overcome enormous economic difficulties and setting it firmly on the road to economic modernization and development. In addition Israel received indirect economic support through large amounts of foreign exchange from Germany. Under the Federal Law of Restitution and Indemnification of 1953, the West German government paid billions of marks in reparations, mostly to individuals, out of which large portions went to Jewish recipients in Israel and to the Israeli government. By the year 2000, overall payments had reached more than DM 100 billion, one-third of which went as payments to individuals in Israel.

The ARAB LEAGUE, as well as individual Arab governments, attempted to change the Israel agreement, but they failed to influence either the negotiations or the later ratification procedure. The Arab states did not question Germany's moral obligation to pay reparations for injustices done to Jews, but they maintained that Israel was not the legal heir of individual Jewish victims and therefore could not put forward its own claims. Moreover, the Arab states maintained that because Israel rejected UNITED NATIONS resolutions demanding compensation for the Palestinian refugees, it had no right to compensation recognized by INTERNATIONAL LAW. In West Germany opponents of the reparations agreement argued that Israel was in a state of war with the Arab world and that as a neutral country, Germany should not support one of the belligerent parties. At the same time, opponents stressed Germany's own dire financial situation and its need to rebuild from the war's destruction.

The most serious Arab argument was that strengthening Israel's economy would increase its military potential and thus its ability to commit acts of aggression on its neighbors. Adenauer answered Arab objections by declaring that the agreement's provisions forbade Israel from using the monies to purchase arms or other war materials. This argument was particularly unconvincing, because all payments under the restitution agreement would increase Israel's available resources for military production or purchases of arms from abroad. Arab critics pointed out, moreover, that 60 percent of the goods on the "Schedule of Commodities" appended to the Israel agreement were classified as "strategic goods" and as such were on the German embargo lists for its trade with Eastern Europe. Indeed, Adenauer's policy of "moral recovery," which was to convince the world that he represented a new "other" Germany, had its own pressing agenda. But it was not part of a policy that involved justice in a universal sense. The Germans involved in negotiating the reparation payments never considered the impact their support of Israel might have on the Palestinians, who, forced to flee their homes and fields, had to bear a large share of the cost for resettling the Jewish refugees.

Military Cooperation with Israel. During the 1950s and early 1960s, West Germany was preoccupied with economic growth, political integration in the West, and the problem of Germany's division into East and West (after the Soviet takeover in 1949). As a result the republic did not pursue a clearly formulated policy in areas outside the world of the big powers. This was even more the case when Germany was confronted—as it was in the Middle East—with a regional conflict that did not fit neatly into Cold War politics. For different reasons both parties to the conflict were important to Germany, but neutrality in the Arab-Israeli conflict and reasonably good relations with both sides—a policy successfully pursued by smaller European states and some nonaligned countries—proved at first difficult and finally impossible for Germany.

For one thing the Arab market appeared highly promising for German exports and direct investments, while some Arab states became increasingly vital suppliers of oil. Additionally, the growing number of independent Arab states that formed a significant bloc in international politics and at the United Nations—and could have been supporters of the German cause—were lost due to Germany's relations with Israel. Well aware of these factors, the Near East section of the German Foreign Office repeatedly urged the German government to avoid policies that could impair Germany's traditionally good relationship with the Arab world. Germany, however, while fulfilling its obligations to Israel under the restitution agreement, also undertook close economic cooperation and intensive secret diplomacy in the field of security and military cooperation with the Jewish state. Under intense pressure from the UNITED STATES, Germany established official diplomatic relations with Israel in 1965—something that would have been unthinkable back in 1952. However, Washington also cautioned Germany not to risk its good relationship with the Arabs, because the Suez War of 1956 had led to hostile relations between most major Western countries and the Arab states.

In the years after the Suez War and the disruption of US supplies, Israel had difficulties in acquiring arms from abroad in the quantities it desired. At the same time, Tel Aviv was looking for export markets for its own incipient arms production. Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION privately contacted Germany in this context, but news of his contact was leaked in December 1957 and provoked heated debates in the Knesset, followed by a government crisis. This in turn aroused Arab fears, which the German government could have allayed by stating that it would not deliver military equipment to Israel. Nevertheless, Franz-Josef Strauss, the German minister of defense, and SHIMON PERES, at that time an official in the Israeli Ministry of Defense, had already met in 1957 and continued to meet during the following years regarding military trade. Their meetings led to secret technical cooperation and the delivery on loan to Israel of small amounts of military equipment, excluding arms proper. Ben-Gurion's first meeting with Adenauer, on 14 March 1960 in New York, paved the way not only for a secret agreement on massive German economic aid but also for the delivery of major quantities of arms to Israel.

Keeping the arms deliveries secret proved increasingly difficult after the German government, at US instigation, made a second agreement in 1964 to deliver to Israel 200 American M-48 Patton tanks, 50 transport and reconnaissance airplanes, 15 helicopters, 6 speedboats, and 2 submarines. When the German press began to report these deliveries in the autumn of 1964, Ludwig Erhard, Adenauer's successor, sent an emissary to Cairo to appease Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR. But Nasir was furious when he learned about the details and reacted by inviting East German party leader and state council president Walter Ulbricht on an official state visit. Because Nasir's invitation to Ulbricht was an unfriendly act toward West Germany, Erhard's government at first tried to persuade Nasir to revoke the invitation. When Nasir did not change his position, Erhard offered to stop the arms deliveries to Israel and eventually warned EGYPT that the consequences of diplomatically recognizing East Germany (the German Democratic Republic) could include economic sanctions and the end of diplomatic relations, as stated in the German Hallstein Doctrine. The doctrine (in effect from 1955 to 1969) stated that West Germany had the exclusive right to represent the entire German nation (East and West) and that West Germany would not maintain diplomatic relations with any state that recognized East Germany in matters of foreign policy.

Although Nasir ignored these pressures and proceeded with the Ulbricht invitation, he did not diplomatically recognize the East German government. Nevertheless, Erhard felt rebuffed—particularly as he had stopped the arms deliveries without getting anything in return. On 7 March 1965 he therefore decided to discontinue economic aid to Egypt, to establish diplomatic relations with Israel, and to put German policy in the Middle East on a new foundation. The government's press release announcing the new policies emphasized that the decision not to deliver arms to areas of conflict now or in the future was an important contribution to a well-formulated Middle East policy. Yet, important as it might have been, it came too late: West German policy for some time to come was a policy without Arab partners. When Germany and Israel announced the establishment of diplomatic relations on 13 May 1965, all Arab governments recalled their ambassadors to Germany, and ten out of the thirteen broke off diplomatic relations with Germany.

The German government—most of all Chancellor Erhard himself—proved blind to the implications of such a massive supply of arms to one side in the Arab-Israeli conflict. In January 1967, almost two years after the arms deliveries had ended, former defense minister Strauss told a German journalist that he fully agreed with Adenauer on establishing relations with Israel. He said he had been convinced from the outset that military cooperation with the Jewish state was not only a duty of reparation but that support of Israel in the field where blood was involved was morally and politically of particular importance, since millions of Jews had been killed with German weapons.

The 1967 War and After. During the final weeks leading up to the 1967 WAR between Israel and SYRIA, JORDAN, and Egypt, Germans believed that Israel was facing a fight for its survival and that the survivors of the Nazi genocide might again be threatened with annihilation. The emotional identification with Israel, therefore, and the great relief when Israel easily won the war were all-embracing. Though the government maintained a carefully phrased policy of noninterference, the leaders of all four political parties represented in the Bundestag left little doubt that they held Nasir and the other Arab leaders responsible for the war and voiced clear sympathy for Israel.

The MEDIA, too, were fully on the side of Israel, some of them reporting very aggressively about Israel's "lightning war" and "lightning victory." The German public also came to the aid of Israel with unprecedented intensity. Millions of German marks were collected within days, thousands of Germans donated blood, and thousands volunteered for civil tasks in Israel. For the German government the situation after the war was not conducive to an active Mideast policy with the Arabs. Since 1969, when a grand coalition was formed between the Christian Democrats under Kurt Kiesinger as chancellor and the Social Democrats with Willy Brandt as foreign minister, a state of immobility had crept into politics and society. In relation to the Arab-Israeli conflict, such immobility was starkly evident when Germany was silent about Israel's early actions in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, which evoked international criticism (even among European partners of Germany, many of whom had fully supported Israel during the weeks leading up to the war). On the other hand, it was difficult for Germany, which had no diplomatic presence in any Arab capital during the crisis, to improve its relationship with the Arab states after their triple no to peace and negotiations at their summit in Khartoum in August 1967. Moreover, major Arab states began to establish closer relations with the Soviet Union and other Warsaw Pact states, and five of them, including Egypt, SYRIA, and IRAQ, established full diplomatic relations with East Germany in the spring of 1969, although five other Arab states had returned their ambassadors to the West German capital of Bonn.

While June 1967 and the following months probably saw the lowest point in German-Arab relations, the effects of the war slowly produced changes on two levels. Soon after the war, without taking a political position concerning Israel's policy, the German government considerably increased its aid to the UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (UNRWA). ISRAELI MILITARISM in 1967, followed by the OCCUPATION, made it more acceptable to show some concern for the Palestinians. During the first five years of UNRWA's existence Germany had made only one contribution, but during fiscal year 1955–1956 it began to make regular annual contributions to UNRWA's budget, starting with a modest DM 70,000 (US$16,000, 1956) per year. In 1958, Germany increased its contribution more than tenfold, paid DM 1 million (over $250,000) annually from 1959 onward, and doubled this sum in 1965. In 1962 and 1963, Germany made an extra donation of DM 3 million (over $750,000) for vocational training.

Soon after the 1967 War Germany became a major supporter of UNRWA. While continuing to pay a fixed annual contribution to UNRWA's budget, the German government earmarked a special fund of an additional DM 50 million (over $12 million) to be used, at the rate of up to DM 10 million ($2.5 million) a year, for special projects for Palestinian refugees. Germany's overall contribution to UNRWA reached DM 4 million in 1968, then increased to sums between DM 11.5 million and 12 million (between $2.8 million and $3 million) during the following years. At first the special fund was used to build shelters, improve the INFRASTRUCTURE (ROADS, sanitation, and WATER supplies), and provide supplementary food and educational services in refugee camps in Jordan and Syria. Later the fund was used for specific projects—for example, the expansion of a vocational training center, the construction and operation of schools and health centers, and a university scholarship program in camps located in LEBANON, Syria, Jordan, and Palestine. Germany's involvement in the relief work for Palestinian refugees has continued ever since—in spite of severe budget cuts in recent years.

The aftermath of the 1967 War coincided in Germany with the emergence of a multiform, fragmented leftist movement at the universities in the larger cities—foremost in (West) Berlin. Particularly among communist and other radical groups and splinter parties, “solidarity with the just struggle of the Palestinian people” soon became one of their battle cries. By the early 1970s the PLO, or at least one or another of its member organizations—especially the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP) and the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP)—were widely celebrated as part of the great liberation movements of the day. Their struggle for a democratic state of Palestine was presented as an integral part of the “fight against US imperialism,” while many considered Israel to be the US spearhead in the Middle East. The identification was so strong and the cooperation so close that some members of the terrorist Red Army Faction even received military training in Palestinian camps in Lebanon.

While they claimed to be merely ANTI-ZIONIST, many German leftists revealed strong ANTI-SEMITIC tendencies in their leaflets and newspapers. Many leaders of this new German left compared Israeli politics in Palestine to Nazi politics, and some referred to Zionists as “the present-day Nazis,” while Israeli politicians were accused of being aggressors and terrorists who were turning the Occupied Territories into “a single concentration camp” for Palestinians. In 1975 legitimacy for such positions came from an unexpected quarter when the UN General Assembly passed the widely quoted UN RESOLUTION 3379 (rescinded in 1991), stating that “ZIONISM is a form of racism and racial discrimination.”

At the same time, anti-Semitic tendencies were strongly criticized, not least by members of the older generation of the left who were sympathetic to Israel—for example, the well-known writers Günter Grass and Heinrich Böll. However, quite a few younger intellectuals of the left, although critical of Israel's policy in the Occupied Territories, were even more critical of the younger emerging radical left. This was particularly pronounced during Israel's 1982 LEBANON WAR, when elements of the radical left again accused Israel of fascist tendencies and compared Israeli behavior in Lebanon to Nazi politics in the Soviet-occupied territories of Eastern Europe.

Limits to Germany's New Policy of “Even-Handedness.” When Willy Brandt formed a new coalition government of his Social Democratic Party with the Free Democratic Party in 1969, the international situation was finally conducive to a reformulation of German foreign policy. In his first government declaration, on 28 October, Brandt stated that his government would seek diplomatic relations in a spirit of “even-handedness” with all states in the Middle East. By referring to UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242 of 22 November 1967 as a balanced basis for a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, Brandt connected his Middle East policy from the outset with the principles of his policy of détente in Europe: rejection of violence as a means in politics, the right to existence, recognition, the security of all states, and a permanent settlement of BORDERS on the basis of international guarantees. The fundamental principle of Resolution 242 is “land in exchange for peace,” and the resolution is quite balanced with regard to Israel and the Arab states. But it says nothing about the Palestinians except a reference to the refugees.

The Arab states welcomed the change in German policy but, after their former experiences, hesitated to resume diplomatic relations before they saw how German-Israeli relations would develop. Most Arab governments, moreover, did not feel any urgency, because economic relations with and development aid from Germany had been good even without diplomatic relations during the preceding years. Brandt's government did not rush to reestablish diplomatic relations either, because its primary objective was improving relations with the Soviet Union and other Eastern European states, including East Germany. It took more than five years until all Arab states had either resumed or for the first time established diplomatic relations with Germany.

While Chancellor Brandt and Foreign Minister Walter Scheel concentrated on their Ostpolitik, the test case for a new policy in the Middle East came soon. When the six founding members of the European Community (EC) established the EPC in November 1969 to coordinate their policies on the US-Soviet Strategic Arms Limitation Talks, the second task for the EPC was monitoring the situation in the Middle East. The EPC established the framework for the EC's Middle East policy for the next twenty years, followed by the Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP) after the European Union (EU) replaced the EC, so that "even-handedness," impartial treatment of both Israel and the Palestinians, became the guiding principle of their Middle East policy.

Even-handedness, however, had its problems. At their first meeting on the Middle East in May 1971, the six foreign ministers accepted a working paper proposed by FRANCE that went beyond UN Resolution 242—at least beyond Israel's reading of it—in three major areas. It implied an Israeli withdrawal from all Occupied Territories, referred to the right of the Palestinian refugees to return to their homes, and suggested the internationalization of JERUSALEM. Although the Arab states welcomed the unpublished paper, Israel totally rejected it based on its opposition to the internationalization of Jerusalem, which Tel Aviv considered its united, eternal capital; the return of the Occupied Territories to the Palestinians; and the return of the refugees. Harsh criticism was voiced in the German media, too, and Scheel had to go to Jerusalem to explain the paper to the Israeli government. While defending the working paper as such, Scheel pointed out several areas in which his government's position differed from the text. In the end Scheel managed to restore the Israeli government's trust in Germany's policy, but he deeply angered the French by his withdrawal from the common position.

The affair revealed a structural dilemma in the EC's Middle East policy: like Germany in its efforts to be more balanced within the EC, other European countries also started from an essentially pro-Israel position. The EPC, therefore, for a long time had to face quite opposite reactions from their Middle Eastern partners because any shift in the status quo tended to go too far for Israel and not far enough for the Arabs. Germany, moreover, had to face an additional dilemma: because of its historical responsibility for the genocide of the European Jews, close cooperation with Israel was mandatory but broken relations with the Arab states needed mending. Thus Germany was particularly susceptible to criticism and pressure in situations of intensified conflict, such as the 1973 OCTOBER WAR. When the German government declared its strict neutrality and stopped the US Armed Forces from loading war material stockpiled in Germany on Israeli ships, Bonn received harsh criticism from the Israeli government and press. Such neutrality, commented the daily Ma'ariv, would indirectly encourage genocide just to secure the uninterrupted delivery of oil.

Germany nevertheless supported the EPC resolution of 6 November 1973, which stated that a just and lasting peace in the Middle East must take into account "the legitimate rights of the Palestinians." A few days later, Israeli prime minister GOLDA MEIR asked Chancellor Brandt to persuade the other European countries to pursue a less "pro-Arab policy." Although Brandt assured her that the special character of German-Israeli relations would remain, his government did not dissociate itself from the EPC resolution. In the following years Germany actually managed to use the EPC framework as a foreign policy tool to maneuver among Arab demands, Israeli protests, and US misgivings. Together with other EC members, the governments of Brandt and (as of May 1974) Helmut Schmidt began gradually to take a more "pro-Arab" stance. The slowly changing position can be sensed in the shifting terminology of the EPC resolutions from "the Palestinians" to "the Palestinian people" who have "legitimate rights," a "national identity," and a "need for a homeland." No longer just a refugee problem, the Palestinian issue moved into the very center of any resolution to the Middle East conflict.

Some crucial points were introduced as German initiatives, in particular, in the mid-1970s, the "right to self-determination." Berlin felt strongly about this, because Germany at that time demanded (with reference to East Germany) the right to self-determination for all Germans, and thus could not deny the same right to the Palestinian people. Other Europeans hesitated to accept this point, and Foreign Minister Hans Dietrich Genscher eventually raised it on his own. At a press conference during an official visit to Egypt in September 1979, he outlined six principles for a Middle East peace settlement, the first being the right to self-determination. However, Genscher had misjudged how negatively Israel's foreign minister MOSHE DAYAN would react, and when Dayan visited Germany one week later, there were harsh words between the two politicians. Genscher eventually added that the implementation of Palestinian self-determination would need the agreement of all parties concerned. Since this meant that Israel could veto the exercise of any of the Palestinian rights enumerated in Genscher's principles, his initiative was effectively ended.

Nevertheless, in the VENICE DECLARATION of 13 June 1980 the EC finally demanded that the Palestinian people "exercise fully its right to self-determination" and that the PLO, which had not been mentioned in any previous resolution of the EPC, "will have to be associated with the negotiations." The Venice Declaration, the most carefully worded and comprehensive of all EPC declarations, was the foundation of European diplomacy during the next two decades (until it was superseded by the ROAD MAP). Yet this European peace initiative, which could have implemented at least some elements needed to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, never even got off the ground because of intense Israeli and US opposition.

The unfulfilled hopes accompanying the Venice Declaration as well as Genscher's aborted initiative were not the only illustrations of the difficulties facing a policy of even-handedness in a context of vast power asymmetries. Germany experienced several other confrontations with Israel. For example, in July 1979 Brandt and his Austrian counterpart, Bruno Kreisky, met with PLO chairman Arafat in their capacities as president and executive council member, respectively, of the Socialist International; the Israeli government and media were outraged and heaped disapprobation on the two. When Chancellor Helmut Schmidt negotiated a multimillion-dollar sale of the highly advanced German Leopard II tank to SAUDI ARABIA in April 1981, Israeli prime minister MENAHEM BEGIN issued vitriolic attacks on the German leader. In January 1984 Chancellor Helmut Kohl addressed the Israeli Knesset and remarked that he had come to Israel not laden with guilt from the Nazi period because he had "the grace of the late birth" (that is, being born after the HOLOCAUST), and the comment raised angry responses. Incidents like these explain why Germany and other European countries attempted to make low-profile Middle East policy statements during the late 1970s and most of the 1980s.

Concurrent developments in the Middle East supported such an approach. The suspension of Egypt's membership in the Arab League after President Anwar Sadat's peace initiative and peace treaty with Israel isolated the strongest Arab player from the majority of Arab states. And the ongoing civil war in Lebanon continued to deepen tensions in the Arab world. Finally, when Iraqi president Saddam Husayn initiated the war with IRAN in September 1980, different Arab states supported opposing sides, so that cleavages in the region made a consistent Middle East policy even more difficult for the Europeans.

With the beginning of the INTIFADA in December 1987, the EC's Middle East policy began to regain some direction, with a number of EPC resolutions supporting the Palestinians in their legitimate demands without fully supporting their struggle for an independent state. In particular the twelve member states of the EC welcomed the acceptance by the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC), in Algiers in November 1988, of UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

East Germany and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict

The beginnings of East Germany's Middle East policy were in many ways linked to the relations between East and West Germany. Although East Germany always insisted on Israel's right to exist, official relations were never established. During the first few years after the founding of East Germany in 1949, its government denied Jewish and Israeli requests to pay reparations along the lines of West Germany's agreement with Israel. East Germany justified its position by stating that it was founded by those Germans who had actively fought the Nazis or had suffered in concentration camps themselves; moreover, it was already paying high reparations to Russia and Poland.

Later, West Germany successfully isolated East Germany internationally with its Hallstein Doctrine, which Israel, with its close relations to the West Germany, had to accept. Not a single Arab state had established full diplomatic relations with East Germany, although Egypt, Syria, and Iraq had some low-level relations at the consular and trade levels. West Germany, on the other hand, had been hesitant to formalize its relations with Israel because some Arab states had turned the Hallstein Doctrine around and threatened that they would fully recognize East Germany if West Germany established diplomatic ties with Israel. When West Germany eventually did this in 1965, East Germany began to intensify its Middle East policy through full recognition of the Arab states, among the first being Egypt, Syria, and Iraq, which came shortly after Chancellor Brandt declared his policy of even-handedness.

During the Suez War and several later occasions, East Germany declared its solidarity with the Arab states, which included references to the Palestinian problem, although, like West Germany's statements during the 1950s and early 1960s, only as a refugee problem. This changed earlier in East Germany than in West Germany. During Ulbricht's visit to Egypt, East Germany recognized "all rights of the Arab people of Palestine including its inalienable right to self-determination." During the following years, particularly after 1967, the tone of East Germany's declarations on the Arab-Israeli conflict became sharper and, to a remarkable extent, resembled the arguments of the radical left in West Germany. Several Arab states and in particular the PLO were seen as allies in the struggle against US imperialism, of which Israel was at the forefront. The close relations between West Germany and Israel mirrored the relationship between East Germany and the PLO, which pitted the two pairs on opposing sides of the Cold War.

During the second half of the 1960s, East Germany had already started direct contacts with Palestinians on the level of youth, student, labor, women's, and other organizations that were PLO-dependent. The East German leadership, however, hesitated for quite some time to establish official relations with the PLO or with individual member organizations, particularly FATAH, the PFLP, and the DFLP, because they were increasingly associated with terrorism. Even though a PLO delegation headed by Arafat had visited East Germany in 1971, it was not a state visit but a "private" invitation by the Afro-Asian Solidarity Committee. Relations with the Palestinians began to change in 1972, when Erich Honecker was elected general secretary of the ruling Socialist Unity Party (SED). Following the Palestinian Black September attack on the Israeli Olympic team on 4 September 1972, East Germany deported a large number of Palestinian students and refused reentry to several hundred others who were returning from their vacations. The government condemned the Munich attack and made future cooperation with the PLO dependent on their promise not to allow similar actions. The PLO accepted this condition, and the responsibility for following it rested with Abu Iyad (SALAH KHALAF), the PLO head of security, who became a regular visitor to East Germany. During the following year, official relations between East Germany and the PLO were established. After several high-level discussions in Berlin, an SED delegation went to Lebanon in June, where the necessary agreements were finalized. On Arafat's next visit to East Berlin, where he was a guest at the World Festival of Youth and Students, the Agreement of Cooperation was signed on 2 August 1973. This agreement detailed several important points, the most significant for the PLO being official recognition by East Germany and permission to set up a representative office in Berlin (which opened in spring 1974). The most controversial point was East Germany's obligation to supply the PLO "goods of the non-civilian sector"—that is, military goods.

Military cooperation between East Germany and the PLO increased after 1976 at the request of the PLO, but it was eventually formalized in a June 1979 agreement between the East Germany Ministry of State Security (MfS) and the United Security of the Palestinian Revolution (USPR), formed by the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE to coordinate the various security services. The new accord included military training for the PLO Security Services, support of PLO security with operative technologies (including Western technology provided on a commercial basis by an East German firm with close connections to West German businessmen and politicians), and the delivery of arms, including Kalashnikov submachine guns, precision guns, hand grenades, mines, and other explosives. The USPR was a good partner for the MfS, because the relationship allowed the MfS to obtain information not only about Palestinian activities abroad—such as airplane hijackings, hostage situations, the liquidation of enemy persons, or the occupation of embassies—but also about Palestinian or other international terrorist connections in East Germany. These included the West German Organization of International Revolutionaries (RAF) of “Carlos” (Ramirez Sanchez)—groups whose leaders were using East Germany as a place of refuge (as were the heads of radical Palestinian splinter groups like ABU NIDAL and Mahmud Odeh/Abu Daoud).

The cooperation between the PLO and East Germany, particularly the MfS, intensified over the years with a constant revolving door of delegations on different functional levels. When Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat started peace negotiations with Israel, Palestinians feared this might lead to a separate peace and threaten their own situation. After Arafat visited Berlin in March 1978, East Germany upgraded the PLO office to the status of “permanent representation,” followed by an agreement on cultural and scientific cooperation. Moreover, East Germany established relations with Israeli communists and the PALESTINIAN COMMUNIST PARTY. When the Israeli army defeated Arafat and the PLO leadership in Beirut in 1982 and drove them out of the country, PLO representation in Berlin was again upgraded to an embassy, with full diplomatic status. The split within Fatah after the disaster in Lebanon and the evacuation of the PLO leadership and military forces to TUNIS affected the PLO’s relationship with East Germany, as leading personalities from all warring factions had strong personal contacts in East Germany. After the PNC in Algiers declared Palestinian independence and proclaimed the state of Palestine in November 1988, the PLO Embassy in Berlin was officially renamed the “Embassy of Palestine.” With that decision the Palestinian liberation movement reached in East Germany the highest point of international recognition possible.

Just one year later, on 9 November 1989, the Berlin Wall between East and West Germany came down, and after 3 October 1990, East Germany no longer existed. The Palestinian Embassy in East Berlin was closed, and the relations between the new united German government and the Palestinians remained limited. A small PLO office within the building of the Delegation of the Arab League in Bonn, the interim German capital, headed by ‘Abd-Allah Frangi, was tolerated.

The dramatic international changes that brought about the end of East Germany had parallels in the Middle East as well. Because of the GULF WAR, the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE, the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES in 1993, and the Oslo Process (including the creation of the PNA in Gaza and Jericho in 1994), the region underwent major transformations. When Germany established relations with the PNA, the PLO office in Bonn was finally recognized, and Frangi was accorded diplomatic status as plenipotentiary of the PNA in Bonn.

United Germany and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict

The process of unification had little direct impact on Germany’s Middle East policy. For German politicians the major issue with the Middle East was the negative reaction of many Israelis to the prospect of a strong Germany emerging again—a fear shared by many people in France, Poland, and other European countries. This would explain why Germany, although it was no longer limited in its sovereignty by allied power prerogatives, still maintained a low profile in the Middle East, leaving action to fellow Europeans in their common EPC.

Ten years later, when the United States was building its “Coalition of the Willing” to bring down the Iraqi regime, Germany refused to join. While this was consistent with Germany’s low-profile policy, it did not mean that Germany was unconcerned about Iraq: Germany participated in the air defense of TURKEY, sent ships to the eastern Mediterranean, after the war sent mine sweepers to the Gulf, and contributed at least US$12 billion to the United States’ Desert Shield and Desert Storm operations—the second largest foreign contribution after Japan.

This low-profile policy did not change substantially when Klaus Kinkel took over from Hans-Dietrich Genscher as vice-chancellor and foreign minister in 1992, or later when the Europeans, after the Maastricht Treaties of 1993, increased their cooperation with the CFSP. A chance for Germany to show some independence in the Middle East came with the Declaration of Principles in September 1993 between the PLO and Israel, which set the goal of establishing Palestinian self-government, and the resultant GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT II in May 1994. Taking advantage of Israel's new relationship with the PLO and Germany's early and close cooperation with the PNA, Germany became the largest bilateral donor to the Palestinians, as well as donating multilaterally through EU projects. Moreover, it negotiated an agreement with Israel that the DM 140 million that Israel had received annually after the 1960 Adenauer–Ben-Gurion accord would slowly be phased out and transferred to infrastructure projects in the Palestinian territories and in Jordan. The mutual trust established with the PNA during the second half of the 1990s suddenly opened up the rare chance that Germany—or a German—might play an active role in the Middle East peace process. German foreign minister Joschka Fischer was in Israel when a Palestinian SUICIDE BOMBER blew himself up at the entrance to a Tel Aviv beachside disco on 2 June 2001, killing twenty-one young Israelis. Acting as a mediator, Fischer was able to convince Arafat to issue a clear public condemnation of the attack—addressed in Arabic to Arafat's own people and not just in English for foreign consumption. At the same time, Fischer dissuaded Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON from ordering the expected revenge air raids—at least for a time. During the following months, Fischer maintained close contact with both Sharon and Arafat and coordinated closely with other European nations to develop his own variant of a peace plan. Eventually Fischer's plan helped bring the Europeans into a QUARTET with the United States, Russia, and the United Nations, which together developed in 2003 the Road Map for a resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Berlin was even mentioned as a possible neutral site for high-level talks between Israel and the Palestinians. Eventually Fischer's endeavors to impress moderation on both sides failed because of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA and Sharon's commitment to quell it at all costs, which resulted in an endless spiral of violence and counterviolence.

See also ARAB STATES; CHINA; EUROPEAN UNION; FRANCE; IRAN; MOSCOW; TURKEY

Bibliography

- Ali, Luay. Die deutsch-arabischen Beziehungen von 1949–1965. Münster: LIT, 1998.
- Allen, David, and Alfred Pijpers, eds. European Foreign Policy-Making and the Arab-Israeli Conflict. The Hague: Nijhoff, 1984.
- Bernstein, Reiner, Yasmin Hamdan, and Karlheinz Schneider, eds. Der Palästina-Konflikt: Geschichte, Positionen, Perspektiven. Bad Wörrishofen: W.P. Sachon, 1983.
- Blasius, Rainer. "Völkerfreundschaft am Nil: Ägypten und die DDR im Februar 1965." Vierteljahreshefte für Zeitgeschichte. 46 (1998).
- Buettner, Friedemann. "Germany's Middle East Policy: The Dilemmas of a 'Policy of Evenhandedness.'" In Politik der Ausgewogenheit. Edited by Haim Goren. Göttingen: Wallstein Verlag, 2003.
- Büttner, Friedemann, and Peter Hünseler. "Die politischen Beziehungen zwischen der Bundesrepublik Deutschland und den arabischen Staaten: Entwicklung, Stand und Perspektiven." In Deutsch-arabische Beziehungen. Edited by Karl Kaiser and Udo Steinbach. Munich and Vienna: R. Oldenbourg, 1981.
- Büttner, Friedemann, and Martin Landgraf. "The European Community's Middle Eastern Policy: The New Order of Europe and the Gulf Crisis." In The Gulf War and the New World Order: International Relations of the Middle East. Edited by Tareq Y. Ismael and Jacqueline S. Ismael. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.
- Chubin, Shahram, ed. Germany and the Middle East. Patterns and Prospects. London: Pinter Publishers, 1992.
- Dachs, Gisela, ed. Deutsche, Israelis und Palästinenser. Ein schwieriges Verhältnis. Heidelberg: Palmyra Verlag, 1999.
- Defrates, John F. "The Federal Republic of Germany and the Palestinian Refugees." Orient. 14:3 (1972–1973).
- Gardner Feldman, Lily. The Special Relationship between West Germany and Israel. Boston, London, and Sydney: George Allen and Unwin, 1984.
- Goren, Haim, ed. Germany and the Middle East: Past, Present, and Future. Jerusalem: The Hebrew University Magnes Press, 2003.
- Greilsammer, Ilan, and Joseph Weiler. Europe's Middle East Dilemma: The Quest for a Unified Stance. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1987.
- Hafez, Kai. "Von der nationalen Frage zur Systempolitik: Perioden der DDR-Nahostpolitik, 1949–1989." Orient. 36:1 (1995).
- Hansen, Niels. "Geheimvorhaben. Frank/Kol.' Zur deutsch-israelischen Rüstungszusammenarbeit 1957 bis 1965." Historisch-Politische Mitteilungen. Archiv für Christlich-Demokratische Politik. 6 (1999).
- Hansen, Niels, and Asher Ben Natan, eds. Israel und Deutschland. Dorniger Weg zur Partnerschaft. Die Botschafter berichten über vier Jahrzehnte diplomatische Beziehungen (1965–2005). Köln/Weimar: Böhlau, 2005.
- Hünseler, Peter. Die außenpolitischen Beziehungen der Bundesrepublik Deutschland zu den arabischen Staaten von 1949–1980. Frankfurt: Lang, 1990.
- Jaeger, Kinan. Quadratur des Dreiecks: Die deutsch-israelischen Beziehungen und die Palästinenser. Schwalbach/Ts.: Wochenschau-Verlag, 1997.

- . “Der ‘Staat Palästina.’ Herausforderung deutscher Außenpolitik.” Aus Politik und Zeitgeschichte. B 49 (2000).
- Jelinek, Yeshayahu A. Deutschland und Israel 1945–1965: Ein neurotisches Verhältnis. München: Oldenbourg, 2004.
- , ed. Zwischen Moral und Realpolitik: Deutsch-israelische Beziehungen 1945–1965. Eine Dokumentensammlung. Gerlingen: Bleicher, 1997.
- Kloke, Martin W. Israel und die deutsche Linke: Zur Geschichte eines schwierigen Verhältnisses, 2nd ed. Frankfurt am Main: Haag + Herchen, 1994.
- Lavy, George. Germany and Israel: Moral Debt and National Interest. London: Frank Cass, 1996.
- Mouna, Ziad. “The Palestine Liberation Organization and the German Democratic Republic.” Orient. 36:1 (1995).
- Neustadt, Amnon. Die deutsch-israelischen Beziehungen im Schatten der EG-Nahostpolitik. Frankfurt am Main: Haag + Herchen, 1983.
- Perthes, Volker, ed. Germany and the Middle East: Interests and Options. Berlin: Heinrich Böll Foundation, Stiftung Wissenschaft und Politik, 2002.
- Polkahn, Klaus. “Die DDR und Palästina.” Aus Politik und Zeitgeschichte. B 38 (1999).
- Scheffler, Thomas. “Schuld und Politik: Zur Geschichte der Beziehungen zwischen der Bundesrepublik und Israel.” Das schmerzhaft Dreieck. Deutsche—Israelis—Palästinenser. Israel & Palästina (Special Issue). 27 (1991).
- Schwanitz, Wolfgang, ed. Deutschland und der Mittlere Osten. Leipzig: Leipziger Univ.-Verl, 2004.
- Schäfer, Isabel, and Dorothee Schmid. “Ein Tandem für Nahost: Deutschlands und Frankreichs Beitrag für eine Konfliktlösung.” Internationale Politik. (2006).
- Timm, Angelika. Hammer, Zirkel, Davidstern: Das gestörte Verhältnis der DDR zu Zionismus und Staat Israel. Bonn: Bouvier, 1997.
- Vogel, Rolf, ed. Deutschlands Weg nach Israel: Eine Dokumentation. Stuttgart: Seewald, 1967.
- Weingardt, Markus A. Deutsche Israel- und Nahostpolitik: Die Geschichte einer Gratwanderung seit 1949. Frankfurt/Main and New York: Campus, 2002.

—Friedemann Büttner

Gesher

The Gesher (Bridge) Party was set up by DAVID LEVY, a leader of the disaffected MIZRAHIM and SEPHARDIM communities, as a breakaway from the LIKUD PARTY during the thirteenth Knesset after he lost the Likud leadership elections to BENJAMIN NETANYAHU.

Levy refused to accept Netanyahu as the new Likud chairman, and in general the internal Likud politics at the time were stormy. Netanyahu’s management tactics angered many Likud supporters, while his right-wing rhetoric gained the confidence of ARIEL SHARON, BENJAMIN BEGIN, and the hard-line party members. Levy knew that if he was cowed by his suave nemesis, Netanyahu, his supporters would either join Netanyahu’s camp in order to oppose the new OSLO ACCORDS or go the opposite direction and back a more socialist candidate. He also knew that Netanyahu would not be willing to give him one of the top four ministries should the Likud return to power after his disastrous term as foreign minister.

Levy mistakenly believed he could draw a mass defection of parliament members from the Likud, and such a situation would lead senior party members on the Central Committee into a panic that would topple Netanyahu. What instead occurred was that only David Magen, a rather obscure Moroccan politician and former mayor of Kiryat Gat who served as minister of economics and planning in the last YITZHAK SHAMIR government, broke with the Likud. Though many of Gesher’s members were derided by the press as lackeys of Levy, Magen would prove to be independent, and later would break with Levy to join the Center Party (then known as Israel in the Center) in 1998.

Gesher on its own never reached the potential Levy predicted for it, but it helped revitalize the Likud and bring in new members. The disaffected populist leader Levy faced the disadvantages of the constant press attention to the Oslo Accords, waves of terror attacks, rumors of negotiations surrounding the future of the Golan Heights, and the low priority that the MEDIA gave to economic and labor issues. Levy had to walk a fine line between opposing Netanyahu’s hard-line rhetoric too harshly and not making enough noise (which would cause his own members to lose interest). The idea of joining the LABOR PARTY openly, even in coalition, was at that time still unacceptable to many Moroccans and other Mizrahim resentful of the old MAPAI that had preceded Labor.

By winter 1995, Levy was beginning to break under the stress of his first election campaign outside of the Likud. Netanyahu, similarly, needed as much street power as possible, even if Levy’s was significantly reduced from the past. After the assassination of Rabin on 5 November 1995, Netanyahu had attempted to moderate his image from the hard-line demagogue that many bereaved Israelis saw him as, into merely a skeptic who wanted to slow the pace of concessions to PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT. Levy's inclusion would bring him somewhat closer to that goal without forcing him to take a clear stand in favor of the Oslo Accords. The opposition leader was trying to bridge the gap by recruiting the hard-line TZOMET (Junction) party of General Rafael Eitan on the right, as well as the moderate right-wing general Yitzhak Mordechai in the center.

Throughout the spring, Netanyahu and Levy held negotiations, and in the end Levy agreed to establish Likud-Gesher-Tzomet, a joint three-party list for the May 1996 elections. The 1996 elections were a huge success for Netanyahu, but they brought little gain to Gesher or Levy in terms of personal power. The real number two leader in the Likud was now Mordechai, and the right-wing character of the government was clear from the start. Levy demanded leadership of the Foreign Ministry, which he received believing that through this post he could remain in control of the ministry. Instead he was again overshadowed by Netanyahu, who controlled almost every important foreign policy decision during his term.

On 6 January 1998 David Levy quit the coalition, along with former ambassador to France Yehuda Lancry and his brother and former Lod mayor Maxim. Gesher was once again independent, and Levy drifted closer to the policies of the Labor Party and opposition leader EHUD BARAK. The total lack of progress on the peace front had created cracks in his enemy Netanyahu's foundation. In early 1997 Minister of Science Benny Begin had broken from the Likud to reform HERUT, a group opposed to the WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM of that year and the ceding of most of HEBRON to Palestinian Authority control, and brought with him fellow Likud members David Re'em and Michael Kleiner. Also, a year after Levy left the Likud, Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai left the Likud to form Israel in the Center, a group that hoped to compete with Gesher for moderate voters, and took with him David Magen and Dan Meridor from the Likud.

In 1999 a motion of no-confidence vote in the Knesset forced Netanyahu to call early elections for May. Levy had not yet been able to redevelop

Gesher's street appeal and was faced with four choices:

1. Back Netanyahu: If the incumbent won, Levy would gain far more influence because of the defection of the party's right wing, and if he lost, then Levy would be a prime candidate in the postelection primary.
2. Join Ehud Barak: Other small parties were joining the Labor Party in what would eventually be called ONE ISRAEL. Levy was sure to get a good ministry in the event of a victory.
3. Join Mordechai: The former general is Iraqi, and therefore was guaranteed to draw Mizrahi votes away from the other larger parties, and his centrist platform was very similar to Levy's, yet he started off with far more support.
4. Run independently: Gesher would have to generate an administrative infrastructure it did not yet have, and would depend on Levy's excellent connections with local activists, many of whom would take votes from the Likud. A gain in Knesset seats would force the next prime minister to reckon with him.

Levy chose the second alternative, because preelection polls showed a deep slide in Netanyahu's support. The Likud had fallen from 32 seats to only 20 with the defections of Mordechai, Levy, Begin, and their supporters. Levy made the decision to merge Gesher into One Israel, and became a significant partner in the new coalition's leadership. This angered many former supporters, who viewed this move to One Israel as a betrayal of his Mizrahi followers and the Likud.

With the new system of direct election of the prime minister and a separate election of the Knesset, the number of parties elected to the body increased markedly in 1999 from eleven to fifteen, and the number would grow further as parties subdivided due to political tensions. The winning faction, One Israel, took only 26 seats, a record low for a governing party, though Barak won 56 percent of the direct vote for prime minister. Netanyahu's Likud was defeated as expected, winning only 19 seats and leading to his immediate resignation from the Knesset and public life.

Levy once again was chosen to be foreign minister, with his deputy being Nawaf Mazalha (One Israel), an Arab Israeli with less experience than he. However, Barak continued Netanyahu's policy of firm control of the Foreign Ministry, leaving Levy as no more than a figurehead.

Gesher quit the coalition in April 2000, both in response to Barak's desperate attempts to move peace negotiations forward and in protest against the announced plan to withdraw Israeli military forces from LEBANON.

Levy was the first minister in Barak's government to resign when his demands were not met. He reformed Gesher along with Maxim Levy and rookie legislator Mordechai Mishani. Like Netanyahu, Barak failed to preserve the cooperation once enjoyed by his coalition; the leftist MERETZ PARTY departed at the end of June that year; the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY (NRP), SHAS, and YISRAEL B'ALIYA followed two weeks later. In addition Barak's popularity plummeted following the outbreak of the Second INTIFADA in September 2000. By November the prime minister had resigned in order to bring new elections that would take the form of a direct vote only for prime minister. This hurt Levy, because the format limited the choice in the end to a ballot between Barak and opposition leader Likud's Ariel Sharon.

The prime ministerial elections in February 2001 ended with a landslide victory for Sharon. But the new government offered Levy even fewer benefits than Barak's: because the Likud had only 19 seats, they were forced to form a coalition with One Israel, Shas, Yisrael b'Aliyah, ONE NATION, National Union–Yisrael Beiteinu, UNITED TORAH JUDAISM, and the NRP. Sharon was able to form a coalition without Levy, meaning that for only the second time since 1977, he was left without a ministry in a new government.

In February 2002 One Nation quit Sharon's government to protest his failed economic policies. Their leader, HISTADRUT Labor Federation chairman Amir Peretz, has many similarities to Levy, with one of the few differences being that he had broken from Labor and not the Likud. One month later the rightist National Union–Israel Beiteinu quit the coalition, claiming that Sharon's restraint policy was equivalent to appeasing the PLO.

This situation allowed Levy to enter the coalition in early April, though with almost no influence; he was named Minister Without Portfolio. Not long afterward Shas was fired from the government and was allowed back in, cementing Sharon's stability as prime minister at least until the end of the year. One Israel quit in November 2002 to force elections for January 2003.

Levy's position for the elections was precarious. He stood to gain nothing running with Gesher. With the abandonment of the direct election for prime minister, the Likud was gaining support while sectarian parties were falling apart. In the end, Levy merged Gesher back into the Likud.

Bibliography

- Arian, Asher. Politics in Israel: The Second Republic, 2nd rev. ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press, 2001.
- Elazar, Daniel. Israel at the Polls, 1996. New York: Routledge, 1998.
- . Israel at the Polls, 1999: Israel the First Hundred Years. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Maor, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Al-Ghuri, Emile (1907–1984)

Emile al-Ghuri was a prominent journalist, author, and politician. Born in Jerusalem to a Greek Orthodox family, he later became a leading representative of that community. He obtained an M.A. in Political Science from the University of Cincinnati (Ohio) and published a bilingual weekly in Jerusalem called Arab Federation (al-Wahda al-Arabiyyah).

Al-Ghuri was a strong supporter of AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, the most important Palestinian leader during the BRITISH MANDATE, and played a significant role in Arab nationalist politics during that period. In 1933 al-Ghuri was elected to the ARAB EXECUTIVE and in 1935 became the secretary-general of the ARAB PALESTINE COMMUNIST PARTY. He was a frequent member of ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE (AHC) delegations that were sent abroad to raise funds for the Palestinian cause.

The British arrested him for his political activities in 1941 and prohibited him from returning to Palestine until 1944. Even when al-Ghuri was allowed to return to Palestine, Britain banned him from any political activity (although in 1946–1947, he participated in the LONDON CONFERENCE). When World War II was imminent, al-Ghuri wrote that “unfortunately, the Arab countries rushed to declare their support for Britain . . . despite the fact that the latter did not show a single indication that proves its desire to solve the Palestinian problem justly.” After 1948 he continued to serve on the AHC, held positions in the Jordanian government, and published several books on Arab nationalism.

He was active in the NON-ALIGNED MOVEMENT of member countries that strove to avoid alliances with any great power, attending that movement's milestone 1955 Bandung Conference.

Bibliography

al-Ghuri, Emile. Filastin Ibra Sittin Aman (Palestine through Sixty Years), vols. I and II. Beirut: Dar al-Nahar, 1972.

———. Palestine through Sixty Years: 1939–1947, vol. III. Amman, Jordan: Dar al-Sha'ab Publishers, 1980.

Muslih, Muhammad. "Emile al-Ghuri." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.

Gil Party

A new party in the 2006 Israeli elections, the Gil Party (Gimla'ey Yisrael LaKnesset, Pensioners of Israel to the Knesset) is a pensioners' party that advocates the interests of Israelis of retirement age. Gil is headed by former MOSSAD operative Rafael Eitan, who was named as the spymaster of Jonathan Pollard, a US citizen convicted of spying for Israel. Little seems to be known of the party's positions on defense, security, or peace, because it campaigned solely on domestic issues. In the past, however, Eitan has been known for his hard-line rightist politics and support for Greater Israel in all the Occupied Territories. In the 2006 elections the Gil Party joined the KADIMA PARTY (newly created by ARIEL SHARON). The coalition succeeded in placing Eitan as minister of pensioners, while another Gil member, Kaakov Ben-Yeyzi, became minister of health.

Giv'at Ze'ev Settlement

Located just northwest of JERUSALEM and southwest of Ramallah, stretching across 6,248 acres, and with numerous additional satellite settlements making up the Giv'at Ze'ev bloc, Giv'at Ze'ev is one of the strategically most important settlements in Israel's design for the WEST BANK.

According to the Israel Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS), at the end of 2007 the colony had a total population of 11,000. Giv'at Ze'ev has a diverse population: religious, secular, and HAREDI Jews. Most of the residents are former residents of Jerusalem who sought housing at cheaper prices than in Jerusalem, a ten-minute drive from the settlement.

In 2008 Nofei Yisrael Company began marketing 600 housing units to the ultra-orthodox Hareidi population. A publication by the marketing company said: "The project is in a closed compound . . . to protect the interests of the Torah observant population," and includes "synagogues, ultra-orthodox elementary schools, ritual baths and schools for advanced Torah learning."

But the neighborhood Nofei Yisrael is constructing is some distance from Giv'at Ze'ev, on a 3.5-kilometer (2-mile) winding road from the end of the settlement (the distance as the crow flies is about 600 meters, or 650 yards). Construction of the neighborhood will enlarge Giv'at Ze'ev's area by hundreds of acres and complete the takeover of the western lands almost as far as the Beit Horon settlement and the BARRIER wall.

Giv'at Ze'ev, like MA'ALE ADUMIM, lies in the second of three circles that expand the boundaries of Jerusalem almost to the border with JORDAN, horizontally severing the West Bank into two separate entities. Giv'at Ze'ev is situated in the "GREATER JERUSALEM" circle and is slated in Israel's master SETTLEMENT plan to play an important role in the expansion of METROPOLITAN JERUSALEM (third circle). In 1996 the Israeli government approved a program for Giv'at Ze'ev that included 2,650 new housing units plus 20,000 new settlers. The housing has been constructed on land confiscated from the Palestinian villages of Betunia, Biddo, and Jeib. In March 1997, Israel confiscated an additional 50 acres from Jeib. Later in 1997 another Israeli confiscation took 200 more acres from Betunia and Jeib for the construction of 11,550 additional housing units. On 9 March 2008, Prime Minister EHUD OLMERT approved the construction of 750 new homes in Giv'at Ze'ev under the Agan Ha'ayalot project (an attempt to sell the apartments to a mixed population, secular and religious).

The Giv'at Ze'ev bloc is part of a wall of colonies surrounding the northwest side of East Jerusalem. The master plan for Jerusalem settlements envisages Giv'at Ze'ev connected with Modi'in Illit to its northwest (on the Green Line), with Modi'in Illit being directly linked due east to Beit El (just north of Ramallah) and Beit El being connected south to Ma'ale Adumim. This will complete the northern part of the third circle (Metropolitan Jerusalem), tying the northern settlements to East Jerusalem through Ma'ale Adumim with new bypass ROADS. In September 2004 it was revealed that the Mishab Company was offering a grant of $8,700 to any buyer of an apartment in the settlement of Giv'at Ze'ev (on top of the grants and loans totaling $22,800 that the Israeli Housing Ministry allots to entitled buyers).

Bibliography

- European Union. EU Heads of Mission Report on East Jerusalem. EUOBSERVER Document. 9 March 2009. euobserver.com.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. "Settlement Timeline." Settlement Report. 14:1 (January–February 2004).
- Mishab Housing Construction and Development Co. Ltd. "New Homes in Givat Zeev, Israel." n.d. <http://nadlan.com/newProjectsResults.asp?only=yes&Method=P&CT=222&Comp=5024&LangId=2>.
- Nofei Yisrael Company. <http://www.nofi-israel.co.il>.
- Peace Now. Periodic Report: Construction in the Settlements Continues. Jerusalem: Peace Now Settlement Watch, May–October 2007.

Goldmann, Nahum (1895–1982)

Nahum Goldmann was an Israeli Zionist leader who became an outspoken critic of Israeli policies. Born in Lithuania, he grew up in GERMANY and was educated at German universities, where he studied philosophy and law. From an early age he became strongly allied with Zionist thought, and during World War I, while working at the Jewish division of the German Foreign Ministry, he unsuccessfully attempted to enlist the Kaiser's support for the Zionist idea. In the 1920s Goldmann was involved in publishing a Zionist periodical and also in launching a German Jewish encyclopedia. In all, twelve volumes of the encyclopedia—ten in German and two in Hebrew—were published before the Nazi rise to power halted the project. Goldmann retained the idea and was a key figure behind the English-language Encyclopedia Judaica in the 1960s.

During the BRITISH MANDATE Goldmann was involved in negotiations with the British to establish a Jewish state. He supported the partition of Palestine into Jewish and Palestinian states, arguing that sovereignty was more important than territory. In 1935, stripped of his German citizenship by the Nazis and forced to leave his adopted country, he settled first in Honduras and thereafter in New York, where he lived from 1940 to 1964. He continued to labor in the UNITED STATES for Zionist causes and for several years represented the JEWISH AGENCY in New York.

In addition to his Zionist work Goldmann championed other Jewish interests, including negotiating German reparations to Israel for the HOLOCAUST. He felt that a Jewish state would never answer all the needs of all Jews and that a strong DIASPORA was also needed. Goldmann believed that the future of world Jewry depended largely on a successful fight against assimilation and dedicated his effort to developing vibrant Jewish institutions in the Diaspora. In 1936 he helped organize the World Jewish Congress and was the first chairman of its executive board; he later served as its president for many years. He founded the Conference of Major Jewish Organizations (known as the Presidents' Conference) and was actively involved with other causes, such as SOVIET JEWS, Jewish education, and promoting Jewish culture.

In 1962 Goldmann became a citizen of Israel, but despite frequent visits he never became a permanent resident, instead dividing his time primarily between Switzerland and Israel. He was critical of what he considered Israel's excessive reliance on and adulation of its military prowess, and following the 1967 WAR he faulted Israel for not being more conciliatory toward the Arabs. Goldmann tried to encourage Israel to engage in negotiations with the neighboring Arab states, and argued that Israel's only chance of long-term survival was to accept the rights of the Palestinians. In 1970 he tried to initiate a dialogue with Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR but was stopped by the Israeli government. In 1974 Goldmann's attempts to contact PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION chairman YASIR ARAFAT were considered high treason in Israel, although he was never formally charged. He strongly opposed the 1982 Israeli invasion of LEBANON and argued that it would lead to ANTI-SEMITISM and ANTI-ZIONISM. Goldmann's vision was to make Israel the spiritual and moral center for all Jews, but as a neutral state, with international guarantees of its security, existence, and BORDERS, and perhaps even a permanent symbolic international presence.

Because of Goldmann's views about the centrality of the Diaspora and the need for Israel to make peace with the Arab states and the Palestinians, for the most part the Israeli establishment loathed him and he became persona non grata with Zionist leaders.

Bibliography

- Friedman, Motti. "Nahum Goldmann." Jerusalem: The Jewish Agency for Israel, The Pedagogic Center, The Department for Jewish Zionist Education, 2000.

Goldmann, Nahum. The Autobiography of Nahum Goldmann: Sixty Years of Jewish Life. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1969.

———. The Jewish Paradox. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1978.

———. Memories: The Autobiography of Nahum Goldmann: The Story of a Lifelong Battle by World Jewry's Ambassador at Large. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1970.

Patai, Raphael. Nahum Goldmann, His Missions to the Gentiles. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1987.

Segev, Tom. "A Jew without Borders." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 27 December 2002.

Goldstein, Baruch Kappel (1956–1994)

Baruch Goldstein was a thirty-eight-year-old Jewish-American physician who was responsible for killing twenty-nine Muslim civilians and injuring approximately 100 in a 1994 mass shooting in HEBRON on the WEST BANK. Three months earlier Goldstein had spoken to a radio interviewer of taking the law into his own hands: "We are fed up and with God's help we will establish the state of Judea. . . . And then we will deal with the Palestinians ourselves."

Born in Brooklyn, New York, Goldstein was a "Kahanist" (a follower of MEIR KAHANE) and a member of the JEWISH DEFENSE LEAGUE. After immigrating to Israel, Goldstein served as a physician in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF), where he gained notoriety for refusing to treat non-Jews, even those serving in the IDF. When threatened with court-martial Goldstein declared: "I am not willing to treat any non-Jew. I recognize as legitimate only two [religious] authorities: Maimonides and Kahane." Following the end of his active duty he worked as a physician and lived in the KIRYAT ARBA SETTLEMENT of some 6,500 Jewish settlers, among the most extreme in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

Dressed as an army officer, Goldstein killed the twenty-nine Palestinians during Friday prayers on 25 February 1994, in the Cave of the Patriarchs/AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE, a site in Hebron sacred to both Muslims and Jews. After being subdued with a fire extinguisher, Goldstein was beaten to death by survivors. At a eulogy reflecting the widespread sentiment of extremist settlers, Rabbi Dov Lior of Kiryat Arba stated: "Goldstein was full of love for fellow human beings. He dedicated himself to helping others. Goldstein could not continue to bear the humiliations and shame nowadays inflicted upon us; this was why he took action for no other reason than to sanctify the holy name of God."

Settlers from Kiryat Arba constructed an elaborate shrine in Goldstein's memory, to which thousands of settlers made pilgrimage in the ensuing years, although most Israelis were repulsed by the glorification of this mass murderer. In 1998 a bill was passed in the Israeli Knesset that forbade the erection of monuments to TERRORISTS, and in 2000 the shrine built around Goldstein's tomb was demolished. At the time, Israel also considered revising the inscription on his tombstone, but no revisions have been made as of 2008. The inscription reads: "Here lies the saint, Dr. Baruch Kappel Goldstein, blessed be the memory of the righteous and holy man, may the Lord avenge his blood, who devoted his soul to the Jews, Jewish religion and Jewish land. His hands are innocent and his heart is pure. He was killed as a martyr of God on the 14th of Adar, Purim, in the year 5754."

See also HEBRON MASSACRE

Bibliography

B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Lethal Gunfire and Collective Punishment in the Wake of the Massacre at the Tomb of the Patriarchs. Case Study No. 4. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1994.

David, Shmuel, et al. Impossible Coexistence: Human Rights in Hebron since the Massacre at the Tomb of the Patriarchs. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1995.

Felner, Eitan, and Roly Rozen. Law Enforcement on Israeli Civilians in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1994.

Levy, Gideon. "A Purim Visit to Hebron." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 17 March 2001.

Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1988.

Palestine Human Rights Information Center. The Massacre in al-Haram al-Ibrahimi al-Sharif: Context and Aftermath. Jerusalem: PHRIC, 1994.

Shahak, Israel, and Norton Mezvinsky. Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. London: Pluto Press, 1999.

Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Sternhell, Zeev. The Founding Myths of Israel: Nationalism, Socialism, and the Making of the Jewish State. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.

Grassroots International Activism

Since the onset of the Second INTIFADA, in September 2000, there has been a marked increase in international grassroots activism attempting to influence Israeli policies in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Calls from the US and Europe for people to travel to the Occupied Territories during this uprising brought widespread international attention to Israeli policies, Palestinian resistance to the OCCUPATION, and the role of the international community in potentially ending the Occupation. While many have heeded the call to challenge Israeli policies in person, international engagement has taken several forms. These movements have resembled past ones—for example, the anti-apartheid divestment movements targeting South Africa and the Central American solidarity movements of the 1980s—and yet they have also broken new ground in international solidarity. Although this engagement has taken many forms, currently three main areas of international peace work are trying to end the Occupation: divestment, boycotts, and international observers in the Occupied Territories.

Divestment

As in past social movements, university students have taken the lead in developing divestment as a response to Israeli policy in the Occupied Territories. The first efforts at divestment began in early 2001 at the University of California at Berkeley and the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. Since then at least forty US campuses have begun campaigns to pressure their university administrations to withdraw endowment funds invested in Israel or to divest from US companies that produce and sell arms to Israel. The campus divestment movement gained momentum and focus in July 2005 when Palestinian CIVIL SOCIETY made a unified call for boycott, divestment, and sanctions against Israel until it complies with INTERNATIONAL LAW. This call was signed by over 170 Palestinian organizations and was made on the one-year anniversary of the International Court of Justice in The Hague's Advisory Opinion on the illegality of the Separation BARRIER in the WEST BANK. In addition, divestment campaigns have emerged within municipalities, faith communities, and religious denominations as well as in other organizations.

Municipalities. Several communities across the UNITED STATES have had grassroots movements for selective divestment, which targets corporations that benefit from Israel's Occupation. In 2004 in Somerville, Massachusetts, the Somerville Divestment Project (SDP) worked to bring a “socially responsible investment” resolution before the town's Board of Aldermen. This resolution highlighted Israeli human rights violations in the Occupied Territories and called for Somerville to divest from companies involved in the Occupation as well as from Israel Bonds. SDP recommended divestment from Caterpillar Inc., United Technologies, General Electric, Boeing, General Dynamics Corporation, Northrop Grumman Corporation, and Lockheed Martin.

The resolution was the result of an eighteen-month organizing effort by the SDP to educate residents about the Occupation. Members knocked on doors, stood outside mass transit stations, hosted film nights, and met individually with aldermen. Through this process, the SDP collected almost 1,200 signatures in support of the resolution, while supporters of Israel worked to counter the resolution. The process culminated on 8 November 2004 in a public board meeting to discuss the resolution. Despite initial support from several aldermen, in the end the resolution lost 9–1. According to MEDIA reports the majority of aldermen believed that it was inappropriate for Somerville to take a position on international issues, that Israel was being unfairly “singled out,” and that the resolution was not “pro-human rights” but “anti-Israel.” In response divestment supporters pointed out that Israel had already been “singled out,” because Israel Bonds are the only foreign bonds Somerville owns. After the resolution was defeated, the board voted (8–3) to refuse to discuss four alternative resolutions regarding Israel/Palestine.

Presbyterian Church (USA). Of all current divestment efforts in the United States, those of several Protestant churches have received the most attention as they have debated taking organizational positions on selective divestment. The issue has been raised within the Presbyterian Church (USA), the United Church of Christ, the United Methodists, the World Council of Churches, and the Anglican Communion. Among these groups the Presbyterian Church (USA) has come closest to articulating a stance on divestment. At the church's General Assembly in July 2004, several measures opposing Israeli policies in the Occupied Territories were approved, including a call for the Committee on Mission Responsibility Through Investment (MRTI) to begin gathering data to support a selective divestment of holdings in multinational corporations doing business in Israel/Palestine. This decision has been controversial both within and outside the church, and the major pro-Israel Jewish organizations united to stop the Presbyterian divestment effort.

Despite the controversies, the Presbyterian Church began to clarify a process it refers to as “progressive engagement” on Israeli divestment. On 6 November 2004 the MRTI announced its socially responsible investing criteria that would determine their targets. The criteria focused on multinational corporations that:

- Provide products or services to or for use by the Israeli police or military to support and maintain the Occupation
- Provide products, services, or technology of particular strategic importance that maintain the Occupation
- Establish facilities or operations on occupied land
- Provide products or services, including financial, for the establishment, expansion, or maintenance of Israeli SETTLEMENTS
- Provide products and services, including financial, to Israeli or Palestinian organizations/groups that support or facilitate violent acts against innocent civilians
- Provide products or services, including financial, that support or facilitate the construction of the separation BARRIER

In the church’s first step it planned to invite representatives of Caterpillar, Citigroup, ITT Industries, Motorola, and United Technologies to discuss the church’s concerns and open a dialogue about the company’s involvement in Israel and Palestine. If these dialogues failed to address the concerns of the MRTI, the church would consider shareholder resolutions for each company and, finally, if there were no positive results consistent with the church’s General Assembly criteria, the MRTI would consider recommending divestment to the General Assembly.

While mainstream Jewish organizations in the United States have firmly opposed divestment and have actively worked against such efforts, several Jewish organizations support the Presbyterian Church and divestment as a strategy in challenging Israeli policy. The most notable of these are Jewish Voice for Peace, Jews Against the Occupation, and Not in My Name. Jews Against the Occupation has written a letter of support to the Presbyterian Church with the intention of deflecting charges of ANTI-SEMITISM. Not in My Name has supported both the Presbyterian Church and divestment as a strategy: “selective divestment from companies that profit from this destruction is not only appropriate, it is both pro-Palestinian and pro-Israeli.” Jewish Voice for Peace has taken the most public stance, both by supporting the Presbyterian Church and by campaigning to end sales of Caterpillar D-9 bulldozers to Israel. As part of this program Voice for Peace introduced a shareholder resolution in 2005 requesting that Caterpillar review whether its equipment sales to the Israeli army violate the corporation’s own Code of Worldwide Business Conduct.

Boycott

Since the AL-AQSA INTIFADA began, several types of boycotts have been proposed (similar to those against South African apartheid), including academic and cultural boycotts of Israeli institutions as well as economic boycotts, in particular of products produced at Israeli settlements.

Of all the boycott campaigns, a British one to boycott selected Israeli universities has received the most attention. On 22 April 2005 the British Association of University Teachers (AUT) decided to boycott Haifa University (for restricting the academic freedom of staff members critical of Israeli policies) and Bar Ilan University (which has a college in the West Bank settlement of Ariel). In addition the AUT voted to circulate among all its branches the Call for Boycott issued by the Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel.

This decision proved to be controversial both within Great Britain and Israel. Haifa University threatened to sue the AUT for defamation, and British academics organized to repeal the AUT decision. Following much debate within the union and the British press, the boycott was overturned at an emergency AUT conference in May 2005.

International Witness

Of all the forms of global activism, the presence of international activists has had the greatest effect on bringing attention to the Palestinian cause. International activists and observers in the Occupied Territories have given accounts of day-to-day life under Occupation that were often absent in the international press, have revealed for audiences in the United States and Europe the existence of a nonviolent Palestinian movement, and by their presence have shown solidarity with Palestinians and Israelis who resist Israeli policy in the Occupied Territories.

Since their beginning in 1995 the CHRISTIAN PEACEMAKER TEAMS have maintained a continual presence in the West Bank, where radical Jewish settlers have harassed the Palestinian population. Team volunteers are trained to observe and document the situation in HEBRON and the Southern Hebron Hills as well as to intervene nonviolently when they can prevent an escalation in violence.

Although the number of international observers and activists in Palestine increased after the beginning of the Second Intifada, Palestinians, Israelis, and internationals had joined together during the First Intifada to protest the Israeli Occupation. The Palestinian Centre for Rapprochement between People (PCR), based in Beit Sahour, was especially active in organizing these actions. The Second Intifada increased resistance to the Occupation, much of which was nonviolent and included internationals. The PCR helped start a series of nonviolent protests in December 2000, and, in the spring of 2001, the Palestinian Network for Non-Governmental Organizations helped form the Grassroots International Protection for the Palestinian People. This group worked with partner organizations in Italy, FRANCE, and Belgium to bring internationals to the Occupied Territories to witness the Israeli suppression of the Intifada, offer solidarity with the Palestinian people, and promote education in their home countries about life in the Occupied Territories. In the group's first year 2,700 internationals traveled to Palestine to help distribute food to areas isolated by CURFEWS and ROADBLOCKS and to accompany ambulances.

In 2001 the INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY MOVEMENT (ISM) was founded in Ramallah, West Bank, by Palestinians and internationals. In its campaigns internationals witnessed Israeli Occupation policies and participated in nonviolent protests in August and December 2001. The ISM gained international notoriety during its third campaign in March 2002, which occurred immediately after Israel had reoccupied most West Bank cities. During the spring of 2002, hundreds of internationals responded to the ISM call and came to Palestine to accompany ambulances and medical personnel and to handle humanitarian needs that Palestinian organizations could not meet because of Israeli CLOSURE policies.

Despite the early successes in organizing international activists, the ISM has also dealt with severe challenges. Although it was originally thought that the international presence would be respected by the Israeli military and thus provide protection for Palestinian communities under attack, this proved not to be true. In March 2003 Rachel Corrie, an ISM participant from the United States, was killed protecting a house from being demolished in the RAFAH area of GAZA. A month later a British ISM participant, Thomas Hurndall, was shot in the head in Rafah (and died from his injuries in January 2004), and Brian Avery, another ISM activist from the United States, was shot in the face by the IDF in Jenin in the West Bank. Most recently, in March 2009, ISM activist Tristan Anderson was shot in the face with a tear gas canister by Israeli soldiers in the West Bank village of Ni'lin. The Israeli government's concerted effort to keep international activists out of the country has weakened the movement.

In addition to the ISM, several other international solidarity groups have emerged. In August 2002 the World Council of Churches founded the Ecumenical Accompaniment Programme in Palestine and Israel. Participants in the program record human rights violations, support acts of nonviolent resistance alongside local Christian and Muslim Palestinians and Israeli peace activists, and engage in public policy advocacy in their home countries through their respective churches. Over 230 members have worked with the program since its founding. Also founded in August 2002 was the International Women's Peace Service, an international team of women based in Haris, a village in the Salfit Governorate of the West Bank. Participants document human rights abuses, work with the media, and participate in Palestinian-led acts of nonviolent direct action.

See also NONVIOLENCE IN ISRAEL/PALESTINE

Bibliography

- Global BDS Movement. "Palestinian Civil Society Calls for Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions against Israel until It Complies with International Law and Universal Principles of Human Rights." 9 July 2005. Accessed 26 March 2009. <http://www.bdsmovement.net/?q=node/52>.
- Sandercock, J., S. Radhika, M. McLaughlin, H. Khalili, N. Blincoe, H. Arraf, and G. Andoni, eds. Peace under Fire: Israel/Palestine and the International Solidarity Movement. New York: Verso, 2004.

Stohlman, Nancy, and Laurieann Aladin, eds. Live from Palestine: International and Palestinian Direct Action against the Israeli Occupation. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 2003.

—Adam Horowitz

Great Britain and the Palestine Mandate

See BRITISH MANDATE IN PALESTINE

Greater Jerusalem

When Israel conquered the WEST BANK and the eastern half of JERUSALEM in the 1967 WAR, its first decision was to tighten its hold on Jerusalem and the surrounding area by transforming the city from a historic and religious symbol for the Jewish people into the heart of the modern Jewish state. Jerusalem has traditionally been an important ideological symbol for Jews around the world, but upon possessing the entire city, Israel wanted to expand it and ensure its status as the “eternal capital” of the state. It first unified east and west Jerusalem as one city under Israeli rule.

Israel then immediately began confiscating West Bank Palestinian LAND, covering an area of some 27 square miles (70 square kilometers), most of which had belonged to 28 Palestinian villages, including part of the municipalities of BETHLEHEM and Beit Jala, enlarging the eastern sector from the 2.5 square miles (6 square kilometers) it was under Jordanian governance. Following these annexations East Jerusalem tripled in size, and Jerusalem became the largest city in Israel.

The new BORDERS, set by a committee headed by General REHAVAM ZE’EVI, then assistant to the head of the Operations Branch of the Israel Defense Forces’ General Staff, were approved by the Israeli government. In setting the borders the committee’s main objective was to strengthen Israeli sovereignty over the city by creating a Jewish majority. Thus DEMOGRAPHIC considerations were decisive, and land development and planning considerations were secondary. In order to ensure a significant Jewish majority, Israel tried to avoid including within Jerusalem areas with large Palestinian populations. Thus several Palestinian villages were placed outside the city even though some of their lands were included within the city’s new borders—for example, Beit Iksa and Beit Hanina in the north, and detached areas in the municipalities of Bethlehem and Beit Sahur in the south. Many Palestinian villages and neighborhoods were thus divided; one part remained in the West Bank, while the other part was annexed by Israel. The government then immediately began construction of a series of Jewish SETTLEMENTS to fill the city with Jews.

In the 1947 UN Partition Resolution (Resolution 181) that divided Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state, Jerusalem was specifically defined as Corpus Separatum, or “separate body,” which was to belong to neither state; rather it was to be under a permanent international trusteeship with free access to all. In the 1948 WAR, Israel seized the western sector and Jordan took the eastern. Between 1948 and June 1967, Jerusalem was divided in two: West Jerusalem, which was Israel’s capital, and East Jerusalem, a city under Jordanian rule.

Israel’s declaration that a unified Jerusalem was Israel’s eternal capital, whose indivisibility and sovereignty derive from its role as the sacred and historical capital of the Jews, is somewhat overstated. While Jews do certainly have a claim to their holy places in and around the OLD CITY, that historical core represents only 3 percent of the area of greater Jerusalem. The other 97 percent was never exclusively Jewish, nor until the frenzy of settlement activity after 1967 did it ever even have a Jewish majority. West Jerusalem, the 15 square miles (38 square kilometers) ruled by Israel as its capital from 1948 through 1967, on the other hand, was built only in the second half of the nineteenth century, and although West Jerusalem is today almost exclusively Jewish (the main exception being part of Beit Safafa village), before 1948 about 40 percent of it was owned by Palestinians who were dispossessed in 1948.

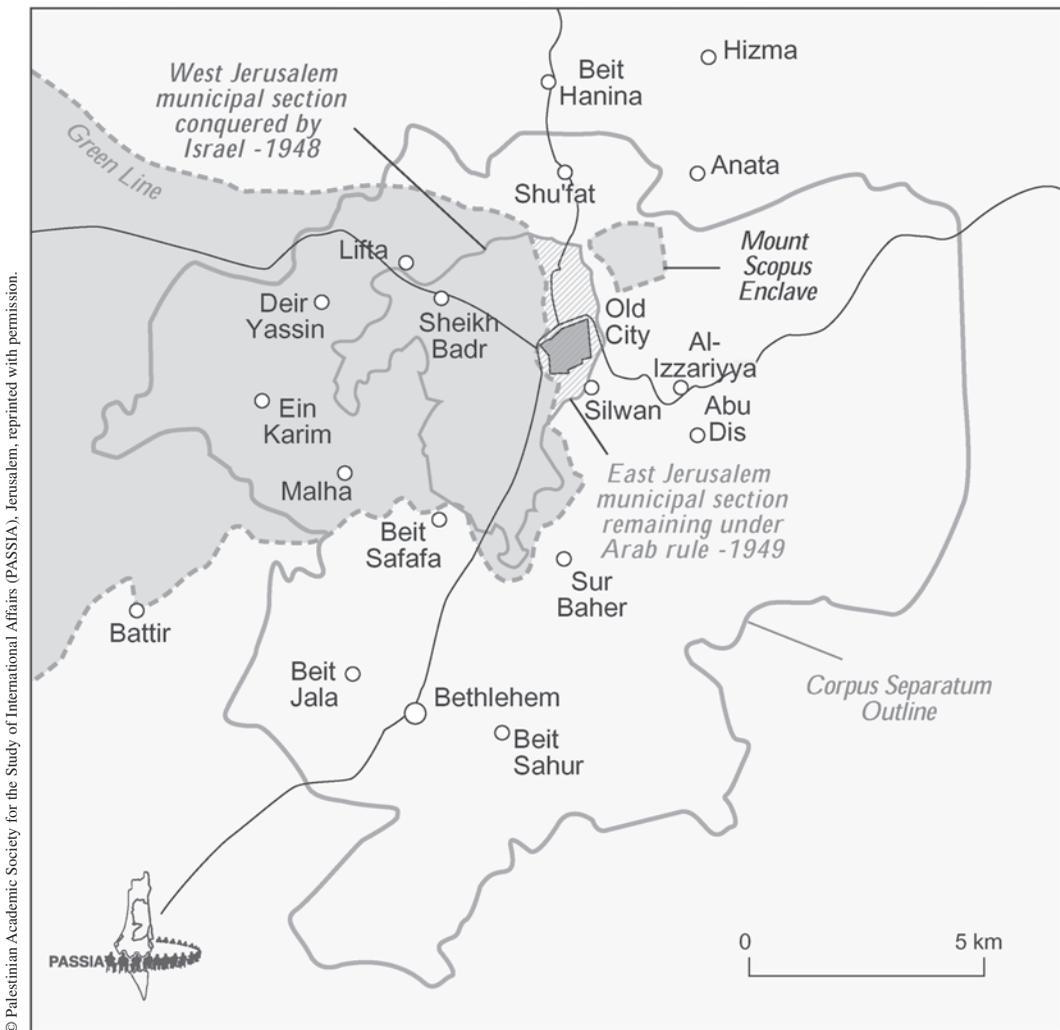

Today Greater Jerusalem, also referred to as “municipal Jerusalem” (distinct from “METROPOLITAN JERUSALEM,” which contains another ring of settlements), comprises an area of some 170 square miles (440 square kilometers), of which less than a quarter is within pre-1967 Israel, and which contains eight large settlements that tightly ring what was once Palestinian Jerusalem (Pisgat Ze’ev, HAR HOMA, Gilo, East Talpiot, Ramot, Givat Hamatos, Neve Ya’acov, and Gilo), while another six settlements (Ramat Ashkol, Givat Hamiftar, Malst Defna, Atarst, Pisgat Omer, and Rekhes Shufat) provide a solid Jewish presence throughout the entire Greater Jerusalem area. Israeli settlers in the East Jerusalem colonies numbered about 200,000 in 2009.

The following maps illustrate the transformation of Jerusalem during the past half century: (Map 15) the Corpus Separatum (“separate body”), an internationally administered zone that was an integral aspect of UN RESOLUTION 181 (partition); (Map 16) Jerusalem as it was partitioned after the 1948 WAR; (Map 17) Municipal Greater Jerusalem 1947–1997/2000; and (Map 18) the expansion of Greater Jerusalem into Metropolitan Jerusalem, which is ongoing.

In the first decades of the OCCUPATION the municipal boundaries of Jerusalem were designed to secure Israeli domination over the city, but as Israel’s settlement presence grew and the need to extend its de facto control over larger areas of the West Bank became apparent after the OSLO ACCORDS, control over a strategic Jerusalem region took on greater urgency. In 1995 the Israeli

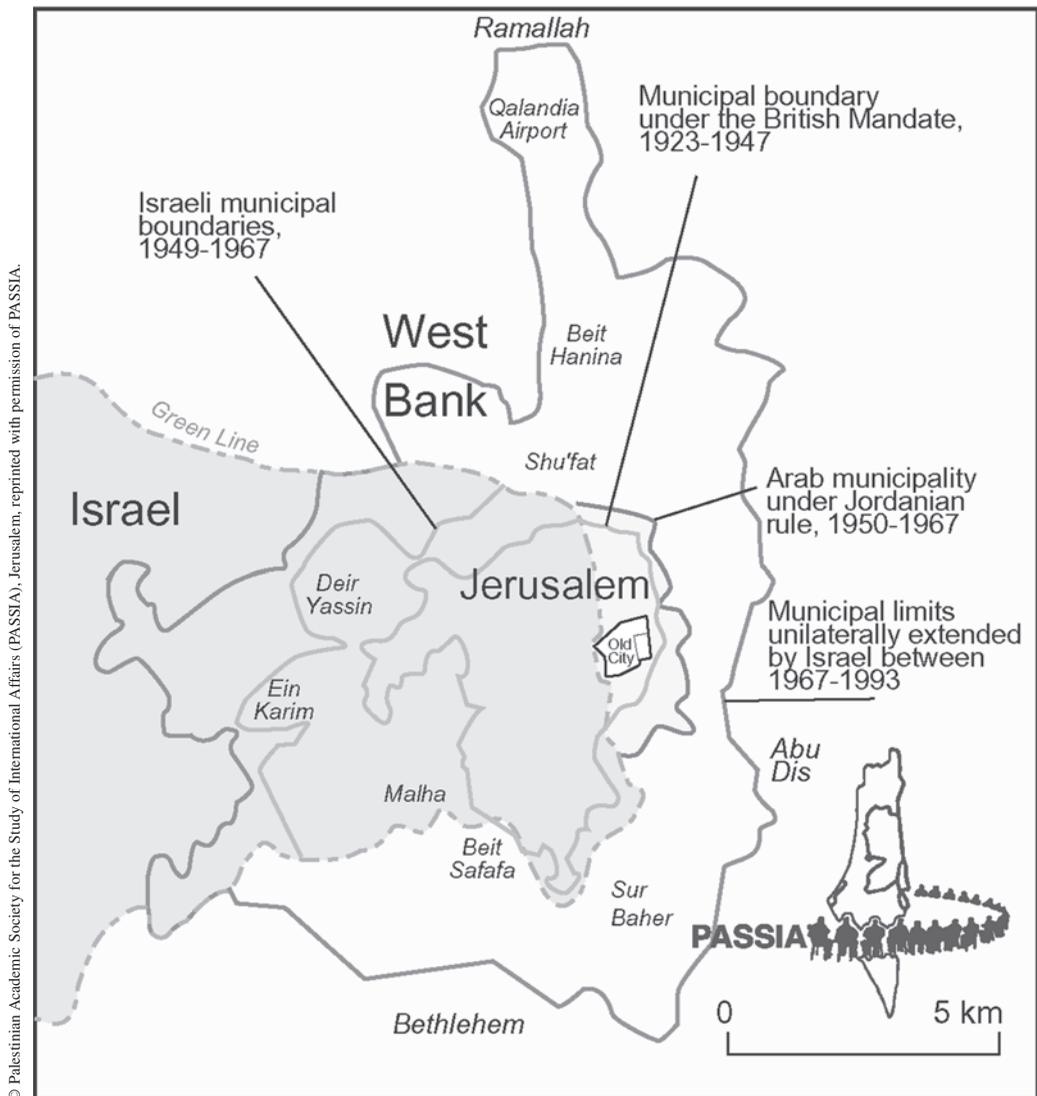

© Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA), Jerusalem, reprinted with permission.

Map 15. Jerusalem and the Corpus Separatum Proposed in UN Resolution 181, 1967

Map 16. Partitioned Jerusalem, 1948-1967

© Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA), Jerusalem (based on H. M. Sachar, A History of Israel, NY: Knopf, 1979), reprinted with permission.

Map 17. Jerusalem Municipal Boundaries, 1947-2000

government adopted a master plan for a Metropolitan Jerusalem whose borders in an outer ring of settlements incorporated a full 40 percent of the West Bank. The area stretches from Beit Shemesh in the west through Kiryat Sefer to Ramallah; then extends southeast through MA'ALE ADUMIM almost to the Jordan River; there turning southwest to encompass Beit Sahur, BETHLEHEM, Efrat, and the Etzion Bloc; and then west again through Beitar Illit and Tsar Hadassah to Beit Shemesh. Within Metropolitan Jerusalem are found 75 percent of the West Bank settlers and the major centers of Israeli construction.

See also METROPOLITAN JERUSALEM PLAN; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM

Bibliography

- B'Tselem (Israeli Center for Information on Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Legal Status of East Jerusalem and Its Residents. n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Jerusalem/Legal\_Status.asp.
- Cook, Jonathan. "Isolating Jerusalem." Al-Ahram (Cairo). 3-9 July 2003.
- De Jong, Jan. "Israel's 'Greater Jerusalem' Engulfs the West Bank's Core." Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace. 25 July 1997.

© Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA), Jerusalem, Jan de Jong cartographer, reprinted with permission.

Map 18. Arab East Jerusalem within "Greater" Jerusalem

European Union. EU Heads of Mission Report on East Jerusalem. EUOBSERVER Document. 9 March 2009. <http://www.euobserver.com>.
 Halper, Jeff. "The 94 Percent Solution: A Matrix of Control." Middle East Report. 216 (Fall 2000).
 Jerusalem Center for Social and Economic Rights. "Land Confiscation and Settlement Construction." n.d. <http://www.jcser.org/english/landconfiscation.html>.
 Mattar, Ibrahim. "From Palestinian to Israeli: Jerusalem 1948–1982." Journal of Palestine Studies. 12:4 (1983).

Greater Land of Israel Movement

The idea of the Greater Land of Israel (Eretz Yisrael l'Hashlema), the full or complete land of Israel, developed within both secular and religious ZIONISM and has been used to legitimize Israeli expansionist territorial policies, programs, and practices. In his comprehensive book on the subject, political scientist Arie Naor claims that Greater Israel ideology was the most influential idea in Israeli history, based on the premise that the entire land of Israel, however defined, belongs exclusively to the Jewish people and that although members of other ethnic groups may hold individual rights to the land, they cannot have any collective rights. According to this ideology, no Israeli government, regardless of the majority it enjoys, has the right to withdraw from any part of the land. This ideology was used to promote expansionist policies before the 1967 WAR, when Israeli BORDERS encompassed only a portion of the “whole” land. After the war had expanded Israeli borders to include all or most of what was defined as Greater Israel, the ideology was promoted to maintain the post-1967 borders, while expansion and colonization of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES focused on the Israelization or Judaization of the new territory with settlement and housing development.

The ideology has various rationales, among them religious belief in the divine promise of the land to the Jews as God’s chosen people, historical memories of the national grandeur of David’s kingdom, nationalist conceptions adopted from European nationalist movements, the unity of people and territory (blood and soil), the “practical” requirements of the Jewish people, a belief that it is required for Israel’s security needs, and a deep distrust of Palestinian nationalism and Arab willingness to coexist peacefully with Israelis. Although currently this ideology is primarily connected to the Israeli religious right, for many years it was the trademark of the secular right, especially the HERUT political party and intellectuals connected to that camp. Factions in the Israeli left also toyed with the idea, though they rarely endorsed it wholeheartedly as a main ideological dictum.

Since 1967 there have been ongoing debates within Israel about the viability and practicality of the ideology. For some the fate of Palestinians was a sensitive and troublesome issue, while others argued that full acceptance of the ideology would transform the DEMOGRAPHIC composition of the Jewish state and encompass a great number of non-Jews hostile to Israel. The case against the Greater Israel ideology claimed that a larger territory entailed less Judaism, democracy, and human rights. Supporters countered with arguments that ranged from the benefits that would accrue to all the peoples of the region regardless of nationality or religion, through visions of future mass Jewish IMMIGRATION that would change the state’s demographics, to a demand for the expulsion (TRANSFER) of all non-Jews from the land ruled by Israel, either through persuasion and incentives or by using the force of the state.

The concept that the national territory can be placed under exclusive Jewish rule is a novelty in Jewish history. While the sacredness of the land of Israel was widely accepted and rarely contested through the years of Jewish exile, the land’s exact boundaries were never defined, and most Jews were more interested in the holy cities and sites than in the outer boundaries of the land. Furthermore, traditional messianic conceptions held that the Jewish return would result from an act of divine redemption, thereby undermining any discussion regarding the actual contours of the land.

Historically the land of Israel was never considered a precise geopolitical and administrative unit, and in early Zionist thought (around the turn of the twentieth century) the question of borders rarely arose. Initially Jewish SETTLEMENTS were established in the general landmass of Palestine and were in turn used to define areas demanded for Jewish rule, but without a debate over what were legitimate national borders. In the BALFOUR DECLARATION (1917), Great Britain promised the Jews a “homeland,” although the borders were not defined. In the SYKES-PICOT AGREEMENT of 1916, implemented after World War I, the former OTTOMAN areas were divided according to the imperial interests of Great Britain and FRANCE. Zionist organizations first formulated a specific territorial demand at the Versailles peace talks (1919) following World War I. When the British partitioned their portion in 1922 to create Trans-Jordan (which included the East Bank) for their protégé King Abdullah, Zionist leaders argued that the eastern and western parts of the land of Israel were an indivisible unity, and consequently the Zionist establishment did not accept the 1922 division. In practical terms, however, the mainstream Zionist leadership never made a cogent political demand to make Trans-Jordan part of the Jewish homeland or to enable Jewish settlement there.

The political debate over the territorial borders of the Zionist enterprise continued in the wake of various British partition plans and international committees whose programs were designed to decide the future boundaries and sovereignty of the land, but the political map stabilized when most of the Israeli LABOR movement accepted the existence of Trans-Jordan. However, the ideology’s secular supporters, known as Revisionists, refused to accept that the East Bank was not Israel and adopted the Greater Land of Israel ideology.

Rationale of the Ideology

Supporters of the Greater Israel ideology often use medical metaphors of health and sickness to argue that a nation that forsakes parts of its land is pathologically ill. Zionism is defined as the return of the Jewish people to their ancient homeland, which implies the transformation of the land into a home for the gathering of exiles. Because the number of Jews and the size of the land to be transformed were never fully or authoritatively declared, a definition of successful completion or of the appropriate time to terminate Zionist expansion remains open. The idea of Greater Israel reflects a fear that the Zionist enterprise will be stopped prematurely, before all Zionist goals are achieved. Supporters of the ideology claim that an untimely end to expansion would endanger the achievements of Zionism so far. Thus the ideology can be interpreted as a desire to continue the Zionist revolution, possibly indefinitely, despite attempts at compromise and the desire to realize other national goals and collective interests.

Claims by the ideology for exclusive Jewish rights on the entire land are numerous, overlapping, and at times contradictory. One claim is the divine biblical promise to the fathers of the nation—God’s covenant with the Jews in which he promised them the land of Israel if they kept his commandments. These promises, however, usually referred to the Jewish people rather than to the size of its territory. On the other hand, certain divine promises mention borders, referring to natural obstacles such as the sea and the desert or other biblical political entities. Yet even the specifically mentioned geographical reference points cannot be identified beyond doubt in the contemporary era, because of the wide range of possibilities and interpretations.

A somewhat different rationale involves the historic boundaries of David’s and Solomon’s kingdoms as described in the Bible (that is, from the Mediterranean Sea to the Euphrates River). Proponents of this position view these as appropriate contours for the full Jewish return. This historical position allows for visions of a return to the glory of ancient times, especially since it is believed that the Messiah will be a descendant of King David. Although some contemporary ARCHAEOLOGISTS have doubts about the actual historical existence of a united ancient Jewish kingdom or the extent of its borders, the believers assume that these boundaries are more than political achievements and that their biblical description charges them with holiness.

In general the ideology of Greater Israel assumes that the boundaries of the land are predetermined and have an autonomous existence originating from the divine will, sacred texts, and ancient history. Thus the current Israeli democracy is not free to determine its national boundaries. Any decision to withdraw from parts of the sacred land may be legal but is inherently illegitimate, for it contradicts the divine covenant on which the Jewish state is based. Daniela Weiss, a leader of the GUSH EMUNIM, a radical settlers’ group, took this idea to the extreme when she claimed that the only relevant plebiscite regarding the borders of Israel can be held among all the Jews that have ever lived in the land and ever will live in it in the future.

Parallel to the religious and historical arguments are practical concerns—namely the territorial needs of the contemporary Jewish people entering their homeland. The Greater Israel ideology sets its sights on the future, demanding that the modern state plan for the millions of Jews still to come, who need not only land to thrive and prosper but, in light of the tragic Jewish history, a secure existence as well. A small country, claim the advocates, will only survive precariously, constantly at the mercy of its neighbors and international superpowers.

A further argument of the Greater Israeli ideology involves a deep distrust of the Arabs, including Palestinians, or any other non-Jews. They are seen as having no legitimate claim on the land and, moreover, a deep desire to wipe out Jewish existence in the region. Therefore Greater Israel ideology is highly connected to deep-rooted images—images that are essentially Orientalist generalizations—of Arab and Muslim culture. The Arabs are considered as a unitary threat, regardless of divisions between Arab states, and supporters of Greater Israel compare the size of the land that Israel holds to the vaster lands that all Arabs and Muslims hold. In addition they claim that all Arabs under Israeli rule, whether citizens of Israel or noncitizens in the Occupied Territories, are potential or actual enemies without a distinct political entity, based on a dubious historical rationale that they are part of the larger Arab community. Accordingly decisions regarding the future of Israel should only be entrusted to Jews, while Palestinians, even when Israeli citizens, should be excluded from deciding the future of Israel.

The ideology of Greater Israel is deeply pessimistic about ever reaching a peaceful end to the Israeli-Arab (let alone the Israeli-Palestinian) conflict. Instead it suggests that the only way to reach Middle East harmony is through Jewish perseverance, military superiority, and deterrence—an “Iron Wall” mentality, which would lead to a reluctant Arab acceptance of Israel’s existence within its larger boundaries. Therefore supporters of the ideology consider a strong Israel within the widest possible borders a prerequisite for stability in the Middle East. Security issues, which are of great import in Israeli public discourse, are often brought up as practical reasons to negate possible territorial compromises. The Greater Israel ideologists claim that territory forsaken can be used against Israel and that Arabs will see Israeli withdrawal as a sign of weakness and thus become more aggressive and make further demands. When the ideological devotion to the Greater Israel ideal was less potent, security issues were used instead of religious or historical arguments to delay or thwart Israeli territorial compromise.

In the prestate years the development of Zionist settlements proceeded according to principles radically different from those of Greater Israel, even though the Zionist movement also attempted to maximize territorial gains and exclude Palestinians from the economic sector and political power. Early Zionists preferred to settle in locations that had little historical resonance, satisfied to exist generally on the “sacred land” of Israel. Thus, for example, the agricultural settlements of Degania and Nahalal, as well as the city of Tel Aviv, were esteemed for being new and innovative rather than for re-creating a predetermined historic map. The ideology of the hegemonic labor movement placed importance on actual laboring on the land, insisting that the plow would decide the future national borders. During the BRITISH MANDATE years and through the first two decades of the state, the Greater Israel ideology found itself in opposition to the established Zionist position—although it always enjoyed some support among important groups of the Labor movement.

Revisionists and Herut:

Secular Holders of the Ideology

The main secular supporter of the Greater Israel idea was the Revisionist movement headed by VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY, later transformed into the Herut Party. In April 1925 the first conference of the Revisionists was convened in Paris and demanded the establishment of a Jewish commonwealth on all the land of Israel, which it defined as including Trans-Jordan (JORDAN after 1950) and the Syrian Desert. The Revisionist youth movement BETAR had as its symbol a map of the entire land, including both banks of the Jordan River and a fist holding a gun in the middle. The hymn of Betar, written by Jabotinsky and named “Left of the Jordan,” proclaimed: “If my land is poor and small/it is mine from its head to its end/it lays from the sea to the wilderness/and the Jordan—the Jordan is in the middle/Two banks to the Jordan/this bank is mine—and so is that.”

According to the Revisionists, the area they demanded was promised to the Jews for a homeland in a legally binding way based on religious history, and the Zionist leadership had the right to claim this territory from the nations of the world. Thus the Revisionists and their successors, the Herut and LIKUD Parties, did not attach as much importance or sanctity to other regions that were later to fall under Israeli rule; for example, they were willing to part with the Sinai Peninsula in order to secure a more internationally accepted Jewish rule on the WEST BANK. Until 1967 the Greater Israel ideology was marginalized, but the 1967 War revived the ideology and made the Herut Party the bearer of a legitimate political program regarding the future of the state’s borders.

1967 and Its Aftermath

The 1967 War and the subsequent OCCUPATION were crucial historical events in the further development of the Greater Land of Israel ideology. The areas that fell under Israeli control as a consequence of the war were the Golan Heights, East JERUSALEM, the West Bank (Judea and Samaria), the GAZA STRIP, and the Sinai Peninsula. Of these places HEBRON, Shechem (NABLUS), and East Jerusalem had great symbolic significance and resonance in Jewish history. After 1967, although Israel’s continuous control of these areas was based on various material and security interests, the Greater Israel ideology was the most important element in attempts to convince the Israeli public that the Occupation was legitimate. For the first time in the history of Israel as a sovereign state, the issue was not just a theoretical idea, a whim of marginal zealots, or an anachronistic slogan of an opposition party, but instead a concrete reality to be debated and possibly implemented. Furthermore, Israel now held territories that many considered as constituting the “wholeness” of the land. Although supporters of the Greater Israel ideology never renounced Israeli claims to other regions that they believed should be part of the Jewish homeland (such as the eastern bank of the Jordan River or southern LEBANON), the post-1967 debate focused on the areas under actual Israeli control. Because the ideology has gained a concrete focus and more specific goals, it came to seem more viable.

Israel's initial policy following the war was to annex a portion of the territories—mainly East Jerusalem and its surroundings—and to keep the rest as bargaining chips for future peace negotiations. This policy clearly contradicted any version of Greater Israel ideology and lasted only briefly. Within a short time Jewish settlements began to spring up in the West Bank, following the concepts of the ALLON PLAN (named after YIGAL ALLON, then vice prime minister) and the DAYAN PLAN (named after MOSHE DAYAN, then defense minister). Both plans had at least a partial vision of Greater Israel, even if for strategic rather than messianic reasons. Moreover, while Labor governments, in power for another ten years, did not publicly sanction the settlement movement immediately, neither did they take measures to impede the settlement activities of GUSH EMUNIM and others, and very shortly these Labor governments were providing the settlers with material support, as in the construction of KIRYAT ARBA.

The actualization of the Greater Israel idea afforded room for variation. The Herut Party and Betar were still committed to both banks of the Jordan River and therefore were presumably less attached to other areas, such as the Golan Heights and Sinai. In contrast the religious groups (the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY and its offshoot, Gush Emunim) were committed to much wider borders, including all those under current Israeli rule, and opposed any negotiation attempts that would undermine Israeli rule or bring about a retreat to the prewar borders. The heady period after the war gave rise to new movements promoting Greater Israel. One such group, the Greater Israel Movement, was composed primarily of writers and intellectuals, including such well-known and respected individuals as Natan Alterman and Sh.Y. Agnon. The group included veteran Labor figures such as Moshe Tabenkin and Eliezer Livneh and mainstream writers Haim Guri, Haim Hazaz, Aharon Reuveni, Gershon Shofman, and Yehuda Burla. It also encompassed veteran Revisionists, including poet Uri Zvi Greenberg and writers Yisrael Eldad and Moshe Shamir. Rabbi M. Z. Nerya and Professor Harel Fish were also a part of the group.

This Greater Israel Movement announced its birth on 22 September 1967, with a proclamation that appeared in almost all of Israel's daily newspapers. Its opening statement began: "The IDF's victory in the Six Day War placed the people and the State within a new fateful era. The integral Land of Israel is now in the hands of the Jewish People and as we are forbidden to forfeit the State of Israel, we are also commanded to retain what it gave us, the Land of Israel. We must be loyal to our country's integrity, considering the nation's past and future alike, and no government in Israel is allowed to compromise this integrity. . . . We are committed to the wholeness of our land—toward the past of the Jewish people and its future together, and no government in Israel is entitled to give up this wholeness." Although most of the signatories to this proclamation were secular—whether from the right or left—the statement reflects a close approximation of the ideology of Gush Emunim and the National Religious Party. It is worth noting that, according to the proclamation, the entire land of Israel was now under Jewish rule.

Greater Israel and the Ascension of the Likud

The secular political supporters of the Greater Israel ideology were mainly descendants of the Revisionists organized in the Herut Party, who had been propagating the idea of Greater Israel for years. As a presence within Israeli politics, they had not been particularly effective until the 1977 elections brought Herut ideologue MENAHEM BEGIN to the prime ministership. The ascension of the right to power created a revolution in Israeli political life. The raison d'être of the Likud was the rapid acceleration of settlements in the Occupied Territories, creating many facts on the ground in an attempt to implement its version of the Greater Israel ideology.

Religious Versions of the Idea

Beside the secular nationalists, the main bearers of the ideology emerged among JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISTS in general and the Gush Emunim in particular. Religious Jews supplied both the ideological framework to hold together the Greater Israel concept and the committed manpower to implement the policy that derives from their ideology.

The center for religious thought on the subject is the MERCAZ HARAV KOOK YESHIVA in Jerusalem, headed by Rabbi Zvi Yehuda HaCohen Kook. Following the teaching and writings of his father, RABBI AVRAHAM YITZHAK HACOEN KOOK, the first chief rabbi of the prestate period, the son defined the Zionist return to the land as the start of redemption. The 1967 War was seen by the yeshiva students at Mercaz as a divine and miraculous event that proved the truth of their rabbi's teachings and enabled them to implement the religious prohibition on the return of the newly Occupied Territories. For the disciples of Rabbi Kook, the entire land was promised and was therefore sacred, although specific places within the land, such as Hebron, Shechem/Nablus, and especially Jerusalem, hold special value due to their biblical history.

The religious Zionists made two important early contributions to Israeli settlements on the West Bank. The first occurred in September 1967, when a distinct group composed of the sons of the residents of Kfar Etzion (most of them orphans of fathers killed in the fighting of 1948) reestablished a religious KIBBUTZ on the same ground in the Judean Hills where their fathers lived and died. On Passover in 1968 a group of religious Jews headed by RABBI MOSHE LEVINGER arrived in Hebron (allegedly to stay for the holiday) but then refused to leave, after which the Israeli government permitted Levinger and his followers to remain. In 1971 the group moved to Kiryat Arba, a new settlement constructed for them by the government, overlooking Hebron. Levinger and his followers were proponents of the Greater Israel ideology, and Kiryat Arba became one of their main strongholds.

In March 1974 the younger generation of National Religious Party leaders, who constituted the party's new religious elite, created the Gush Emunim organization, which promoted a systematic Greater Israel ideology. This ideology, as represented in numerous religious and political texts, demanded Jewish settlement in all the land of Israel as part of the implementation of divine redemption. Because the land in its entirety belongs to the Jewish people, Gush Emunim argued that no land can rightly be given away to non-Jews, so that returning land to Palestinians or the Arab nations is inconceivable. From this perspective the connection of the Jewish people to the land is metahistorical, not tied to specific memories or historical events but determined by the eternal mystical bond between the chosen people and their home. Rabbi Levinger expressed this view in his demand to settle Jews in the marketplace of the Palestinian town of Qalqilya on the West Bank, a place assumed to be completely Palestinian, because he believed it was necessary for Jews to express their exclusive rights everywhere in the land of Israel.

For practical political reasons Gush Emunim prefers to focus on places that hold historical memories, especially those mentioned in the Bible. Thus, after Hebron, Gush Emunim's next settlement attempt was directed toward Shechem. This focus on historical/biblical sites won the movement popular support, but despite the movement's specific actions, its metahistorical worldview remained. Thus, when Gush Emunim attempted, unsuccessfully, to halt Israeli withdrawal from Sinai—a place that holds few Jewish references—their rationale was that it belonged to the sacred land of Israel as divinely promised in the Bible, although the Sinai is not specifically mentioned as part of the land of Israel.

The defiant Palestinian presence was the single greatest obstacle to the implementation of the Greater Israel ideology. The idea of transferring masses of Palestinians across national borders, while carried out in 1948 and on smaller scales on later occasions, was not adopted by Gush Emunim leaders. They preferred mass Jewish immigration to the Occupied Territories and selective eviction of radical Palestinian activists, coupled with giving Palestinians individual rights in the hope that they would leave in the face of the Judaization of the territories. More radical factions formed around the Gush Emunim movement, with some openly advocating mass transfer of Palestinians, including the expulsion of the Israeli-Arab citizens. RABBI MEIR KAHANE, head of the KACH movement and member of the Israeli Knesset, claimed in the 1980s that, given the possibility of a Palestinian majority, the contradiction between the concept of Israel as both a Jewish and a democratic state could not be resolved, and therefore both citizen and noncitizen Arabs should be evicted from Israel and the territories.

Changes and Setbacks

After the 1977 elections, when supporters of the Greater Israel ideology reached their greatest political power, Prime Minister Begin's first official declaration was that there would be many ELON MOREHS, referring to the first Gush Emunim settlement in Samaria. Yet, although the Greater Israel ideology appeared to have become the foundation of Israel's policy, within a short time supporters of the ideology had to accept various compromises, which led to the rise of new radical groups (Kach, MOLEDET, and others). For Greater Israel proponents the 1979 CAMP DAVID agreement with EGYPT was a major crisis. Supporters of the ideology bitterly noted that although Israel surrendered its rights on the Sinai Peninsula, the Egyptians insisted on the return of "every grain of sand" of the Sinai. For these members of the Greater Israel movement Egypt showed greater love for its land than did Israel. The debate over the peace proposal brought about the secession of the ultra-rightist faction of the Likud Party and the establishment of a new radical Greater Israel party, TEHIYA. From then on, the main body of Likud leadership moved, if very slowly, away from the Greater Israel ideology. During the 1980s the number of settlements in the Occupied Territories greatly increased, in accordance with the Greater Israel ideology. However, even when the movement appeared to be most effective, as in altering the ethnic landscape of the West Bank, its public support became increasingly tenuous within Israel.

Significantly, the Greater Israel ideology developed as an inner-Israeli discourse that never considered the Palestinian and Arab positions. The growing resistance of the Palestinians, leading to the 1987 INTIFADA, rendered a blow to the aspiration to annex the Occupied Territories and keep them as an eternal part of Israeli. Although Israel continued to colonize and settle in the Occupied Territories, the discourse of Greater Israel was mostly abandoned by the governing elite.

Greater Israel and the Oslo Process

Despite YITZHAK RABIN's expansion of Jewish settlements after the OSLO ACCORDS, the Labor government's return to power was a further blow to Greater Israel ideology. With the Oslo Accords the Israeli government disavowed the intention of holding indefinitely all the territories occupied in 1967. In protest the opponents of the Oslo agreements and their political allies demonstrated against the agreements and reestablished the Greater Israel coalition. Their arguments, however, mostly abandoned the Greater Israel rhetoric and focused instead on the security issues raised by the agreements.

The Israeli right's return to power after Rabin's assassination and the 1996 elections did not change the basic situation. Although Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU was obliged to follow the Oslo Accords, he did so as sparingly as possible, refusing to implement numerous signed agreements and aggressively expanding GREATER JERUSALEM. He did, however, finally concede areas of Hebron to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. EHUD BARAK, who followed him as prime minister, received much criticism for his apparent willingness to concede much of the Occupied Territories to the Palestinians in a final settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The second Palestinian Intifada (AL-AQSA INTIFADA), starting in October 2000, brought new opportunities but also new constraints for the Greater Israel ideology. Its basic claim was always that the land was homogeneous, with no difference between either side of the Green Line. Although the SUICIDE BOMBINGS in Israeli cities seemed to enforce that view, the construction of the BARRIER wall was a major setback for the Greater Israel movement. It clearly implied that one part of the whole land should be physically protected from the other part and that security concerns should take precedence over religious/ideological dicta.

Similarly, Israel's plan for unilateral disengagement, which called for an Israeli evacuation from the Gaza Strip and the destruction of the Gush Katif settlement region, was devastating to Greater Israel proponents, all the more so because it was carried out by Ariel Sharon, previously a major proponent of Greater Israel ideology.

As of 2006 the ideology of Greater Israel is rarely mentioned in Israel and hardly considered in deliberations with the international community. Supporters of Greater Israel are still found in right-wing political parties and still form a sizable group that often must be considered in political decisions. Publicly, however, it is rare to find unqualified support for a political position that favors keeping the entire land of Israel, in whatever definition, under exclusive Israeli rule—apart from marginal messianic groups with limited followings. It has become clear to most Israelis that a Greater Israel solution would cause increasingly greater violence and undoubtedly entail mass ethnic cleansing of non-Jews. The radical Jewish messianic groups that support the idea try to legitimize the dehumanization of the Palestinians with religious, nationalistic, and security considerations. Whether these attempts to keep the ideological torch burning will eventually rekindle the idea is a matter for the future.

See also GUSH EMUNIM; JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM; SETTLEMENTS

Bibliography

- Aran, Gideon. From Religious Zionism to Zionist Religion: The Roots and Culture of Gush Emunim. PhD diss. Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1987.
- . “Jewish Zionist Fundamentalism: The Bloc of the Faithful in Israel.” In Fundamentalism Observed. Edited by Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- . “A Mystic-Messianic Interpretation of Modern Israeli History: The Six Day War as a Key Event in the Development of the Original Religious Culture of Gush Emunim.” Studies in Contemporary Judaism. 4 (1988).
- Feige, Michael. “Jewish Settlement of Hebron: The Place and the Other.” GeoJournal. 53 (2001).
- . One Space, Two Places: Gush Emunim, Peace Now and the Construction of Israeli Space. Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 2002.
- . Settling in the Hearts: Jewish Fundamentalism in the Occupied Territories. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2009.
- Gal-Nur. Sons Return to Their Borders: Decisions on the State and Territories in the Zionist Movement. Jerusalem and Sede Boker: Magnes Press and Ben-Gurion Research Center, 1995.
- Harkabi, Yehoshafat. Israel's Fateful Hour. New York: Harper and Row, 1989.
- Harnoi, Meir. The Settlers. Jerusalem: Ma'ariv, 1995.
- Isaak, R. Israel Divided: Ideological Politics in the Jewish State. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1976.
- Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1991.
- . Unsettled States, Disputed Lands. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993.
- Naor, Arie. Greater Israel: Theology and Policy. Haifa: University of Haifa Press and Zmora-Bitan, 1999.
- Newman, David, ed. The Impact of Gush Emunim. London: Croom Helm, 1985.
- Ohana, David. “Kfar Etzion: The Community of Memory and the Myth of Return.” Israel Studies. 7:2 (2002).
- Ravitzki, Avi. Messianism, Zionism and Jewish Religious Radicalism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Shafat, Gershon. Gush Emunim: The Story behind the Scenes. Beit El: Sifriyat Bet-El, 1985.
- Sheleg, Yair. The New Religious Jews: Recent Developments among Observant Jews in Israel. Jerusalem: Keter, 2000.

Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

—Michael Feige

Greek Orthodox Church

In Palestine the Greek Orthodox Church is the richest Christian church and the second largest landholder (after the state of Israel and the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND), with major holdings in JERUSALEM, the WEST BANK, and the GAZA STRIP. It is also the largest Palestinian Christian community, with some 100,000 members. As such its patriarchy in Jerusalem has played a complicated role in the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. In contrast to the Roman Catholic Church, whose pope makes policy and passes it down through the hierarchy, the Greek Orthodox Church is not centrally structured. Every Orthodox patriarch who has served in Jerusalem has essentially made his own policies. There is constant tension between the Greek patriarchs and local Palestinian Greek Orthodox bishops and priests over LAND sales to Israel, as well as tension among the patriarchs, Israel, JORDAN, and, more recently, the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA).

In 1974 Patriarch Hilarion Capucci was arrested and convicted by Israel of smuggling weapons to the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, and in 2000 Patriarch Theodosios Hanna accused Israel of “ethnic cleansing” of Palestinians. Much more common than such extremes, however, are sales of Palestinian LAND by patriarchs to Israel, an action that enrages Palestinians.

Before the establishment of Israel in 1948, Zionist pioneers bought land through middlemen or from ABSENTEE LANDLORDS and then established fortified communities, sometimes evicting long-term Palestinian tenants. Since Israeli forces captured East Jerusalem from Jordan in 1967, groups of Jewish investors and several right-wing settler organizations have continued this policy in and around East Jerusalem with the support of Israel, and Greek Orthodox patriarchs have been major land sellers. Since the BRITISH MANDATE the Greek Orthodox Church has sold or leased land to Jews. For example, the land for Jerusalem's prestigious Rehavia suburb, the Knesset, and ARIEL SHARON's official residence was originally owned by the church. In the 1990s the Greek Orthodox Church sold a large piece of land on the outskirts of East Jerusalem to Jewish investors who built the settlement of HAR HOMA on it, and since then there have been several smaller deals.

In 2001 Patriarch Irenaeus I was elected to the Jerusalem office, although initially Israel opposed him as too pro-Palestinian and refused to recognize him. Subsequently Ma'ariv, a respected Israeli newspaper, broke the story that Irenaeus had sold several church properties, including the landmark Imperial and Petra hotels along with numerous shops inside Jaffa Gate in the OLD CITY, to two groups of overseas Jewish investors. The paper described the sale as Jews seeking to "liberate the lands of Jerusalem." The patriarch quickly denied the allegations and blamed a Greek financial advisor, Nicholas Papadimas, for abusing his authority under a limited power of attorney. At the time Irenaeus was already fighting for his survival as patriarch after an Israeli court, acting on the government's initial belief that Irenaeus would support the Palestinian claim to East Jerusalem and before the news of his land sales was made public, ruled that he had been elected to the post with the help of a convicted drug trafficker.

After the story about the land deals was published the Jordanian government withdrew its recognition of the patriarch, and the PNA was prepared to follow. However, the PNA eventually decided to maintain its support of Irenaeus after the patriarch promised to cancel the property transactions. The transactions were not cancelled, however, and Ha'aretz, the Jerusalem daily, revealed in November 2005 that US businessman IRWIN MOSKOWITZ was the person who had bought the two hotels near the Jaffa Gate from the Greek Orthodox Church and that he had no intention of reselling them. On the other hand, the highest local Greek Orthodox ecclesiastic bodies, the Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulcher and the Church Synod, both voted to depose Irenaeus, accusing him of being part of a conspiracy to "Judaize" the Old City. The synod demoted Irenaeus from archbishop to monk and elected Cornelius of Petra to act in his stead until a new patriarch would be officially installed.

Irenaeus, however, insisted he was still the patriarch. Legally church leaders cannot dismiss a patriarch; only the governments in the areas where his congregation lives—in this case, Israel, Jordan, and the PNA—have the power to do that by withdrawing their recognition of him. Only Jordan did so. After Israel learned of Irenaeus's land deals with Jewish investors in East Jerusalem, it maintained cordial relations with him until the end of his service in 2005. Such conflicts and political intrigues characterize the history of the Greek Orthodox Church in the Holy Land.

See also CHRISTIANITY

Bibliography

- Associated Press. "Palestinian Cabinet Clears Greek Orthodox Patriarch in Property Deals with Jewish Settlement Groups in Jerusalem." 4 July 2005.
- Baker, Joharah. "Orthodox Church in the Eye of the Storm." Palestine Report. 11:39 (3 March 2005).
- Lis, Jonathan, and Meron Rappoport. "Plan to Build 90 Apartments in the Sheikh Jarrah Neighborhood." Ha'aretz. 3 November 2005.
- Mcgreal, Chris. "Greek Orthodox Church Mired in Jerusalem Land Row." The Guardian. 22 March 2005.
- Middle East Christian News. "Israel and Greek Orthodox Church at Loggerheads over Patriarch." Ecumenical News International. 30 November 2006.
- Middle East Media Research Institute. "Greek Orthodox Church Spokesman Replaced for Supporting Suicide Attacks." The Middle East Media Research Institute. Special Dispatch No. 405. 30 July 2002.
- O'Loughlin, Ed. "Jerusalem Land Sale Scandal Rocks Greek Orthodox Church." The Sydney Morning Herald. 25 March 2005.
- Parsons, David. "Takeover Bid." International Christian Embassy (Jerusalem). 17 June 2005.
- Shuman, Ellis. "Appointment of 'Pro-Palestinian' Greek Orthodox Church Head Postponed." Israelinsider. 29 December 2002. <http://web.israelinsider.com/Articles/Diplomacy/1793.htm>.
- Susser, Leslie. "Israel Should Back the Greek Orthodox Church Unreservedly." The Jerusalem Report. 11 July 2005.

Green Areas

Since 1967 the Israeli authorities have confiscated large areas of Palestinian land in Israeli-defined greater East JERUSALEM and categorized them as green areas. Ostensibly such spaces were established for environmental and recreational purposes, in which all construction is prohibited. Later, however, many of these areas were reclassified as "yellow areas" for exclusive Jewish building. The Israeli settlements of Neve Ya'cub, Pisgat Zeiv, MA'ALE ADUMIM, Gilo, the French Hill, Giva'at Shabira, and HAR HOMA are all built on land previously classified by the Israeli authorities as green areas.

In the early 1980s the Jerusalem municipal government began to prepare development plans for all the Palestinian neighborhoods within and surrounding the Old City of East Jerusalem. The most conspicuous feature of these plans is the vast size—some 50 percent—of the area designated as green areas. The municipality used zoning restrictions to establish these green areas and thus removed the land from Palestinian use and created a reserve for Jewish housing.

Conversely, according to B'Tselem (Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), in the plans that were approved prior to the end of 1999, only some 1,250 acres (5,100 dunums, constituting 11 percent of the land in East Jerusalem) were available to the Palestinian population for construction. In 2006 the percentage of Jerusalem land accessible to Palestinians had shrunk to only 7 percent. The consequences of this policy are evident in Palestinian neighborhoods. For example, at the end of 2002 housing density in Arab neighborhoods was almost twice that of Jewish neighborhoods: 128 square feet (11.9 square meters) per person compared to 256 square feet (23.8 square meters) per person, respectively. This situation forced many Palestinians to build homes without first obtaining building PERMITS, which were consistently denied by the authorities. For the year 2006 the municipality budgeted US$600,000 for Palestinian HOUSE DEMOLITIONS in Jerusalem. From January to April 2006, 246 house demolition orders were sent to Jerusalemites living in the Sur Baher, Jabal Al Mukabber, SILWAN, and Shu'fat areas of Jerusalem. In the years 2003–2005 a total of 442 Palestinian homes were demolished in East Jerusalem, dispossessing some 2,108 persons.

If the municipality has declared an area as green, any Palestinian landowner wishing to build on the land must make a proposal for it to be rezoned. To make a rezoning proposal, one must employ an engineer to draw up plans in accordance with regulations. Not only are such proposals typically refused, they can also cost up to two or three times the cost of building the house. Once the municipality declares an area a green zone, existing houses may be demolished and new construction is illegal. Palestinians who live in the green areas have nowhere to go. If they build outside the city, they lose their residency rights, because the authorities claim Jerusalem is no longer their "CENTER OF LIFE," and if they build without a permit, their houses are demolished.

See also JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; SHAYK JARRAH; SILWAN; ZONING LAWS AND REGULATIONS

Bibliography

- Barghouthi, Mustafa. "Summary of Press Conference." Palestinian Non-Governmental Organization Network, PNGO. 29 March 2005.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Planning and Zoning. n.d. http://64.233.161.104/search?q=cache:waEFdmhYakwJ:www.btselem.org/English/Jerusalem/Discriminating\_Policy.asp+%22green+areas%22+Israel&hl=en&gl=ca&ct=clnk&cd=31.
- Guego, Elodie. "'Quiet Transfer' in East Jerusalem Nears Completion." Forced Migration Review. 8 September 2006.
- MIFTAH. "Home Demolition and Land Confiscation." MIFTAH (Palestinian Initiative for the Promotion of Global Dialogue and Democracy). 15 October 2001.
- POICA. Intensive Demolition Campaign against Palestinian Housing in Jerusalem during the First Three Months of 2006. Land Research Center, Applied Research Institute. April 2006. www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=819.
- Schweitzer, Amanda, and Marjie Sackett. "Land and Housing Rights in al-Issawiya, Israeli Occupied East Jerusalem." Alternatives. 2 November 2008. <http://www.alternatives.ca/article4213.html>.

Green Patrol

The Green Patrol, an environmental paramilitary unit under the Israel Land Administration, has the mission of preventing BEDOUIN infiltration into national Israeli land and also keeps the Bedouin from grazing their animals, cultivating their farmlands, and establishing homes, roads, and educational facilities in traditional areas, among other things. In 1979 Agriculture Minister ARIEL SHARON declared the Negev south of the 50-degree latitude a protected nature reserve or "green area," rendering it almost completely out of bounds for Bedouin herders, who had traditionally grazed there. Initially the Agriculture Ministry established the Green Patrol for the purpose of implementing the 1950 Black Goat Law, which prohibited grazing on a large scale. The patrol later expanded its activities and removed 900 Bedouin settlements and cut their goat herds by more than one-third. Twice in 2003 the Israel Land Administration sent crop-dusting planes to spray Bedouin farmland with herbicide. Members of the Green Patrol are sometimes accompanied by a significant police presence on the ground.

See also BEDOUIN IN ISRAEL; UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES

Bibliography

- Humphries, Isabelle. "The Green Patrol: Israel Tightens Stranglehold on 1948 Palestinians." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. August 2002.
- Jamjoum, Hazem. "Ongoing Displacement of Palestine's Southern Bedouin." The Palestine Chronicle. 4 February 2009.

Grossman, David (1954–)

David Grossman is an Israeli journalist and writer who has published five novels, two nonfiction works, a play, and several children's books. As a journalist for a number of organizations, including Kol Israel (Israeli Radio), he has been hailed by some as Israel's best journalist. Grossman has won numerous awards for his writing, including the Prime Minister's Prize for Hebrew Literature, the Israeli Publisher's Prize for best novel, the Vallombrosa Prize, the Nelly Sachs prize, and the Premio Mondelo for The Zigzag Kid.

Grossman was born in JERUSALEM, the son of Yitzhak Grossman, who immigrated to Palestine from Austria, and Michaela, a Jerusalemite. He studied philosophy and theater at Hebrew University, graduating in 1979. Grossman first achieved international recognition with the publication of his book The Yellow Wind (1987), a nonfiction account of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Since then he has continued to garner acclaim for works such as The Smile of the Lamb, which was inspired by the Israeli OCCUPATION, and See Under: Love, which examines the experiences of a child of HOLOCAUST survivors.

See also HEBREW LITERATURE

Gulf War, 1991

Following IRAQ's invasion of KUWAIT in August 1990, the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chose not to join a coalition that immediately began to form against Iraqi president Saddam Husayn. The isolation of Iraq quickly widened to include a UN Security Council resolution (No. 664) condemning its action and calling for its "complete, immediate, and unconditional withdrawal" from Kuwait. Similar resolutions were hurriedly approved by the ARAB LEAGUE, while the UNITED STATES orchestrated an alliance to liberate Kuwait. The PLO's decision to align itself with Iraq resulted in wide-ranging setbacks—from economic deprivation to political marginalization—that affected many aspects of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Following its liberation by the US and allied forces, Kuwait retaliated with a mass expulsion of the entire Palestinian community—some 450,000 persons, including many who had either been born in Kuwait or lived there for decades, so that individuals who had initially been REFUGEES from Palestine were now refugees from Kuwait. The majority went to JORDAN while others were scattered around the globe. At the same time, jobs that had previously been open to Palestinians in SAUDI ARABIA and elsewhere in the Gulf were now closed. All of these circumstances created economic difficulties for the Palestinians residing in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP and in the refugee camps elsewhere in the Middle East, who had become financially dependent on the remittances from Gulf workers. Moreover, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia abruptly ended their large annual financial contributions to YASIR ARAFAT for PLO institutions and individuals. The Palestinians also experienced serious political fallout that threatened their long-term goal of a viable, independent state. All the political capital the PLO had so painstakingly acquired since 1988 was squandered by its alignment with Iraq.

The most serious consequences of the PLO's decision was the organization's subsequent need for excessive accommodation to Israel after the PLO's legitimacy, credibility, and primacy as the "sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinian people" were questioned at a number of levels after the Gulf War. At the local (West Bank/Gaza Strip) level, where the Islamic Resistance Movement (HAMAS) had emerged during the First INTIFADA, the Palestinian masses were increasingly opposed to the secular policies of the PLO, which included recognition of Israel and a TWO-STATE SOLUTION. At the regional and international levels the PLO suddenly found itself more isolated than it had been since 1975.

The PLO took such a fateful course of action as a result of several factors. In the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, frustration had increased as the First Intifada entered its third year without ending the Israeli OCCUPATION. Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza were also facing a rapid expansion of Jewish SETTLEMENT construction and the influx of a huge SOVIET JEWISH community. The newly formed LIKUD government was proving to be more hard-line than the previous LABOR-Likud coalition, and the threat of expulsion of Palestinians from the Occupied Territories was in the air after the far right MOLEDET Party, known for its open advocacy of Palestinian TRANSFER, gained positions in the new Israeli government. And Palestinians became increasingly frustrated over what they perceived as continual PLO deference to the United States with nothing tangible to show for it.

In this context of despair and disappointment, Palestinians suddenly experienced a renewed sense of optimism about their plight when a February 1990 speech by Saddam Husayn marking the first anniversary of the Arab Cooperation Council was broadcast throughout the Occupied Territories. The Iraqi president condemned the West for its unwavering support of Israel and called upon all Arabs to unite in the struggle against the US superpower. Popular opinion in the West Bank and Gaza Strip now turned toward Iraq as the power in the region that could potentially liberate them from the Israeli military Occupation. At the same time, while other Arab states were significantly scaling back their financial contributions to the PLO, Iraq not only maintained but actually increased its assistance—aid that was materially experienced in the Occupied Territories and in the Palestinian DIASPORA.

When Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990, demonstrations in support of Saddam erupted throughout the Occupied Territories. One major force behind Palestinian public support for Saddam Husayn was that he proposed making any Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait conditional upon an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza Strip. At this time Hamas was also calling on all Palestinians to take their struggle to Israeli soil and for Baghdad to strike at Tel Aviv if the West attacked Iraq. Arafat and his colleagues believed that if the PLO condemned the Iraqi invasion and Saddam's subsequent annexation of Kuwait, it risked being judged illegitimate by its constituency in the Occupied Territories—a constituency that had become increasingly important to the PLO as a consequence of the Intifada. The majority of the PLO leadership felt that it could not politically afford to ignore Palestinian grassroots support for Saddam or Saddam's political and financial support for the PLO and the Palestinian cause.

Yet its decision to align with Iraq and not join the US-led coalition against Baghdad stripped the PLO of its support in the Arab world and isolated it in the international community, leaving it extremely weakened and vulnerable. Throughout the preparations leading up to the MADRID CONFERENCE in the period after the war, the United States, following Israel's demands, set the terms and conditions for Palestinian participation, and the PLO was powerless to object. It had to accept that it would be formally excluded from the conference, that any Palestinian participation would be tied to a joint Jordanian delegation, that Israel would vet any Palestinian participants, and that no Palestinians from outside the Occupied Territories or from East JERUSALEM could participate. Despite these restrictions, Arafat concluded that to remain a factor in the Middle East, he had no choice but to participate in the conference.

At the start of the Madrid peace process, the Palestinian negotiators were optimistic because their voices and their concerns were being heard, and they hoped that the United States would be a fair and neutral partner in the peace process. Also the conference would mark the first time that all the parties to the dispute were seated at the negotiating table. The talks, however, failed to make any progress on substantive issues. The government of Israeli prime minister YITZHAK SHAMIR rejected Palestinian proposals for self-rule, and Israel (and the United States) now began to refer to the West Bank and Gaza Strip as "disputed lands" rather than as "occupied territories." Both Hamas and the Damascus-based PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT openly opposed continued Palestinian participation in the Madrid talks, especially in light of Israel's increased settlement building, growing human rights violations, avoidance of the refugee issue, and the Palestinian ECONOMIC crisis. Yet despite its doubts, the PLO's Central Council decided that it had no choice but to continue engaging in the talks, although the leader of the Palestinian delegation, Gazan HAYDAR 'ABD AL-SHAFI, concluded differently and resigned.

During this period Arafat also approved secret back-channel negotiations that ultimately produced the joint Israel-PLO DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP) and the OSLO ACCORDS that followed. But the PLO was in no stronger a position vis-à-vis Israel in these negotiations than in the formal bilateral Madrid talks. The vast disparities of power that underlay the OSLO PROCESS set the PLO on a seven-year quest for a state that ended with Arafat's eighteen-month imprisonment until his death, an economic catastrophe for Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, the harshest Occupation policies Palestinians had ever experienced, a new Intifada, and the end of all hope for a state.

The PLO's agreement to the extremely unfavorable terms of the Declaration of Principles, which set the goal of establishing a Palestinian self-governing authority, can only be understood in terms of the organization's weakness as a result of siding with Saddam Husayn in a war in which every other state was on the opposite side. The Israeli-PLO relationship was always characterized by massive power differentials, but after the Gulf War the PLO's position was so weak that it had no leverage or bargaining power, which was one reason why Israel agreed to recognize and engage with the PLO. The DOP and the numerous agreements that followed were, in effect, dictated by Israel and acquiesced to by the PLO. Throughout the seven years of negotiations, the Israelis made demands and the Palestinians made concessions.

In the end the Oslo Process not only failed to lead to the fulfillment of Palestinian aspirations for self-determination and statehood, but also left unresolved the issue of the 1948 refugees' right of return as well as the final status of Jerusalem. At the same time, this period witnessed both an enormous increase in Jewish settlement and ROAD construction in the West Bank (thus reducing any prospect for a viable, territorially contiguous Palestinian state in the future) and an aggressive Judaization of East Jerusalem (foreclosing any possibility that the city could serve as the capital of any future Palestinian state).

Bibliography

- Abed, George. "The Palestinians and the Gulf Crisis." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:2 (1991).
- Abu-Amr, Ziad. " Hamas: A Historical and Political Background." Journal of Palestine Studies. 22:4 (1993).
- Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim. "Non-alignment and Commitment in the Gulf Conflicts: Palestine's Policy." Arab Studies Quarterly. 13 (1991).
- Adoni, Lamis. "The PLO at the Crossroads." Journal of Palestine Studies. 21:1 (1991).
- . "The PLO: In Search of a Strategy." Middle East International. 20 July 1990.
- . "The PLO: Relying on Saddam." Middle East International. 11 May 1990.
- Aruri, Nasser. "The United States and Palestine: Reagan's Legacy to Bush." Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:3 (1989).
- DiGeorgio-Lutz, JoAnn. "Has the Palestine Liberation Organization Been an Able Representative of the Palestinian People—Yes." In History in Dispute: The Middle East since 1945, vol. 14. Edited by David W. Lesch. Columbia, SC, and Manly, MI: St. James Press, 2003.
- . A Role Modification Model: The Foreign Policy of the Palestine Liberation Organization 1964–1981. Ph.D. diss., University of North Texas, Denton, 1993.

- . "The U.S.-PLO Relationship: From Dialogue to the White House Lawn." In The Middle East and the United States: A Historical and Political Reassessment, 3rd ed. Edited by David W. Lesch. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2002.
- Eilts, Hermann Frederick. "The Persian Gulf Crisis: Perspectives and Prospects." The Middle East Journal. 45 (1991).
- Gowers, Andrew, and Tony Walker. Behind the Myth: Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Revolution. New York: Olive Branch Press, 1992.
- Hallaj, Muhammad. "Taking Sides: Palestinians and the Gulf Crisis." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:3 (1991).
- Khalidi, Rashid. "After Arafat." London Review of Books. 27:3 (2005).
- . "The Palestinians and the Gulf Crisis." In The Gulf War Reader: History, Documents, Opinions. Edited by Micah L. Sifry and Christopher Cerf. New York: Random House, 1991.
- Khalidi, Walid. "Why Some Arabs Support Saddam." In The Gulf War Reader: History, Documents, Opinions. Edited by Micah L. Sifry and Christopher Cerf. New York: Random House, 1991.
- Lesch, Ann Mosely. "Contrasting Reactions to the Persian Gulf Crisis: Egypt, Syria, Jordan, and the Palestinians." The Middle East Journal. 45 (Winter 1991).
- Rashad, Ahmed. " Hamas: Palestinian Politics with an Islamic Hue." In The Politics and Development of the Middle East. Occasional Papers Series No. 2. United Association for Studies and Research, 1993.
- Robinson, Glen E. "After Arafat." Current History. 104:678 (January 2005).
- Roy, Sara. "The Palestinian State: Division and Despair." Current History. January 2004.
- . "The Political Economy of Despair: Changing Political and Economic Realities in the Gaza Strip." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:3 (1991).
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. "The Bush Administration and the Palestinians: A Reassessment." In U.S. Policy on Palestine from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Normal, IL: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1994.
- . "The Gulf War, the Palestinians, and the New World Order." In The Gulf War and the New World Order: International Relations of the Middle East. Edited by Tareq Y. Ismael and Jacqueline S. Ismael. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.

—JoAnn DiGeorgio-Lutz

Gush Emunim

The impact of Gush Emunim (Bloc of the Faithful) on Israeli society thirty years after its establishment in 1974 cannot be underestimated. While the movement as such ceased to exist in the 1980s, it gave birth to a large number of SETTLEMENTS and political and ideological organizations, which continue to implement the basic ideology laid out by the movement's founders. This ideology focuses above all else on the philosophies of the Greater Land of Israel and JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM, spearheaded through its WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, and GAZA settlement policy. The impact of Gush's policy and settlements has been clearly evident in attempts to draw the boundaries of a TWO-STATE SOLUTION to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the period since the OSLO ACCORDS in 1993 and 1995. At the same time, the political influence of its supporters as part of the governmental and institutional framework has been a major factor underlying Israeli governmental coalitions during the past twenty years.

History of the Movement

Gush Emunim was founded in 1974 as a movement seeking the permanent retention by Israel of the West Bank and Gaza Strip territories and their ultimate incorporation into Israel. It has rejected any form of territorial withdrawal from these regions, viewing the Israel-SYRIA disengagement agreements on the Golan Heights, in the immediate aftermath of the 1973 War, as a dangerous precedent for further territorial withdrawals in the West Bank and Gaza. Gush Emunim's territorial philosophy is based on a religious ideology that believes the whole of the "Land of Israel," as described in biblical texts, was promised to the Jewish people by God. Once conquered (or, in their terms, "liberated") in the "miraculous" events of the 1967 WAR, this LAND cannot voluntarily be given over to any form of non-Jewish rule, even through the democratic decisions of an elected government. To achieve its objective, Gush Emunim sought to create a political movement that would ensure that no part of Israeli-controlled land would ever be relinquished. To that end it proposed the establishment of Jewish settlements throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip as a practical means to establish permanent Israeli control of the land. Arguing that all settlement-colonization activity in pre-Israel Palestine had helped determine Israel's ultimate BORDERS, Gush believed that similar activities were necessary within the West Bank and Gaza Strip during the present era.

Gush Emunim established its first settlements in the West Bank, in Sebastia and Ophrah, against the wishes of the YITZHAK RABIN government of the time (1974–1977). After the election of Israel's first right-wing government in 1977, one of Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN's earliest actions was to visit the Camp Kedumim outpost and to declare that there would be many more ELON MOREHS (a reference to settlement OUTPOSTS not sanctioned by the Israeli government) during the life of his government.

Political Activity

Gush Emunim never became a formal movement with membership lists and official leadership roles. Movement activists, who identified with the basic Greater Land of Israel ideology, tended instead to become involved in a wide range of private, public, and quasi-governmental institutions, all aimed at furthering the cause of West Bank and Gaza settlements. Over time it adopted two modes of political behavior to achieve its objectives. On the one hand it maintained an informal street activist mode of protest via public demonstrations and similar actions whenever it felt that its ultimate objectives were threatened. At the same time the movement's leaders and their spin-off institutions worked within the government to advance their political aims. They assumed active roles in political parties, splinter factions, settlement movements, planning agencies, and local governmental and municipal positions, as well as getting support from specific government ministries and even from some LABOR and LIKUD administrations. This political involvement enabled Gush Emunim to use public sector resources to advance its settlement objectives and to disseminate the Greater Land of Israel ideology and messianic fundamentalism to future generations of adherents through a network of public sector and religious schools, as well as other educational institutions.

Gush Emunim and its ideological inheritors have always been major opponents of every peace process that proposed any territorial withdrawal that would lead to non-Jewish control or sovereignty over parts of the land of Israel. They have always been the most effective demonstrators against various peace initiatives, organizing large protests in the major cities, posting their slogans and billboards throughout the country at the most visible intersections and public places, and creating a lobby among right-wing politicians to prevent the implementation of any proposed peace accord. Compared to all other modes of protest in Israel during the past thirty years, the Gush Emunim settler movement has been the most vociferous and active, able to mobilize tens of thousands of supporters in public rallies whenever necessary. At the same time, its belief that its objectives are religiously sanctioned has resulted in acts of violence and extremism, which have become associated with right-wing protests in Israel.

In the mid-1980s the discovery and arrest of members of an ultranationalist underground were the first indications of the extremes to which some members of the settler movement were prepared to go. Elected Palestinian mayors of West Bank cities were killed and maimed by bombs planted in their cars, while plans to plant bombs on Palestinian buses and to blow up the AL-AQSA MOSQUE were central to the activities of this underground. The murder of Emil Greenzweig at a PEACE NOW demonstration in 1983, the murder of 29 Muslim worshippers in AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in HEBRON by KIRYAT ARBA resident BARUCH GOLDSTEIN in 1994, and the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in September 1995 were further indications of ultranationalist political extremism. In each case the movement was at pains to emphasize that these were exceptions rather than the rule and that the incidents of violence did not represent the overall settler movement, which was composed of law-abiding citizens opposed to any form of violence, particularly against the Jewish citizens of Israel.

The Gush Emunim ideology created additional protest movements, organizations, and NGOs. Most notable among these have been the WOMEN IN GREEN, ZO ARTZENU, BeTzedek movements, the GAMLA movement, and PROFESSORS FOR A STRONG ISRAEL, all of which strongly oppose any form of territorial compromise and have led the campaign against Israel's disengagement from any OCCUPIED TERRITORY. Many of these movements have adopted the most extreme statements and slogans of protest, distancing themselves from mainstream Israeli leadership. Many receive support and funding from supporters in North America and Western Europe.

The main political party associated with the Gush Emunim ideology was initially the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY (NRP, or Mafdal). Prior to 1967, Mafdal was seen as the party of compromise between secular and orthodox Israel and took part in almost all government coalitions. Following 1967, however, the party clearly turned to the right in terms of national politics, becoming the party that supported and promoted the retention of the Occupied Territories and the establishment of settlements throughout this region. Many Gush Emunim supporters transferred their political allegiances to other, more extreme, right-wing parties—such as the Ihud leumi (NATIONAL UNITY Party), led by BENYAMIN ELON, and YISRAEL BETEINU (Israel Is Our Home party), led by Avigdor Lieberman—and the more mainstream Likud party of government, and were partially responsible for the eventual demise of the NRP and its reincarnation into a small splinter faction known as Habayit Hayehudi (the Jewish Home) in the 2009 elections.

Another form of Gush Emunim political mobilization and institutionalization has been through local governments, which are responsible for educational and welfare services within their jurisdictions. Many Gush Emunim settler activists find employment within local government, while local mayors are elected from the resident settler population. In this way Gush Emunim is able to use public sector resources to consolidate and expand its existing settlement network.

A number of additional quasi-public bodies, set up with specific political objectives, provide additional indications of the sophisticated organizations that have formed around the Gush Emunim settler movement ideology. The YESHA COUNCIL is an umbrella organization representing all of the West Bank (and previously Gaza) municipalities and local government authorities. Its objective is to promote the settlements and to lobby on their behalf inside government, in political parties, and in government ministries. Similarly, the YESHA RABBIS Council, composed of some of the leading West Bank community rabbis, has over time become the supreme authority for many settlers in interpreting religious ideology and determining the form of opposition and political activity when government decisions support territorial withdrawal and settlement evacuation. The Yesha Council often consults with the leading Yesha Rabbis before it adopts a specific political position, and the latter played a leading role in the period before the Gaza disengagement.

Settlement Activity

Gush Emunim has always focused on the practical, concrete way to achieve its political objectives—the establishment of settlements throughout the Occupied Territories to ensure that the Palestinian territories taken in the 1967 War will never again be under non-Jewish rule. In its worldview, settling the territories will advance divine redemption, while relinquishing these territories constitutes a setback in the redemption process.

Gush Emunim presents itself as the true preservers and interpreters of the Zionist movement as defined by RABBI AVRAHAM YITZHAK KOOK and his son, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda, who believed that the coming of the Messiah is imminent and that the Jews, with God's aid, will thereafter triumph over the non-Jews and rule them forever. The use of Arab-owned land for settlement by Jews, they argue, is part of this redemption process. Gush also looks to the early Zionist movement that brought land under control of the Jewish collective and eventually produced a sovereign state by incremental land purchases and settlements. The notion of hitnachelut, the term used in the Bible to describe Joshua's conquest of the land of Israel following the return from Egyptian exile, has come to define the West Bank and Gaza settlements and is perceived by Gush Emunim as a positive rather than negative term.

The Gush Emunim activities have resulted—directly and indirectly—in the settling of well over 250,000 residents in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. This has taken place in a wide range of urban and suburban communities and townships, most of which have experienced growth due to relatively high rates of birth among the mostly religious inhabitants of these communities. Settlement growth has been accompanied by the development of social and physical infrastructure, schools, municipalities, and institutes of higher education, as well as the construction of roads, industrial parks, and commercial centers. In the ongoing Israeli discourse about the eventual borders between Israel and a future Palestinian state, settlements have played an important role. Israel's attempt to annex those parts of the West Bank where the major settlement blocs are located—especially those close to the Green Line—has shown the settlements' powerful impact in creating new geographical and political realities, which then become difficult, if not impossible, to reverse later if political conditions change. This has been demonstrated by the construction of the separation BARRIER, which has effectively annexed parts of the West Bank to Israel under the guise of security considerations. Equally, the evacuation of settlements in the Gaza Strip and the fact that many settlements are on the Palestinian side of the Barrier (which would indicate that they are candidates for future evacuation) show that geographical facts on the ground are powerful political assets, but ones that can be disposed of and removed if and when the political conditions are ripe.

Gaza Disengagement

Israel's hitnatkut (disengagement) from Gaza in 2005 caused a major crisis among the Gush Emunim settlers, at both the ideological and practical levels, because the withdrawal of Israeli troops and the forced evacuation of the settlements was the antithesis of what they perceived as the true path of contemporary ZIONISM: Jewish control of the Greater Land of Israel. In practice, the settler movement and their supporters used all available means to thwart the implementation of hitnatkut. This included attempts to overturn government decisions through civil protests, including demonstrations at which protesters wore orange clothes and ribbons to signify their opposition to the plan, violent actions such as the blocking of major roadways in the center of the country, and the establishment of small illegal outposts.

ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA also raised major questions about the long-term success of Gush Emunim ideology. Having set out to ensure future sovereignty over the entire Greater Land of Israel territory taken in the 1967 War, the settlers were forced to give up control over one part. The collapse of their dream started not with the Gaza disengagement but with the implementation of the Oslo Accords and the transfer of local control and autonomy in many areas to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. Some settler leaders bitterly noted that they had not enlisted the support of most of the country's Jewish population because while they had "succeeded in settling the heart of the Land; they had failed to settle in the hearts of the people." In making this comparison, Gush drew on the term with which it is most associated, namely lehitnachel (settle or squat, or take root).

See also GREATER LAND OF ISRAEL MOVEMENT; JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM; SETTLEMENTS

Bibliography

- Don-Yehiye, Eliezer. "Jewish Messianism, Religious Zionism and Israeli Politics." Middle Eastern Studies. 23 (1987).
- Feige, Michael. Two Maps to the West Bank: Gush Emunim, Peace Now and the Formation of Space in Israel. Jerusalem: Eshkolot Press, 2003.
- Newman, David. "From 'Hitnachelut' to 'Hitnatkut': The Impact of Gush Emunim on Israeli Society and Politics." Israel Affairs. 10:3 (2005).

- . “Gush Emunim between Fundamentalism and Pragmatism.” Jerusalem Quarterly. 39 (1986).
- Newman, David, and Tamar Hermann. “Extra-Parliamentarism in Israel: A Comparative Study of Peace Now and Gush Emunim.” Middle Eastern Studies. 28:3 (1992).
- Shahak, Israel, and Norton Mezvinsky. Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination. New York: Free Press, 1999.
- . Fundamentalism, Terrorism and Democracy: The Case of Gush Emunim Underground. Washington, DC: Woodrow Wilson Institute, 1986.
- . “Gush Emunim: The Iceberg Model of Political Extremism.” State, Government & International Relations. 14 (1983).

—David Newman

Gush Shalom

Gush Shalom (the Peace Bloc) is the core of the ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT. It was founded by URI AVNERY and others in 1993, in response to the repressive measures against the Palestinians introduced by the new LABOR PARTY government headed by YITZHAK RABIN. It struggled with the government to keep the OSLO PROCESS on track as soon as Israel began to deviate from the path of peace. An extraparliamentary organization, independent of any party or other political grouping, Gush Shalom is known for its unwavering stand for peace even in times of crisis, such as the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. Since its inception, Gush Shalom has played a leading role in determining the moral and political agenda of the peace forces in Israel as well as attempting to break the national (anti-Oslo) consensus.

The primary aim of Gush Shalom is to influence Israeli public opinion and lead Israel toward peace and reconciliation with the Palestinian people, based on the following principles:

- Putting an end to the OCCUPATION
- Accepting the right of the Palestinian people to establish an independent and sovereign state of Palestine in all the territories occupied by Israel in 1967
- Reinstating the pre-1967 Green Line as the border between Israel and Palestine (with possible minor exchanges of territories agreed to between the parties)
- Opening the Green Line border for the free movement of people and goods, subject to mutual agreement
- Establishing JERUSALEM as the capital of the two states, with East Jerusalem (including the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF) serving as the capital of Palestine and West Jerusalem (including the WESTERN WALL) serving as the capital of Israel
- Recognizing in principle the right of return of the Palestinian REFUGEES, allowing each refugee to choose between compensation and repatriation to Palestine or Israel, and fixing by mutual agreement an annual quota for the number of refugees who will be able to return to Israel from the camps in LEBANON, JORDAN, and SYRIA without undermining Israel’s foundations
- Safeguarding the security of both Israel and Palestine by mutual agreement and guarantees
- Striving for overall peace between Israel and all Arab countries and the creation of a regional union (www.gush-shalom.org/english).

See also URI AVNERY; CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT; REFUSENIKS; YESH G’VUL

---

H

---

Ha'am, Ahad (1856–1927)

Ahad Ha'am, which means "One of the People," was the pen name of Asher Tzevi Ginzberg, a moral philosopher, prolific writer, Zionist thinker and leader, and the father of "cultural Zionism," a trend in Zionism that values Jewish culture and history and the Hebrew language to a greater extent than statehood, LAND, and other aspects of political Zionism. Born in Kiev, Russia, Ginzberg visited Palestine in 1891 and 1892 and immigrated in 1922. In addition to his traditional Hasidic upbringing, Ginzberg acquired a broad secular education in philosophy and literature and was fluent in five languages. As editor of the journal Ha'shiloah (1896–1902) he was influential in creating the Modern Hebrew literary style. But after Ginzberg developed a strong rationalist philosophy, he rejected first Hasidism, then religion itself. He believed the chief obligation of Jewish life was the fulfillment of the ethical demands of the Old Testament prophets and saw Palestine as the "spiritual center" for a cultural and spiritual revival of the Jewish people, which he considered a crucial precursor to a Jewish state.

Ginzberg joined the HOVEVEI ZION movement around 1884 but soon became a severe critic of its SETTLEMENT activities, preferring instead to work for a Jewish regeneration, for a Jewish cultural revival. He adopted his pen name in 1889 when he published his first and highly controversial essay on ZIONISM, "The Wrong Way," in which he criticized Jews who sought to settle in Palestine, advocating instead Jewish cultural education as the basis for building a strong people for later settlement. He founded the Bnai Moshe (Sons of Moses), a group that primarily concerned itself with the improvement of Hebrew education, the dissemination of HEBREW LITERATURE, and a cultural revival of the Jewish people. However, the group later founded Rehovoth, a settlement in Palestine, as well the Achiasaf Hebrew publishing company. Bnai Moshe was a short-lived effort.

Ginzberg's visits to Palestine convinced him that the Zionist movement would face an uphill struggle. In particular he warned of the difficulties associated with land purchase and cultivation, the problems with OTTOMAN authorities, and the inevitable conflict with the Arabs that would ensue if Jews established a homeland in Palestine. He criticized Zionism's founder THEODOR HERZL for "quasi-messianic schemes" and warned of the disillusionment that would follow Herzl's failure to secure great power support for Zionist land acquisition, IMMIGRATION, and statehood. Ginzberg did not believe in political Zionism and thought settlement of Palestine would not happen until nationalist sentiment and culture were promoted among Jews in the DIASPORA. He split from the Zionist movement after the FIRST ZIONIST CONGRESS of 1898.

Ginzberg played a role in obtaining the British BALFOUR DECLARATION (1917), which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine; however, he was one of the few in the Zionist movement who stressed the parallel obligations to the Arabs found in the declaration. Based on his concept of cultural Zionism, he attempted to limit the political aims of Zionism by emphasizing "consideration for the national rights of the Palestinian Arabs." This was a note rarely if ever struck by the spokesmen for mainstream Zionism.

Four years after the Balfour Declaration was promulgated, Ginzberg, writing as Ahad Ha'am, expressed his views in a preface to the Berlin edition of his book At the Cross Ways. He wrote that the historical right of the Jewish people to a national home in Palestine "does not invalidate the right of the rest of the land's inhabitants . . . [they have] a genuine right to the land due to generations of residence and work upon it." For the Palestinians, too, Ginzberg wrote, "this country is a national home and they have the right to develop their national potentialities to the utmost." He felt this "makes Palestine into a common possession of different peoples," which was why the British government "promised to facilitate the establishment in Palestine of a National Home for the Jewish people and not, as was proposed by the political Zionists, the reconstruction of Palestine as the National Home for the Jewish People."

In 1925 Ginzberg was the spiritual father of and an early participant in the creation of the Berit Shalom (Covenant of Peace), the first organization to call for BINATIONALISM in Palestine. He died in 1927 at the age of seventy-one.

Bibliography

Ha'am, Ahad. Selected Essays by Ahad Ha'am. Translated by Leon Simon. Whitefish, MT: Kessinger Publishing, 2005.

Kornberg, Jacques. At the Crossroads: Essays on Ahad Ha'am. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983.

Stone, I. F. "Part II 'The Other Zionism.'" In Underground to Palestine and Reflections Thirty Years Later. New York: Hutchinson, 1978.

Zipperstein, Steven J. Elusive Prophet: Ahad Ha'am and the Origins of Zionism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Ha'avara, 1933

The Ha'avara (transfer) agreement enabled German Jews to transfer part of their assets to Palestine and to immigrate there. It was concluded in 1933 between Nazi authorities and HAIM ARLOZOROV, a leading representative of the Yishuv, a LABOR Zionist, and a prominent HISTADRUT (Zionist labor federation) leader who traveled to GERMANY and initiated the idea. In 1935 the WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS and the JEWISH AGENCY officially approved the Ha'avara agreement, and it remained active, guaranteed by Hitler, until the outbreak of World War II. In 1933 Sam Cohen, a Jewish businessman from Palestine, also concluded a pact with the Nazi minister of economics that allowed German Jews to transfer their capital in the form of certain goods through Cohen's company, up to a limit of 3 million Reichmarks (about $857,000).

As a result of the Ha'avara agreement, two companies were established to carry out the transfers: the Ha'avara Company in Tel Aviv and a sister company, Paltreu, in Berlin. To start the process, the German Jewish emigrant paid his fee for emigration (the minimum sum was around a thousand pounds sterling) into the German account of the Ha'avara (at the Wassermann Bank in Berlin or at the Warburg Bank in Hamburg). With this money Jewish importers could purchase German goods for export to Palestine while paying the equivalent value in Palestinian pounds into the Ha'avara account at the Anglo-Palestine Bank in Palestine. When the German Jewish emigrant arrived in Palestine, he received from this account the equivalent value of the sum he had paid in Germany, after remitting rather high fees for emigration. In connection with this agreement, the Zionists established their own shipping company, which bought the German passenger ship Hohenstein and renamed it Tel Aviv.

The Ha'avara agreement benefited the economies of both Germany and the Yishuv. It assured the German economy of an export market at a time when world trade still suffered from the 1929 global economic depression and the series of US tariffs that followed. A 1937 memorandum from the German Reich Ministry of the Interior noted that the Ha'avara was good for Germany because German goods were being bought in Palestine and Jews were leaving Germany: "The emigration of Jews suits our overall objectives and the increasing German IMMIGRATION to Palestine has strengthened the Zionists against the British and the Arabs." Additionally, according to Francis R. Nicosia, "Germany became the number-one exporter of goods to Palestine by 1937 due to the Ha'avara agreement."

The Ha'avara agreement also improved the Zionist economy in Palestine. Some analysts suggest that as much as 8 million pounds sterling were transferred from Germany to Palestine. Moreover, only the wealthy German Jews could afford the required 1,000 pounds sterling to leave, so such individuals were more likely to have money that they could invest in the Yishuv economy. As a result of the Ha'avara agreement, approximately 50,000 German Jews immigrated to Palestine.

For the development of the Yishuv, the German immigrants themselves were the most important benefit of the Ha'avara. Many of the most important economic projects in the Yishuv were founded and directed by German immigrants, including the largest foundry and cement industry, owned by Karl Landau, the onetime director of the Berlin electricity and water company. Additionally, Arnold Barth of Berlin, Siegfried Sahlheine of Hamburg, and Herbert Forder of Braslav were prominent managers of the Bank Leumi, originally opened in JAFFA and eventually based in JERUSALEM. Fritz Naphtals of Berlin and George Josephthal of Nuremberg made a giant enterprise out of the insignificant Arbeiterbank. Some of the most important Israeli firms were founded by German immigrants Yekutiel and Sam Federmann of Chemnitz; Yekutiel's entry in Who's Who in Israel (1962) describes him as the founder of the Dan Hotel chain; the Israeli partner of Isasbes, a construction materials company; the founder and partner of Yekutiel Federmann's Federal Oil Company group for investment in an Israeli oil-drilling program in 1975–1976; and president of numerous other companies.

The Ha'avara agreement thus served the Zionist aim of bringing Jewish settlers and development capital to Palestine, while simultaneously serving the German goal of freeing the country of its unwanted Jewish population.

This, however, was not the only instance of contacts between Zionists and the Nazis. LEHI, or the "Stern Group," proposed a variety of schemes to the Nazis in return for promises to fight against Britain in World War II. Not to be outdone, the IRGUN also offered Germany an alliance. Nothing came of either initiative.

Bibliography

- Black, Edwin. The Transfer Agreement: The Dramatic Story of the Pact between the Third Reich and Jewish Palestine, updated ed. New York: Carroll and Graf Publishers, 2001.
- Braatz, Werner. "German Commercial Interests in Palestine: Zionism and the Boycott of German Goods." European Studies Review. 9 (October 1979).
- Brenner, Lenni. 51 Documents: Zionist Collaboration with the Nazis. Fort Lee, NJ: Barricade Books, 2002.
- . Zionism in the Age of the Dictators: A Reappraisal. New York: Lawrence Hill and Co., 1983.
- Encyclopedia of the Holocaust*. "Zionist Attempts to Utilize the Crisis." Museum of Tolerance Multi Media Learning Center. New York: Macmillan, 1990.
- Nicosia, Francis R. The Third Reich and the Palestine Question. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985.
- Polkahn, Klaus. "The Secret Contacts: Zionism and Nazi Germany, 1933–1941." Journal of Palestine Studies. 5:3–4 (1976).
- Yad Vashem. "Chronology of the Holocaust: August 25: Ha'avara Agreement." The Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, 2004. www1.yadvashem.org/about\_holocaust/chronology/1933-1938/1933/chronology\_1933\_18.html

Habash, George (1925–2008)

George Habash is one of the historic leaders of the Palestinian national movement as it developed after 1948, the year of the Palestinian exodus from Israel (or Nakba [catastrophe], as it is called by Palestinians). Together with Hani al-Hindi, he was the founder of the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN, or Harakat al-Qaumiyyin al-'Arab), and in 1967 he established the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP, or al-Jabha al-Shabiya li-Tahrir Filastin), which he led as its general secretary until his resignation in 2000. He is admired by many for his consistent though radical positions in Palestinian politics, and his partisans call him "al-hakim" (the wise old man).

Habash was born in the Palestinian town of LYDDA, the son of a well-off Christian merchant. In 1944 his family sent Habash to the American University of Beirut to study medicine. The year 1948 proved to be the turning point for Habash, who was then in his second year of medical school. Instead of pursuing the career of a medical doctor, as envisioned by his family, he chose the life of a political activist—often underground, in and out of prison, hunted by his enemies and often only narrowly escaping death.

When the 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors began, Habash hurried back to Lydda, where he helped in the local hospital and experienced firsthand Israel's organized expulsion of the populations of Lydda and RAMLA. After viewing the suffering, humiliation, and injustice, Habash returned to Beirut a different person. He became active in student politics in and around the originally cultural association al-Urwa al-Wuthqa (whose president he became), but he also searched for the possibility of more direct action. He found it in a small clandestine organization trying to fight those it considered responsible for the disaster that had struck Palestine and the Palestinians. The tiny but notorious underground group Kata'ib al-Fida' al-'Arabi (Phalanges of Arab Self-Sacrifice or Devotion) indiscriminately attacked Jewish and other targets in 1949–1950: the bloodiest attack was on a synagogue in Damascus where twelve people were killed. Although Habash was probably a marginal figure in the Kata'ib, at least concerning its TERRORIST attacks, he and his friends drew a major lesson from this early experience of activism: individual terror attacks cannot bring about a revolution, and small elite or student organizations cannot substitute for a mass movement. The American University students therefore decided to establish a clandestine but well-organized political group and turned to the refugee camps in Beirut and throughout LEBANON to mobilize and organize people.

In 1952 the results of this effort were visible with the publication of an underground journal, al-Tha'r (Revenge), which attempted to mobilize the masses. Behind the small paper, which was published in Lebanon from 1952 until 1958, was the organization Habash and his friends had finally succeeded in creating—the Movement of Arab Nationalists (MAN). The organization was first active in Lebanon but moved its activities and its headquarters to Amman, JORDAN, where the families of the founding leaders, Habash and his friend WADI' HADDAD, had moved as REFUGEES and where both newly graduated doctors wanted to start their work as physicians. Although Habash practiced medicine for a while, politics remained his main work and his passion. The goal of his new organization was the overthrow of the reactionary Arab regimes and the unification of the Arab states into one united state along the lines of nineteenth-century European national unification movements, especially that of Italy. This was to be followed by a united and well-prepared attack against the state of Israel, which they believed had occupied Palestine or, in an Arab nationalist reading, the heart of the Arab world.

The nationalist ideology of MAN was built mainly on the writings and teachings of Constantine Zurayk, a professor at the American University of Beirut and Habash's teacher and later mentor from the days of al-Urwa al-Wuthqa. But there were clear differences between Zurayk and the MAN leaders. Although Zurayk made an unambiguous and systematic distinction between Jews and Zionists and Judaism and ZIONISM, the young MAN leaders blamed and attacked all Jews. Zurayk called for the military defeat of the state of Israel by a united Arab army, on the basis that Israel was an illegal and therefore unacceptable creation in the heart of the future Arab state, but he also believed that the Arabs should emulate the Zionist movement's successful creation of Israel if they were to succeed in their goals of creating one Arab state. The young nationalists surrounding Habash, however, saw Israel as the cause for the Palestinian disaster and therefore as their prime object of revenge. MAN's first slogans expressed their philosophy succinctly: wahda, taharrur, tha'r (unity, liberation, revenge).

With a network of former friends and colleagues from the American University, Habash succeeded in establishing his newly founded organization throughout the Arab East—from Beirut to IRAQ and KUWAIT, and from SYRIA down to Yemen. Still, the organization remained what it had been at the start, an idealistic student organization demanding from its members total dedication to their political and organizational work. Although Habash possessed a charismatic personality and was loved and venerated by his friends and colleagues, he was unable to make a name for himself in Arab public life and politics. A small clandestine movement like MAN did not allow him to launch such a breakthrough, but he knew that without winning over Arab public opinion MAN's goals could never be attained.

Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR provided the solution to MAN and Habash's dilemma. After Nasir's first nationalist acts of defiance against the West in the mid-1950s, Habash wholeheartedly supported Nasir's new pan-Arab nationalism, or what came to be called "Nasirism." In Habash's view, Nasir would be the public figurehead while MAN would provide the intellectual and ideological foundation and the organizational infrastructure needed for an Arab revolution and Arab unity, which would climax with the liberation of Palestine. Although Nasir supported the young MAN activists and ideologues, he never accepted them as peers. He used them when it was convenient for him, but mainly Nasir followed the political course he deemed to be in EGYPT'S best interest. In the early 1960s Habash and the MAN leadership were compelled to confront reality. When the Egyptian-Syrian union broke apart, Arabs in general and Palestinians in particular were disillusioned with Nasir's Arab nationalism and his willingness or ability to liberate Palestine.

A number of young Palestinians began to follow their own course. Palestinian members of MAN in the refugee camps in Lebanon, Syria, and Jordan demanded a new and more activist political course. Although MAN's other ideologues insisted on loyalty to Nasir, Habash, who had always demonstrated a penchant for activism, recognized the challenge and reached a compromise. While MAN began to focus more on Palestine, most visibly through a new magazine, Filastin (Palestine), clandestine guerrilla groups were established to prepare for guerrilla warfare when Nasir would give the signal to begin fighting.

Through this course of action (or rather non-action) from 1964 to 1967 until the 1967 WAR, Habash unwittingly played into the hands of rival groups, above all the newly active FATAH movement under the leadership of YASIR ARAFAT. After Nasir's crushing defeat by Israel, Habash saw no alternative but to make a formal split with Nasir and embrace a new strategy. In effect Habash followed the path Arafat had forged with Fatah in 1964–1965 for unity of the Palestinian factions, although presented in a different ideological package. Habash could not abandon Arab nationalism, because it constituted one of his deepest convictions, yet he understood that a new dimension to the struggle was needed: more direct activism and a new ideological approach that addressed the concerns of the Palestinian masses. He decided that Marxism-Leninism, in a unique Palestinian interpretation, provided the way forward on both levels. The new focus was on the Arab and Palestinian masses but led by a Lenin-Mao-inspired revolutionary party, established by Habash in December 1967 as the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), which pushed MAN first into the background and soon into general oblivion.

After a brief period of fierce and often ugly ideological infighting, NAYIF HAWATIMAH, who among MAN's early founders had challenged Habash most strongly, broke with the PFLP to create his own group of "pure and real" revolutionaries—the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE. While Hawatimah took most of the intellectuals (real and self-proclaimed) of the PFLP with him, Habash stayed with the old leaders and militants of the PFLP and MAN, respectively, and took with him the bulk of the popular base of the organization in Palestinian camps. The PFLP almost immediately embarked on a course of spectacular airplane hijackings intended to bring the Palestinian cause—and the PFLP—to international attention and to establish themselves as the true revolutionary force in the Arab region. Although the PFLP did highlight the Palestinian situation for the world political scene, they, and by association all Palestinians to some extent, were seen not as revolutionaries but as terrorists. On the other hand, the PFLP could not prevent the equally spectacular rise of Palestinian nationalism represented by Arafat's Fatah movement and its establishment of almost complete ideological and political hegemony over Palestinians inside and outside Palestine.

After the 1970–1971 BLACK SEPTEMBER war that King Husayn waged in Jordan against the Palestinian resistance movement, Habash, together with the remnants of the PFLP, was forced to leave Jordan and moved to Lebanon. In Lebanon the PFLP decided to stop any further hijackings because the leaders decided that the actions represented a deviation from the true path of revolution, which should be led by the masses. Meanwhile Arafat's Fatah was ascendant and once again challenging Habash and his PFLP. While the issue in the 1960s had been independent Palestinian ARMED STRUGGLE, now it was the acceptance of a TWO-STATE SOLUTION, which Arafat supported as early as 1972–1973. For Habash this meant the betrayal of all he believed in, and he responded with the creation of the PALESTINE REJECTION FRONT (Jabhat ar-Rafd).

At the same time, it appears that the series of disappointments—the 1967 War, the disillusionment with Abd al-Nasir, Black September, and Arafat's "betrayal," among others—exacted a physical price from Habash. He suffered his first stroke in 1972, and thereafter his ability to lead was severely limited. None of his competitors for leadership proved able to take control, and in the end the consensus was that Habash should remain leader of the PFLP. Yasir Arafat also recognized Habash's status, according him the respect of a historical leader and an honored elder statesman, who often accompanied Arafat on his diplomatic missions during the 1980s. For Arafat this was another successful co-optation of a potentially dangerous rival. For Habash it meant the recognition that although he and the PFLP had not been successful in gaining majority support for their ideology and political program, he was being recognized as one of the Palestinian leaders everybody held in high esteem. Also, it at least gave him a chance, however remote, to try to influence Arafat with the views of the PFLP.

Despite Habash's opposition, the PFLP did not stop Arafat's Fatah from pursuing the two-state option, and in November 1988 the PFLP and Habash could no longer resist its almost unanimous adoption in the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL in Algiers. However, Habash did not support Arafat on the OSLO ACCORDS, and under his leadership the PFLP vigorously objected to what it perceived as an abandonment of historic Palestinian political positions. But when Habash's deputy, Abu Ali Mustafa, decided to accept Arafat's course and return to the West Bank under the conditions imposed on him by the Oslo Accords and Israel, Habash resigned as general secretary of the PFLP. From his exile in Amman, where he had returned in 1990, Habash devoted his years in retirement to writing his memoirs, establishing a research center, and working once again for an Arab nationalist revival.

Bibliography

- Habash, George. Speeches and Articles, 1977–1979. Red Papers 36. n.d.
- . “Student Days in Beirut and Beyond.” The Jerusalem Quarterly. 48 (1988).
- Hajjar, George. Kanafani: Symbol of Palestine. Karoun, Bekaa: George Hajjar Publisher, 1974.
- Kazziha, Walid. Revolutionary Transformation in the Arab World. London and Tonbridge: Charles Knight, 1975.
- Matar, Fuad. The “Wise Man” of the Revolution/Hakim al-Thaura (Arabic). London: Highlight Publications, 1984.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- Suwayd, Mahmud. The Palestinian Struggle in Practice: An Interview with George Habash (Arabic). Beirut: Institute of Palestine Studies, 1998.

—Helga Baumgarten

Habibi, Emile (1922–1996)

Emile Habibi was a novelist, journalist, politician, and member of the Knesset. He is probably the most renowned Palestinian writer who lived inside Israel. Born in HAIFA, Palestine, to Protestant parents, Habibi was involved in the Palestinian resistance against the BRITISH MANDATE, yet he supported the 1947 UN Partition Plan (UN RESOLUTION 181, which called for the creation of both Jewish and Arab states in Palestine) and chose to remain in Haifa until his death. In 1940 he joined the ARAB-PALESTINE COMMUNIST PARTY, becoming the editor-in-chief of the party’s official newspaper, Ittihad. After the fall of NAZARETH and Haifa in the 1948 WAR, Habibi joined the Israeli communist party MAKI and served in the Knesset on its list from 1951 to 1959. In 1960 he left Maki to found RAKAH with Tawfuk Toubi and served on its list in the Knesset from 1961 to 1972. He left Rakah in 1989 and devoted himself full-time to writing.

Habibi published his first short story collection, The Sextet of the Six-Day War, in 1968. In 1974 he wrote his first novel, The Secret Life of Saeed the Ill-fated Pessimist, depicting the life and fortunes of a PALESTINIAN CITIZEN OF ISRAEL. Published in 1974, it was an instant success and remains one of the greatest modern Arabic novels. It was translated into Hebrew and English and was well received far beyond the Arab world. In 1983 Habibi published a play, Luka’Bin Luka’, and in 1985 a novella, Ikhtiyeh, which received great critical acclaim because of its originality and the writer’s successful use of humor in the portrayal of tragic situations. His last novel, Saraya Bint al Ghoul/Saraya (The Ogre’s Daughter), was published in 1992. Habibi’s novels are noteworthy for combining mythological and modern times, mixing tragedy with comedy, and using extensive sarcasm and satire. He was awarded two important prizes for his writing: in 1990 Habibi received the Al Quds Prize from the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, and two years later he received the Israel Prize. His acceptance of both reflected his belief in coexistence.

Bibliography

- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Rouhana, Nadim. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities and Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Hadash: The Democratic Front for Peace and Equality

Hadash, the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality, is a left-wing political party that defines itself as a “Jewish-Arab Party,” although most of its voters and leaders are Israeli-Arab citizens. It has three legislators in the Israeli parliament, the Knesset.

Hadash was formed during the term of the eighth Knesset when RAKAH joined with several nonparliamentary groups and other left-wing noncommunist groups. Within the Hadash movement, Rakah (which was renamed MAKI, a Hebrew acronym for Israeli Communist Party, in 1989) has retained its independent status.

In the 1996 elections the party ran a joint list with BALAD. Together they won five seats, but split during the Knesset term, with Hadash reduced to three seats. In the 2003 elections, Hadash ran on another joint list, this time with AHMAD TIBI’S Ta’al. The list won three seats, but again split during the parliamentary session, leaving Hadash with two Knesset members.

The party supports evacuation of all Israeli SETTLEMENTS, a complete withdrawal by Israel from all territories occupied as a result of the 1967 War, and the establishment of a Palestinian state in those territories. It also supports the right of return or compensation for Palestinian refugees. In addition to issues of peace and security, Hadash is known for being active on social and environmental issues.

Hadash defines itself as a non-Zionist party, originally in keeping with Marxist opposition to nationalism. It calls for recognition of Palestinian Arabs as a national minority within Israel.

In the 2006 elections, Hadash received three Knesset seats and in 2009 four seats. (www.hadash.org.il/).

Bibliography

- Daoud, Suheir Abu Oksa. Palestinian Women and Politics in Israel. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2009.
- Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Torstrick, Rebecca L. The Limits of Coexistence: Identity Politics in Israel. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000.

Hadawi, Sami (1904–2004)

An administrator, scholar, and writer, Sami Hadawi was regarded as the most important Arab authority on ownership of LAND in Palestine. He was born in West JERUSALEM and raised in his grandfather's house in the Jewish Quarter. During the BRITISH MANDATE he worked for the Land Registration Office, which was responsible for land taxation operations—a position that afforded Hadawi enormous information about land transactions during the Mandate. He is known for meticulous research and exact documentation of how Palestine was taken over by Israel in 1948, including the extent of Palestinian losses in land and other property. Hadawi made a major contribution toward documenting and compiling village land statistics prior to the partition of Palestine in 1948. He brought to the public's attention the last official British Mandate record of Palestinian population and landownership. Among his numerous books are Village Statistics, 1945: A Classification of Land and Area Ownership in Palestine (reprinted 1970); Palestinian Rights and Losses in 1948: A Comprehensive Study (reprinted 2000); Palestine Loss of Heritage (1963); and Bitter Harvest: Palestine between 1914–1979 (1979, reprinted 1991).

Hadawi was expelled from Palestine in 1948 and spent the rest of his life working for the Palestinian cause in various capacities, much of the time from Beirut. He served as the land specialist for the UN Palestinian Conciliation Commission in New York and as a member of numerous Arab and Palestinian diplomatic missions, and was director of the INSTITUTE FOR PALESTINE STUDIES in Beirut.

Haddad, Saad (1936–1984)

Around 1975, Israel sponsored the creation of a surrogate force in LEBANON, and Lebanese Christian major Saad Haddad was the first officer to defect from the Lebanese army to ally himself with Israel. His defection led to the formation of the pro-Israel Free Lebanon Army, based in a corridor, Israel's so-called security zone along Lebanon's southern border from the 1978 Israeli invasion of Lebanon, which cleared out the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) strongholds as far north as the Litani River. On 18 April 1979 Haddad proclaimed the area controlled by his force Independent Free Lebanon. The following day, he was branded a traitor to the Lebanese government and officially dismissed from the Lebanese army. He remained a loyal Israeli ally, and several sources have suggested that Haddad was directly involved in the 1982 SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE. After the 1982 LEBANON WAR the Free Lebanon Army was renamed the SOUTH LEBANON ARMY (SLA) and was under the leadership of Antoine Lahad following Haddad's death in 1984. It remained a proxy force for Israel in its war with the Palestinians until Israel's withdrawal in 2000.

Bibliography

- Fisk, Robert. Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon, 4th ed. New York: Nation Books, 2002.
- Khalidi, Rashid. "Foreword." In The War on Lebanon: A Reader. Edited by Nubar Hovsepian. Ithaca, NY: Olive Branch Press, 2007.

Haddad, Wadi' (1927–1978)

Wadi' Haddad (Abu Hani) was a founding member (with GEORGE HABASH) and leader of the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN) and of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP). As head of the PFLP's Special Operations, he was the main strategist behind PFLP hijackings of airplanes and other TERRORIST operations directed against Israel. Born in SAFED, Palestine, to a middle-class Greek Orthodox family, Haddad was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and forced to flee to Palestine, settling in Beirut.

A physician as well as a political activist, Haddad was a low-key supporter and friend of Habash when both attended medical school at the American University in Beirut. Although Habash was comfortable in leadership positions, Haddad always preferred to stay in the background. When they graduated from the university in 1952, Haddad and Habash moved to Amman, JORDAN, where they set up a health clinic to treat poor patients. The clinic brought them attention, which they used to recruit for the MAN and later for the PFLP. Habash too was a Greek Orthodox Christian, and one analyst speculates that both Habash and Haddad "were obliged to act as extremists in pursuit of better credentials as Arabs."

The PFLP hijackings began in 1968, and Habash has stated that they were the brainchild of Haddad, who believed that the PFLP should strike at the Zionist enemy wherever it was to be found. (His slogan and the slogan of his group was "Behind the enemy, everywhere.") In July 1968 Haddad and another PFLP operative from the Special Operations wing hijacked an El Al jet flying from Rome to Tel Aviv. Of this operation, Habash said: "Wadi' and I were trying to determine how world opinion could be awakened to the injustice that has been done to the Palestinian people. Wadi' came up with the hijacking idea. . . . We wanted to attract world attention through some action, and that was it." Yezid Sayigh, an expert on Palestinian politics and militarism, concurs and states that "the real purpose of international terrorism was to shock the international community out of its complacency regarding Palestinian suffering."

In the first hijacking, Haddad and the PFLP demanded only the release of PRISONERS in Israeli jails, but US support for Israel led to later attacks on Israeli territory, citizens, and property. The PFLP and its offshoots thought of themselves as representing Third World revolutions and anti-colonialism, and they viewed the hijackings as a way to combat the image of Palestinian passivity portrayed in Israeli propaganda. Between December 1968 and September 1969 Haddad followed up the initial hijacking with attacks on Israeli aircraft and businesses in Athens, Zurich, London, the Hague, Brussels, and Bonn. His Special Operations group hijacked a TWA flight to Damascus, where they destroyed the plane. Haddad and some of his comrades argued that their targets were not actually civilian, but assets of Israel as a center of imperialism and capitalism. In September 1970 the PFLP hijacked Swissair, TWA, and BOAC airliners and attempted to take a fourth. They took the three aircraft to Jordan and destroyed them after the passengers were released. These actions gave rise to BLACK SEPTEMBER, during which the Jordanian military drove the entire PLO military apparatus from Jordan. The PFLP also seized a Pan Am plane, took it to Cairo, and blew it up on the ground. According to Haddad and the PFLP, their purpose was to break the cease-fire that had been arranged under US auspices (the ROGERS PLAN) among Jordan, EGYPT, and Israel; to undermine the Jordanian government; and to deal a blow to the "world nervous system." Destroying the plane in Cairo, as opposed to elsewhere, was intended to protest the US relationship with Egypt.

In 1971, however, the PFLP Central Committee decided to end hijackings completely, because they had become counterproductive. Haddad, who had been absent from the meeting, was enraged and defied the orders by mobilizing his Special Operations group to hijack a Lufthansa plane to Aden, Yemen. After a severe reprimand by Habash, Haddad worked independently as PFLP-International Operations. Nevertheless Haddad and Habash remained friends until Haddad's death seven years later. The official cause of death was cancer, although his family and many others believed and continue to believe that Haddad was poisoned. Israel had attempted to assassinate Haddad numerous times, including launching missiles into his Beirut apartment, although no conclusive evidence was ever found of Israeli involvement in his death.

Bibliography

- Abu Khalil, As'ad. "Internal Contradictions in the PFLP: Decision Making and Policy Orientation." Middle East Journal. 41:3 (1987).
- "Habash, George: Taking Stock: An Interview." Journal of Palestine Studies. 27:1 (1998).
- Pryce-Jones, David. The Face of Defeat: Palestinian Refugees and Guerrillas. London: Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1972.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949-1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Al-Hadi, Awni 'Abd (1889–1970)

Awni 'Abd al-Hadi was a prominent Palestinian political and diplomatic leader during the BRITISH MANDATE. He was educated in Beirut, in Istanbul, and at the Law Faculty of the University of Paris. 'Abd al-Hadi was active in the Arab nationalist movement against the Turks before World War I as a founding member in 1911 of the al-Fatat nationalist society, as a member of the Decentralization Party, and as an organizer of the first Arab Congress in Paris in 1913. He served as private secretary to King Faysal of Saudi Arabia and later was an advisor to Emir Abdullah as well as to his father, Sharif Husayn, and he also represented the Hijazi delegation from eastern Arabia at the Versailles Peace Conference.

'Abd al-Hadi returned to Palestine in 1924, where he resumed the practice of law and became one of the chief spokespersons of Palestinian nationalism and the Arab nationalist movement. Besides his private law practice, he served as lawyer for the SUPREME MUSLIM COUNCIL. For a period he advocated dialogue with the British and also provided legal services to Zionist LAND purchasing agencies. One of the largest sales in which he participated was the Wadi Hawarith land deal of 1929, in which Zionists acquired 30,000 dunums (nearly 7,500 acres) of land. Nevertheless he was elected to the ARAB EXECUTIVE (the Palestinian nationalist organization) three times—in 1922, 1923, and 1928. 'Abd al-Hadi was among the Palestinians attending the London Conference of 1930 and the ISLAMIC CONFERENCE in Jerusalem in 1931, and he presented the Palestinian viewpoint before the SHAW COMMISSION.

By 1932 'Abd al-Hadi began to adopt a more consistently militant position on the question of Palestine. Together with several former colleagues, he revived the ISTIQLAL (Independence) PARTY, which was plainly anti-British and ANTI-ZIONIST, and eventually became its general secretary. In 1936 'Abd al-Hadi was appointed secretary general of the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE (the successor to the Arab Executive) and assigned the job of coordinating the ARAB REVOLT of 1936–1939, the Palestinian general strike against the British Occupation and Zionist settlement of Palestine. For this the British deported him from Palestine in 1937, banning him from reentering the country until 1941.

In 1948 he was appointed minister for social affairs in the ALL PALESTINE GOVERNMENT located in Gaza, but he never served. Instead he held several posts in the Jordanian government from 1951 to 1955, and from 1955 to 1958 he was a member of the Jordanian Senate. He died in Cairo, where he had lived from 1964.

Bibliography

- Abd al-Hadi, Awni. Memorandum on the Palestine White Paper of October, 1930. Jerusalem: Commercial Press, 1930.
- Fischback, Michael R. "Awni 'Abd al-Hadi." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian Arab National Movement 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- . The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1977.

Al-Hadi Family

The 'Abd al-Hadi family was a prominent multi-branch Palestinian family of large landowners in the NABLUS/JENIN area of the WEST BANK. Under the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, BRITISH MANDATE, and Jordanian occupations, it was influential in central Palestine and held senior government positions. Highly respected family members include Hafez Pasha (1872–1916, a large landowner and tax collector during Ottoman reign); Ruhi (1885–1954, a member of the Ottoman diplomatic and consular corps); Awni (1889–1970, a lawyer and politician); al-Haj (circa 1862–1938, a man of literature, a landlord in Jenin, a district attorney in Beirut); Fu'ad (1900–1997, a lawyer and judge); Naim (b. 1912, an engineer and mayor); Issam (b. 1928, a union leader and political activist); and Mahdi (b. 1944, an academic and activist).

Hagana

Founded in June 1920, the Hagana was the main Jewish underground military organization in Palestine from 1920 to 1948. Leaders of the Jewish Yishuv believed they could not rely on BRITISH MANDATE authorities for protection from the Palestinians and thus needed to create an independent military force completely free of foreign authority.

During the first nine years of its existence, the Hagana was a loose organization of local groups in the large towns and in several of the Jewish SETTLEMENTS. By 1929, however, the Hagana became far larger and more organized, encompassing nearly all the youth and adults in the settlements as well as several thousand members from each of the cities. It created a comprehensive training program for its members, ran officers' training courses, and established central arms depots into which a continuous stream of light arms flowed from Europe, while it simultaneously laid the basis for the underground production of arms.

During 1936–1939 the Hagana developed into a sophisticated military organization. Although the British did not officially recognize it, the British Security Forces cooperated with Hagana by establishing civilian militia—Jewish Settlement Police and Jewish Auxiliary Police—ghafirs. In the summer of 1938, Special Night Squads were established to protect settlements from Palestinian guerrillas. During this time the Hagana supported illegal Jewish IMMIGRATION and organized demonstrations against the British for not going far enough in supporting Jewish LAND purchases and immigration.

With the outbreak of World War II, the Hagana faced a new situation. Although anti-British, its volunteer fighters were now mobilized by the British to form Jewish units to fight for the British. The Hagana also cooperated with British intelligence units and sent its personnel on various commando missions in the Middle East. Service with the British further strengthened the Hagana militarily, and by 1948 it was a formidable army—highly trained, disciplined, and well equipped. In the early 1940s the Yishuv instituted a systematic training program for all the Jewish youth of the country, which evolved into the Hagana's first mobilized regiment, the PALMAH, in 1941. After the war the Hagana began an open, organized struggle against British Mandatory rule and against Palestinian resistance in the framework of a unified JEWISH RESISTANCE MOVEMENT (1945), consisting of the Hagana, IRGUN TZEVA'I LE'UMI (ETZEL), and LOHAMEI HERUT YISRAEL (LEHI) underground military groups.

After the war, Hagana branches were also established at Jewish displaced-persons camps in Europe, and its members accompanied the illegal immigrant boats. In the spring of 1947, Israel's founder, DAVID BEN-GURION, took it upon himself to direct the general policy of the Hagana, especially in preparation for the impending 1948 WAR with the Palestinians. On 26 May 1948 the Provisional Government of Israel transformed the Hagana into the regular state army, called Zeva Hagana Le-Yisrael (the Israel Defense Forces).

Bibliography

- Bauer, Yehuda. From Diplomacy to Resistance: A History of Jewish Palestine, 1930–1945. Philadelphia, PA: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1970.
- Dekel, Ephraim. Shai: The Exploits of Hagana Intelligence. New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1959.
- Giladi, Naeim. Ben Gurion's Scandals: How the Hagana and the Mossad Eliminated Jews. Flushing, NY: Gilit Publishing Co., 1992.
- Goldstein, Jacob. From Fighters to Soldiers: How the Israeli Defense Forces Began. Brighton, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 1998.
- Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Lorch, Netanel. Shield of Zion: The Israel Defense Forces. Charlottesville, VA: Howell Press, 1991.
- Mardor, Munya Meir. Strictly Illegal. London: R. Hale, 1964.
- Slater, Leonard. The Pledge. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1970.

Haifa

Haifa is located on the Mediterranean coast at the base of Mount Carmel in Israel. A small port town dating from the fourteenth century BCE, it has existed in the shadow of its more powerful neighbors, ACRE and Caesarea. The Byzantines ruled there until the seventh century, when the city was conquered, first by the Persians and then by the Arabs. In 1100 it was taken over by the Crusaders, who made the city part of the principality of Galilee until the Muslim MAMLUKS conquered it in 1265. After the OTTOMAN conquest in 1516, Haifa began a revival and a renaissance. In 1761 the governor of Acre, Zahir al-Umar, completely rebuilt Haifa in a new location, destroying the Old City, and solidified it with a fortress-like wall. This event is considered the beginning of Haifa's modern era.

Shaykh al-Umar was a native of Galilee and began his career as a minor tax collector. Over a forty-five-year period (1730–1775) he emerged as the most powerful leader in Palestine. One key to his success was his ability to monopolize the trade in cotton, grain, and olive oil destined for Europe.

From the profits of this trade, the shaykh built a military force that allowed him to expand the territories under his control, withstand repeated attacks by the governors of Damascus, and construct lavish public and private buildings. The castle he built for himself remains standing—if in considerable disrepair—in Saffuriyya near Haifa.

Between 1830 and 1841 the Egyptian Ibrahim Pasha, son of Mohammad Ali, took Haifa from the Ottomans and their Arab governor. In the years following the Egyptian occupation Haifa grew in population and importance while Acre suffered further decline.

In the early nineteenth century, Haifa began to overtake Acre as a commercial center and became home to a growing number of foreign consulates. The rebuilding of the Carmelite monastery in the 1830s introduced Christian education and led to a growing Christian merchant community with well-established links to European commerce. Haifa became the fastest-growing trade center in Palestine. Building activity increased, and separate Muslim, Christian, and eventually Jewish quarters developed. In 1868 a colony of GERMAN Templars settled in Haifa and engaged in road building as well as agricultural and industrial improvement. At the same time, Haifa became an important site of worship and administration for the members of the Bahá'í faith, who have a significant holy site there, the Shrine of the Bab.

By mid-century over 150 steamships called at Haifa annually, and trade prospered with exports of cotton, sesame, and grains. The period after the 1880s saw increased IMMIGRATION of European Jews. A growing number of Zionist settlements in northern Palestine and new neighborhoods on the periphery of Haifa, subsidized by wealthy Zionist organizations, began to surround the Arab Muslim and Arab Christian residential areas and threatened the Palestinian commercial sector. Haifa's population continued to increase, especially with the construction of a new railway line—a spur of the Hijaz railway connecting Haifa with Damascus (completed in 1905), which attracted workers from villages and towns throughout Palestine to Haifa.

The construction of Haifa harbor between 1929 and 1933 and the building of the Iraq Petroleum Company pipeline in 1939 contributed to an increasing number of Palestinian laborers in the city. But the workers were inadequately housed and paid, which in turn produced violent strikes and demonstrations in 1929 and further strikes and rebellions in the 1930s. The 1936 general strike was a response to the vast discrepancies in wages between Jewish and Arab workers, the loss of more Palestinian LANDS to Zionist SETTLEMENTS, and continuous increases in the cost of living in Haifa. The beginning of the ARAB REVOLT was marked in Haifa by a walkout of porters from Haifa harbor. Palestinian work stoppages in most areas, however, only provided openings for Jewish workers, furthered Arab unemployment, and endangered the fragile Muslim-Christian solidarity. After the strike more radical rural elements, some influenced by the Muslim cleric 'IZZ AL-DIN AL-QASSAM, assumed a leading role in Haifa and succeeded in pulling together Muslims and Christians against Zionists and the British. Haifa was the center of intense fighting throughout the rebellion (1936–1939), and much of the city's communications infrastructure was destroyed. When the Arab Revolt spread beyond Haifa throughout the Galilee, it prompted violent retaliation by radical Zionist groups, especially the IRGUN TZEVA' I LE'UMI.

By the end of the BRITISH MANDATE, Haifa had become an unbalanced mixture of a new, flourishing Jewish bourgeoisie that controlled the city's industry and a Palestinian community composed overwhelmingly of lower-class workers. After the UNITED NATIONS announced the partition of Palestine (UN RESOLUTION 181) in 1947 and placed Haifa in the Jewish sector, intense fighting broke out. At the time, Haifa was home to about 128,000 people, of whom 66,000 were Jews. On 21 April 1948 approximately 5,000 HAGANA military forces began an assault on the Palestinian sectors of Haifa, preceded by loudspeakers broadcasting messages intended to terrorize the Palestinian inhabitants into fleeing.

From the Jewish neighborhood Hadar HaCarmel, the militant underground organization LEHI joined the offensive and began shelling the Palestinian-Muslim neighborhood of Halisa. The 3,500–5,000 Arab irregulars and elements of the ARAB LIBERATION ARMY could not mount an effective defense. Furthermore, the 3,000 defenders of al-Tira, who tried to reinforce the city, were intercepted by the British. The next day the Arab National Committee of Haifa was prepared to ask for a truce via Hugh C. Stockwell, the British commander in Haifa. Stockwell agreed to meet with the Israelis, but the terms proposed by the Hagana—complete disarmament, surrender of weapons, and a CURFEW—were not accepted by the Arab leadership.

The next day (23 April) the Arab leadership met with Stockwell to discuss organizing an evacuation. On the same day, Haifa fell to the Zionist forces, and most Muslims left the city and moved to Arab villages in the Galilee, from which they were later forced to flee, becoming REFUGEES in LEBANON and SYRIA. After only a few days, around 40,000 Palestinians had fled Haifa under the combined military pressure of the LEHI and Hagana. After the occupation of the city by Zionist forces and the further expulsion of the Arab population, barely 3,500 Palestinians remained in Haifa.

Today Haifa is one of five “mixed” cities in Israel, with a total population of around 270,000, of whom officially 24,100 (9 percent) are Palestinians (13,500 Christians and 10,600 Muslims).

See also PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Faier, Elizabeth. Organizations, Gender and the Culture of Palestinian Activism in Haifa, Israel. New York: Routledge, 2004.
- Graham-Brown, Sarah. Palestinians and Their Society 1880–1946: A Photographic Essay. London: Quartet Books, 1980.
- Ibrahim, Rashid al-Haj. Defending Haifa and the Problem of Palestine: The Memoirs of Rashid al-Haj Ibrahim, 1891–1953 (Arabic). Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 2005.
- Nieuwhof, Adri, and Jeff Handmaker. “Haifa, Peaceful Town with a Silent Pain.” The Electronic Intifada. 21 June 2005.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian-Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- Seikaly, May. Haifa: The Transformation of a Palestinian Arab Society, 1918–1939. London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.
- Yazbak, Mahmud. Haifa in the Late Ottoman Period 1864–1914. Leiden: Brill, 1998.

—Betsy Folkins

Haig, Alexander Meigs, Jr. (1924–2010)

A US general and public official, Alexander Haig served as secretary of state under President RONALD REAGAN. He graduated from West Point, was military adviser to Secretary of State HENRY KISSINGER from 1969 to 1973, and became an influential member of the National Security Council staff. In 1981 he became President Reagan’s secretary of state but resigned abruptly on 25 June 1982, reportedly because his policies and actions regarding Israel’s 1982 invasion of LEBANON led to foreign policy disagreements with the president.

In the months before the invasion Israeli Defense Minister ARIEL SHARON had repeatedly told Haig that the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION’s (PLO) armed presence in Lebanon was intolerable, that the security of Israel required that it be ended, and that he (Sharon) was going to do the job. Haig informed Sharon that the UNITED STATES understood Israel’s problems and requirements and that the United States would find such an operation acceptable if it was carried out in response to a sufficiently bloody and brutal provocation. Sharon and Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN considered the attempted assassination of Israel’s ambassador to Great Britain by a non-PLO terrorist such a provocation and launched the invasion.

But Haig apparently had not told President Reagan or anyone else in the White House about his conversations with Sharon. When the Israeli invasion of Lebanon began, the White House’s first reaction was to send Special Presidential Envoy Philip Habib to the Middle East to find an acceptable political solution and bring the war to a swift end. His attempts were unsuccessful.

Reagan’s instructions to Philip Habib had been based on Reagan’s and his immediate circle of advisors’ view of the world. They believed the fighting must cease because of the potential for SOVIET UNION involvement on the Syrian side, which could lead to a confrontation between the United States and the Soviets. Reagan incorrectly believed that SYRIA’s missiles in Lebanon were aimed at the heart of Israel, that the troubles in Lebanon were stirred up by the Soviets, and that the PLO was an instrument of the Soviets.

In any case Haig’s view of what should happen in Lebanon was different from Habib’s and Reagan’s. Haig thought that a good outcome would see the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) smash the PLO’s military capability, send its political leadership running, and in the process destroy any part of Hafez al-Asad’s Syrian military that got in the way. This result would, Haig believed, seriously weaken Soviet influence in the Middle East. Haig believed that if the US ally Israel was seen easily defeating the Soviet client Syria, then more countries in the region would want to become US allies. Few policymakers viewed the situation that simplistically.

To Haig the Israeli-Palestinian issue was of little concern. Although he strongly promoted STRATEGIC COOPERATION with Israel, his focus was on the perceived Soviet threat, and Haig was convinced that Israel was an effective regional surrogate in stemming Soviet inroads. Haig made some halfhearted efforts to encourage Israel to negotiate with EGYPT over Palestinian autonomy, as defined at Camp David. However, he was not concerned with the fate of the Palestinians but with solidifying a “consensus of strategic concern” in the Middle East, and he believed some form of Palestinian autonomy was important to solidify Israeli-Egyptian relations.

Even after Egyptian president Anwar Sadat and Israeli prime minister Menahem Begin decided in August 1981 to resume the autonomy talks that would eventually lead to the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS, Haig did little to encourage them. He delayed a trip to the region until January 1982—supposedly to promote the talks—but that effort faded and the secretary of state waited until late May to pursue a serious effort to encourage a resumption of the talks.

Bibliography

- Boykin, John. Cursed Is the Peacemaker: The American Diplomat versus the Israeli General, Beirut 1982. Belmont, CA: Applegate Press, 2002.
- Lesch, Ann M. “The Reagan Administration’s Policy toward the Palestinians.” In U.S. Policy on Palestine from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Normal, IL: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1995.

Hamami, Sa’id (1941–1978)

Sa’id Hamami was a PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) diplomat and an early peace activist who began clandestine meetings with Israeli peace activists in the 1970s. Hamami, who was born in JAFFA, was dispossessed with his family in the 1948 WAR, becoming a REFUGEE in Amman, JORDAN. After he received a B.A. in English Literature from Damascus University, he worked as a journalist and teacher. In 1967 Hamami joined FATAH and rose quickly to become a PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (the PLO parliament) member in February 1969. For a short time he was active in Fatah’s military wing, AL-‘ASIFA.

In 1972 PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT appointed Hamami as the first PLO delegate to the United Kingdom, although he served officially as head of the ARAB LEAGUE’s Palestine Information Office. Hamami was highly critical of Palestinian international violence, such as plane hijackings, especially the operations by the TERRORIST group the BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION. In 1973, with Arafat’s backing, he began to call publicly for mutual Israeli-Palestinian recognition—in two articles that appeared in The Times of London on 16 November 1973 and 17 December 1973. While Israel dismissed Hamami’s initiatives as camouflage for the PLO’s “real” objective of destroying Israel, it seems clear that they were genuine “trial balloons,” undertaken on behalf of the PLO leadership. Indeed, by this time Arafat had written twice to US secretary of state HENRY KISSINGER requesting that the PLO be included in the GENEVA CONFERENCE.

In 1974 Hamami met with Knesset member URI AVNERY, which was the first meeting between a Knesset member and a PLO leader. As a result of meetings with Avnery and other Israeli activists, Hamami came to advocate explicitly the TWO-STATE SOLUTION in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES (which would be obtained through negotiations at Geneva) and criticized the PLO’s continued rhetorical allegiance to the idea of a democratic state in Palestine. Hamami was assassinated on 4 January 1978 by the ABU NIDAL group, who opposed any political overtures to Israel.

Bibliography

- Avnery, Uri. “An Extraordinary Conference.” Arabic Media Internet Network. 25 February 2006.
- . “Give Me Some Credit.” Gush Shalom. 30 November 2004.
- . “Walking into a Deadlock: Don’t Envy Abu-Mazen.” Counterpunch. 29 (April 2003).
- Blau, Joyce, Alain Gresh, and Joseph Hazan. “True Enemies.” The Other Israel. May 1995.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State, rev. ed. London: Zed Books, 1988.
- Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat: Between Gun and Olive Branch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.

Hamas: The Movement of Islamic Resistance

Hamas, the Movement of the Islamic Resistance (Harakat al-Muqawamah al-Islamiyah), was established in Gaza in December 1987 at the beginning of the First INTIFADA. The founders are believed to include SHEIKH AHMAD YASIN, ABD AL-AZIZ RANTISI, Salah Shehadeh, Muhammad Sham'ah, Isa al-Nashshar, Abdel Fattah Dukhan, and Ibrahim al-Yazuri, all of whom were members of the Political Bureau of the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD in the GAZA STRIP. In their historic meeting on 9 December 1987, they decided that recent events provided the right moment for the Palestinian Brothers to take a direct and active role in the Palestinian resistance against the Israeli OCCUPATION. Only days later, on 14 December, Hamas's first communiqué was distributed throughout the Gaza Strip and the WEST BANK: "The Intifada of our vigilant people in the Occupied Territories comes as a resounding rejection of the Occupation and its pressures, LAND confiscation and the planting of SETTLEMENTS and the policy of subjugation by the Zionists. It also comes to awaken the conscience of those among us who are grasping after a sick peace, after empty international conferences, after treasonous partial settlements like CAMP DAVID [1978]. The Intifada is here to convince them that Islam is the solution and the alternative."

Historical and Ideological Roots

Hamas's origins are found in the Muslim Brotherhood, which began in EGYPT in 1928 under the leadership of Hassan al-Banna. In addition to its Islamic tenets, a dominant element in its ideology is opposition to colonialism, which is the basis of the Egyptian Brothers' pro-Palestinian activities. Thus the Brothers supported the struggle of the Palestinians during the 1936–1939 ARAB REVOLT against British Mandatory rule in Palestine and against the accelerating Jewish IMMIGRATION. In 1945 a branch of the Brotherhood was established in Gaza and in 1946 another branch in JERUSALEM.

Despite their fervent ideology, only in the last years before the Intifada, beginning around 1984, did the Brothers take up direct political activities. They participated in demonstrations against the Israeli Occupation and began to prepare for engaging in ARMED STRUGGLE. Shaykh Yasin (who was arrested in 1983, sentenced to thirteen years' imprisonment, but released in a 1985 prisoner exchange) played the central role in this change of direction. When the Palestinian Intifada started in December 1987, with all parts of Palestinian society actively participating in this uprising, Yasin led the Brothers in the creation of Hamas.

However, the unique conditions of Gaza and the Israeli Occupation led Hamas to develop an ideology and a political program of its own that was distinct from the principles, belief system, and political program of the Muslim Brothers. On the one hand, Hamas's charter, published in August 1988, is firmly rooted in the anticolonialist, ANTI-ZIONIST, anti-American, and anti-Soviet tradition of the Muslim Brothers in general. As a Palestinian organization operating under the Israeli Occupation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Hamas's situation was not unlike that of the Egyptian Brothers under Hassan al-Banna, who had fought against the British occupation of Egypt, Western colonialism, foreign domination, and exploitation on all levels. The Muslim Brothers in Egypt considered the current situation of Palestine a manifestation of "crusading Western imperialism," sometimes used interchangeably with "Jewish crusading imperialism" (al-salibiyya al-yahudiyya).

Hamas used this idea almost verbatim in its charter, and the Egyptian Brothers' analysis and criticism of imperialism and ZIONISM were also incorporated into the charter. Hamas differs, however, quite drastically from the Muslim Brotherhood in its uniform and vulgar ANTI-SEMITIC presentation of the role of Jews, Judaism, and Zionism in both history and the present. Especially when using the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a nineteenth-century forgery purporting to demonstrate that Jews commit blood libel and other heinous crimes, as a historical reference, Hamas's discourse borders on racism, with stereotypes borrowed directly from nineteenth-century European anti-Semitism. Additionally, the charter superimposes on these European characterizations a flawed reading of the Prophet Muhammad's relationship with the Jewish community in the Arabian Peninsula.

Hamas characterizes the Palestinian resistance against Occupation as jihad—a struggle against a colonialist occupation in which the resistance fighter must be ready to sacrifice his life. Jihad is not presented as an absolute value but as an instrument in achieving Hamas's central goal: the liberation of Palestine, which the charter defines as the historic state within the Mandatory borders of 1947. Thus Hamas's goal is quite similar to those of its historic predecessors, GEORGE HABASH'S MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS and YASIR ARAFAT'S FATAH, which began with the objective of liberating the whole of Palestine, a goal both abandoned as unrealistic. However, Hamas expects the new Palestine to become an Islamic state, which differs substantially from both the Arab Nationalists and Fatah, who envisioned a secular democratic state.

The 1988 charter is, above all, a political manifesto and ignores the philosophical-political arguments of the Egyptian Brothers. The founders of Hamas were primarily political-military activists who aimed for solidarity in Palestinian society as the necessary basis for a successful struggle against the Occupation. As part of that goal, Hamas asked Palestinians, as well as all Arabs and Muslims worldwide, to support Hamas through the payment of zakat, or charity, a special tax any pious Muslim is supposed to give to the poor.

The position Hamas takes toward women is a clear step backward in comparison to the ideas held by the Egyptian Brothers. While the Egyptian Brothers argued that Islam sees women as equal to men, Hamas focuses almost exclusively on the role of women within the family—in the private not the public realm. Women are supposed to give birth to children, to educate them as Muslims, and to support their husbands. It is thus not surprising that Hamas's leadership does not generally include women, notwithstanding the election of six female Hamas deputies in the Palestinian parliamentary elections of January 2006. Certain trends, however, suggest that Hamas's traditional view of women may be changing, perhaps as a reaction to the increasing outspokenness of Hamas women, especially within the field of education.

Struggle against the Israeli Occupation

In a clear departure from the first years of other historic Palestinian factions and despite the maximalist positions articulated in Hamas's charter, it has always been open to negotiations with Israel. As early as 1987 Yasin declared that Hamas was ready to negotiate with Israel, provided Israel was ready to recognize the Palestinian right to self-determination and the right of return of the Palestinian REFUGEES. And in 1989 he stated: "I do not want to destroy Israel. We want to negotiate with Israel. Our goal is to enable Palestinians to live in Palestine. Having achieved this would be the end of our problem." A number of Israeli political leaders, from YITZHAK RABIN to SHIMON PERES, did in fact meet with Hamas leaders, such as Dr. Mahmoud az-Zahar.

Although in principle ready for negotiations with Israel, Hamas nevertheless adamantly opposed the MADRID CONFERENCE—the US-sponsored dialogue among Arab states, Palestinians, and Israelis—and the subsequent negotiations in Washington. Despite the many attempts made to include Hamas in the negotiating teams, it insisted on its precondition: Israeli withdrawal from Palestinian land occupied in 1967. In the same manner, it opposed the OSLO ACCORDS from 1993 on and presented the same preconditions as in the Madrid process: an Israeli withdrawal and unequivocal commitment to the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Hamas is adamant on one point that differs substantially from its predecessors and competitors: the struggle against the Israeli Occupation is to be led inside Palestine, not in the Arab world, and not abroad. In another clear distinction from other Palestinian groups, Hamas never separated politics and the armed struggle. Additionally, while clearly committed to armed resistance, Hamas has never celebrated or idealized violence, and its ideology never claimed that only violence should or could bring about liberation.

Beginning in December 1987 Hamas, like Fatah and the other PLO organizations, participated in demonstrations and strikes against the Occupation in Gaza and the West Bank, organized by a series of leaflets. In addition to these activities, Hamas followed a rather low-key course of armed struggle against Israel with a limited number of military attacks. When Hamas embarked on a direct confrontation with the Israeli army in 1989 through kidnappings (followed by killings) of Israeli soldiers, it was outlawed and declared a TERRORIST organization. Yasin was rearrested, together with other Hamas activists and leaders, and was kept in Israeli prisons until 1997.

The major turning points in Hamas's armed resistance against the Israeli Occupation came following the 9 October 1990 killing of nineteen Palestinian stone-throwers by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES on the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF and more importantly the February 1994 killing of twenty-nine Muslims at prayer in AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in HEBRON by a settler from KIRYAT ARBA. Subsequent to the killing of the stone-throwers, Hamas called for jihad "against the Zionist enemy everywhere, on all fronts and with every means." In response to the Hebron massacre, Hamas embarked on a course of revenge, no longer following a logical military strategy, but attacking every possible target: soldiers, police, and, for the first time, Israeli civilians. From November 1990 until February 1991, thirteen Israelis were killed. During this period Israeli politicians and military officials were ordered to stop all lines of communication with Hamas, which had been kept open until then. The climax of this veritable war between Hamas and the Israeli Occupation came with the deportation of more than 400 Hamas leaders and activists into South Lebanon (Marj al-Zuhur) in 1992.

The major decisive change in the strategy of Hamas's armed struggle occurred after BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, an extremist Israeli settler, attacked Muslim worshipers inside the Haram al-Ibrahimi (al-Ibrahim) Mosque in Hebron, killing twenty-nine in February 1994. In a direct reaction to this crime, Hamas changed its well-established strategy of armed attacks against army positions and/or settlers in the Occupied Territories to armed attacks against civilians inside Israel, including SUICIDE BOMBINGS. First were two bomb attacks, one of them a suicide attack, in Afula and Hadera, with eight and five casualties, respectively. Hamas then resumed kidnapping Israeli soldiers, which led to the Israeli army's killing of Hamas activists and additional arrests of Hamas militants by the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). Fatah, which dominated the PNA, wanted to make peace with Israel and so tried to control those who threatened the PNA-Israeli-US relationship.

A new round of bombings started in fall 1994, killing twenty-two Israelis in a bus bombing in Tel Aviv. Suicide bombings in the summer of 1995, which claimed six victims in Ramat Gan and four in Jerusalem, cannot be clearly attributed to Hamas, although the UNITED STATES arrested a senior Hamas leader, Musa Abu Marzuq, after these bombings and detained him before deporting him to SYRIA. In 1995, negotiations with the PNA produced an agreement that Hamas would stop its suicide bombings. Hamas adhered to the agreement until the TARGETED ASSASSINATION by the Israeli security services of the alleged mastermind behind Hamas bombings, the "Engineer" YAHYA AYYASH, in January 1996. Hamas waited until the end of the Palestinian ELECTIONS before taking revenge with two attacks in February 1996, killing twenty-six civilians in Jerusalem and a number of soldiers at a hitchhiking post near Ashkelon.

A number of suicide attacks in March 1996 (when nineteen were killed in Jerusalem and another thirteen on Tel Aviv's Dizengoff Avenue) cannot be clearly attributed to anyone, because contradictory leaflets were issued by Hamas—one claiming and one denying responsibility. The same contradictions are found in the March and July bombings, respectively, in Tel Aviv (three dead and forty-eight wounded) and Jerusalem's Mahane Yehuda market (sixteen dead and 178 wounded), when Hamas political leader Rantisi denied any involvement at the same time that the AL-QASSAM BRIGADES, the military wing of Hamas, claimed responsibility. The last bombing was another suicide attack in Jerusalem's Ben Yehuda shopping street in September 1997, which left five dead and 181 wounded.

Several times Hamas offered Israel a cease-fire, the first after the Goldstein massacre and another in November 1994, after an encouraging statement on 24 October by YOSSI BEILIN, an Israeli liberal, who proposed that Israel should take up official talks with Hamas, provided Hamas was truly interested in reducing tensions. Rabin, however, rejected it out of hand. After the series of bombings in February 1996 in response to Israel's assassination of Yahya Ayyash, Hamas again called for a cease-fire and offered negotiations with Israel, but Israel again refused, convinced that a military resolution was in its best interest.

The rationale Hamas offered for these suicide attacks, apart from revenge, is that the bombings "exhaust and weaken Israel." Hamas's leaders argued that the overall negative consequences for Israel, including "impacts on the structure of Zionist society, on immigration from abroad, and on various other activities including tourism," would force Israel to capitulate. In that sense Hamas considered suicide bombings as part of the legitimate resistance of the Occupied Palestinians against the occupying Israelis and not as acts of terror. There are ample indications, however, that inside Hamas the suicide bombings were not as widely accepted as most terror specialists suggest. It appears that many Hamas activists and leaders, both inside and outside the Occupied Territories, considered these attacks controversial, in the least. The internal leadership in Gaza was apparently more hesitant to continue the attacks because of their negative repercussions on the Palestinian population at large and on Hamas, its leaders, and activists in particular. The external leadership in Damascus, however, seems to have considered this new strategy of civilian attacks as successful and therefore advocated that they be continued.

The turning point came with Israel's attempt on 25 September 1997 to assassinate Khaled Mash'al in Amman. The Israeli government admitted that it had approved this assassination attempt in the course of its goal of "fighting terror without compromise." JORDAN's King Husayn was furious, because only days before he had communicated to Israel that Hamas might be ready to enter a dialogue and halt suicide attacks. Israel was forced to apologize to the Hashemite (Jordanian) monarchy, to supply the necessary antidote for the nerve toxin with which it had tried to kill Khaled Mash'al, and to release Shaykh Ahmed Yasin (Hamas's spiritual leader), which it did on 30 September.

When Yasin returned to Gaza on 6 October 1997, Hamas published a statement announcing that suicide bombings would be abandoned if there was a full Israeli withdrawal from the Occupied Territories and the removal of all Jewish settlements. On 19 October 1997 Yasin announced a temporary halt to Hamas's attacks against Israel and the start of a cooling-off period, on the condition that Israel halt its punitive measures against the population in Gaza. Even though Israel did not agree to the conditions, there were no more Hamas attacks against civilians in Israel or, for that matter, in the Occupied Territories until March 2001, well into the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, when Hamas initiated a second period of suicide attacks against Israeli civilians. Hamas stated that it renewed the attacks because of the Israeli army's attacks on Palestinian demonstrators during the first few months of the Intifada, especially its use of snipers and targeted assassinations. By the end of December 2000, Israeli soldiers had killed almost 300 Palestinians, among them ninety-two children and youths. In the same period Palestinians had killed thirty-six Israelis, more than half of them soldiers, and, with the exception of four, all were attacked and killed inside the Occupied Territories. Given this background, Palestinian society was in full support of this renewed round of suicide attacks undertaken by Hamas, which produced an ever-increasing number of casualties, especially among the Israeli civilian population, including women and children.

Only in June 2003 did Hamas make a strategic decision to stop the suicide attacks in the first cease-fire announced by Hamas and all other Palestinian organizations. In contrast to other organizations, especially the ISLAMIC JIHAD (al-jihad al-Islami) and to a lesser degree the armed groups inside Fatah (Kataib shuhada al-Aqsa), Hamas embarked on a course to change its resistance strategy from armed struggle to the political arena and, above all, to stop suicide bombings.

Hamas Enters Politics

Throughout 2005 Hamas competed for seats on municipal councils and for mayoralties throughout the Occupied Territories. From election to election, Hamas became more confident of its campaign skills and increasingly made a good showing in the polls. In the last round in November 2005, Hamas won the elections in the major West Bank towns of NABLUS, JENIN, and al-Bireh and made a strong showing in the historically Christian-dominated city of Ramallah, where the first female (Christian) mayor was elected with the support of the Hamas deputies. In previous rounds Hamas took the city of BETHLEHEM, where a POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE mayor was elected with the backing of Hamas. In comparison Fatah scored mostly in small scattered villages around the West Bank but could not stop the Hamas victories in the major cities. The Gaza Strip showed similar results, with fiercely contested elections putting Hamas ahead of Fatah again and again.

Polls before the PNA parliamentary elections scheduled for 25 January 2006 showed Fatah in the lead, and most analysts predicted that the Palestinians would vote differently on the national level than on the municipal level. The election results proved them wrong. Based on the new election law (which gave Palestinian voters one party vote for a national list of candidates and determined the number of deputies in each electoral district), Hamas scored slightly better than Fatah on the party or national vote, but also swept most district votes. Fatah scored only a few direct victories in Jenin, JERICHO, and Rafah. The final result gave Hamas an overwhelming majority in the new parliament, with nearly 80 percent of the seats, demonstrating the people's impatience with the policies of Fatah.

Because Israel did not allow the newly elected Hamas deputies to travel from Gaza to Ramallah, two separate inaugural sessions were held on 18 February 2006, connected by video conferencing. In the 132-strong parliament, Hamas controlled seventy-four seats, compared to forty-five seats for Fatah, with four independents, all close to Hamas, plus nine deputies from four smaller parties. PNA president MAHMUD ABBAS asked the leader of the Hamas majority, ISMAIL HANIYEH, to form a government. Israel, with strong US backing, refused to recognize the new Palestinian government, because it considers Hamas a terrorist organization, and refused to remit taxes to the Palestinians, as required in the Oslo Accords. The United States cut off the limited assistance it had been providing the PNA and persuaded the European governments, whose contributions had been the backbone of the Palestinian Authority, to cease financial aid. Within two months the PNA was bankrupt and its economy in shambles, and in June 2006, Israel arrested nine Palestinian cabinet ministers and twenty-one members of the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL—all affiliated with Hamas. This was followed by more arrests of Hamas officials, which paralyzed the government, and a full-scale Israeli invasion of Gaza that continued from the end of June into the fall.

Hammas and Fatah in the Aftermath of the Elections

Fatah had been the preeminent party in the PLO since its inception and the paramount faction in the PNA dominating every institution in both for forty-five years. The January 2006 electoral loss was akin to a tsunami to both the Fatah leadership and the rank and file, and some were prepared to do anything to reverse the results.

The situation, however, should not be construed as merely a power struggle between the two factions, though that is certainly a major factor. But in the murky political underworld in the Palestinian territories, there are internal power struggles within both Fatah and Hamas, the switching of loyalties based on political expediency, and powerful clan struggles revolving around extortion and business racketeering, as clan chieftains fight to retain their turf. The myriad of powerful clans in Gaza who under the previous PNA leadership became both powerful and rich as they cornered specific business and black markets swore allegiance to Fatah in return, and maintained that loyalty throughout the Hamas-Fatah conflict.

Moreover, as Moshe Ma'oz of the Hebrew University points out, "To the international supporters and the financial backers of Abbas, or Abu Mazen as he is better known, he is the good guy due to his moderation while Hamas are considered the bad guys because of being 'Islamic fundamentalists.' [Yet] to a large degree Hamas managed to establish law and order on the streets of Gaza and kidnappings ceased. They are regarded as clean politically, not corrupt like Fatah."

Additionally, relations between Hamas and Fatah had been quite hostile historically. For example, in 1996 the 20,000-man Preventative Security Force (PSF) in Gaza, under the control of strongman MUHAMMAD DAHLAN, ruthlessly suppressed Hamas and arrested 2,000 alleged Hamas militants after a series of suicide bombings against Israeli targets. From the outset of the al-Aqsa Intifada in 2000, Dahlan's security forces zealously victimized Hamas for its opposition to ongoing talks with Israel. In the following years, Fatah security services arrested hundreds of Hamas activists, torturing and mistreating them, while Dahlan provided Israel with intelligence on Hamas's activities and the location of Hamas militants. Egyptian journalist Abdelhalim Kandil told the Inter-Press News Agency, Cairo Office, that "the US and Israel worked closely with Dahlan, whose main task was the persecution of Hamas."

The defeated Fatah party initially maintained control of most of the Palestinian security apparatus and began immediately to strengthen it in order to defeat Hamas militarily. The US administration of GEORGE W. BUSH supported Fatah's objectives, funding, arming, and training, at a cost of $59 million, Abbas's Presidential Guard and Dahlan's Gaza-based security services. Throughout 2006 and 2007, the United States supplied money, guns, ammunition, and training to Palestinian Fatah activists and encouraged them to take on Hamas in the streets of Gaza and the West Bank. Washington also covertly persuaded Arab allies to supply more funding and training. A large number of Fatah activists were prepared and "graduated" from two West Bank camps, while Jordan and Egypt trained two Fatah battalions, one of which was deployed to Gaza in May. According to Vanity Fair, in 2006 the United States initiated a "covert initiative, approved by Bush and implemented by Secretary of State CONDOLEEZZA RICE and Deputy National Security Adviser Elliott Abrams, to provoke a Palestinian civil war." At an even more covert level, the United States cooperated with Israel to arm and train Fatah militants in preparation for a violent coup against the Hamas leadership in Gaza, a scheme known as the "Dayton Plan," which was reportedly managed by Dahlan and US lieutenant general Keith Dayton. Some have accused Dahlan of organizing and dispatching death squads into Gaza.

March 2006 to December 2006:

Rise of Tensions

Two main issues contributed to an escalation of tensions between March and December 2006. Fatah commanders refused to take orders from the new government of Prime Minister Haniyeh, and the Fatah-PNA initiated a campaign of terror attacks, assassinations, and abductions against Hamas, which led Hamas to respond in kind. Tensions also mounted over the failure of Hamas and Fatah to reach a power-sharing agreement. Truces were signed and broken; agreements were concluded then violated; cease-fires were agreed upon then breached. Essentially Fatah did not want to share power with Hamas, nor did it want a cease-fire; it wanted to crush Hamas. On 17 February 2006, the Fatah movement of PNA president Mahmud Abbas refused an invitation by Prime Minister Haniyeh to join a government formed by Hamas. When, on 15 December 2006, Abbas called for a Palestinian general election, Hamas challenged the legality of holding an early election, maintaining Hamas's right to hold the full term of its democratically elected offices. Hamas viewed this as an attempted Fatah coup by Abbas, using undemocratic means to overthrow the results of a democratically elected government.

Skirmishes between Fatah and Hamas continued on a low level, but on an almost daily basis, from March to December 2006. December saw the first major battle between the two factions. On 15 December fighting broke out in the West Bank after Palestinian security forces fired on a Hamas rally in Ramallah that occurred shortly after Hamas accused Fatah of attempting to assassinate Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister. On 16 December at least thirty-two Hamas supporters in Ramallah were wounded by gunfire from Mahmud Abbas's and Dahlan's forces. On 20 December Hamas and Fatah reached a new truce; however, the following morning two Fatah members were killed during a gunfight with Hamas members. In a separate incident in Jabalya, seven Palestinians were wounded by Hamas members.

Second Round of Fighting:

30 December 2006–May 2007

Intense fighting continued throughout December and January 2007 in the Gaza Strip. Several cease-fire attempts failed, broken by continued battles. In February 2007 Palestinian rivals met in the Islamic holy city of Mecca, SAUDI ARABIA, and reached an accord ensuring a cease-fire and a national unity government—the MECCA AGREEMENT. However, the unity government collapsed almost as quickly as it was established, and minor incidents continued through March and April 2007. More than ninety people were killed in these first months. At least twenty people were wounded in the clashes.

In mid-May 2007, heavy clashes erupted once again in the streets of Gaza as Fatah moved to oust Hamas. In less than twenty days, more than fifty Palestinians were killed. Leaders of both parties tried to stop the fighting with dozens of truces, but none of them held for longer than a few days. By most accounts, Hamas performed better than Fatah in this round of fighting. Some attribute this to the discipline and better training of Hamas's fighters. However, Fatah's armed forces are greater in number and were trained, armed, and prepared for this operation by the United States, Egypt, and Jordan.

Battle of Gaza 2007: Hamas

Reasserts Control

The final and most intense round of fighting took place between 7 and 15 June 2007 in the Gaza Strip. It resulted in Hamas remaining in control of the Gaza Strip after forcing out Fatah. It may also have signaled the downfall of Muhammad Dahlan. The PNA was now formally split, with Fatah controlling the West Bank and Hamas the Gaza Strip. The Red Cross estimated that at least 118 people were killed and over 550 wounded during the fighting in the week up to 15 June.

West Bank: Fatah Establishes

a Separate Government

The attacks of Hamas gunmen against Fatah security forces in the Gaza Strip resulted in a reaction of Fatah gunmen against Hamas institutions in the West Bank. Although Hamas's numbers are greater in the Gaza Strip, Fatah forces are greater in the West Bank.

The West Bank had its first casualty on 15 June when the bullet-riddled body of a Hamas militant was found in Nablus, sparking the fear that Fatah would use its advantage in the West Bank for retaliation against its members' deaths in the Gaza Strip. On the same day, Hamas also declared that it was in full control of Gaza, a claim denied by Abbas, but reflecting reality on the ground.

On 16 June, a Fatah-linked militant group, the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, stormed the Hamas-controlled parliament based in Ramallah in the West Bank. This act, including the ransacking of the Ministry of Education, was undoubtedly a response to Fatah's defeat in Gaza, but it did not bode well for future reconciliation between the two parties. On 20 June, Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar declared that if Fatah continued to try to uproot Hamas in the West Bank, it could lead to Fatah's downfall there as well. When asked, he would not deny that Hamas resistance against Fatah would take the form of attacks and suicide bombings similar to those Hamas has used against Israel in the past.

On 14 June, President Abbas announced the dissolution of the current government and the declaration of a state of emergency. Palestinian prime minister Haniyeh was dismissed, and Abbas began to rule Gaza and the West Bank by presidential decree. Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri responded by declaring that President Abbas's decision was "in practical terms . . . worthless," asserting that Haniyeh "remains the head of the government even if it was dissolved by the president." On 15 June, Abbas appointed Salam Fayyad as prime minister and gave him the task of forming a new government—something he has yet to accomplish as of April 2009.

In consequence of the failure of Israel's surrogate, Muhammad Dahlan and his highly trained forces, to crush Hamas in Gaza, Tel Aviv decided to undertake the task itself. In this context, then, Israel, which on 19 September 2007 had declared Gaza an "enemy entity" and had imposed a total, punishing, eighteen-month siege on Gaza, unleashed OPERATION CAST LEAD on 27 December 2008, lasting until 18 January 2009. In the twenty-two days of Operation Cast Lead, the Palestinian Center for Human Rights (PCHR) put the Palestinian death toll during the offensive at a total of 1,417, of whom 926 were civilians, including 313 children and 116 women. Noncombatant police officers constituted 255, and 236 combatants were killed, representing 16.7 percent of the total deaths. The number of civilian fatalities included sixteen medics and four journalists. The number of wounded was approximately 5,500, of which two-thirds were civilians. The IDF reported ten fatalities, all combatants, of which four were killed by friendly fire, one inside Israel by a Qassam rocket, and five in combat with Palestinian forces. Three civilians were reportedly killed, but neither the place nor circumstances of their deaths were published. The IDF did not publish numbers of injured.

Yet despite the carnage that Israel inflicted on Gaza, when the onslaught was over, Hamas remained in power.

Bibliography

- Abu Amr, Ziad. Islamic Fundamentalism in the West Bank and Gaza: Muslim Brotherhood and Islamic Jihad. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994.
- Akleh, Elias. "Palestinians at a Cross-Road: Dynamics of Fatah-Hamas Conflict." Global Research. 23 June 2007.
- Baroud, Ramzy. "War without Context: Fatah, Hamas and Flawed Language." Global Research. 8 May 2009.
- Baumgarten, Helga. "The Three Phases/Faces of Palestinian Nationalism." Journal of Palestine Studies. 34:4 (2005).
- BBC News. "Gaza Faction Boosts Police Ranks." 15 May 2007.
- Budeiri, Musa. "The Nationalist Dimension of Islamic Movements." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:3 (1995).
- Burgat, Francois. "Ballot Boxes, Militaries, and Islamic Movements." In The Islamism Debate. Edited by Martin Kramer. Tel Aviv, Israel: Tel Aviv University, The Moshe Dayan Center, 1997.
- . Face to Face with Political Islam. London: I. B. Tauris, 2003.
- Crooke, Alastair, and Beverley Milton-Edwards. "Elusive Ingredient: Hamas and the Peace Process." Journal of Palestine Studies. 33:4 (2004).
- Frykberg, Mel. "Political Divide between Hamas, Fatah Deepens." Middle East Times. 6 (February 2009).
- Ghosh, Pothik. "In Defence of Hamas." Radical Notes. 11 January 2009. <http://radicalnotes.com/content/view/83/39/>.
- Hroub, Khaled. Hammas: Political Thought and Practice. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 2000.
- International Crisis Group. "Dealing with Hamas." Middle East Report. 21 (January 2004).
- . "Enter Hamas: The Challenges of Political Integration." Middle East Report. 49 (January 2006).
- . "Islamic Social Welfare Activism in the Occupied Territories: A Legitimate Target?" Middle East Report. 13 (April 2003).
- Legrain, Jean-Francois. "The Islamic Movement and the Intifada." In Intifada: Palestine at the Crossroads. Edited by Jamal R. Nassar and Roger Heacock. New York: Praeger, 1990.
- . Les Voix du soulèvement palestinien, 1987–1988. Édition critique des communiqués du Commandement National Unifié du Soulèvement et du Mouvement de la Résistance Islamique (The Voices of the Palestinian Uprising, 1987–1988. A critical edition of the leaflets of the United National Leadership of the Uprising and of the Islamic Resistance Movement). Cairo: Centre d'Études de

- Documentation Économique, Juridique et Sociale, 1991.
- Maalouf, Amin. On Identity. London: The Harvill Press, 2000.
- McKeeby, David. "U.S. Supports New Abbas Government, Pledges $40 Million in New Aid." Washington, DC: Bureau of International Information Programs, US Department of State. 19 June 2007. <http://usinfo.state.gov>.
- Miller, Barbara. "Fatah and Hamas Hold Talks." The World Today. 27 January 2009.
- Milton-Edwards, Beverley. Islamic Politics in Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 1996.
- Mishal, Shaul, and Avraham Sela. The Palestinian Hamas: Vision, Violence, and Coexistence. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.
- Mitchell, Richard P. The Society of the Muslim Brothers. New York and Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1993 [1969].
- Morrow, Adam, and Khaled Moussa Al-Omrani. "Dahlan Comeback to Gaza Fails." The Electronic Intifada. 27 April 2009.
- Al-Nawati, Muhib Salman Ahmad. Hamas from the Inside. Gaza: Dar al-Shuruk l'il nashr (in Arabic), 2002.
- Nuesse, Andrea. Muslim Palestine: The Ideology of Hamas. Abingdon, Oxon: Routledge Curzon, 1998.
- Palestine Information Center. www.palestine-info.net.
- Ross, Oakland. "Fatah, Hamas on Brink of Civil War: Worsening Conflict between Rival Groups Threatens to Split Palestinian Society." The Toronto Star. 13 June 2007.
- Waked, Ali. "Fatah Starts Detaining Hamas Members in West Bank." YNet, Israel News. 14 June 2007.
- "Who Won Gaza: Dahlan-US-Israel or Hamas?" The Daily Life of Kawther Salam. Vienna, Austria. n.d. <http://www.kawther.info/K20070618A.html>.

—Helga Baumgarten

Al-Hamid, Hayil 'Abd (ca. 1935–1991)

Hayil 'Abd al-Hamid (Abu al-Hawl) was head of the FATAH security apparatuses from 1973 until his death. He was born in SAFED, Palestine, and, with his family, was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR, becoming a refugee in Yarmuk camp near Damascus, SYRIA. In the mid-1950s he joined the Arab Filastin student group, which competed in the League of Palestinian Students. After the Arab Filastin group merged with Fatah in 1963–1964, al-Hamid led Fatah groups in EGYPT, where he began to build relations with the governments of JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR and with Syria. In cooperation with HANI AL-HASAN he coordinated Palestinian activism from East GERMANY and was sent for military training in CHINA during the latter half of 1967. In 1969 he was again appointed Fatah's representative to Cairo.

In April 1973 'Abd al-Hamid became head of Fatah's security services, taking over from AL-YUSIF MUHAMMAD AL-NAJJAR, and became a member of the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE. He was assassinated in January 1991, together with SALAH KHALAF, by the ABU NIDAL faction for siding with Arafat's two-state political strategy.

Bibliography

- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1948–1993. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.

HaMoked

HaMoked, the Center for the Defense of the Individual, is an Israeli human rights organization established in 1988 during the First INTIFADA, to help Palestinians who were injured as a result of President Rabin's policy to "break the bones" of demonstrators. HaMoked's main work is to assist Palestinians whose rights are violated by the Israeli authorities or as a result of Israeli policies. On behalf of Palestinians it petitions the Civil Authority, the Military Attorney General, the State Attorney General, or any of a variety of Israeli governmental offices. When necessary HaMoked files legal claims and submits petitions to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT. HaMoked often collaborates with B'TSELEM, the Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. (www.hamoked.org.il).

Haniyeh, Ismail (1963–)

In January 2006 Ismail Haniyeh, a senior political leader of HAMAS, became prime minister of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). He was born in al-Shati refugee camp in the GAZA STRIP. His parents, originally from Al-Majdal (now Ashkelon in southern Israel), were dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and became REFUGEES. In 1987 Haniyeh graduated from the Islamic University of Gaza with a degree in Arabic literature. In 1989 he was imprisoned for three years by Israeli authorities for participation in the First INTIFADA and membership in Hamas, and, following his release in 1992, he was deported to LEBANON. A year later he returned to Gaza and was appointed dean of the Islamic University.

After his return the Israeli army continuously targeted Haniyeh for alleged involvement in attacks against Israeli citizens. Following a SUICIDE BOMBING in JERUSALEM in 2003, the Israeli Air Force attempted to eliminate all Hamas leaders, and Haniyeh was slightly injured on his hand in an assassination attempt. His position within Hamas continued to strengthen during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA because of both his close relationship with SHEIKH AHMAD YASIN (Hamas's spiritual leader) and the assassinations of much of the Hamas leadership by Israel. In December 2005 Haniyeh was elected to head the Hamas slate, which on 25 January 2006 won the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL ELECTIONS. After Haniyeh was asked by Palestinian president MAHMUD ABBAS to form a new government, he was elected by the Hamas delegates to serve as prime minister and was sworn in on 29 March 2006.

Haniyeh first attempted to form a coalition with the FATAH party, but when it declined he named a cabinet primarily of Hamas members and technocrats. When he outlined his administration's program, Haniyeh urged the UNITED STATES and the EUROPEAN UNION not to carry out their threats to cut funding to the PNA. He stressed that Palestinians were entitled to continue their struggle for independence, but at the same time he said clearly that he wanted to hold talks with international mediators about solving the conflict with Israel. "Our government will spare no effort to reach a just peace in the region, putting an end to the OCCUPATION and restoring our rights," he said.

Israel and the United States immediately imposed severe sanctions on the PNA because they deemed Hamas a TERRORIST group. The Europeans followed shortly, leaving the PNA bereft of resources with which to govern. Nevertheless, Haniyeh is considered a pragmatist in the ranks of Hamas who is more open to dialogue with Israel, although he has insisted that Israel would have to recognize Palestinian rights before talks could begin.

Despite the sanctions and incidences of successful border interdiction, Hamas leaders were able to smuggle enough money into the Palestinian territories to maintain basic health and educational services. The defeated Fatah party maintains control of most of the Palestinian security apparatus and the US administration of GEORGE W. BUSH funded and armed Abbas's Presidential Guard and Gaza-based Fatah warlord MUHAMMAD DAHLAN.

During 2006 and 2007, the United States supplied guns, ammunition, and training to Fatah activists to take on Hamas in the streets of Gaza and the WEST BANK. The US objective was to provoke a Palestinian civil war and topple the Haniyeh government.

The period from March to December 2006 was marked by tensions when Fatah commanders refused to take orders from the government while the PNA initiated a campaign of assassinations and abductions against Hamas, which led to Hamas beginning their own campaign. Tensions increased further between the two Palestinian factions after they failed to reach a deal to share government power. On 15 December 2006, Abbas called for a Palestinian general election. Hamas challenged the legality of holding an early election, maintaining their right to hold the full term of their democratically elected offices. Haniyeh characterized this as an attempted Fatah coup by Abbas, using undemocratic means to overthrow the results of a democratically elected government.

Intense fighting broke out after Palestinian security forces fired on a Hamas rally in the West Bank. Hamas accused Fatah of attempting to assassinate Prime Minister Haniyeh. Fighting continued through January 2007, though mostly in Gaza. In February 2007, the Palestinian rivals met in the Islamic holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, and reached an accord ensuring a cease-fire—the MECCA AGREEMENT. A national unity government emerged, but just as quickly disintegrated.

Clashes erupted again in mid-May 2007 in the streets of Gaza. In less than twenty days, more than 50 Palestinians were killed. According to one Palestinian rights group, more than 600 Palestinians were killed in fighting from January 2006 to May 2007.

In just four days of fighting, Hamas took control of the entire Gaza Strip and forced Fatah out. Fatah then attacked Hamas institutions in the West Bank. President Abbas declared a state of emergency and dismissed Prime Minister Haniyeh, but he remained in power in Gaza as the two Palestinian territories split.

See also HAMAS

Bibliography

- BBC. "Profile: Hamas PM Ismail Haniyeh." BBC News. 14 December 2006. http://news.bbc.co.uk/go/pr/fr/-/1/hi/world/middle\_east/4655146.stm.
- Frykberg, Mel. "Political Divide between Hamas, Fatah Deepens." Middle East Times. 29 April 2009.
- Haniyeh, Ismail. "Aggression under False Pretenses." New York Times. 11 July 2006.

Hass, Amira. "Sacrificing the Palestinian Struggle." Ha'aretz. 26 January 2009.

Schanzer, Jonathan. Hamas vs. Fatah: The Struggle for Palestine. Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.

Wedeman, Ben. "A Year under Hamas: Gaza Safer, but Life Is Desperate." CNN News. 14 June 2008.

Weymouth, Sally. "We Do Not Wish to Throw Them into the Sea." Washington Post. 26 February 2006.

Hankin, Joshua (1864–1945)

Joshua (Yehoshua) Hankin was an early Zionist LAND purchaser in Palestine. Born in the Ukraine, he immigrated to Palestine with his father in 1882, where they were among the founders of the town of Rishon LeZion. In 1887 Hankin and his father moved to Gedera, where they established relations with the local Arab landowners in order to facilitate major land purchases and expansion of the Jewish colonization movement.

Hankin made his first land purchase in 1890, buying the land on which the settlement of Rehovoth was established, and later bought land on which the JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION established settlements in the Galilee and in other parts of Palestine. In 1908 he went to work for the PALESTINE LAND DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION, which was established by the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION to purchase and cultivate land for the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND and for private individuals. Hankin negotiated the purchase of lands in the fertile Jezreel Valley as early as 1897, but the sale was delayed until 1909, when he finally succeeded in buying the land on which Merhavia, the first Jewish settlement in the valley, was established.

In 1915 Hankin was exiled by OTTOMAN authorities to Turkey, but he returned three years later. In 1920 he concluded another major purchase in the Jezreel Valley, which led to the founding of the Ein Harod, Tel Yosef, and Nahalal settlements. As a result of this important acquisition, Hankin became known as "Redeemer of the Valley," and Kfar Yehoshua in the Jezreel Valley is named for him.

In 1927 Hankin presented the Zionist leadership with a daring twenty-year plan for the acquisition of Palestinian lands, and he became the director of the Palestine Land Development Corporation in 1932. Hankin also sought to establish a town on the Mediterranean shore south of Caesarea, to be named Hephzibah. He planned to develop the area as a resort and build an elaborate European-style home for himself there. By the 1950s, however, the area became a housing project for immigrant families. During his lifetime Hankin arranged for the purchase of more than 600,000 dunums (almost 150,000 acres) of land.

See also ABSENTEE LANDLORDS; ARAB NATIONALISTS' LAND SALES TO THE ZIONISTS

Bibliography

Cohen, Michael J. The Origins and Evolution of the Arab-Zionist Conflict. Berkeley: University of California, 1987.

Stein, Kenneth W. The Land Question in Palestine, 1917–1939, reprint ed. Durham, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

HaPoel HaMizrachi

HaPoel HaMizrachi (Spiritual Center Worker) was an Orthodox religious workers' movement founded in Palestine in 1922 by a left-wing faction of MIZRACHI. In 1956 it rejoined Mizrachi to form the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY (NRP), which was part of the religious Zionist movement that aimed to restore not only the Jewish nation in the "whole land of Israel" but also the Jewish religion, the Torah, and its commandments. Today the NRP and its offshoot, GUSH EMUNIM, are deeply committed to settling the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and to the GREATER LAND OF ISRAEL MOVEMENT.

Bibliography

Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

HaPoel HaTzair

HaPoel HaTzair (The Young Worker) was a labor Zionist political party founded in 1905 and led by A.D. Gordon (1856–1922), a Zionist ideologue and the spiritual force behind practical (political) ZIONISM. The party was active in Palestine from 1905 to 1930. HaPoel HaTzair's philosophy—Jewish labor as a Zionist value—embodied what became the major tenets of labor Zionism that dominated the Zionist movement and Israeli politics for many years.

Bibliography

Aronoff, Myron J. Power and Ritual in the Israel Labor Party: A Study in Political Anthropology, revised ed. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1993.

Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

Al-Haq: Law in the Service of Man

Al-Haq (Fairness, Justice, Law, Truth) is the WEST BANK affiliate of the Geneva-based International Commission of Jurists. It is a Palestinian human rights organization, founded in Ramallah in 1979 by Palestinian lawyers concerned with the protection and promotion of the principles of human rights and the rule of law. Al-Haq is among the most respected and trusted human rights organizations in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. (www.alhaq.org).

Al-Haram ash-Sharif

Al-Haram al-Sharif (Noble Sanctuary) is a Muslim shrine that is situated in the heart of the OLD CITY of JERUSALEM. Because part of it was also a Jewish holy site, it has been a major flashpoint in the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians. Al-Haram ash-Sharif comprises nearly one-sixth of the walled Old City, enclosing over thirty-five acres of fountains, gardens, buildings, domes, and the tombs of revered Muslim individuals. At its southernmost end is AL-AQSA MOSQUE and, closer to the main entrance, the DOME OF THE ROCK. As the site of the Prophet Muhammad's Night Journey and as the first qibla (direction of prayer) for Islam, al-Haram ash-Sharif holds special significance for Muslims. The entire area, one of the three most important sites in Islam, is regarded by Muslims as a mosque and is thus sacred and inviolable. As a showcase for Islamic architecture and design from Umayyad to Ottoman times, al-Haram ash-Sharif continues to be an important religious and educational center for Muslims today.

Jews refer to the area (which sits atop the WESTERN WALL) as Har Ha-Bayit or TEMPLE MOUNT. Many believe it was the site of the Temple of Solomon, destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BCE, or the site of the Second Temple, destroyed by the Romans in 70 CE. Some Jews and fundamentalist Christians want to destroy the entire Haram and rebuild the THIRD TEMPLE there. Since 1967 there have been some 100 attempts by individuals and groups to assault al-Haram ash-Sharif for a variety of reasons, including to perform Jewish rituals, to destroy the Muslim buildings, to rebuild the Third Temple, or to upset the balance of power between Judaism and Islam and alter the status quo. Two groups in particular are dedicated to the destruction of Jerusalem's most sacred Islamic shrine: the militant Bloc of the Faithful (GUSH EMUNIM), led by rabbis, and the Temple Mount Reclamation Movement, whose objective is to build the Third Temple on the site. Militant fundamentalist Christians who want the Islamic shrine destroyed give support and financial aid to both Israeli groups, because, in their millennialist ideology, the second coming of Christ is dependent on the Jews rebuilding the Second Temple. The following is a brief chronology of provocative actions or direct attacks on al-Haram ash-Sharif.

August 1967. Shlomo Goren, the chief chaplain of the Armed Forces and later Israel's chief rabbi, led fifty armed men onto the shrine and declared "it is a holy commandment" for Jews to go to the Muslim grounds. That year there was much talk about Israel's restoration of its presence in the land of Israel. One Israeli publication reported that "many rabbis, including members of the Council of the Chief Rabbinate, support . . . Jewish sovereignty" over al-Haram ash-Sharif.

August 1969. A Christian fundamentalist from Australia set fire to al-Aqsa Mosque, destroying a priceless one-thousand-year-old wood and ivory minbar (pulpit) that had been sent from Aleppo, SYRIA, by the twelfth-century Muslim leader SALADIN.

December 1969. A group of militant Jews stormed their way onto al-Haram ash-Sharif in order "to conduct Hanukkah prayers."

July 1978. Gershon Salomon, leader of the Temple Mount Faithful, led militant Jews onto the Islamic holy grounds. When Palestinians demonstrated in protest, Israeli forces responded with tear gas.

August 1980. Three hundred heavily armed Gush Emunim extremists overcame Palestinian police and stormed the grounds of the Haram. They were eventually dispersed by Israeli troops.

September 1980. One month after their previous assault, armed Gush Emunim settlers again forced their way onto the Haram grounds. After scuffling with police, they were evicted.

April 1982. An Israeli soldier went on a shooting rampage in al-Aqsa Mosque, killing two Palestinians and wounding numerous others. A week of Palestinian demonstrations followed; the soldier was tried and sentenced to life imprisonment, but in November 1997 he was released.

October 1982. A member of MEIR KAHANE'S KACH movement was arrested for plotting to blow up the Dome of the Rock.

March 1983. Some forty-five armed men from Gush Emunim and Kach climbed the walls onto al-Haram ash-Sharif and attempted to overcome security guards and seize the site. They were found with large quantities of explosives, automatic rifles, and pistols. Twenty-nine people were eventually charged for the intrusion, but all were acquitted of the charges.

May 1983. After the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT ruled that Jews could pray on al-Haram ash-Sharif, Gershon Salomon and other members of the Temple Mount Faithful entered the compound under police protection and held a service commemorating the reunification of Jerusalem.

January 1984. The Lifta Cell, led by RABBI MOSHE LEVINGER of Gush Emunim, attempted to blow up the Muslim holy sites on al-Haram ash-Sharif. The plan was thwarted only at the last minute, and police recovered almost 250 pounds of explosives, including dozens of Israeli army-issue hand grenades, boxes of dynamite, and about twelve mortar rounds. No suspects were arrested.

January 1986. A group of Israel Knesset members, including those who believe that the Jews have a right to pray on the Temple Mount, gathered on al-Haram ash-Sharif. Palestinians protested, but Israel suppressed the demonstrations. A week later someone hoisted the Israeli flag over the Haram.

October 1990. The Temple Mount Faithful marched on the Haram and unfurled a banner denouncing the Muslim presence. When they attempted to lay a foundation stone for the Third Temple, they were stopped by the police. In the ensuing riot twenty-two Palestinians were killed; no one was arrested.

September 1996. Israeli prime minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU opened the HASMONEAN TUNNEL—excavated in secret nighttime operations—which runs the length of the al-Aqsa Mosque. The controversial tunnel sparked intense fighting that claimed the lives of sixty Palestinians and fifty Israeli soldiers.

October 1998. Gershon Salomon and his followers mounted a ramp to the Haram, waving Israeli flags and blowing rams' horns. "The time has come to rebuild the Jewish Temple," said Salomon. To underscore his point, Salomon brought a forty-one-ton stone intended as the cornerstone for the Third Temple.

September 2000. Israeli Likud leader ARIEL SHARON, flanked by over 1,000 riot policemen, visited al-Haram ash-Sharif. It was intended to be a provocative statement of Israel's sovereignty over all of Jerusalem, but demonstrations broke out across the Occupied Territories, and the Second INTIFADA, known as the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, was under way.

April 2005. Israel's security service, SHIN BET, arrested nine far-right activists suspected of plotting to attack al-Haram ash-Sharif with missiles.

See also AL-AQSA MOSQUE; DOME OF THE ROCK; HASMONEAN TUNNEL; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Alpher, Yossi, Ghassan Khatib, and Jamil Hamami. "The Temple Mount/Haram Al Sharif." bitterlemons.org. 3 June 2002. www.bitterlemons.org/previous/bl030602ed20.html.
- Bender, Arik. "Temple Mount Activist Says Blowing Up Dome of Rock Is 'Worthy Act.'" Ma'ariv International (English). 25 July 2004.
- Cook, Jonathan. "The Real Israeli Target, Al-Haram Al-Sharif." Al-Ahram (Cairo weekly). 28 May 2003.
- Dumper, Michael. The Politics of Jerusalem since 1967. New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.
- . The Politics of Sacred Space: The Old City of Jerusalem in the Middle East Conflict. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2002.
- Halsell, Grace. "Anxious for Armageddon: Militant Coalition of Christian Fundamentalist and Jewish Orthodox Cults Plots Destruction of Al Aqsa Mosque." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs, March 2002. www.washington-report.org/backissues/0300/0003016.html.
- . "Shrine under Siege." The Link. 25:2 (1992).
- Hanegbi, Tzachi. "Israeli Officials Fear Jewish Fanatics Might Launch Attack at Muslim Sites." Broadcast, 25 July 2004. Transcript at www.isracast.com/Transcripts/250704a\_trans.htm.
- Harel, Amos, and Jonathan Lis. "High Alert amid Warnings of Temple Mount Attack." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 4 July 2005.
- . "The Jerusalem Tunnel: Eradicating Muslims and Christians from Jerusalem." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs, November–December 1996.
- Journal of Palestine Studies. "The Haram Al-Sharif (Temple Mount) Killings." Special File. Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:2 (1991).
- Lis, Jonathan, et al. "Officials: Jewish Extremists May Crash Plane on Temple Mount." Ha'aretz. 25 July 2004.
- Lustick, Ian S. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1988.
- . "Israel's Dangerous Fundamentalists." Foreign Policy. 68 (1987).

Sedan, Gil. "As Tension Rises, Israeli Police Warn of Extremists." Jewish Telegraphic Agency. 19 January 2001.

Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1991.

UNESCO. Jerusalem and the Implementation of 23 c/Resolution 11.3. Paris: United Nations Economic, Social and Cultural Organization. 125 EX/15. 1986. <http://unesdoc.unesco.org/images/0006/000695/069594eo.pdf>.

United Nations General Assembly. "Report on the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories." Letter dated 14 March 1983 from the Permanent Representative of Jordan to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General. A/38/117. S/15642. 16 March 1983. <http://domino.un.org/UNISPAL.NSF/3822b5e39951876a85256b6e0058a478/0aaab901d103f96485257006006edebe!OpenDocument>.

Weiss, Efrat. "Police: Temple Mount Attack Thwarted." Ynet.news. 16 May 2005.

Haredi

Haredi (one who trembles), also known as ultra-Orthodox Judaism, is the most theologically conservative form of Judaism. Haredi Jews consider their belief system and religious practices to extend in an unbroken chain back to Moses and the giving of the Torah on Mount Sinai. Historically the Haredi were ANTI-ZIONISTS because they believed that Jewish political independence could only be obtained through divine intervention with the coming of the Messiah. Once the state of Israel was created, however, the Haredi found it expedient to work with Zionists and also formed a political party, the AGUDAT YISRAEL. Today the Haredim are divided into two political parties. The first, UNITED TORAH JUDAISM, is an alliance of DEGEL HATORAH and Agudat Yisrael and is the party of the ASHKENAZI Haredim, who are of East European origin. The second is SHAS, the party of the MIZRAHI/SEPHARDI Haredim, who are of Middle Eastern and North African origin. In the 2006 elections the Haredi parties together won 18 of the 120 total Knesset seats. Shas won 12 seats, and United Torah Judaism 6 seats.

The Haredim constitute about 11 percent of the Israeli population and 13.4 percent of the Israeli Jews. They are, however, far more influential than their numbers might suggest, which is significant because on issues relating to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict they share the worldview of the LIKUD PARTY, GUSH EMUNIM, and others from the right.

Like the others, they are committed to a Greater Israel and to the retention and SETTLEMENT of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Traditionally the main interests of the Haredi parties were obtaining government subsidies for their yeshivas (schools), maintaining their exemption from military service, and expanding Halacha (Jewish) law over more aspects of Israeli society. Since around 2000, however, the single most important issue to the Haredi (aside from Halachic issues) has been Jewish settlements in the WEST BANK.

This issue had become important to the Haredi because they make up one-third of the population of the Occupied Territories, mainly drawn there because of the shortage of affordable housing within the Green Line, especially in JERUSALEM, where they have been traditionally concentrated. Because the high Haredi birthrate (8 to 12 children per family) had led to a great demand for housing, two settlements have become key contributors to the settler population's increase: Betar Illit, between the Etzion Bloc and Jerusalem, and Modi'in Illit (formerly called Kiryat Sefer) in the Modi'in area. The two settlements' combined population—each is estimated to have 22,000 residents—represents a quarter of the settler population in this area. If the Haredi town of Immanuel (population 2,700) is added, along with Tel Zion and Kokhav Yaakov's Haredi neighborhood (with 560 families, according to its own figures), the significance of the ultra-Orthodox in any Israeli program for retaining the West Bank is clearly crucial. Having established communities in the West Bank and having a vested interest in the Occupied Territories, the Haredi oppose any political arrangement with the Palestinians that would involve giving up LAND and settlements.

Bibliography

Baumel, Simeon D. "Black Hats and Holy Tongues: Language and Culture among British Haredim." European Judaism. 36:2 (2003).

———. Sacred Speakers: Language and Culture among the Haredim in Israel. Oxford, UK: Berghahn Books, 2006.

Heilman, Samuel C. The Haredim in Israel: Who Are They and What Do They Want? New York: Institute of American Jewish-Israeli Relations, The American Jewish Committee, 1991.

Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

Shahak, Israel, and Norton Mezvinsky. Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. London: Pluto Press, 1999.

Har Habait/Har HaBayit

See THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Har Homa Settlement

Har Homa is a major SETTLEMENT on the southeastern border of JERUSALEM, the development and construction of which was undertaken during the OSLO PROCESS. The area of the Har Homa settlement project comprises 2,056 dunum (about 500 acres) and completes the circle of Jewish settlements around East Jerusalem.

Har Homa, like all the Jewish settlements in East Jerusalem and the West Bank, is illegal because it violates various provisions of INTERNATIONAL LAW that are binding on Israel. International humanitarian law prohibits the establishment of the settlements on Occupied territory. Breach of this prohibition leads to the infringement of numerous human rights of Palestinians that are set forth in international human rights law.

International humanitarian law relates to rules applying to states during times of war and OCCUPATION. The settlements in the Occupied Territories breach two primary instruments of international law: the Hague Convention on the Laws and Customs of War on Land, and its attached Regulations of 1907 (hereafter the Hague Regulations), and the Fourth Geneva Convention Relative to Civilian Persons in Time of War of 1949. Because the settlements have been constructed on land Israel has illegally occupied since 1967, they contravene the most basic tenets of the laws of war and occupation.

These principles are recognized by the UNITED NATIONS, the EUROPEAN UNION, and most every other country in the world. The US position, however, is ambiguous. On the one hand, it has quietly pressured Israel not to go forward with new settlement construction, particularly Har Homa, because of the ongoing peace process; on the other, the UNITED STATES has looked the other way during most of Israel's construction project, continuously providing it increasing financial assistance, and has vetoed UN Security Council resolutions condemning the settlement plans, including two different resolutions that called on Israel to stop construction at Har Homa. The United States was the only country of the fifteen members on the council to vote against the resolutions.

Shortly after concluding the HEBRON PROTOCOL on 17 January 1997 and five years into the peace process, Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU announced on 19 February 1997 the beginning of construction of another Jewish settlement in East Jerusalem on Jabel Abu Ghanem—Har Homa. The pronouncement was met with strong displeasure in Washington because it compromised the negotiating process; nevertheless, despite its objections to the project, on 21 March the United States vetoed a second UN Security Council resolution critical of Israel's settlement policy. On that same day a HAMAS activist placed a bomb in a Tel Aviv café, killing three women. The Israeli government suspended all further negotiations with the Palestinians except those concerned with security (until October 1998 when US president CLINTON convinced Israeli prime minister Netanyahu to return to the negotiating process at WYE RIVER).

The declaration also led to demonstrations throughout the Occupied Territories. On 1 March 1997 over 600 Palestinian and Israeli peace activists, as well as members of the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, protested the building of Har Homa. Similar demonstrations took place in the succeeding months as construction work proceeded. On 3 March Palestinians throughout the territories observed a general strike in protest of Har Homa. The ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES sent hundreds of soldiers into the West Bank to forestall additional demonstrations, and between 6 and 20 March Israeli troops killed eight Palestinians and wounded over 1,000. Two Israeli soldiers were killed.

In the early 1980s, Israel classified the Abu Ghanem mountain as a "GREEN AREA" (in principle meaning there was to be no construction in the area, Israeli or Palestinian). However, when the Israeli government completed its confiscation of the forested mountain, they reclassified it as a "building zone" for the construction of Har Homa.

Expropriation of the land commenced in July 1991 and was approved in December 1994 by Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN. Approximately 33 percent (694 dunum, 170 acres) of the Har Homa planning area was owned by Palestinian residents of the nearby West Bank village Beit Sahur (at the time part of Area A under the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY'S control) and the Jerusalem village of Um Tuba.

In addition to losing land, Palestinians lost both culturally and environmentally in the Har Homa project. The closeness of Abu Ghanem Mountain to the traditional Christian site of Shepherd's Fields should have necessitated that the forested mountain be left intact so as to preserve the ENVIRONMENT and landscape of this biblical setting. The removal of the trees and their replacement with modern Western-style houses and industrial parks has substantially altered the ecosystem and character of the area adjacent to the Shepherd's Fields, and this is occurring at a time when Israel is restoring ancient archaeology in Jerusalem, at the expense of Palestinian homes and way of life, to reestablish their biblical past. A Byzantine monastery on the top of Abu Ghanem remained on the site under control of the Jewish settlers. It has become a showpiece, exploited for tourist revenue in the same fashion as the Byzantine church located in the middle of MA'ALE ADUMIM. The location of the settlement, now buttressed by the BARRIER wall, which physically isolates BETHLEHEM, plus loss of control of the monastery, deprives the Palestinians of Bethlehem of their main source of income—tourism.

Har Homa is, however, important to Israel, as the linchpin for the completion of a ring of large-scale housing colonies all along Jerusalem's southern, northern, and eastern perimeters. When these settlements are completed (with construction of Har Homa), Palestinian neighborhoods throughout East Jerusalem will be cut off from their WEST BANK hinterland by a circle of settlements housing more than 200,000 Israelis. This is part of Israel's program for realizing Jewish sovereignty over a united and Jewish Jerusalem in which there will be no possibility for sharing the city with Palestinians, who hope to have East Jerusalem as the capital of their state. Moreover, beyond its place in the unification of Jerusalem, Har Homa's significance resides in Israel's larger scheme for the city's connection with the West Bank settlement Ma'ale Adumim through the E1 PLAN, which will sever the occupied territory of the West Bank into two separate and unconnected halves.

Construction of Har Homa began within days after Prime Minister Netanyahu's 17 February announcement, but due to intense US pressure, work on the site ceased after INFRASTRUCTURE was laid in late 1997. In May 1999, construction was resumed at the controversial settlement and by the end of 2000, settlers began moving into the 110 units built with government tenders. Between the years 2003 and 2007, the Israeli Ministry of Housing in cooperation with the Israeli Municipality of Jerusalem consigned six contractors to build an additional 2,536 new housing units in Har Homa.

A week before President GEORGE W. BUSH convened the 27 November 2007 Annapolis Conference, Israeli prime minister EHUD OLMERT announced that the minister of housing had issued a tender for the construction of 307 new homes at Har Homa. Prior to the announcement, according to Housing Ministry spokesman Kobi Bleich, the Knesset had approved an allocation of 50 million shekels ($13 million) in the national budget proposal for 500 new housing units in the West Bank, including 307 units in Har Homa.

The Annapolis Conference was based on the 2003 ROAD MAP peace plan, which required Israel to halt all settlement activity and the Palestinians to rein in militants. Israel's announcement on Har Homa appeared to US officials as a slap in the face. US secretary of state CONDOLEEZZA RICE demanded explanations from her Israeli counterpart, TZIPI LIVNI, about the construction plans for Har Homa. Administration spokespeople normally oppose any moves liable to damage Israeli-Palestinian FINAL STATUS negotiations, namely the settlements. But this time, Rice also expressed fear that the construction in Har Homa would disrupt the Annapolis process. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president MAHMUD ABBAS claimed to be moving toward President Bush's goal of concluding the negotiations and establishing a Palestinian state within a year, although the talks were still on the "back burner."

In December 2007, Rafi Eitan, minister for Jerusalem affairs, told the BBC that Israel had never promised to stop building within Jerusalem and had a duty to house its citizens and, further, that the budget provided for 500 new homes in Har Homa. At the time there were some 2,500 families living in Har Homa, and there were plans for another 4,000.

By the end of 2008, there were approximately 4,000 families, twelve kindergartens, six day care centers, two public grammar schools, three medical clinics, and three shopping centers in Har Homa. There were three bus lines, including two that connect Har Homa to downtown Jerusalem and the central bus station, and another that connects the settlement to the Malha Mall, also known as the Jerusalem Mall (an indoor shopping center), and Ramot Alon (one of the largest settlements in Jerusalem, with about 40,000 residents). Har Homa is considered the newest bastion of religious ZIONISM, with three religious youth groups, two synagogues, many informal daily prayer services, two religious schools, Talmudei Torah, nurseries, and an abundance of Torah classes. In addition, two yeshivot, Har HaMor (which carries on the legacy of RABBI AVRAHAM KOOK) and Mekor Chaim, plan to relocate from Jerusalem and Bet Shemesh, respectively, to Har Homa.

See also JERUSALEM; SETTLEMENTS (B'TSELEM); SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; UNITED STATES

Bibliography

- Agence France Presse. "Israel Approves New Homes in East Jerusalem Settlement." Agence France Presse. 10 July 2008.
- Applied Research Institute. The Har Homa Settlement and the Uprooting of Abu Ghanem Forest. Jerusalem: The Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. 18 March 1997.
- Aronson, Geoffrey. "The Search Continues for a Successor to Oslo Diplomacy." Settlement Report. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace. 7:5. September–October 1997.
- BBC. "Building Work Resumes at Har Homa." BBC. 17 May 1999.
- . "Israel Confirms Settlement Plans: Israel Plans to Build 740 New Homes in Settlements in Occupied East Jerusalem, a Minister Said, Despite Its Commitment to Freeze All Settlement Activity." BBC. 23 December 2007.
- Ben David, Lenny. "The Strategic Significance of Har Homa." The Jerusalem Post. 15 December 2007.
- B'Tselem. Land Expropriation and Settlements. 2007. <http://www.btselem.org/English/Settlements/>.
- . Land Expropriation and Settlements in International Law. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, n.d. http://www.btselem.org/english/Settlements/International\_Law.asp.
- . Population by Year in West Bank Settlements. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2007. http://74.125.47.132/search?q=cache:pB0iU4odS\_EJ:www.btselem.org/English/Settlements/Settlement\_population.xls+Har+Homa&hl=en&ct=clnk&cd=2&gl=us&lr=lang\_en&inlang=en.
- . Route of the Barrier around East Jerusalem. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, n.d. http://www.btselem.org/English/Separation\_Barrier/Jerusalem.asp.
- . Settlement Expansion Plans. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 27 February 2009. http://www.btselem.org/english/settlements/20090227\_settlement\_expansion.asp.
- . Splitting of the Southern West Bank: Map Depicting Har Homa's Role in Isolating the Southern West Bank from the Northern. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, n.d. http://www.btselem.org/Download/South\_West\_Bank\_Fragmentation\_Map\_Eng.pdf.
- . Statistics on Land Expropriation in East Jerusalem. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, n.d. http://www.btselem.org/english/Jerusalem/Land\_Expropriation\_Statistics.asp.
- European Union. EU Heads of Mission Report on East Jerusalem. EUOBSERVER Document. 9 March 2009. euobserver.com.
- Fendel, Hillel. "Jerusalem's Har Homa Waiting for Expansion." IsraelNationalNews.com. 6 March 2009.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. "Netanyahu Decides to Build at Har Homa." Settlement Report. 7:2 (March–April 1997).
- . "Report on Israeli Settlement in the Occupied Territories." The Foundation for Middle East Peace. 7:3 (May–June 1997).
- Greenberg, Joel. "Din of Israel's Bulldozers, and Arab Silence." New York Times. 20 March 1997.
- Ha'aretz*. Editorial. "From Annapolis to Har Homa." Ha'aretz. 12 December 2007.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Land Grab: Israel's Settlement Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Lurie, J. Zel. "Har Homa Back in the News." Jewish Journal of South Florida. 18 (December 2007).
- Parry, Nigel. "Seeing the Mountain for the First Time." Abu Ghanem Diary. 7 March 1997.
- Seidemann, Daniel. State of Affairs—Jerusalem 2008: Political Developments and Changes on the Ground. Jerusalem: Ir Amin, 2008.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Simon, Daniel Ben. "Wall-Eyed at Har Homa." Ha'aretz. 15 February 2002.

Al-Hasan, Bilal (1944–)

Bilal al-Hasan is a former political activist and, since the early 1970s when he eschewed politics, a prominent writer. Born in HAIFA, he was dispossessed with his family in the 1948 WAR and became a REFUGEE in SIDON, LEBANON. After the 1961 breakup of the United Arab Republic, al-Hasan became an activist in the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN) in Damascus and a member of the first command structure of the MAN's Palestine Action Committee (established in September 1964). Beginning in 1965, he was active on the editorial board of the MAN journal al-Hurriyya (Freedom), where he pressed for an early commencement of attacks on Israel and for independent Palestinian action. He joined the politburo of the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP) after it broke away from the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, and in 1969 was the DFLP's first representative to the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE (EC). However, he strongly objected to the DFLP's confrontational stance toward JORDAN in early 1970, and in 1971 he left both the DFLP politburo and the PLO-EC.

Al-Hasan became editor of the PLO journal Shu'un Filastiniyya, through which he became a well-known and respected journalist, and later was an editor at al-Safir in Lebanon. In March 1984, he created Al Youm al Sabia, an Arabic-language newspaper published in Paris, where he currently lives. During the years of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY he managed to place the so-called NATSHE DOCUMENT, critical of Arafat and senior Fatah leaders, in the most popular FATAH chat rooms, creating a major stir in Palestinian politics. He often writes for the London-based daily Al-Hayat, representing the position of the Palestinian left. Bilal al-Hasan is the younger brother of HANI and KHALID AL-HASAN, both founders of Fatah.

Bibliography

Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle within, towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.

Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat: Between Gun and Olive Branch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.

Al-Hasan, Hani (1937–)

Hani al-Hasan (Abu Tariq or Abu-I'-Hasan) was one of the founders of FATAH and played a leading role in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). He was born in HAIFA, Palestine, and, with his once-wealthy family, was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR. He grew up as a REFUGEE in Sidon, LEBANON, and joined the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD in the early 1950s, later becoming involved in resistance politics when he led the General Union of Palestinian Students while studying construction engineering at the University of Darmstadt in West GERMANY. He joined Fatah in 1963 and soon became a leading figure in the movement. By 1967 he had become Fatah's senior figure in Europe and in 1974 was appointed chair of Fatah's political affairs department. He was also a member of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (the PLO parliament). Internationally, al-Hasan became Fatah's main contact with CHINA.

During the 1970s al-Hasan was a deputy in Fatah's intelligence service. From 1974 he was a personal political aide to PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT, becoming a member of the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE in 1980 and the PLO's representative to Amman, JORDAN. In August 1990 al-Hasan was highly critical of Arafat's stand in the GULF WAR and was one of several senior Fatah figures who voiced criticism of the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS, criticism that led to serious dissension within the movement. Although al-Hasan continued to oppose the Oslo Accords even after the establishment of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, he came to the GAZA STRIP in November 1995 and was subsequently chief political advisor to Arafat as well as head of the Palestine National Council's foreign relations committee. He is a brother of BILAL AL-HASAN, a prominent writer, and KHALID AL-HASAN, also a founder of Fatah.

Bibliography

Quandt, William, Fuad Jabber, and Ann Mosely Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.

Said, Edward. The Politics of Dispossession: The Struggle for Palestinian Self-Determination, 1969–1994. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.

Al-Hasan, Khalid Muhammad (1928–1994)

Khalid al-Hasan (Abu Sa'id) was a founding member of FATAH, a leading official in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), and senior advisor to PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT until 1991. In 1948 al-Hasan worked for the British military, who provided him protection in the Sinai for a year. He then joined his once-prosperous HAIFA family, who had been dispossessed and were then REFUGEES in Sidon, LEBANON. In 1950 al-Hasan moved to Damascus, SYRIA, where he worked as a tutor and became involved in Islamist politics, helping to found the Islamic Liberation Party, for which activity he was imprisoned. He moved around the Middle East and Africa for a period before settling in KUWAIT in 1952, where he became a prominent and exceedingly wealthy businessman and developer, and was one of the few Palestinians ever to receive Kuwaiti citizenship.

Within the PLO Khalid al-Hasan was known for his conservative politics. He was generally opposed to the use of military means against Israel and stressed collective leadership and democratic values. His most valuable contribution to the organization, particularly from the perspective of finances, was to build and maintain Fatah's strong links with SAUDI ARABIA from 1969 on. In 1991 he broke with Arafat in opposition to the latter's siding with IRAQ and Saddam Husayn in the GULF WAR, but was nonetheless stripped of his Kuwaiti citizenship. Though a longtime advocate of a negotiated settlement with Israel, he was opposed to the OSLO ACCORDS, because he believed they constituted a violation of internationally recognized Palestinian national rights and could not serve as a basis for a just peace. After the signing at Oslo, al-Hasan moved to Morocco, where he died of cancer. He was brother of HANI AL-HASAN, also a founder of Fatah, and BILAL AL-HASAN, a prominent writer.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestine Liberation Organization. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
 Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.

Hashemite Genealogy from the Hejaz

Husayn Ibn Ali (1852–1931) was king of the Hejaz (western Arabia), sharif and emir of Mecca. The British conducted the HUSAYN-McMAHON CORRESPONDENCE with him. He had five sons, two of whom played important roles in contemporary Arab politics.

1. Abdullah Ibn Husayn al-Hashem (1882–1951). The British appointed him emir of Transjordan in 1920, and he later became king of JORDAN.

King Husayn bin Talal bin Abdullah. The grandson of King Abdullah, he was king of Jordan from 1953 to 1999.

King Abdullah II bin Husayn. Son of King Husayn, he became king of Jordan in 1999.

2. Faysal Ibn Husayn (1885–1933). An Arab nationalist leader, he led the Arab Revolt against the OTTOMANS during World War I, based on his belief that the British had committed to his father in the Husayn-McMahon Correspondence to give all of the Arab world back to the Arabs in exchange for their help in defeating the Ottomans. He was elected by a pan-Arab nationalist congress in 1920 as king of Greater SYRIA but did not take the throne because FRANCE held the mandate for Syria and threatened war if the British did not remove him. Instead the British made him king of IRAQ, a country also created by the British, where he ruled from 1921 until 1933. He was succeeded by his son Ghazi Ibn Faysal and grandson Faysal Ibn Ghazi Ibn Faysal Al Hashim, who ruled Iraq from 1939 until 1958, when a coup by Arab nationalists deposed him.

HaShomer

HaShomer (The Guardians) was an armed Jewish paramilitary organization, mounted on horseback, which operated throughout Palestine during the early years of Zionist colonization. Founded in 1909, it assumed responsibility for the security of Jewish settlements and grew out of smaller, irregular militias, such as the BAR GIORA organization and later the Jaffa Group and the Gideonites. These militias were also the forerunners of the HAGANA, a major Jewish military organization that became the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES. HaShomer organized its operations in a three-tiered hierarchy: a small core of founders (veterans of Bar Giora), a larger circle of active guards, and members of HaShomer and Jewish laborers, who termed themselves a “labor legion,” as reserves. HaShomer members often dressed as Arabs to avoid detection and were known to forcibly evict Palestinian peasants from lands they had cultivated for centuries, which had been sold by ABSENTEE LANDLORDS to Jewish agencies. After the founding of the Hagana, it ceased to operate in 1920.

Bibliography

- Halpern, Ben. The Jewish State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1961.
 Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2000.

Hashomer Hatzair

Hashomer Hatzair (Ha-Shomer Ha-Tza'ir, or the Young Guard) originated as a Zionist youth and scouting organization in Galicia (now in Poland) in 1913. In the 1920s it began sending members to settle in Palestine, where it quickly developed into a prominent left-wing voice within the growing Jewish community. Hashomer Hatzair members were strongly committed to the KIBBUTZ movement, and by 1927 the organization had created its own network of kibbutzim. In 1936 Hashomer Hatzair created a political party, the Socialist League of Palestine, to unite its supporters and organize around its agenda.

By the 1930s Hashomer Hatzair had become increasingly Marxist in outlook, although it remained an integral part of the Zionist movement, committed to continuing Jewish IMMIGRATION and the economic and political development of the Jewish community in Palestine. It was the largest opposition bloc in the HISTADRUT (labor federation), winning some 20 percent of the vote in a 1942 election. Yet it diverged sharply from much of the rest of the Zionist movement due to its Marxist internationalism, which caused it to champion Jewish-Arab worker unity and a BINATIONAL future for Palestine. As early as the mid-1930s Hashomer Hatzair members participated in efforts to organize jointly both Jewish and Palestinian workers, for example in the HAIFA railways. When Arab workers went on strike, Hashomer Hatzair kibbutzim lent support and through meetings and newspaper articles called upon Jewish workers to unite with their Arab brothers to form joint Arab-Jewish trade unions and build political alliances between them.

To systematize and expand this work, in 1940 Hashomer Hatzair established an Arab affairs department and began agitating within the Zionist movement for a concrete policy of outreach to Palestinian communities. Jewish settlements were urged to establish health clinics and sports centers that could be used by nearby Arab villages, and Jewish activists were urged to fight national chauvinism and anti-Arab prejudice.

Hashomer Hatzair made a particular effort to seek out left-wing Arab political figures for discussions and to conduct political and trade union organizing. Leaflets and pamphlets were issued in Arabic, calling on Arab workers to reject ANTI-SEMITISM and to seek allies among progressive forces in the Jewish community. In 1942 Hashomer Hatzair joined the League for Arab-Jewish Rapprochement and Cooperation. Its goal was an international federation of workers that “would lead the socialist revolution in Palestine when the time came.” It supported the idea of a binational state, believing that Palestine was the common homeland of both Jews and Arabs, and worked for the creation of a binational regime, based on political parity that would allow for the unhampered development of both peoples, regardless of their numerical proportion. On the eve of the creation of the state of Israel, Hashomer Hatzair held to its own vision, and after Israel was established it joined with a number of other Zionist groups to form MAPAM, the United Workers’ Party of Israel, and played a leading role in the development of the country’s peace camp. Hashomer Hatzair was the only socialist Zionist party that admitted Arab members on an equal basis and that consistently supported full civil and political rights for Israel’s Arab minority.

Bibliography

- Ben-Sasson, H. H. A History of the Jewish People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1976.
- Buber, Martin, Judah Magnes, and E. Simon. Towards Union in Palestine, reprinted ed. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1972.
- Cohen, Aharon. Israel and the Arab World, Boston: Beacon Press, 1970.
- Goren, A. A. Dissenter in Zion: From the Writings of Judah L. Magnes. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.
- Lockman, Zachary. Comrades and Enemies: Arab and Jewish Workers in Palestine, 1906–1948. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Margalit, E. “Social and Intellectual Origins of the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement, 1913–1920.” In Essential Papers on Jews and the Left. Edited by Evert Mendelsohn. New York: New York University Press, 1969.
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul R. A Land of Two Peoples: Martin Buber on Jews and Arabs. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Merhav, Peter. The Israeli Left: History, Problems, Documents. New York: A. S. Barnes and Co., 1980.
- Saba, Paul, and Dawn Belkin Martinez. “Jewish Efforts at Jewish-Arab Cooperation in Palestine before the Creation of the State of Israel.” Visions of Peace with Justice in Israel/Palestine: For Justice and Equality, 27 April 2002.

Haskalah

Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment) was a movement for the dissemination of modern European culture among Jews. It began in Berlin around 1750 with the work of Moses Mendelssohn. Advocates of Haskalah believed that to achieve emancipation Jews had to accept the cultural values of the eighteenth-century European Enlightenment and liberal humanism. The maskilim (followers of Haskalah) employed a secularized Hebrew as their literary vehicle. Over time, with the publication of journals, books, and newspapers, there emerged a group of highly secularized Jews, influenced by the prevailing social and political ideas of the Enlightenment yet still retaining their historical traditions through Hebrew. The sons and grandsons of the early maskilim became the first leaders of the Zionist movement.

Bibliography

Brann, Ross, and Adam Sutcliffe, eds. Renewing the Past, Reconfiguring Jewish Culture: From Al-Andalus to the Haskalah. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Feiner, Shmuel. Haskalah and History: The Emergence of a Modern Jewish Historical Consciousness. Oxford, UK: Littman Library of Jewish Studies, 2004.

Hasmonean Tunnel

The Hasmonean tunnel is an archaeological site running under the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, a Muslim holy site in JERUSALEM, which was opened by Israeli prime minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU in September 1996, three years into the OSLO PROCESS. The opening was symbolic of Israeli sovereignty over all of Jerusalem.

The tunnel is an aqueduct that is believed to date back to the Hasmonean kings in the second century BCE, about 100 years before King Herod. It is a rock-cut channel of approximately 525 yards (480 meters) and runs in a north-south direction along and under one wall of the AL-AQSA MOSQUE. One gate emerges at the WESTERN WALL directly below the DOME OF THE ROCK, the other at a cistern located below Islamic Waqf property.

Netanyahu's action occurred during intense Palestinian frustration with the peace process, when the prime minister had made clear his opposition to Oslo and had refused to move negotiations forward. Moreover, while Palestinians perceived the tunnel as a threat to the physical stability of the al-Haram ash-Sharif, they also viewed it as another unilateral Israeli action to assert its sovereignty over all of Jerusalem and further preempt FINAL STATUS TALKS on the city.

Palestinian outrage erupted in protests that spread throughout the entire WEST BANK and GAZA. In three days Israeli soldiers killed eighty Palestinian civilian demonstrators and injured some 1,500. Watching the carnage, Palestinian policemen turned their guns on the soldiers, killing fifteen and wounding dozens. Security cooperation between Israel and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY appeared shattered, and the peace process seemed to be at an end. However, the tensions brought US diplomatic intervention with pressure on both sides to resume negotiations, which led to the HEBRON PROTOCOL in 1997. Nevertheless, the Hasmonean tunnel affair, combined with the HAR HOMA SETTLEMENT five months later, marked the beginning of the end of the Oslo Process.

Bibliography

Baron, Virginia. "After the Bulldozers, the Rebuilding." NonViolent Activist. July–August 1997. <http://www.warresisters.org/nva/nva0797-2.htm>.

Dumper, Michael. The Politics of Sacred Space: The Old City of Jerusalem in the Middle East Conflict. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2002.

Fletcher, Elaine Ruth. "Tunnel to Past Is Also Path to War: Palestinians Take Israel's Claim to Walkway as Affront." San Francisco Chronicle. 27 September 1996.

Hancock, Landon E. and Joshua N. Weiss. "The Conflict Within: The Interpersonal Conflict between Netanyahu and Arafat." Online Journal of Peace and Conflict Resolution. 22 May 1999.

Jerusalem Post. "PA Asks Security Council to Meet: King Hussein Slams Hasmonean Tunnel." Jerusalem Post. 26 September 1996.

Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Shragi, Nadav. "The Latest Damage to Antiquities on the Temple Mount." Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. 7:32 (27 February 2008).

HaTenu'ah LeChinun HaMikdash

See THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Hawatimah, Nayif (1937–)

Nayif Hawatimah (Abu An-Nuf) is the founder and secretary-general of the Marxist DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP). He was active as a left-wing leader in the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN) and was a founding member of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), which he left to form the DFLP in 1969. Born in Salt, JORDAN, Hawatimah joined MAN at the age of sixteen and was appointed the overall leader of the organization after the overthrow of the Sulayman Nabulsi government in 1957 when he was only nineteen. After Jordanian military courts handed him several death sentences for his attempts to overthrow the government, he fled to LEBANON, where he joined the leftist and Arab nationalist coalition in 1958. After the end of the first civil war in Lebanon, Hawatimah went to IRAQ, where he organized Arab nationalists, for which he was arrested and spent fourteen months in jail.

Hawatimah formed a leftist, Marxist-oriented faction within MAN and, in that capacity, clashed with GEORGE HABASH, who was associated with the rightist faction. In addition to their political differences, Hawatimah was always frustrated because Habash could move an audience, both inside the ranks of the movement and at mass rallies. Hawatimah viewed himself as an intellectual and did not respect those who used their oratorical skills to influence mass opinion. It was ironic that this man, with less formal education than Habash, a physician, and Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT, an engineer, had greater success in mobilizing intellectuals from Lebanon and Palestine.

When Hawatimah split from the PFLP in 1969, he initially used the name Democratic Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (eventually the DFLP), thus claiming that his movement, not Habash's organization, adhered to democratic principles. Hawatimah's understanding of democracy, however, stemmed from his appreciation of Lenin's "democratic centralism." Under pressure from Habash, he dropped the word "popular" from the name of the organization to avoid confusion. The DFLP succeeded in attracting intellectuals from around the Arab world, in large part because of Hawatimah's clarity and consistency of ideology. Hawatimah not only preached a Marxist-Leninist line, but also was one of the first Palestinian leaders to advocate for and engage in dialogue with progressive Jewish forces inside and outside Israel. The DFLP also used ARMED STRUGGLE, although it could not compete militarily with the much stronger FATAH and PFLP at the time.

In the BLACK SEPTEMBER war between Jordan and Palestinian fighters, the DFLP was often blamed by the Jordanian government and even by Fatah leaders for "provocative" actions and slogans. Hawatimah coined the slogan "All power to the Resistance," which was aimed at wresting control of Jordan from the Hashemite royal family. Hawatimah and the DFLP leadership relocated from Amman and Damascus to Beirut, where the group joined the Lebanese civil war. He was very close to the Lebanese Communist Party, but his closest ties were with the Communist Action Organization.

In the early 1970s Hawatimah established strong relations with Arafat and supported his political compromises: a TWO-STATE SOLUTION and no armed struggle outside of Palestine. Hawatimah was one of the first leaders to argue for an acceptance of the "phased solution"—a reference to the two-state solution. Hawatimah attracted some Western leftist and press interest but could not compete with Fatah or PFLP in attracting followers in the Palestinian REFUGEE camps because he was too intellectual, too cerebral, for popular appeal.

After the OSLO ACCORDS Hawatimah could not decide whether he supported or opposed Oslo. He decided to stay in Damascus and oppose Oslo, although he dispatched some DFLP leaders to Ramallah in the West Bank. Some of them split from his organization, including his deputy, YASIR 'ABD RABBU, who had been an Arafat confidant for years and was persuaded by Arafat to become the leader of the DFLP. In 1999 Hawatimah attracted strong criticism from his Palestinian and Arab peers when he shook hands with Israeli president EZER WEIZMAN at the funeral of Jordan's King Husayn in February 1999. In 2004 he was briefly active in a joint Palestinian-Israeli nongovernmental attempt to start a coalition of Palestinian groups supporting a two-state solution, and during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA he called for a cessation of hostilities. Hawatimah's influence in Palestinian politics is now minimal.

Bibliography

- Quandt, William, Fuad Jabber, and Ann Mosely Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Said, Edward. The Politics of Dispossession: The Struggle for Palestinian Self-Determination, 1969–1994. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

—As'ad AbuKhalil

Haycraft Commission, 1921

The Haycraft Commission was appointed by the British to investigate the 1921 disturbances between Palestinian Arabs and Jews that began in JAFFA after a Zionist Labor Day march and then spread beyond the city. In all, forty-seven Jews and forty-eight Palestinians were killed. To calm the atmosphere following the upheaval, Sir HERBERT SAMUEL created the investigatory commission of inquiry. Although the commission found the Palestinians responsible for the outbreak of violence, it claimed that the root cause of the trouble was Arab anxiety about British pro-Zionist commitments and Palestinian fear of the political and economic consequences of Zionist IMMIGRATION into Palestine. In particular, the Haycraft Commission noted, Palestinians were concerned about unemployment and the potential for Jewish domination of Palestine.

See also BRITISH MANDATE

Bibliography

- Halbrook, Stephen P. "The Alienation of a Homeland: How Palestine Became Israel." The Journal of Libertarian Studies. 5:4 (1981).
- McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1922. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.

Hazit Hamoledeth

Hazit Hamoledeth (Fatherland Front) was either an offshoot of or an alternate name for LOHAMEI HERUT YISRAEL (fighters for the freedom of Israel, or LEHI), which took credit for the 17 September 1948 assassination of COUNT FOLKE BERNADOTTE, the UN special mediator for Palestine. Because this was the only time the Fatherland Front appeared, most analysts believe that LEHI, at the time headed by YITZHAK SHAMIR, the eventual prime minister of Israel, was actually responsible for the slaying of Bernadotte.

Health Care

Health care and the health-care systems of Israel and Palestine are as much an aspect of the conflict as are LAND, WATER, or SETTLEMENTS. Moreover, issues of health are intertwined with numerous other aspects of the conflict, such as RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, CLOSURE, siege, the PERMIT system, and so on. Richard Horton, editor-in-chief of the eminent British medical journal The Lancet, observes that "the pursuit of health as a political objective and the creation of a strong health system for Palestinians could be one fruitful diplomatic path to reconciliation, peace, and justice." Moreover he argues, "The people of the Palestinian territory matter, most importantly, because their lives and communities are continuing to experience an OCCUPATION that has produced chronic de-development for nearly four million people over many decades, . . . because of the continued conflict with Israel, the failure of the peace process to make any substantial progress, and the internally catastrophic and violent divisions within Palestinian politics." Analysis of health care in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES (OT) exposes several important Palestinian particularities, not least, occupation, coercion, violence, and insecurity.

Health and the Occupation (1967–1994)

Israel has one of the most sophisticated and highly technologized medical systems in the world. In the Occupied Territories, by contrast, the medical system is akin to that of a third-world country. During the 27 years of formal Occupation (1967–1994), Israel invested little in Palestinian health care or in any other INFRASTRUCTURE development, despite the fact that Palestinians paid heavy taxes to Israel, supposedly for social services, throughout that time. Under Israeli law, Palestinians were required to pay 55 percent on all income over 24,000 Israeli shekels (about $16,000 in 1988 currency). The highest tax bracket in Israel was not reached until the individual earned 45,000 shekels ($30,000), and then the tax assessment was only 48 percent. Another demonstration of this discrimination is governmental expenditure per capita on health care: in 1992, for example, Tel Aviv spent $500 per capita in Israel and on the settlers in the Occupied Territories, compared to per capita expenditure of $18–20 on Palestinians in the OT.

Health conditions in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP improved in a number of areas after 1967. Israel facilitated a comprehensive immunization program for Palestinian infants, provided training seminars in Israeli medical centers for Palestinian doctors, and certain medical facilities were expanded. Yet, although the infant mortality rate was reduced from approximately 100 per 1,000 to 38 per 1,000, it was still much higher than Israel's 9.9 per 1,000. Life expectancy rose in the territories by about 10 years, but the average Israeli lives 14 years longer than his Palestinian cousin.

Civil Administration (military government) hospitals provided 1,477 beds in 1992, roughly equal to the number of beds available 25 years earlier, although the population had more than doubled. The ratio of hospital beds was 1.1 per 1,000 in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, and 6.1 per 1,000 in Israel.

Israel's unwillingness to develop the Palestinian health institutions is in violation of a number of international conventions. Most notable is the Fourth Geneva Convention (1949), which stipulates that the adequacy of health-care services must be determined by the extent to which the real medical needs of a population are being met. Article 56 states that the occupying power "has the duty of ensuring and maintaining the medical and hospital establishments and services, public health and hygiene in occupied territories."

Health and the Oslo Accords

In 1994, under the Oslo Accords, Israel transferred responsibility for health in the OT to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). But the PNA inherited from Israel a health system that was decentralized, highly dependent on services provided by private nongovernmental organizations, and structurally incapable of meeting the health needs of the Palestinian population.

Moreover, despite the transfer to the PNA of responsibility for Palestinian health care, the PNA had but limited autonomy over disconnected areas in the West Bank and Gaza, and these areas remain, effectively, under Israel's control. Since November 2001, Israel's control has been explicit and absolute—even in Gaza after ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT in 2005. Therefore, these areas are still Occupied Territories, and Israel, according to INTERNATIONAL LAW, unequivocally remains responsible for health services therein.

The extensive Palestinian dependence on Israel for medical care was not addressed in any of the agreements of the OSLO PROCESS except briefly and inadequately in the INTERIM AGREEMENT. Some have argued that Palestinian negotiators should have taken into account the Palestinian dependence upon Israeli medical services and ensured the referral of patients who cannot be treated in Palestinian hospitals to Israeli medical institutions that can treat them, and that the negotiators should have laid the grounds for Israeli and Palestinian cooperation in the development of an independent Palestinian medical infrastructure. Power asymmetries and Israel's interests are not realistically considered in such an assertion.

In the October 1995 Interim Agreement, in the article dealing with health, it is stipulated that Palestinians will assume responsibility for the vaccination of the population, that Palestinians will also cover the cost of all treatment of Palestinian patients in Israeli medical institutions, and that Israel will ensure "SAFE PASSAGE" of patients in and out of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The two sides concluded by agreeing that a joint committee should be established to facilitate coordination and cooperation on health and medical issues. Only three pages, out of the 400-page agreement, were dedicated to the health of the population; moreover, the infrastructure of the health system was not mentioned. Nothing came of the joint committee, and Israel refused to implement the safe passage.

The deficiencies in the system that the PNA inherited were reflected, in one instance, in June 1995, a year after the transfer of the health institutions to the PNA, when 15 children from Gaza were dying from heart defects. Physicians for Human Rights-Israel (PHR-I) wrote: "Surgery can save their lives, but nowhere in the Gaza Strip is there a single pediatric cardiologist capable of handling these cases; nor is there a scanner or catheterization room. The only echocardiology machine available is outdated to the extent that it has not been used in Israel for over 20 years. An operation that can save these children's lives costs $12,000 in Israel. The cost of a similar operation in Cairo is $3,000, but even this sum is too great for the Palestinian Ministry of Health to meet." How, the physicians asked, "did Gaza reach a state in which only five out of the 300 infants born annually with heart defects are operated on?"

In mid-February 1996, Amira Hass, Ha'aretz correspondent, reported that out of children under the age of five who were living in the Gaza Strip, an estimated 188,000 were in need of urgent treatment for malnutrition. She discussed a survey taken in 1995, which revealed that 41.6 percent of the families living in the Gaza Strip had to sell appliances to buy food, 53.8 percent took out loans to buy food, and only 5 percent of the population had savings accounts. In April 1996 Gideon Levy reported in Ha'aretz that during March and the first weeks of April, at least nine patients died due to closure, five of them children.

Severe lack of expertise and equipment extends to other medical fields, such as oncology and hematology, pediatric neurology and neurosurgery, metabolic diseases, and rehabilitation. Children or adults suffering from a disorder related to one of these specialties must be transferred to hospitals outside of the West Bank and Gaza Strip to receive adequate medical care. The dilapidated condition of the pediatric institutions is an indication of the overall infrastructure of the Palestinian health institution, and underscores the life-or-death Palestinian dependency on Israeli medicine.

Israeli Obstacles to Palestinian Health (1994–2009)

In addition to eluding its responsibility to provide comprehensive health services to residents of the Occupied Territories, Israel has placed obstacles to the development of a Palestinian-run health-care system. The most significant barrier limiting Palestinians' ability to receive health services has been the restriction of movement within the West Bank and Gaza Strip, between the West Bank and Gaza, travel to other countries, and the prohibition on entering East Jerusalem or Israel.

All medical systems presuppose that patients, doctors, and emergency rescue teams have a guaranteed right of freedom of movement. As early as 1994, PHR-I proposed that "permission to enter Israel should be granted to patients on the basis of a recommendation by the Palestinian Ministry of Health, without need of a permit of any sort from the Israeli authorities, including the General Security Service." But Israel chose not to implement PHR-I's recommendation. PHR-I also wrote that "Israel should supply permits to allow the regular passage of West Bank and Gaza Strip residents who are members of the medical staff working in medical institutions in East Jerusalem." This proposal took into consideration that the largest and most modern Palestinian medical institutions are located in East Jerusalem, including Makassed, Augusta Victoria, and St. John's hospitals. Some 60 percent of the employees of these institutions (1,000 individuals including physicians), which provide medical attention for the population of the West Bank and Gaza Strip (when they are permitted to enter East Jerusalem), are not residents of the city and need entry permits in order to reach the hospital. No policy was ever established to ensure the free movement of medical personnel at all times, and it is still common for the operation of these hospitals to be hindered due to restriction of movement of the staff.

Due to the restrictions, it is almost impossible for physicians and staff to get to in-service training or students to the university, and many students are unable to either complete their studies or receive a higher quality of professional training. Every professional training, medical specialization, or travel for educational purposes is contingent on obtaining a permit. These permits are granted in such an arbitrary manner that intended travel is always in doubt. For example, hundreds of students in Gaza cannot travel to the West Bank or abroad to continue their education due to age-related travel restriction.

Closure was first imposed in the West Bank and Gaza in March 1993 and was repeatedly imposed during the Oslo years (1994–2000) for varying periods of time. During closures, no one, including chronically ill patients who regularly came to Israel for treatment or emergency patients who required catastrophic intervention, could leave the OT to enter Israel. Closures, however, were not the only Israeli practice that restricted Palestinians' freedom of movement and their ability to secure health care.

Throughout the Oslo period and even more harshly after 2000, the hundreds of physical obstructions and dozens of CHECKPOINTS resulted in very limited access to medical treatment, and sometimes none at all. The problem is especially grave among residents of villages and outlying areas who need to get to hospitals in the large cities. For example, persons living in villages around Jerusalem who need to get to hospitals in East Jerusalem for treatment require a permit in order to reach their destination. To obtain a permit, patients have to provide medical documents testifying to their illness, as well as confirmation that they have an appointment at the specific hospital and that it is the only facility where the needed treatment is available.

Cities within the Occupied Territories experience the same phenomena as East Jerusalem: Hospitals in Ramallah, NABLUS, and HEBRON cannot receive patients from nearby villages because of the impediments to movement and the permit regime. Since 1996 the way to the hospital is often blocked, so the sick and injured have to travel on long, winding, and worn roads. These alternate roads often lead to a checkpoint, where they are forced to wait and undergo lengthy interrogations and searches of their personal effects. In other cases, when checkpoints are closed at night and whole Palestinian communities are blocked from entering or leaving by vehicle, including by ambulance, access to medical treatment is prevented, and ill and wounded persons are unable to receive emergency medical care at all. In 2007, there was an increase in the number of persons needing medical treatment who were delayed at checkpoints, and B'Tselem documented five cases in which ill or wounded persons died after being delayed at a checkpoint.

The need for a permit is especially problematic in emergency situations and for pregnant women, who need to get to the hospital in time to give birth. Even though the delivery date is uncertain, the permit given to women about to deliver is valid for only one or two days, as is the case for most sick persons. Therefore, women in their ninth month of pregnancy must go to the Occupation authorities every few days to renew the permit. In 2007, at least five women gave birth at a checkpoint, three of them at a checkpoint at the entrance to Jerusalem.

With the eruption of conflict in late September 2000, restrictions on movement worsened: closure was followed by a policy of internal separation and siege. According to B'Tselem, by November 2003, the IDF had set up 56 staffed checkpoints in the West Bank, as well as 607 physical ROADBLOCKS that prevent the passage of motor vehicles—457 dirt piles, 94 concrete blocks, and 56 trenches. In addition, Palestinians are forbidden to travel on most of the main roads in the West Bank.

Medical personnel also frequently experience difficulties in crossing checkpoints. The IDF does not have special procedures for ambulances to cross checkpoints, but have issued only a general procedure relating to Palestinians who seek to cross. The procedures do not provide a proper solution for the severe problems ambulances have in reaching hospitals; in addition, soldiers at times ignore the procedures. Ambulance medical teams are often detained and harassed by the security force personnel stationed at the checkpoints, and in some cases have been beaten. In a few extreme cases, Israeli soldiers damaged ambulances beyond repair, and in others they have seized ambulances for military purposes.

As a result of these difficulties, ambulances are able to reach the sick and wounded only 30 percent of the time they are called. The rest of the time, patients are forced to get to a physical roadblock or checkpoint by themselves. As a consequence, many Palestinians forgo calling ambulances. This phenomenon is demonstrated by the drastic drop in Palestinian women who give birth in a hospital. The rate of hospital births has dropped from 95 percent before the Intifada to less than 50 percent after.

The PNA and Health Care

The Palestinian Ministry of Health (PMH) was established after the Oslo Accords in 1994 and, as has been illustrated, inherited from the Israeli military government health services that had been severely neglected. Supported by massive funding from international donors, the ministry has since upgraded and expanded the health system infrastructure by institution building and human resource development. The number of hospitals, hospital beds, and primary health-care centers in the West Bank and Gaza increased, a public health laboratory was established, and a health information system and a planning unit were set up. Planning for the development of the health sector began during this period and entailed some coordination with the UN RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY (UNRWA), local nongovernmental organizations, and the private medical sector in developing policies and protocols.

By 2006, the number of hospital beds managed by the PMH had increased by 53 percent from 1994, with a similar increase in the number of available hospital beds in nongovernmental organizations and private sectors. In 2006 the PMH managed 57 percent of all hospital beds in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Also, the number of primary health-care facilities increased between 2000 and 2005, with 416 of 654 centers managed by the PMH. Similarly, the UNRWA facilities have increased in number, although not those of nongovernmental organizations.

Also by 2006, about 40,000 people were employed in different sectors of the health system, with 33 percent employed by the PMH. Health-related human resources in Palestinian institutions of higher learning also grew. Although a shortage of health personnel exists in many specialties (especially in family medicine, surgery, internal medicine, neurology, dermatology, psychiatry, pathology, anesthesiology, nephrology, nursing, and midwifery), there is an excess in others (such as dentistry, pharmacy, laboratory technology, and radiology technology), suggesting the need for rationalization of the educational programs of Palestinian institutions of higher learning.

All four main health service providers (the PMH, the UNRWA, nongovernmental organizations, and the private medical sector) contributed to all areas of health care. However, because of various factors, including little health service development under the Israeli military Occupation between 1967 and 1994, and poor governance and mismanagement by the PNA, current services have been unable to provide adequately for people's needs, especially in tertiary health care. Therefore, the PMH continues to refer patients elsewhere (Israel, Egypt, and Jordan), leading to a substantial drain of health resources.

Yet, despite this progress in conventional indicators of health system functionality (e.g., number of patients who use services, number of hospital beds, number of primary health-care facilities), there is a serious underlying issue that is masked by the foregoing—the very poor quality of health care available in the Occupied Territories. Several types of health services fail to meet basic standards for training, equipment, and overall quality. For example, in all of the OT, no proper treatment is available for cancer—there are no radiation treatments, no treatments for eye tumors of all types, and no operations to remove cervical cancers. Pediatric hematology treatments are of such a poor standard that they can effectively be considered nonexistent; the same is the case for other oncology services. Additional fields that are unavailable include services in the field of cardiology and chest surgery. Pediatric heart operations and catheterization are not performed, nor are services available in the field of pacemakers and open heart surgery for children. In the field of transplants, no types of transplants are performed in the OT. There are no bone marrow transplants or isolation rooms suitable for such patients. In the field of orthopedics, there are no bone transplants or hip replacements. Procedures to rectify urological defects in children are among the other services that are lacking.

In March 2009 the World Health Organization (WHO) released a report on health in the Occupied Territories indicating, among many other problems, the following: infant mortality rates have risen sharply; mental disorders are up by a third and little treatment is available; treatment for heart disease and cancer is largely unavailable; tuberculosis in the West Bank and Gaza rose by more than half between 1999 and 2003; between 10 and 30 percent of Palestinian children suffer a detriment to their cognitive development and physical health from malnutrition; the trend of stunted growth among children is increasing, reaching 30 percent in some areas, and the WHO is concerned about the long-term effects of chronic malnutrition; there is a low level of postnatal care; and despite the availability of child immunizations, children are not receiving them.

Over the eight years it effectively functioned, the PNA made a great effort to establish a system capable of functioning under frequent changes and a state of combat. At the same time, as Israel divided the Occupied Territories with checkpoints, walls, and barriers; imposed protracted closures on the main cities that provided secondary and tertiary health services; and obliged the PNA to duplicate vital services in numerous smaller medical centers, the quality of health care remained stagnant. Moreover, the deterioration in the economic condition of the population (from 1995 to 2000) led to a growing dependence on primary medical services, requiring extensive budgetary investments in this field, at the expense of the development of medical infrastructure and of secondary and tertiary services. Conversely, economic deprivation led to falling income from taxes, including the health tax and medical insurance—one of the important sources of funding for the health system and basic to any Western medical system.

According to Rita Giacaman, Rana Khatib, and associates, there are three fundamental factors undermining the quality of Palestinian health care. First, despite substantial funding and efforts made by the Palestinian Ministry of Health to build a Palestinian health system, the obstacles to planned development have proved too great. Restrictions placed by Israel since 1994 on the movement of Palestinian goods and labor across borders between the West Bank and Gaza, and within the West Bank, have had damaging effects not only on the economy and society, but also on the attempts of the PNA at system building. The physical separation and complicated system of permits required to go from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank resulted in the emergence of two PNA ministries of health, one in the Gaza Strip and the other in the West Bank. Since 2007, this separation has been further compounded by the political divide between FATAH and HAMAS.

Second, the absence of any control by the PNA over water, land, the ENVIRONMENT, and movement within the Occupied Palestinian territory has made a public health approach to health system development difficult, if not impossible. These issues have been exacerbated by the dysfunctional political and institutional systems of the PNA; the damaging effects on ministries of using the Authority's resources for patronage to secure loyalty; marginalization of the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL; and corruption and cronyism, all of which led to a rapid increase in the number of health service employees of the PNA without improvement in the quality of health services. These factors have adversely affected an already fragile health service.

Third, the multiplicity of donors with different agendas and the dependence of the PNA on donor financial assistance have also caused program fragmentation. Most of the Occupied Palestinian territory health budget is financed by donor agencies. The PNA is estimated to have received $840.5 million in aid between 1994 and 2000. Donors have an influential role in determining the policy of the PNA. The American Rand Corporation has indicated that donors prefer to support infrastructure—mostly equipment and construction—over the operating expenses of the PNA health sector, which have increased as a result of expanded infrastructure and the introduction of modern equipment.

All these interacting factors have contributed to undermine the ability of Palestinians to build a health system from existing health services. In addition to the need for control over resources for health care, building an effective health system requires sovereignty, self-determination, authority, and control over land, water, the environment, and movement of people and goods, all of which are relevant for the protection and promotion of health. The international community has not appreciated the degree to which the PNA is “less than a state, yet expected to act like a state.”

See also CLOSURE; ENVIRONMENTAL DEGRADATION; INFRASTRUCTURE; LAND; PERMITS; RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT; WATER RESOURCES AND ACCESS

Bibliography

- Abdul Rahim, F. Hanan, Laura Wick, Samia Halileh, Sahar Hassan-Bitar, Hafedh Chekir, Graham Watt, and Marwan Khawaja. “Maternal and Child Health in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.” The Lancet. 373:9666 (4 March 2009).
- Abu-Mourad T., et al. “Individual Determinants of Primary Healthcare Utilisation in Gaza Strip, Palestine.” Journal of Epidemiologic Community Health. (2008).
- Barghuthi, Mustafa. Palestinian Health: Toward a Healthy Development Strategy in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Jerusalem: Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees, 1993.
- Barghuthi, Mustafa, and Ibrahim Daibes. Infrastructure and Health Services in the West Bank: Guidelines for Health-Care Planning. Ramallah: The Health Development Information Project, in Cooperation with the World Health Organization, 1993.
- Baxendale, Sidney J. “Israeli Taxes Discriminate against Arabs.” Christian Science Monitor. 19 October 1988.
- Becker, Andrea, Katherine al-Ju'beh, and Graham Watt. “Keys to Health: Justice, Sovereignty, and Self-Determination.” The Lancet. 373:9666 (4 March 2009).
- B'Tselem. Impeding Medical Treatment and Firing at Ambulances by IDF Soldiers in the Occupied Territories. 2002. http://www.btselem.org/Download/200203\_Medical\_Treatment\_Eng.rtf.
- . Infringement of the Right to Medical Treatment in the West Bank. Jerusalem: Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, 2002. http://www.btselem.org/English/Medical\_Treatment/Index.asp.
- Dhaher E., R. T. Mikolajczyk, A. E. Maxwell, and A. Kräme. “Factors Associated with Lack of Postnatal Care among Palestinian Women: A Cross-Sectional Study of Three Clinics in the West Bank.” BioMed-Central: Pregnancy Childbirth. 8:26 (2008).
- Dudai, Ron. No Way Out: Medical Implications of Israel's Siege Policy. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- Dugard, John. Human Rights Situation in Palestine and Other Occupied Arab Territories: Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories Occupied since 1967. Geneva: United Nations Information System on the Question of Palestine, 2006. <http://domino.un.org/UNISPAL.NSF/22f431edb91c6f548525678a0051be1d/f71be9fae0abbe1c852573ec006dde2e!OpenDocument>.
- File, Dani. Circles of Exclusion: The Politics of Health Care in Israel. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2008.
- Giacaman, Rita, et al. “Health Status and Health Services in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.” The Lancet. 373:9666 (7 March 2009).
- Giacaman, Rita, Hanan F. Abdul-Rahim, and Laura Wick. “Health Sector Reform in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT): Targeting the Forest or the Trees?” Health Policy Plan (UK). 18:1 (March 2003).
- Gordon, Neve. “Palestinian Health Care: Neglect and Crisis.” The Palestine-Israel Journal of Politics Education and Culture. 4:2 (1997).
- . “Scars of Repression.” Peace Review. 9:2 (June 1997).
- Hass, Amira. Drinking the Sea at Gaza: Days and Nights in a Land under Siege. New York: Metropolitan Books/Henry Holt, 2006.
- Horton, Richard, ed. Health in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. The Lancet. 373:9666 (4 March 2009).
- . “The Occupied Palestinian Territory: Peace, Justice, and Health.” The Lancet. 373:9666 (7 March 2009).

- . “Palestinians: The Crisis in Medical Care.” New York Review of Books. 15 March 2007.
- House of Commons International Development Committee. Development Assistance and the Occupied Palestinian Territories, vols. I and II. London: House of Commons, 2007. <http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm200607/cmselect/cmintdev/114/114i.pdf>; <http://www.flwi.ugent.be/cie/documenten/114ii.pdf>.
- Husseini, Abdullatif, et al. “Cardiovascular Diseases, Diabetes Mellitus, and Cancer in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.” The Lancet. 373:9668 (21 March 2009).
- Kanaanah, Hatim. A Doctor in Galilee: The Life and Struggle of a Palestinian in Israel. New York: Macmillan/Pluto Press, 2008.
- Levy, Gideon. “Twilight Zone: Birth and Death at the Checkpoint.” Ha'aretz. 12 September 2003.
- Mash'al, Jihad. “The Palestinian Health System—Medical Health Characteristics, Medical Insurance, and Medical Initiatives in the Palestinian Authority.” The Palestinian Health System. Zichron Ya'akov, Israel: The Ford Foundation, 2003.
- Mataria, Awad, et al. “The [Palestinian] Health-Care System: An Assessment and Reform Agenda.” The Lancet. 373:9670 (4 April 2009).
- Mazali, Rela, Nogah Ofer, and Neve Gordon. Annual Report—1992: Focus on the Occupied Territories' Health-Care System. Tel Aviv: Physicians for Human Rights, 1993.
- Palestinian Medical Relief Society. The Occupation's Impact on Health Care. Ramallah, West Bank: Palestinian Medical Relief Society, 2006. <http://www.pmps.ps/last/etemplate.php?id=127>.
- Physicians for Human Rights—Israel (PHR-I). Emergency Gaza Update. Tel Aviv: Physicians for Human Rights—Israel, January 2009.
- . Five New MRI Machines Will Be Added [Israel]; Priority Will Be Given to Peripheral Areas. Tel Aviv: Physicians for Human Rights—Israel, November 2008.
- PHR-I, The Palestinian Center for Human Rights, Gisha—Legal Center for Freedom of Movement, and B'Tselem. Protest Violations of the Rights of Palestinian Patients. March 2009.
- Rabaia, Yoke, et al. “Health as Human Security in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.” The Lancet. 373:9669 (28 March 2009).
- Roy, Sara. “The Gaza Strip: Critical Effects of the Occupation.” Arab Studies Quarterly. 10:1 (Winter 1988).
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. Palestinian Women: Patriarchy and Resistance in the West Bank. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2001.
- . “Twenty Years of Israeli Economic Policies in the West Bank and Gaza: Prologue to the Intifada.” Journal of Arab Affairs. 8:1 (1989).
- Sabatinelli, Guido, Stefania Pace-Shanklin, Flavia Riccardo, and Yousef Shahin. “Palestinian Refugees outside the Occupied Palestinian Territory.” The Lancet. 373:9669 (28 March 2009).
- Swisa, Shlomi. Harm to Medical Personnel: The Delay, Abuse and Humiliation of Medical Personnel by the Israeli Security Forces. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2003.
- United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. Health Conditions and Services in the West Bank and Gaza Strip—UNCTAD Study. Geneva: United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, 28 September 1994. UNCTAD/ECDC/SEU/3.
- Waterson, Tony, et al. “Teaching Child Health in the Occupied Palestinian Territory.” The Lancet. 373:9667 (14 March 2009).
- Watkins, Kevin. The Oxfam Poverty Report. UK: Oxfam Publishing, 1995.
- WHO. Gaps in Palestinian Health Care. March 2009.
- . Health Conditions in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, Including East Jerusalem, and in the Occupied Syrian Golan: Progress Report. 22 May 2006. http://www.who.int/gb/ebwha/pdf\_files/WHA59/A59\_ID4-en.pdf.
- . The Impact of the Conflict on Daily Life: Medical Treatment Abroad for Gaza Residents: Closures and Access. 31 January 2005.
- . WHO Statement by the Director-General on the Health Situation in Gaza. Geneva: World Health Organization, 2008. <http://www.who.int/mediacentre/news/statements/2008/s01/en/index.html>.
- . WHO Warns of Rise in Deaths, Human Suffering in Gaza. 2008. <http://www.who.int/mediacentre/news/statements/2008/s15/en/index.html>.
- World Bank. Developing the Occupied Territories: An Investment in Peace. Washington, DC: World Bank, 1993.

Hebrew Literature

The new Hebrew literature can be said to have begun as the cultural response of European Judaism to modernity. According to this view, starting from the late eighteenth century, European thinkers found in Jews an otherness that helped define the modern European self, as formulated by the famous question “What is enlightenment?” In this intellectual climate Jews and Judaism became a problem, a question, and the subject of numerous works designed to define the problem and prescribe a solution.

Jewish Enlightenment (HASKALAH) produced modern Hebrew letters as a form of cultural sovereignty whose writers often assumed a position typical of the modern Jewish polity. This is evident in the figure of the writer as “Hazofe Lebeit Yisrael” (Watchman unto the House of Israel), the Hebrew persona in Yizhak Erter’s eponymous seminal satires published after 1824. The perspective of modern Hebrew letters, like that of ZIONISM, is quintessentially European and therefore concerned above all with issues of identity, subjectivity, social reform, and the place of Jews in colonial Europe. It is therefore to be expected that the Arabs, and especially the Palestinians, are viewed in modern Hebrew literature from a European and increasingly orientalist perspective. Turning his gaze to the old/new land, the Watchman of Israel is aware of the presence of Arabs but perceives them mainly through the perspective of European discourse—in a romanticized light, adorned with biblical nonmodernity, and rarely attributed with any national meaning.

This is the perspective of the First ALIYA, the first group of Zionist Jews that came to Palestine from Europe in order to create agricultural SETTLEMENTS ON LAND bought by dedicated Jewish funds and to develop what can be described as colonial labor relations with the native Palestinian agricultural workforce. In 1895, AHAD HA'AM (1856–1927) wrote that the land was populated with Arabs and would not be taken without force, yet in the same passage dismissed the Arabs as lazy and incapable of caring for the future.

Among the writers of the period, Moshe Smilansky (1874–1953) stands out. In 1891 he came to Palestine from Russia and was among the founders of the settlement of Hadera and then moved to Rehovot, eventually taking part in many aspects of the development of Jewish settlements in Palestine, including founding and editing the agricultural journal Bustenai in 1929. While he was in Europe for the seventh WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS, Smilansky fell ill and, reportedly out of boredom, wrote his first story, “Latifa,” about an “Arab subject,” as he put it. Latifa is the daughter of a local dignitary who comes to work for the narrator, Hawaja Mussa, a pseudonym employed by Smilansky in writing these stories, later published under the title Sons of Arabia. Latifa has beautiful black eyes that bewitch the narrator, and she inquires about the conjugal habits of Jews and if it is true the Jews take only one wife, whom they do not beat. After Mussa confirms this, Latifa informs him that her father would give her to him in marriage if he became a Muslim. In reply he suggests she become Jewish, but she responds: “He will kill us both.” Latifa then disappears and returns years later as a withered old woman who would like to meet Mussa’s wife.

The story is revealing, showing that the earliest representations of the conflict in Hebrew literature already formulate a distance between Arab and Jew that oscillates between ethnic and colonial. Typically, it is a European male narrator who engages a native woman, although the Jewish narrative is only partially colonial. The distance between the two cannot be bridged because the proposed union can be achieved only if one of them relinquishes his/her ethnic/religious identity. It is a telling feature of the story that the narrator cannot contemplate becoming a Muslim for reasons that need no explication, while the reason Latifa cannot become Jewish is fear of her father’s (violent) society.

Defining Wave of Immigration

At the beginning of the twentieth century, Zionism and Hebrew letters came closer together as Zionist writers increasingly chose Hebrew as their primary, if not exclusive, literary language. At this time the wave of immigrants known as the Second Aliya (1905–1919) started to arrive in Palestine, containing people destined to become the founders and leaders of the state, among them future prime ministers DAVID BEN-GURION and LEVI ESHKOL, and future Nobel Prize winner S. Y. Agnon, as well as Yosef Chayim Brenner. This wave of Zionist immigrants was dedicated to a contradictory set of ideals combining Jewish ethnic nationalism with socialism and the assumption of labor and defense duties, both until then held by the Arabs.

The stories written during and about the Second Aliya are the foundations of modern Israeli culture and politics. At this time a Hebrew literary community in Palestine also began taking shape, consolidated in 1908 by the arrival of Brenner (1881–1921). Like most of those arriving then, Brenner came from a traditional religious background, then lost his faith, taught himself European languages and literatures, and found in Zionism a Jewish resolution to the Jewish problem within modernity. In his years in Palestine, which included the travails of World War I, Brenner was almost a one-man literary republic—editing and publishing literary political journals (Revivim, Achdut) and books, and producing his own literary work. Among these, Breakdown and Bereavement, published in full format in 1919, towers as one of the most important works of the time.

Breakdown and Bereavement is the fictional diary of a young man gone mad. Yechezkel Hefez, the protagonist, is a Jewish youth who arrives in Palestine with the typical ideas of his generation, “to build [the land] and be built.” but he fails and has a nervous breakdown. As in many of the literary works of the time, the conflict with the Arabs is not explicitly discussed, yet Hefez's breakdown is expressed entirely in terms of the conflict. In his delusion he transfers Jews' relations with Gentiles in Eastern Europe to relations with the Arabs in the Middle East, and an innocent question about a missing boy becomes an accusation of ritual murder.

Brenner represents a formative generation of Zionist writers and activists who shared the view that the conflict does not exist or at the most is a result of the effendis—the landowners—instigating the Arab workers because they feared the Jews and the higher wages they offered the workers. This sometimes was accompanied by a utopian view based on a positive orientalism that perceived the Arab as a noble savage. In R. Binyamin's writing and in many others of the period, Zionism would develop the country for the benefit of both peoples, who shared the same origin, because the Arabs were seen as being descended from Jews who did not go into exile but changed their faith.

On 1 May 1921 a Jewish workers' procession clashed with an Arab one, and the violence spread quickly, lasting five days. Among the forty-two killed was Brenner. Only a few days before he was murdered he published a short piece, "From a Notebook," in which he recounts meeting a young Arab worker in an orchard. Before this Brenner had been contemplating that the land "all belonged to them, to the Arabs." The story exposes the ironies and contradictions of Brenner's generation, because it is clear that Brenner and the boy share no language, so any meeting is impossible. After his death Brenner was immediately canonized; R. Binyamin (Joshua Radler 1880–1957), a central figure of the time, eulogized him with the words "how perfect was your death Brennerke." The perfection lies in Brenner's consistent position on Jewish relations with the Arabs. In all his literary work he insisted on the brutal truth: Arabs don't look favorably on Jewish IMMIGRATION and never will. Brenner saw and wrote about an emerging Arab nationalism at a time when official Zionism talked of benefiting the simple felah—the peasant worker, who favors Jewish immigration because it brings work and increases wages. Brenner saw that economic conflict was inevitable and that there was an inherent contradiction in the Zionist endeavor to "conquer the labor for the defense"; in the end, it was all work taken from the hands of Arab peasants.

Especially for Brenner, and perhaps for most of the other writers of the time, such as S. Y. Agnon, Aharon Reuveni, and L. A. Ariely-Orloff, it was clear that the land, far from being empty, was full of Arabs. Orloff's seminal theater piece Alla Karim is in fact a tortuous account of Jewish masculinity faced by the noble savage in the form of the Palestinian. For these writers the main reason that conflict was inevitable was cultural. More than once Brenner wrote that even if those who claim an ancient brotherhood between Jew and Arab were right, that fraternity had no bearing on the present. In the present the Jews came from Europe seeking to create a modern Jewish entity of European stamp, and therefore a clash was not only inevitable but perhaps even desirable. In opposition to earlier romantic trends that sought to emulate the Arabs for their biblical customs rooted in the land, Brenner presented a clearly Jewish European position seeking to distance itself from the surroundings.

New Generation of Immigrants

Hebrew literature and culture in the 1920s and 1930s combined the basic ideas of the Second Aliya with varieties of futuristic modernism and socialism. The wave of immigrants known as the Third Aliya began arriving in 1919, propelled by the BALFOUR DECLARATION, the British conquest of Palestine, and the unprecedented pogroms against Jews that accompanied the end of World War I and the Russian civil war. This new generation of Jewish immigrants followed the ideas of its predecessor about the land and the need to settle it by merging socialism and nationalism, but did so with bigger numbers and with more success, thanks to aid by the British administration. In terms of literary genre, the 1920s and 1930s were dominated by poetry. In fact, the major Hebrew literary figures to emerge from this generation, such as Yitzchak Lamdan, Avraham Shlonsky, and Uri Zvi Greenberg, dominated the poetry scene until the late 1930s. In "Masada" (1927), his most celebrated work, Lamdan (1899–1954) elaborated the trauma of the pogroms and the radical solution of Zionism as a desperate last stand. Although the poem hardly refers to the suicidal defiance at Masada, it is nevertheless the symbolic base of the poem: the desperation of the enterprise grounded in the impossible balance of power between the handful of Jews and the vast Arab majority.

Avraham Shlonsky (1900–1973) arrived in Palestine from Russia in 1921, having already published some poetry. In the 1920s he became the main representative of a new generation of poets and a central speaker of “labor poetics,” expressing the communal views and experiences of his peers, which celebrated the reconnection of Jewish workers with the land in terms that are taken from Nietzsche’s description of the Dionysian. The symbolic conquest of the landscape is a central aspect of Shlonsky’s poetry, achieved in a cycle of poems named “Gilboa,” after the mountains overlooking the main communal settlement of the time in the Valley of Jezreel. In these poems as well as in others, the Arabs and the conflict seem almost absent. In this sense the new poets adhere to the Zionist norm of not explicitly writing about the conflict but using figurative language instead. In Shlonsky’s writing this eventually takes shape as a battle of civilizations. In a cycle of poems, Facing the Wasteland, he writes of a grand symbolic battle between the lazy, chaotic, and inert (Arab) desert and industrious, modern, and constructive (Jewish) labor.

Though not unprecedented, the violence of the Western Wall uprising of 1929 took the Jews in Palestine by surprise. The wave of violence erupted in August and hit the non-Zionist communities of the holy cities the hardest, confirming in the eyes of many the primeval nature of the conflict. In HEBRON sixty-six Jews were murdered, and the millenary Jewish presence there and in places like GAZA was eradicated, creating the first ethnic cleansings of the conflict. These events were by far the most violent that had taken place in Palestine until then and presented Hebrew culture with a real challenge. Writers and politicians reacted; a few months later Ben-Gurion said that the real significance of the events had been to show the Arabs that the annihilation of the Jews was a politically feasible solution to the Jewish problem in Palestine.

Uri Zvi Greenberg (1896–1981) seems to best represent the reaction of Hebrew letters to the new situation presented in 1929. Greenberg, who fought on the Serbian front in World War I, began his career as a Yiddish modernist poet, gradually making a transition to Hebrew that became final with his arrival in Palestine in 1923. In Palestine he belonged to the workers’ brigades, and he celebrated their ecstatic experience with a hitherto unparalleled Hebrew expressionism espousing modernistic existentialism with a Jewish nationalism that increasingly figured as the only possible solution to the conflict with the Arabs. Throughout the 1920s Greenberg gradually turned away from the labor movement in his political and poetic views, but a final break came only after the riots of 1929. To him they were no surprise, for he saw them as merely a continuation of the religious persecution of the Jews by Christianity and Islam. In reaction he wrote two small cycles of poems: Defender’s Girdle (1929) and Blood Son’s Speech (1930). In these poems and in the abundant journalistic prose he began to write at the time, he elaborates views that are remarkably close to those of VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY and the Zionist right wing with whom he now became openly affiliated. These views held that the clash between Jews and Arabs was inevitable for reasons more spiritual than material (economic). Thus the only course of action open to the Jews is to uphold a fierce Jewish nationalism backed by brute military force, creating an “iron wall” that won’t come down until the Arabs accept the return of the land to Jews.

Hebrew Culture Coalesces

In the 1930s, Jewish settlement in Palestine underwent intensive development, as the hegemony of the Hebrew cultural community in Palestine became clear via immigration of the most important writers and the decline of the Hebrew centers in Eastern Europe, the UNITED STATES, and MOSCOW. The rise of Hitler to power in 1933 seemed to vindicate the Zionist analysis of the situation of the Jews, and Palestine became a prime destination, one of the few open to GERMAN Jewish emigrants. In literary terms this meant a continuation of the currents established in the 1920s.

Increasingly, poetry turned away from expressionist modernism toward a neosymbolism that culminated in the figure of Nathan Alterman (1910–1970). The young Alterman was a late addition to the group that, under the leadership of Shlonsky, broke away from the old literary establishment, creating a new journal for itself, Turim, which advocated the independence of art from political reality and a Zionist version of art pour art (art for art’s sake). Alterman quickly became a central figure in the group and in 1938 amazed the public with the publication of Stars Outside, his incredibly ripe debut book of symbolist poetry, full of stunning imagery and use of biblical Hebrew. The significance of the collection can be seen in how it epitomizes Zionist culture's preparation for war. An avowed Zionist, Alterman kept a neat separation between his journalistic poetry, which he published in a highly popular "Seventh Column" in the daily newspaper Davar, and his lyrical poetry, which makes little reference to the political reality of the time. Politically Alterman belonged to the LABOR PARTY and was an ardent supporter of Ben-Gurion, and though he railed against British policy limiting immigration to Palestine, he certainly understood the importance of the alliance with colonial power.

The main cultural significance of Alterman and the symbolist group is how their poetry supported the Zionist national project and especially the continuum of culture and art perceived as existing, just like the Jewish nation, beyond time. The main poetic persona in Alterman's poetry, as it developed in his second book, Pauper's Joy (1941), is in fact the living-dead male, a figure of the continuation of the Hebrew voice embodied, who speaks and abides with the living, beyond physical existence, in a space where memory, poetry, and life are one. Inhabiting this poetic space, the lyrical poetry of Alterman, as well as that of more marginal figures of the time such as Raphael Eliaz (1905–1974), is set in a world engaged in mortal primeval clashes that can only result in life or death.

At the time the beginnings of an alternative poetic view were evident in Avot Yeshurun's (1904–1992) work On the Road's Wisdoms (1942), in which the Arab village is identified as home through an imaginative fraternity with the Jewish town in Europe. Although Yeshurun's work had little resonance at the time, in the 1970s his views became popular.

In 1936 the ARAB REVOLT began and for three years there was violence in Palestine, with the British trying to subdue the revolt and the Arabs attacking the weaker links of the Jewish Yishuv, namely transportation and remote settlements. The revolt finally dissolved with the beginning of World War II, although among its many consequences was the creation of a legal Jewish guard force, which became part of the collective experience of the literary generation that came of age in the 1940s. This eagerly anticipated generation of writers came to be known as the "generation of the land"—those who were born and raised in Palestine, supposedly free from the Jewish neuroses of the DIASPORA. They were supposed to be the new Jews, a generation that grew up with the conflict and had an ideological commitment to the formation of Israel. The new generation matured during World War II and often served in various military and paramilitary organizations, such as the PALMAH (the crack troops of the Jewish HAGANA) or the Jewish Brigade, both formed by the British. Most of the writers of the time adhered to mainstream Zionism, working under the leadership of Ben-Gurion toward creation of a state that would, somewhat paradoxically, be Jewish but would also guarantee the rights of the Arabs. From that time on, the political right and left differed mainly over the question of how this would come about. The left opted to leave the inconsistencies of Zionism unclear, while the right, led by Vladimir Jabotinsky, spoke openly about the need for an "iron wall" as the only means to achieve a Jewish state against Arab hostility. A weaker faction on the left named Peace Alliance, which included the writers MARTIN BUBER, Moshe Smilansky, and Binyamin, opted for a BINATIONAL state.

Military Generation of Writers

Military service, especially in the Palmah and the 1948 WAR, was the formative experience of the generation of writers known in literary discourse as the Palmah generation. Many of these belonged to the workers' settlements that hosted the Palmah after the British dismantled the troops, and they formed the front line of battle. S. Yizhar (Yizhar Smilansky) is perhaps the most important writer of this generation, especially because he does not fully belong to the group. Born in 1916 (d. 2006) to an established agricultural family, he grew up speaking Arabic, because life with the Arab workers was a common characteristic of private farming in Palestine. He began publishing stories in 1938 and was immediately recognized for his rich and dense use of stream of consciousness. In the 1948 War between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Yizhar served as an intelligence officer, and afterward (in 1949) he published a book with three stories on the war, two of which describe the unpleasant fate of the Arabs in the war. In "Hirbet Hizaa" (literally, Hizaa Ruin), Yizhar tells the tale of the DEPORTATION of a whole Arab village as narrated by one of the soldiers. With the villagers gone, the village becomes a silent haunting sign of absence that will soon become a settlement for Jewish refugees, while its inhabitants are turned into REFUGEES. "The Prisoner,” set during the same phase in the war when the Israeli army was on the offensive, tells of the capture and interrogation of an Arab shepherd, who knows very little besides his sheep and the biblical pastoral surroundings from which he has been torn, perhaps never to return.

Yizhar was not unique in relating deep disaffection with the offensive turn that a defensive war had taken. Although perhaps Yizhar was the most acerbic, other notable writers, such as Dan Ben Amotz, URI AVNERI, and Netiva Ben Yehuda, shared his depiction of victory as trauma. The initial reaction to the war that completely changed the land and its population—Israel lost 1 percent of its population, or 6,000 men—is one of deep ambiguity toward and suspicion of what the future holds. In the years following the war of independence, Israel’s population tripled, absorbing in a few years an immigrant population that was more than twice its original size. In the 1950s this led to ambivalent writing, in which the writers were torn between a spirit of nation building and a pressing need to express the traumatic nature of recent events affecting both Jews and Arabs. For example, while a member of parliament in the 1950s, Yizhar wrote a 1,200-page novel about a week-long battle called Ziklag, relating in dense prose the consciousness of the youths serving as soldiers. Although the battles are described in detail, the enemy is mostly referred to as the “blacks.”

After the 1948 War and the HOLOCAUST, Israeli culture functioned in a ground zero environment that in literature took shape as a turn to introspection and away from the omnipresence of the conflict with the Arabs, who were slowly being recognized as the Palestinian people. When Alterman published his poetic epic about the foundation of Israel, Ir Hayona (almost untranslatable because the title can mean “the city of the dove” or “the city of deceit”), in 1957, he was scorned by the younger generation of poets and writers that emerged after the war, led by Nathan Zach (1936–). In the book Alterman praises the construction of the state, recognizing the problem of forging an Israeli identity out of the myriad strains of Judaism. War and nationalism are deemed child’s play that a very old people is forced to engage in once again, after its utopian solo attempt to move beyond territorial nationalism had failed so miserably in the Holocaust. Although the younger generation’s critique is one of a youthful turn from a collective spirit fully engaged in the public sphere to a more private space, it is nevertheless an evasion of the need—and assumed role of culture—to tackle significant political issues such as the conflict.

Indeed, after a short period of writing about the War of 1948, many writers seemed to turn in other directions. After both had written important works about the war, MOSHE SHAMIR (1921–2004) turned to biblical novels and Nathan Shacham (1925–) to novels dealing with KIBBUTZ life. In Shamir’s case, one must especially note the early bestseller, He Walked in the Fields, that appeared a few months before the 1948 War and was later adapted as a play with great success. The book focuses on the life of Uri Kahana, born on the kibbutz and involved with Mika, a Holocaust survivor. Although Mika gets pregnant, Uri chooses the life of the Palmah over her. She plans to have an abortion, but, as she decides to keep the baby, she learns of Uri’s sacrificial death in a training accident. Beyond the obvious national allegory, the causes of the struggle are significantly absent; the neighboring Arabs are not to be seen, or as Uri puts it: “There are things that are obvious and don’t require discussion.”

After the War

Uri’s statement can be seen as a maxim of the first decade of Israeli literature, and yet this transition to a state culture remains an uneasy one, frequently interrupted by residues of Jewish moralism and Zionism’s utopian past, which bluntly clash with the reality of the conflict. Apart from some very interesting exceptions such as Mikre Haksil (The Fools Case) by Aharon Megged (1920–), the 1956 war and the years that follow are characterized by an absence of a Palestinian voice in Hebrew letters. Yet the Israeli writers who gained center stage in the late 1950s and 1960s, such as AMOS OZ (1939–) and A. B. YEHOShUA (1936–), were the first to return to the repressed figure of the silenced Palestinian Arab.

Yehoshua’s story “Facing the Forests” (1963) is a well-known example of the generational dynamics in Zionism and the change in perspective on the conflict. The story describes an aging student who can’t finish his schoolwork on the Crusades and leaves the city to become a watchman in the fast-growing pine forests imagined by Zionist founder THEODOR HERZL and planted by the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND, frequently over the land of former Palestinian villages. The old forest manager, a symbol of Israel's founding generation, entrusts the job to the forest guardian, who is aided by a mute Arab and his daughter. The student discovers the ruins of a village buried under the forest and, together with the Arab, burns the forest. The old manager is heartbroken, the Arab is blamed for the fire, and the balding eternal student drifts away aimlessly. The striking aspect of the story at the time was the rebellion expressed in the burning of the forest, exposing the coverup of the evergreen pine trees, so foreign to the landscape. In retrospect, what is even more striking is that the contact between the Jew and the mute Arab could function tacitly.

In Oz's popular early writings, especially Where the Jackal Howls (1965), Arabs are a menacing presence on the fragile boundaries of the kibbutz, already destabilized by this Arab presence and other pressures. These stories, which began to be published in the late 1950s, present another description of the conflicts between Arabs and Jews, which can be seen in the story "Geula" (Redemption). The story tells about a kibbutz whose fields are being invaded by nameless Arabs from the desert. As in Yehoshua's short story, the younger generation is at odds with the older one, but from the other direction. Facing growing theft and vandalism, the young generation wants to retaliate physically against the Arabs. The story reaches a climax as Geula, a female allegorical figure, meets an Arab shepherd in the grove, who she fantasizes tries to rape her, and the wrath of the kibbutz is unleashed on the Arabs. The paradoxes of this position are many; the self-image of settlers as advancing the boundaries of civilization on the frontier clashes with the violent reality of their conflict with the Arabs, conceived as a struggle with the chaotic powers of the desert in ways that by now are part of the stock images of the Zionist enterprise as a civilizing modernist enterprise. Oz attempts to be ironic, aware that a violent civilizing mission is hardly what it claims to be, yet the irony is obstructed by an underlying survivalist sense of justification.

After the 1967 WAR this view, along with the Israeli cultural scene, changed. Oz, Yizhak Ben Ner (1937–) (The Man from There, 1967), and others were quick to realize that the OCCUPATION of the Palestinian territories allowed a perception of a modern Western Israeli self pitted against an oriental enemy. By winning the war and gaining control of a large Palestinian population, the conflict, as Oz saw it, threatened to undo the very change Zionism wanted to effect on the Jews in rendering them into a sovereign democratic nation. While eroding the delicate balance of liberal democracy with Jewish nationalism, the Occupation threatened to unleash the "capacity to self-destruct" latent in Judaism.

One of the most interesting formulations of the time can be found in Seventh Day, a book that was published in Israel a few months after the war and sold an unprecedented number of copies—distributed to every home in all the kibbutzim. The book, with interviews by Oz and others, is an edited compilation of conversations with soldiers in the kibbutzim after they returned from the war. In retrospect it is an amazing document, a report of group therapy undertaken after the war, yet from another point of view it can be seen as the last testament of the once hegemonic kibbutz movement. Taking credit for the victorious war, the declining movement metaphorically realizes that its role in the public sphere has ended. As such, the conversations can be seen as the cornerstone of left-wing politics in post-1967 Israel, with the war and the Occupation viewed as a disaster, constantly eroding the border that Zionism strove to establish between Israel and the Orient. It is here one can see that post-1967 left-wing politics are shaped not just by a longing for peace but also by a nostalgia for the Israel that once was: small, with Western values, and predominantly white (European).

Following the trajectory of Israeli history in these years, In the Land of Israel (1982) is a perceptive report of Oz's travels through the torn country of Israel after the SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRES, when Israel was still engaged in the LEBANON WAR. The Sabra and Shatila Massacres in September 1982, after the Israeli occupation of west Beirut, though perpetrated by the Christian militias, took place while Israel controlled the perimeter of the refugee camps, not knowing or not wanting to know what was happening. The episode turned Israeli public opinion against the war, and Oz articulates this disaffection with the war as a comprehensive distancing of the current Israeli reality from the original Zionist vision. In what started as a series of articles for the Labor Party newspaper Davar, Oz engaged the country as a member of a kibbutz, part of a fallen elite, whose undoing began in the Six Day War. These views were to be the ruling paradigm of the Jewish peace movement and left-wing politics, culminating with a peace movement with a rather messianic name, PEACE NOW. Politically and culturally, this paradigm came to an abrupt end with the failure of the OSLO PROCESS and the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000.

Arab Jews on Literary Margin

That the so-called left-wing view of the conflict ignored MIZRAHI (Middle Eastern) Jews is hardly surprising. The arrival of a large mass of Jews from Arab countries had been presented in culture almost solely in terms of the Westernization and modernization of a backward part of the nation. Required to renounce their language and cultures, Mizrahi Jews were marginalized in literary discourse and in political and social life. MENAHEM BEGIN's rise to power in 1977 with his right-wing LIKUD PARTY is precisely the result of this disregard, which Begin addressed with a Jewish inclusiveness poised against a hostile Arab world. This move has crippled the political development of an alternative nonseparationist politics perhaps forever. It is only in the late 1990s with the development of Mizrahi radicalism that such a critique of Israeli culture became available and expressed itself in works by Sami Schalom Shitrit (1960–) or in Yossi Sucari's (1959–) enticing Emilia and the Salt of the Land (2002). These authors brought to the forefront of culture a Mizrahi voice that renounces Zionism and seeks a radical break with what is portrayed as an oppressive idea.

It can be stipulated that Zionism began with a move toward the East and yet never became part of that East, partly because the East never accepted Jewish nationalism and partly because Jewish nationalism never accepted the East. The terms are deliberately vague because their precise function in culture is such, denoting an oriental existentially threatening otherness. While keeping an eye on Zion, Hebrew letters kept certain parts of Zionism out of sight, particularly the literature of non-Western Jews, although such writers have been present in Hebrew letters starting with 1920s writers Yehuda Burla, Yizhak Shami, and Yacov Khurgin, all born and raised in Palestine and speaking Arabic as well as Hebrew. Though their inclusion in Hebrew letters is never doubted, they are marginal to the Israeli canon that is essentially about European Jewish (ASHKENAZI) male experience. In fact, Jews from Arab countries, who formed the majority of immigrants to the newborn state, remained almost as invisible in the culture as the non-Jewish Arabs. The harsh experience of Mizrahi immigration to Israel only began to surface in writing in the 1960s, notably with the unique voice of Egyptian-born master essayist Jacqueline Kahanof (1917–1979) and Shimon Ballas (1930–), a non-Zionist Jew from Baghdad who was the first to write artistically about the experience of immigration in Hamabara (The Transit Camp) in 1964. But it was not until after the 1973 War and its perception as a disaster that Mizrahi writing gained a presence and force. In 1974 Sami Michael (b. 1926), an immigrant from Baghdad and a communist, published Equal and More Equal (1974), a groundbreaking novel about a young man's immigration to Israel and his struggle to find a place in society. The story alternates between the narrator not understanding why he should fight against his Arab brethren in the 1967 War and the memory of his hardships in the transit camp where immigrants from Arab countries were first placed under precarious conditions. In spite of his rancor, when the moment comes, he saves his comrade's life, among others, through his knowledge of Arabic. Though the tone is neutral, the text discloses the brutal politics of class and race imposed on the Mizrahi Jews by an Ashkenazi-absorbing establishment. Another critical account of immigration, Yizhak Gormezanu Goren's (b. 1941) Alexandrian Summer (1978), which was later developed into a trilogy, recounts the protagonist's move from Alexandria to Israel, allowing a different view of Israeli society and an Arab past to emerge in which the Arab and the Jew are not enemies but rather part of a whole.

The turning point seems to have come after the 1967 War, which allowed for wider economic mobility and the rise of a relatively small but still significant Mizrahi middle class. This development was hastened by the shock of the 1973 War, which forced Israelis to reconsider if not reconfigure power and culture within Jewish society. Loyal to their role in Jewish modernity, Hebrew letters not only reflected these changes but also helped bring them about by an acute awareness of the fault lines of Israeli society. The political shift that put the Palestinians and their aspirations in the center of Israeli discourse was caused by many events, but these were made possible by a conceptual framework created foremost in Hebrew letters with its constant effort to expose the blind spot, to fulfill its ancient role of "Watchman unto the House of Israel." The participation of Arab writers in Israel also played an important role in effecting change, whether in the form of EMILE HABIBI's (1922–1996) exceptional Arabic novel The Pessoptimist (1974) or Anton Shamas's (1950–) masterly Hebrew novel Arabesques (1986). The significance of these authors is how they incorporate the Palestinian pain of the Nakba—when Palestinians fled Israel during the 1948 War—into Hebrew discourse. The writing of Habibi and Shamas brought forth a voice almost unknown to Hebrew letters—the voice of the Arab from within. Although the participation of Arab writers in Hebrew culture is still marginal, as such it receives constant attention and has found new exponents in recent years, notably Said Kashua, whose bitter irony challenges the possibility of its very own voice, the Hebrew-Arab voice being as big a paradox as the attention it receives, which has little effect on power.

Effects of the Intifada

On the Hebrew side, the growing importance of the Palestinian identity and the transformation brought about by the Occupation form the main thrust of DAVID GROSSMAN's (b. 1954) early groundbreaking work, The Smile of the Lamb (1983), and the equally important journalistic account of his travels in the Palestinian territories, The Yellow Wind (1987), which predicted the advent of the INTIFADA. In these books as well as in his prolific journalistic writing, Grossman tries to elaborate a left-wing position that provides a nonparanoid response to Israeli anxieties about the Palestinian uprising. At the time, Grossman brought to Israeli letters his psychological insight into the Palestinian condition, which was perhaps the most acute available at the time, while he also reported profoundly on the brutalization caused by the Occupation. An ardent supporter of the Oslo Process, Grossman has since become almost more widely read outside Israel than inside.

In the 1990s many “posts”—POST-ZIONISM, post-modernism, and others—began to emerge between the cracks of the fragmented scene of Hebrew letters. The variety of voices and the abundance of autobiography, coming from all over the Jewish world, are striking. It seems culture has endowed the story of an individual life in the conflict with the significance of history. Although Hebrew letters no longer has a direct role in the developments of Jewish politics, writers struggle to function as the custodians of truth and memory, a role that has perhaps been suppressed by the pressing needs of conflict.

The truth that begins to emerge is by definition tentative, partial, and ambiguous, and at the same time a hardly noticed feminine voice becomes increasingly central to a rethinking of the public arena. Though women have always been a significant part of Hebrew letters, the centrality of the male military enterprise to state building confined the female voice to a personal, lyrical sphere. In this respect it is only since the 1980s that some of the most radical political writing began to be carried out by women, such as Daniella Carmi (All the Time in the World to Pick Plums, 1987) and Ilana Hamerman, a prolific and extremely judicious editor, translator, and author central to any discussion of Hebrew letters from the 1980s on. Together with other female writers such as Orly Castel Bloom and Ronit Matalon, they have challenged the norms of the reigning aesthetics in terms of both form and political content. Still to this very day it is the male authors who are prominent as political voices, and though the female voice is perhaps the dominant one in current letters, the arena itself has diminished in political importance.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a determining feature of Hebrew letters and is as much about Jews and being Jewish as it is about the enemy. As time progresses and the time before the Occupation fades from memory, both themes begin to merge. Such a moment of paradigm collapse is strangely present in Etgar Keret's (1967–) short story “Cocked and Locked” (1994), in which a soldier on guard in the Territories uses a bandage to dress his injured head like the kufiya-clad youth opposing him. Desperate from his immobility, he throws his weapon toward the youth, who hurries to pick it up only to “discover what I've discovered in this hellhole over the past month: the rifle is worth shit.” The desire to become the enemy, to be like him, unburdened by the gun, the uniform, and the Occupation, is erotically telling as it harkens back to a lost history of moral certitude and a dream yet uncorrupted by reality.

See also PALESTINIAN POETRY

Bibliography

- Aberbach, David. Major Turning Points in Jewish Intellectual History. New York: Palgrave, 2003.
- Alcalay, Ammiel, ed. Keys to the Garden: New Israeli Writing. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1966.
- Ben-Ezer, Ehud, ed. Sleepwalkers and Other Stories: The Arab in Hebrew Fiction. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1998.
- Brenner, Rachel Feldhay. Inextricably Bonded: Israeli Arab and Jewish Writers Re-visioning Culture. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2003.

- Chetrit, Sami Shalom. "Mizrahi Politics in Israel: Between Integration and Alternative." Journal of Palestine Studies. 29:4 (2000).
- Coffin, Edna Amir. "The Image of the Arab in Modern Hebrew Literature." Michigan Quarterly Review. 21 (1982).
- Elad-Bouskila, Ami. "Arabic and/or Hebrew: The Languages of Arab Writers in Israel." In Israeli and Palestinian Identities in History and Literature. Edited by Kamal Abdel-Malek and David Jacobson. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Frieden, Ken. "A. B. Yehoshua: Arab Dissent in His Early Fiction." In Israeli Writers Consider the "Outsider". Edited by Leon I. Yudkin. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1993.
- Gover, Yerach. Zionism: The Limits of Moral Discourse in Israeli Hebrew Fiction. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994.
- Grossman, David. Sleeping on a Wire: Conversations with Palestinians in Israel. New York: Picador, 2003.
- Hever, Hannan. Producing the Modern Hebrew Canon: Nation Building and Minority Discourse. New York: New York University Press, 2002.
- Jayyusi, Salma Khadra. Anthology of Modern Palestinian Literature. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Morahg, Gilead. "Reality and Symbol in the Fiction of A. B. Yehoshua." Proof Texts. 2:2 (1982).
- Oppenheimer, Yochai. "The Image of the Arab in Israeli Fiction." Proof Texts. 19:3 (1999).
- Ram, Uri. The Changing Agenda of Israeli Sociology: Theory, Ideology, and Identity. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Ramras-Rauch, Gila. The Arab in Israeli Literature. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Shaked, Gershon. "The Arab in Israeli Fiction." Ariel. 54 (1983).
- Shohat, Ella. "Sephardim in Israel: Zionism from the Standpoint of Its Jewish Victims." Social Text. Fall 1988.

—Uri Cohen

Hebron and Jewish Settlements

In the post-1967 phase of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict no single area has been more of a flashpoint than Hebron. Some of the most intense bloodshed has taken place at a religious shrine sacred to both Muslims and Jews in this WEST BANK city. As the only city in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES to have Jewish settlements in the heart of the Palestinian population, nowhere in the Occupied Territories is SETTLER VIOLENCE more intense.

Hebron (Hevron in Hebrew, al-Khalil in Arabic) is one of the oldest cities in Palestine, believed to date back more than 6,000 years. Around 4000 BCE, Semitic tribes migrated from the Arabian Peninsula and built several villages and towns throughout the area of Palestine. Four such villages on the hills of Hebron were later amalgamated into a unified political and social system, and the city flourished after its unification. Archaeological excavations show human presence dating several millennia, but the identity of its original inhabitants remains in dispute. Hebron's holy site, the Cave of the Patriarchs (also "Abraham's Cave"), is revered equally by Jews and Muslims and is believed to be the burial place of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and their wives. Both religions honor these men as their first prophets. Herod the Great built the first structure over "Abraham's Cave," and the Byzantine emperor Justinian I turned it into a church in the sixth century CE, which was later destroyed by the Sassanid Persians. Muslims, believing that Abraham was the first Muslim and that the site was visited by their Prophet Muhammad on his night flight from Mecca to JERUSALEM, converted the building into a mosque in the seventh century and named it al-Ibrahimi.

Islamic rule in Hebron began in 638 and lasted until the Crusaders occupied it in 1099, which they called the City of Abraham. The name was changed back to Hebron in 1187 after the Muslim leader SALADIN defeated the Crusaders. Muslim MAMLUKS, a politically powerful Egyptian military class and political dynasty, controlled Hebron until 1516, when it fell under the rule of the Muslim OTTOMAN EMPIRE. From the beginning of the Islamic period the city has been predominantly Muslim, with small Christian and Jewish communities. In the twentieth century the Christian community dwindled to almost nothing, and the Jewish community was dispersed following an eruption of violence in 1929 (known as the WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES), in which sixty-seven Jews were murdered. The Jewish community began to reestablish itself in Hebron following the 1967 WAR, during which Israel took control of the West Bank. In 2007, Hebron was home to approximately 160,000 Palestinian Muslims, 600 Jews, and three Christians. An additional 6,651 Jews reside in the adjacent KIRYAT ARBA SETTLEMENT.

Jewish Return to Hebron

The Jewish reentry into Hebron began in 1968 when RABBI MOSHE LEVINGER, a radical JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST, placed a newspaper advertisement asking for “families or singles to resettle the ancient city of Hebron.” A group of eighty settlers calling themselves the Bloc of the Faithful (GUSH EMUNIM) responded to the call. On Passover the group rented space in a Hebron hotel to celebrate the holiday and then announced that they would not leave. With YIGAL ALLON’s (1918–1980) encouragement and Israeli defense minister MOSHE DAYAN’s approval, Gush Emunim was temporarily housed in an unused military barracks while a settlement was constructed for them on the outskirts of Hebron, in what became Kiryat Arba.

In 1976 the Israeli government granted Gush Emunim permission to construct a settlement near the AVRAM AVINU ruins in downtown Hebron, on the site of a structure destroyed in 1948. The Palestinian wholesale market in the area had to close to accommodate the new building, which also served—and still serves—as the central offices for the Hebron Jewish community. After finishing construction on Avram Avinu, Gush Emunim focused on nearby Beit Hadassa, built in 1880 as a hospital for the then Jewish community but later administered as a school by the UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES (UNRWA) under the Jordanian government. After 1967 the building was administered by the Israeli CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY but still leased to UNRWA as a school. When this contract ended in the mid-1970s, the building was left empty until 1979, when a group of Jewish women, led by Moshe Levinger’s wife Miriam, entered the building and, as eleven years earlier, refused to leave. After a short standoff with the Israeli government, the group was allowed to stay.

In May 1980, Palestinians killed six yeshiva students on their way home from the Cave of the Patriarchs. The Israeli government responded by officially recognizing the Beit Hadassa settlement, strengthening Jewish control in the face of Palestinian opposition. By that time the settlers occupied several buildings, including Avram Avinu, Beit Hadassa, Beit Castel, Beit Hasson, Beit Schneerson, and Beit Fink. An additional building, Beit Hashisha (House of Six, commemorating the six yeshiva students), was finished later. Situated between Beit Hadassa and Avram Avinu is yet another building, Beit Romano, constructed as a residence in 1879 by a Turkish Jew. Like Beit Hadassa, it was leased to UNRWA as a school. After the killing of the six students, however, this contract was terminated and the building was taken over by the settlers in 1981. It is currently a yeshiva, enrolling between 250 and 300 religious students.

The last settlement established in Hebron was Tel Rumeida in 1984. Situated on a hill overlooking the other settlements, it is believed to be the site where Abraham lived circa 1800 BCE. In 1984 a group of seven Jewish families placed portable caravans at the site. Following the killing of outspoken conservative leader Rabbi Shlomo Ranaan inside his caravan there in 1998, the Israeli government approved the building of permanent houses in Tel Rumeida.

These seven settlements sit in the heart of Palestinian Hebron, and since their arrival, there has been tension between the settlers and the Palestinians. Of all the settlers in the Occupied Territories, those in Hebron City and Kiryat Arba (and environs) are among the most ideologically extreme. The Gush Emunim are driven by messianism and literalism (especially with regard to Jewish “chosenness” and the belief in the territoriality of God’s covenant) and by their sense of purpose—to “redeem” Eretz Yisrael (the Land of Israel) and restore it to its “rightful” owners—the Jewish people.

Settler Violence

The settlers use their ideology to justify their almost daily acts of harassment, humiliation, and intimidation against Palestinian residents of the city, including throwing stones, physical assaults, and damaging and destroying property. Their ideology permits them to use any tactics to achieve their objectives, including murder and expulsion of the Palestinians. Believing that they are God’s chosen people, the settlers also think that God gave them this land for their exclusive use. The Israeli government has cooperated with the settlers and has imposed harsh measures on Palestinians in Hebron, including prolonged CURFEWS, CLOSURES, blockades, WATER shortages, LAND confiscation, large numbers of HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and use of force by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF). The 1994 HEBRON MASSACRE by settler BARUCH GOLDSTEIN of twenty-nine Palestinians in the al-Ibrahimi Mosque was not an isolated incident but one marker on a continuum of violence directed at Palestinians that began with the first settlers in Avram Avinu and Kiryat Arba and continues to this day.

The Israeli government has seldom punished the settlers for their crimes. On the rare occasions

The information contained on this map does not imply the expression of any views whatsoever on the part of the Coordinator of the UN Humanitarian Assistance in the West Bank and Gaza, or any of the UN agencies, or concerning the boundaries of its territory or possessions.

when an individual has been tried and convicted of an offense—usually murder—he has been given at most a sentence of only a few years' imprisonment and has invariably been pardoned and released long before completing the term. Rabbi Levinger, the spiritual as well as political and tactical leader of Gush Emunim, is one of the most active individuals in this group, yet only once has he been convicted of a crime. In 1990 he served ten weeks in prison for the killing of an unarmed Palestinian merchant and was hailed by his followers as a hero upon his release. He maintained that he only shot in the air to defend himself against stone throwers. In 1972 US-born fundamentalist RABBI MEIR KAHANE arrived in Hebron and leafleted the city, summoning the mayor, Muhammad Ali Ja'abari, to a public show trial for his alleged part in the 1929 massacre. Kahane even stormed the mayor's office, demanding his appearance at the trial. The public accounting never took place, but as Israeli analyst Ehud Sprinzak writes of Kahane: "His message was always the same. 'The Arabs do not belong here; they must leave.' In this spirit, Kahane initiated an organized operation to encourage the Arabs to emigrate."

By 1980 a group that originated in Kiryat Arba was carrying out violent acts throughout the West Bank, including several attempts to blow up the Muslim shrine AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF in Jerusalem. They had also carried out assassination attempts against five West Bank mayors, who as prominent nationalist leaders have respect throughout the Occupied Territories. Three escaped without harm, while Nablus mayor BASSAM SHAKA'A lost both legs and a second mayor, Karim Khalaf of El Bireh/Ramallah, was permanently crippled. Those charged with the assassination attempts were released after serving two years of a ten-year sentence. Shortly thereafter Gush Emunim settlers exploded a fragmentation grenade in the Hebron market, which severely injured eleven Palestinian children. In March 1982 an Israeli soldier reported that thirty twelve- to thirteen-year-old Palestinian children were lined up facing a wall with their hands up for five hours in Hebron on a cold night. Afterwards the children were taken to an army camp where their parents were not allowed to see them or to bring them coats.

In October 1982, settlers planted a time bomb in the stands of Hebron's Husayn School football field. The explosion occurred minutes before the game was to begin and seriously injured several spectators. Another time bomb was discovered in the middle of the field. In 1983, three settlers entered the Muslim College of Hebron (later Islamic University), threw grenades, and opened fire on students, killing three and seriously wounding thirty-three more. The perpetrators were initially sentenced to life in prison but subsequently had their sentences reduced to fifteen years and were released after serving seven years. In 1984, settlers from Kiryat Arba wired explosives to the fuel tanks of five Palestinian buses, but the operation was foiled before the buses set off. After discussing several of these actions, American Jewish academic Ian Lustick wrote: "But these were only the most spectacular events in a wave of less serious vigilantism. . . . During that period [1980–84], the Israeli press reported more than 380 attacks against individuals in which 23 were killed, 191 injured and 38 abducted. Hundreds more attacks were directed at property—automobiles, homes, and shops. Forty-one attacks on Muslim . . . religious institutions were counted."

Eighteen months after the 1994 Goldstein massacre at al-Ibrahimi Mosque, the Israeli human rights organization B'Tselem undertook a detailed investigation of Palestinians living in Hebron. It found that Palestinians were victimized both by the IDF and by settlers. B'Tselem reported that security forces "used live ammunition excessively" against the demonstrators, performed often violent searches of Palestinians homes, killed twenty-seven Palestinians by gunfire, closed seven mosques for three to six months, imposed a total of fifty days of twenty-four-hour curfew, put up CHECKPOINTS within the city, closed and blocked ROADS, "severely" beat Palestinians, and ignored cases of settlers injuring Palestinians. "Whereas the Israeli authorities acted vigorously, often in flagrant violation of the human rights of Palestinians," B'Tselem stated, "in order to protect the settlers and to punish those who harmed them, those authorities failed to protect the lives, integrity and property of Hebron's Palestinian residents from repeated attacks by Jewish settlers in the city."

In 1997, Israel and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) signed the HEBRON PROTOCOL, which divided the city into two distinct sections: Israeli-controlled Jewish Hebron (H-2, with 400 Jews and 25,000 Palestinians and the Cave of the Patriarchs) and an area where the PNA had limited authority over the remaining Palestinian population (H-1).

Palestinian Situation Worsens

Beginning in 1999 the Palestinians' situation in Hebron and the surrounding areas worsened significantly. Settler violence became more widespread with the support of the authorities, and the IDF itself became more directly involved in the repression of Palestinians. In one incident in 1996, a settler fatally pistol-whipped an eleven-year-old child. The settler was arrested but at the trial the Israeli judge acquitted him, stating that the "child died on his own as a result of emotional pressure." After numerous appeals by the child's family and their Israeli lawyer, the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT termed the act a "light killing" and called for a new trial. At the second trial the settler was sentenced to six months of community service and a fine of a few thousand dollars.

In 2001 Human Rights Watch published a report documenting the various abuses by the settlers, while B'Tselem produced two additional major studies on the collaboration of the government with the vigilante settlers. B'Tselem reported that settlers destroyed grapevines, poisoned water supplies, burned grain storage, cut phone lines, and burned businesses of Palestinians. These incidents suggest that the peace process made the settlers more determined and aggressive and the Palestinians more vulnerable.

B'Tselem concluded: "It is clear that the majority of physical attacks are initiated by Israeli settlers and that the IDF has consistently failed in its obligations to protect Palestinians from attacks by Israeli settlers. In effect, settlers are using the protection provided by the IDF to attack Palestinian civilians."

In early July 2001, Israel established a new settlement near Kiryat Arba, and a few days later a Palestinian gunman shot and killed a man at its entrance. The Jerusalem daily Ha'aretz reported that in response, Kiryat Arba's "vigilante armies burned fields, ignited houses, uprooted trees, and vandalized anything in their path. . . . Completing this orgy of revenge without any interference [from the IDF], the settlers returned safely to their homes. No settler had been impeded; none was arrested. Soldiers stood by. . . . [Subsequently] the Palestinian residents of Hebron were put under curfew."

Settler and Government Plans for Hebron

The settlers' achievements in the early 1980s prompted more ambitious plans. In 1982 the Hebron Fund was created in New York to raise money to strengthen and expand the Jewish presence in Hebron and elsewhere in the Occupied Territories. In 1984, Hebron's settler establishment introduced a master plan that delineated their strategy to create a greatly expanded Jewish quarter in Hebron's downtown Old City. The master plan included two basic elements: increasing the size of the Jewish community inside the Old City and constructing a territorial link between the settlements in the Old City and Kiryat Arba. In 1990 the mayor of the Jewish enclave in Hebron, Rabbi Yechiel Leitner, stated at the Hebron Fund's national fund-raising dinner in the United States that "it is self-evident that the second largest city in Judea and Samaria [the West Bank] can be Jewish." However, during the 1990s—the era of the OSLO PROCESS—political opinion tilted away from such ambitious plans. The 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT between the PNA and Israel envisaged that the PNA would take control of Palestinian cities inside the Occupied Territories, including Hebron. This news alarmed the settlers in Hebron's Old City, who came to view Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN as a traitor.

Because he sympathized with their goal of making Hebron part of Israel, BENJAMIN NETANYAHU's electoral victory as prime minister in 1996 gave the settlers renewed optimism, tempered somewhat, however, when the UNITED STATES pressured Netanyahu to resume the Oslo Process, including the planned redeployment from Hebron on the terms set out in the Interim Agreement. During this period ARIEL SHARON, then the minister of national infrastructure, provided Netanyahu with a set of proposals concerning Hebron. Like the settlers' master plan, Sharon's proposals called for the construction of a territorial link between Kiryat Arba and the Cave of the Patriarchs. His plan also envisioned the reduction of the Palestinian population inside Hebron's Old City as well as the construction of the BARRIER wall separating the Old City and its Jewish settlements from Palestinians in southern Hebron.

By the end of 2000 Sharon was prime minister, and the Oslo Process was in shambles. The outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA caused Israel to intensify its security measures in Hebron. New barriers, checkpoints, and ROADBLOCKS were erected throughout Hebron, effectively isolating neighborhoods within the city from each other and from the southern district of Hebron. The Israeli army imposed extensive periods of curfew and carried out massive house demolitions along with other security measures against the uprising.

During this period the Hebron “settler promenade” of Worshiper’s Way was initiated. Worshiper’s Way is the road linking Kiryat Arba to the Jewish quarter of Hebron and to the Cave of Patriarchs. A long-cherished goal of Hebron’s settler community, one supported by Sharon, was its transformation into a promenade that would attract tourists and become a national landmark. Yet even for the prime minister implementation of the promenade was a sensitive political issue, because it involved the expropriation and destruction of Palestinian property in Hebron, including sixty-four parcels of private land and at least fifteen houses. However, immediately following a November 2002 ambush of IDF soldiers by Palestinian militants in which nine soldiers and three Israeli civilians were killed, Sharon gave his approval to begin preparations for the promenade.

Shortly thereafter IDF central commander Moshe Kaplinski, a close aide to Sharon, issued military orders for the expropriation of Palestinian land and the demolition of Palestinian structures for “security reasons.” Once the orders were formally issued, a legal battle ensued between the Israeli government and the Palestinian owners of the houses and land. Israeli human rights activists and lawyers represented the Palestinians before the Israeli Supreme Court, where they argued that the expropriations had nothing to do with security, as the government claimed, but rather were an attempt to establish territorial contiguity between Kiryat Arba and the Cave of the Patriarchs. As of this writing, the case remains in the court without a legal resolution, but the military nevertheless confiscated the designated Palestinian property, demolished homes and businesses, and by 2003 had begun construction of the 650-yard (600-meter) promenade.

During the first three years of the al-Aqsa Intifada, the army imposed a curfew on the Palestinians in the city center of Hebron for more than 377 days total, including a consecutive period of 182 days, with only short breaks to obtain provisions. In addition the army created a contiguous strip of land in the city center along which the movement of Palestinian vehicles is forbidden. The middle of the strip contains many sections of road that the army forbids even Palestinian pedestrians to use. The strip blocks the main north-south traffic artery of the city, and therefore affects the entire city and its population. The extensive prohibitions have led to the closing of hundreds of shops, in addition to those that were closed under army order.

By 2007 these policies resulted in the economic collapse of the Palestinian center of Hebron and had driven many Palestinians out of the area. The findings of a survey conducted by the ASSOCIATION FOR CIVIL RIGHTS IN ISRAEL (ACRI) demonstrated that at least 1,014 Palestinian housing units in the center of Hebron had been vacated by their occupants. This number represents 41.9 percent of the housing units in the relevant area. Sixty-five percent (659) of the empty apartments became vacant during the course of the Second Intifada. By 2007, 1,829 Palestinian commercial establishments were no longer open for business. This number represents 76.6 percent of all the commercial establishments in the surveyed area. Of the closed businesses, 62.4 percent (1,141) were closed during the Second Intifada. At least 440 of them closed pursuant to military orders.

According to ACRI, the main elements of Israel’s separation policy are “the severe and extensive restrictions on Palestinian movement and the Israeli authorities’ systematic failure to enforce law and order on violent settlers attacking Palestinians. The city’s Palestinian residents also continue to suffer as a direct result of the actions of Israel’s security forces.”

In the summer of 2007, the Israeli army helped the Hebron settlers expand eastward to a hilltop home near the settlement of Kiryat Arba, a large step in their plan to connect the two areas. This new Jewish settlement is separated—by a wall, razor wire, and a worldview—from Hebron’s Palestinian residents, who have watched as the settlement project swelled beyond the city center under the protection of Israel’s military.

Hebron’s Separation Walls

The Israeli military has prepared plans for a wall to divide the Palestinian-controlled side (H-1) of Hebron from the Israeli-controlled side (H-2). It is designed to separate the small number of Jewish settlers from some 162,000 Palestinian residents of the city by constructing a physical barrier through the center of Hebron. However, about 35,000 Palestinians live in the Israeli sector, which is also home to Palestinian Hebron’s industrial zone and to the al-Ibrahimi Mosque. In the past this industrial sector has contributed 40 percent of the total production of the Hebron District. In 2005, Israel imposed a closure on the industrial sector, and 5,000 workers lost their jobs. In addition to lost revenues (which were estimated at $63 million over a three-month period), due to the ripple effect unemployment skyrocketed to 70 percent in the district. In 2005 the IDF also placed seven iron gates across roads leading to the Old Suq in Hebron, which completed the encirclement of the market area, located within H-2, and resulted in shop owners losing their means of livelihood.

If the wall is completed, this area will probably be closed indefinitely to Palestinians from H-1. Moreover, access to the Old City and to the al-Ibrahimi Mosque would most probably be closed to Palestinians from H-1. Hebron's Land Defense Committee, an independent Israeli-Palestinian group, revealed in November 2003 that Israeli government officials had developed a plan to confiscate from Palestinians over 120,000 acres (half a million dunums)—some 48 percent of the total available space—for the Jewish sector in Hebron District.

As of 2006, both projects appeared to be on hold awaiting a decision from the Israeli Supreme Court, but by 2009 the route of the planned wall, while not yet walled, was completely barricaded so no Palestinian could pass.

Wall II

The Barrier wall is effectively separating Arab from Jew in rural areas along much of its 456-mile length, perhaps nowhere more so than in the Hebron Governate. In the Hebron District, Israel's Barrier will run from Kfar Ezion to the south of Hebron city near the Green Line up to el Daheriyya also in the south. From there it will run to the east to Susya, located east of Yatta. Most of the land that will be confiscated in this area is home to small Palestinian villages. This partially explains what has been taking place east of Yatta in the Hebron Southern District. According to the official signs placed by the Israeli engineers and soldiers, the wall's dimensions as of August 2005 were 3 miles (5 km) long and 100 yards (100 meters) wide.

By 2009, Palestinian Hebron was in shambles: a once thriving commercial metropolis, Hebron was a largely shuttered city where unemployment stood at 60 percent. The enforced division of Hebron had virtually emptied the city of the most important historic, religious, and commercial areas of Palestinians. International observers said the settlers regularly toss debris and dirty water into the Arab markets and yards. Settler violence had increased, and the IDF still afforded no protection to the Palestinian residents. Hemmed in and harassed, the Palestinians continued to flee.

The major new settlement point that was established on 19 March 2002 occupied a four-story house in the a-Ras neighborhood on a hill-top less than a mile's trip along streets secured by Israeli soldiers. Dozens of soldiers surrounded the home to protect its new residents. The settlers said they bought the home for $700,000, some of it donated by American supporters. But Israel's CIVIL ADMINISTRATION, the military government in the Occupied Territories, contended that the settlers did not arrange for the PERMITS Israelis need to buy and move into property in the West Bank.

While a military court considered their appeal, the settlers renovated the building and soldiers wandered the airy halls. The house overlooks the main roads leading from Kiryat Arba to the downtown settlements and the Tomb of the Patriarchs/al-Ibrahimi Mosque. The army used to set up a temporary checkpoint at the house on the Jewish Sabbath; after the settlers took over, they set up a more permanent rooftop position. Permit or not, the house will not be demolished; no Jewish house has ever been demolished for lacking a permit.

See also BARRIER; GUSH EMUNIM; HEBRON DISTRICT, SOUTHERN AREA; HEBRON PROTOCOL; JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM; SETTLER VIOLENCE

Bibliography

- ACRI. "HCJ Orders State to Dismantle Concrete Wall in Southern Hebron Hills." Tel Aviv: The Association for Civil Rights in Israel, 25 December 2006.
- APN. "Hebron." Settlements in Focus. New York: Americans for Peace Now. 1:13 (28 September 2005).
- Barghouti, Omar. "Palestine's Tell-Tale Heart." In The New Intifada: Resisting Israel's Apartheid. Edited by Roane Carey. London: Verso, 2001.
- Benn, Aluf, and Gideon Alon. "PM Benjamin Netanyahu's Statement to the Knesset on the Hebron Protocol." Ha'aretz. 16 January 1997.
- . "PM Demands Quick Changes in Hebron for Jewish Control." Ha'aretz. 28 November 2002.
- Ben Simon, Daniel. "Primal Passions." Ha'aretz Friday Magazine. 20 July 2001.
- Benvenisti, Meron. The Crusaders in the Holy Land. New York: Macmillan, 1972.

- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Hebron: The Settlement in the a-Ras Neighborhood Is One Year Old. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, March 2008.
- . Hebron: Willful Abandonment by Security Forces. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, December 2008.
- . Security Forces Stand Idly by during Settler Rioting in Hebron. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, December 2008.
- . Settler Violence Continues in Hebron. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, August 2008.
- . Status Report: Hebron, Area H2, Settlements Cause Mass Departure of Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, August 2003.
- Chomsky, Noam. Fateful Triangle: The United States, Israel, and the Palestinians, updated ed. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 1999.
- David, Shelly Cohen, et al. Impossible Coexistence: Human Rights in Hebron since the Massacre at the Cave of the Patriarchs. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1995.
- Dudai, Ron. Free Rein: Vigilante Settlers and Israel's Non-Enforcement of the Law. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- . Tacit Consent: Israeli Policy on Law Enforcement toward Settlers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- Feuerstein, Ofir. Ghost Town: Israel's Separation Policy and Forced Eviction of Palestinians from the Center of Hebron. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, 2007.
- Friedman, Robert I. Zealots for Zion: Inside Israel's West Bank Settler Movement. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1992.
- HaCohen, Ran. "Hebron, City of Terror." Ran HaCohen: Letter from Israel. 19 February 2003. www.antiwar.com/hacohen/h021903.html.
- Halper, Efrat. "Settler Violence: A Report." News from Within (Jerusalem monthly). 16:9 (2000).
- Hass, Amira. "Protected by the System." Ha'aretz. 25 July 2001.
- Human Rights Watch. Center of the Storm: A Case Study of Human Rights Abuses in Hebron District. New York: Human Rights Watch, 2001.
- Jaradat, Ahmad. "Another Apartheid Wall in the Making." Alternative Information Center. 21 June 2004. Jerusalem. www.alternativenews.org.
- Kamphoefner, Kathy. "Hebron Wall Slated to Divide Hebron, Take Abraham's Tomb." Hebron: Christian Peacemaker Teams, 2003.
- Karmi-Ayyoub, Salma. "The Silent War." Palestine Report Online (East Jerusalem). 21 July 2004. www.palestinereport.ps.
- Karmon, Yehuda. "Changes in the Urban Geography of Hebron during the 19th Century." In Studies on Palestine during the Ottoman Period. Edited by Moshe Ma'oz. Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1975.
- Kern, Kathleen. "Settler Violence and September 11: A Report from the Mean Streets of Hebron." Tikkun Magazine. November–December 2001.
- Kotler, Yair. Heil Kahane. New York: Adama Books, 1986.
- Laurin, Jennifer, Nizar Qattoush, and Wafa' Safar. Infringements in Hebron District. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute of Jerusalem, 2000.
- Lavie, Mark. "Israeli Military Proposes Hebron Wall." Washington Post. 27 April 2005.
- Levy, Gideon. "A Purim Visit to Hebron." Ha'aretz. 17 March 2001.
- Litani, Yehuda. "Hebron and Its Legacy of Hate." Jerusalem Post International Edition. 13 June 1987.
- Morris, Benny. Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict 1881–1999. New York: Knopf, 1999.
- Mueller, Patrick. "The Struggle for Hebron's Old City." News from Within. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center. 29:8 (2003).
- Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment (LAW). Hebron under Siege: Accounts. Jerusalem: LAW, 1999.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestinians in Search of a Just Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Sellick, Patricia. "The Old City of Hebron: Can It Be Saved?" Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:4 (1994).
- Shahak, Israel, and Norton Mezvinsky. Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Stein, Yael. Soldiers' Abuse of Palestinians in Hebron, 3 December 2002. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Sternhell, Zeev. The Founding Myths of Israel: Nationalism, Socialism, and the Making of the Jewish State. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.
- Swisa, Shlomi. Hebron, Area H-2: Settlements Cause Mass Departure of Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2003.
- United Nations Information System on the Question of Palestine, Division for Palestinian Rights. Chronological Review of Events Relating to the Question of Palestine. 31 December 2002.
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. Humanitarian Update: Occupied Palestinian Territories. 31 July 2005.
- Vitulo, Anita. "People Tied to Place: Strengthening Cultural Identity in Hebron's Old City." Journal of Palestine Studies. 33:1 (2003).
- Wilson, Scott. "In Divided Hebron, a Shared Despair." Washington Post. 26 July 2007.

Hebron District, Southern Area: Expulsion of Arabs

In the southern part of the Hebron Governate, in the southern WEST BANK in an area that Palestinians refer to as Masafer Yatta, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) have been systematically attempting to expel the Palestinians who reside there. This activity has been centered in the satellite villages of the town of Yatta: a-Tuba, al-

Mufaḡara, a-Sfai, Magheir al-‘Abid, al-Majaz, a-Tabban, al-Fakhit, al-Halaweh, al-Mirkez, Jinba, al-Kharuba, and a-Sarura. The area is home to about 1,000 Palestinians who live mostly in caves and maintain a traditional lifestyle, farming the LAND and grazing their sheep and goats. In the same area Israel has constructed four SETTLEMENTS plus five OUTPOSTS. There is strong evidence that this area of South Hebron—that is, the whole region south of Yatta, which is currently part of Area C (under complete Israeli control)—is one of the areas that Israel plans to annex in the future. Moreover, the state wants to incorporate the land without any Palestinians and appears determined to expel all the Palestinians residing in small villages within the region.

In the 1970s the IDF regional military commander declared large parts of this area a CLOSED MILITARY ZONE, and this injunction has been repeated since then. The official reasons given for the orders are “security needs,” including using the area for IDF training grounds, although the IDF has never used this region for exercises. But these declarations provide Israel with a “legal” reason for expulsions of those living in the zone.

Cave Area and Its Residents

The southern Hebron hills in general and the closed area in particular are full of natural caves, which Palestinians use for homes and also as shelter for their sheep and goats. In addition to the natural caves, the ancestors of the current cave residents dug caves near wells and farmland. Each family has at least one cave that it uses as a residence for part of the year, although Jinba, a-Tuba, and al-Majaz villages also contain freestanding stone houses. Contrary to common perception, the cave residents are not BEDOUIN and do not migrate. Eighty-eight percent of the cave residents were born there, and, in fact, cave dwellers have been living in the southern Hebron hills at least since the 1830s. Residents support themselves primarily from farming and raising sheep and goats and from the production of milk and cheese. Most of the produce is for home consumption and for their flocks, with the surplus being sold in Yatta and other nearby towns.

Until 1947 the Palestinian farmers of Masafer Yatta cultivated swaths of land that extended all the way to Arad (located on the border of the Negev and Judean deserts, 25 kilometers [15.5 miles] west of the Dead Sea and 45 kilometers [28.0 miles] east of the city of Beersheba). Following the 1948 WAR they became Jordanian residents and were denied access to their land on the Israeli side of the border. After the 1967 WAR Israel occupied this region as well as the rest of the West Bank. When residents returned to their land, the OCCUPATION authorities began to expropriate the farmers’ land for military bases, “drilling zones,” nature reserves, and forests.

The area that the IDF declared a closed military zone, referred to as Firing Area 918, lies southeast of Yatta and consists of some 30,000 dunums (about 7,500 acres) and twelve Palestinian villages. A small number of the residents live there for a few months a year to farm the land and graze their flocks. In many cases this seasonal presence in the closed area reaches a total of six months a year. They farm out of sheer necessity until Israel confiscates their land, arrests them, or drives them off. Most of the residents living in the closed area also have a house in Yatta, which their children use during the school year and the family uses when in town. Yatta is situated about 7 to 10 miles (12 to 17 kilometers) from the villages in the closed area. Because of the distance, the lack of public transportation, and Israeli-imposed RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT to and from the closed area, children of residents who do not own homes in Yatta spend the school year with relatives from their extended family in the town or do not go to school at all.

The closed area has no physical INFRASTRUCTURE, including power, telephone, or WATER. There are no paved ROADS leading from the villages, and its harsh topography compels the residents to travel to and from the closed area by foot, on horse or donkey, or by tractor or off-road vehicle. A few families have a generator that is used primarily for lighting and heating. Residents have two options for obtaining water: rainwater gathered in cisterns in the villages and water purchased outside the closed area that is delivered by tanker and stored in the cisterns. A cubic meter of water purchased this way costs from $6 to $12 (25 to 50 shekels), whereas a cubic meter of water obtained from a running-water system costs from $0.75 to $1.25 (3 to 5 shekels).

No schools are available in the closed area, so residents must rely on the services provided by their parent town, Yatta, and other nearby villages.

Khirbet a-Tawaneh, which is situated just north of the closed area, has one elementary school that is used primarily by the children from nearby a-Tuba. The children go home on weekends and holidays, as well as for the summer. One-quarter of the children in the closed area do not attend school at all but help with the farmwork and the grazing.

The residents also rely on Yatta for medical services. A clinic is being built in nearby Khirbet a-Tawaneh that will provide basic medical services to residents of the closed area. However, it takes from thirty to forty-five minutes to get to Yatta from the closed area, depending on the location of the village and the means of transportation. As a result, residents requiring urgent medical care can find themselves in life-threatening situations. In addition, most of the childbirths take place in the caves under poor sanitary conditions, without licensed midwives and without appropriate medical equipment.

Israeli Settlements in Masafer Yatta

From the early 1980s the Israeli government began confiscating increasing amounts of land for settlements in the area, constructed to create territorial contiguity between border towns inside Israel and the area north of the Green Line. The settlements were erected on expropriated Palestinian-owned property, which the government declared STATE LAND. In the early 1980s, Israel built four settlements near the closed area, in which, by 2005, some 1,600 settlers lived: Carmel and Ma'on north of the closed area, and Susia and Mezadot Yehuda (also known as Beit Yatir) to the west. From 1996 to 2001 the settlers established four outposts near the settlements: Avigail, Hill 833, Mitzpeh Ya'ir (also called Magen David), and Nof Neshar (also called Lucifer Farm). A fifth outpost, Ma'on Farm, was established inside the closed area but evacuated in 2005. Other Israeli settlements in the Southern Hebron Governate include Eshkolot, Sinsaneh, Telem, Adora, Nego-hut, Otni'el, and Pene Hever.

According to B'Tselem, "All the settlements in the Masafer Yatta area are inhabited by extremist national-religious settlers. These settlers make religious claims to the land and assert themselves sole owners of the land. They assert that all non-Jews must be expelled from the land. They claim that all means are acceptable to achieve this goal. Many of the settlers of this area are linked to the KACH organization."

The Mount Hebron Regional Council intends to pave a new settler road parallel to the north-to-south Route 317. Such roads are typically closed to Palestinians. The road will link Mezadot Yehuda, Mitzpeh Ya'ir, Ma'on, and Carmel and will likely run the whole length of the closed area and through the cave residents' land. In addition, the Israeli MEDIA reported in 2005 that the council is planning to build forty new housing units in Mitzpeh Ya'ir near the closed area.

In the total Hebron Governorate there are twenty-three settlements whose built-up area is 3.7 square kilometers (1.4 square miles and about 0.4 percent of the total area of the Hebron Governorate). This number does not include the municipal area estimated at 39.9 square kilometers (15.4 square miles, 3.7 percent of the total area of Hebron District). These settlements are distributed along three nearly parallel lines. In addition to the existence of the settlement belt at the southern section of the governorate, there is the settlement of Kiryat Arba and its northern neighborhood, Kharsina (Ramat Mamre), which are the largest settlements in the governorate, with a total population of 7,000—the most extremist West Bank settlers. The total settler population in the Governorate of Hebron was approximately 15,000 in 2006.

Although the outposts in this region lack building PERMITS, an outline plan, or official approval for their establishment, government ministries have nevertheless provided financial support to the settlements. For example, the Interim Report on the Unauthorized Outposts indicates that the Housing Ministry transferred $320,000 (1.3 million shekels) to Mitzpeh Ya'ir and over $140,000 (570,000 shekels) to Avigail, which is situated near the western boundary of the closed area.

In FINAL STATUS TALKS between Israel and the Palestinians held in July 2000 at CAMP DAVID, Israeli prime minister EHUD BARAK offered a proposal by which Israel would annex 13 percent of the West Bank, including Masafer Yatta, and would hold another 10 percent of the land for a period of at least ten years. The proposal came to nothing in the collapse of Camp David.

Expulsion Efforts

During the 1970s the IDF carried out a number of sporadic expulsions of Palestinians, sometimes on a small scale and on other occasions as much larger operations. During these evictions houses were destroyed, and residents were ordered to leave their villages and were informed that they could not remain in the area. In 1984 the IDF implemented a more thorough expulsion in Khirbat al-Jinba, a small village composed of a few dozen houses and tents, which were totally destroyed. All of the residents were expelled.

The first attempt to carry out a massive expulsion took place in November 1999, during the Oslo Process, when the IDF, accompanied by CIVIL ADMINISTRATION officials, forcibly removed 750 Palestinians residing in twelve villages in the Yatta area. This action was taken because of demands by settlers from Ma'on, who had established a farm outpost and exerted pressure on the government to evict the Palestinians from nearby areas. The IDF soldiers, accompanied by bulldozers, expelled the cave residents; sealed their caves; ruined their tents, produce, and clothes; destroyed wells; and demolished temporary structures used to provide services to the residents. After hundreds of people, including children and infants, were prohibited from returning to the area, they were forced to pass the winter in nearby caves. During the spring of 2000 the cave residents petitioned the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT to halt their expulsion. After a public struggle in which various Israeli political organizations, writers, and public figures lent support to the cave residents, the court issued a temporary injunction, returning the residents to the area and enjoining the state from expelling them until the court reached a final decision in the matter. After this injunction the families returned to their land, although Israel made continuous efforts to complete the expulsion before a final decision is handed down. In the years since 2003 the army, too, has damaged their property. Furthermore, Israeli planning officials have refused to issue building permits that would provide the cave residents with housing and demolished new structures that the residents built in the villages.

From 3 to 5 July 2001, another expulsion occurred, which was far wider in scope than previous ones and affected communities throughout the region between Yatta and the Green Line and east of the Yatta-as Samou'a road. These expulsions involved a large military and civil administration presence. Caves that had been sealed in the past were now completely destroyed by bulldozers, which also blocked most of the water wells in the area, ruined crops and property, and killed livestock. Hundreds of people were dispossessed of their land. Among the people expelled were those whom the High Court—in the spring of 2000—had explicitly stated were not to be evicted. During this expulsion campaign the military prevented the Red Cross from providing the Palestinians with basic humanitarian assistance such as food, blankets, and tents.

During the months following the large-scale expulsions some of the residents managed to return to their land. To prevent any form of provisional residency the military prohibited the Palestinians from erecting tents, rebuilding the ruins, cultivating their land, or tending their herds. In addition the IDF blocked all attempts made by Israeli and international human rights organizations to provide food assistance and tents to the population; the military even destroyed the tents that had been donated by the Red Cross. Following wide-scale public protests and legal appeals, the state prosecutor announced that the government would avoid further exacerbating the residents' conditions and allow them to rebuild their homes.

Nevertheless, on the night of 16–17 September 2001 the military began another round of evictions that lasted several days. Targeting two locations near Susiya (Khirbat al-Nabi and Khirbat al-Tawaymin) that had not been included in previous campaigns, soldiers carried out nightly raids and destroyed buildings and structures sheltering livestock, as well as water wells. The residents reported that the military used physical violence against them, including blast grenades that were thrown at one of the family encampments. In all, 118 people were evicted during this wave. Subsequently the Palestinian residents filed an appeal to the Supreme Court requesting that Israel allow them to continue living on and cultivating their land. In the high court injunction Judge Ayala Proccaccia prohibited the Israeli authorities from expelling the Palestinians from the region, but in spite of the court order a renegade group of IDF soldiers destroyed buildings, property, and wells belonging to the Palestinian Abu Kavash family near Al Samou'a.

On 26 September 2001, following the Supreme Court decision, the Khirbat Susia residents returned to their lands and were met by IDF soldiers who presented an order stating that the region was a closed military zone for a period of three months. This order was a direct violation of the high court decision and a promise made by the defense minister to stop the evictions. On 29 September, as a consequence of intense media coverage and political pressure, the Defense Ministry announced that the residents were free to return to their land, and dozens of Palestinians did so.

Israel's policy of expelling the Palestinians from the al-Mufqara region of the Hebron District is being contested by an Israeli support group, TA'AYUSH, a coalition of organizations from Israel's peace camp that, in partnership with several Palestinian groups, attempts to halt the expulsions. Ta'ayush stated its case in 2002: "The Israeli government, military, civil administration, and Jewish settlers have been carrying out a premeditated and coordinated plan to make the South Hebron area 'Arab Free.' . . . The government pursues this plan while expropriating Palestinian land and issuing injunctions that confine the residents' right to remain in the region. These actions are carried out in order to exhaust the local Palestinian population and to run them off their land. In the last few months, the rate of evictions has increased and the attempt to ethnically cleanse the whole area is underway."

On 6 June 2007 the Supreme Court ruled in favor of a petition brought by residents of the settlement of Susiya. The court agreed with the settlement (which also stole the name Susiya), which legally allows the eviction of the area's legal landowners. Because their land is considered "Area C," the Israeli state declared that the Palestinians are illegally squatting on the land they have lived on for centuries.

Settler Violence

Since the residents returned to the caves in March 2000, they have been subject to abuse by the settlers living nearby, in addition to the IDF harassment. According to B'Tselem, 88 percent of the residents have been victims of SETTLER VIOLENCE or have witnessed such violence toward a first-degree relative. No village has managed to escape settler abuse, although the frequency and nature of the abuse differs from village to village. Khirbet al-Fakhit, for example, suffered relatively little, apparently because it is situated far from the settlements and outposts near the closed area.

The abuse can be categorized by four broad patterns: (1) blocking roads and preventing access to fields (51 percent of the cases); (2) property damage, including destruction of crops and theft of sheep and goats (21 percent); (3) intimidation (17 percent); and (4) physical violence (11 percent). The attacks on property increased during the planting and harvesting seasons, which harms families in the closed area, because most earn their entire livelihood from farming and grazing.

For years Palestinian children who live in the closed area and study at the elementary school in Khirbet a-Tawaneh have been victims of attacks by settlers living in Ma'on. Because the settlers intimidated and beat the children when they tried to use the direct route to a-Tawaneh, the children used a longer and alternate route to get to school. In the beginning of the 2005 school year, members of the international voluntary organization CHRISTIAN PEACEMAKER TEAMS began to accompany children on their way to school using the direct route. In three instances Ma'on settlers beat the volunteers.

On 29 April 2004 a large contingent of Israeli police, army, Border Police, and Civil Administration officials came to the village of a-Tabban. A village elder reported to B'Tselem: "They destroyed our tents, the pens for our sheep and goats, and wells. When my children tried to remove mattresses and kitchen utensils from the tents, the soldiers beat them. They also tried to hit me. Tareq [commander of the forces] told them not to touch me because I am elderly and he ordered the soldiers to take me from the area and tie my hands. . . . In the past three years, Israeli aircraft have been spraying our fields and crops with chemicals completely destroying the crops. Tanks and jeeps also go onto our fields and destroy them. The army also destroyed six structures that we built from contributions by an organization from abroad, and which my family used."

See also HOUSE DEMOLITIONS; SASSON REPORT; TRANSFER AND DISPLACEMENT

Bibliography

- Algazy, Joseph. "Safe Enough for Settlers, but Not for Those Whose Grandfathers Lived There." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 5 February 2002.
- Amayreh, Khalid. "The Jewish Settler Pogrom against Palestinians Must Be Stopped Now." Palestine Think Tank: Free Minds for a Free Palestine. 5 August 2008. <http://palestinethinktank.com/>.
- Ashkar, Antigona. Means of Expulsion: Violence, Harassment and Lawlessness against Palestinians in the Southern Hebron Hills. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2005.
- Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT). "Israeli Military Action Again Blocks Main Access Road in South Hebron Hills." Peacemaker Teams. 9 June 2008. <http://www.cpt.org>.

- . “Israeli Settlers Attack Children for the Fourth Time in One Week.” Posted by Palestine Solidarity Project (PSP). 2 August 2008. <http://palestinesolidarityproject.org>.
- . “Israeli Soldiers and Settlers Harass Palestinian Shepherds; Soldiers Wound Sheep.” 25 February 2008. <http://www.cpt.org>.
- . “Palestinians Require Hospitalization after Settler Attack in South Hebron.” 25 June 2008. <http://www.cpt.org>.
- . “When Grazing Sheep Becomes an Act of Non-Violent Resistance.” 15 March 2008. <http://www.cpt.org>.
- Committee on the Rights of the Child. “Israel and Occupied Palestinian Territories: Individual Submission on the Situation in the Area of At-Tuwani, South Hebron Hills.” UPR Session, December 2008. [lib.ohchr.org/HRBodies/UPR/Documents/Session3/IL/APGXXIII\_ISR\_UPR\_S3\_2008\_Asoociación PapaGiovanniXXIII\_uprsubmission.pdf](http://lib.ohchr.org/HRBodies/UPR/Documents/Session3/IL/APGXXIII_ISR_UPR_S3_2008_Asoociación PapaGiovanniXXIII_uprsubmission.pdf).
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. “Data on Hebron District.” Settlement Database, Washington, DC, 1999. www.fmep.org.
- Halper, Jeff. The Israeli Army’s Campaign of Revenge and Ethnic Cleansing. Jerusalem: The Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions, 6 July 2001.
- Land Research Center and Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. Monitoring Israeli Settlement Activities in the Palestinian Territories. Jerusalem: LRC and Arij, 2006. www.lrcj.org; www.poica.org.
- Laurin, Jennifer, Nizar Qattoush, and Wafa’ Safar. Infringements in Hebron District. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute of Jerusalem, 2000.
- Levy, Gideon. “No Water in the Pipes.” Ha’aretz. 12 July 2001.
- . “Out in the Cold: Hundreds of Bedouin and Palestinian Farmers Have Lost Their Homes to a Cruel Deal between the Jewish Settlers and the Authorities.” Ha’aretz Week End. 28 January 2000.
- Palestine Solidarity Project. “264 Palestinians Forced from Their Homes . . . Again.” 2 November 2007.
- . “Demonstration against the Expulsion of the People of Susiya.” 7 July 2007. <http://palestinesolidarityproject.org/2007/07/07/demonstration-against-the-expulsion-of-the-people-of-susiyah/>.
- . “Israeli Military Invasions Intensify in Southern West Bank.” 27 February 2009.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestinians in Search of a Just Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Stein, Yael. Expulsion of Palestinian Residents from the South Mt. Hebron Area, October–November 1999. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, 2000.
- Ta’ayush: Arab Jewish Partnership. Solidarity Actions with the Inhabitants of South Hebron Area. 2002. <http://taayush.org>.

Hebron Disturbances, 1929

See WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES

Hebron Massacre, 1994

On 25 February 1994, Dr. BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, a US-born physician-settler armed with a Galil assault rifle, entered AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE (Tomb of the Patriarchs) in HEBRON, walked past the Israeli troops stationed there to protect worshippers, and killed twenty-nine Muslims at prayer, wounding 125 others. Goldstein was killed after he was overcome by surviving worshippers.

Rioting immediately following the massacre led to the deaths of another twenty-six Palestinians and two Israelis. Israel responded by imposing a CURFEW on the 160,000 Palestinian residents of Hebron for thirty days. During the eighteen months following the end of the first curfew, twelve more twenty-four-hour curfews of varying length were imposed on Hebron Palestinians, totaling fifty days, plus forty night curfews. Hebron’s Jewish settlers, however, were free to live normally.

Goldstein’s act had profound effects on the OSLO PROCESS. For one, it highlighted the dangers posed by Israeli settlers to Palestinians in the Occupied Territories and spread terror among the Palestinians. The Israeli government expressed shock and outrage at the massacre, yet took no substantive measures to remove the settlers or to restrict their actions against the Palestinians. Many Israelis as well as Palestinians called for removing the 400-plus settlers in Hebron, and a majority of Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN’s cabinet favored their removal, but Rabin vetoed it.

Although the major focus of the OSLO ACCORDS was on Israeli security, the Hebron massacre, which occurred within days of the signing of the first GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT (part of the Oslo Accords), demonstrated that Palestinians were vulnerable to Israeli security abuses and indifference to Palestinian safety. Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT initially demanded that Israel permit the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) to dispatch a Palestinian police force to Hebron and that Israel remove the settlers. Faced with unrelenting Israeli opposition to both demands, Arafat eventually dropped them but demanded that international observers be stationed in the volatile city. Rabin eventually permitted a group known as the TEMPORARY INTERNATIONAL PRESENCE IN HEBRON to come to Hebron in March 1994. Their mandate, however, was so restrictive that they were ineffective, and four months later (in August 1994) Rabin sent them home.

Another consequence of the massacre was a change in the HAMAS movement. Significantly, the first Palestinian suicide attack occurred two months after this massacre in retaliation for the murders. Until then, Hamas activists had concentrated their actions against Palestinian collaborators and Israeli military targets, with only one bombing directed against a civilian target in Israel. After the massacre, however, Hamas decided to engage in SUICIDE BOMBING of civilian targets, the first of which occurred on 4 April 1994. The suicide bombings in turn contributed significantly to the collapse of the peace process.

Bibliography

- David, Shmuel. "Impossible Coexistence: Human Rights in Hebron since the Massacre at the Cave of the Patriarchs." Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1995.
- Human Rights Watch. "Center of the Storm: A Case Study of Human Rights Abuses in Hebron District." New York: Human Rights Watch, 2001.
- Levy, Gideon. "A Purim Visit to Hebron." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem), 17 March 2001.
- Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1988.
- Palestine Human Rights Information Center. The Massacre in al-Haram al-Ibrahimi al-Sharif: Context and Aftermath. Jerusalem: PHRIC, 1994.
- Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment. Hebron under Siege: Accounts. Jerusalem: LAW, 1999.
- Shahak, Israel, and Norton Mezvinsky. Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Hebron Protocol, 1997

The Protocol Concerning Redeployment in HEBRON was signed by the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), Israel, and the UNITED STATES on 15 January 1997, and divided Hebron city into two distinct sectors. Israel was accorded full control of sector H-2, which constituted 20 percent of the city, including its commercial center, the choicest real estate, the old Suq market area, and AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE and contained 600 settlers and some 35,000 Palestinians. By expanding and according formal recognition to an exclusive settler enclave under Israeli control within a Palestinian city, the protocol implicitly sanctioned this and other (heretofore considered illegal) settlements encroaching on Hebron and facilitated Jewish settlements in the centers of other Palestinian cities. According to the protocol, Israel would redeploy from the remaining 80 percent of the city (H-1), where 160,000 Palestinians would be permitted limited autonomy and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) would be responsible for security, although subject to Israeli restrictions and conditions. The protocol also required Israel to make three additional redeployments in other WEST BANK areas within eighteen months, provided the Palestinians met their "security responsibilities" of protecting the Israelis; and the protocol stipulated that "Israel alone will decide the[ir] timing and scope." The Knesset approved the protocol on 16 January by a vote of eighty-seven to seventeen, with the LABOR opposition voting with the LIKUD government.

The protocol required Israel to

- Remove the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) from 80 percent of Hebron within ten days of 15 January 1997.
- Begin the first phase of withdrawal from rural areas in the West Bank by 7 March 1997.
- Carry out the second phase of withdrawal eight months after the first stage.
- Complete the third phase before mid-1998. In this phase Israel would withdraw from the remaining parts of the West Bank, apart from "settlements and military locations."
- Begin negotiations with the PNA on the FINAL STATUS TALKS within two months of the Hebron Protocol and complete negotiations by 4 May 1999.

The protocol required Palestinians to

- Convene the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL and revoke the PALESTINE NATIONAL CHARTER.
- Fight terror and prevent violence by all means.
- Strengthen security cooperation with both Israel and the United States.

- Prevent “incitement” and “hostile propaganda” among the Palestinian population.
- Combat systematically and effectively TERRORIST organizations and infrastructure, including the apprehension, prosecution, and punishment of terrorists.
- Confiscate illegal firearms.

In addition the size of the Palestinian police force, the exercise of governmental activity, and the location of Palestinian governmental offices would follow what was specified in the INTERIM AGREEMENT, also called Oslo II.

After the first redeployment was completed—the only one that Israel implemented—Israel remained in exclusive control of 71 percent of the West Bank (Area C) and had security control over another 23 percent (Area B), while the PNA exercised control over only 6 percent (Area A). On 21 March 1997 a suicide bomber in a Tel Aviv café killed three Israelis and wounded forty-two, after which Prime Minister Netanyahu suspended further negotiations with the Palestinians and announced that there would be no further withdrawals because the PNA was not living up to its security responsibilities. (See Map 21.)

On 18 April 1997, Israel defied world opinion by beginning construction of the HAR HOMA SETTLEMENT on Jabal Abu Ghneim to complete a circle of Jewish SETTLEMENTS around occupied East JERUSALEM.

In the Interim Agreement, Israel had committed to redeploy from Hebron no later than six months after its signing, that is, in September 1996. Prime Minister SHIMON PERES, however, suspended the redeployment because of Palestinian SUICIDE BOMBINGS that came in retaliation for Israel’s TARGETED ASSASSINATION of YAHYA AYYASH, a Hamas bomb maker. When Netanyahu became prime minister, he declared there would be no redeployments and canceled the Interim Agreement. Washington became concerned and convened talks in October 1996 in TABA, EGYPT, which focused on getting the peace process back on track. That meant redirecting attention to the Hebron redeployment. Facing a potential crisis with the United States if he refused to participate in negotiations, Netanyahu made a tactical decision to engage in the process without compromising his principles. President BILL CLINTON supported the Israeli position on Hebron but clarified specific US conditions, embodied in a Note for the Record and in a private letter from Secretary of State WARREN CHRISTOPHER to Netanyahu. Nevertheless, it required three additional months of negotiations until Israel agreed to sign the Hebron Protocol, which occurred at ERETZ CROSSING. It was the shortest agreement between the two parties but the one that contained the most explicit loss for the Palestinians—the 20 percent of Hebron city that would be under Israeli control, and the precedent that set.

Following the signing of the Hebron Protocol, the two sides also signed an agreement on the TEMPORARY INTERNATIONAL PRESENCE IN HEBRON on 21 January 1997, setting out the arrangements for up to 180 observers from the SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES, Italy, Switzerland, and TURKEY, with Norway responsible for the coordination, to monitor and report on conflicts in the city.

After implementation of the Hebron Protocol, Palestinians living in H-2 experienced a sharp deterioration in their living conditions, and, as a result, those families who could afford to do so moved to other neighborhoods. According to B’Tselem, the Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, among the factors causing residents to leave the area were the following:

- Palestinians suffered almost daily physical violence and property damage by settlers in the city.
- The RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT in the city were among the harshest in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. The IDF imposed a CURFEW on Palestinian residents of H-2, in response to violence by both Palestinians and settlers, and to enable settlers to hold public events.
- Some 2,000 to 2,500 shops and businesses were closed. Business life in the Casbah and Bab a-Zawiya areas, which had constituted the commercial center of the city, came to an almost complete standstill.
- Palestinian residents of H-2 also suffered from serious acts of violence by border policemen and IDF soldiers due to the tension of having the settlers within the city.

In the highly charged atmosphere of Netanyahu’s November 1998 announcement that he would not implement the remainder of the Hebron Protocol and would reactivate the settlement policy, an undeclared Arab group carried out two suicide bombings in JERUSALEM. Israel and the United States immediately condemned the PNA for its failure to fulfill its security obligations and demanded that it arrest every Islamist in the Occupied Territories. Washington then inserted the CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY as coordinator between Israeli and Palestinian security services and produced an agreement on 17 December 1997, known as the "Israel and the Palestinian Authority Memorandum on Security Understanding." The accord was focused on Israel's security needs, held the PNA responsible for all acts of violence against Israelis, and stipulated that the PNA use all measures against its people to end violence and guarantee Israel's security.

© Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA), Jerusalem, reprinted with permission.

Map 21. The Divided City of Hebron Following the Hebron Protocol, 1997

During the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, which began in September 2000, Israel retook control of Area H-1.

Bibliography

- Andoni, Lamis. "Redefining Oslo: Negotiating the Hebron Protocol." Journal of Palestine Studies. 26:3 (1997).
- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization. "Protocol Concerning the Redeployment in Hebron (Agreed Version), Erez Crossing, 15 January 1997." Journal of Palestine Studies. 26:3 (1997).
- Israel and the Palestinian Authority. "Memorandum on Security Understanding, 17 December 1997." Journal of Palestinian Studies. 27:3 (1998).
- Landay, Jonathan S. "CIA's New Mideast Role: Referee." Christian Science Monitor. 27 October 1998.
- Netanyahu, Benjamin. "Statement to the Knesset by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on the Protocol Concerning Redeployment in Hebron." Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1997. www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00t60.
- Pundak, Ron. "From Oslo to Taba: What Went Wrong?" June 2001. www.ajds.org.au/pundak.htm.
- Said, Edward. "The Real Meaning of the Hebron Agreement." Journal of Palestine Studies. 26:3 (1997).
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Swisa, Shlomi. Hebron, Area H-2: Settlements Cause Mass Departure of Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2003.
- United Nations Office of the Special Coordinator in the Occupied Territories. Economic and Social Conditions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Quarterly Report, Summer 1997. Gaza City: OSCOT, 1997.
- US Embassy. Note for the Record. Tel Aviv: US Embassy, 1997. http://telaviv.usembassy.gov/publish/peace/note\_record.htm.
- Weiner, Tim. "CIA Officers Teach Tricks of Their Trade to Palestinians." The New York Times. 5 March 1997.

Heroes of the Return

The Heroes of the Return (Abtal al-Awda) first appeared in 1966 as a small underground commando group in LEBANON associated with regional elements of the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN). In 1967 the Heroes of the Return merged with the Young Avengers, or Youth Revenge Group (Shebab Al-Tha'r), also a regional entity of MAN, and the two in turn merged with AHMAD JIBRIL'S PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (PLF, formed in 1961). Within months all amalgamated into the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), headed by GEORGE HABASH. In 1968 Jibril split with the PFLP and formed the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND (PFLP-GC) and took the Heroes of the Return and the Youth Revenge Group with him.

Bibliography

- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: the Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Herut Party

Herut (Tenuat ha-Herut, National Jewish Movement) was the political party of the Revisionist Zionist movement in Israel. Founded in 1948 by MENAHEM BEGIN and other remnants of the militant Zionist group IRGUN TZEVA'I LE'UMI, it was committed to the principles of VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY, founder of Revisionist ZIONISM. An extreme right-wing party, Herut believed that Israel should include the territory from the sea (Mediterranean) through both sides of the Jordan River (i.e., the state of JORDAN) and opposed any territorial compromises, especially the creation of a Palestinian state.

Begin led the party until 1983, when YITZHAK SHAMIR became its head. In 1965, Herut joined with the LIBERAL PARTY to form the GAHAL bloc, although it retained its own organization within the new party and dominated the new formation. In 1973, Gahal merged with other right-wing parties to form the LIKUD, but Herut maintained a dominant role in the new party and provided the main leaders of Likud. In 1988 the parties in the Likud coalition, including Herut, formally merged and Herut ended its independent existence.

In 1998 a new Herut party was created by dissenting members of the Likud, led by BENJAMIN

BEGIN, the son of Menahem Begin. The second incarnation of the Herut, or the National Jewish Movement, was in essence a continuation of the historic Herut. According to its founders, the need for reestablishing Herut arose when Israel's Likud government implemented the HEBRON PROTOCOL and agreed at WYE Plantation to cede parts of Judea and Samaria (the WEST BANK) to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. Knesset members Benjamin Begin, Michael Kleiner, and David Re'em resigned from the Likud and reestablished Herut as a political vehicle for continuing the struggle for Greater Israel. Herut affirms, according to its literature, that "Eretz Israel was given in eternal trust to the Jewish people—past, present and future—and only they have the right to a sovereign state with JERUSALEM as its eternal capital. No Israeli government, therefore, can renounce any part of The Land, even in the name of peace." (www.herut.org.il/old/index-1.htm).

See also MOLEDET PARTY; TEKUMA

Bibliography

Roberts, Samuel J. Party and Policy in Israel: The Battle between Hawks and Doves. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.

Shapiro, Yonathan. The Road to Power: Herut Party in Israel. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.

Herzl, Theodor Binyamin Ze'ev (1860–1904)

Theodor Herzl, a Viennese journalist, was the father of modern political ZIONISM and founder of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION. He was born in Budapest and his Jewish family moved to Vienna in 1878; he grew up in a secular environment and was educated during the GERMAN Jewish Enlightenment. Herzl received a doctorate in law in 1884 and worked for a short while in the Vienna and Salzburg courts but left law within a year and devoted himself to writing, for which he had demonstrated ability from an early age.

In 1891 Herzl became Paris correspondent for the Viennese Neue Freie Presse (New Free Press), a liberal newspaper. In Paris he witnessed the effects of ANTI-SEMITISM as manifested in the court-martial of ALFRED DREYFUS, a French-Jewish army officer who, after an unjust conviction on espionage charges, was stripped of his rank and imprisoned in a humiliating public ceremony in January 1895 while a mob shouted, "Death to the Jews." Herzl became convinced that the only solution to the problems facing Jews was the mass exodus of Jews from their current places of residence to a home of their own. Originally he wrote that it did not matter where the Jews went and he was prepared to accept a home in Uganda, although he eventually settled on Palestine.

Herzl believed that anti-Semitism was a stable and immutable factor in human society that assimilation did not solve. In 1896, despite ridicule from Jewish leaders, he published Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State). In this work he argued that the Jews are one people and their plight could be resolved by the establishment of a Jewish state, with the consent of the great powers. He saw the Jewish question as a political issue to be dealt with in the international arena. In his novel Altneuland (Old New Land, 1902), Herzl envisioned a socialist Jewish utopian society that would arise in Israel by means of science and technology and be "a light unto the nations"—borrowing a phrase from the ancient prophets of Israel.

Although others had suggested solutions to anti-Semitism, Herzl was the first to call for immediate political action, but Jewish reaction to his plan was mixed. His ideas were met with enthusiasm by some of the Jewish masses in Eastern Europe, although Jewish leaders were less ardent. Herzl appealed to wealthy Jews such as Baron Hirsch and BARON ROTHSCHILD to join the national Zionist movement but without success initially. For those who responded positively to his ideas, he called for an international conference. The result was the First Zionist Congress, held in Basel, Switzerland, on 29–31 August 1897, the first international gathering of Jews on a national and secular basis. The delegates adopted the BASEL PROGRAM, which became the basis of the political Zionist movement, and created the major institutions that were to lead the movement thereafter—most importantly, the World Zionist Organization (at the time, Zionist Organization), which served as the political arm of the Jewish people and helped establish the economic foundation for the proposed Jewish state.

Herzl was elected first president of the World Zionist Organization and chaired the first six WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESSES. In his remaining years he spent much of his time meeting with world leaders, both Jewish and non-Jewish, trying to enlist financial and political support for his dream of a Jewish state. He died before his dream could become reality, but his influence extended far beyond his death.

Bibliography

- Ali Khalidi, Muhammad. "Utopian Zionism or Zionist Proselytism: A Reading of Herzl's Altneuland." Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:4 (2001).
- Bein, Alex. Theodore Herzl: A Biography. Translated from the German by Maurice Samuel. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America, 1940.
- Cohen, Israel. Theodor Herzl: Founder of Political Zionism. New York: Thomas Yoseloff Publisher, 1959.
- Hertzberg, Arthur, ed. The Zionist Idea: A Historical Analysis and Reader. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society, 1997.
- Herzl, Theodor. Diaries of Theodor Herzl. Translated from the German and reissued. Gloucester, MA: Peter Smith Publisher, 1987.
- . The Jewish State. Translated from the German and reissued. New York: Dover Publications, 1989.
- Khalidi, Walid. "The Jewish-Ottoman Land Company: Herzl's Blueprint for the Colonization of Palestine." Journal of Palestine Studies. 22:2 (1993).

Herzog, Chaim (1918–1997)

Chaim Herzog was a military commander, diplomat, and president of Israel. Born in Belfast, Northern Ireland, he immigrated to Palestine with his family in 1935. Herzog received his early education in the Jewish Yishuv, then studied at Cambridge and London universities, where he earned a law degree.

During World War II Herzog served as a tank commander in Britain's elite Guard Armoured Division, later becoming a director of British intelligence in GERMANY. In this capacity he identified a captured soldier as Nazi leader Heinrich Himmler. After the war he served in the HAGANA, the underground military organization in Palestine. During the 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Herzog was an officer in the battle for Latrun, a strategic hilltop overlooking the road to Jerusalem, and later headed military intelligence twice, in 1948–1950 and 1959–1962. He served as Israel's military attaché in Washington from 1950 to 1954, as commanding officer of the JERUSALEM district from 1954 to 1957, and as chief of the Southern Command from 1957 to 1959. In 1962, Herzog retired from the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) and became the head of an industrial investment company.

During the 1967 WAR Herzog was a radio commentator best known for his military and political analyses. Likewise, during the 1973 War, Israelis relied on his commentaries on the war. In 1975 Herzog became Israel's ambassador to the UNITED NATIONS, where he was an aggressive advocate for Israel's interests, campaigning against the resolution that equated ZIONISM and racism (UN RESOLUTION 3379, 10 November 1975) and defending Israel's rescue of Jewish hostages in ENTEBBE, Uganda, in July 1976.

In 1981 Herzog was elected to the Knesset as a member of the LABOR PARTY. In 1983 he became Israel's president, a position to which he was reelected by the Knesset in 1988.

Bibliography

- Herzog, Chaim. Arab-Israeli Wars: War and Peace in the Middle East from the War of Independence through Lebanon, revised and updated ed. New York: Vintage, 1983.
- . Heroes of Israel: Profiles of Jewish Courage. New York: Little, Brown, 1989.
- . "Jewish Settlements in 'The Territories' Aren't the Problem." Speech to UN General Assembly, 1978. Reprinted in FrontPageMagazine.com. 9 April 2003. www.frontpagemag.com/Articles/Printable.asp?ID=7142.
- . Living History: A Memoir. New York: Pantheon, 1996.
- . War of Atonement October 1973: The Fateful Implications of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 3rd ed. (originally published by Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1975). London: Greenhill Books, 2003.

Hibbat Tziyon

See HOVEVEI ZION

High Commissioner for Palestine

When Palestine was ruled by Great Britain from 1917 to 1948, initially as occupied enemy territory and later under a mandate from the League of Nations, a high commissioner was appointed to govern Palestine. The mandate was assigned to Britain at the SAN REMO CONFERENCE (1920) after World War I, which ratified the earlier division of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE's Arab provinces between FRANCE and Britain. France gained control over SYRIA and LEBANON, while Britain acquired IRAQ as well as Palestine. All these territories were designated Class A mandates, which meant that they would soon gain self-rule.

Palestine was placed under unique provisions because Britain had promised the Zionist movement in the BALFOUR DECLARATION (2 November 1917) that Jews could establish a national home in the territory.

Britain thus governed Palestine as a colony under the jurisdiction of the Colonial Office, with the region headed by the high commissioner for Palestine, who had unfettered executive and legislative powers, including censorship, DEPORTATION, detention without trial, demolition of the homes of suspects, and collective punishment. These powers were wielded against both the Palestinians and the Jews. Britain appointed the first high commissioner on 1 July 1920, before the mandate was ratified. The commissioner's advisory Executive Council and district commissioners were exclusively British, although they had Palestinian and Jewish assistants. Palestinians and Jews also worked in the administrative departments under British heads. The only elected bodies in Palestine were the municipalities and the organs of the Jewish community. Although some prominent Palestinians participated in an ADVISORY COUNCIL established by the high commissioner in the fall of 1920, they did so as individuals, not as representatives of the public. Moreover, they understood the council was temporary, to be superseded by constitutional representative organs.

Names and dates of appointments of high commissioners are Sir Herbert Samuel (1 July 1920), Lord Herbert Charles Onslow Plumer (14 August 1925), Sir John Chancellor (1 November 1928), Sir Arthur Wauchope (20 November 1931), Sir Harold MacMichael (3 March 1938), Viscount Gort (31 October 1944), and Sir Alan Gordan Cunningham (21 November 1945).

Bibliography

- Jones, A. Philip. Britain and Palestine, 1914–1948: Archival Sources for the History of the British Mandate. London: British Academy, 1979.
- Mattar, Philip. "High Commissioner for Palestine." In The Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- . ed. "Palestine Mandate (1922–1948)." In The Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Reprinted with permission from Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- McTague, John. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1922. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1983.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate, 2nd reprint ed. Farmingdale, NY: Owl Books, 2001.

High Court of Justice, Israel

See ISRAELI SUPREME COURT

High Follow-Up Committee and the Mada Manifesto

The High Follow-Up Committee was established in 1982, in the wake of "Land Day" in 1976 when six unarmed Palestinian citizens were shot dead by Israeli security forces during demonstrations against a wave of LAND confiscations by the state to advance its official goal of "Judaizing" the Galilee.

Since its inception the High Follow-Up Committee has been in the forefront of leadership of the PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL, including annually organizing and mobilizing the people for Land Day commemoration and Nakba remembrance.

In October 2000, Israeli police shot and killed thirteen Arab-Israeli individuals participating in a demonstration supporting Palestinians in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES engaged in the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. Prime Minister EHUD BARAK appointed a commission of inquiry to investigate the deaths. The Or Commission was headed by a senior judge, Theodore Or.

After the Or Commission completed its task, the government appointed a ministerial committee led by Minister of Justice Yosef Lapid to translate the recommendations of Justice Or and his colleagues into practical steps. Organizations representing Arab citizens of Israel, including the Arab Higher Follow-Up Committee, refused to appear before the Lapid Commission, saying that the creation of this second commission was only an attempt by the state to shirk its responsibility for the killings. Six months after the September 2005 publication of the Lapid Commission recommendations, it appeared to the vast majority of Israeli-Arabs that the recommendations of the Lapid Commission were merely dead words. In 2007, the Or Commission's spokesperson, Israel's attorney general Menachem Mazuz, declared that the investigations were being wound up. In most cases there was a lack of evidence, he claimed, and in the cases where there was evidence the policemen had acted in the belief that their lives were in danger. Shawki Khatib, chairman of the High Follow-Up Committee, told a demonstration of some 250,000 that Mazuz's decision proved that, as far as the Israeli authorities were concerned, "Arab blood is worthless."

In August 2007, the Israeli government made a decision to encourage national service among Arabs—both Christian and Muslim—with Israeli citizenship. The service is voluntary and is aimed at helping the Arab community. There was, however, strong opposition within the Arab community. Shaykh Abdullah Nimr Darwish, the founder of Israel's Islamic Movement, said, "Israeli Arabs will never agree to do national service for the State of Israel because it would call into question their loyalty to the Palestinian cause. Any type of national service, no matter what it is, would be perceived by the Palestinian people as military service."

The High Follow-Up Committee immediately became active and on 27 October mobilized hundreds of youth from different Arab villages to attend a national conference against civic service entitled "I Will Not Serve." The conference was overseen by the High Committee in conjunction with Baladna—Association for Arab Youth, the Youth Coalition against Civic Service, the Committee against Civic Service and all Forms of Enlistment, and the Welfare Association.

All of the foregoing, plus many other difficult circumstances, led the High Follow-Up Committee—a cautious and conservative body, mainly comprising the heads of Arab local authorities—which had never before dared to speak out, to commission a body of intellectuals in the community known as Mada, to produce a study on the future of Israel's Arab citizens. The Future Vision of the Palestinian Arabs in Israel was issued under the auspices of the High Committee in December 2006. It is the first such sweeping demand by Israel's Arab mainstream, drafted by forty academics and activists, and it has been endorsed by an unprecedented range of Arab community leaders. The document presents, in addition to a clear bill of indictment against continuing discrimination by all Israeli governments, a radical reconceptualization of Palestinian collective rights and formulates bold demands in this area.

Included in the manifesto are calls for Israel to be reformed from a Jewish state that privileges its Jewish majority into "a state of all its citizens" and for sweeping changes to a national system of land control designed to exclude Palestinian citizens from influence. The manifesto declared that Israel's 1.4 million Arab citizens are an indigenous group with collective rights, not just individual rights. The document argues that Arabs are entitled to share power in a BINATIONAL state and block policies that discriminate against them and demands a partnership in governing the country to ensure that Arab citizens get equal treatment and more control over their communities.

The most contentious issue (for Israeli Jews) raised in the document is Israel's status as a Jewish state. The authors argue that Israel is not a democracy but an "ethnocracy" similar to TURKEY, Sri Lanka, and the Baltic states. Instead, says the manifesto, Israel must become a "consensual democracy" enabling Palestinian citizens "to be fully active in the decision-making process and guarantee our individual and collective civil, historic and national rights."

The demand for a state of all its citizens has wide backing among the Palestinian minority: a recent survey by the Mada Al-Carmel Centre revealed that 90 percent believed a Jewish state could not guarantee them equality, and 61 percent objected to Israel's self-definition.

As well as highlighting the various spheres of life in which Palestinian citizens are discriminated against, the manifesto makes several key demands that are certain to fall on stony Jewish ground.

The High Follow-Up Committee argues that the Palestinian minority must be given "institutional self-rule in the field of education, culture and religion." Israeli officials have always refused to countenance such forms of autonomy. Instead, the separate and grossly underfunded Arab education system is overseen by Jewish officials; the status of the Arabic language is at an all-time low; and the government regularly interferes in the appointment of Muslim and Christian clerics, as well as controlling the running of their places of worship and providing almost no budget for non-Jewish religious services.

The manifesto also demands that Israel "acknowledge responsibility for the Palestinian Nakba"—the catastrophic dispossession of the Palestinian people during Israel's establishment in 1948—and "consider paying compensation for its Palestinian citizens."

As many as one in four Palestinian citizens are internal refugees from the war, and referred to as "PRESENT ABSENTEES" by the Israeli authorities. They were stripped of their homes, possessions, and bank accounts inside Israel, even though they remained citizens. Most homes were either later destroyed by the army or reallocated to Jewish citizens.

An internal government memorandum leaked several years ago showed that most of the internal refugees' money, supposedly held in trust by a state official known as the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY, had disappeared and could no longer be traced.

Another controversial demand is for a radical overhaul of the system of land policy and planning in Israel, described in the manifesto as "the most sensitive issue" between Palestinian citizens and their state. Israel has nationalized 93 percent of the territory inside its vague borders, holding it in trust not for its citizens but for the Jewish people worldwide. The land can be leased, but usually only to Jews.

Israel's Palestinian citizens are restricted to about 3 percent of the land, although they do not control much of the area nominally in their possession. Gerrymandering of municipal boundaries means that Arab local authorities have been stripped of jurisdiction over half of their areas, which have been effectively handed over to Jewish regional councils.

The manifesto calls for an end to other discriminatory land practices: the exclusion of Palestinian citizens from planning committees; the refusal of such committees to issue house-building PERMITS to Palestinian citizens; the enforcement of HOUSE DEMOLITIONS only against Palestinian citizens; and the continuing harmful interference by international Zionist organizations, particularly the JEWISH AGENCY and the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND, in Israel's land and planning system.

The chairman of the High Follow-Up Committee, Shawki Khatib, said: "We've already seen the reality of which the Arab public says to the Jewish public, 'I want to live together, and I really mean it,' but the Jewish public has still not reached the same conclusion. This document is a preliminary spark. Its importance is not in its publishing, but in what happens after it."

Whatever else, the document is likely to further increase tensions between the Israeli government and the country's Palestinian minority and has been roundly condemned in the Hebrew MEDIA. An editorial in Israel's liberal Ha'aretz newspaper denounced the document as "undermining the Jewish character of the state" and argued that it was likely its publication would "actually weaken the standing of Arabs in Israel instead of strengthening it."

See also PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Bibliography

- Badil Resource Center. "Our Displacement—Our Return: Palestinians Commemorate the 53rd Anniversary of Their Massive Displacement by Israel in 1948." Bethlehem: Badil Resource Center. 11 May 2001.
- Baladna News. "Baladna along with the Coalition Against Civic Recruitment: Even the Genie Opposes Civic Service Recruitment." Haifa. 27 October 2007.
- Boudreaux, Richard. "Arabs Say Israel Is Not Just for Jews." Los Angeles Times. 22 February 2007.
- Cook, Jonathan. Blood and Religion: The Unmasking of the Jewish and Democratic State. London: Pluto Press, 2006.
- . "Still No Justice for October 2000 Killings." Electronic Intifada. 26 February 2008. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.
- Dalal, Marwan, ed. Law and Politics before the Or Commission of Inquiry. Israel: WAO, 2003.
- Kaminer, Reuven. "The Future Vision of the Palestinian Arabs in Israel." Politicalaffairs.net. 1 March 2007.
- Khoury, Jack, and Yoav Stern. "Israeli Arabs Protesting in Sakhnin on Friday." Ha'aretz. 2 February 2008.
- Lagerquist, Peter, and Jonathan Cook. "Crime and Punishment on Israel's Demographic Frontier." Middle East Report. Winter 2005.
- Louer, Laurence. To Be an Arab in Israel. New York: Columbia University Press, 2007.
- Payes, Shany. Palestinian NGOs in Israel: The Politics of Civil Society. London: I. B. Tauris, 2005.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Wagner, Matthew. "Darwish: Israeli Arabs Won't Do Civil Service." Jerusalem Post. 17 December 2007.

Hijackings

See ACHILLE LAURO; BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION; ENTEBBE; WADI' HADDAD; POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE

Histadrut

From its establishment in 1920 and into the 1990s, the Histadrut was one of the most powerful institutions in the Yishuv (the Jewish community in Palestine) and then in the state of Israel. (Histadrut is Hebrew for "organization" and is commonly used to refer to what was originally called the General Organization of Hebrew Workers in the Land of Israel, or Ha-Histadrut ha-Klalit shel ha-Ovdim Ha-Ivrim be-Eretz Yisrael.) The dense web of economic, social, cultural, and political institutions it controlled and the policies it implemented not only helped shape Jewish society in Palestine but also affected the character and course of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The Histadrut was created as an instrument of labor ZIONISM, which emerged as a distinct tendency within the broader Zionist movement soon after the establishment of the Zionist Organization (later the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, WZO) in 1897. As opposed to both THEODOR HERZL's bourgeois-secular version of Zionism and the religious Zionist movement that emerged almost simultaneously, labor Zionists sought to synthesize the socialism popular among the oppressed Jewish masses in Eastern Europe (especially in Tsarist Russia) with Zionism's vision of solving Europe's "Jewish problem"—persistent or even worsening anti-Semitism—by creating a Jewish majority and a Jewish state in Palestine. Two rival labor-Zionist parties coalesced in Eastern Europe and then among Jewish immigrants to Palestine during the Second ALIYA (the 1903–1914 wave of Jewish IMMIGRATION to Palestine).

Though largely of lower-middle-class origin, the few thousand labor Zionists who in that period emigrated from Eastern Europe to what they regarded as their ancestral homeland were intent on transforming themselves into authentic workers through physical labor, especially in agriculture. This was in keeping with labor Zionism's doctrine of the "conquest of labor" (kibbush ha-'avodah), which asserted that in Palestine Jews could purge themselves, through manual labor, of the negative social characteristics with which they were associated in the DIASPORA and achieve both personal and national redemption. In so doing they would also create the nucleus of a Hebrew working class in Palestine, which would serve as the vanguard of the Zionist settlement and state-building enterprise. (Labor Zionists routinely used the term "Hebrew" instead of "Jew" to express their denigration and rejection of Diaspora Judaism, which they associated with statelessness and hence powerlessness, preferring to identify themselves with the ancient Hebrews, whom they saw as a sovereign people in their own homeland.)

However, these would-be workers quickly encountered obstacles unforeseen by the theoreticians of labor Zionism. Most Jewish farmers, especially the citrus plantation owners in the new Jewish agricultural settlements (moshavot) established from 1882 onward, preferred to employ cheaper (and less obstreperous) Palestinian workers, while the settlement and financial institutions of the Zionist Organization lacked the means to underwrite the large-scale settlement of these immigrants on farms of their own or secure them jobs elsewhere. As sociologist Gershon Shafir has shown, the inability of these immigrants to compete effectively in Palestine's labor market, dominated by masses of cheap Arab labor, and the resulting prospect that the Zionist project would founder because neither jobs nor resources for settlement (including both LAND and capital) were available to maintain them or attract others, led, through a process of trial and error, to the elaboration and adoption of both a new strategy and an ideology that justified it.

By World War I most labor Zionists had come to believe that the conquest of labor required not just individual and collective proletarianization but also a sustained campaign to prevent Jewish employers from employing Palestinian workers, thereby creating or preserving jobs for Jews. In the years that followed, the commitment to achieving Hebrew labor ('avodah ivrit)—exclusively Jewish employment in all Jewish sectors of Palestine's economy through exclusion of Arab workers, along with maximized Jewish employment in the government and non-Jewish private sectors—became a central component of labor-Zionist discourse and practice. At the same time, labor Zionists began to advocate a systematic effort to develop a separate, self-sufficient, and relatively high-wage Jewish economic sector in Palestine in which (ideally) only Jews would be employed, thereby creating the basis for an economically (and, eventually, politically) autonomous Yishuv. The leadership of the Zionist movement, initially indifferent or even hostile to labor Zionism, eventually endorsed and underwrote this strategy of economic separatism, through subsidies, land purchases, and political support, cementing what sociologist Michael Shalev has called a "practical alliance between a settlement movement without settlers and a workers' movement without work."

By the end of World War I, Britain had not only seized control of Palestine but endorsed the Zionist project, opening the way to large-scale Jewish immigration, settlement, and state building. To enhance labor Zionism's political and social weight within the Yishuv and the international Zionist movement, as well as its effectiveness in implementing its strategy, the two main labor-

Zionist parties—the avowedly social-democratic AHDUT HA'AVODAH (Unity of Labor), the successor of the prewar PO'ALE ZION (Workers of Zion), and the nonsocialist HAPOEL HATZAIR (The Young Worker)—agreed to create a new organization that could organize and mobilize all the Jewish workers in Palestine, regardless of party affiliation. The founding congress of the General Organization of Hebrew Workers in the Land of Israel took place in HAIFA in December 1920.

The founders of the Histadrut did not envision or structure it as a federation of autonomous trade unions, like the Trades Union Congress in Britain or the American Federation of Labor (or the later CIO and AFL-CIO). It was instead a highly centralized organization designed to further labor Zionism's goal of constructing in Palestine a politically, economically, and culturally separate Jewish society along social-democratic lines, which could eventually lead to a Jewish state. Early efforts by some Jewish trade unions to assert their autonomy were quickly crushed by the Histadrut leadership, and thereafter, notwithstanding sporadic upsurges from below, top-down control was exercised through a powerful, increasingly bureaucratized apparatus based in Tel Aviv (the Histadrut's headquarters there was later nicknamed "the Kremlin") as well as through a network of workers' councils in every Jewish city and town. The members of these councils and delegates to the Histadrut's congresses (which in turn elected its executive organs) were chosen not by trade unions but by the vote of all Histadrut members, under a system of proportional representation by party slates. This structure tended to give party apparatchiks (mainly from Ahdut Ha'avodah and then from MAPAI [Land of Israel Workers' Party], created in 1930 by the merger of that party with Hapo'el Hatza'ir) firm control of the Histadrut apparatus at the local as well as national level.

While the Histadrut leadership sometimes launched or supported (Jewish) workers' struggles for higher wages and better working conditions, on other occasions it sabotaged or crushed grassroots militancy when it was deemed to threaten the interests of Mapai, the Histadrut, or the Zionist cause. For the Histadrut leadership, trade unionism was always secondary in importance to the organization's "national" (i.e., Zionist) tasks, including immigration, settlement, education, and culture. The Histadrut played an especially crucial role in implementing labor Zionism's strategy of separate Jewish economic development in Palestine, using capital raised from its members' dues, the Zionist Organization, Jewish investors and donors, and later its own financial institutions to gradually build up a burgeoning network of industrial, agricultural, construction, housing, commercial, marketing, banking, insurance, and transport enterprises, largely controlled through its Hevrat 'Ovdim (Workers' Company) holding company. The Histadrut also played a central role in the sustained campaign to encourage Jews in Palestine to boycott local Arab and any imported produce and products to the greatest extent possible and instead to buy only local Jewish produce and goods, thereby supporting separate economic development. At the peak of the Histadrut's economic power in the 1970s, enterprises owned by or affiliated with it—including the new forms of collective and cooperative Jewish agricultural settlement (the KIBBUTZ and the moshav) developed in Palestine—accounted for as much as one-quarter of the Israeli economy. Beginning with some 5,000 members at its founding, the Histadrut also came to encompass over the decades an increasingly large proportion of Palestine's Jewish population (including the nonworking wives of its largely male membership) and to constitute a powerful (in some domains, virtually monopolistic) presence in the daily lives of most Israelis. In addition to its economic enterprises, it ran its own labor exchanges through which members could seek jobs; had affiliated organizations for women and youth; ran its own separate labor-oriented school system into the early 1950s; owned one of Israel's largest publishing houses; and offered members and their families a broad range of cultural, recreational, and social services, including Kupat Holim, the Histadrut's health-care organization, which at its peak (before the 1990s, when the state assumed greater control of the health-care system) served some three-quarters of Israel's population. Its members also played key roles in the Yishuv's main paramilitary organization, the HAGANA. At its high point in the mid-1980s, the Histadrut had some 1.6 million members—nearly half of Israel's Jewish population, more than one-third of its total population, and three-quarters of its wage earners.

The Histadrut's growing economic, social, and cultural influence made it central to the labor-Zionist movement's mobilization of the sociopolitical support it needed to achieve political and cultural hegemony in the Yishuv, Israel, and the Zionist Organization—a position it then maintained for almost half a century. In 1921, Ahdut Ha'avodah leader DAVID BEN-GURION was elected secretary of the Histadrut; from that base he soon established himself as labor Zionism's preeminent leader in Palestine. By the early 1930s the growing electoral strength of Mapai (realized in large measure through its control of the Histadrut) enabled Ben-Gurion and his colleagues to secure key posts in the international Zionist movement. In 1935 Ben-Gurion became chairman of both the ZIONIST EXECUTIVE and the JEWISH AGENCY, the de facto political leadership of the Yishuv, and when Israel was established he became its first prime minister, succeeded in that office by various other leaders of Mapai and its successor, the LABOR PARTY, until the surprise victory of the Zionist right in the 1977 elections. Throughout that period the Histadrut remained the key institutional bulwark of the labor-Zionist camp and of the party-state that Mapai sought to construct in the Yishuv and then in Israel.

For its first four decades the Histadrut remained firmly committed to the goal of maximizing Hebrew labor. When either unemployment was high among Jewish workers or Mapai wanted to mobilize its mass base for political advantage (for example, in 1934, when it was engaged in a bitter struggle with its centrist and right-wing rivals), the Histadrut launched campaigns to compel Jewish employers (mainly citrus farmers and construction contractors) to replace their Palestinian workers with Jews, using picketing, harassment, intense political and moral pressure, and even violence. The Histadrut and the Zionist leadership also relentlessly lobbied the British authorities to increase the number of Jews working in government agencies and on government construction projects, arguing that the ratio of Jews employed should reflect the growing proportion of Jews in Palestine's population or (even better) the percentage of the government's tax revenues collected from Jews. During the 1936–1939 Palestinian ARAB REVOLT against British colonial rule and the Zionist project it protected and facilitated, labor-Zionist leaders were quick to argue that employing Jewish workers at critical sites like ports and railroads could help break the Arab general strike, a key component of the revolt. Unsurprisingly, the effort to achieve Hebrew labor evoked bitterness and outrage among Palestinian Arabs, especially those workers who felt that they lost or were denied jobs simply because they were not Jews.

Despite decades of sustained effort, however, the Histadrut's struggle to achieve Hebrew labor was never completely successful during the Mandate period. Jewish workers could never totally or permanently displace the much more plentiful (and less expensive) Arab workers in key sectors, such as agriculture, construction, the seaports, the Haifa oil refinery, and (during World War II) British military installations. It was only in 1947–1949, when most of the Palestinian inhabitants fled or were expelled from the territory that became Israel and massive numbers of Jews emigrated from Eastern Europe and then from Arab countries, that labor Zionism could achieve something approaching victory in its struggle for the conquest of labor.

From its inception and through the 1950s the Histadrut remained an exclusively Jewish organization. In the 1920s some marginal left-wing elements of labor Zionism (and the ANTI-ZIONIST Jewish communists, who were purged from the Histadrut in the mid-1920s) demanded that Arab workers be admitted or at least that the Histadrut commit itself to organizing Arab workers, especially in workplaces that employed both Arab and Jewish workers (e.g., the government-owned Palestine Railways). Ben-Gurion and his colleagues adamantly refused to allow Arabs to join the organization, because that would compromise its ability to fulfill its Zionist mission. Though the Histadrut eventually created a subsidiary organization for Arab workers (known in English as the Palestine Labor League [PLL]), the subsidiary never gained any significant membership or life of its own. The few Arab workers who joined did so mainly in the hope of securing jobs in Jewish-owned enterprises or of gaining access to HEALTH CARE and other services. Palestinian nationalists and trade unionists denounced the PLL as a Zionist front, and by the mid-1940s, when a vigorous Palestinian Arab trade union movement led in part by communists began to develop, the PLL was virtually defunct.

For a decade after 1948 the Histadrut, intent on protecting the jobs, wages, and superior status of its exclusively Jewish mass base, continued its attempts to bar PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL from employment in Jewish enterprises and refused to allow them to become members; instead, they were relegated to a resurrected PLL.

Only when the Israeli economy began to suffer from labor shortages in the late 1950s did the Histadrut move toward allowing “Israeli Arabs” (as they were officially designated) to join. Arabs were first allowed to vote in Histadrut elections in 1965, the term “Hebrew” was dropped from the organization’s name, and Arabs would eventually come to constitute some 10 percent of the organization’s membership. However, the Histadrut neither organized nor did anything concrete to help the large numbers of Palestinians from the WEST BANK and GAZA, occupied by Israel in 1967, who found jobs at low wages and with miserable conditions in Israeli agriculture, construction, and other sectors. Nor has it offered any real help to the foreign workers (usually undocumented and highly exploited) who largely replaced Palestinians at the bottom of the Israeli labor market after the First INTIFADA (1987–1993) and during the OSLO years (1993–2000).

The labor Zionist movement’s loss of political and cultural hegemony in Israel from the late 1970s onward and the radical restructuring of Israel’s economy along neoliberal lines beginning in the 1980s led to a sharp decline in the fortunes of the Histadrut. With state subsidies cut off, many of its enterprises were closed or sold off, and by the end of the 1990s it had lost nearly two-thirds of its membership (and hence most of its revenues), largely because once the state instituted a national health insurance system, Histadrut membership was no longer a requirement for access to the once nearly monopolistic Kupat Holim. Still closely linked with the Labor Party, itself in decline, the much-weakened Histadrut was, in the early years of the twenty-first century, struggling to hold on to its shrinking and beleaguered membership (now concentrated in the public sector) and to protect its wages and jobs. By then Israel had one of the most sharply skewed income distributions among the highly industrialized economies, in large part because of the poverty of many of its Palestinian citizens and the economic transformations that had disproportionately disadvantaged working-class Israeli Jews from Arab lands.

The labor Zionist strategy of ethnic exclusion and economic separatism, in whose implementation the Histadrut played a key role, clearly contributed a great deal to the establishment of a viable Jewish economy, society, and state in Palestine. At the same time, however, that strategy exacerbated antagonism and conflict between Arabs and Jews, with consequences that remain evident to the present day.

See also PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948

Bibliography

- Ben-Porat, Amir. Between Class and Nation: The Formation of the Jewish Working Class in the Period before Israel’s Statehood. New York: Greenwood Press, 1986.
- Bernstein, Deborah S. Constructing Boundaries: Jewish and Arab Workers in Mandatory Palestine. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Glazer, Steven A. “Picketing for Hebrew Labor: A Window on Histadrut Tactics and Strategy.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:4 (2001).
- Gozanski, Tamar. Hitpathut hakapitalizm be-palestina (The Development of Capitalism in Palestine). Haifa: Mif ‘alim universita’im, 1986.
- Greenberg, Stanley. Race and State in Capitalist Development: Comparative Perspectives. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1980.
- Grinburg, Lev Luis. Split Corporatism in Israel. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. Zionism and Economy. Cambridge, MA: Schenkman Publishing, 1983.
- Lockman, Zachary. Comrades and Enemies: Arab and Jewish Workers in Palestine, 1906–1948. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Lustick, Ian. Arabs in the Jewish State: Israel’s Control of a National Minority. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1980.
- Metzer, Jacob. The Divided Economy of Mandatory Palestine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Shafir, Gershon. Land, Labor and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882–1914. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.
- Shalev, Michael. Labour and the Political Economy in Israel. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Sussman, Tzvi. Pa’ar veshivayon bahistadrut: Hahashpa’a shel ha’ideologiyya hashivyonit vеха’avodah ha’aravit ‘al s’kharo shel ha’oved hayehudi be’eretz yisra’el (Inequality and Equality in the Histadrut: The Influence of Egalitarian Ideology and Arab Labor on the Wages of the Jewish Worker in the Land of Israel). Ramat Gan: Masada, 1974.

—Zachary Lockman

Hizbullah (Party of God)

A Shi’ia Islamist group in LEBANON founded in 1982 to fight the Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon, Hizbullah (Party of God) has a military wing and a civilian arm, which runs hospitals, news services, and educational facilities; holds seats in the Lebanese parliament; and in 2005 held several cabinet positions in the Lebanese government. In the summer of 2006 it fought a major war with Israel.

The Holocaust

The Holocaust (in Hebrew, HaShoah) is considered in the West the genocide of six million Jews under the German Nazi regime during World War II. A somewhat broader definition emerges when other groups also exterminated by the Nazis and their collaborators are considered. Indeed, millions of Gentiles were also victimized by efforts to exterminate “racially inferior” or “undesirable” groups. More than 330,000 to 500,000 Sinti and Roma (in Romani the genocide is called Porrajmos) were murdered in the Holocaust. More than 2 million non-Jewish Poles were exterminated, between 5.5 and 7 million Ukrainians (by Russia), between 100,000 and 700,000 Serbs, between 100,000 and 250,000 of the disabled, tens of thousands of homosexuals, between 2,500 and 5,000 Jehovah’s Witnesses, plus untold numbers of Czechs, Greeks, Freemasons, and others. Taking all these other groups into account, the total death toll rises considerably; estimates generally place the total number of Holocaust victims at 9 to 12 million, though some estimates have ranged as high as 26 million.

The Holocaust has been ever present in the thinking of modern Israel, and the link between the birth of Israel and the genocide of 6 million Jews under the German Nazi regime during World War II remains indissoluble. The Holocaust suffuses every aspect of Israel’s discourse, society, culture, politics, and militarism. As Israeli scholar Idith Zertal puts it: “Through a dialectical process of appropriation and exclusion, remembering and forgetting, Israeli society has defined itself in relation to the Holocaust. . . . It has been processed, coded, and put to use in Israel’s public space.”

One dimension of the connection between Israel and the Holocaust is the way the genocide of the Jews of Europe has been essentialized as proof of the Jews’ uniqueness. Portraying the Holocaust as a uniquely Jewish experience deepens Jews’ sense of themselves and others, the feeling of Jews as being essentially and eternally victims and conversely entitled to unlimited might and power and the right to use force at will. The Holocaust and the paradigm of power that grew out of it reinforce the perception of the Jews’ inherent and permanent uniqueness among all nations in the world, which further legitimizes any actions taken by the state.

This reflects a process of social construction by the country’s elites to serve the particular interests of ZIONISM. As Zertal notes, “There has not been a war in Israel, from 1948 till the present ongoing outburst of violence which began in October 2000 that has not been perceived, defined, and conceptualized in terms of the Holocaust. . . . Auschwitz—as the embodiment of the total, ultimate evil—was, and still is, summoned up for military and security issues . . . where Auschwitz is not a past event but a threatening present and a constant option . . . [by which] Israel rendered itself immune to criticism, and impervious to a rational dialogue with the world around her.”

Zertal describes the 1961 trial of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann in Jerusalem as “one of the most constitutive events in the annals of Israel.” The trial “was a historic, continuous morality play . . . [that] created the teleological, indispensable connection between the agony and death of the Jewish DIASPORA and the establishment and the right to exist of the State of Israel, including its daily practices, especially the military ones. Thus, the trial gave new meaning to the fight against the Arab enemy.” Perhaps as important, the trial served to boost the status of the Israeli army, as its might was viewed as indispensable to the security of the Jews—and to preventing a second Holocaust.

At the time of the Eichmann trial, MOSHE DAYAN, then Israeli minister of agriculture, spoke about the connection between the European tragedy and the land of Israel. “What is becoming clear at the Eichmann trial is the active passivity of the world in the face of the murder of the six million. There can be no doubt that only this country and only this people can protect the Jews again against a second Holocaust. And hence every inch of Israeli soil is intended for Jews only.” Thereafter the Israeli government and public were prone to invoke the Holocaust when confronting threats—from the aggressive rhetoric of Arab leaders to stone-throwing Palestinians.

In the context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the Arabs were transformed into Nazis and the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli conflict into another ever-present potential Holocaust. DAVID BEN-GURION, the first Israeli leader to use the term “Arab Nazis,” did so as early as 1947, although not in public. In planning for the Eichmann trial he made the first of many public declarations, telling a New York Times reporter that the “trial will help us ferret out other Nazis—for example, the connection between Nazis and some Arab rulers,” and he went on to talk about EGYPT’S JAMAL ‘ABD AL-NASIR. Thereafter, virtually every Israeli leader from Ben-Gurion through BENJAMIN NETANYAHU has repeated the Nazi-Arab association and described the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli conflict in terms of the Holocaust.

The Holocaust has been variously appropriated, politicized, and mobilized by groups and individuals to promote various agendas. Indeed, the Holocaust became a dominant shadow in Israel at times of crisis such as war, military OCCUPATION, and relations with the world beyond Israel. Whoever controlled the interpretation of the legacy of the Holocaust wielded a formidable symbolic power against their enemies, whether Palestinians, Arab nations, or any critics of Israel’s policies. With the end of World War II and the revelations of the results of Hitler’s genocidal program, Zionist leaders argued that, had a Jewish state been established before the war, millions of Jews would have had a secure homeland.

The subject of the Holocaust gave rise to several serious debates in Israel. One of the first conflicts about the genocide was whether or not the Israeli government should accept reparations from West GERMANY. In 1951 Prime Minister Ben-Gurion asserted, “They [the Arabs] could slaughter us tomorrow in this country. . . . We don’t want to relive the situation that you [Holocaust survivors] endured. We don’t want the Arab Nazis to come and slaughter us.” Money from Germany was judged necessary to strengthen the Israeli infrastructure, especially the military of the fledgling state. But MENAHEM BEGIN and the HERUT PARTY decried what they saw as Ben-Gurion’s immoral pragmatism in dealing with the hated Germans. In the raucous debates that ensued, Begin articulated an elevated, purist view of the Holocaust that he believed ought to guide state policy, rather than a state policy that made the sacred memory of the Holocaust a factor to be used or ignored as expedience dictated.

In 1953, Israel institutionalized remembrance of the Holocaust by establishing an annual Holocaust and Ghetto Rebellion Memorial Day (Yom HaShoah), to appear on the Israeli calendar between Passover and Independence Day. Yad Vashem, the memorial to the Holocaust in JERUSALEM, opened to the public in 1957.

Israeli leaders from 1948 on drew on Nazi/Holocaust imagery, allusions, and analogies to vilify Israel’s external enemies. However, the 1967 WAR changed all that. Because of the UN Partition Plan (UN RESOLUTION 181) and further conquests in the 1948 WAR, Israel before the 1967 War controlled over 78 percent of historic Palestine. After the June 1967 War, Israel instituted a military Occupation of the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP, thus seizing control over the remaining 22 percent of Palestinian land. Because of the bellicosity of threats coming from Arab leaders in the weeks before the war began, Israelis and many Jews worldwide were convinced of an imminent catastrophe—another Holocaust. Israeli commentators regularly equated Egypt’s Jamal ‘Abd al-Nasir with Hitler. There was also growing opposition from some Israeli elites to Prime Minister LEVI ESHKOL’s seeming vacillation in light of the Arab threats. Then out of power, Ben-Gurion zeroed in on the issue facing the Israelis: “A war of annihilation. None of us can forget the Holocaust that the Nazis inflicted on us. And if some Arab rulers declare day and night that Israel must be annihilated—this time referring not to the entire Jewish people in the world, but to the Jews living in their land—it is our duty not to take these statements lightly.”

Jews around the world were galvanized to rally around what many perceived as a beleaguered Israel. Some even traveled there, including the then relatively unknown Jewish writer and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel, who made the journey to Israel from the UNITED STATES and witnessed the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) at work, offering this impassioned report: “In the OLD CITY of Jerusalem, barely re-conquered, I saw hardened paratroopers pray and weep for the first time in their lives; I saw them, in the thick of battle, gripped by an ancient collective fervor, kiss the stones of the WESTERN WALL and commune in a silence as elusive as it was pure; I saw them, as in a dream, jump two thousand years into the past, renewing their bond with legend, memory and the mysterious tradition of Israel.” Wiesel’s rhapsodic testimony about the Israeli soldiers expressed the euphoria many Jews experienced.

Soon after the 1967 War, Israel began sending Jewish settlers to colonize parts of East Jerusalem, the West Bank, and Gaza Strip. With religious sites now in Israel’s possession, a movement of JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST ideological settlers (e.g., GUSH EMUNIM and others) made its presence felt in Israeli political affairs. While the resolutely secular Ben-Gurion never hesitated in comparing Arabs to Nazis, Gush Emunim shared the same feelings but with a fundamentalist worldview. For example, in 1988 a settler writing in Gush Emunim's paper stated, "There is no difference between the PLO's attitude towards the State of Israel and that of other Arab countries, just as there is no difference between them—and the Final Solution scheme and the liquidation of the Jewish people as perpetrated by the brutal troops of Hitler and Nazi Germany during the Holocaust. There is, indeed, one difference between Hitler and Arafat: Hitler implemented his scheme, Arafat simply cannot implement his."

Despite the widespread fear and insecurity in Israel, the war's brevity (six days) and its results demonstrated that the Israeli military was the overwhelmingly preponderant force in the region. Israel's military prowess impressed the United States, and not long after, the US government came to regard Israel as a "STRATEGIC ASSET" in the Middle East. In the first decades following the 1967 War, one witnessed the beginnings of a Holocaust culture industry in the United States: innumerable books, histories, and testimonies on the tragedy; symposia and university courses; inter-faith conferences; museums and memorials; and popular and documentary films on the Holocaust. During this time, Wiesel's career as witness to the Holocaust began to accelerate, as he became a public speaker, commentator, and professor of increasing renown at major universities (Yale, Boston University, etc.). Wiesel stood resolutely on the side of Israel by speaking as a survivor of Auschwitz in defense of the Jewish state, particularly after the October 1973 war. In 1978 President JIMMY CARTER authorized a President's Commission on Remembering the Holocaust.

The year 1977 witnessed the passing of power in Israel from the LABOR PARTY to the LIKUD with Menahem Begin becoming prime minister. Since the 1940s Begin had frequently alluded to the Holocaust in his skirmishes with opponents. In 1978 Begin, along with Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, was awarded a Nobel Peace Prize for the peace negotiations between Egypt and Israel. But Begin's image as peacemaker was severely challenged by Israel's invasion of LEBANON in the summer of 1982, and by the IDF's failure to restrain its PHALANGIST allies on a rampage in the Palestinian refugee camps of SABRA AND SHATILA in September of that year, in which hundreds of Palestinian civilians were massacred.

In a meeting of his cabinet in early June, Begin attempted to justify his course of action: "You know what I did and what we all did to prevent war and bereavement, but it is our fate that in Eretz Israel there is no escape from fighting with dedication. Believe me, the alternative is Treblinka [the Nazi extermination camp], and we have decided that there will be no more Treblinkas." He likened Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT to Adolf Hitler and viewed the Israeli invasion as parallel to the Allied forces marching into Berlin in 1945 to finish off Hitler. After the Israeli invasion of Lebanon had generated considerable international criticism, Begin claimed in the Knesset, "No one, anywhere in the world, can preach morality to our people."

Some Israeli Jews, however, were willing to preach morality to their own government. Writer AMOS OZ retorted to Begin a few weeks later: "There is not and cannot be balm for the open wound in our souls. Tens of thousands of Arab dead will not heal this wound. But, Mr. Begin, Adolf Hitler died 37 years ago. Sadly or not: it is a fact: Hitler is not hiding in Nabatiyeh, Sidon or Beirut. He is dead and burnt."

Contradictory voices were increasingly making themselves heard. Well-known Israeli philosopher YESHAYAHU LEIBOWITZ referred scathingly to "Judeo-Nazi" policies. Dr. Shlomo Shmelzman, a Holocaust survivor, explained in a statement to the press why he was on a hunger strike in protest of the Israeli war in Lebanon: "In my childhood I have suffered fear, hunger and humiliation when I passed from the Warsaw Ghetto, through labor camps, to Buchenwald. Today, as a citizen of Israel, I cannot accept the systematic destruction of cities, towns, and refugee camps. I cannot accept the technocratic cruelty of the bombing, destroying and killing of human beings. I hear too many familiar sounds today, sounds which are being amplified by the war. I hear 'dirty Arabs' and I remember 'dirty Jews.' I hear about 'CLOSED [MILITARY ZONES]' and I remember ghettos and camps. I hear 'two-legged beasts' and I remember 'Untermenschen (subhumans).' I hear about tightening the SIEGE, clearing the area, pounding the city into submission and I remember suffering, destruction, death, blood and murder. . . . Too many things in Israel remind me of too many other things from my childhood."

Israeli novelist A. B. YEHOASHUA also drew parallels that countered Begin's rhetoric about the invasion. After the massacres at Sabra and Shatila, Yehoshua stated that "even if I could believe that IDF soldiers who stood at a distance of 100 meters from the camps did not know what happened, then this would be the same lack of knowledge of the Germans who stood outside Buchenwald and Treblinka and did not know what was happening! We too did not want to know."

Wiesel was disturbed by such intellectuals and politicians who, he said, "profaned the memory of the Jewish victims of the Holocaust by comparing Beirut with the Warsaw Ghetto . . . Israel's soldiers with the Nazis; the military operation in Lebanon with the genocide perpetrated by the Nazis—obscene comparisons, twisted analogies, vile and base and rooted in hate." Unlike Yehoshua and Shmelzman, Wiesel believed that, as a Jew loyal to Israel, his mission was not to criticize Israeli power or Begin's discourse of the Holocaust but to criticize those who were speaking truth to Israeli power.

Wiesel, and by association Holocaust remembrance, received prestigious recognition in 1986, when he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. One year earlier he had been awarded the US Congressional Medal of Honor, further evidence of his increasing celebrity. Some Israelis offered spirited, at times raucous commentary on his awards, from criticism of Wiesel making personal gain from the Holocaust to his lack of a forthright criticism of Israel's policies toward the Palestinians. In his speech in Oslo, Wiesel referred to Israel's commitment to resolving its conflicts with the Palestinians and its Arab neighbors: "Israel will cooperate, I am sure of that. I trust Israel, for I have faith in the Jewish people. . . . Please understand my deep and total commitment to Israel: if you could remember what I remember, you would understand. Israel is the only nation in the world whose very existence is threatened."

In late 1987, Israelis were caught by surprise at the outbreak of a society-wide Palestinian effort to shake off the Israeli Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which was known as the INTIFADA. Palestinians pursued largely nonviolent means—strikes, marches, and a TAX REVOLT—to challenge Israeli domination. Israeli leaders saw the uprising as another manifestation of an eternal anti-Jewish hatred that could only be countered with power and arms. In the Israeli press an exchange was reported between an Israeli physician, Marcus Levin, and his colleagues. Levin had been called up to duty and assigned the task of examining Palestinian PRISONERS both before and after Israeli soldiers interrogated them. Surprised at being asked to inspect the prisoners after interrogation, Levin was told that some Palestinian prisoners had broken bones. Levin subsequently told the commander of the camp, "My name is Marcus Levin and not Josef Mengele, and for reasons of conscience I refuse to serve in this place." One of Levin's medical partners sought to assuage his discomfort and told him, "Marcus, first you feel like Mengele, but after a few days you get used to it." The title of this account in an Israeli newspaper was "You Will Get Used to Being a Mengele."

Although Holocaust analogies and comparisons had long been used in Israel to defend Israeli actions, after the LEBANON WAR and increasingly during the Intifada, Holocaust references that criticized Israeli power began to circulate more widely. In 1991, Israeli writer Ari Shavit wrestled with images of the Holocaust in the contemporary scene: "Like a believer whose faith is cracking, I go over and over again in my heart the long list of arguments, the list of the differences. There are no crematoria here, I remind myself, and there was no conflict between people there. Germany, with its racist doctrine, was organized evil, its people were not in danger, and so on. But then I realized that the problem is not in the similarity—for no one can seriously think that there is a real similarity—but that there isn't enough lack of similarity. The problem is that the lack of similarity isn't strong enough to silence once and for all the evil echoes, the accusing images." During Israel's Lebanon invasion, when an Israeli officer was charged with unjustified violence toward Palestinians, he admitted that he had instructed his men to write numbers on the Palestinian prisoners' arms. With the famous 1993 handshake between Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN and Arafat, presided over by US president BILL CLINTON, many people expected progress in the peace process. But among right-wing Israelis the Holocaust was invoked and the prime minister equated with Hitler. A Likud press release asserted that "Rabin must not speak in the name of the Holocaust martyrs when he receives the [Nobel Peace] prize together with the heir of the Nazis." In an increasingly hysterical environment, Rabin was assassinated by a Jewish religious student in 1995.

In 1993 the Holocaust remembrance project that began with Carter was completed under Clinton: the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum opened to the public on the national mall in Washington, DC. Controversy ensued when, after the OSLO ACCORDS, the Clinton administration invited Arafat to the museum. Amid criticism that Arafat's record of TERRORISM would tarnish the reputation of the museum, officials denied him the security protection typically made available to other world leaders, so the Palestinian leader canceled the visit. A similar controversy had taken place in January 1995 when Polish leader Lech Walesa intended to invite other Nobel laureates to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp. More clamor erupted, with one Holocaust survivor commenting, "Arafat will go to Auschwitz to learn from his teacher, Hitler, how to destroy us." Walesa decided not to invite the Nobel laureates.

In 2005 this perception of persecution and victimization was again expressed in Holocaust terms when several thousand Israeli settlers were ordered to depart the Gaza Strip by ARIEL SHARON's government. In protest, settlers donned Star of David patches, which Jews had been forced to wear under Nazi rule. Settlers, among them Holocaust survivors and their children, contended that withdrawal would lead to another Holocaust. Israeli rabbi and Holocaust survivor Israel Meir Lau rebuked the settlers, stating, "The deliberate murder of six million Jews is such a sacred and significant thing that it cannot be compared with absolutely anything else in the world."

Other Jews in Israel and the Diaspora, however, continued to criticize the Israeli military Occupation, based upon the experiences of Jews during the Holocaust. Amira Hass, an Israeli journalist who lived with Palestinians in both Gaza and the West Bank, recalled a formative story from her mother: "On a summer day in 1944, my mother was herded from a cattle car along with the rest of its human cargo, which had been transported from Belgrade to the concentration camp at Bergen-Belsen. She saw a group of German women, some on foot, some on bicycles, slow down as the strange procession went by and watch with indifferent curiosity on their faces. For me, those women became a loathsome symbol of watching from the sidelines, and at an early age I decided that my place was not with the bystanders. In the end, my desire to live in Gaza stemmed neither from adventurism nor from insanity, but from that dread of being a bystander, from my need to understand, down to the last detail, a world that is, to the best of my political and historical comprehension, a profoundly Israeli creation."

Like Amira Hass, Sara Roy is a daughter of Holocaust survivors and an authority on the Gaza Strip. In a reflection on what it has been like to grow up in the shadow of the Holocaust—one hundred members of her family and extended family were killed in Poland—Roy offered a view opposed to those of Begin and Ben-Gurion, Wiesel and Dayan, and Gush Emunim: "Memory in Judaism—like all memory—is dynamic, not static, embracing a multiplicity of voices and shunning the hegemony of one. But in the post-Holocaust world, Jewish memory has faltered—even failed—in one critical respect: it has excluded the reality of Palestinian suffering and Jewish culpability therein. As a people, we have been unable to link the creation of Israel with the displacement of the Palestinians. We have been unwilling to see, let alone remember, that finding our place meant the loss of theirs. Perhaps one reason for the ferocity of the conflict today is that Palestinians are insisting on their voice despite our continued and desperate efforts to subdue it. Within the Jewish community it has always been considered a form of heresy to compare Israeli actions or policies with those of the Nazis, and certainly one must be very careful in doing so. But what does it mean when Israeli soldiers paint identification numbers on Palestinian arms; when young Palestinian men and boys of a certain age are told through Israeli loudspeakers to gather in the town square; when Israeli soldiers openly admit to shooting Palestinian children for sport; when some of the Palestinian dead must be buried in mass graves while the bodies of others are left in city streets and camp alleyways because the army will not allow proper burial; when certain Israeli officials and Jewish intellectuals publicly call for the destruction of Palestinian villages in retaliation for SUICIDE BOMBINGS or for the TRANSFER of the Palestinian population out of the West Bank and Gaza; when 46 percent of the Israeli public favors such transfers and when transfer or expulsion becomes a legitimate part of popular discourse; when government officials speak of the 'cleansing of the refugee camps'; and when a leading Israeli intellectual calls for hermetic separation between Israelis and Palestinians in the form of a Berlin Wall, caring not whether the Palestinians on the other side of the wall may starve to death as a result. What are we supposed to think when we hear this? What is my mother supposed to think?"

Bibliography

- Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil. New York: Penguin Classics, 1994.
- . The Origins of Totalitarianism. New York: Schocken, 1972.
- Beit-Hallahmi, Benjamin. Original Sins: Reflections on the History of Zionism and Israel. New York: Olive Branch Press, 1993.
- Berenbaum, Michael, ed. A Mosaic of Victims: Non-Jews Persecuted and Murdered by the Nazis. New York: New York University Press, 1990.
- Chmiel, Mark. Elie Wiesel and the Politics of Moral Leadership. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2001.
- Chomsky, Noam. Fateful Triangle: The United States, Israel and the Palestinians, updated ed. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 1999.
- Ellis, Marc H. Beyond Innocence and Redemption: Confronting the Holocaust and Israeli Power—Creating a Moral Future for the Jewish People. San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1990.
- . O, Jerusalem! The Contested Future of the Jewish Covenant. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1999.
- Evron, Boaz. "The Holocaust: Learning the Wrong Lessons." Journal of Palestine Studies. 10:3 (1981).
- Finkelstein, Norman G. Beyond Chutzpah: Anti-Semitism and the Abuse of History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.
- . The Holocaust Industry: Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering, 2nd ed. London: Verso, 2003.
- Grodzinsky, Yosef. In the Shadow of the Holocaust: The Struggle between Jews and Zionists in the Aftermath of World War II. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press, 2004.
- Grossman, David. Death as a Way of Life: Israel Ten Years after Oslo. Translated by Haim Watzman. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2003.
- Hass, Amira. Drinking the Sea at Gaza: Days and Nights in a Land under Siege. Translated by Elana Wesley and Maxine Kaufman-Lacusta. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.
- Levi, Primo. The Drowned and the Saved, reprint ed. New York: Vintage, 1989.
- . The Reawakening, reprint ed. New York: Touchstone, 1995.
- Lukas, Richard C. The Forgotten Holocaust: The Poles under German Occupation 1939–1944, 2nd rev. ed. New York: Hippocrene Books, 2001.
- Massad, Joseph. "Palestinians and Jewish History: Recognition or Submission?" Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:1 (2000).
- McGowan, Daniel, and Marc H. Ellis, eds. Remembering Deir Yassin: The Future of Israel and Palestine. New York: Olive Branch Press, 1998.
- Novick, Peter. The Holocaust in American Life. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1999.
- Ophir, Adi. The Order of Evils: Toward an Ontology of Morals. New York: Zone Books, 2005.
- Rodinson, Maxime. Cult, Ghetto, and State: The Persistence of the Jewish Question. London: al-Saqi Books, 1981.
- Roy, Sara. "Living with the Holocaust." Journal of Palestine Studies. 32:1 (2002).
- Segev, Tom. The Seventh Million: The Israelis and the Holocaust. New York: Hill and Wang, 1993.
- Wistrich, Robert, and David Ohana, eds. The Shaping of Israeli Identity: Myth, Memory, and Trauma. London: Frank Cass, 1995.
- Zertal, Idith. Israel's Holocaust and the Politics of Nationhood. Translated by Chaya Galai. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

—Mark Chmiel

Holst, Johan Juergen (1938–1994)

Johan Juergen Holst was the Norwegian foreign and defense minister who played a singularly important role in bringing about the OSLO ACCORDS. Norwegian secret diplomacy was the central factor in birthing the tentative peace agreement between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), initialed in Oslo on 20 August 1993, in which the PLO and Israel reached agreement on limited autonomy for Palestinians. The basis for much of the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES was developed at meetings in Holst's and other Norwegians' homes.

Holst believed that the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE was the "front door" to peace in the Middle East, but that there needed to be a "back door," which Norway could provide by being an "honest broker" in negotiations. At a press conference shortly before the Oslo Accords were formally signed in Washington, Holst outlined the nature of Norwegian participation: a total of fourteen PLO-Israeli meetings were held in Norway under conditions of deepest secrecy, eleven of them in the four months preceding the initialing of the accord. "Our mission has been to mediate when the two sides felt the need for it." He said the negotiations were carried out in three phases: a preparatory one from January 1992 to January 1993, an "academic" study from January to March 1993, and direct negotiations from April to August.

According to Holst, Norway's role as secret mediator began with FAFO—the Norwegian Trade Union Centre for Social Science and Research, which had been studying the living conditions of Palestinians in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES since 1988. This secured them contacts among both Israelis and the PLO, which in turn provided a key diplomatic opening. FAFO acted, for example, as an intermediary in the up to twenty telephone calls a day between the two sides.

The Norwegian working team consisted of two married couples: Holst and his wife Marianne Heiberg, who led the FAFO study group, and FAFO head TERJE ROED-LARSEN and his wife Mona Juul, who worked in Holst's secretariat. Holst was convinced that this "family atmosphere" broke down the barriers of suspicion and reserve and got the two sides on good terms. Because the political reality of the Oslo Accords necessitated extensive international aid to the Palestinians, Holst was also active in enlisting the help of the other SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES in procuring funds. The joint Nordic contribution to the Palestinians at the outset was approximately US$140 million.

See also SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES

Bibliography

- Behrendt, Sven. The Secret Israeli Palestinian Negotiations in Oslo: Their Success and Why the Process Ultimately Failed. New York: Routledge, 2007.
- Beilin, Yossi. Touching Peace: From the Oslo Accord to a Final Agreement. London: George Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1999.
- Qurei, Ahmed. From Oslo to Jerusalem: The Palestinian Story of the Secret Negotiations. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Wittes, Tamara Cofman. How Israelis and Palestinians Negotiate: A Cross-Cultural Analysis of the Oslo Peace Process. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press, 2005

Holst Fund

The Holst Fund was one of several channels of European financial assistance to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). It was established in December 1993 by the World Bank as a central, but temporary and short-term, repository for donations to help the interim government pay start-up expenses and short-term operating costs (as compared to development aid). The World Bank was responsible for overseeing the use of these funds on behalf of the contributing donors. In 1994 the Holst Fund disbursed approximately $51 million to the PNA and to the PALESTINIAN ECONOMIC COUNCIL FOR DEVELOPMENT AND RECONSTRUCTION.

The Holst Fund gradually began to expand its mandate beyond the PNA (and, after 1998, ceased paying for support of the PNA budget). In the first half of 1996, responding to skyrocketing unemployment in the Occupied Territories as a consequence of Israeli-imposed border CLOSURES and RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, the fund developed a rapid response mechanism in the form of the Employment Generation Program (EGP) to fund "make-work" schemes and small-scale micro projects. The Holst Fund contributed $23 million to the EGP that year.

After 1997 the EGP evolved from "make-work" schemes into a program of more sustainable community-based, high-labor-content micro projects, identified and implemented by local communities. Between 1997 and 2000 the Holst Fund received $269 million from 26 donors and distributed $220 million toward budget support and $40 million toward energy employment activities, including EGP and others. The fund ceased operations in March 2001.

Bibliography

- Johan Jorgen Holst Fund for the West Bank and Gaza. n.d. http://lnweb18.worldbank.org/mna/mena.nsf/Attachments/Holst/\$File/THE+JOHAN+JORGEN+HOLST+FUND.pdf.

Holy Basin

The Holy Basin, the land in the OLD CITY and its immediate surroundings, where tens of thousands of Palestinians currently live, is the most extreme and volatile site of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Israeli settlers and, officially or tacitly, the government are literally racing to create facts on the ground in Palestinian neighborhoods to foreclose any future settlement of JERUSALEM that would divide the city between a Jewish and a Palestinian state. The object is to totally Judaize this area, thus preventing Palestinians from having any future claim. As strife in Jerusalem, itself the center of the conflict, intensifies due to the struggles over LAND confiscation, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, home takeovers by settlers, as well as the separation BARRIER, activity in the Holy Basin is the most sensitive focal point of this complex reality.

The term "Holy Basin" should not be confused with the "Jerusalem Envelope," which is the area that the Barrier will encompass around Jerusalem. The entire length of the Barrier will be approximately 770 kilometers (462 miles), and about 168 kilometers (101 miles) of these, or about 21 percent of the length, will be built in and around Jerusalem, enclosing a far larger area than that which constitutes the Holy Basin.

On 31 March 2009, on the eve of the swearing-in of a new ultra-right-wing government with BENJAMIN NETANYAHU (responsible for HAR HOMA and opening the HASMONEAN TUNNEL) as prime minister, the lead editorial in Ha'aretz reported that "right-wing elements in the new coalition and among the settlers are preparing to heighten Israeli control in East Jerusalem. . . . Settlers' associations that have gained purchase in the Holy Basin near the Old City are increasing their pressure on the political system. Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat, who was supported by these groups in his election campaign, was under pressure from them to demolish dozens of homes in the village of SILWAN to reduce the Palestinian population in the area. . . . It can be assumed that the ATERET COHANIM activists who were behind the establishment of the Jewish neighborhood in ABU DIS will lobby their loyalists in the government and the municipality to revive the project. . . . Netanyahu's declaration that his government will renew the negotiations with the Palestinians is at odds with unilateral measures in Jerusalem, whose status is one of the core issues of the Israeli-Palestinian agenda."

On 1 May 2009 Ha'aretz revealed the existence of a secret Israeli government plan to thwart the division of Jerusalem. "The government and settler organizations are working to surround the Old City of Jerusalem with nine national parks, pathways and sites, drastically altering the status quo in the city. As part of the plan, Palestinian areas of the old city neighborhoods are being cleared and turned into lush gardens and parks, now already accessible to visitors who can walk along new footpaths and take in the majestic views, along with new signs and displays that point out significant points of Jewish history. The focus of the project is solely on Jewish heritage, despite the religious significance of the area to Muslims and Christians and the fact that Palestinians have lived in these neighborhoods for centuries; moreover, in the larger government plan, much of the presentation is being shaped by right-wing settler groups with a singularly Zionist approach, emphasizing ancient Jewish religion and history, even in mostly Palestinian neighborhoods.

Ha'aretz further revealed that Israel is clandestinely carrying out a $100 million, multiyear development plan in some of the most significant religious and national heritage sites just outside the walled Old City, the Holy Basin, as part of an effort to strengthen the status of Jerusalem as its capital. ARCHAEOLOGY, new Jewish SETTLEMENTS, parks, and recreational areas are all being developed in the service of Israel's retention of Jerusalem under its united and permanent sovereignty. In the process Palestinians are being dispossessed and excluded from having any claim to the city's eastern sector—an integral part of every peace plan thus far proposed. Based on the Geneva Conventions and numerous UNITED NATIONS resolutions such as Resolution 181 (Partition), Resolutions 242 and 338 (inadmissibility of acquisition of territory by force), Israel's 1967 OCCUPATION and the June 1980 Knesset law making Jerusalem the capital of Israel are violations of INTERNATIONAL LAW.

The secret plan was assigned to the Jerusalem Development Authority (JDA). In a report presented to former prime minister EHUD OLMERT on 11 September 2008, the JDA described the purpose of the project as "to create a sequence of parks surrounding the Old City," all in the aspiration "to strengthen Jerusalem as the capital of the State of Israel."

The program, sponsored by the prime minister's office and the mayor of Jerusalem and largely outsourced to the private settler group ELAD, has been kept hush-hush to prevent any public debate. "It is a detailed, confidential government plan, the motivation is to create Israeli hegemony over the area around the Old City, inspired by extreme right-wing ideology."

The government development plan was first agreed upon in 2005 "to strengthen the status of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel," as it states in its opening line, and became operational in 2008, with the prime minister's office and the municipality jointly responsible. The New York Times reported that despite the expected objections of the Obama administration, the government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu declared that it will push ahead with the project. Interior Minister Eli Yishai said in early May 2009 of the activity in the Holy Basin: "I intend to act on this issue with full strength. This is the land of our sovereignty.

Jewish settlement there is our right.” Another official in the prime minister’s office told the Times: “Jerusalem has been the eternal capital of the Jewish people for some 3,000 years and will remain the united capital of the State of Israel. Under Israeli sovereignty, for the first time in the history of Jerusalem, the different religious communities have enjoyed freedom of worship and the holy sites of all faiths have been protected.”

Ha’aretz wrote: “This program integrates with statutory Program 11555, approved by the Jerusalem municipality in November 2007, designed to accelerate development [to six housing units per dunum, or some 24 units per acre] in one of the most important archaeological sites in Israel. The array of escalators, cable cars and tunnels included in the plan portend blatant signs of a biblical playground populated by settler organizations, which the organization says will be carried out by ousting Palestinian residents.”

The plan provides a comprehensive view of how the government and settlers, working as one body, are creating a “biblical” territorial reign which connects Armon Hanatziv and Silwan in the south, RAS AL-AMUD and the Mount of Olives in the east, and SHAYK JARRAH in the north, by connecting all of the land east of E-1. The map of ELAD’s “Ancient Jerusalem” is, according to Ha’aretz, very similar to the map of the current Holy Basin project of the Old City.

Since 1967, Israeli governments have given clear priority to ideological settler organizations that work to strengthen their hold on the Holy Basin area. These settler organizations labor to increase the Jewish presence, usually through the establishment of fenced and guarded Jewish-only communities, in the heart of Palestinian neighborhoods in Jerusalem. Following the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES and especially after the 2000 CAMP DAVID SUMMIT and the subsequent CLINTON PARAMETERS, there has been a marked increase in efforts to create facts on the ground in order to prevent the future possibility of geographically dividing the city.

Sites of Conflict in the Holy Basin

Mughrabi Gate: The Mughrabi Gate is situated near the southeast corner of the Old City, southwest of the TEMPLE MOUNT/AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF. It was built by the OTTOMAN emperor Suleiman the Magnificent and is one of seven open gates (there are three sealed gates) facilitating access to and from the Old City. The gate is the closest gate to the WESTERN WALL and is a main passage for vehicles.

On 14 February 2004, torrential rains led to collapse of the earthwork ramp that had connected the Western Wall compound to the Mughrabi Gate since 1967. The Israeli authorities wanted to restore entry to the Mughrabi Gate, and in 2006 the Jerusalem Municipality proposed a plan that would have radically altered the status quo in terms of access to the site. The plan envisions replacing the ramp with a massive bridge that would permit much larger numbers of people—Israelis, tourists, security forces—to access the gate and in turn provide direct entry to the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif from the Western Wall compound.

This plan generated heated debate, in part because of Palestinian/Muslim mistrust regarding Israeli intentions, and in part because the issue of construction of the ramp at the Mughrabi Gate is not purely archaeological. The real question concerns whether sovereignty over the Temple Mount and adjacent areas lies in the hands of Israel or the Islamic Waqf. The project was placed on temporary hold.

Of all the gates providing entry to the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif, the Mughrabi Gate is both unique and the most sensitive. The keys of the other gates remain in the hands of the Waqf, the Islamic administrative authority responsible for al-Haram ash-Sharif, which also controls access to the Temple Mount/al-Haram compound. However, since 1967 direct control over the Mughrabi Gate has remained with the Israeli authorities. It is via the Mughrabi Gate that the periodic and often tense and controversial visits by Jews to the Muslim sacred site take place, and it is also the primary route of admission to the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif for Israeli security forces when disturbances erupt.

In December 2007 following the Annapolis Summit, the Israeli government decided to renew excavations beneath the Mughrabi Gate, designed to allow construction of the new bridge on the site. On 17 January 2008 the Jewish District Committee approved a new revised and expanded plan for restoration of the Mughrabi Gate proposed by the Jerusalem Municipality. The plan includes enlarging the women’s section of the Western Wall to include the space under the ramp, where there are archaeological remains from various periods. Both of these aspects of the plan have brought about massive public dissent among Palestinians and Israeli organizations such as IR AMIN: FOR AN EQUITABLE AND STABLE JERUSALEM WITH AN AGREED POLITICAL FUTURE; Bimkon: Planners for Planning Rights; Jerusalem Inter-Cultural Center (JICC); The Open House: Jerusalem Open House (JOH); Sikkuy: The Association for the Advancement of Civic Equality in Israel; YESH DIN: Volunteers for Human Rights; ACRI: ASSOCIATION FOR CIVIL RIGHTS IN ISRAEL, and others.

© Ir-Amin—For an Equitable and Stable Jerusalem with an Agreed Political Future, Jerusalem, reprinted with permission.

Map 22. The Holy Basin of the Old City, 2008

In July 2008 the Jerusalem Planning and Construction Committee, under pressure from these Israeli groups, agreed that archaeological remains from the later periods (including Mughrabi quarter remains) should be preserved, and that utilization of the space under the bridge for prayer should be prohibited. What happens in the future remains to be seen. But this perhaps explains the government's secrecy with regard to its master plan for Jerusalem discussed at the outset.

Herod's Gate: Herod's Gate is located on the northeastern perimeter of the Old City and was built in 1538–1540 by Suleiman the Magnificent's architects. The conflict here involves a pending project planned by the municipality, known as the "Herod's Gate project," or more prosaically, the "Town Planning Scheme (TPS) 9870," for a new settlement adjacent to Herod's Gate inside the Muslim Quarter of the Old City. The plan was approved by the Jerusalem Municipality in July 2005, but since then no further action has been taken to expedite its final approval by the government of Israel. The area in question is located at the northeastern tip of the Old City and consists of 3.8 dunums (1 acre), which is a relatively large open space in the context of the densely populated Old City. Currently, the area is used as a playground, but this is set to change. The Herod's Gate project consists of twenty-one housing units and a golden-domed synagogue that will loom over the city walls when completed. The outcome of this first governmental construction project in the Old City will be the creation of a new Jewish-only area. Though the scheme is currently dormant, it is likely to be implemented in the future.

Damascus Gate (underground "Solomon's Quarry"): This is the main north-facing gate of the Old City, built in 1542 by the Ottoman ruler Suleiman the Magnificent. Solomon's Quarry (also known as Zedekiah's Cave) is a 5-acre (20-dunum) underground limestone quarry that runs the length of five city blocks under the Muslim Quarter of the Old City, carved over a period of several thousand years. The entrance to Solomon's Quarry is just beneath the Old City wall, between the Damascus and Herod Gates, about 500 feet (150 meters) east of the former. In the mid-1990s the Israeli government contracted Ateret Cohanim, one of the largest settlement organizations in East Jerusalem, to "restore," with government funding, the 3,000-year-old quarry.

The quarry begins adjacent to Herod's Gate, and the underground excavated area stretches around 820 feet (250 meters) toward the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif. In the past, funding for the project has come, in part, from a fund held in the Ministry of Infrastructure intended for the rehabilitation of modern quarries that have become a blight on the landscape. The intentions of the government and the settlers are clear: to link the quarry with the Hasmonean Tunnel, creating a subterranean settler thoroughfare that will traverse the Old City, from the Damascus Gate in the north to the Mughrabi Gate in the south. Other proposals raised by the settlers include the opening of an underground theme park or opening the site for weddings and bar mitzvahs. This project is under way.

Hasmonean Tunnel: The Hasmonean Tunnel is an underground tunnel exposing the Western Wall in its full length. The tunnel is adjacent to the Western Wall and is located under buildings in the Old City. On 24 September 1996, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered that a new exit be cut from the Struthion Pool area to the Via Dolorosa. Palestinians believed that the real aim was to make the al-Haram ash-Sharif collapse; demonstrations erupted in which seventy Palestinians and sixteen IDF soldiers were killed.

Western Wall Tunnel and Ohel Yitzhak: Excavations have recently resumed inside the Western Wall Tunnel (which leads to the Hasmonean Tunnel) under the auspices of an archaeologist closely associated with the settlers. A mere 80 meters to the west, excavations (called "Ohel Yitzhak") are taking place under a settler house in the Muslim Quarter. There is basis for the conclusion that the intention is to link the house to the tunnel. Meanwhile, aboveground at Ohel Yitzhak construction of a new synagogue is proceeding.

Western Wall excavations and the Makhkame Complex: On the western perimeter of the Western Wall plaza, excavations are well under way in preparation for the construction of a new police station. The old one, 100 meters away, is prime “settler” real estate: the Makhkame building overlooks both the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif and the Western Wall. Settlers have plans to turn the Makhkame into a synagogue.

Excavations at Isaacs’s Tent: Since 2004, archaeological excavations in the Muslim Quarter in Jerusalem have been carried out underneath the structure known as “Isaac’s Tent.” The excavations are taking place without an excavation PERMIT and without permission from the archaeological council. They are being defined as “stabilizing excavations” despite the fact that they are not connected to any construction taking place on the building above.

The excavation site will constitute a tourist attraction, connecting the Western Wall tunnels with Isaac’s Tent. As well, an educational center and an underground museum are planned for this site. The Western Wall Heritage Foundation, the body behind this initiative, is a governmental non-profit organization responsible for the management of the Western Wall plaza and is closely tied to the settler community in East Jerusalem.

The excavation plan was not subjected to public scrutiny and was not approved by the statutory institutions of construction planning. Furthermore, the Palestinian residents of the Muslim Quarter, under whose houses the excavations are taking place, have not given their agreement to any kind of construction under their houses.

Jaffa Gate: The Jaffa Gate is a stone portal in the historic walls of the Old City, so named because it is the portal for Jaffa Road, which extends to the ancient port of JAFFA and the Mediterranean coastal plain. Inside the Jaffa Gate is a small square between the Christian and Armenian Quarters. The Christian Quarter is to the north, on the left, and the Armenian Quarter is to the south, on the right.

Controversy erupted in 2005 when settlers claimed to have purchased prized property—two hotels located just inside the Old City at Jaffa Gate, including the famed Imperial Hotel, which had become a symbol of Israeli-Palestinian dialogue and coexistence. The Imperial Hotel was part of a large land deal leased for 198 years by the Patriarch of the GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH in Jerusalem, Irineos I, to Israeli developers. When news of the deal emerged, so did a conflict among Israel, the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), JORDAN, and the church over the legality of the transactions. The battle has raged since then. As of March 2009, displaced Palestinians were being housed in the hotel, rather than Jewish settlers. However, that could change when and if the court finally rules on the case.

Preservation of the Old City and Its Historic Basin: During 2005 the Israeli cabinet approved NIS 60 million (around $13.5 million) per year for seven years to fund the “preservation” of the Old City and its environs. This is in effect a slush fund for settler activities in the area.

Holy Basin/National Parks: Many of the authorities and sites in the national park area around the Old City have already been placed under the control of the settlers. By 2009, construction of several parks and walkways was completed and the remainder were ready to be implemented.

Silwan: The consolidation of the settlers’ stranglehold over the Palestinian neighborhood of Silwan was nearly complete by 2008. In particular, the ancient part of Silwan that the settlers call “Ir David” (believed to be the site of the ancient City of David) was expanded with new acquisitions and takeovers. The importance of Silwan is such that if the settler presence and hold in the area are permitted to continue and expand, it could destroy any future efforts to come to a solution for Jerusalem based on the generally accepted notion that “what is Arab will be Palestinian, and what is Jewish will be Israeli.”

Silwan “Archaeological Sites”: ELAD, one of the main settler organizations, continues to expand its activities and its hold in Silwan, with the group acting as a quasi-governmental body controlling tourism in the area and with full authority over archaeological activities. Entrance fees to the sites are paid to the settlers, who have recently begun offering tourists “Segway” tours of the area on which the tourists ride on individual mechanized scooters—a tour through what also happens to be home to tens of thousands of increasingly humiliated Palestinians. The settlers have recently begun subterranean excavations—unsanctioned and illegal—to expose what appears to be a Herodian-era road. Their goal is to establish an underground thoroughfare from the Pool of Shiloah to the containing walls of the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif. In 2005, excavations at the Pool of Shiloah were started under the sponsorship of the City of David National Park and a road was discovered that connected the Shiloah pool in the City of David and on to the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif compound. It is this underground road that is now being reconstructed as a modern thoroughfare.

Silwan/al-Bustan Demolitions: In 1995 a municipal plan to demolish eighty-eight Palestinian-owned homes in the al-Bustan quarter of Silwan came to light. The goal of the plan was the “clearing” of the site for a settler-controlled national park in which the homes are located. Early exposure of the scheme led the Jerusalem Municipality to pull back and enter into a dialogue with the residents geared to leaving their homes intact. However, on 22 February 2009, the municipality served citizens of the al-Bustan neighborhood of Silwan notices to evacuate their houses voluntarily within seventy-two hours or else the authorities would evacuate them under the pretext of building without proper licensing documents. The process came after the municipality announced on 20 February a plan to relocate the more than 1,500 Palestinian citizens living in the eighty-eight houses of al-Bustan to alternative locations, one on a different hill in Silwan north of Jerusalem and the other in Beit Hanina north of Jerusalem.

A-Tur (Mount of Olives): A TUR is a Palestinian neighborhood on the Mount of Olives. In 2006, settlers made unprecedented inroads there. This new development is thus far limited in scope (with just two buildings partially taken over), so the impact to date is marginal. However, given the success of 2006, other settlers will likely be emboldened to establish themselves there. Israeli authorities evidence considerable tolerance of and even tacit support for such activities on the Mount. In March 2007 a number of violent incidents took place among Palestinian protestors, the settlers’ private security guards, and the Israeli Border Patrol.

Shaykh Jarrah: In SHAYKH JARRAH, another threatened Palestinian neighborhood, plans are moving ahead for a new large settler complex at the Shepherd Hotel compound, financed by a company owned by US settler patron IRVING MOSKOWITZ. This scheme is to link the new settlement to the already existing settlement in Shaykh Jarrah (Shimon ha-Tzaddik). Moskowitz began to expedite efforts to start work on the complex in 2008, and on 26 March 2009 the licensing committee of the Jerusalem Municipality approved applications for building permits to allow for the construction of a new twenty-residential-unit settlement in Shepherd’s Hotel.

The Mufti Grove: “The Mufti’s Grove” is the historic name for a 30-dunum (7.5-acre), ancient olive grove located on a slope between the Shaykh Jarrah neighborhood and the Kidron Valley (Wadi al Joz) in East Jerusalem. The area is named after the grand mufti of Jerusalem during the BRITISH MANDATE, AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, whose family owned the land.

In July and August 2007, a MEDIA investigation revealed an attempt by an East Jerusalem settlers’ organization to seize government-held land. In the Mufti’s Grove case, the Israel Lands Authority (ILA) had leased a private plot of land—of which it had no ownership—to Ateret Cohanim, a militant settlers’ organization, for the agricultural cultivation of the area, even though the organization has no experience in such work. The transfer was officially justified under the mantle of “appropriation for public needs,” a statute that had not been implemented for years. Aside from the harm caused to the landowners and the possibility of equal distribution of lands between Israelis and Palestinians in Jerusalem, the Mufti’s Grove incident is an example of the erosion in the upholding of Israeli law.

On 31 July 2007, the Arab Hotels Company submitted a petition against the ILA claiming that the association was working in collaboration with the Ateret Cohanim organization and conspired to seize the Mufti’s Grove. The court has not ruled as of this writing.

Ras al-Amud: There are two settler projects in Palestinian Ras al-Amud. In 2006, substantial new construction occurred in the settlement of Ma’aleh Zeitim, located in the heart of the densely populated Palestinian neighborhood of Ras al-Amud. Ma’aleh Zeitim is set to more than double in size, with sixty-seven new units to be added to the existing fifty-two. The second project in Ras al-Amud is of even greater concern and is linked to the E1 settlement plan (connecting East Jerusalem to the WEST BANK settlement of MA’ALE ADUMIN). Under this scheme, a new Israeli police headquarters has been constructed in E1, completed in early 2009. The police have relocated to E1 from their present headquarters in the heart of Ras al-Amud. The vacated station is in the process of being handed over to the settlers to develop into a new major housing project in a key location—simultaneously expanding the settlers’ hold on the area and consolidating their control over the main thoroughfare through the neighborhood.

Kidmat Tziyon/Abu Dis: Overlooking the Old City on the edge of Ras al-Amud/Abu Dis and hugging the Western Wall is a plan for the construction of a new settlement with 200 residential units. It was approved in the mid-1990s by the Jerusalem Municipality, but was officially put on hold. Nevertheless, several Jewish families have since moved into Palestinian homes in the area where the planned Kidmat Zion neighborhood is to be built. Two additional settlement houses adorn the northern and southern edges of the planned settlement. The northern house was built illegally by the settlers as the Barrier was going up—a fact that does not prevent the Border Patrol from guarding the house and its residents. Ninety percent of the lands within the Abu Dis area are defined as Area B territory, where the PNA maintains civil, but not military, jurisdiction. However, with Israel's permission the PNA constructed a new parliamentary building in Abu Dis, and several senior PNA leaders live there in their ancestral homes. Yet, settler and religious leaders are putting strong pressure on the government to lift the “hold” and go forward with the settlement.

Herodian Aqueduct: In a different era, a Herodian aqueduct brought water from the Artas pools, near BETHLEHEM, to the Second Temple in Jerusalem. This aqueduct, running under the Hill of Evil Counsel (on the southern ridge overlooking the Old City) is intact and accessible—if only one gets the keys. As is the case with so many other crucial archaeological sites in the area, those keys are now, literally, in the hands of the settlers.

Abu Tor Seminar Center: On the edges of the Palestinian neighborhood of Abu Tor, overlooking the Old City from the south, a building was designated as a center for the rehabilitation of Palestinian mentally disabled persons. At the last moment, it was turned over to the settlers, who use it as a seminar center, principally for addressing groups of Israeli army recruits and officers. The IDF has granted exclusivity to the settlers in terms of the messages and content delivered to its soldiers.

Nof Tziyon/Jabel Mukkaber: This project, for the construction of 400 homes for Jews on the southern ridge of Jabel Mukkaber, a Palestinian neighborhood overlooking the Old City, is in some ways an anomaly. The project is commercially (rather than ideologically) driven, and the target buyers appear to be mainly gullible DIASPORA JEWS promised (and delivered) a stunning view of the Old City, but never informed that they will be living in “downtown” Palestinian Jabel Mukkaber. While not exactly fitting the mold, that tens of residential units are being built in an existing Palestinian neighborhood within the Holy Basin is not without significance.

Settlers' Private Security Guards: For more than fifteen years, the Israeli government has funded private security for the settlers. These guards not only guard the settlers' homes but escort individual settlers in their comings and goings. In the absence of any real public scrutiny, these guards have, on occasion, assumed some of the trappings of a private militia. Based on the findings of a governmental committee headed by retired general Uri Or, it was decided to remove this allocation from the 2007 budget and to restore exclusive responsibility for security to the Israeli police—a decision reversed by the cabinet in 2008. The public funding of private security guards for the settlers continues, reinforcing their status as the unofficial, albeit highly effective, “settlers' militia” in the Old City and the Holy Basin.

Sifting Sites: In an odd twist, the settlers have established two “sifting sites”—the first on the Mount of Olives, the second in Abu Tor. At the first site, settlers sift through waste material that is brought out of the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif, in pursuit of discarded Jewish artifacts (notably, the settlers displayed no similar sensitivities when they engaged in the illegal and unauthorized excavations in the Hasmonean Tunnel—no records were kept and the rubble removed from the site ended up unexamined in the dump). The second site is used for the examination of material extracted from the illegal excavations in Silwan.

See also JERUSALEM; JEWISH QUARTER DEVELOPMENT COMPANY; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Bronner, Ethan, and Isabel Kershner. “Parks Fortify Israel's Claim to Jerusalem.” New York Times. 10 May 2009.
- Eldar, Akiva. “Court Orders State to Explain Construction in Jerusalem's Holy Basin.” Ha'aretz. 14 November 2008.
- . “Israel Has Secret Plan to Thwart Division of Jerusalem.” Ha'aretz. 10 May 2009.
- . “The Very Eye of the Storm.” Ha'aretz. 2 May 2009.
- European Union. EU Heads of Mission Report on East Jerusalem. EUObserver document. 9 March 2009. <http://www.euobserver.com>.

- Friedman, Lara, and Daniel Seidemann. Targeting the Old City's Muslim Quarter. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, n.d.
- Ir Amin. The Old City and the Historic Basin: Issues of Concern and Recent Developments. Jerusalem: Ir Amin, 2007.
- . The Struggle over the "Holy Basin." <http://www.ir-amin.org.il/Eng/?CategoryID=269>.
- "Leave East Jerusalem Alone." Ha'aretz. 31 March 2009.
- Lefkovitz, Etgar. "Jewish Housing Project Planned for E. J'lem Hotel Site." Jerusalem Post. 9 November 2005.
- Peace Now. Settlements in Focus: The Battle for Jerusalem's Old City and Holy Basin. Jerusalem: Peace Now, 2006.
- Palestine Monitor. "Meanwhile in Jerusalem . . ." Palestine Monitor. 11 March 2008. <http://palestinemonitor.org/spip/>.
- Seidemann, Daniel. State of Affairs—Jerusalem 2008: Political Developments and Changes. Jerusalem: Ir Amin, 2008.
- Shragai, Nadav. "The Holy Basin: Sovereignty, Autonomy, Internationalisation or Division." Common Ground News Service. 16 March 2006.
- . "Shas Chair Demands That PM Unfreeze E. J'lem Construction Plan." Ha'aretz. 12 March 2008.
- Wilson, Scott. "Jewish Inroads in Muslim Quarter: Settlers' Project to Alter Skyline of Jerusalem's Old City." Washington Post. 11 February 2007.

Holy Sites in Palestine

Since a Babylonian named Abraham left his birthplace in Ur and immigrated to the land of Canaan almost 4,000 years ago, this small piece of territory has become holy to the three great monotheistic religions of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Each religion claims to be the rightful heir of the patriarch Abraham and the true followers of God. Jews claim primacy because they were the first to receive God's word. Christians worship Jesus as the Messiah and the Son of God, whose lineage they trace to the Hebrew King David, while Muslims revere all the prophets found in the Hebrew scriptures, beginning with Abraham, as well as Jesus, whom they consider a prophet (not the Son of God), and Muhammad, who is venerated as God's final prophet. Although these three religions believe in the same God and honor many of the same Hebrew prophets, their followers also compete, as modern-day Muslim and Christian Palestinians and Jewish Israelis, over the land, resources, and shrines to their prophets, as well as for their very existence in this same piece of land.

From the Christian CRUSADERS and Muslim OTTOMANS to the modern-day Zionists, successive conquerors have used their religious association with this land as justification for political control. The state of Israel has been especially active in politicizing holy sites in order to legitimize its political dominance. Many Jewish SETTLEMENTS, for example, have been established at holy sites in the WEST BANK, which the Israeli government uses to gain control over land and resources. Some JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISTS, including the settlers, are willing to risk their lives and the lives of Israeli soldiers to settle religiously significant areas.

Israel's comprehensive settlement program, however, has caused significant restrictions on Palestinians' access to holy sites. For example, the Christian and Muslim holy sites in East JERUSALEM cannot be visited by Palestinians from the West Bank or Gaza without PERMITS issued by Israel, difficult or impossible to obtain. Even if they are issued, arbitrary denial of passage at CHECKPOINTS is common.

Among the most important holy sites in the holy land are the following.

Al-Haram ash-Sharif, or Temple Mount, Jerusalem. The Muslim complex called the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF (Noble Sanctuary) in Jerusalem's OLD CITY is one of the most intensely contested and politically charged spots in the world. The Haram contains the AL-AQSA MOSQUE and the DOME OF THE ROCK (one of the oldest and most spectacular Islamic buildings in the world), as well as numerous other structures significant to Muslims. Jews refer to the site as the TEMPLE MOUNT, where many believe the ancient Jewish temples were built, and many also believe that the WESTERN WALL of the Haram compound is the last remnant of the retaining wall of the Second Temple. The Western Wall is surrounded by a plaza that serves as a massive open-air synagogue. It is a site of worldwide Jewish pilgrimage as well as the focal point of prayers for religious Jews.

The entire site has the inherent potential to create both political and religious tensions. Two nations—the Israelis and the Palestinians—and two religions—Islam and Judaism—have deeply conflicting claims and narratives surrounding the site. Muslims revere it as a sacred spiritual and cultural center, as a triumph of Islamic art and architecture, and as the third holiest religious site in Islam. Some fundamentalist Christians and Jews believe that the Islamic sites must be destroyed so that the THIRD TEMPLE can be erected in their stead in order to allow the Messiah to return (Christians) or to come (Jews). Israelis claim both East and West Jerusalem for their political capital while Palestinians claim East Jerusalem for theirs. The Haram is the anchor of identification with East Jerusalem and a potent symbol of nationhood.

When Israel captured the Old City in 1967, Israeli defense minister MOSHE DAYAN ordered that the keys to the Haram be returned to the Muslim authorities, who thereafter nominally maintained their 750-year authority over the complex. Religious Jews focused on the Western Wall and its surrounding area, where some 100 Palestinian buildings, including homes and mosques, were destroyed to build a greatly enlarged prayer plaza. This arrangement has been relatively peaceful but highly unstable. Muslims fear efforts to erode their authority and resent Israel's control over access. There have been at least a half dozen attempts by fundamentalist Jews and Christians to destroy or desecrate the Islamic sites.

Jews from all over the world are given free access to worship at the Western Wall, but only a small percentage of the 4 million Palestinians living in the West Bank and Gaza are allowed to pray at the Muslim compound above it and none of the 1.66 billion from outside Israel. Non-Muslim tourists can enter the Haram at times when the Muslims are not at prayer, but cannot enter the mosques themselves without Waqf permission.

Church of the Holy Sepulcher, Jerusalem. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem's Old City is believed to be built on Golgotha, the Hill of Calvary, which the New Testament identifies as the location of the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. Because Christians believe it also is the place where Jesus was buried (the sepulcher), it has been an important destination for Christian pilgrimage since the fourth century.

Several Christian sects, including Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox, Armenian Catholic and Orthodox, Apostolic, Syrian Orthodox, and Coptic Orthodox, compete for the administration and maintenance of the church and its grounds. Their infighting prompted Muslim leader Salah al-Din (SALADIN) in 1178 to appoint a Muslim family, the NUSEIBEH FAMILY, to be custodians of the key to the single door and to mediate disputes. An agreement now regulates times and places of worship for each sect. The church is open daily except during religious rituals and observations. Christians from the West Bank and Gaza, however, are subject to the usual, often insurmountable, Israeli-imposed restrictions on Palestinians visiting East Jerusalem and cannot, in most cases, visit the church. Occasionally on special holidays, extra permits are given to Palestinian Christians to enter Jerusalem and visit the church.

Rachel's Tomb and Bilal Mosque, Bethlehem. Rachel was the favored wife of Jacob and the mother of Joseph and Benjamin, two of the patriarchs of the twelve tribes of Israel. She is believed to be buried on the road leading from Jerusalem to BETHLEHEM, where she died giving birth to Benjamin. On her grave Jacob erected a pillar that became a pilgrimage site.

The current structure, which is believed to mark the spot where she died, dates to the Ottoman period and contains a revered mosque called Bilal bin Rabah, as well as Bethlehem's only Muslim cemetery. Since Israel captured the West Bank in 1967, Palestinians have been barred from the mosque, the grave, and the cemetery.

In the 1990s, Israel transformed the tomb into a heavily fortified military post and enclosed the area in concrete slab walls, guarded by soldiers and snipers. Israel's takeover of the site, located in a northern neighborhood of Bethlehem deep in Palestinian territory, has caused unrest and occasional violence. The military encampment also serves as a checkpoint that prevents many Christians from reaching their holy sites in Bethlehem, such as the CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY.

Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem. The centerpiece of Bethlehem, the birthplace of Jesus Christ, is the Church of the Nativity. The first church on this spot was dedicated in 339 CE by Helena, mother of the emperor Constantine. Most of what remains dates from renovations by the Crusaders (1099–1187). The church is controlled jointly by three Christian denominations: the Armenian Church, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Greek Orthodox Church.

The church is open daily, but there are many impediments to entering Bethlehem and reaching the church. Would-be visitors and pilgrims to the Church of the Nativity also must go through the checkpoint between Jerusalem and Bethlehem, which the Israeli army has reduced to a tiny bottleneck and turned into something resembling an international border terminal.

In addition, Israeli CLOSURES in the Occupied Territories dramatically affect pilgrimage and tourism in Bethlehem, and Palestinians living outside Bethlehem are prevented from entering the church by the usual RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT—checkpoints, ROADBLOCKS, and the prohibition on entering or passing through Jerusalem without a permit, the route for those living in the northern West Bank (Ramallah, Nablus, and so on). The church is open daily, but access for Palestinian Christians who wish to visit the site is difficult if not impossible, even for tourists. Thus, for example, Christians living in Ramallah cannot reach the church.

Cave of the Patriarchs (Jews) or al-Ibrahimi Mosque (Muslims), Hebron, West Bank. The Book of Genesis relates that the patriarch Abraham purchased a field near HEBRON 3,700 years ago as a burial place for his wife, Sarah. Jews believe that the biblical patriarchs and matriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Sarah, Rebecca, and Leah, are buried in the tombs located in a cave on the property, over which a massive shrine has been built.

Like the al-Haram ash-Sharif, this site is of major religious importance to both Muslims and Jews. Both groups venerate the same founding patriarchs that they believe are buried here. Although the Muslims have maintained it for centuries, Israeli Jews have increasingly come to dominate the shrine since 1967. It has become a major site of conflict between Palestinians and Jews. Jewish settlers have created fortified colonies around the shrine and have done their utmost, including theft, vandalism, and violence, to force Palestinians out of the area and prevent their worship at the mosque. The Israeli army rarely curbs the behavior of the settlers and often aids them in their attempts to take over more Hebron real estate.

Joseph's Tomb, Nablus, West Bank. According to the Bible, Joseph was the favored son of the patriarch Jacob but was taken to EGYPT from Canaan as a slave when his envious brothers sold him into slavery and tricked his father into believing he was dead. Later, in order to escape a famine, Jacob's entire family moved to Egypt, where their descendants remained until Moses led them back to Canaan generations later. Joseph died in Egypt, after decades of service to the pharaoh, but the Book of Joshua relates that Joseph's bones were brought by the Israelites out of Egypt, and buried at Shechem (NABLUS) in a tract of land that Jacob had bought for a hundred pieces of silver from the sons of Hamor, the father of Shechem. This shrine became the inheritance of Joseph's descendants.

Based on this account, right-wing Jewish settlers have claimed ownership of what they believe is the site of Joseph's Tomb in the heart of the West Bank. In the 1980s, Israel transformed the shrine into a fortified military base and a yeshiva (Jewish religious school). It maintained control over the area even after 1995, when Nablus was given over to nominal PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY control.

The presence of settlers and soldiers has caused tensions here too, which came to a head in October 2000 following ARIEL SHARON's explosive visit to al-Haram ash-Sharif. Violent clashes broke out around the tomb, and six Palestinians and one Israeli were killed. When the Israelis eventually retreated, Palestinians ransacked and destroyed the outpost and shrine. The next day, Israelis burned down a mosque in the Israeli city of Tiberius in protest.

The ruins of Joseph's Tomb are now located in a back alley of a poor residential area near a refugee camp in Nablus. The basic stonework mostly stands, but the grounds are overgrown and the tomb itself has been reduced to soot-blackened rubble. There is no restriction on access except for the Israeli law that makes it illegal for Israeli citizens to enter certain Palestinian-controlled areas and the general difficulty in getting around the West Bank due to the BARRIER, checkpoints, roadblocks, CURFEWS, and closures.

Jacob's Well, Nablus. A Greek Orthodox church has been built near the site of Joseph's Tomb, next to the Balata refugee camp in Nablus. It covers a well that tradition says was built by Jacob and where, according to the Gospel of John, Jesus met a SAMARITAN woman and revealed to her that he was the Messiah. In 1885 the Greek Orthodox Church acquired the site and began restoring it. In 1999 a new wave of restoration began, often hampered by the difficulty of acquiring Israeli building permits.

In November 1979 a priest and caretaker of the site, the Archimandrite Father Philoumenos, was murdered in the well chamber. Earlier that month, a radical rabbi settler and his followers came to the monastery and demanded that the crosses and icons be taken down, claiming the site belonged to the Jews. They shouted threats and blasphemies, but Philoumenos explained that the church had for many years been a sacred Orthodox place. A week later the extremists came back and tortured and killed the priest and desecrated the church. No one was ever arrested or tried for the crimes.

Access to the church is open, but because Nablus is surrounded by Israeli checkpoints and under a state of continuous SIEGE by the Israeli military, the site is rarely visited by any but the most intrepid travelers and occasional tour groups.

See also ARCHAEOLOGY; AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF; HASMONEAN TUNNEL; HEBRON AND JEWISH SETTLEMENTS; HOLY BASIN; NABLUS; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Armstrong, Karen. The Battle for God. New York: Ballantine Books, 2001.
- . The Great Transformation: The Beginning of Our Religious Traditions, reprint ed. New York: Anchor, 2007.
- . A History of God: The 4,000-Year Quest of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. New York: Gramercy, 2004.
- . History of Jerusalem. New York: Harper-Collins, 2005.
- . In the Beginning: A New Interpretation of Genesis. New York: Ballantine Books, 1997.
- . Jerusalem: One City, Three Faiths, reprint ed. New York: Ballantine Books, 1997.
- Hollis, Christopher. Holy Places: Jewish, Christian, and Muslim Monuments in the Holy Land. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1969.
- Patterson, Webster T. Sacred Sites: Christian Perspectives on the Holy Land. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 2004.
- Pearlman, Moshe, and Yaacov Yannai. Historical Sites in the Holy Land. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1985.
- Robinson, O. Preston. Biblical Sites in the Holy Land. Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Company, 1963.
- Rosenberg, Stuart E. Great Religions of the Holy Land: An Historical Guide to Sacred Places and Sites. Toronto, ON: McClelland and Stewart, 1971.

—Pamela Olson

Holy War Army

The Holy War Army (Jaysh al-Jihad al-Muqaddas) was founded in 1933 but did not fight in the ARAB REVOLT and was relaunched at the end of 1947. These Palestinian irregular forces are said to have fought bravely but ineffectively against Israeli troops. Led by Hasan Salama and ABD AL-QADIR AL-HUSAYNI, they were loosely under the auspices of the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE. In 1948 the Holy War Army was assisted, if poorly, by the 4,000-man volunteer ARAB LIBERATION

ARMY, which was funded by the ARAB LEAGUE, trained at southern SYRIA bases, and led by the Syrian FAWZI AL-QAWUQJI.

See also WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- O'Ballance, Edgar. The Arab-Israel War, 1948. New York: Hyperion Press, 1983.
- Pappé, Ilan. The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict 1947–51. London: I. B. Tauris, 1994.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1997.
- Rogan, Eugene L., and Avi Shlaim, eds. The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Homot Shalem Association

The Homot Shalem Association, together with the right-wing MOLEDET political party, is among the most vocal advocates of “TRANSFER”—removing Palestinians from Israel and the Occupied Territories. In East JERUSALEM the group mobilizes and organizes investors to purchase land in an effort to ensure Jewish control over the city. Homot Shalem is dedicated to populating East Jerusalem with Jews and Judaizing it so that Palestinians have no demographic claim to the area, thus precluding the possibility of a future partition of the city. A prime mover of the project is Knesset member BENYAMIN ELON of the NATIONAL UNION PARTY—Israel Beiteinu.

One Homot Shalem project implemented in 2001 was the assembling of a group of Jewish investors from Israel and abroad to purchase 18 dunums (4.5 acres) of land in the Palestinian neighborhood of SHAYKH JARRAH, inhabited by thousands of East Jerusalem Arabs, for $3 million. With the money, Homot Shalem's company, Nahalat Shimon Ltd., constructed a Jewish colony consisting of three buildings, each of which housed forty Jewish families in what the company termed “the first stage of the project.” An additional forty apartments were built in another part of Shaykh Jarrah owned by Palestinians until 1976, when a cave and the adjoining field were purchased by Jews with funds raised abroad. The cave is allegedly the grave of Simeon the Just, a high priest during the time of the Second Temple, and Elon says he looks forward to a time when there will be no Palestinians living around the tomb of Simeon the Just and in Simeon's Heritage, the name he prefers to Shaykh Jarrah. “It was a Jewish neighborhood and it will be a Jewish neighborhood.”

In April 2002, Ha'aretz reported that over the past few months, the Homot Shalem Association has secured Jewish rights to some one-third of the MUSRARAH neighborhood in East Jerusalem by buying vacant lots and compounds currently inhabited by Palestinians.

See also SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM

Bibliography

- European Union. EU Heads of Mission Report on East Jerusalem. EUobserver Document. 9 March 2009. euobserver.com.
- Frey, Annabel. "Settler Violence and Harassment in Sheikh Jarrah." Independent Media Center. 13 May 2003. www.Indymedia.org.
- Lefkowitz, Etgar. "MK Benny Elon Promises 'Jewish Continuity' in Jerusalem." Jerusalem Post. 24 April 2002. <http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2002/04/23/News/News.47596.htm>.
- Lynfield, Ben. "Settlers Strategically Split East Jerusalem." Christian Science Monitor. n.d. www.pass.to/newsletter/0602SettlersStrategicallySplitEas.htm.
- MIFTAH. "Palestinian Neighborhood in East Jerusalem under Threat." Behind the News: MIFTAH's Weekly E-Bulletin. 4–12 October 2001. www.miftah.org.
- Orient House. Israel to Build New Israeli Settlement in Sheikh Jarrah. Press release. Jerusalem: The Orient House, 7 May 2001.
- "Restoring a Jewish Neighborhood in Jerusalem." Judea Magazine. 10:2 (14 April 2002).
- Shragai, Nadav. "Jews Buy up Land around Jerusalem Shimon HaTzaddik neighborhood." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 12 October 2001.
- . "Jews Buy Up Property in East Jerusalem: Prime Minister Ariel Sharon Encouraged Move into Arab Musrara Neighborhood." Ha'aretz. 14 April 2002.

HonestReporting.com

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US

The Hope

See THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Hope-Simpson Commission, 1930

In 1930 the SHAW COMMISSION, a British commission investigating the origins of the 1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES, determined that the Palestinian violence had stemmed from the community's anxiety over the adverse effects of Zionist IMMIGRATION and LAND purchases. It recommended that British authorities limit both. Subsequently the British government appointed a second commission, headed by Sir John Hope-Simpson, to reexamine "the questions of immigration, land settlement, and development."

Hope-Simpson's report, issued in late 1930, focused primarily on the fact that there was insufficient land in Palestine to support continued Jewish immigration. According to the report, Arab farmers were suffering from severe economic difficulties. Approximately 30 percent of Palestinians were landless, which the report linked to Zionist land purchases. The report blamed the Jewish policy of hiring only Jews for the Arabs' deplorable economic circumstances. Because of these conditions, Hope-Simpson recommended the cessation of Jewish immigration until new agricultural methods were introduced in Palestine.

The Hope-Simpson Commission's findings led the British government to formulate a policy paper known as the PASSFIELD WHITE PAPER, which revived the idea of forming a LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL for Palestine and of limiting Jewish immigration and land purchase by linking them to the absorptive capacity of the country.

Bibliography

- Cohen, Michael Joseph. Palestine, Retreat from the Mandate: A Study of British Policy, 1936–45. New York: Holmes and Meier Publishers, 1978.
- Hope-Simpson, Sir John, C.I.E., Palestine: Report on Immigration, Land Settlement and Development. Presented by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to Parliament by Command of His Majesty, October, 1930. Command Paper No. 3686, His Majesty's Stationery Office, 1930.
- Lesch, Anne M. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.
- Taylor Alan R. Prelude to Israel: An Analysis of Zionist Diplomacy 1897–1947. New York: Philosophical Library, 1955.

Hospitallers

Known as the knights of the "Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem," the Hospitallers were originally CRUSADERS who devoted themselves to caring for pilgrims to the Holy Land. They established a hospital and hostel in 1080 CE near the Church of the Holy Sepulcher (St. Johns Hospice) that was taken over by radical Jewish settlers in 1990.

House Demolitions

The long-standing Israeli policy of demolishing Palestinian houses on both sides of the Green Line represents a central element in the conflict between the Israeli Jewish and Palestinian peoples. Israel offers a number of reasons for the demolitions, including that houses have been built without PERMITS and that homes demolished in military operations are merely “collateral damage.” The policy did not originate with the OCCUPATION in 1967. Before 1948 the BRITISH MANDATE authorities demolished Palestinian homes as a form of deterrence against attacks, appreciating the fact that this was the most painful punishment for Arabs. It was Israel, however, that applied the house demolition policy widely and systematically, and house demolitions have stood at the center of Israel’s approach to “the Arab problem” since the state’s founding. Although exact figures are impossible to arrive at, the stages in Israel’s demolition campaign are as follows:

- From 1948 into the mid-1960s, Israel systematically demolished 531 Palestinian villages and eleven urban neighborhoods inside of what became the state of Israel, which comprised two-thirds of the villages of Palestine. This was done after the residents had fled or were driven out to prevent the REFUGEES from returning, so that their LANDS could be turned over to Jewish immigrants.
- At the start of the Occupation in 1967, the policy of demolition was carried across the Green Line into the WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, and the GAZA STRIP. From 1967 to early 2009 (including the December 2008/January 2009 attack on Gaza), approximately 24,000 Palestinian houses were destroyed; many of these people had already lost their homes inside Israel in 1948 and after.
- Immediately following the 1967 WAR, at least 2,000 houses were demolished. Three villages (Yalu, Imwas, and Beit Nuba) were razed in the Latrun area (now transformed into Canada Park), while dozens of homes were destroyed in the Mughrabi Quarter of Jerusalem’s OLD CITY to create a plaza for the WESTERN WALL.
- In 1971 ARIEL SHARON, then head of the Southern Command, demolished 2,000 houses in Gaza refugee camps to facilitate military control. (From the time he was elected prime minister in early 2001 until his stroke in January 2006, he oversaw the demolition of another 1,500 homes in Gaza.)
- During the First INTIFADA in the late 1980s and early 1990s, Israel destroyed at least 2,000 houses in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES in the process of quelling the uprising.
- During the course of the OSLO PROCESS (1993–2000) almost 1,700 Palestinian houses in the Occupied Territories were demolished.
- Throughout the Second Intifada (2000–2009) some 4,000 to 5,000 Palestinian houses were destroyed in military operations. Hundreds of homes in JENIN, NABLUS, Ramallah, BETHLEHEM, HEBRON, and other cities of the West Bank were bulldozed, while in Gaza more than 2,500 homes were destroyed, many in the Rafah district. Tens of thousands of additional homes were left uninhabitable. Altogether, some 50,000 people were left homeless in this five-year period. Additionally, in the course of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, hundreds of shops, workshops, factories, and public buildings, including all the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY ministry offices in every West Bank city, were destroyed or damaged beyond repair. According to Amnesty International, more than 7,400 acres (3,000 hectares) of cultivated land—10 percent of the agricultural land of Gaza—was bulldozed during this time. Wells, WATER storage pools, and water pumps that provided water for drinking, irrigation, and other needs for thousands of people were also destroyed, along with tens of kilometers of irrigation networks.
- During the same period, about 900 Palestinian homes were demolished by the Civil Administration for lack of proper permits, and more than 628 Palestinian homes were demolished as collective punishment and deterrence, affecting families of people known or suspected of involvement in attacks on Israeli civilians.

According to B’TSELEM, the Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, on average twelve innocent people lose their homes for every person punished for a security offense—and in half the cases the occupants had nothing whatsoever to do with the acts in question. The Israeli government says its actions are intended to deter potential TERRORISTS, but B’Tselem has noted that 79 percent of the suspected offenders were either dead or in prison at the time of the demolition. According to B’Tselem, 60 percent of the Palestinian homes demolished in the Occupied Territories during the Second Intifada were destroyed as part of military “clearing operations,” 25 percent as being “illegal” (not having proper permits), and 15 percent as collective punishment.

Throughout Israel proper in the “UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES” of Palestinians and BEDOUINS, as well as in the Palestinian neighborhoods of RAMLA, Lydda, and other Palestinian towns, houses continue to be demolished at an ever accelerating rate. Some 100,000 “internal refugees” or PRESENT ABSENTEES from 1948 and their families live in more than 100 unrecognized villages. These villages, located in the vicinity of their now-destroyed villages, have no legal standing and receive no services, and their residents have inadequate living conditions and face constant threats of demolition. Bedouin villages in the Negev, with some 60,000 to 70,000 residents, are threatened with demolition. Indeed, whereas Arabs comprise almost 20 percent of the population of Israel, they are confined by law and zoning policies to 3.5 percent of the land. In mid-2004 the Israeli government announced the formation of a demolition administration in the Ministry of Interior to oversee the demolition of the homes of Palestinian-Arab citizens—between 20,000 and 40,000 in number.

The process for demolishing Palestinian homes is based on an elaborate system of planning, laws, and administrative procedures to reach the goal of confining the 3.6 million Palestinians of the Occupied Territories, together with the million Palestinian citizens of Israel, to small enclaves on only about 8 percent of the country—rising to 15 percent if a truncated Palestinian mini-state is established.

When homes are demolished in military actions or as acts of deterrence and other forms of collective punishment, there is no process. On the other hand, demolitions for administrative reasons (such as lack of a permit) are carried out by the Civil Administration in the West Bank and Gaza, by either the Ministry of Interior or the Jerusalem municipality in East Jerusalem. Regardless, the overall process is similar. Master plans and zoning regulations limit the number of Palestinian buildings, based on planning requirements. For example, the entire West Bank has been designated agricultural land and STATE LAND, meaning that Palestinian buildings are not allowed, while most of the empty land owned by Palestinians in East Jerusalem has been zoned as “open GREEN AREAS.” If Palestinians nevertheless build on land that belonged to them before the Israeli designations, Israel can demolish their illegal homes. (While Jews may in rare cases receive a demolition order for an illegal porch or shed, there has never been a Jewish house demolished in either Jerusalem or the Occupied Territories.) And the policy is explicit; as Colonel Shlomo Politus, legal advisor to the Civil Administration, stated flatly to the Israeli parliament on 13 July 2003: “There are no more construction permits for Palestinians.”

Because Palestinians do not have home mail delivery (including in East Jerusalem), demolition orders are distributed haphazardly. Occasionally a building inspector may knock on the door and hand the order to anyone who answers, even small children. More frequently the order is stuck into the doorframe or even left under a stone near the house. Palestinians have frequently complained that they never received the order before the bulldozers arrived and thus were denied recourse to the courts. In Jerusalem a favored practice is to deliver an order at night by placing it somewhere near the targeted house, then arriving early in the morning to demolish it.

If they manage to reach the court in time, Palestinians may occasionally delay the order’s execution (at considerable expense), although there is no record of an order being overturned. Once it is affirmed, the bulldozers may arrive at any time—the same day, that week, or even years later. (Because the government has issued so many demolition orders, it is unable to implement them all at once and orders are thus prioritized.) Though many families know their homes are targeted, actual demolitions are carried out seemingly at random. Randomization and its associated fear are part of the generalized policy of making life difficult for Palestinians so that they will voluntarily leave the territories. The wrecking crews, accompanied by soldiers, police, and Civil Administration officials, usually come in the early morning hours just after the men have left for work. The family is sometimes given a few minutes to remove their belongings before the bulldozers move in, but because family members and neighbors usually put up some kind of resistance—or at least protest—they are often removed forcibly from the house. Their possessions are then thrown out by the wrecking crews (often foreign guest workers).

In addition to the emotional suffering, demolitions constitute a serious financial blow, especially to the poor families who make up the vast majority of demolition victims. About 70 percent of Palestinians living in both Jerusalem and the West Bank and Gaza live below the poverty line (US$2 per day). Israeli courts issue hefty fines when a demolition order is imposed, in the range of $10,000–$20,000, to be paid in monthly installments whether the house is demolished or not. In Jerusalem, families must also pay for the demolition of their own homes; at the end of the demolition they are presented with the wrecking company's bill, around $1,500. When the bulldozer finally begins its systematic work of demolition, the whole process may take between five minutes (for a small home of concrete blocks) and six hours (for a five-story apartment building). At times demolition is resisted, and people are beaten, jailed, and sometimes killed.

Although every country has planning regulations, zoning, and enforcement mechanisms, Israel is the only Western country—and Jerusalem the only city—that systematically denies permits to and demolishes houses of a particular ethnonational group. The Fourth Geneva Convention requires occupying powers (such as Israel) to protect the well-being of civilian populations under their control. Under the Hague Regulations of 1907 and the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, for example, Israel is enjoined as an occupying power to protect and ensure the needs of the Palestinian population.

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. House Demolitions: Palestinian Civilians in Rafah Refugee Camp. MDE 15/053/2004. London: Amnesty International.
- . Israel: House Demolitions—Palestinians Given 15 Minutes to Leave. MDE 15/078/1999. London: Amnesty International.
- . Israel and the Occupied Territories: Demolition and Dispossession: The Destruction of Palestinian Homes. MDE 15/059/1999. London: Amnesty International.
- . Israel and the Occupied Territories: Under the Rubble: House Demolition and Destruction of Land and Property. MDE 15/033/2004. London: Amnesty International.
- Benvenisti, Meron. "Systematically Burying Ourselves." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 18 January 2002.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). House Demolition Statistics. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1998.
- . Planning and Building Statistics. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2000.
- . Planning and Building Statistics. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Christian Peacemaker Teams, Israeli Committee against House Demolitions, Land Defense General Committee—Palestine, and Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment. Campaign to Save the Homes of Palestine. Jerusalem: Israeli Committee against House Demolitions, 1998. www.icahd.org/eng.
- Darcy, Shane. Israel's Punitive House Demolition Policy: Collective Punishment in Violation of International Law. Ramallah, West Bank: al-Haq—Law in the Service of Man, 2003.
- GINBAR, Yuval. Demolishing Peace: Israel's Policy of Mass Demolition of Palestinian Houses in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1997.
- Institute of Applied Research—Jerusalem. Behind the Policy of House Demolition: Why Here and Now? Jerusalem: ARIJ, 1997.
- Margalit, Meir. House Demolitions in East Jerusalem. Jerusalem: ICAHD, 2009.
- Palestine Human Rights Campaign. House Demolitions and Sealings as Practiced against the Palestinians Living under Military Occupation. Jerusalem: Database Center, 1986.
- Pappe, Ilan. The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine. Oxford: One World Publications, 2006.
- Parastou Hassouri. Bulldozed into Cantons: Israel's House Demolition Policy in the West Bank since the Signing of the Oslo Agreements, September 1993–March 1998. Jerusalem: The Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment—LAW, 1998.
- Playfair, Emma. Demolition and Sealing of Houses as a Punitive Measure in the Israeli Occupied West Bank. Ramallah, West Bank: Al-Haq—Law in the Service of Man, 1987.
- Shnayderman, Ronen. Through No Fault of Their Own: Punitive House Demolitions during the al-Aqsa Intifada. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2004.

—Jeff Halper

House of Harrari

See THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Housing Restrictions for Palestinians

In the decades since the 1967 WAR, Israel's policy of planning, development, and building in the West Bank has severely restricted construction by Palestinians while allocating broad expanses of LAND to establish and expand Jewish housing in SETTLEMENTS. In this way Israel has created a situation in which thousands of Palestinians are unable to obtain PERMITS to build on their land and are compelled to build without a permit, because they have no other way to provide shelter for their families.

At the outset of the OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK and GAZA, Israel implemented planning regulations that serve as the basis for the approval—though more often the rejection—of applications for building permits. Since 1977, land registration has been frozen, making it difficult for Palestinians to prove ownership of their land. Israel administers the building authorities, which have no Palestinian representation. A Palestinian wanting to obtain a building permit to construct on his land in Area C (more than two-thirds of the West Bank, which remains under Israeli control as a consequence of the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION) must follow a prolonged, complicated, and expensive application procedure, which generally ends in denial of the application. In this situation, many Palestinians have no choice except to build without a permit to provide housing for themselves and their families.

Rather than change this situation, Israel has adopted a policy of mass HOUSE DEMOLITIONS. At the same time, at least 150 Israeli settlements containing more than 475,000 Jewish Israeli citizens have been established. These settlements benefit from an efficient system of planning and supervision of construction and comprehensive planning schemes for all the settlements. Despite this, thousands of houses have been built in the settlements without permits. Israel has refrained from demolishing these houses, instead issuing retroactive building permits for the houses constructed without permits.

The ongoing violation of the Palestinian people's housing rights and the ever expanding settlements in the West Bank are organically interconnected. Settlement creation and expansion require land. The usurpation of Palestinian land for the planning and building of Jewish settlements and housing, concurrent with the refusal to allow Palestinians to build on their own land, negates even the possibility that Palestinians will one day be able to plan and build for their future.

Bibliography

Alfasi, Nurit. "Planning Policy? Between Long-Term Planning and Zoning Amendments in the Israeli Planning System." Environment and Planning. 38:3 (2006).

B'Tselem (Israel Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Planning and Building. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Planning\_and\_Building/Index.asp

Halper, Jeff. Obstacles to Peace: A Critical Re-framing of the Israel-Palestine Conflict, 3rd ed. Bethlehem: Palestine Mapping Center, 2005.

Israeli Committee against House Demolitions. www.icahd.org.

Hovevei Zion

Hovevei Zion (Lovers of Zion), also known as Hibbat Zion, was the name taken by a loosely organized network of Jewish community circles that sprang up in the RUSSIAN FEDERATION, Poland, and Romania in the early 1880s in response to the intensification of anti-Jewish government policies and increasingly destructive ANTI-SEMITIC riots. These were the beginning years of large-scale Jewish emigration out of Eastern Europe, most of it to the West. Leaders of the Hovevei Zion movement instead argued for migration to Palestine, where they hoped new Jewish colonies would both offer refuge from persecution and revive Jewish culture and identity, which they felt were threatened by the pressures to integrate into modern societies. By 1884, there were more than thirty-two Hovevei Zion societies spread across Eastern Europe, with approximately 14,000 dues-paying members working to raise money and promote immigration to Palestine. In Palestine they had established and helped to maintain six SETTLEMENTS: Petah Tikva, Rishon le-Zion, Rosh Pina, Zikhron Ya'akov, Yesud ha-Ma'ale, and Gadera.

Each settlement was begun by different groups and individuals under the Hovevei Zion umbrella. Gadera, for example, was established by a society named Bilu that was made up of high school and university students in Kharkov. With a name that was an acronym for the biblical phrase Beit Ya'akov lakhu va nalkha (Come, House of Jacob, let us go, Isaiah 2:5), Bilu was imbued with the secular populist ideas then prevalent at the university, including the ultimate takeover of Palestine and the establishment there of a modern Jewish state. An impatient idealistic youth movement, by 1890 it had grown to around 500 members in twenty-five groups. Ultimately, perhaps only 60 members actually reached Palestine, with 14 settling there permanently—half in Rishon le-Zion and the other 7 in Gadera.

Although Hovevei Zion is best known as a pioneer of the early Zionist settlements of Palestine, its ideological influence on the later European-wide general Zionist movement was also important. This was evident in a conference it organized in 1884 in Kattowice, Poland, which was intended to provide organizational coherence and a united purpose to the settlements, bringing together influential leaders from across Eastern Europe with different backgrounds and ideological bents. For example, the religious traditionalist Rabbi Samuel Mohilever from Bialystok, Poland, the honorary president of the conference, saw the settlements not only as physical refuges but also as practical applications of the traditional daily prayer for return to Zion, which had been abandoned by the integrationist Reform Judaism of the West. The presiding officer was LEON PINSKER, a modernist physician from Odessa, Russia, who argued in an 1882 pamphlet, "Auto-Emancipation," that only an independent Jewish state could save the Jews from persecution, and who repeated those ideas in his presidential address. Asher Ginzberg, a newcomer to Hovevei Zion, better known by his pen name, AHAD HA'AM, argued strongly at Kattowice that the Palestinian settlements should be built as spiritual and cultural centers of Hebrew language and culture. Without this primary focus on common language and culture, he insisted, the settlement movement (and by implication a Jewish state) would never survive. Others pushed for a focus on agricultural settlements with a "back to the land" theme.

The Kattowice Conference was a useful exchange of ideas. Particularly striking was its ability to hold together both religious traditionalists and secular nontraditionalists, although each member society of Hovevei Zion continued to pursue its own projects. In 1890 the Russian government granted legal status to Pinsker's Odessa group under the rubric Society for the Support of Jewish Farmers and Artisans in SYRIA and Palestine, but the license applied only to Odessa. Ahad Ha'am, through correspondence, built a network of Jewish intelligentsia throughout Europe, which supported his idea of Hebrew education. Calling themselves the Sons of Moses (Bnei Moshe), they worked to establish a national college in JAFFA, initially in cooperation with the ALLIANCE ISRAÉLITE UNIVERSELLE in Paris. The school opened in 1892, supported with Hovevei Zion funds from Odessa; by the late 1890s some 250 students were enrolled. In the end the establishment of a strong central executive to coordinate all of these activities came from Western Europe, in the form of the Zionist Organization, later the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION (WZO).

At the first WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS, convened in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897 and led by THEODOR HERZL, a caucus of the main Hovevei Zion groups attended and presented their views, which came to be known as "cultural" or "practical" Zionism. Cultural or practical Zionism stood in contrast to Herzl's secular nationalist "political Zionism," which believed that a Jewish state could currently be created in Palestine. For the cultural Zionists a Jewish state was at best a long-term hope. But Jews in Eastern Europe were under intense pressure of persecution and needed immediate relief. Herzl's political Zionist approach won the day, although the culturalist Ahad Ha'am and his followers continued their educational work, loosely cooperating with the WZO and providing a cultural voice to its political and diplomatic activities.

Only a few representatives from the religiously oriented Hovevei Zion societies were present at the 1897 conference, yet ultimately they would reinforce one of the salient features of modern ZIONISM: the concept of a Jewish state grounded in Judaic law and the Torah. Arguing that belief in the coming of the Messiah, Hibbat Zion, and Zionism were all part of a whole, they participated in World Zionist activities, where they presented their point of view. As proto-political parties emerged at the Zionist Congresses in the early twentieth century, these religious Zionists formed their own MIZRAHI faction (1902) under the leadership of Rabbi Yitzhak Reines. Mizrahi's founding manifesto called for a clear separation between political activities and "the spiritual sphere, which is the real animator of Zionism"; the name "Mizrahi" was formed from the words merkaz ruhani (spiritual center). Though Mizrahi leadership played down the earlier messianic theme, it never entirely disappeared. Mizrahi and its adjunct settlement organization Hapoel Mizrahi were strong forces in Yishuv activities during the BRITISH MANDATE period and coalesced into the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY in 1956. Its youth movement, Bnei Akiva, founded in 1929, is active today in Israel and throughout the DIASPORA.

Bibliography

Avineri, Shlomo. The Making of Modern Zionism: The Intellectual Origins of the Jewish State. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1981.

- Dieckhoff, Alain. The Invention of a Nation: Zionist Thought and the Making of Modern Israel. Translated by Jonathan Derrick. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Mendelsohn, Ezra. Zionism in Poland: The Formative Years, 1915–1926. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981.
- Shimoni, Gideon. The Zionist Ideology. Hanover and London: Brandeis University Press, 1995.
- Simon, Leon. Ahad Ha-Am: Essays, Letters, Memoirs. Oxford, UK: Phaedon Press, 1946.
- Vital, David. The Origins of Zionism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1975.
- . Zionism: The Crucial Phase. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1987.

—Jon Mandaville

Husayn, Rashid (1936–1977)

Rashid Husayn, a Palestinian-Israeli teacher, poet, and activist, was a founding member of AL-ARD, an Arab nationalist political movement that emerged in the 1950s. Born in Musmus near HAIFA, Husayn was imprisoned numerous times by Israel for his activities with al-Ard, and in 1967 he left Haifa for the UNITED STATES, where he lived in poverty and eventually died in a fire. He is remembered for several major poems and for his style, which, like that of so many Palestinian poets, links the writer to his subject matter. This is perhaps best evidenced in the poem “To a Cloud,” in which he abandons the attempt at maintaining aesthetic distance, instead becoming the land itself: “I, cloud of my life / am the hills of Galilee / I am the bosom of Haifa / And the forehead of JAFFA. . . . Waiting for you, my poetry turned to earth / Has become fields / Has turned into wheat / And trees. / I am all that remains of our earth, / I am all that remains of what you love, / So pour . . . pour with bounty, / Pour down the rain.”

See also PALESTINIAN POETRY

Bibliography

- Boullata, Kamal, and Mirène Ghossein. The World of Rashid Hussein, a Palestinian Poet in Exile. Detroit: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1979.
- Elmessiri, Abdelwahab M. “The Palestinian Wedding: Major Themes of Contemporary Palestinian Resistance Poetry.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 10:3 (1981).
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian

Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.

- Rouhana, Nadim. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities and Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Husayn-Arafat Agreement, 1985

In early 1985 King Husayn of JORDAN put a temporary end to fifteen years of secret negotiations with Israel and attempted to reach an agreement with YASIR ARAFAT and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), whose bases, infrastructure, and unity had been shattered by the 1982 Israeli-initiated LEBANON WAR. The king’s objectives remained as they had been since the 1967 WAR: to regain control over the WEST BANK and East JERUSALEM and to establish a situation in which any Palestinian entity would be under a form of Jordanian rule instead of sovereign. The king believed that if Jordan was to achieve either peace or prosperity, he needed to tame Palestinian nationalism and assert Jordanian control over the territories. He encouraged the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC) to meet in Amman, and on 22–29 November 1984 the seventeenth PNC convened and reaffirmed support for Arafat as PLO chairman and the PLO-Jordanian dialogue; however, the only attendees were some loyal FATAH members and the ARAB LIBERATION FRONT (ALF). The majority of PLO factions boycotted the meeting.

At this time there were four distinct factional alliances in the Palestinian movement: (1) Arafat and his remaining Fatah supporters; (2) the Fatah rebels (known as Fatah-Intifada or FATAH UPRISING or Fatah-Provisional Command); (3) the NATIONAL ALLIANCE, which included SA’IQA, the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND (PFLP-GC), and the Palestinian Popular Struggle Front (PPSF), who called for Arafat’s removal as PLO leader; and (4) the DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE, which included the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP), the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), the PALESTINIAN COMMUNIST PARTY (PCP), and the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (PLF; Yakub faction). Although this latter group upheld Arafat’s leadership, they were extremely critical of his policies.

On 22 December 1983 Arafat had met with Egyptian president HOSNI MUBARAK in Cairo. This move was designed to reward Egypt’s support of Arafat when he was under siege by the Fatah Uprising in Tripoli and to provide a counterweight to Syrian pressure, but it brought a storm of protest not only from the National Alliance but also from the Democratic Alliance. The meeting with EGYPT was condemned because Cairo remained isolated in the Arab world as a consequence of its separate bilateral peace treaty with Israel.

Seemingly heedless of the intense frustration among PLO cadres and the severe fractures in the PLO, in February 1984 Arafat reopened discussions with Jordan on a joint diplomatic approach to the Arab-Israeli conflict, which resulted in the Husayn-Arafat Agreement of 11 February 1985. Arafat's diplomacy caused further outrage in most sectors of the PLO, since King Husayn's desire to reassert Jordanian hegemony over the West Bank was well-known.

The Husayn-Arafat Agreement proposed a Middle East peace accord that called for the exchange of land for peace within the context of an international conference, but Palestinian autonomy would occur only in the context of Jordanian sovereignty. On 25 March 1985, former Palestine National Council speaker Khalid al-Fahum announced from Damascus the formation by the National Alliance, the PLF, and the PFLP of a PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT (PNSF).

In its founding statement, the PNSF condemned the Amman accords and called for "action to topple the trend of deviation and relinquishment" within the PLO. Now legitimized by the presence of the PFLP, the opposition's challenge to Arafat's leadership seemed stronger than ever. Indeed, never in its existence had the PLO been so bitterly divided.

The king wanted assurances from Arafat that he would renounce violence and recognize the state of Israel, but such an assurance was never formally given and negotiations broke down. On 19 February 1986 King Husayn announced the end of the year-long effort to construct a joint strategy with the PLO.

King Husayn then resumed talks with Israel, and in April 1987 the monarch and SHIMON PERES, the Israeli foreign minister, agreed to a UN-sponsored conference that would include Palestinian representatives as part of a Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. Despite American assent to the plan, Israel's premier, YITZHAK SHAMIR, refused to accept the agreement, wanting the conference to include only Jordanian delegates.

When the INTIFADA (the Palestinian uprising on the West Bank and in Gaza) erupted in December 1987, the entire situation for Jordan was altered. Any hopes of a Jordanian-Palestinian resolution to the Palestine problem were effectively quashed, and the king renounced all claims to the West Bank. He dissolved the Jordanian Parliament, half of whom were West Bank representatives, stopped paying salaries to over 20,000 West Bank civil servants, and resumed secret negotiations with Israel.

In November 1988 a reunified PNC declared the "State of Palestine" and agreed to recognize Israel. It also accepted UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338, which until then it had firmly rejected. This momentous event signaled an enormous shift in Palestinian thinking toward a greater recognition of political reality.

See also CAMPS' WAR; JORDAN; LEBANON WAR

Bibliography

- Aruri, Naseer. The PLO and the Jordan Option. MERIP Reports No. 131 (1985).
- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Chomsky, Noam. "Terror in South Lebanon." Journal of Palestine Studies. 13 (1984).
- Hagopian, Elaine, ed. Amal and the Palestinians: Understanding the Battle of the Camps. Belmont, MA: AAUG Press, 1985.
- Hirst, David. The Gun and the Olive Branch, 2nd ed. London: Faber and Faber, 2003.
- Al-Hout, Bayan Nuwayhed. Sabra and Shatila, September 1982. London: Pluto Press, 2004.
- Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Hussein-Arafat Accord. 9–10. 11 February 1985.
- Sahliyah, Emile. The PLO after the Lebanon War. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1986.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- . "Struggle within, Struggle Without: The Transformation of PLO Politics since 1982." International Affairs. 65 (Spring 1989).
- . "The War of the Camps." Journal of Palestine Studies. 16 (1986).
- Al-Shaikh, Zakaria. "Sabra and Shatila 1982: Resisting the Massacre." Journal of Palestine Studies. 14 (1984).
- Timmerman, Jacobo. The Longest War: Israel in Lebanon. New York: Knopf, 1982.

Al-Husayni, Abd al-Qadir (1908–1948)

Abd al-Qadir al-Husayni was a Palestinian resistance leader during the BRITISH MANDATE. Born in JERUSALEM, he received a B.A. in Chemistry from the American University in Cairo in 1932. When he returned to Palestine he initially took a post in the settlement department of the British Mandate government, but eventually moved to the HEBRON area during the 1936–1939 ARAB REVOLT to lead the struggle against the British, during which he was a singularly important leader in the Jerusalem area. A member of the Palestine ARAB PARTY, he served as its secretary-general and became editor-in-chief of the party's paper, Al-Liwa', and other newspapers, including Al-Jami'a Al-Islamiyya. In response to his role in the Arab Revolt, the British deported him in 1938, and in 1939 he fled to IRAQ, where in 1941 he fought with the Iraqi army against the British in Baghdad (the Rashid Ali al-Gaylani coup). In 1946 al-Husayni moved to EGYPT, but secretly returned to Palestine to lead the HOLY WAR ARMY (Jaysh al-Jihad al-Muqaddas) in January 1948, and was killed fighting the PALMAH during hand-to-hand fighting for control of Qastal Hill on the Tel Aviv–Jerusalem road. Abd al-Qadir established himself as a great and courageous leader in the Holy War Army against Zionist forces.

Bibliography

- Benvenisti, Meron. Sacred Landscape: The Buried History of the Holy Land since 1948. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
- Levenberg, Haim. Military Preparations of the Arab Community in Palestine: 1945–1948. London: Routledge, 1993.
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem Revisited. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Robinson, Glenn E. Building a Palestinian State: The Incomplete Revolution. Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Swedenburg, Ted. "The Role of the Palestinian Peasantry in the Great Revolt (1936–9)." In The Israel/Palestine Question. Edited by Ilan Pappé. London: Routledge, 1999.

Al-Husayni, al-Hajj Amin Mohammad (1895–1974)

Al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni was a Palestinian-Arab nationalist and Muslim religious leader (mufti). As an al-Husayni he was a member of one of JERUSALEM's most prominent families. During the BRITISH MANDATE his most important positions were as mufti of Jerusalem, president of the SUPREME MUSLIM COUNCIL, and head of the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE, through which he led the Palestinians in the struggle against the Zionists. Al-Husayni was born in Jerusalem in 1895 at a time when less than 7 percent of Palestine's population was Jewish. In 1913, at the age of eighteen, he made the pilgrimage to Mecca and thereafter was known by the honorific title of hajj. Al-Husayni studied at al-Azhar University in Cairo for a short period, then studied with Rashid Rida, the Muslim reformer and early proponent of Arab nationalism. Before World War I he attended the Military Academy in Istanbul, Turkey.

With the outbreak of World War I in 1914 al-Husayni joined the OTTOMAN Turkish army, received a commission as an artillery officer, and was assigned to the 47th Brigade, stationed in and around the predominately Greek Christian city of Smyrna. However, in November 1916, disillusioned with the Ottoman attitude toward Arab nationalism, al-Husayni left the army on a three-month disability leave and returned to Jerusalem, where he remained for the duration of the war. In 1916 he took part in the pan-Arab Revolt against the Ottomans, which struggled to establish a unified, independent Arab state, which they believed was promised by the British in the HUSAYN-MCMAHON CORRESPONDENCE.

In 1919 al-Husayni attended the Pan-Syrian Congress held in Damascus, where he supported Emir Faisal as king of SYRIA. That same year he joined the Arab secret society al-Nadi al-Arabi (The Arab Club) in Jerusalem, a literary and nationalist organization opposed to Zionist claims on Palestine, and wrote articles for the first new newspaper to be established in Palestine, Suriyya al-Janubiyya (Southern Syria). Beginning in September 1919, the paper was published in Jerusalem by the lawyer Muhammad Hasan al-Budayri and edited by 'Arif al-'Arif, both prominent members of al-Nadi al-Arabi.

Until late 1921 al-Husayni focused his efforts on pan-Arabism and creating Greater Syria, in which Palestine would be a southern province of one unified Arab state, with its capital in Damascus. Greater Syria was to include the territory now known as Syria, LEBANON, JORDAN, the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, and Israel. The struggle for Greater Syria collapsed after Britain ceded control over present-day Syria and Lebanon to FRANCE in July 1920, in accord with the SYKES-PICOT AGREEMENT. After the French army overthrew King Faysal and dissolved Greater Syria, al-Husayni turned from a Damascus-oriented pan-Arabism to an Arab-Palestinian nationalism centered on Jerusalem.

Al-Husayni viewed the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine, as a betrayal of the Arabs by the British, and in 1920 he began his political activism on behalf of the Palestinians. He helped to organize ANTI-ZIONIST demonstrations in Jerusalem, and his initial speeches called for unity with Syria, as he had not yet given up hope of pan-Arab nationalism. Soon, however, he became a strong advocate of Palestinian nationalism, for which he became famous. An anti-Zionist demonstration in April 1920 turned violent, and in the ensuing riots five Jews and four Arabs were killed. The British sentenced several Jews and Arabs to prison terms for their parts in the riot, with al-Husayni being sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in absentia, because he had already fled Palestine. In 1921 the first British HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR PALESTINE, Sir HERBERT SAMUEL, pardoned al-Husayni and appointed him to succeed his brother as mufti of Jerusalem. Before his appointment al-Husayni had assured Samuel that he and his family would maintain tranquillity in Jerusalem and cooperate with the British, which he did until 1936.

In early 1922 the British high commissioner appointed al-Husayni president of the Supreme Muslim Council, which gave him control over Muslim Shari'a courts, schools, and mosques; an annual budget of about $220,000 (50,000 pounds sterling); and the Waqf (religious endowment) funds. He formed an international Muslim campaign to improve and restore the shrine known as the DOME OF THE ROCK on the Muslim holy site AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF. The success of al-Husayni's fund-raising activities allowed the structure to be completely renovated.

Al-Husayni used these offices during the 1920s to extend his influence in religious and political affairs within and beyond Palestine. His rise to power coincided with the decline of the Palestine ARAB EXECUTIVE, which led the Palestinian national struggle from 1920 to 1934, and was based on the public perception that he had stood up to Zionists during the 1928–1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES and violent riots. In fact he neither organized nor led the riots, according to the British SHAW COMMISSION, which investigated the disturbances. Rather, he had publicly encouraged Muslims throughout Palestine not to resort to violence.

From 1929 to 1936 al-Husayni continued to cooperate with the British while at the same time attempting to change British pro-Zionist policy. He opposed militant activities against British rule and sent his secretary to London to propose a representative government.

For their part, the British proposed restrictions on Jewish IMMIGRATION and LAND purchase in the 1930 PASSFIELD WHITE PAPER but withdrew the proposal because of Zionist pressure. Thus al-Husayni convened a General ISLAMIC CONFERENCE in December 1931 to galvanize Arab and Muslim opposition toward Zionists and to caution Britain that support for ZIONISM would jeopardize its interests in the Arab and Muslim world.

British policy, however, continued to support the Zionist cause, and al-Husayni increasingly found himself in the untenable position of working for the British and believing they would support Palestinian national rights, while consistently and forcefully articulating the Palestinian cause and opposing Zionism, and counseling the Palestinians not to use violence.

As Jewish immigration and land purchases continued to grow, so did Palestinian opposition to them. In April 1936, Palestinian groups throughout the country declared a general strike, and violence spread across Palestine. The public urged al-Husayni to assume the leadership of the ARAB REVOLT, which protested Jewish immigration and land purchases and demanded a national government. He reluctantly joined the executive organ known as the Arab High Committee, of which he became president. The committee proclaimed an official general strike; called for nonpayment of taxes and shutting down of municipal governments; and demanded an end to Jewish immigration, a ban on land sales to Jews, and national independence for the Palestinians. This immediately put al-Husayni on a collision course with the British. As the Arab Revolt continued, Jewish colonies, KIBBUTZIM, and quarters in towns became the targets for Arab sniping, bombing, and other violent activities.

In July 1937, British police were sent to arrest al-Husayni for his part in the Arab rebellion, but he was tipped off and escaped to al-Haram ash-Sharif, where the British thought it inadvisable to capture him. He rejected the 1937 PEEL COMMISSION Report, which recommended partition, and in September the British removed him from the presidency of the Supreme Muslim Council and declared the Arab Higher Committee illegal. In October he fled to Lebanon, where he attempted to reconstitute the Arab Higher Committee and to direct events in Palestine—neither of which was very successful. It is thought that he acquiesced in the assassinations of collaborators. After Britain published the 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, which declared Britain's opposition to a Jewish state in Palestine, al-Husayni became even more bitter and uncompromising, rejecting (as did the Zionist leaders) the White Paper because it did not provide for an immediate Palestinian state, even though its terms were favorable to the Palestinians. Although he remained in Lebanon for two years, his deteriorating relationship with the French authorities led him to flee to IRAQ in October 1939. There he encouraged a pan-Arab revolt against British rule in 1941, which caused British prime minister Winston Churchill to approve his assassination, but the assassins failed.

Subsequently al-Husayni fled to Italy and GERMANY, where he conferred with Mussolini and Hitler. In exchange for German promises that the Arab nations would be liberated and given their independence after the war, he cooperated with the Nazis and assisted in anti-British and ANTI-SEMITIC propaganda campaigns as well as in recruitment of Muslims for the war effort. Fearing that Jewish immigration to Palestine would lead to the domination or dispossession of his people, al-Husayni appealed to Nazi officials not to allow Jews to leave Italy and Germany for Palestine. By doing so he endangered the lives of thousands of Jews, mostly children, who would not have been sent to concentration camps had the Nazis complied. Whatever his contributions to the cause of Palestinian nationalism, his career and his cause were tainted by his association with the Nazis. This involvement also limited his freedom of action during the critical period from 1946 to 1948.

In 1946 al-Husayni returned to the Arab world to continue his struggle against Zionists and his work for an Arab Palestine. But he utterly misjudged the balance of forces in Palestine and internationally. He rejected the November 1947 UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 181, which was a missed opportunity, because implementation of the partition resolution would have resulted in a TWO-STATE SOLUTION. On 1 October 1948 al-Husayni was elected president of the ALL PALES-TINE GOVERNMENT, headquartered in the GAZA STRIP. But within a few days he was escorted back to Cairo by the Egyptians, and the All Palestine Government was annulled shortly after it was established. Thereafter, al-Husayni gradually lost political influence and became a religious Islamic leader, settling first in Cairo and then in Beirut, where he died.

Bibliography

- Elpeleg, Zvi. The Grand Mufti of Jerusalem: Haj Amin al-Husayni, Founder of the Palestinian National Movement. London: Frank Cass, 1993.
- Khadduri, Majid. Arab Contemporaries: The Role of Personalities in Politics. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973.
- Lesch, Ann Mosely. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Marlow, John. The Seat of Pilate: An Account of the Palestine Mandate. London: The Cresset Press, 1959.
- Mattar, Philip. The Mufti of Jerusalem: Al-Hajj Amin Al-Husayni and the Palestinian National Movement, rev. ed. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Pappe, Ilan. "Hajj Amin and the Buraq Revolt." Jerusalem Quarterly. 18 (2003).
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- . The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1977.

—Philip Mattar

Al-Husayni, Faysal (1940–2001)

Faysal al-Husayni, a prominent Palestinian political leader, was the son of ABD AL-QADIR AL-HUSAYNI, a Palestinian nationalist and fighter, and the grandnephew of AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI. His participation in the struggle for Palestine began in the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN) and involved guerrilla activity, but evolved to intellectual pursuits and political activism working for a TWO-STATE SOLUTION.

Upon finishing school in EGYPT in 1958, al-Husayni cofounded the General Union of Palestinian Students, which later became one of the central institutions of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). As a young man he was attracted to MAN but soon identified more with YASIR ARAFAT's FATAH movement. In 1963 he received commando training in Egypt, returned to JERUSALEM where he opened an office for the PLO, and later (1966–1967) received military training in a PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY camp in SYRIA. In 1967 al-Husayni was back in Jerusalem under Arafat's leadership as the PLO's head of popular organizations in the WEST BANK. He also acted as a MAN military commander from August to October 1967, when he was arrested by Israel for arms possession and imprisoned for a year. After his release he worked as an X-ray technician in Jerusalem from 1969 to 1977, then went to Beirut to pursue graduate studies in history.

In 1979 Faysal al-Husayni founded the Jerusalem-based ARAB STUDIES SOCIETY and in 1982 became a member of the SUPREME MUSLIM COUNCIL. By the mid-1980s al-Husayni was the senior representative of Fatah in the West Bank. He was held under house arrest by Israel for his political activities from 1982 to 1987 and repeatedly imprisoned from April 1987 through January 1989. These experiences helped transform al-Husayni's political outlook, leading him to recognize Israel as a permanent part of the landscape and to seek ways to achieve peaceful coexistence. In 1990 he led preparatory talks with US Secretary of State JAMES BAKER for the MADRID CONFERENCE, the US-sponsored dialogue among Arab states, Palestinians, and Israelis, and was part of the Palestinian steering committee from 1991 to 1993. Although Israel prevented him from taking a direct role in the talks for two years because of his association with Fatah, in 1993 he became head of the Palestinian delegation to Madrid. From April 1996 until his death in 2001, he served on the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, and Arafat appointed him a minister in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY as well as a member of the FINAL STATUS negotiating team. He spoke Hebrew fluently, often presenting the Palestinian viewpoint to Israeli audiences. Al-Husayni died of a heart attack while acting as the first PLO leader to visit KUWAIT after the GULF WAR.

Bibliography

- Brynen, Rex. "The Dynamics of Palestinian Elite Formation." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:3 (1995).
- Butt, Gerald. "Faisal Hussein: More Diplomat Than Politician." BBC News. 31 May 2001.
- Joffe, Lawrence. "Faisal Hussein: Palestinian Politician Renowned for His Commitment to Human Rights Who Played a Key Role in the Quest for Peace with Israel." The Guardian. 1 June 2001.
- Sontag, Deborah. "A Palestinian Champion of Peace Is Dead." The New York Times. 1 June 2001.

Al-Husayni, Jamal (1892–1982)

Jamal al-Husayni, a member of the prominent al-Husayni family of Jerusalem, played an important role in the Palestinian national struggle during the BRITISH MANDATE. He was secretary of the ARAB EXECUTIVE and secretary of the SUPREME MUSLIM COUNCIL, and in 1936 became a member of the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE (AHC). Al-Husayni was a member of the Palestinian delegation to the 1930 LONDON CONFERENCE, which was held to find a peaceful solution to the Palestine situation, and in 1939 he was president of the delegation to the second London Conference.

Additionally he served on the AHC delegations to the ARAB LEAGUE and the UNITED NATIONS. After the British crackdown on Palestinian leaders in 1937, al-Husayni fled to LEBANON and from there to IRAQ and then IRAN, where the British arrested him and held him in Southern Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe). During his time in exile, he attempted to revive the AHC but was unsuccessful, because by that time the British had outlawed all Palestinian political activity, and other former members had little interest in reviving it. In 1948, al-Husayni served for a period in the short-lived ALL PALESTINE GOVERNMENT. Eventually he settled in SAUDI ARABIA and was an advisor to King Sa'ud from 1953 to 1964.

Bibliography

- Porath, Yehoshua. The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1997.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.

Al-Husayni, (Pasha) Musa Kazim (1850/1853–1934)

Musa Kazim al-Husayni was a prominent Palestinian politician. The son of a former mayor of JERUSALEM, Salim al-Husayni, he was appointed mayor by the British in 1918. However, BRITISH MANDATE officials removed him two years later, in 1920 during the AL-NABI MUSA DEMONSTRATIONS, because he gave a speech in support of SYRIAN independence under Faysal bin Husayn.

Musa Kazim was a prominent figure in the MUSLIM-CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS opposed to ZIONISM, which began to emerge in 1918. He was elected head of the ARAB EXECUTIVE in 1920 and throughout the 1920s was the most important Palestinian nationalist leader, heading the opposition to the British-proposed LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL. Between 1921 and 1930 Musa Kazim led four delegations to London to argue the Palestinian cause before British officials. The delegations pressed for termination of the BALFOUR DECLARATION (which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine), suspension of Zionist IMMIGRATION, a halt to Jewish LAND purchases, and an independent, representative (without Zionists) Palestinian state, which would become part of a federation of Arab states. In October 1933, by which time his influence had significantly declined, Musa Kazim was severely beaten by British police during a demonstration in JAFFA protesting Zionist immigration. Twelve Palestinians and one policeman were killed. Al-Husayni died five months later of the injuries he sustained.

Bibliography

- Al Hut, Bayan Nuweheid. The Political Leaders and Political Organization in Palestine 1917–48. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1981.
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.

Al-Husayni Family

Historically, the al-Husaynis, the AL-KHALIDI FAMILY, and the AL-NASHASHIBI FAMILY were the three most prominent families in JERUSALEM. Until 1856 the al-Husaynis largely dominated the three traditional power bases in the OTTOMAN EMPIRE: Mashyachat al Haram (the guardian of the Muslim holy site AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF), Niqabat al-Ashraf (head of the prophet's family), and the mufti, the Muslim legal scholar (as head of the committee for religious research and rulings). As a result of the Ottoman reform movement (Tanzimat) and the Ottoman sultan's effort to build a modern centralized state, the family had to conquer a new area, that of the Baladiya, the Jerusalem town council and the mayoralty, which were established in 1863. For most of the time until the outbreak of World War I, the Husaynis dominated this position as well as their other power bases. The mayoralty fortified the family's central role in local politics in Jerusalem from the 1860s through the BRITISH MANDATE period. Although the British in theory had the power to take that role from the Husaynis, they decided to leave the balance of power among the families intact.

The Husaynis' control over Jerusalem continued during the first decade of the twentieth century.

The last mayor of Jerusalem before World War I was Husayn Salim al-Husayni, who inherited the mayoralty from his father in 1910. His stepbrothers, 'Abd al-Salih and Sa'id, held the posts in the years 1900 to 1906. Sa'id was also elected as a representative to the Ottoman parliament.

Additionally, in 1856 Mustafa al-Husayni, the grandfather of al-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, headed the Ifta (an educational institute founded to represent Islam) and remained its leader until 1893, when he was replaced by his son, Shaykh Taher. Kamil, Mustafa's son from his first wife, Mahbuba, replaced his father, Shaykh Taher, in 1908; Amin, Shaykh Taher's son from his second wife, Zainab, became the first grand mufti after the British occupation.

Bibliography

- Mattar, Philip. The Mufti of Jerusalem: Al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni and the Palestinian National Movement, rev. ed. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Pappe, Ilan. "The Husayni Family Faces New Challenges: Tanzimat, Young Turks, the Europeans and Zionism, 1840–1922, Part II." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 11–12 (2001).

Husayn-McMahon Correspondence

The Husayn-McMahon Correspondence was an exchange of ten letters in 1915–1916 between Sir Henry McMahon, British high commissioner in EGYPT, and Husayn ibn Ali, emir of the Hijaz (ruler of Western Arabia) and sharif of Mecca (keeper of the holy sites in Mecca and Medina). These letters concerned the future political status of the Arab lands of the Middle East and Great Britain's effort to mobilize the Arabs in armed revolt against the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, with which Britain was at war.

After the Ottomans were formally allied with GERMANY during World War I, Lord Herbert Kitchener, then British secretary for war, asked McMahon to seek an alliance with Sharif Husayn, who had established contact with groups of active Arab nationalists in SYRIA. Although British officials did not expect the Arabs to provide significant military assistance, they hoped that an alliance with an Arab Muslim leader belonging to a prominent family with long-standing Islamic credentials would deflect the Turkish call for holy war against its non-Muslim enemies.

The first letter, of 14 July 1915, in the exchange was sent by Husayn's son Abdullah and laid out Husayn's opening conditions for joining Britain in the war against the Turks. The first condition was for Britain to "acknowledge the independence of the Arab countries," defined as all of the Arabian Peninsula except the British-controlled territory at Aden, along with the territory to the north of it bounded on the east by the border with Persia and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea, and extending north into what is now southern Turkey.

McMahon's second letter, dated 24 October 1915, is crucial. It states: "The districts of Mersin and Alexandretta, and portions of Syria lying to the west of the districts of Damascus, Homs, Hama, and Aleppo, cannot be said to be purely Arab, and must on that account be exempted from the proposed delimitation. Subject to that modification, and without prejudice to the treaties concluded between us and certain Arab Chiefs, we accept that delimitation. As for the regions lying within the proposed frontiers, in which Great Britain is free to act without detriment to interests of her ally FRANCE, I am authorized to give you the following pledges on behalf of the Government of Great Britain, and to reply as follows to your note: 'That subject to the modifications stated above, Great Britain is prepared to recognize and uphold the independence of the Arabs in all the regions lying within the frontiers proposed by the Sharif of Mecca.'"

Disputes erupted soon after the war. Was Palestine included in the promise of Arab independence, as argued by Arab nationalists with the support of some British officials, or was it excluded, as afterwards claimed by the British government and propounded by Zionist leaders? Countless analysts have debated and interpreted and reinterpreted the Husayn-McMahon Correspondence over the issue of whether the British sponsorship of the Zionist program of colonization in Palestine (the 1917 BALFOUR DECLARATION) was compatible with agreements embodied in this exchange of letters. The disputes over the interpretation of the correspondence were, on the pro-Zionist side, related to the fact that the letter did not explicitly mention the Sanjak of JERUSALEM, which was the Ottoman administrative division that covered most of Palestine. On the other hand, the letter is clear about which areas are to be part of the Arab state and which are not.

McMahon's promises, which were made on instructions from the government in London, are seen by Arab nationalists as a pledge of immediate Arab unity and independence, which they believe was violated by the region's subsequent partition by the League of Nations into British and French MANDATES under the secret SYKES-PICOT AGREEMENT of May 1916. Husayn did not comprehend how the Ottoman Sanjak of Jerusalem (central and southern Palestine) could possibly have been part of McMahon's exclusion. Because of the status of Jerusalem in Islamic tradition, Husayn would have vigorously insisted that it be part of the promise of Arab independence if he had thought McMahon was suggesting its exclusion.

Husayn and his side lacked practical leverage with Britain, so in the postwar settlement the Sykes-Picot Agreement and the Balfour Declaration, not the Husayn-McMahon Correspondence, were given priority. France took Syria, and Britain assumed direct rule in Palestine (as well as IRAQ and what became TRANSJORDAN). Not only in the Husayn-McMahon exchanges, but in all the contacts between British officials and Arab leaders, British officials had avoided fully exposing the true ambitions of London in the Middle East.

Aside from the question of alleged British duplicity, the prolonged argument over the inclusion or exclusion of Palestine in the promise of Arab independence has been regarded by some as relevant to the legitimacy of British sponsorship of the Jewish colonization of the country. The debate is part of a decades-long dispute over whether or not justification exists for the progressive alienation of Palestine Arabs from the LAND in whose history and geography they are deeply embedded.

See also HASHEMITE GENEALOGY FROM THE HEJAZ

Bibliography

- Antonius, George. The Arab Awakening: The Story of the Arab National Movement. London and Beirut, 1938.
- Bunton, Martin. "Review of Isaiah Friedman, Palestine: A Twice-Promised Land?" The Middle East Journal. 55:1 (2001).
- Dawn, C. Ernest. "The Amir of Mecca al-Husayn ibn-'Ali and the Origin of the Arab Revolt." Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society. 104 (1960).
- . "Review of Elie Kedourie, In the Anglo-Arab Labyrinth." International Journal of Middle East Studies. 9:1 (1978).
- Friedman, Isaiah. Palestine: A Twice-Promised Land? Vol. 1, The British, the Arabs and Zionism 1915–1920. New Brunswick and London: Transaction Publishers, 2000.

- . The Question of Palestine, 1914–1918: British-Jewish-Arab Relations. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1973.
- Howard, Harry N. The Partition of Turkey: A Diplomatic History, 1913–1923. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1931.
- Hurewitz, J. C. Diplomacy in the Near and Middle East: A Documentary Record, 1535–1956. Princeton, NJ: Van Nostrand, 1956.
- Kedourie, Elie. In the Anglo-Arab Labyrinth: The McMahon-Husayn Correspondence and Its Interpretations, 1914–1939. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- Klieman, Aaron S. Foundations of British Policy in the Arab World: The Cairo Conference of 1921. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1970.
- Smith, Charles D. “The Invention of a Tradition: The Question of Arab Acceptance of the Zionist Right to Palestine during World War I.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 22:2 (1993).
- Tibawi, A. L. Arabic and Islamic Themes. London: Luzak, 1974.
- . A Modern History of Syria, Including Lebanon and Palestine. New York: St. Martin’s, 1969.
- Toynbee, Arnold, and Isaiah Friedman. “The McMahon-Hussein Correspondence: Comments and a Reply.” Journal of Contemporary History. 5:4 (1970).
- Zeine, Zeine N. The Struggle for Arab Independence: Western Diplomacy and the Rise and Fall of Faisal’s Kingdom in Syria, 2nd ed. Delmar, NY: Caravan Books, 1977.

—Ray L. Cleveland

Husayn-Peres Agreement, 1987

The Husayn-Peres Agreement, also known as the London Agreement, was an accord reached between Israeli foreign minister SHIMON PERES and JORDAN’S King Husayn in London in 1987. It encompassed both the process for and substance of a peace agreement among Israel, Jordan, and the Palestinians—and potentially between Israel and the remaining Arab states. It failed because Israel’s Prime Minister YITZHAK SHAMIR vetoed it and US Secretary of State GEORGE SCHULTZ did not advocate it with the US government.

In 1987 a national unity government ruled Israel, with LIKUD PARTY Shamir as prime minister and LABOR PARTY Peres as foreign minister, producing a government rent with contradictions. At the international level none of the official diplomatic initiatives (e.g., the REAGAN PLAN, the FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE) had produced any movement toward a Palestinian-Israeli settlement, the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) had yet to clarify its position sufficiently on a number of issues (as required by the UNITED STATES) in order to be part of a peace process, and the king’s efforts to draw the PLO into an alliance with Jordan had failed. Thus Peres and Husayn took it upon themselves to hold a secret summit and attempt to break the deadlock.

On 11 April they met in London and agreed on an agenda for proceeding, based on the following positions:

- An international conference should launch the process but should be a purely symbolic meeting without any power to impose solutions.
- After the initial conference, every subsequent session would require the prior consent of all the parties.
- All substantive negotiations would be conducted on a bilateral basis between Israel and individual Arab states.
- A joint Jordanian-Palestinian negotiating team would be composed of non-PLO Palestinians and the PLO would be excluded from the conference.
- All issues concerning the Palestinians would be dealt with by Israel and the Jordanian-Palestinian team.
- Participation in the conference would be dependent on a party’s acceptance of UN RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338 and their renunciation of violence and TERRORISM.
- The proposal was subject to the agreement of the United States, which would take the initiative in convening the conference.

Both Peres and the king believed that they had produced a practical, workable, and much-needed initiative, which moreover included all of Israel’s demands made at the 1973 GENEVA CONFERENCE. Although Shamir had given Peres the go-ahead for the summit with King Husayn, he vetoed the agreement, backed by his Likud ministers. He even discouraged Schultz from coming to Israel to discuss it, although Schultz was not overly enthusiastic and did not push the initiative. Shamir was committed to holding on to the entire WEST BANK, which he considered an integral part of Greater Israel. King Husayn just as adamantly wanted the West Bank returned to his jurisdiction. He had no concern for the political and national rights of the Palestinians and thus was willing to exclude the PLO from negotiations.

Bibliography

- Abu-Odeh, Adnan. Jordanians, Palestinians, and the Hashemite Kingdom in the Middle East Peace Process. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace, 1999.
- Caplan, Neil. Futile Diplomacy: A Multi-Volume Documentary History of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, Vols. 3-4. London: Frank Cass, 1997.
- Eisenberg, Laura Zittrain, and Neil Caplan. Negotiating Arab-Israeli Peace: Patterns, Problems, Possibilities. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Madfai, Madiha. Jordan, the United States and the Middle East Peace Process, 1974–1991. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Al-Hut, Shafiq (1932–)

Shafiq al-Hut was the head of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION'S (PLO) Beirut office from 1966 to 1993 and sat on the PLO'S EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE (PLO-EC), where he was one of only two genuinely independent representatives. He was a member of the first PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL in 1964.

Born in JAFFA, al-Hut was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and became a REFUGEE in Beirut, where he obtained a B.A. in biology from the American University in Beirut, then worked as a teacher in KUWAIT, and returned to Beirut in 1958, where he emerged as a pro-NASIR journalist for Beirut newspapers. He was also the director of Al-Hawadeth weekly magazine from 1958 to 1964 and served as deputy secretary-general of the Arab Journalists Union from 1963 to 1967.

In 1963, before the PLO came into existence, al-Hut was a founding member and leading figure in a group of prominent intellectuals who created the Palestinian Liberation Front–Path of Return (PLA-PA), which circulated the bulletin Tariq Al-Awda (Path of Return), and in 1966 the PLA-PA allied itself with the Palestinian National Liberation Front. These small organizations, however, did not play significant roles in the Palestinian struggle. In 1965 al-Hut formed an alliance with AHMAD SHUQAYRI (the first chairman of the PLO), who appointed him PLO representative in Beirut that year, a position he held until 1993. He was appointed to the PLO Executive Committee in July 1966 and was active in encouraging the formation of Palestinian associations in LEBANON, which furthered the recruitment of activists.

In September 1968 al-Hut declined several high positions in the PLO, but remained affiliated with it, serving as PLO representative to the UN General Assembly on various occasions and remaining as the PLO ambassador to Lebanon, where he played a key role in managing the Palestinian position in the 1975–1976 Lebanese civil war. He narrowly avoided assassination on various occasions, especially by SA'IQA in January 1976. Although al-Hut was never a fighter or a military man, some speculate that Israel was behind several of the assassination attempts because of the clarity of his arguments for Palestinian interests.

Al-Hut was strongly opposed to the OSLO ACCORDS, believing they completely negated the basic principles of Palestinian nationalism—self-determination and sovereignty in an independent state in all of the territories Israel conquered in 1967. In response, he suspended his participation in the PLO-EC and removed himself from all positions in the PLO. He remains critical of the leadership's stance toward Palestinian refugees, especially those in Lebanon, and remains active in assisting dissident Palestinian factions based in Damascus.

Bibliography

- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State. The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

---

Bibliography

- Armstrong, Karen. The Battle for God. New York: Ballantine Books, 2001.
- . A History of God: The 4,000-Year Quest of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. New York: Gramercy, 2004.
- . In the Beginning: A New Interpretation of Genesis. New York: Ballantine Books, 1997.
- Farsoun, Samih, and Naseer Aruri. Palestine and the Palestinians: A Social and Political History, 2nd ed. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2006.

---

Ichud Leumi

See NATIONAL UNION PARTY

Al-Ibrahimi Mosque

The al-Ibrahimi Mosque (Tomb or Sanctuary of Abraham) is located in HEBRON, in the WEST BANK, over a site venerated by both Muslims and Jews (who call it the CAVE OF MACHPELAH) and, as such, is a place of continuous conflict between Palestinians and Israeli settlers. The prophet Ibrahim (Abraham) is believed to have come to Hebron around 2000–1900 BCE and to be buried in a cave under the present mosque with his wife, their sons, and their wives. In the first century BCE, King Herod built a Roman temple over Ibrahim's cave, which was converted into a Christian church during the Byzantine period. Believing that Abraham was the first Muslim and that the Prophet Muhammad had visited al-Haram al-Ibrahimi on his night flight from Mecca to JERUSALEM, Muslims converted the building into a mosque in 638 CE and named it al-Haram al-Ibrahimi. Thus Hebron became the fourth most sacred city of Islam after Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem.

The al-Ibrahimi Mosque was under Muslim control from the seventh century until 1967, when Israel conquered the West Bank and partitioned the mosque into a Jewish synagogue and a mosque. Thereafter Jewish services were held on the lower level, and Muslims prayed in an upper structure. As a consequence of the OSLO ACCORDS and increasing SETTLER VIOLENCE, the mosque has become virtually inaccessible to Muslims. A source of continuous Israeli-Palestinian tension since 1967, the 1994 massacre of twenty-nine Muslims at prayer in the mosque marked its nadir.

See also CAVE OF MACHPELAH; HEBRON AND JEWISH SETTLEMENTS; HEBRON MASSACRE, 1994

Identity

See PALESTINIAN IDENTITY

Identity Cards

The Israeli Identity Card (Teudat Zehut) is a compulsory document for every individual over sixteen years of age, Jew or Arab, living in Israel or the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Children are generally registered on at least one of their parents' ID cards. It was prescribed in the Identity Card Carrying and Displaying Act of 1982. The card must be with the individual at all times and presented upon demand to a head of municipal or regional authority, a police officer, a member of the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES, or a member of the Border Patrol. Attached to the ID cards, people must carry any PERMITS they are issued, such as work permits or permits to enter JERUSALEM, for example.

The Identity Card includes the following personal details:

- Unique number, called Identity Number
- Full name
- Name of father
- Name of mother
- Date of birth (both civil and—for Jews—the Hebrew date)
- Place of birth
- Ethnicity (only in cards issued before 2005, but the Hebrew date of birth still differentiates Jews from non-Jews)
- Gender
- Place and date of issue (both Gregorian and Hebrew dates)
- Portrait photo (in color)

The document has an appendix where the following is listed:

- Current address
- Previous addresses
- Previous name(s)
- Citizenship (the bearer may be a permanent resident with a foreign citizenship)
- Name and Identity Number of spouse and children
- Electoral polling station stamp (the appendix used to be stamped at the polling station to help prevent ballot stuffing) (This regulation was abolished in 1992, so that the Israeli voter may now use an ID card without an appendix.)

There have been several fierce legal battles about identifying the ethnicity of the bearer of the Identity Card. As of 2005, the ethnicity has not been printed; a line of eight asterisks appears instead. Nevertheless, whether a citizen is Jewish or non-Jewish can in most cases be determined by checking whether the Hebrew date of birth appears in addition to the civil date. The Israeli state's population registry, which serves as the basis for the data on the Identity Cards, still indicates the ethnicity of each person, and this information is available upon request in certain circumstances determined by the registration law. It is always available when the requester names "security" as the reason for knowing.

The color of the plastic casing of the Identity Card of Israeli citizens and permanent residents is blue, with the Israeli coat of arms embossed on the outer cover. Non-Israeli residents of the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP (until 2005) were originally issued orange ID cards that were similar to the Israeli card (the differences being that the surname category came after the first name, father's name, and grandfather's name categories instead of at the top, and the ethnicity category was replaced with a religion category). The Identity Card has functioned as an important means of Israeli monitoring and control of the Palestinian population and is the prerequisite for acquiring any type of permit or document that a resident may need.

With regard to Palestinians, Israel began to change the Identity Card system following the outbreak of the First INTIFADA (December 1987). After a number of stabbings in which Israeli civilians were killed by Palestinians in Israel, the Israel authorities took measures to restrict and supervise the entry of Palestinians into Israel and instituted nontransparent procedures based on unclear considerations. One change, instituted in 1988, involved changing West Bank ID cards to green while keeping them orange in Gaza. New Identity Cards were issued to Palestinian residents with a "security history" and whom Israel prohibited from leaving the Occupied Territories or from entering Israel. Furthermore, in 1989, the CIVIL ADMINISTRATION'S employment offices ceased issuing work permits for Palestinians automatically, as it had done previously, and issued permits only to those who met undefined security criteria.

In June 1989, Israel began to require that every Palestinian worker entering Israel from the Gaza Strip (and later, in 2004, also workers from the West Bank) have a "magnetic identity card," in addition to the basic Identity Card, to obtain a work permit. These magnetic cards contained coded information that could be swiped when passing through the turnstiles at the Eretz checkpoint between Gaza and Israel (or later at CHECKPOINTS between Israel and the West Bank). The authorities did not issue magnetic cards to released PRISONERS, those formerly in ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, or even Palestinians who had been detained and released without charges being filed against them.

By 2005 the magnetic card was able to carry biometric identification, that is, it bears a picture of a person's face and hand from both sides, an image of the eye, and a fingerprint. In March 2005 some 2,000 residents of the West Bank had a magnetic card. By 2007, their number had reached 120,000. They are intended for use in conjunction with the separation BARRIER, where they are necessary at seven special access points along the Barrier and in the Ramallah area, and any Palestinian wishing to enter Israel must have one.

To obtain the card, Palestinians must go to the District Coordination Office, fill out forms, and pay a fee. Frequently, applicants are required to meet with a SHIN BET (GSS) agent to remove the "security prevention" notation on their file. The GSS agents use these meetings to pressure Palestinians to become COLLABORATORS. The decision on whether to grant a magnetic card is not transparent and is based on security considerations that the authorities fail to delineate. Applicants who are found to have a "security prevention" are rejected, as are every one of the some 650,000 Palestinians who since 1967 have been detained by Israel, were once imprisoned or detained, including every Palestinian who was administratively detained, even if ultimately released from detention without being charged. This number constitutes approximately 20 percent of the total Palestinian population in the Occupied Territories. Considering the fact that the majority of those detained are male, the number of Palestinians detained forms approximately 40 percent of the total male Palestinian population in the Occupied Territories. Since these individuals cannot obtain a magnetic identification card, they cannot work or travel. A Palestinian without a magnetic identity card has almost no chance of obtaining a permit to enter Israel, but even those who have such a card must overcome additional hurdles before they can hope to receive a permit allowing such travel.

As of July 2006, there were 9,493 Palestinians held in Israeli prisons. At least 765 of these prisoners are administrative detainees and have not been charged or tried. There are 311 prisoners aged eighteen or younger, and 126 of the prisoners are female. When these persons are released, they too will be unable to acquire a magnetic card.

Identity Cards and the PNA

After the establishment of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), residents were issued Palestinian ID cards, but each must be approved by Israel. They are identical to the Israeli Civil Administration cards save for the order of languages being switched, with Arabic coming before Hebrew, and the plastic casing being dark green with the PNA insignia embossed on the outer cover. The INTERIM AGREEMENT (September 1995) gave Israel control of the Palestinian population registry, and the Israeli government assigns the ID numbers for Palestinian ID cards, meaning it determines the number of Palestinians who can settle in the PNA territories. Changing addresses inside the territories was declared a PNA “right.” But Israel, by virtue of its recording all the details in the ID cards, often prevented changes of address from Gaza to the West Bank, including cases of people who had long since moved to the West Bank as children, went to school there, and made families. Such Gazans have been living for years as “illegals” in the West Bank, under constant threat of expulsion to Gaza. Moreover, even after ISRAEL’S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in 2005, the Israeli government continues to control the Strip’s population registry.

According to the Palestinian Ministry of Social Affairs, there are over 50,000 Palestinians who have been waiting for up to eleven years for their ID cards to be approved by Israel. As a result, they cannot travel and are considered “illegal” in their own places of residence. Israel claims the PNA exceeded the quota allotted to it for FAMILY REUNIFICATION and ID issuance, and that the Palestinians themselves overstayed the visitor’s permits that they were issued. Palestinians, however, consider obtaining residency their natural right, especially as many of those now without status were born in Gaza or the West Bank.

Jerusalem

In June 1967, Israel annexed some 70,000 dunums (17,500 acres, or 70 square kilometers) of land it occupied in the area in and around East Jerusalem, including twenty-eight Palestinian villages, and incorporated it into Israeli Jerusalem. Whereas the rest of the Palestinians in the West Bank were given West Bank Identity Cards, most residents of the annexed areas of Jerusalem were given Israeli Identity Cards and listed as “residents” of Jerusalem after they refused to accept Israeli citizenship following the OCCUPATION of East Jerusalem. This would have required them to take an oath of allegiance to the Israeli state and would have meant the de facto acceptance of the Occupation. However, a few thousand Palestinians who lived in the annexed areas were not recognized as residents of Jerusalem (in most cases because they were not at home when the census was taken, or because the census takers mistakenly thought they lived outside the annexed territory).

During the many years (1967–1988) in which free movement was allowed between the Occupied Territories and Israel, the lack of an Israeli Identity Card had almost no effect on these persons. However, since the CLOSURE policy (1990) has been in effect, they require an Identity Card and a permit (which they have little chance of obtaining) to stay in Jerusalem, including in their own house in the annexed territory. Lacking a permit, they are classified as “persons staying illegally.” While these persons have not moved—in many instances, they and their families have been living in the same place for generations—the border has been moved, and now the Israeli authorities consider them trespassers. As a result, the Border Police from time to time—usually in the dead of night—go into Palestinian neighborhoods, drag people from their beds, detain them for hours, interrogate them, arrest them, and let them return home only after they sign a document confirming that they live unlawfully in their homes and know that they are not allowed to sleep there without a permit to stay overnight in Jerusalem.

The confiscation of ID cards of Palestinian Jerusalemites has become as normal as LAND CONFISCATION, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and SETTLEMENT construction. In order to qualify as a “permanent resident,” a measure necessary only for Palestinian Jerusalemites and not for Israeli citizens, Palestinians

- Must obtain an Israeli reentry visa when they travel abroad, or they lose their right of return
- Lose their residency right in Jerusalem if they hold or apply for residency/citizenship elsewhere
- Must prove that their “center of life” is within the municipal boundaries of Jerusalem
- Who live abroad for more than seven years automatically lose their residency rights
- Can only register their children as Jerusalem residents if the father holds a valid Jerusalem ID card
- Must apply for family reunification if they marry someone from the West Bank, Gaza Strip, or abroad in order to live legally with their spouses in Jerusalem. Most such applications are turned down.

Because of these policies, the ID cards of 6,500 Palestinian Jerusalemites have been revoked since 1967, a figure that does not include the dependents of those who had their ID cards revoked.

Unregistered Persons

As for the Palestinian Jerusalemites who live in the annexed areas of Jerusalem but are not recognized as residents, Israel refuses to issue ID cards to all unregistered Palestinians. These are persons whose parents did not register them at birth in the Palestinian population registry, usually due to ignorance or neglect of bureaucratic affairs, and consequently have no legal status. The major result of their lack of status is their inability to obtain an ID card, which is essential to accomplishing the most mundane acts in many walks of life.

Since the Occupation began in 1967, Israel has exercised almost total control over the Palestinian population registry and has sole power to determine who is a Palestinian resident. In this capacity, Israel could enable children whose parents did not register them—a tendency that is more prominent with regard to daughters—to obtain ID cards by applying the simple and relatively rapid solution known as “late registration.” However, Israel refuses to authorize this procedure, and insists instead on channeling these cases to the long and exhausting family unification procedure, which was created to enable a nonresident of the West Bank or Gaza Strip (generally spouses of residents of the Occupied Territories) to live there. Not only does the demand to apply for family unification seem unreasonable with regard to people who have never lived apart from their families and have always resided in the West Bank, but the procedure cannot even be implemented because Israel has frozen handling of all family unification requests since 2000. Furthermore, even if the freeze is removed, and the quota applied prior to the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA (2000) remains in effect, it would take dozens of years to arrange their status. B’TSELEM has taken the testimonies of Palestinians without legal status who began the family unification process when they were minors, who are now married with families, and have yet to receive a status.

Possession of an ID card is especially important in the Occupied Territories, where Israel runs a complex and cumbersome bureaucratic system. Due to the severe restrictions on movement that Israel imposes on Palestinians, many residents are required to show proof of identity on a daily basis, at the many checkpoints that are spread throughout the West Bank or at the ERETZ CROSSING on Gaza’s border. Persons who cannot provide official proof of their identity are subjected to harassment, delays, and even denial of the right to pass through checkpoints. Those unregistered persons who insist on trying to live normally despite their lack of status are forced to deal with daily humiliation and harassment.

Another significant aspect of life without an ID card is the difficulty of unregistered persons in obtaining education. Children who do not have ID numbers come up against a variety of obstacles during their formal schooling. Those who manage to overcome bureaucracy and graduate high school—usually due to pressure by the family on key figures in the education system—are then often forced to give up any hope of higher education. Bureaucratic obstacles to registration combine with difficulty to get to the few universities and colleges that are dispersed throughout the West Bank. Safa Fuqahaa, from the town of Tubas in the northern West Bank, told B'Tselem at the beginning of her fourth semester of nursing school, "the second [al-Aqsa] Intifada began and the Israeli army set up a lot of checkpoints on the way to NABLUS. I had to stop studying because I can't pass through checkpoints without an ID card. . . . I was one of the top students."

Unregistered persons suffer also from a particularly painful repercussion of their lack of status: many find it difficult to marry, as potential partners are deterred by the daily burden and constant restrictions that accompany life without status. Lena Fuqahaa from 'Ein al-Beida in JENIN District told B'Tselem she has almost given up hope of marrying and starting her own family: "A few men have proposed to me, but each time they changed their mind once my parents told them that I don't have an ID card."

The Barrier and New Special Identity Cards

The Barrier diverges from the "Green Line" by anywhere from 200 meters (600 feet) to as much as 20 kilometers (12 miles), with the result that many Israeli settlements in the West Bank remain on the Israeli side of the Barrier, and some Palestinian towns are nearly encircled by it. Considerable Palestinian agricultural land is on the Israeli side and is cut off from the towns. Palestinian concern about access to their property and lands has been intense—all the more so because Israel has declared the swath of land between the Green Line and the Barrier a "CLOSED MILITARY ZONE."

The IDF has decreed that the villagers need to have a special Identity Card, additional to the long-standing Identity Card they already have, because they live in an area that was declared a closed military area. Jews can go there or live there, but Palestinians cannot. Only those who live there are allowed to stay, provided they get this authorization from the Israeli authorities. A few have already been told that they are not allowed to stay there, because some of them were politically active years ago and were in Israeli jails, or for other, often not stated, reasons.

In order to obtain the new identification cards, residents must still prove "permanent residence" to the satisfaction of the authorities. The IDF claims that anyone who can demonstrate permanent residence will be automatically issued a new identification card. As of 2007, no definition of "permanent" was included in the order, and no criteria for judging permanency of residence are available. Unless explicitly addressed, this could lead to arbitrary implementation of the permit/identification card process in areas under PNA administration pursuant to the OSLO ACCORDS.

Palestinian farmers seeking access to their lands must cope with a complex bureaucracy and meet a number of conditions. First and foremost, with their new IDs in hand, they must prove ownership of their land. They also have to pressure the Civil Administration time and again to set times to allow them to enter. Also, the defense establishment subjects Palestinian access to the goodwill and caprice of the settlers. Against this background, many farmers give up and stop trying to gain access and to work their land.

Bibliography

- Addameer. Political Detention: The Infinite Violation of Human Rights. Jerusalem, West Bank. 16 April 2007.
- Badil. ID-Card Confiscations in Jerusalem Continue in 1998. Jerusalem: BADIL Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. 5 May 1998.
- B'Tselem. Access Denied: Israeli Measures to Deny Palestinians Access to Land around Settlements. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2008.
- . Israel Refuses to Issue ID Cards to Unregistered Palestinians: Residency and Family Separation. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 29 May 2008.
- Diamond, Eitan. Crossing the Line: Violation of the Rights of Palestinians in Israel without a Permit. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2007.
- Glass, Nancy, and Reem Salahi. Defending Palestinian Prisoners: A Report on the Status of Defense Lawyers in Israeli Courts. Jerusalem, West Bank: Addameer, January 2007.
- Haberman, Clyde. "ID Cards a New Symbol of Gaza's Battle." New York Times. 13 June 1989.
- Hanieh, Adam. "Israel's Clampdown Masks System of Control." Middle East Report. 14 February 2003.
- Hass, Amira. "Disengaged from Reality." Ha'aretz. 2 June 2004.
- . "The Yearnings for a Magnetic Card." Ha'aretz. 17 July 2007.
- Human Right Watch. Israel's Closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. New York: Human Rights Watch, 1996.
- Krystall, Nathan. Urgent Issue of Palestinian Residency in Jerusalem, 2nd rev. ed. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, June 1994.
- Suissa, Shlomi. Not All It Seems: Preventing Palestinians' Access to Their Lands West of the Separation Barrier in the Tulkarm-Qalqiliya Area. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2004.

United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees. UNRWA Reports on the West Bank Barrier: Case Study: The Permit System. New York, 2004.

Ihud

Ihud (Unity) was founded in JERUSALEM in 1942 as a political movement to advance Palestinian-Jewish accord. Although it was part of the Zionist movement and thus committed to the right of the Jewish people to return to Palestine, the rest of its program diverged sharply from Zionist tradition, because Ihud also supported the right of independence for Palestinian Arabs. And, in opposition to the BILTMORE PROGRAM, the Zionist declaration in 1942 to establish a Jewish state in Palestine, Ihud proposed that these rights be exercised by the two communities jointly in a single BINATIONAL state of Arabs and Jews based on equality and full cooperation in social, economic, political, and cultural relations.

The leaders of Ihud believed that the Zionist movement had neglected the aspirations of the Palestinian community and saw this indifference not just as a political problem but as a deeply moral one as well. For Ihud the Jewish people's relationship to the Arabs while creating a new state in Palestine was the key political and moral concern, because Ihud saw the national rebirth of the Jewish people in Palestine primarily as a means to its cultural and spiritual rebirth. It contended that if Jews created their state by violence and subjugation of other peoples and if they failed in their political and moral obligations to their Arab neighbors, they were imperiling that spiritual rebirth and thus the very future of the Jewish people.

Ihud promoted the idea of a binational state in meetings with Jewish leaders and community activists in Palestine and in the UNITED STATES. It also made determined efforts to find and negotiate with Palestinian Arabs willing to talk about political compromises with the Jewish community. And it resolutely opposed the proposals of both the British government and later the UNITED NATIONS to divide Palestine into two separate states.

For Ihud the new Jewish immigrants had a particular responsibility to set an example for their Arab neighbors. Robert Weltsch, a good friend of Ihud leader MARTIN BUBER, wrote in 1925: "Palestine can only prosper if a relationship of mutual trust is established between the two peoples. Such a relationship can only be established if those who are the newcomers—and such we are—arrive with the honest and sincere determination to live together with the other people on the basis of mutual respect and full consideration of all their human and national rights."

Ihud was the culmination of years of dedicated effort by a number of Zionist leaders and intellectuals, many of whom had worked to create the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. The most prominent of these were JUDAH L. MAGNES, the first president of the Hebrew University, and Buber, the eminent philosopher and social historian. In 1939 some of them came together with other political activists to found the League for Arab-Jewish Rapprochement and Cooperation. The league was active for a number of years, organizing joint projects with progressive Arab leaders and seeking to build bridges between the two communities. In the end Ihud failed to prevent the partition of Palestine and the victory of political ZIONISM. Yet its example has kept alive a moral vision and the political ideal of a Palestine that transcends the limits of national enmity and conflict.

See also PEACE: "THE OTHER ZIONISM"

Bibliography

- Ben-Sasson, H. H. A History of the Jewish People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1976.
- Buber, Martin, Judah L. Magnes, and E. Simon. Towards Union in Palestine. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1972.
- Cohen, A. Israel and the Arab World. Boston: Beacon Press, 1970.
- Goren, A. A. Dissenter in Zion: From the Writings of Judah L. Magnes. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.
- Lockman, Zachary. Comrades and Enemies: Arab and Jewish Workers in Palestine, 1906–1948. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Margalit, E. "Social and Intellectual Origins of the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement, 1913–1920." In Essential Papers on Jews and the Left. Edited by Evert Mendelsohn. New York: NYU Press, 1969.
- Mendes-Flohr, Paul R. A Land of Two Peoples: Martin Buber on Jews and Arabs. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Merhav, P. The Israeli Left: History, Problems, Documents. New York: A. S. Barnes, 1980.
- Saba, Paul, and Dawn Belkin Martinez. "Jewish Efforts at Jewish-Arab Cooperation in Palestine before the Creation of the State of Israel." For Justice and Equality. 29 April 2002.

Immigration

Two issues—immigration and LAND—lie at the heart of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Since the 1897 Basel Congress, the Zionist movement has worked to bring Jews from around the world to Palestine, while from the beginning of the twentieth century, Palestinians have protested the waves of Jewish settlers that have transformed their lives and their land. Although the story of the Jewish population in Palestine is one of in-migration supplemented by modest natural increase, the story of the Arab population of Palestine is one of high natural increase offset by periodic expulsions.

In To the Promised Land: A History of Zionist Thought, David Goldberg notes that for Jewish immigration to Palestine, “the objective was not merely a national home for the Jews, as proffered by the BALFOUR DECLARATION, but through massive immigration to transform the DEMOGRAPHY of Palestine, so that the Jewish minority acquired equal status in the eyes of BRITISH MANDATE authorities and international opinion, and a plausible basis for demanding self-government. . . . This was the tacitly understood goal of Zionist policy during the mandate period. . . . The practical demands of creating an autonomous Jewish society in Palestine ready for eventual statehood took precedence over theoretical ruminations about coexistence with the Arab majority.”

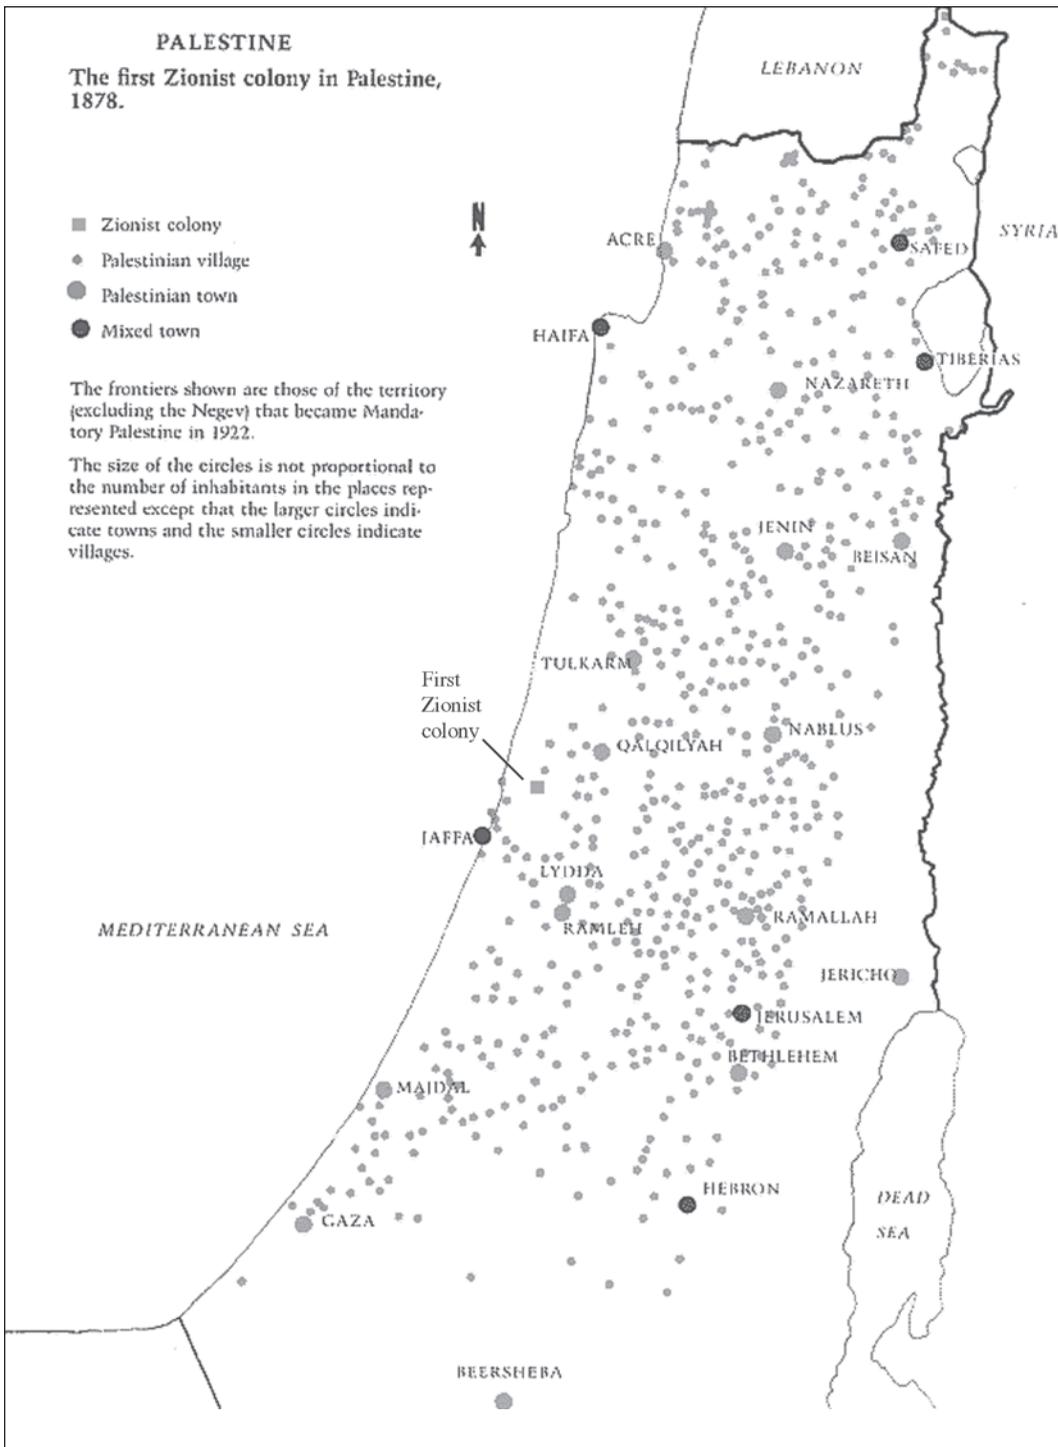

Throughout the Mandate, Palestinian protests, demonstrations, and violent revolts were said to be “anti-Jewish” when in fact they were “anti-Jewish immigration” and “anti-Jewish land purchases.” The difference is real and material. For twenty years the Palestinian elite used political means to attempt to stem the tidal wave of immigrants without result, and consequently, what began as sporadic, localized outbursts in 1920, 1921, and 1929 became a sustained nationwide revolt in 1936.

Zionist arguments stress the continuity of a Jewish presence in the Holy Land; however, even the most militant proponents of this position acknowledge that, historically, the number of Jews living there was very small. Most Israeli sources accept the figure of the Turkish census of 1882, which indicated that only 24,000 Jews were in Palestine. Only later do Jewish sources begin to diverge. ARTHUR RUPPIN, official agent of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION in Palestine, for example, accepted the Turkish estimate of 60,000 Jews in Palestine in 1914 and acknowledged that these numbers dropped significantly during and after World War I. However, present-day Israeli demographers have revised this 1914 figure upward to 85,000.

According to Janet Abu-Lughod, whose research in the area of immigration is highly respected, after becoming the Mandatory power in Palestine, Britain took the first modern census in the country in 1922, which revealed that the Jewish population at that time numbered 83,790, or 11 percent of the total population of Palestine. Between the census of 1922 and that of 1931 (the latter was the last official census in the country), the Jewish population increased from 83,790 to 174,610, while the Arab population grew from 673,000 to 862,000. Thus in the nine-year period, the total population had increased by some 280,000 persons. Of this total, approximately 4,000 represented persons who had not been counted during the 1922 census, as well as another 10,000 added because of a 1923 boundary adjustment that included an Arab population resident in a district that had been Syrian. Thus there was a real increase of only 266,000 in the total population of Palestine in the nine-year period 1922–1931. The increase in the Jewish population during this period was approximately 91,000, which was attributable to 57,000 Jewish immigrants who entered the country on official visas, an estimated 9,000 persons (almost all Jewish) who were illegally present in the country and not counted when the first census was taken, and an additional 25,000 from natural growth.

Even if so high a Jewish rate of natural increase had been sustained during the next fifteen or so years, without immigration the Jewish population would not have reached 260,000. Although no census was taken again, making all numbers after 1931 relatively suspect, the British Office of Statistics of Palestine continued until 1947 to publish its “best estimates” of the population in Palestine. At that time the Statistical Office estimated the Jewish population at 589,341 (a footnote indicated that this figure had been revised upward, evidently due to “corrections” suggested by JEWISH AGENCY demographers). Thus, it is estimated that between the end of 1931 and early 1947, about 320,000 Jews arrived in Palestine—either as legal immigrants, illegal immigrants, or the offspring of such immigrants. Such immigration was sufficient to raise the Jewish proportion of the population to some 30.8 percent, while the Arab population increased to about 1,320,000, almost exclusively through natural increase.

Map 23. The First Zionist Colony in Palestine, 1878

Map 24. Zionist Colonies in Palestine at the Beginning of the British Mandate, 1920

Even before the establishment of the state of Israel on 15 May 1948, it was clear that the demographic struggle for Palestine had become serious. Between 1932 and 1948 the Jewish population increased by approximately 470,000; of this growth, some 135,000 (29 percent) was due to natural increase while approximately 335,000 was due to an excess of immigrants over emigrants.

The Turkish census of 1914 indicated a resident Arab population in Palestine of about 630,000, a number that had increased only modestly to about 673,000 when the British took their census in 1922. This increase (only 7 percent over the eight-year interval, or less than 1 percent per year) is lower than the estimated natural increase rate for the time. It indicates that there may have been a net emigration, albeit temporary, but clearly no immigration. Nor was immigration a significant contributor to Arab growth during the nine-year period that elapsed before the British took their second census in 1931. The number of "non-Jews" in the country had by then increased to 861,815, of which some 10,000 had been added through a boundary change and perhaps 5,000 consisted of Europeans (British administrators and others). The real increase, then, was approximately 170,000, or about 25 percent over the nine-year period, yielding a compounded annual rate of some 2.5 percent. Most of this could be attributed to the rate of natural increase.

After 1931 the figures become more conjectural, but it is possible to reach some reasonable estimates by projecting forward from the last official figures in British sources. According to the last published General Monthly Bulletin on 31 March 1947, the total population of Palestine was 1,908,775; of these, 1,157,423 were Muslims, 146,162 were Christians (mostly Arab), and 15,849 were "others" (again, mostly Arab). Summing these, we reach the estimate of 1.32 million Arabs in Palestine as of 31 March 1947, and applying a reasonable rate of natural increase, close to 1.4 million at the time of the establishment of Israel and the Palestinian flight and expulsion.

In the years since 1948 the total number of Palestinians has more than tripled, and yet the number of Palestinians living in the territory of Palestine itself increased by only 43 percent. They represent the remnants of communities left behind after the 1948 WAR, despite Israel's successive efforts to expel them. The estimated number of Palestinians all over the world at the end of 2005 was 10.1 million, distributed as follows: 3.8 million (37.9 percent) in the Palestinian Territories (including 2.4 million in the West Bank and 1.4 million in the Gaza Strip), 1.1 million (11.2 percent) in Israel, 3.0 million (29.4 percent) in JORDAN, and 462,000 (4.6 percent) in SYRIA. Additionally there were 287,000 Palestinians in SAUDI ARABIA and 152,000 in other Gulf states. There were 58,000 in EGYPT, 113,000 in other Arab states, 216,000 in the Americas, and 275,000 in other countries. As of 2005 the total number of Palestinian refugees accounted for about 40 percent (or 4.2 million) of the total Palestinian population.

See also ALIYA; DEMOGRAPHY; DIASPORA, PALESTINIAN; PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948

Bibliography

- Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim, ed. The Transformation of Palestine. Chicago: Northwestern University Press, 1971.
- Abu-Lughod, Janet. "The Continuing Expulsions from Palestine: 1948–1985." In Palestine: Continuing Dispossession. Edited by Glenn Perry. Belmont, MA: AAUG Press, 1986.
- . "Demographic Characteristics of the Palestinian Population: Relevance for Planning Palestine Open University." Palestine Open University Feasibility Study: Part II, Annexes. Paris: UNESCO, 1980.
- . "The Demographic Transformation of Palestine." In The Transformation of Palestine. Edited by Ibrahim Abu-Lughod. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1971.
- . "The Demographic War for Palestine." The Link 19:5 (1986).
- Bauer, Yehuda. From Diplomacy to Resistance: A History of Jewish Palestine 1939–1945. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1970.
- . "Illegal Immigration." In Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel, vol. I. Edited by Raphael Patai. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1971.
- Goldberg, David. To the Promised Land: A History of Zionist Thought. New York: Penguin Books, 1996.
- Government of Palestine. Department of Statistics. "Estimated Population of Palestine, up to March, 1947." General Monthly Bulletin of Current Statistics. 12:12 (1947). Jerusalem: Government Printing Office.
- Hadari, Ze'ev Venia. Second Exodus: The Full Story of Jewish Illegal Immigration to Palestine, 1945–1948. London: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1991.
- Levine, Daniel. David Raziel: The Man and His Times. New York: Yeshiva University, 1969.
- Nijim, Basheer, and Bishara Muammar. Toward the De-Arabization of Palestine/Israel, 1945–1977. Dubuque, IA: Kendall Hunt, 1984.

- PCBS. Palestinians in Diaspora and in Historic Palestine End Year 2005. Ramallah: Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, 2006.
- Peters, Joan. From Time Immemorial: The Origins of the Arab-Jewish Conflict over Palestine. Chicago: JKAP Publications, 2001.
- Roof, Michael, and Kevin Kinsella. "Palestinian Population: 1950 to 1984." Center for International Research. Washington, DC: US Bureau of Census, 1985.
- Ruppin, Arthur. Agricultural Colonization of the Zionist Organization in Palestine. New York: Hyperion Press, 1975.
- . Arthur Ruppin: Memoirs, Diaries, Letters. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1971.
- Seidmann, O. Saga of Aliyah Beth. Shanghai: Tagar, 1947.
- Wasserstein, Bernard. Britain and the Jews of Europe 1939–1945. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1979.

Industry (Palestinian)

See ECONOMY: THE EFFECTS OF OCCUPATION ON THE PALESTINIANS

Indyk, Martin S. (1951–)

Martin S. Indyk was a UNITED STATES official with enormous influence on US policymaking for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. He was twice US ambassador to Israel (1995–1997 and 2000–2001), served as assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs in the BILL CLINTON administration (1997–2000), and was special assistant to the president and senior director for Near East and South Asian affairs on the National Security Council (1993–1995). In the latter position Indyk worked from the White House and advised President Clinton directly. Thus he was one of the most strategically placed and powerful individuals in the world when it came to shaping US Middle East policy.

Indyk was born in England of Jewish parentage but was raised in Australia, where he received a B.A. in economics from the University of Sydney and a Ph.D. from the Australian National University. In 1979 he accepted a teaching position at Australia's Macquarie University but left in 1982 to settle in Washington, D.C., where he took a job with the AMERICAN-ISRAEL PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE (AIPAC), the official, registered pro-Israel lobby in the United States. Its power to ensure that Israel's interests prevail with Congress and the White House is legendary. Indyk assisted in establishing AIPAC's research department and became its deputy director of research.

In 1985 Indyk founded the WASHINGTON INSTITUTE FOR NEAR EAST POLICY (WINEP), a pro-Israel think tank less directly involved in politics than AIPAC, but closely associated with it, focusing instead on producing policy papers for the use of the executive and legislative branches of government. Indyk believed that all the existing think tanks concerned with the Middle East were "too pro-Arab and anti-Israel." WINEP's major goal has been to keep the US-Israeli relationship at the center of US Middle Eastern policy. Although he had applied for US citizenship several years earlier, he was naturalized only in January 1993 at the request of incoming president Clinton, immediately before his appointment to the National Security Council.

In 2005 Indyk became a senior fellow at the pro-Israel Brookings Institution's Saban Center for Middle East Policy, funded by a grant from prominent Los Angeles businessman Haim Saban. Saban, with an estimated net worth of $2.8 billion, said, "he caught the political bug in the mid-1990s, when he felt that support for Israel was slipping in the United States."

Bibliography

- Abrams, Elliott. "Why America Must Lead." The National Interest. 28 (1992).
- Atherton, Alfred Leroy, Jr. "The Shifting Sands of Middle East Peace." Foreign Policy. 86 (1992).
- Bannerman, M. Graeme. "Arabs and Israelis: Slow Walk Toward Peace." Foreign Affairs. 72:1 (1992–93).
- Beinin, Joel. "Money, Media and Policy Consensus: The Washington Institute of Near East Policy." Middle East Report. January–February 1993.
- Clark, Pilita. "Gulf Expert Who Riled Hawke Finds His Niche in Washington." The Sydney Morning Herald. 13 March 1993.
- Hill, Karen, ed. Research Centers Directory, 15th ed. vol. 2. Detroit: Gale Research, 1991.
- Indyk, Martin. "Beyond the Balance of Power: America's Choice in the Middle East." The National Interest. 26 (1991–92).
- . "Peace without the PLO." Foreign Policy. 83 (1991).
- . "Watershed in the Middle East." Foreign Affairs. 71:1 (1992).
- Kamen, Al. "An Olive Branch over NSC Appointment." Washington Post. 21 January 1993.
- Neuman, Johanna. "Domestic Focus Stirring Some Uneasiness Abroad." USA Today. 6 November 1992.
- Pipes, Daniel, and Patrick Clawson. "Ambitious Iran, Troubled Neighbors." Foreign Affairs. 72:1 (1992–93).
- Sheridan, Greg. "Our Man in the White House." Weekend Australian. 30–31 January 1993.

Stedman, Stephen John. "The New Interventionists." Foreign Affairs. 72:1 (1992–93).

Infiltration (Palestinian) and Retaliation (Israeli)

Following the 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors, some 750,000 Palestinians were displaced or fled Israel. After the 1949 ARMISTICE AGREEMENTS between Israel and neighboring states, Palestinian REFUGEES sought to return to their homes, rescue their belongings, tend to their fields, harvest their crops, return to their villages, contact their relatives, or reclaim the property that Israel had expropriated. Occasionally a Palestinian sought revenge, but during the period 1949–1956, 90 percent or more of the infiltrations were motivated by social or economic concerns, according to Israeli historian Avi Shalim. During the same period, Israel shot and killed between 2,700 and 5,000 Palestinian infiltrators, the great majority of them unarmed.

Israel first responded to the infiltrations domestically, then began massive retaliatory military strikes against the countries from whose territory the infiltrators crossed the border—mainly EGYPT and JORDAN. To combat infiltration domestically Israel razed Palestinian villages; established new SETTLEMENTS along its borders; transferred Palestinian homes to new Jewish immigrants in strategic areas; established regular military patrols along its borders; laid ambushes; placed land mines; set booby traps; and instituted a "free fire," or fire-at-will, policy toward infiltrators. The first external attacks by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) were carried out in February 1951 against the WEST BANK Palestinian villages (then under Jordanian control) of Saffa, Falama, and Sharafat, in response to alleged infiltrations. The Arab governments themselves, especially Jordan, opposed the infiltrations and acted to stop them as best they could, but with little success. Israel's raids were aimed at civilians, constituted collective punishment of whole villages, and were carried out at night for maximum damage—material and human.

By mid-1953 the border situation had deteriorated significantly, and on the night of 14–15 October a major raid took place with serious consequences. Acting Israeli defense minister Pinhas Lavon directed a small commando division, UNIT 101 led by Major ARIEL SHARON, to attack the village of QIBYA under Jordanian control. Sharon and his men reduced the village to a pile of rubble, blew up forty-five houses, and killed sixty-nine civilians—two-thirds of them women and children. In the face of intense international pressure after Qibya, Israeli officially ceased focusing its offensives directly against civilians, adopting instead an aggressive counterforce strategy aimed at military targets in the neighboring Arab states, though without attempting to eliminate "collateral," or civilian, casualties.

Israeli raids continued unabated, including three major ones: First, on 10 October 1956, Israeli forces raided Qalqilya (a Palestinian town under Jordanian OCCUPATION). The attackers cut the telephone lines and mined roads. The initial attack was met with some resistance by the town's National Guard; however, Israeli troops returned following an intensive bombardment, in which fighter planes took part. They then entered the town firing randomly and blowing up houses over the heads of their occupants. The Palestinian dead included seventy to eighty-three persons, mostly civilians, including many women, children, and elderly people, and fifteen were severely injured.

The second major attack was Israel's 28 February 1955 raid on a police post in GAZA (under Egyptian control) in which forty Egyptian soldiers and two children were killed and every building destroyed. According to Israeli historian Benny Morris, from 1953 to 1956 the IDF strikes on its Arab neighbors were designed in part to emphasize Israel's military superiority and to provoke Arab states into war with Israel. The IDF's new chief of staff, MOSHE DAYAN, wanted war and hoped that "a given retaliatory strike would embarrass or provoke the Arab state . . . into . . . retaliating, giving Israel cause to escalate the shooting until war resulted—a war in which Israel could realize such major strategic objectives as the conquest of the West Bank or Sinai, or the destruction of the Egyptian Army." The Gaza raid was one such attack. Egypt had previously consistently discouraged Palestinian infiltration into Israel, but following this incident Egypt did begin to sponsor official fidaiyyun and commando raids on Israel, while still discouraging "private" Palestinian infiltration.

Confirming Morris's analysis, Israeli historian Ehud Ya'ari was given access to documents of the Egyptian military and civilian authorities in Gaza, captured by Israel during the 1956 and 1967 wars. The documents were published in 1975 in Hebrew as Egypt and the Fedayeen, 1953–1956. Ya'ari found that the Egyptian authorities had a clear and consistent policy of curbing private incursions into Israel until the Gaza raid of February 1955 and that this policy was abruptly reversed as a direct consequence of this devastating raid.

The third major raid in this period was the 31 August 1955 Israeli attack on Khan Yunis under Egyptian control. Israeli troops conducted house-to-house searches for Palestinian fidaiyyun and weaponry. During this operation, 275 Palestinians were killed, with an additional 111 killed in Israeli raids on the Rafah refugee camp. Noam Chomsky writes that “Israel claimed that the killings were caused by ‘refugee resistance,’ a claim denied by refugees.” He further notes that there were no Israeli casualties.

The major effect of these massive retaliations on Egypt was to lead Cairo to the “Czech arms deal,” wherein it acquired heavy weapons and which ultimately resulted in the 1956 Sinai/Suez War.

See also KAFR QASIM; UNIT 101

Bibliography

- Bar-On, Mordechai, Benny Morris, and Motti Golani. “Reassessing Israel’s Road to Sinai/Suez, 1956: A ‘Dialogue.’” In Traditions and Transitions in Israel Studies: Books on Israel, vol. VI. Edited by Gary A. Olson. Albany: SUNY Press, 2002.
- Drory, Ze’ev. Israel’s Reprisal Policy, 1953–1956: The Dynamics of Military Retaliation. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Eveland, Wilbur Crane. Ropes of Sand: America’s Failure in the Middle East. New York: W. W. Norton, 1980.
- Love, Kennett. Suez: The Twice-Fought War. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1969.
- Morris, Benny. “The Israeli Press and the Qibya Operation, 1953.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 25:4 (1996).
- . Israel’s Border Wars, 1949–1956: Arab Infiltration, Israeli Retaliation and the Countdown to the Suez War. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- . Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881–2001. New York: Vintage Publishers, 2001.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Stock, Ernest. Israel on the Road to Sinai, 1949–1956. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1967.

Infrastructure in the Occupied Territories

Israel has occupied the WEST BANK, the GAZA STRIP (until August 2005), and East JERUSALEM since 1967. As the OCCUPATION authority it has a legal responsibility to provide basic infrastructure—WATER, electricity, sanitation and wastewater treatment, ROADS, telecommunication, and HEALTH CARE—but it has not done so. As a result the Palestinian infrastructure, which was underdeveloped in 1967, progressively deteriorated during the Occupation, even though every Palestinian is required to pay taxes for municipal services to the Israeli government. When the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) took over these services in 1994, it was faced with the task of revitalizing every sector. Due in large part to the generosity of international donors, the PNA made limited progress in most spheres, though not nearly enough. With the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000, almost all improvements were entirely destroyed.

The following illustrates the dilapidated and/or underdeveloped condition of all aspects of Palestinian infrastructure in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, and East Jerusalem; Israel’s role in its dedevelopment during thirty-seven years of Occupation; the continuing dependence of the Palestinians on Israel, or conversely, Israel’s continuing control over every aspect of Palestinian life; and the destruction Israel has wrought on the infrastructure, especially since 2000.

Energy

West Bank and Gaza Strip (WBGS). The West Bank and Gaza have different energy supply sources. Nearly all energy is provided by electricity and petroleum products, almost all of which have to be purchased from Israel. There is no storage capacity for petroleum products in the WBGS, thus fuel is transferred on a day-to-day basis and it all comes from Israel.

According to the Paris Agreement (INTERIM AGREEMENT), the Palestinians are allowed to sell fuel in the WBGS at a lower price than that in Israel, at a rate that does not exceed 15 percent of the excise tax on gasoline. Israel collects the taxes on the fuel for the Palestinians and is supposed to remit them to the PNA; however, since the start of the Intifada in 2000, Tel Aviv has refused to remit any revenue to the PNA. The total revenue from fuel excises in 2005 was equivalent to US $180 million. Total revenues from fuel excise duties and VAT on energy consumption amounted to about US $330 million in 2005, equivalent to one-third of total fiscal revenues for the PNA (but which they did not receive).

West Bank. The West Bank depends almost entirely on the Israeli Electricity Company (IEC) for electricity supply because it has no generation capacity or transmission network. The electricity system in the West Bank consists of numerous isolated distribution systems to which power is supplied by four utilities: (1) the Jerusalem District Electricity Company (JDECO), (2) the Hebron Electric Power Co. (HEPCO), (3) the Southern Electric Co. (SELCO), and (4) the Northern Electricity Distribution Co. (NEDCO). The maximum capacity of electricity supply to the West Bank is about 550 megawatts, of which the IEC directly supplies 30 percent in bulk to 215 localities, and 70 percent indirectly through JDECO, which in turn supplies electricity to East Jerusalem and in bulk to 165 localities. In the West Bank, fuel is supplied by Israel to terminals in Nil'in (liquefied petroleum gas) and Deir Kadiz (other fuel types), from where it is distributed through the Palestinian Petroleum Commission (PPC). West Bank electricity consumption—as measured by purchases of bulk power from IEC—increased at an average annual rate of 6.4 percent between 1999 and 2005.

Gaza Strip. Israel failed to supply the Gaza Strip, except Gaza City, with electricity until 1978, more than ten years after the beginning of the Occupation. Thereafter it slowly expanded services to the towns and refugee camps throughout the Strip. Gaza receives electricity from the IEC and from a diesel-based power plant built by Palestinians in 2002 with an electricity-generating capacity of some 140 megawatts located inside Gaza. Gaza also receives a small proportion of its power supply, from 9 to 17 percent, from EGYPT. In Gaza, Tel Aviv supplies fuel to a terminal at Nahal Oz on the border with Israel.

Electricity is distributed in Gaza by the Gaza Electricity Distribution Company (GEDCO). The electrical lines for Gaza were initially installed by Israel and were later extended as Gaza's population increased. The different lines are not connected to each other, that is, there is no electrical grid that covers all of the Gaza Strip; there is a network connected to Egypt, a network connected to Gaza's power station in Nuseirat, and networks connected to the Israeli feeders. The different networks cannot be connected to compensate for the loss of one or more sources of electricity. GEDCO has no central control room to monitor and manage the flow of electricity. When it needs to redistribute electricity to share power cuts, engineers travel to a substation to manually pull a switch. The switches are designed to be operated once a year for maintenance, but since 2006 they have been used up to five times a day, resulting in serious damage and the electrocution of two engineers (both of whom recovered after lengthy hospital stays). According to GEDCO, at any one time 30 percent of Gaza's supply is affected by technical problems caused by the strain placed on the system and the lack of spare parts due to Israel's boycott.

In June 2006, following the capture of an Israeli combat soldier by Palestinian militants, Israeli aircraft bombed and destroyed the six transformers of Gaza's power plant. Since the bombing, eight new, smaller transformers have been installed, with a maximum output of 80 megawatts, but the power plant is operating far below capacity and is fully dependent on fuel supplies from Israel.

Following the destruction of the power plant's transformers, Israel increased for a time its direct supply of electricity to Gaza. Power from Israel reaches Gaza via ten feeder cables, which supply twelve megawatts each to different parts of the Strip. In late January 2007, one of the feeders from Israel was damaged. It was repaired on 6 February 2008, a year later.

By early 2007, however, Israel began reducing fuel and energy supplies to the Gaza Strip. Additionally, because of Israel's total blockade of the Strip, badly needed spare parts were unavailable. On 19 September 2007, Israel declared the coastal strip a "hostile entity" in response to HAMAS's 26 June takeover of the Gaza Strip and began further reductions in the amount of fuel it supplied to Gaza.

Israel said the measures are aimed at stopping Gaza militants from firing rockets into Israel. Others saw it differently. Human Rights Watch commented, "Israel's cuts of fuel and electricity to Gaza . . . amount to collective punishment of the civilian population, and violate Israel's obligations under the laws of war. . . . the cuts are seriously affecting civilians who have nothing to do with these armed groups, and that violates a fundamental principle of the laws of war."

Without power, Gaza's water authority, the Coastal Municipalities Water Utility (CMWU), cannot pump and distribute water or process sewage. Power cuts also mean that hospitals have to suspend operations in order to ensure emergency services and increase the risk of health problems related to contaminated water and non-functioning sanitation and heating systems.

Recently hospitals and the CMWU have had to rely solely on emergency generators to maintain normal services. Between 18 January 2007 and 22 January 2008, when Israel suspended all fuel supplies, both services ran low on diesel and had to curtail their operations. Hospitals turned away patients, and in some cases relatives had to bring in food to feed patients.

Unable to treat sewage, the CMWU had no other choice but to release wastewater into the sea at a rate of 40 million liters per day. During the second half of January 2008, almost half of Gaza's population had no access to running water. The limited and diminishing supply of electricity to the Gaza Strip is placing ever increasing pressure on the delivery of basic services in health, education, water, and sanitation to a growing Palestinian population.

During and after OPERATION CAST LEAD (December 2008–January 2009), some three-quarters of Gaza's 1.5 million residents were without electricity. Areas that still had electricity were mostly limited to a few hours of power each day. As of May 2009, Israel was shipping only a fraction of the fuel needed to Gaza, and the ban on imports of spare parts and machinery continued while the Gaza power plant was not operating at nearly full capacity. This situation exacerbates an already precarious network for the provision of basic services and will lead, inevitably, to further decline in the standard of living for the residents of the Gaza Strip.

Solid Waste and Sewage

West Bank. In the West Bank several long-standing problems with waste disposal and sewage became acute during the al-Aqsa Intifada. The ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) frequently prevented garbage and wastewater trucks from reaching municipal garbage compounds. As a result garbage piled up, sometimes for weeks, and created health problems. Israeli CHECKPOINTS also disrupted normal solid waste transportation and diverted access from regular disposal sites. In addition the IDF prevented passage of maintenance equipment and spare parts. Transport difficulties have also been caused by ROADBLOCKS, CURFEWS, CLOSURES, and import restrictions. Jewish settlers blew up sewage pipes in several areas, and the expansion and development of Jewish SETTLEMENTS have dramatically increased the amount of generated waste, as well as destroying Palestinian buildings and infrastructure. In order to deal with the excess waste, some Palestinians have resorted to open burning. There are new emergency dump sites within urban areas, but these have significant negative ENVIRONMENTAL and health impacts.

Although approximately 50 percent of homes in the West Bank are linked to a public sewage network, the rest, including the majority of villages, rely on cesspits that require periodic emptying, usually every two to four weeks depending on size. Israel's closures, curfews, roadblocks, and checkpoints have impeded the proper disposal of this sewage, which has promoted the spread of a variety of diseases.

Adding to Palestinian problems with their waste infrastructure, in 2005, Israel began a new program to transfer garbage beyond the Green Line and dump it in the West Bank at the Kedumin quarry. The project was launched despite international treaties prohibiting an occupying state from making use of an occupied territory unless such use benefits the local population. In addition, Israeli pollution experts say such use of the Kedumin quarry—located in an old Palestinian quarry between the Kedumin settlement and NABLUS—will jeopardize the Mountain Aquifer, one of the largest freshwater sources in the West Bank. The dump operators deposit around 10,000 tons of garbage from the Dan and Sharon regions of Israel every month in this quarry.

Gaza Strip. In the Gaza Strip only eight communities out of twenty-three have access to piped sewage disposal networks, while overall 62 percent of the Gaza Strip households have access to sewage disposal systems of some type. Twenty-two communities, comprising 99 percent of the population, have access to garbage collection and disposal mechanisms, which are provided by local community councils and in refugee camps by the UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (UNRWA). However, the services in most communities are far from adequate to cope with the large amounts of solid waste generated by the population.

Following twenty-two consecutive days of Israeli military action on the Gaza Strip during Operation Cast Lead, sanitation and water services and facilities were on the brink of collapse. The sanitation and water sector was already in a dire state following Israel's eighteen-month blockade on Gaza, which had prevented the entry of material necessary for construction and repair of water and sanitation facilities as well as the fuel and electricity necessary to operate essential services such as sewage pumping stations and water wells. Israel's aerial bombardment of the Gaza Strip beginning on 27 December 2008 and the ground invasion beginning on 3 January 2009 turned an already desperate humanitarian situation into a catastrophe.

Sewage overflowed into residential areas, posing an extreme threat to people's health and the environment. The main sewage line in Beit Hanoun was destroyed, and the main power generator at the Beit Lahia wastewater treatment plant was attacked. Due to the presence of Israeli troops in the Netzarim area, the Gaza wastewater treatment plant stopped operating and remains in danger of collapse. Wastewater from this plant flooded an area up to one kilometer from the plant. The wastewater level at the main Beit Lahia wastewater lagoon increased due to lack of electricity to operate it and could collapse, releasing millions of cubic meters of wastewater into surrounding areas and threatening lives and property. So far, appeals for materials to repair damaged infrastructure and coordination for technicians to access the area have been denied by the Israeli authorities.

During the war, Israel directly targeted the sanitation and water infrastructure. The CMWU reported that all basic water and sanitation infrastructure had been destroyed in areas that were subject to Israeli military attack. This included a direct hit on the Gaza City Waste Water Treatment Plant on 10 January.

Water

WBGs. Palestinians do not have adequate amounts of water for human consumption and much of the water they have for agricultural and industrial development is contaminated. Israel controls all the West Bank aquifers as well as the one that serves the Gaza Strip. It also regulates wells, requiring a permit to dig one, and requires Palestinians to pay three times as much as Israelis for water. Israel's restrictions on Palestinian water usage for human consumption and agricultural/industrial development, severe in the mid-1980s, became far more stringent in the ensuing years. In July 2000, B'TSELEM reported that "the average Israeli consumes for domestic, urban, and industrial [and agricultural] use approximately 128 cubic meters a year, or 350 liters per person a day—five times more than the Palestinian per capita consumption." At an average of 70 liters per day, Palestinians thus consume less water than the World Health Organization and the US Agency for International Development recommend as the essential minimum of 100 liters per person per day.

West Bank. Only 45 percent of the available water supply in the West Bank is obtained from locally owned sources, mostly wells. Access to aquifers and riparian rights remains under Israeli control. During the al-Aqsa Intifada the lack of access to water resources became more acute. For example, many villages in the JENIN area suffered from serious water shortages, because the municipality was not able to import needed spare parts for the well pumps, and water tankers could not reach the villages because of the internal closure. Also, continual Israeli settler attacks on the water tankers prevented them from reaching their water supply source-taps, which are solely owned and controlled by the settlers, who in turn control the flow of water in the region, often cutting it off entirely. Some Palestinian villages, such as Dier Ibzi and Qabalan, suffered greatly from the cutoff of water supply by the settlers, who are protected by the IDF. Israeli settlers from Humesh also cut the water pipes that served seven surrounding Palestinian villages.

Additionally, many water tankers were unable to fill their tanks because of the high demand on exhausted water source-taps in areas under Palestinian control. As a result the price of tanked water increased from $2.5 to $7.5 per cubic meter, which meant that from 2000 to 2008, there was a 12 percent increase in the proportion of income spent per family on water. Another problem involves the shutting off of well pumps due to fuel scarcity. Israeli soldiers have often targeted the roof water tanks and solar heaters of Palestinian houses.

Gaza Strip. At the end of January 2009, in the wake of Operation Cast Lead, more than half a million residents of the Gaza Strip (a third of the population) had no access to clean water and 37 percent of water wells were not functioning. Some had been without water for over ten days. The CMWU, the water sector service provider in Gaza, announced that it was no longer able to maintain services in the water and wastewater sector due to concerns for staff safety and an acute shortage of spare parts, material, equipment, electricity, and fuel required to rehabilitate facilities and operate services.

Israeli military attacks damaged the water pipes that serve more than 30,000 residents in Nuseirat refugee camp, who were still (as of April 2009) without a water supply, as well as more than 200,000 residents in Gaza City. Israeli helicopters bombarded the water well in the Mawasi area (refugee camp and surrounding towns) in Gaza, cutting off the water supply there. Destruction of El Edara well has left more than 25,000 people in Jabalya refugee camp without a water supply. Damage to an electrical transistor that operates a water well left more than 40,000 residents of southern Tal Al Hawa without water. There was destruction of water-filling points; long queues of people waited at the filling points, and water trucks were in desperate need to supply those without access to a water supply. Three staff members from the Palestinian Water Authority were killed during the course of Israel's military assault on Gaza, two working in the wastewater sector and one who was working at a water well at the time.

Health Care

WBGs. After eight years of Intifada the health-care infrastructure was near collapse. Israel's curfews, closures, and prohibitions on the importation of medicines and medical supplies, as well as the general RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, have created difficulties for medical personnel, who often are unable to reach their places of employment. Patient nonattendance at rural clinics has been reported at 35 to 40 percent in some areas. Checkpoints have denied civilians access to health care, a problem especially serious for the 70 percent of the Palestinian population that lives in rural areas without full-service health-care facilities. According to Médicins du Monde, Palestinian women in labor have often been delayed at checkpoints or refused permission to reach medical facilities, resulting in fifty-two women giving birth at checkpoints.

Another problem is acute blood shortages in hospitals because donors cannot reach them. Vaccination programs have been virtually halted, because the rural communities are difficult to reach and because Israeli restrictions on Palestinian imports have resulted in an insufficient supply of vaccines. Palestinian ambulances have been repeatedly denied access to the sick and wounded, and in many cases the injured were left to die. In other instances those requiring regular treatments (for example, for cancer chemotherapy or renal dialysis) suffered when they were prevented from leaving their villages to receive treatment.

The physical component of the health-care system experienced significant destruction as well. Between 29 September 2000 and 14 October 2003, 290 attacks by soldiers and settlers on hospitals and clinics resulted in damage. The IDF attacked 121 ambulances, with 36 damaged beyond repair, and Israeli soldiers killed 25 medical personnel, injured 425, and arrested 71 emergency personnel, alleging they were terrorists.

Further problems have been caused by the blockade on raw materials and other imports; for example, the Israeli Ministry of Defense banned imports of raw materials required by pharmaceutical companies. Additionally, health-care providers have faced great difficulties in the distribution of medical supplies to Palestinian towns and villages. In November 2003, Médicins du Monde reported that medical supplies had been held up at Tel Aviv customs since April of that year and were therefore unable to reach the West Bank. Imports of medical equipment are also typically denied by Israel.

Because Israeli import restrictions have closed the Palestinian pharmaceutical market to international competition, Palestinians must purchase material from Israel, which has made the prices paid by the Palestinian Ministry of Health (MOH) considerably more expensive than imports. The delay of drug deliveries from suppliers and the lack of contact between the MOH in Gaza and the MOH in the West Bank, due to movement restrictions, have also hurt drug procurement. During the al-Aqsa Intifada, MOH reported that its facilities were operating at about 30 percent of capacity.

A study published by the World Health Organization (WHO) in March 2009 found that the health-care system had deteriorated significantly. "Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza have fragmented health services due to the restrictions imposed upon people by Israeli security forces, poor management, growing population, and nine years of violent conflict." WHO found that infant mortality rates have risen sharply, as well as mental health cases, and many Palestinians find it difficult to get treatment for heart disease or cancer. Tuberculosis in the West Bank and Gaza rose by more than half between 1999 and 2003, with mental disorders up by a third.

Between 10 percent and 30 percent of Palestinian children suffer a detriment to their cognitive development and physical health from malnutrition. The trend of stunted growth among children is increasing, and physicians are concerned about the long-term effects of chronic malnutrition. There are pockets in northern Gaza where the level of stunted growth reaches 30 percent.

The WHO study said that movement restrictions affect every aspect of Palestinian life, and that this directly affects the health of Palestinians. For example, the increasing infant mortality rates and deaths of expectant mothers have not declined the way they have in other countries in the region, despite the potential availability of good care and the number of child immunizations. But restrictions on movement make access to pre- and post-natal care extremely difficult.

Gaza Strip. The Canadian Medical Association (CMA) reported on the consequences of Operation Cast Lead for the health-care situation. “When Israel began its ‘Operation Cast Lead’ . . . the Gaza health care system was already crippled by under-funding and a border blockade that prevented needed medical supplies and personnel from entering the region. The health care system soon buckled under the stress of rapidly rising casualties and infrastructure damage . . . some 34 health facilities were damaged or destroyed in the 22-day conflict.” Additionally, among the facilities shelled during the military campaign was the al-Quds Hospital, Gaza’s second largest, and the Israeli military severely hindered medical relief missions through missile attacks on or around health-care facilities, preventing medical personnel from safely getting to work and limiting the movement of ambulances. During Operation Cast Lead, an estimated sixteen medical personnel were killed on duty, and twenty-two were injured.

Israel bombed the headquarters of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) in January 2009 killing three and destroying tons of food and forcing UNRWA to stop distribution of humanitarian aid in the Gaza Strip. Four United Nations aid workers were killed.

According to the CMA, “In terms of infrastructure, the needs are significant: Along with the damaged or destroyed health facilities, basic infrastructure has been ravaged. Medical workers are pushing for water, sanitation and electricity to be restored as quickly as possible before the lack of such basic necessities causes even more health problems.”

One of the challenges facing Gaza in its attempt to repair and reconstruct its health infrastructure and other infrastructural problems is getting building supplies and other materials into

Gaza. Israel has a long-standing ban on goods entering Gaza, including cement and other construction materials. Aid officials say this will have a serious impact on attempts to restore the health-care system, which needs to be rebuilt as quickly as possible. “Medical supplies can be replaced within one month,” says Dr. Wael Qadan, director of health services for the Palestinian Red Crescent Society, which is affiliated with the Red Cross. “But the problem is infrastructure. The construction materials have not been allowed into Gaza and the impact of that is very dangerous.”

After Operation Cast Lead, Israel prevented aid workers from entering Gaza even though they had donations and supplies in hand. All of these factors created what the head of operations in Gaza for the International Committee of the Red Cross, Pierre Kraehenbuhl, calls “a full-blown and major humanitarian crisis.”

Education

WBGS. The educational system—government as well as UNRWA schools—has been crippled by Israel’s curfews and closures. Neither students nor teachers have been able to reach their classrooms with any regularity. Schools have frequently been closed, and many schools were taken over by the IDF for use as detention centers. The consequences for students have been dire. Exam pass rates in Arabic and math have collapsed, and dropout rates have risen for the first time in a decade. Teachers are increasingly reporting signs of psychological trauma and disruptive behavior in students. Between 1997 and 2004, student-teacher ratios increased by 30 percent, with 80 students per class in government schools and 40 per class in UNRWA schools. As a result, test scores for Palestinian children are increasingly well below passing.

Telephone Service

WBGS. Outside of urban areas (and in many of them as well) the West Bank and Gaza did not have telephone service until 1989–1990, when the PNA developed a telephone network infrastructure. They established a fiber-optic cable outside Gaza to serve the city, but the system was inefficient; for example, a connection made between Palestinian locales within Gaza had to first go outside Gaza and then back into Gaza, because Israel financially and physically controlled all the connections. Both before and during the OSLO PROCESS the Israeli military denied Palestinian institutions the right to lease lines. After the accords, Israel developed complicated rules that required a leased line application to go through various channels. As a result of the Interim Agreement in 1995 between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, the PNA was permitted to build an independent communication system, PALTEL (Palestinian Communications Co.), which increased the number of lines to over 311,206 as of December 2003. In December 2003, 36.2 percent of Palestinian households had a telephone line, but 60.4 percent still required a mobile phone.

Although wireless microwave technology provides some links between Palestinian cities, the West Bank has a hilly topography, so establishing transmission between cities requires the positioning of the microwave towers on high hilltops, a great number of which are occupied by the Israeli settlements. Also, the telephone network under the PNA is geographically fragmented, and most of the West Bank is not under Palestinian control. As of 2005, Israel still controlled the long-distance and international telephone network.

Internet

WBGs. In March 2000, Palestine became an official territory of the Internet. By 2002 there were thirteen Internet service providers, and 2.9 percent of Palestinian households had Internet access, although access was far greater at the institutional level, such as universities and businesses. The lack of widespread Internet access keeps Palestinians from networking not only on a national level but also at a regional and global level. The small percentage of Palestinians with Internet access must use dial-up connections to Israeli service providers or to Palestinian providers that are themselves connected to Israeli providers. Additionally, a shortage of networking and information technology skills as well as a lack of financial resources impedes the growth of the communications network.

Roads

WBGs. The road network provides a geographic linkage between various communities and centers. Yet this sector was completely ignored during the Israeli Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The existing road network is based mainly on the roads built in the years before Israeli occupation in 1967; roads constructed, upgraded, or maintained since 1967 serve the Israeli settlements and military encampments. They were intended not to serve Palestinian towns and villages, but to bypass them. This resulted in an outdated and deteriorated Palestinian road network with major engineering deficiencies and traffic operational problems.

The inadequacy of the Palestinian road network, in conjunction with the myriad restrictions Israel has imposed on movement of goods and people, constitutes a major handicap for the Occupied Territories, which suffer from isolation and an inability to trade among West Bank communities, the Gaza Strip, or neighboring countries. The Palestinian road network is made up of 2,495 kilometers (1,500 miles) of roads, 2,200 kilometers (1,320 miles) in the West Bank and 295 kilometers (177 miles) in the Gaza Strip as well as an additional 1,300 kilometers (780 miles) known as "bypass" roads to Israeli settlements on which access is limited to Israelis. There are about 595 Palestinian towns and villages in WBGs (many are in sparsely settled areas) requiring the services of a transport network. Many have no access other than narrow dirt passageways. In 2003 about 50 percent of the Palestinian paved-road network was in poor condition, up from 40 percent in 1993 despite the investments made during those ten years.

When the PNA took over responsibility for some parts of the West Bank and Gaza in 1994, it moved quickly to upgrade and modernize the existing, decayed road infrastructure. Lacking financial resources equal to the challenge and with no national, public institutions to oversee the development of these services, the PNA adopted a dual strategy: an institutional reform to improve governance by creating better regulation, and financial mobilization from the private sector and from foreign donors. Progress, however, was sketchy, and when the al-Aqsa Intifada erupted in 2000, Israel's destruction of the main roads essentially reversed what limited improvements the PNA had made.

West Bank. During its forty years of Occupation, Israel invested little to nothing to repair or develop the Palestinian road system while at the same time spending millions of dollars to construct modern, wide, well-lit settler roads for Jewish use only. Palestinian roads, especially in rural areas, are in a very dilapidated condition; the majority are unpaved and the paved ones are in disrepair. There is no lighting and few signs (except to direct Israelis to the settlements). At least 65 percent of the main roads that lead to eighteen Palestinian communities in the West Bank are closed or fully controlled by the Israeli army (forty-seven of seventy-two roads). In addition, approximately one-third of the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, is inaccessible to Palestinians without a permit issued by the IDF, which is extremely difficult to obtain.

The road network in place when Israel occupied the West Bank in 1967 ran north-south down the region's hilly central spine. Lateral roads ran off this central artery. This transportation network reflected the requirements of the Palestinian community rather than those of an occupying army embarking upon creation of scores of Israeli settlements. In 1970, Israel began construction of roads running east-west, as part of an integrated security package that aimed at connecting Israel with the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY settlements and facilitating its military control of the valley.

Israel's policy on road development in the West Bank. Settlement expansion during the 1970s concentrated on establishing Jewish colonies in strategically and historically significant locales. The success of this program led in 1984 to the publication of Road Plan 50, the crystallization of Israel's intention to construct a dedicated network of roads to facilitate settlement expansion. In an unsuccessful objection to the plan before Israel's High Court, Palestinian attorney Raja Shehadeh argued that "the way the roads have been designed means that Palestinian towns and villages will be greatly restricted in their development, with many roads creating tight rings around their existing boundaries."

The Palestinian rebellion against Israeli rule that erupted in the First Intifada in 1987 focused, in one dimension, on attacking settler vehicles with stones. By 1990, Road Plan 50 had evolved into the "Intifada bypass" road plan. The uprising fortified the Israeli view of the necessity to create a transport network for a growing settler population separate and distinct from the one serving Palestinians. In 1990, 100 kilometers (60 miles) of new roads were paved in the West Bank alone to serve settlements including Beitar, Dolev, Hermesh, Karnei Shomron, Kedar, Otniel, Revava, Shani, and Talmon Bet. By 1992, the Ministry of Housing and Construction's Great Roads Plan—the new name given to Plan 50—outlined 400 kilometers (240 miles) of new West Bank roads, including bypasses around Halhul, HEBRON, Ramallah, and Nablus.

The Oslo Process dressed up the original bypass road plan in politically correct clothing, but changed neither the plan's dimensions nor its objectives. What did change was the public rationale. No longer were these bypass roads justified by Israel for their value to Palestinians. Indeed there were early suggestions that Palestinians would be prohibited from driving on them altogether. The bypass road plan became part of the Oslo "peace" package, intended to increase settlers' sense of security. This idea was now viewed positively by some Oslo supporters as confirmation of Israel's disengagement from parts of the West Bank. The BILL CLINTON administration considered these roads security-related expenditures and refused to deduct Israel's investments in them from its loan guarantees.

ARIEL SHARON'S "Continuous Movement Plan" is meant to answer the strategic problem inherent in the territorial framework defined in the Oslo II agreement and exacerbated by the heightened security needs of many West Bank settlements resulting from the nine-year-old Second Palestinian Intifada—how to enable Palestinians to travel between the territorial islands formalized by Oslo—Areas A and B, comprising about 40 percent of the West Bank—on roads not used by settlers. Sharon described his objective as ensuring "transportation continuity" for Palestinians in these areas, where Israel favors a form of Palestinian self-rule and ersatz independence.

The extensive new Israeli network constructed during the 1990s failed to make settlements entirely independent of the historical network of West Bank roads. During the al-Aqsa Intifada, in order to maintain a normal, everyday life for settlers, Israel has restricted and sometimes prohibited Palestinian travel on many of these roads, a key feature of the "closure economy." In order to protect settlers, not only have Palestinians been separated from the new bypass road network; they have also been denied use of roads as old as Palestine itself.

Israel's solution to this untenable situation establishes yet another milestone along the long road of Occupation. Having constructed, at a cost of more than $2 billion, a bypass road network, which now includes major sections of the historical system, most notably large sections of Route 60, the Sharon government presented a plan for foreign donors to finance the rebuilding, construction, and establishment of underpasses, overpasses, junctions, and roads throughout the West Bank as alternatives to routes on which the IDF has forbidden Palestinian traffic and to others cut by the separation barrier.

Sharon's plan, adopted by EHUD OLMERT and BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, for a separate Palestinian network outlines fifty-two possible road projects and sixteen new crossroads and junctions, including bridges and underpasses spanning settler thoroughfares. Israel describes it as "a social-political stabilizer [that] creates an environment for support of the disengagement plan." The plan, in fact, reveals Israel's intention to remain in all West Bank settlements. Turning a tactical decision to deny Palestinians use of many West Bank roads into a permanent strategic objective is yet another element in Israel's ever-evolving strategy of creating facts on the ground.

Like the original Road Plan 50, today's Continuous Movement Plan is presented as beneficial to Palestinians. The Israeli plan—which Palestinians have had no role in preparing—is portrayed as an instrument of Palestinian economic revival made necessary because of the inadequacy of existing infrastructure. No mention is made that the existing infrastructure is inadequate principally because of Israel's draconian closure policy and the denial of Palestinian use of major segments of the road network improved for settlers.

Creation of separate road networks for Palestinians and settlers is yet another element of a long-term program aimed at the permanent physical division of the West Bank. It aims at subordinating Palestinian national and economic development to the maintenance of an expansive and unrestricted program of Israeli settlement in 60 percent of the West Bank and undermining the prospect of a territorially coherent state of Palestine.

There is no doubt that a continuous, unobstructed transport network is vital to Palestinian political and economic life. A rational plan would, for example, modernize the venerable Route 60 as the key to a regional road network. The ever-growing demands of the West Bank settlement enterprise, however, preclude this logical option. Instead Israel is demanding the creation of an inferior system at great expense.

A further issue concerns Israel's destruction of roads and its misuse of roads to control the movement of people and goods. Since the al-Aqsa Intifada, which began in September 2000, Israel has worked to regulate and restrict Palestinian movement in an attempt to disrupt the movement of militants and to punish the population at large. Aid workers estimate that, in this context, the IDF has cut off, dug up, or gated shut the roads leading to 80 percent of West Bank villages. The IDF says it has no figures on blocked roads. Israel exercises control over Palestinian roads through roadblocks and checkpoints. There are approximately 630 permanent roadblocks and manned and unmanned checkpoints across the West Bank. In addition, the IDF erects approximately sixty to eighty "flying" or temporary checkpoints across the West Bank each week. Permits to pass checkpoints are extremely difficult to obtain. Due to the movement restrictions imposed by Israel's separation Barrier and other policies that have led to the fragmentation of the West Bank, transportation costs have increased by up to six to seven times.

Gaza Strip. The Gaza Strip has a small, poorly developed road network of approximately 300 kilometers (180 miles). It had a single standard-gauge railway line running the entire length of the Strip from north to south along its center; however, it is abandoned, in disrepair, and cannot be used. One reasonably good road runs the entire north-south length of the Strip, but the many feeder roads are often unpaved or in serious disrepair. Few roads inside any of the refugee camps or towns are paved.

There is not a lot of data on roads in Gaza, but the following comment on Gaza City is illustrative because it is the most modern, developed sector of the Gaza Strip: "Gaza City attracts heavy traffic volumes as well as different types of transportation—from lorries to donkey-carts. Gaza City is also facing a great challenge in dealing with an aging infrastructure. For pavements in particular, many streets were built 20 or 30 years ago and they are near the end of their economic life."

In Israel's six-month 2006 war on Gaza (OPERATION SUMMER RAINS) the Strip's infrastructure was one of the first and primary targets of the IDF. In that campaign Israel bombarded seven Palestinian bridges linking Gaza City with the central Gaza Strip, and destroyed much of the major road system in the Strip. Israel claimed it was limiting the mobility of "terrorists," but the civilian population was the major victim. One road that was damaged was that approaching Gaza's Netzarim junction, at the northern end of Gaza's arterial road, Salah al-Din Street. The three-kilometer-long (1.8-mile) road connecting the junction to the Israeli border was “swept” by the IDF, demolishing OLIVE TREES, a brick factory, three greenhouses, and almost everything else that fell within forty meters of the road. Operation Cast Lead destroyed more roads and made the situation in Gaza even worse.

East Jerusalem

Since East Jerusalem was annexed in 1967, the government of Israel’s primary goal in Jerusalem has been to create a demographic and geographic situation that will thwart any future attempt to challenge Israeli sovereignty over the city. To achieve this goal, the government has been taking various actions to increase the number of Jews and reduce the number of Palestinians living in the city.

At the end of 2005, the population of Jerusalem stood at 723,700: 482,500 Jews (67 percent) and 241,200 Palestinians (33 percent). About 58 percent of the residents live on Palestinian land that was annexed in 1967 (45 percent of whom are Jews and 55 percent Palestinians). With the Palestinians having a higher growth rate than the Jews, Israel has had to plan very carefully to achieve its goal of demographic superiority.

One significant policy concerns the municipal budget. Less than 10 percent of the municipality’s development budget is allocated for Palestinian neighborhoods, although the population there represents a third of the city’s residents. The lack of investment has left infrastructure in East Jerusalem in a deteriorated state.

East Jerusalem residents are required to pay taxes like all city residents. However, they do not receive the same services. As Cheshin, Hutman, and Melamed, former Jerusalem municipal officials, explain, the Jerusalem municipality has continuously failed to invest significantly in infrastructure and services (such as roads, sidewalks, and water and sewage systems) in Jerusalem’s Palestinian neighborhoods. Since the annexation of Jerusalem, the municipality has built almost no new schools, public buildings, or medical clinics for Palestinians. The lion’s share of investment has been dedicated to the city’s Jewish areas.

Indicators of the discrepancies in infrastructure between Jews and Palestinians in Jerusalem include:

- Entire Palestinian neighborhoods are not connected to a sewage system and do not have paved roads or sidewalks.
- Almost 90 percent of the sewage pipes, roads, and sidewalks are found in West Jerusalem.

- West Jerusalem has 1,000 public parks; East Jerusalem has 45.
- West Jerusalem has 34 swimming pools; East Jerusalem has 3.
- West Jerusalem has 26 libraries; East Jerusalem has 2.
- West Jerusalem has 531 sports facilities; East Jerusalem has 33.
- West Jerusalem has direct mail delivery to every home; East Jerusalemites must rent mailboxes if they are to receive mail.

In addition, Israel has discriminated against East Jerusalem Palestinians by:

- Physically isolating East Jerusalem from the rest of the West Bank, in part by building the separation Barrier
- Discriminating in land expropriation, planning, and building, and the demolition of houses
- Revoking residency and social benefits of Palestinians who stay abroad for at least seven years, or who are unable to prove that their “center of life” is in Jerusalem
- Allowing messianic settlers to displace Palestinians and construct Jewish enclaves in every Palestinian neighborhood

Israel’s policies gravely infringe the rights of residents of East Jerusalem and flagrantly breach international law.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; EDUCATION; ENVIRONMENTAL DEGRADATION; HEALTH CARE; INTIFADAS: FIRST AND SECOND COMPARED; RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT; ROAD SYSTEM IN THE WEST BANK; WATER RESOURCES AND ACCESS

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Israel and the Occupied Territories: Humanitarian Crisis in Gaza. London: Amnesty International, 31 July 2006.
- Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem. Israeli Proposed Road System in the West Bank: A Road Web from Hell. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem, 28 October 2004. http://www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=454.
- Associated Press. “Israel Silent on Food Warehouse Razing.” New York Times. 12 August 2002.
- Barghouthi, Mustafa. Health and Segregation: The Impact of the Israeli Separation Wall on Access to Health Care Services. Ramallah, West Bank: The Health, Development, Information and Policy Institute, 2004.
- Benvenisti, Meron, and Shlomo Khayat. The West Bank and Gaza Atlas. Jerusalem: West Bank Data Base Project, 1988.

- Brundtland, Gro Harlem. Health Situation of Palestinian People Living in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. World Health Organization, 27 September 2002. www.who.int/mediacentre/news/statements/statement04/en/index.html.
- B'Tselem. East Jerusalem. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. <http://www.btselem.org/English/Jerusalem/>
- . Impeding Medical Treatment and Firing at Ambulances by IDF Soldiers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Neglect of Infrastructure and Services in Palestinian Neighbourhoods. Jerusalem. n/d. http://www.btselem.org/English/Jerusalem/Infrastructure\_and\_Services.asp
- . Settlement Expansion Plans. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 27 February 2009. http://www.btselem.org/english/settlements/20090227\_settlement\_expansion.asp.
- Caritas. "The Problem of Illegal Garbage Dumping in the West Bank—An Old Problem." ReliefWeb. 13 April 2005.
- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions. Policies of Denial: Lack of Access to Water in the West Bank. Geneva: Center on Housing Rights and Evictions (COHRE), Right to Water Programme. 2008.
- . Statement on Water and Sanitation Catastrophe in Gaza: The Collapse of Gaza's Water and Waste Water Sector. Geneva: Center on Housing Rights and Evictions, 22 January 2009.
- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Christison, Kathleen, and Bill Christison. "Polluting Palestine: The Settlements and Their Sewage." CounterPunch. 24–25 (September 2005).
- Construction and Transportation Research Center. Infrastructure Assessment in the West Bank and Gaza: Transport Sector Assessment. Nablus, West Bank: Construction and Transportation Research Center, An-Najah National University, 2005.
- Cook, Catherine. "Palestinian Malnutrition Bodes Ill for the Future." Ha'aretz. 12 August 2002.
- Davis, Uri, Antonia E. L. Maks, and John Richardson. "Israel's Water Policies." Journal of Palestine Studies. 9:2 (1980).
- de Jong, Jan. Mapping Jerusalem: One Capital or Two? Washington, DC: Middle East Institute, Foundation for Middle East Peace, and the Helen Dwight Reid Educational Foundation, 2005.
- Ehsan Sabobah, Ehsan. "The Roads Sector in Palestine." Ramallah, West Bank: Ministry of Public Works and Housing, ca. 1998. PNA<http://74.125.47.132/search?q=cache:355Vn7hvoBJ:www.mpwh.gov.ps/viewdoc.aspx%3Faid%3D901+Gaza+Strip+road+network&cd=21&hl=en&ct=clnk&gl=ca>.
- European Commission Technical Assistance Office for the West Bank and Gaza Strip. West Bank. Geneva and Jerusalem: European Commission Technical Assistance Office for the West Bank and Gaza Strip, 2009. www.delwbw.ec.europa.eu or delegation-west-bank-gaza@ec.europa.eu.
- European Union. Commission Decides on Emergency Rehabilitation of Administrative Infrastructure of Palestinian Authority. Brussels: EU's Relations with West Bank and Gaza Strip, 2002.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. "Israel Proposes a Separate Road Network for Palestinians." Settlement Report. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace. 14:6 (November–December 2004).
- Ganor, Ethan. "Holy Land or Living Hell?" Earth First Journal. 6 September 2005.
- Gaouette, Nicole. "Roads Turned to Rubble: Donkey Power Is King on Restricted West Bank." Christian Science Monitor. 22 July 2003.
- Giacaman, Rita, et al. Schooling at Gunpoint: Palestinians Children's Learning Environment in War-Like Conditions. Ramallah, West Bank: Ramallah Urban Center, 2002.
- GISHA. Facts Regarding Israel's Fuel and Electricity Cuts to the Gaza Strip. Jerusalem: GISHA, Legal Center for Freedom of Movement. <http://www.gisha.org/index.php?intLanguage=2&intItemId=744&intSiteSN=113>.
- Gordon, Neve, and Catherine Rottenberg. "The Empire Strikes Back: Sharon and Settlers Destroy Palestinian Infrastructure." CounterPunch. 3 February 2003.
- Gubser, Peter. Peter Gubser's Middle East Trip Report to the ANERA Board of Directors, April 2–16, 2005. Washington, DC: American Near East Relief Aid, 2005.
- Ha'aretz staff. "EU Urges Israel to Reconsider Cuts to Gaza Energy Supply." Ha'aretz. 31 October 2007.
- Haavisto, Pekka, et al. Desk Study on the Environment in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Geneva: UN Environmental Program, 2003.
- Hammami, Rema. "Interregnum: Palestine after Operation Defensive Shield." Middle East Report. 26 June 2002.
- Harel, Amos, and Amiram Cohen. "Eitam Bans Palestinians from Drilling for Water in West Bank." Ha'aretz. 22 October 2002.
- Hass, Amira. "Destruction and Degradation." Ha'aretz. 6 May 2002.
- . "Israel Forces Internal Movement Permit on Palestinians." Ha'aretz. 19 May 2002.
- . "Maybe Seven States Instead of 11?" 14 February 2005. www.bitterlemons.org.
- . "The Real Disaster Is the Checkpoints." Ha'aretz. 21 May 2002.
- . "Separate and Unequal on the West Bank." New York Times. 2 September 2001.
- The Health, Development, Information and Policy Institute. Health and Segregation: The Impact of the Israeli Separation Wall on Access to Health Care Services. Ramallah, West Bank: HDIP, 2005.
- Human Rights Watch. Israel Violating Laws of War with Gaza Energy Cuts. New York: Human Rights Watch, 7 February 2008.

- Isaac, Jad. Core Issues of the Palestinian-Israeli Water Dispute. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem, 1998.
- Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information. The Gaza—West Bank Passage—A Review of Options and Recommendations. Jerusalem: IPCRI, 2005.
- Jendia, Shafiq, and Maher Al Hallaq. "Development of a Pavement Maintenance Management System (PMMS) for Gaza City." Journal of the Islamic University of Gaza. 13:1 (2005).
- Kahan, David. Agriculture and Water Resources in the West Bank and Gaza (1967–1981). Jerusalem: West Bank Data Project, 1987.
- Kunder, James. Testimony before the Subcommittee on the Middle East and Central Asia. U.S. House of Representatives Committee on International Relations. 9 March 2005.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Disputed Waters: Israel's Responsibility for the Water Shortage in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1998.
- . Foreseen but Not Prevented: The Performance of Law-Enforcement Authorities in Responding to Settler Attacks on [Palestinian] Olive Harvesters. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Not Even a Drop: The Water Crisis in Palestinian Villages without a Water Network. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- . Thirsty for a Solution: The Water Crisis in the Occupied Territories and Its Resolution in a Final Status Agreement. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2000.
- Li, Darryl, and Yehezkel Lein. Act of Vengeance: Israel's Bombing of the Gaza Power Plant and Its Effects. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2006.
- Mason, Christopher. "Operation Cast Lead Casts Long Health Care Shadow." Canadian Medical Association Journal. Ottawa: Canadian Medical Association. 4 February 2009. www.cmaj.ca/cgi/rapidpdf/cmaj.090201v1.pdf.
- Médicins du Monde. Access to Health Care and Protection of the Medical Services in the Occupied and Autonomous Palestinian Territories. Paris: Médicins du Monde, 2003. www.medecinsdumonde.org.uk/pressreportsevents/pressrelease42.asp?year=4.
- Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs. Transportation and Roads. Ramallah, West Bank: The Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs, 2008. www.passia.org/palestine\_facts/pdf/pdf2008/Infrastructure.pdf.
- Program on Humanitarian Policy and Conflict Research. Human Security for Gaza in 2010: An HPCR Research and Policy Initiative, Project Synopsis. Boston: Harvard School of Public Health, 2004.
- Ratner, David. "Israel to Dump 10,000 Tons of Garbage a Month in West Bank." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 4 April 2005.
- Roy, Sara. "Developing the Gaza Strip in the Event of Israel's Disengagement: Possibilities and Constraints." In Aid, Diplomacy, and Facts on the Ground: The Case of Palestine. Edited by Michael Keating, Anne Le More, and Robert Lowe. London: Chatham House, 2005.
- . "Praying with Their Eyes Closed: Reflections on the Disengagement from Gaza." Journal of Palestine Studies. 34:4 (Summer 2005).
- "Six Human Rights Groups to Israeli High Court: Renew Fuel Supply to Gaza and Open the Crossings for Food, Equipment and Humanitarian Supplies." Networking Human Rights Defenders: fidha.org. 11 July 2006.
- Stein, Yael. Policy of Destruction: House Demolitions and Destruction of Agricultural Land in the Gaza Strip. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . The Quiet Deportation Continues: Revocation of Residency and Denial of Social Rights of East Jerusalem Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and HaMoke, 1998.
- "UN Cites 'Alarming' Damage to Occupied Territory by Israel." Albion Monitor. 21 January 2003. www.monitor.net/monitor.
- UN Conference on Trade and Development. Report on UNCTAD's Assistance to the Palestinian People. Geneva: UNCTAD, 2004.
- UN Development Program. The Effect of the West Bank and Gaza Strip Closure on Health Care. Program of Assistance to the Palestinian People, 2003.
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. Electricity Shortages in the Gaza Strip: Situation Report. Geneva and East Jerusalem: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, 8 February 2008.
- . OPT: West Bank Movement and Access Update—May 2009. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, 26 May 2009.
- Usher, Graham. Gaza Agonists. Middle East Report Online No. 218 (n/d). www.merip.org/mer/mer218/218\_usher.html.
- Vitullo, Anita. "Israel's Social Policy in Arab Jerusalem." Jerusalem Quarterly File. Jerusalem: Institute of Jerusalem Studies, Fall 1998.
- World Bank. An Update on Palestinian Movement, Access and Trade in the West Bank and Gaza. Washington, DC: World Bank Technical Team Report, 15 August 2006. <http://unispal.un.org/unispal.nsf/361eea1cc08301c485256cf600606959/606c76072407b0cd852571e0004e8fbb?OpenDocument>.
- . West Bank and Gaza Energy Sector Review. Washington, DC: World Bank, May 2007.
- World Development Indicators. Selected Infrastructure Indicators in the West Bank and Gaza. Private Participation in Mediterranean Infrastructure: A Joint World Bank/European Commission Program, 2002.
- World Health Organization. Situation Reports: Gaps in Palestinian Health Care. Geneva: World Health Organization, 9 March 2009.
- Ziv, Gadas, et al. Medicine under Attack: Critical Damage Inflicted on Medical Services in the Occupied Territories: An Interim Report. Tel Aviv: Physicians for Human Rights—Israel, 2002.

Institute for Jerusalem Studies

The Institute for Jerusalem Studies is a branch of the INSTITUTE FOR PALESTINE STUDIES. Established in 1995, it initially operated in Ramallah, WEST BANK, and then moved to JERUSALEM in 2000. Because of ISRAELI RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, its offices returned to Ramallah three years later. The institute's main objective is to commission and publish research on FINAL STATUS issues, with a particular focus on Jerusalem and REFUGEES. In addition it is active in setting up networks with both local and international research communities around common areas of interest and in computerizing data on Palestine. (www.jerusalemquarterly.org).

Institute for Palestine Studies

The Institute for Palestine Studies is the only institution in the world exclusively devoted to documentation and analysis of, and research and publication on, Palestinian affairs and the Palestinian dimension of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Established in Beirut in 1963, it was incorporated there as a private, independent, nonprofit institute unaffiliated with any political organization or government. The institute also has offices in Washington, Paris, and London, and an affiliate, The INSTITUTE OF JERUSALEM STUDIES, in Ramallah, WEST BANK. It publishes four quarterly scholarly journals in English, French, and Arabic, which are independently edited and published from Washington, Paris, Jerusalem, and Beirut, respectively: Journal of Palestine Studies (English), Revue d'études palestiniennes (French), Majallat al-Dirasat al-Filastiniyah (Arabic), and Jerusalem Quarterly File (English). (www.palestine-studies.org/final/en/index.html).

Inter-Arab Politics

See ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS

Interim Agreement

The Interim Agreement, sometimes called Oslo II or the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP, was signed on 28 September 1995 in Washington by Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). It detailed the mechanisms for and the limitations of the extension of Palestinian self-rule to portions of the West Bank. The agreement's main feature was the division of the West Bank into areas in which there were varying degrees of Israeli and Palestinian responsibility. It also contained provisions for ELECTIONS for a PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (which were held in January 1996), to which Israel would transfer authority in sectors specified in previous agreements: EDUCATION and culture, HEALTH CARE, social welfare, direct taxation, and tourism, and a "Palestinian police force as agreed upon." The police and security organs of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), the interim government, were required to coordinate jointly with the security apparatus in Israel, although "security" was defined mainly according to Israeli needs, and the Israeli military government was explicitly recognized as the ultimate source of authority in all the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. The Interim Agreement also specifically committed Israel to release West Bank and Gazan (though not East JERUSALEM) Palestinian PRISONERS and detainees who had committed offenses before 13 September 1993. It further provided for construction of "safe passages" for Palestinians between Gaza and the West Bank. Oslo II was the fourth accord in the OSLO PROCESS, and, as with other Oslo agreements, it contained hundreds of pages that defined the limits of Palestinian autonomy in ways initially imposed by YITZHAK RABIN in the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

The most important element of the Interim Agreement was the division of the West Bank into three areas of jurisdiction. Area A, under the jurisdiction of the PNA, would consist of some 3 percent of the West Bank, including Ramallah, JENIN, NABLUS, Qalqilya, Tulkarm, and BETHLEHEM, although notably not HEBRON (the largest Palestinian city), whose jurisdiction would be decided at a later date. Area B, controlled jointly by Israel and the PNA, included a network of some 400 Palestinian villages and adjoining rural lands that comprised approximately 27 percent of the West Bank. Area C, containing almost 70 percent of the West Bank, would be under exclusive Israeli control and would include the Jewish SETTLEMENTS and their bypass ROADS, military encampments, and Israeli-designated STATE LAND, plus hundreds of Palestinian villages and their farmland.

Oslo II also specified that Israeli troops were to redeploy from the Palestinian-controlled territory—Area A—in three phases, starting in October 1996 and ending by October 1997. On completing the third phase, Israel was to have withdrawn from all of the West Bank with the exception of Israeli settlements and Israeli military bases—in total some 88 percent of the West Bank. However, the territory from which Israel was to withdraw was not clearly specified in Oslo II. The Interim Agreement did not, however, commit Israel and the PLO to a FINAL STATUS agreement by October 1999, as prescribed in the Declaration of Principles.

Map 25. Oslo II, Interim Agreement, 1995

Although Israel was to redeploy from Area A, Palestinians could not move from one part of Area A to another without passing through Area B, which involved crossing a series of CHECKPOINTS, ROADBLOCKS, and other obstacles. Entrances to and exits from Gaza were also under Israeli control. The agreement thus created a series of isolated Palestinian BANTUSTANS as well as completely severing the West Bank from Gaza.

This state of affairs, combined with a unilateral Israeli prohibition on West Bank and Gazan Palestinians from entering Jerusalem, created a schizophrenic situation. For instance, life in downtown Ramallah appeared perfectly normal. The redeployment of ISRAELI DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) gave residents a new sense of freedom, and social life blossomed. Cafés, restaurants, coffee shops, galleries, businesses, research centers, and so on opened and flourished. Yet, a Ramallah resident with family in Bethlehem could not visit them (and vice versa) because the road between the two cities passes through Jerusalem. A Ramallah (or Bethlehem or any other West Bank) residents with a serious illness could not obtain medical attention at one of the major Palestinian hospitals in Jerusalem because they were prohibited from entering the city (as were all Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza). Ramallah residents who were students or professors at BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY (a few kilometers outside the city but in Area B) frequently found they could not reach the campus because of an IDF roadblock. A Muslim from anywhere in the Occupied Territories could not pray at AL-AQSA MOSQUE; a Christian could not worship at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. A Ramallah Christian could not even attend the CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY in Bethlehem. Palestinians from the West Bank could not enter Gaza, or the reverse, and so on across all the Occupied Territories.

On 4 November 1995, Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated, and a new Israeli government led by SHIMON PERES took over. Shortly thereafter the IDF began its redeployments in Area A, first from Jenin (13 November 1995), followed by Tulkarem (10 December 1995), Nablus and other villages in the Tulkarm area (11 December 1995), Qalqilya (17 December 1995), Bethlehem (21 December 1995), and finally Ramallah (28 December 1995). However, other parts of the agreement were not fulfilled; prisoners were not released and Israel did not carry out further withdrawals. Final status talks never seriously commenced, and in less than a year (May 1996) BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, who opposed the Oslo Process altogether, became prime minister and ceased to carry out any further provisions.

Bibliography

- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Israel, State of, and Palestine Liberation Organization. “Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Washington, 28 September, 1995.” www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Peace%20Process/Guide%20to%20the%20Peace%20Process/THE%20ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN%20INTERIM%20AGREEMENT.
- Kra, Baruch. “Background: Fuzzy ‘A’ and ‘B’ Definition Costs Lives.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 3 August 2001.
- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment (LAW). Apartheid, Bantustans, Cantons: The ABC of the Oslo Accords. Jerusalem: LAW, 1998.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestinians: In Search of a Just Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Said, Edward. “On Visiting Wadie.” London Review of Books. 5 September 1996.
- . The End of the Peace Process: Oslo and After. New York: Pantheon, 2000.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Usher, Graham. Dispatches from Palestine: The Rise and Fall of the Oslo Peace Process. London: Pluto Press, 1999.

International Christian Embassy

The International Christian Embassy (ICE), located in JERUSALEM, is the main institutional vehicle through which Christian Zionists support Israel. It was established in 1980 to provide Christian support for the JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST and right-wing nationalist Greater Israel agenda. ICE says that 1,400 Christians from forty countries opened the embassy in Jerusalem as “an act of solidarity with the Jewish people’s 3,000-year-old connection to their holy city.” The ICE believes that it is God’s will that Jews be returned to their “rightful land” and rebuild the Third Temple, after which the second coming of Christ will occur. (www.icej.org).

See also CHRISTIANITY; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

International Law and UN Authority

From the earliest period of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, decades before Israel existed, the world Zionist movement focused on political strategies while the Palestinians rested their claims mainly on legal rights. Of course Zionists also put forward historical and religious arguments that came to enjoy the conditional backing of the British government. This backing acquired a certain formal status after the 1917 BALFOUR DECLARATION, named after the British foreign secretary LORD ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR, endorsed Zionist efforts to establish a Jewish “national home” within the territory of historic Palestine. Yet two aspects were fundamental to the legal situation of the Israel-Palestine conflict: first, the highly questionable colonial authority of the British government to constrict and interfere with the Palestinian right of self-determination; and second, the historical developments that constantly changed de facto situations in Israel’s favor and the effect of these changes on the negotiation of the adversary claims of the two peoples.

After World War I, Palestine became a separate entity with the breakup of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, although it was not granted political independence as a separate sovereign state. Instead, by Article 22 of the COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, the peoples inhabiting the former Ottoman imperial territories were deemed “not able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world” and needed to be “temporarily” administered by a so-called advanced state entrusted with the job of promoting “the well-being and development of such peoples” as “a sacred trust of civilization.” By agreement with the League of Nations, Britain became in 1922 the Mandatory power responsible for the administration of Palestine and incorporated the text of the Balfour Declaration into its formal Mandate, thus initially demonstrating international support for the Zionist project.

It was clear from the outset, sparking controversy even in Britain, that acknowledging Jewish national rights in Palestine would violate Palestinian rights of self-determination and produce future difficulties as Zionist settlers occupied land already inhabited. British motivations in proceeding down this path seem to have been dictated by broader colonial policies and a characteristic paternalistic mindset: the pragmatic assumption that Jewish settlers would dominate Palestinian inhabitants and thereby weaken indigenous pressures on British administrative control. Such an approach was consistent with the British tendency to implement a strategy of “divide and conquer” in its colonies—a policy that invariably produced dangerously divided contested states upon political independence (as in Ireland, India, Cyprus, and Malaya). San Remo deemed Palestine a Class A mandate, the type considered most evolved toward statehood—a political community whose “existence as an independent state can be provisionally recognized.”

When the BRITISH MANDATE was established the region contained about 85,000 Jews (most not Zionists) and some 673,000 Palestinians, whose interests were explicitly subordinated from the outset in a manner that jeopardized the fundamental right of Palestinian self-determination. Aside from the legally problematic Balfour Declaration, the small proportion of Jews in Palestine at the start of the Mandate made the Jews appear to be a religious and ethnic minority rather than a rival claimant for shaping political independence and territorial sovereignty. In this regard the Palestinian narrative needs to be comprehended within the wider story of the struggle against colonialism, complicated in this case by the Zionist project, which at the time must have seemed to most observers an entirely extraneous movement pursuing a harmless pipe dream—the establishment of a Jewish state rendered viable by waves of Jewish settlers. After World War I, colonial policies were not repudiated by international law or rejected by world political opinion, nor was the right of self-determination yet legally vindicated or politically supported. The winners in World War I considered the Mandate system for the Ottoman territories as a middle ground between outright independence and continued colonial rule, giving the colonial actors extensive administrative rights for the present while holding out an indeterminate promise of future independence.

Without tracing the tortuous history of Palestine during the Mandatory years or discussing the dynamics of Jewish SETTLEMENT and Palestinian opposition, it is important to acknowledge the decisive impact of the HOLOCAUST on the interplay of Zionist and Palestinian interests. The Nazi persecution of European Jews from 1933 onward, culminating in massive genocide, convinced Jews around the world of the need for a Jewish homeland, gave rise to a far more credible claim for a Jewish right of self-determination in Palestine, and increased support for a Jewish state from liberal public opinion in Europe and North America. In effect the Holocaust transformed ZIONISM from a utopian fantasy into a formidable political project. This was acknowledged in the international community when the British decided to quit Palestine abruptly and terminate their Mandatory role without resolving the clash of nationalisms, handing over responsibility to the UNITED NATIONS General Assembly in 1947.

The UN then formally endorsed a UNITED STATES-backed plan to partition Palestine into two states and to establish an international trusteeship over JERUSALEM to be administered by the United Nations (UN RESOLUTION 181(II), 27 November 1947, also known as the Partition Resolution). Significantly the Partition Resolution included two additional integral elements that might have made all the difference if this outcome had been accepted by both sides: an economic union between the two entities and unimpeded rights of transit to and from both proposed states, “subject to security considerations.” Boundaries separating the two proposed states were specified with some precision, and the characteristics of the special status of Jerusalem were set forth. Taking account of the existing circumstances, the UN effort was a reasonable attempt to define a sustainable future for the two peoples, although given Palestinian expectations at the time, it was hardly surprising that they and their Arab neighbors considered the UN plan a colonialist ploy that unacceptably intruded upon their lands.

The JEWISH AGENCY, representing the Jewish community in Palestine, initially accepted the proposal, but the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE, representing Palestinian interests, rejected it and urged reconsideration by the United Nations. Later decisions by the World Court on issues of self-determination and decolonization, although not directly considering the issue, have generally relied on legal reasoning that is consistent with the essential Arab claim that the problems of European Jewry were being addressed at the expense of the legal rights of the Palestinian people. Reputable scholarship has also established that the Zionist leadership accepted the Partition Resolution only provisionally, viewing it as a stepping-stone to a far more extensive Israeli state.

The 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors resulted in the flight and coerced departure of some 750,000 to 800,000 Palestinians from the territory of the state of Israel, which, as the war's victor, expanded territory to one-quarter more than its allotment in the partition plan, thereby occupying 78 percent of historic Palestine and leaving Jerusalem divided between Israeli governance of the western sector, with the eastern half (the WEST BANK and East Jerusalem) administered by JORDAN. Significantly, Israel's DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE on 14 May 1948 expressed the commitment both to be "open for Jewish IMMIGRATION and for the ingathering of the exiles" and to "ensure complete equality of social and political rights for all inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex." The fundamental tension between these two undertakings has been one crucial source of the ongoing conflict between the Palestinian-Arab citizens and the Jewish citizens of Israel.

Although the legality of the state of Israel was questionable at the time of its establishment due to the unilateral curtailment of Palestinian rights of self-determination, the issue became effectively moot in the ensuing years because Israel received diplomatic recognition from leading states and in 1949 was admitted to membership in the United Nations. The General Assembly Resolution 273 of 11 May 1949, which admitted Israel to membership, called on Israel to repatriate the Palestinians who were either expelled or fled in fear in 1948. Israel has never admitted any responsibility for the Palestinian REFUGEES who left in 1948 and over the years has consistently refused to acknowledge any right of return of these refugees. It has also consistently resisted pressures from the United Nations and elsewhere to address under international law the claims of Palestinian refugees. Yet the Palestinian refugee issue is of fundamental importance in assessing the claims of both peoples. UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 194(III), adopted on 11 December 1948, attempted to foster a settlement between Israel and the Arab states based on a framework of principles and goals, the basis of which was the repatriation or compensation of the refugees: "Resolves that the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property, which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible." Although the United Nations was given the responsibility to implement this proposed solution, it has never been able to do more than reiterate again and again this obligation of Israel.

Significant by itself, Resolution 194 also reflects the general approach of international law to refugees, which is premised upon rights of repatriation and of compensation for damages wrongfully sustained. Over the years some Palestinian refugees have managed to assimilate in neighboring Arab countries, but several million Palestinians still live in impoverished and insecure conditions in refugee camps located in GAZA, LEBANON, SYRIA, the West Bank, and Jordan. The numbers are difficult to calculate, but there are at least four million Palestinian refugees resulting from the 1948 War and the 1967 WAR, as well as one million dispersed outside of historic Palestine and more than one million living in Gaza and West Bank refugee camps. These numbers give some sense of the magnitude of the refugee problem, although it is thought that only a small percentage of the several million DIASPORA Palestinians would wish to exercise their right of return. At the international level the refugee issue remains seemingly irresolvable despite the UN's continued affirmation of Resolution 194. Israel's persistent refusal to acknowledge any obligation for the Palestinian refugees remains a major stumbling block to achieving a resolution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Israeli public opinion is overwhelmingly convinced that honoring a Palestinian right of return would be fatal to Israel's identity as a Jewish state and would thereby be the end of the Zionist project. Yet, as long as this ethnonationalism predominates among Israelis, the possibility of real peace will remain unattainable even if one assumes resolution of a variety of other obstacles.

Issues after the 1967 War

Israel initiated the 1967 War in complex circumstances arising from a crisis generated by neighboring Arab states, especially EGYPT, which asked for the removal of UN peacekeeping forces from the Sinai, closed the Gulf of Aqaba to Israeli shipping, and adopted a belligerent tone toward Israel as articulated by its fiery leader, Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR. The apparent Arab mobilization for war, combined with menacing troop deployments on Israel's BORDERS, led Tel Aviv to launch a major preemptive military attack to weaken Arab military capabilities decisively at the very beginning of hostilities, including the destruction of the Egyptian air force on the ground. Israel took the occasion to occupy the West Bank, all of Jerusalem, Gaza, Egypt's Sinai Peninsula, and Syria's Golan Heights, thereby greatly increasing its military control over the entirety of historic Palestine and much territory beyond.

The UN Security Council did not condemn Israel for waging war, implicitly accepting Israel's rationale for a preemptive attack even though it stretched the UN charter's concept of self-defense in Article 51, which requires a prior armed attack to qualify a response as self-defense. The Arab provocation was implicitly treated as being sufficiently credible to justify action that might be described as anticipatory self-defense. From the outset, however, the United Nations did object to Israeli moves to convert its defensive claims to wage war into postwar plans to extend the scope of its territorial sovereignty. In UN Resolution 2253 (ES-V) of 4 July 1967, the General Assembly called Israel's moves to annex Jerusalem "invalid" and insisted that "Israel . . . rescind all measures already taken" and "desist . . . from taking any action which would alter the status of Jerusalem." In the resolution the UN secretary-general was requested to report "on [its] implementation . . . not later than one week from its adoption." Israel's response was based disingenuously on its assertion that only the Jewish state could protect the HOLY SITES of Jerusalem on a nondiscriminatory basis and provide for the harmonious administration of the city. The claim, however, was inconsistent with Israel's efforts to TRANSFER a large number of Jews to the Arab parts of the city as well as to establish sizable Jewish settlements in parts of Jerusalem previously considered Palestinian, conduct that was in direct violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention regulating the behavior of an occupying power. A subsequent General Assembly resolution, UN Resolution 2254 of 14 July 1967, deplored Israel's failure to abide by 2253, repeated its call for compliance, and again requested a report on implementation from the secretary-general.

The key action taken by the United Nations was the unanimously supported UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242, adopted on 22 November 1967. The main elements of Resolution 242 are the following propositions: "withdrawal of Israel armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict" (the 1967 War) and "a just settlement of the refugee problem." On Israel's behalf the resolution also called on all Arab states to terminate the state of belligerency and to show respect for and acknowledge "the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force." Israel was also supported by the call for "guaranteeing freedom of navigation through international waterways in the region," which went against Egypt's attempts to close the Gulf of Aqaba. This resolution, although sensitive to legitimate Israeli state interests, did not lead Israel at any point to contemplate a full withdrawal. Instead it led to a pattern of activity that seemed decisively at odds with the intention of 242, especially the creation of numerous Jewish settlements on the West Bank and Israel's annexation of Jerusalem, even though the resolution was nominally embraced by all parties, including the United States and Israel. The Security Council challenged Israel's annexation of Jerusalem in a series of resolutions, including 252 (1968), 267 (1969), and 298 (1971). Resolution 298 objected to all steps taken by Israel "to change the status of the city of Jerusalem including expropriations of LAND and properties, transfer of populations and legislation aimed at the incorporation of the occupied section," calling them "totally invalid."

After the 1973 War, UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 338 called on the parties (Egypt, Syria, and Israel) "to start immediately after the cease-fire the implementation of Security Council Resolution 242 (1967) in all of its parts" and to embark upon negotiations "aimed at establishing a just and durable peace in the Middle East." A 1973 declaration by the EUROPEAN UNION reaffirmed the applicability of Security Council Resolution 242 as providing the necessary basis for "a just and durable peace." The EU Declaration suggested four points as essential to this process: "(1) the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force. (2) The need for Israel to end the territorial OCCUPATION which it has maintained since the conflict of 1967. (3) Respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of every state in the area and their right to live in peace with secure and recognized boundaries. (4) Recognition that in the establishment of a just and lasting peace, account must be taken of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people."

The declaration also supported reinforcing this framework with “international guarantees” by establishing “peacekeeping forces” and “demilitarized zones” and stated that the issuance of these guarantees is “of primary importance” in fostering the termination of the conflict in conformity with Resolution 242. This emphasis on building confidence addresses Israel’s concerns about its alleged vulnerability, but Israel rejected in totality the EU Declaration. Until 1973 the Palestinians called for the abolition of Israel as a Jewish state, most authoritatively in the PALESTINE NATIONAL CHARTER of July 1968 adopted by the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC) of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). Article 9 of the Charter asserted that “ARMED STRUGGLE is the way to liberate Palestine,” which is identified as the exclusive “homeland of the Arab Palestinian people.” Article 29 asserted that “the Palestinian people possess the fundamental and genuine legal right to liberate and retrieve their homeland,” and Article 19 stated that “the partition of Palestine in 1947 and the establishment of the State of Israel are entirely illegal, regardless of the passage of time, because they were contrary to the will of the Palestinian people . . . and inconsistent with the principles embodied in the Charter of the United Nations, particularly the right of self-determination.”

The aims of the Palestinian people were subsequently altered, most significantly at the 1988 meeting of the Palestine National Council, which effectively acknowledged the state of Israel as legally existing within its pre-1967 borders. However, because of Israel’s failure to withdraw and the re-radicalization of Palestinian political life in 2006 under the auspices of HAMAS, these earlier Palestinian concessions to the existence of Israel have been partially withdrawn or at least rendered temporarily ambiguous. Because the PLO remains the legal representative of the Palestinian people and has not altered its 1988 approach to Israel, the rise of Hamas is unlikely to overshadow the earlier acceptance of an Israeli state. Besides, even Hamas has indicated a pragmatic willingness to drop its maximalist goals if Israel will comply with 242 and withdraw completely from Palestinian territory occupied in 1967. In an important recognition of the significance of the 1988 PNC resolutions, UN General Assembly Resolution 43/177 of 15 December 1988, acknowledged the 1988 Palestinian proclamation of a Palestinian state as consistent with the earlier Resolution 181, which called for the partition of Palestine into two states. On 9 September 1993, Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN and PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT recognized one another in an exchange of letters, and a few days later, on 13 September, the two leaders signed the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES on Interim Self-Governing Arrangements for the Palestinian Territories, which set a five-year goal of establishing Palestinian self-government.

Israeli Occupation of Palestinian Territories

Since the 1967 War many issues of international law have arisen in connection with Israel’s Occupation of the West Bank, East Jerusalem, and Gaza. The most fundamental of these involves a controversy over whether the Fourth Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilians in Time of War (1949) is applicable to Israel’s Occupation. Especially in Articles 47–48, the treaty specifies in considerable detail the obligations of an occupying power to protect the civilian population, although the occupier is entitled to impose some restrictions “strictly necessary” for its security. Both Israel and the neighboring Arab states are parties to this Geneva Convention. According to Article 1 the parties “undertake to respect and to ensure respect for the present Convention in all circumstances.” Nevertheless, Israel has refused to acknowledge that its Occupation policy is so constrained. It has insisted that according to Article 2, the Fourth Geneva Convention applies only to territory held lawfully by one of the parties and that between 1948 and 1967 neither Jordan nor Egypt possessed such a legal title when they administered the West Bank and Gaza. The government of Israel, supported by the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT, declared it would apply, only of its own free will and without legal obligation, those provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention that it deemed “humanitarian” in character. It is generally understood that this ex gratia commitment by the Israeli government applies only to Article 3, which sets forth an obligation for humane treatment for all those who are not taking “an active part in hostilities” and to this end prohibits the following practices: “(a) violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture; (b) taking of hostages; (c) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment; (d) the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court affording all judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples.” Even on this limited basis Israeli judicial proceedings have officially acknowledged that Israeli detention practices have violated in various ways prohibitions on “cruel and inhumane treatment and torture,” as well as extrajudicial executions.

Moreover, Israel’s refusal to acknowledge its role as an occupying power and hence its obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention has resulted in its further self-exemption from any obligation, even voluntary, to respect the provisions that define the overall rights and duties of an occupying power. This Israeli view of the legal applicability of the humanitarian law of war (i.e., the Geneva legal framework) to the Occupation was unanimously rejected by the international community, including the International Court of Justice in its 2004 Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Israeli Security Wall (the BARRIER). The ruling followed the 2000 UN Security Council Resolution 1322, adopted by a vote of 14–0 with the United States abstaining, which called “upon Israel to abide scrupulously by its legal obligations and its responsibilities” under the Fourth Geneva Convention.

A central issue of international law during the entire duration of the Occupation has been the Israeli policy of establishing settlements on the West Bank and Gaza (the latter dismantled in 2005), as well as in East Jerusalem. Since 1967 both the number of settlements and especially the number of settlers have steadily increased. Present estimates indicate that there are 121 settlements in the West Bank with 285,500 settlers, plus some 150 outposts, and 12 major settlements in Jerusalem with 193,700 settlers. The establishment of these settlements on occupied territory is clearly prohibited by Article 49(6) of the Fourth Geneva Convention: “the Occupying Power shall not deport or TRANSFER parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies.” The Israeli Supreme Court has rejected Palestinian objections to the settlements, contending that Article 49 is not a “humanitarian” provision of the convention and thus not relevant. This argument is rejected by the overwhelming majority of international law specialists, who consider the convention fully applicable to the Israeli Occupation and reject the more informal Israeli claim that the settlers have established their settlements by their own volition rather than by any official policy. In fact the Israeli government has continuously helped settlers expropriate Palestinian land, subsidized and defended the settlements, and promoted settlement establishment and expansion as matters of official policy.

On the basis of international law the removal of all or most of the settlements and settlers is crucial to any effort to shape negotiations for a Palestinian state or to end this 100-plus-year conflict. Notably the settlement population almost doubled during the OSLO PROCESS, suggesting an Israeli unwillingness even during these negotiations to address Palestinian objections, rooted in international law, to its Occupation policies. This Israeli settlement expansion increased Palestinian suspicions that Oslo was a delaying tactic and that Israel never intended to allow the creation of a Palestinian state in the territory occupied since 1967.

The issue of seizing Palestinian land for Israeli settlements raises several separate and important issues. Article 46 of the 1907 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land declares that land occupied as a result of belligerency should not be confiscated. Although Israel is not a party to this convention, so many states consider it obligatory that it has achieved the status of customary international law, which the Israeli Supreme Court has acknowledged as binding on Israel. In the 1979 ELON MOREH SETTLEMENT case the Israeli Supreme Court held “that private West Bank and Gaza Strip land could not be confiscated in the absence of a security justification.” After the Elon Moreh ruling by the Israeli government bypassed this restriction by declaring huge tracts of Palestinian land STATE LAND, then seizing it for “security” reasons and building settlements on it. The Israeli Supreme Court raised no objection to this practice. Professor John Quigley, a respected expert on these matters, points out that “the [Israeli] government [following Elon Moreh] began confiscation of nominally state-owned land. . . . Much of the land of the West Bank was under a tenure system that was in a technical sense state ownership, though individual [Palestinian] families had occupied the land for generations and, so long as they paid taxes on it, were considered its owners.”

Another violation of Geneva Convention Article 49 is Israel’s use of DEPORTATION as a policy against Palestinians. According to B’Tselem, the respected Israeli Center for Human Rights, between 1967 and 1992, Israel deported 1,522 individuals. Following a ten-year hiatus, in 2002, Israel deported 13 individuals, and between 2003 and 2005, in a new twist on the policy, Israel deported 32 persons from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank and vice versa. No one who has been deported has even been charged with a crime, much less convicted. All these individuals were expelled for political reasons. Once more Israel's Supreme Court gave a legal justification to a practice—deportation—deemed illegal by the international community. Israel's Supreme Court decided in 1987 that Article 49 only prohibits “mass deportations for purposes of forced labor or extermination, and therefore, does not prohibit deportations of individuals or small groups, done for punitive purposes.” The United States and the European Community, as well as the UN Security Council, have protested the deportations. UN Security Council Resolution 607 of 5 January 1988 interpreted Article 49 as legally prohibiting any expulsion of residents of an occupied territory.

Israeli Occupation policies have produced other serious violations of Palestinian civil rights under the Fourth Geneva Convention. Among the most condemned has been the Israeli practice of HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, used both as retribution for building a house without a PERMIT (Israel has rarely issued permits) and as a punishment imposed on families of suspected terrorists. Israeli scholar and activist Jeff Halper, who has thoroughly studied this issue, estimates that between 1967 and 2005, Israel demolished 12,000 houses, and these demolition practices continue through the present. Israel has also imposed harsh CURFEWS and CLOSURES on Palestinian communities or even, at times, the entire OCCUPIED TERRITORIES as punishment for an act of an individual. These curfews and closures constitute collective punishment that is clearly prohibited by Article 33 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which states: “No protected person [that is, Palestinian civilian] may be punished for an offence he or she has not personally committed. Collective penalties and likewise all measures of intimidation or of TERRORISM are prohibited. . . . Reprisals against protected persons and their property are prohibited.” Other serious violations of Article 32 are associated with the practice of ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION in which thousands of Palestinians have often been held for long periods without charges.

Palestinian Right of Resistance

A contested issue in international law is whether there is a right of resistance to a prolonged belligerent occupation that specifically violates the basic guidelines of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and more generally international humanitarian law. This question has a special importance if the occupier's violations curtail or nullify a people's ability to exercise the right of self-determination as conferred in common Article 1 of the two international human rights covenants that are authoritative under international law. In the Palestinian situation these legal guidelines suggest that the Palestinian people enjoy some right of resistance that validates at least nonviolent defense of their fundamental rights, and more likely, armed resistance in accordance with limits imposed by international humanitarian law.

Since the Occupation commenced, there have been various forms of sporadic resistance by Palestinians of various political persuasions. But a collective, essentially nonviolent, and spontaneous resistance, the INTIFADA, occurred with unexpected suddenness in December 1987. In Cheryl Rubenberg's words, “virtually all Palestinians participated in Intifada-related activities—mass demonstrations, labor and merchant strikes, civil disobedience (e.g., refusal to pay taxes), confrontations with military authorities, blocking roads with burning tires, and—in what became the symbol of the uprising—throwing stones at armed soldiers.” The Israeli government responded with an “IRON FIST” POLICY enunciated by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, in which ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES were instructed to beat resisters or break their bones at the scenes of confrontation. The iron fist was officially intended to intimidate the Palestinians by making them fear the consequences of taking part in even nonviolent resistance. Israel's use of excessive force was condemned in Security Council Resolution 605 of 22 December 1987. The UN Human Rights Commission regarded the Intifada's forms of resistance as a lawful exercise of the “right of the Palestinian people to regain their rights by all means in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and with relevant United Nations resolutions.” On this basis the commission concluded that “the uprising of the Palestinian people against the Israeli Occupation since 8 December 1987 is a form of legitimate resistance.”

The broader legal issues raised by Palestinian resistance involved the limits imposed by international law on the use of force in armed conflict, especially the prohibition on attacks that deliberately target civilians. The AL-AQSA INTIFADA, also called the Second Intifada, was triggered by the deliberately provocative visit of ARIEL SHARON and several hundred armed guards to the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF/TEMPLE MOUNT, a holy site in Jerusalem for both Jews and Arabs, on 30 September 2000. When Sharon, who was then running for prime minister, visited al-Haram, Israeli snipers shot unarmed Palestinian demonstrators, killing several. Sharon's visit occurred in the context of intense Palestinian anger, frustration, and despair at the failure of the peace process. The renewed expressions of Palestinian resistance targeted not only Israel but also the leadership of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY for its corruption, cronyism, repression, and especially the concessions made at the 2000 CAMP DAVID meetings. Unlike the First Intifada, this second instance of collective resistance was far more violent on both sides from the outset. Because the OSLO ACCORDS gave Palestinian police the duty to guarantee Israel's security, they had a variety of light weapons that were used against Israeli soldiers in some of the early demonstrations. Israeli forces reacted with sophisticated weaponry, as well as a variety of tactics deemed inconsistent with international humanitarian law, such as TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS of terrorist suspects, collective punishments of Palestinian communities by way of extended closures and curfews, destruction of Palestinian property without compensation, violence against children, and interference with movement of medicines and medical relief vehicles. In response to Israel's use of force in the Second Intifada, the UN Security Council, by a vote of 14 to 0 with the United States abstaining, adopted Resolution 1322, which "called upon Israel to abide scrupulously by its legal obligations and responsibilities" under the Fourth Geneva Convention. A "special rapporteur" appointed by the UN Human Rights Commission to assess allegations that Israel had violated human rights in the Palestinian Territories concluded that Israel used excessive force against Palestinian demonstrations and political activities associated with the Second Intifada.

The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel and the Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment petitioned the Israeli Supreme Court to stop the practice of targeted assassinations; however, on 11 December 2005 the court upheld the legality of assassinations. "The State determined that preventative strikes upon terrorists in the area which cause their deaths are a necessary means from the military standpoint. These strikes at times cause harm and even death to innocent civilians. These preventative strikes, with all the military importance they entail, must be made within the framework of the law. . . . In this case, the law was determined by customary international law [UNSC Res. 1322 and the Geneva Convention] regarding conflicts of international character."

Suicide Bombings

After the 1994 massacre of twenty-nine men at prayer in the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in HEBRON by settler BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, various Palestinian groups, including Hamas, ISLAMIC JIHAD, and the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, have relied on the tactic of SUICIDE BOMBING to inflict harm on Israeli civilian society, killing hundreds and maiming thousands. This tactic did not originate with the Palestinians but has been used in numerous modern conflicts, especially by the Tamil Tigers of Sri Lanka. In their setting, Palestinians have defended it as a necessary tactic, given the asymmetries of power between the two sides. SHEIKH AHMAD YASIN, the subsequently assassinated Hamas leader, expressed the standard justification: "Once we have warplanes and missiles, then we can think of changing our means of legitimate self-defense. But right now, we can only tackle fire with our bare hands and sacrifice ourselves."

International law uniformly condemns targeting civilians by suicide bombings. As constituting the international crime of terrorism, suicide bombings are punished by all legal systems, even though the major world powers have been unable to agree on the definition of terrorism. Every government is entitled to take lawful measures to prevent suicide bombing, although such responses may not be feasible, as the bomber is usually dead and his/her accomplices may be unknown or merely suspected. In retaliation Israel has relied on targeted assassinations, the destruction of the home of the family of a suicide bomber, the imposition of a collective punishment on a whole community or region where a suicide bomber resided, and the indiscriminate use of weaponry such as missiles or helicopter gunships to attack targets allegedly linked to suicide bombing. These are considered unlawful measures in international law.

Peace Process

In the aftermath of the 1991 GULF WAR and the widespread sympathy for the Palestinian cause that grew out of the First Intifada, the United States took the initiative in encouraging some sort of Israel-Palestine negotiating process. The first formal phase was the MADRID CONFERENCE in October 1991, which was dominated by the United States and embodied all Israel's diplomatic priorities. Israel insisted that the PLO be excluded, that only non-PLO Palestinians from the West Bank or Gaza, but not Jerusalem or the Diaspora, could participate, and only then as part of a joint Jordanian-Palestinian negotiating presence. The United States acquiesced and further accepted Israel's interpretation of Security Council Resolution 242—that it had fulfilled its commitment by withdrawing from the Sinai—which substantially weakened the resolution as the foundation for a resolution of the conflict. After a divisive debate, the PLO under Yasir Arafat's leadership agreed to the conditions set by Israel despite their unfavorable basis. None of the Palestinians' concerns were satisfied at Madrid or in the bilateral and multilateral talks that followed. But simultaneously, in a highly secret and lengthy undertaking, senior Israeli and Palestinian officials met in Oslo, Norway, and hammered out a plan for a peace process. This became the Declaration of Principles (DOP), signed on 13 September 1993 on the White House lawn, and marked the start of what became known as the Oslo Process. The DOP has several notable features: there was no reference to a Palestinian right of self-determination or to the eventual establishment of a sovereign Palestinian state; the Interim Self-Government Arrangements called for a transition period of five years during which Israeli military forces in Palestine were to be redeployed rather than withdrawn; and issues such as borders, refugees, Jerusalem, and WATER were left for resolution in final status negotiations.

During the Oslo years many Palestinians and Israelis expressed hopes for the establishment of a Palestinian state based on the pre-1967 borders and a real reconciliation of the parties. As well, the Declaration of Principles affirmed "that the negotiation on the permanent status will lead to the implementation of Security Council Resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973)." As time went on, however, Israel's carefully chosen diplomatic language, its expansion of settlements, and the construction of an extensive network of settlement roads as well as the Security Barrier indicated that implementing 242 and 338 did not involve dismantling the main settlement blocs, nor did it mean more than partial withdrawal. It certainly did not suggest that Israel would give up control of a unified Jerusalem or concede a right of return to Palestinian refugees. The Palestinian expectation of a state in the territories occupied by Israel in 1967, which could be formed only if Israel adhered to the real meaning of 242, was no longer viable. The entire framework of the peace process reflected the gross power disparities between the parties, a reality magnified by the unconditional partisanship manifested by the United States on Israel's behalf, a posture masked behind its spurious claim that it was serving as an "honest broker" in the conflict. The weakness of the Palestinian position was never more dramatically evident than by their acquiescence to the Oslo Process.

Just as significantly, Palestinian weakness was underscored by their failure to insist on a negotiating process that respected their rights under international law. Aside from their political resolve to maintain their struggle, international law is the strongest Palestinian weapon. On every crucial issue between the parties—from the occupied land and borders to the status of Jerusalem, the rights of refugees, the settlements, and access to water—international law is clearly on the side of the Palestinians, especially considering that in 1988 the Palestinians renounced their earlier claims to the whole of the Palestine Mandate and thereby conceded the legitimacy of the state of Israel as encompassing 78 percent of historic Palestine. It is equally an expression of Israel's strength that it could frame negotiations in such a way as to marginalize, if not altogether eliminate, consideration of Palestinian rights and issues under international law. It should be remembered in this regard that international law incorporates well-established notions of fairness and common sense in its operative norms on the issues separating the two parties. The effective exclusion of international law made it clear that the bargaining process would be based on power not rights, and that the outcome would not correspond with the wider international understanding of justice. There was no pressure on Israel to stop all actions inconsistent with its obligations under international law, and the Palestinians were told that their grievances would be addressed later in the FINAL STATUS TALKS and that any present Palestinian insistence on their rights under international law would disrupt the peace process. Their acceptance of pre-1967 Israel, without challenges to its legitimacy or borders, was an enormous Palestinian concession that, if reciprocated by Israel, could have produced a mutually beneficial peace agreement, but this was not to be.

There are two ways of conceiving of a just outcome that is sensitive to the historical evolution of the relations among the two peoples: first, conflict resolution in accordance with international law, allowing minor adjustments as agreed by the parties; and second, two truly equal, sovereign independent states established on either side of the pre-1967 borders, with international guarantees, international border supervision, an internationalized Jerusalem, and full and equal transborder mobility. These two views converge to a considerable extent, but the second approach allows for more negotiating flexibility. It permits, for instance, the Palestinians to allay Israeli anxieties on the refugee issue in a manner that would not be feasible if the process of reconciliation depended on a strict implementation of Palestinian rights under international law.

World Court and Israel's Security Wall

Israel began construction of its Security Wall in June 2002, mainly situated on the Palestinian side of the 1967 Green Line, which will have an estimated length of more than 430 miles (700 kilometers) when and if completed. It cuts Palestinian villages off from the Palestinian Territories and effectively incorporates occupied Palestinian land into Israel, including over 90 percent of the settlement population and all of the large West Bank settlement blocs. On 8 December 2003 the UN General Assembly adopted Resolution ES-10/14, requesting the International Court of Justice (World Court) to issue an advisory opinion on the legality and legal consequences of the wall as being constructed on occupied Palestinian territory. This approach was a reaction to a US veto of an earlier draft Security Council resolution condemning the wall as illegal and the lack of any mention of the wall in the ROAD MAP, which had been approved by the Security Council as a resumption of the peace process initiated at Oslo.

The World Court issued its advisory opinion on 9 July 2004, first addressing objections by Israel and the United States to the court's jurisdiction in the case, and then concluding, by a vote of 14–1, that the wall as constructed on Palestinian territory was illegal and should be dismantled, with reparations paid to the Palestinians harmed by the construction. The lone dissenting vote was cast by the US judge, Thomas Buergenthal, who contended that the majority had not sufficiently considered Israel's security justifications for constructing the wall on Palestinian territory, but otherwise endorsed almost all of the legal reasoning of the World Court advisory opinion, including the affirmation that the Fourth Geneva Convention applied to Israel's Occupation. Judge Buergenthal observed that the construction of the wall on Palestinian territory had raised serious legal issues, including an impairment of the Palestinian right to self-determination.

On 20 July 2004 the General Assembly overwhelmingly adopted Resolution ES-10/15 (by a vote of 150–6, with ten abstentions), which endorsed the conclusions of the advisory opinion and called upon Israel to dismantle the wall, and otherwise comply. The government of Israel, supported by the United States, rejected the World Court's legal conclusions and, as expected, voted against the General Assembly resolution. In separate legal proceedings within Israel the Israeli Supreme Court, although accepting Israel's basic security rationale for constructing the wall on Palestinian territory, did issue several specific legal rulings requiring Israel to dismantle segments of the wall that imposed unacceptable levels of harm on the Palestinian inhabitants residing in particular areas. The Israeli Supreme Court's approach was to weigh the humanitarian argument against the security rationale in each specific locale and to require relocation of the wall closer to the Green Line in cases of disproportionate harm to the Palestinians. Israel implemented the Supreme Court's decision, requiring changes in the direction of the wall applying to an area of some twenty miles (thirty kilometers) in length, while thereby reinforcing the overall legality of the wall and allowing Israel to purport a show of respect for the rule of law as well as to claim the independence of its judiciary.

John Dugard, the special rapporteur on the Palestinian Territories appointed by the UN Human Rights Commission, summarized the widely held international views on the wall in a report issued on 19 March 2004, as well as in a statement made to the Third Committee of the General Assembly on 28 October 2004. Professor Dugard emphasized that three sets of adverse consequences for the Palestinian people follow from the wall:

- (1) "It consolidates and encourages illegal Israeli settlements by including most settlements in the 'closed zone'—the area between the Wall and the Green Line." This prediction was borne out by statistics on the growth of settlements. In 2003, for instance, the settler population increased by a total of 5.3 percent as compared to a population growth in Israel itself of 1.3 percent. In addition the Israeli government issued 2,167 permits to Israeli settlers to build apartments in Palestine. The report argued that this has caused "increased SETTLER VIOLENCE against Palestinians" and it held Israel responsible for this violence.
- (2) "The Wall has led to the seizure of substantial amounts of land previously considered part of Palestine, owned and used by Palestinians. . . . Regions of Tulkarm and Qalqilya have already seen the seizure of the best agricultural land and its water resources."
- (3) "The Wall impedes Palestinian freedom of movement, making it particularly difficult for those Palestinians with lands partially located on the Israeli side to have access without obtaining PERMITS, which are often either unavailable or exceedingly difficult to obtain, especially by young Palestinians who allegedly pose security threats."

An overwhelming majority of Israelis believe that the wall has reduced the incidence of suicide bombings, and this belief is reinforced by a decline in incidents. However, a wall on Israeli territory would probably make an equal or greater contribution to Israeli security behind the Green Line and would almost certainly have been treated as consistent with international law, although raising moral and political objections of the sort occasioned during the Cold War by the Berlin Wall.

See also BARRIER; DEPORTATION; HOUSE DEMOLITIONS; ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES; ISRAELI SUPREME COURT AND THE OCCUPATION; SASSON REPORT; SETTLEMENTS; UNITED NATIONS

Bibliography

Allain, Jean, ed. Unlocking the Middle East: The Writings of Richard Falk. Northampton, MA: Olive Branch Press, 2003.

Amnesty International. Reports. www.amnesty.org.

- . Surviving under Siege: The Impact of Movement Restrictions on the Right to Work. London: Amnesty International, 2003.
- Beinin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Bowen, Stephen, ed. Human Rights, Self-Determination, and Political Change in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. The Hague, Netherlands: Kluwer Law International, 1997.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Foreseen but Not Prevented: The Israeli Law Enforcement Authorities' Handling of Settler Attacks on Olive Harvesters. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . House Demolition Statistics. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1998.
- . Planning and Building Statistics. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2000.
- . Planning and Building Statistics. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Policy of Destruction: House Demolition and Destruction of Agricultural Land in the Gaza Strip. Information sheet. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . "Statistics on Deportation." n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Deportation/Statistics.asp.
- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva: COHRE and Badil, 2005.
- Darcy, Shane. Israel's Punitive House Demolition Policy: Collective Punishment in Violation of International Law. Ramallah, West Bank: Al-Haq—Law in the Service of Man, 2003.
- Diplomatic Conference for the Establishment of International Conventions for the Protection of Victims of War. Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (Fourth Geneva Convention). 12 August 1949. www.unhcr.ch/html/menu3/b/92.htm or www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/History/Human\_Rights/geneva1.html.
- Dugard, John. Question of the Violation of Human Rights in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (OPT), Including Palestine: Statement by Prof. John Dugard, Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories Occupied by Israel since 1967, at the Sixtieth Session of the Commission on Human Rights, 19 March 2004. Al-Haq, 2004. www.alhaq.org/etemplate.php?id=131.
- . Report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights, John Dugard, on the Situation of Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories Occupied by Israel since 1967, Submitted in Accordance with Commission Resolution 1993/s A, E/CN.4/2004/6, 8 September 2003. Geneva: Commission on Human Rights, 2003.
- Ginbar, Yuval. Demolishing Peace: Israel's Policy of Mass Demolition of Palestinian Houses in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1997.

- Gutman, Roy, ed. Crimes of War: What the Public Should Know. New York: W. W. Norton, 1999.
- Al-Haq. The Applicability of Human Rights Law to Occupied Territories: The Case of the Occupied Palestinian Territories, 2nd ed. Al-Haq: Jerusalem, 2003.
- International Court of Justice. "Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory." Advisory Opinion. 9 July 2004.
- Joint Parliamentary Middle East Councils Commission of Enquiry. Right of Return, 2nd ed. London: Labour Middle East Council, Conservative Middle East Council, Liberal Democrat Middle East Council, 2001.
- Meshal, Khaled. Translated from the Arabic by Ali Abunimah. "Major Policy Speech by Hamas Leader Khaled Meshal: 'Hamas' Choice'—Recognition or Resistance in the Age of Obama." Electronic Intifada. 6 July 2009. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.
- Moore, John Norton, ed. The Arab-Israeli Conflict: Readings and Documents. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1977.
- Palestinian Centre for Human Rights. Three Years of Israeli Violations of International Humanitarian Law in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Gaza City: PCHR, 2003.
- Playfair, Emma, ed. International Law and the Administration of Occupied Territories: Two Decades of Israeli Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. South Gloucestershire, UK: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Quigley, John. The Case for Palestine: An International Law Perspective. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2005.
- Roberts, Adam, and Richard Guelff, eds. Documents on the Laws of War, 2nd ed. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestinians: In Search of a Just Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Supreme Court [Israeli] Sitting as the High Court of Justice. Before President (Emeritus) A. Barak, President D. Beinisch, and Vice President E. Rivlin. Petition for an Order Nisi and an Interlocutory Order. Judgment. HCJ 769/02. 11 December 2005.
- UN General Assembly. "Illegal Actions in Occupied East Jerusalem and the Rest of the Occupied Palestinian Territory." Resolution. New York: United Nations General Assembly, 8 December 2003.
- Zionism and Israel Information Center. "Israel High Court Ruling Docket H.C.J. 7957/04. 2005. International Legality of the Security Fence and Sections near Alfei Menashe." 15 September 2005. www.zionism-israel.com/hdoc/High\_Court\_Fence.htm.
- Zunes, Stephen. Tinderbox: U.S. Middle East Policy and the Roots of Terrorism. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press, 2003.

International Solidarity Movement

The International Solidarity Movement (ISM) is a nongovernmental organization focused on protesting certain Israeli activities in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. It was founded in 2001 by Ghassan Andoni, a Palestinian; Neta Golan, an Israeli; Huwaida Arraf, a Palestinian American; and George N. Rishmawi, a Palestinian. Adam Shapiro, a Jewish American, joined the movement shortly after its founding and is also often considered one of the founders.

The organization calls on civilians from around the world to participate in acts of nonviolent protest against the Israeli military's actions in the WEST BANK and, prior to Israel's withdrawal in August 2005, the GAZA STRIP. The group has attracted criticism as well as praise for its peaceful methods.

Past ISM campaigns have employed the following tactics:

- Acting to deter military operations.
- Accompanying Palestinians to minimize harassment by Israeli settlers or soldiers, ensuring that queues at Israeli CHECKPOINTS are processed efficiently, and providing witnesses and intermediaries during annual olive harvests, which are often disrupted by settlers and police.
- Removing ROADBLOCKS. These large, unmanned mounds of earth and concrete are placed on roads throughout the West Bank and at the entrances of Palestinian villages by the Israel Defense Forces (IDF), thereby preventing traffic in or out.
- Attempting to block military vehicles such as tanks and bulldozers, especially in the destruction of homes.
- Violating Israeli CURFEW orders enforced on Palestinian areas in order to monitor Israeli military actions, deliver food and medicine to Palestinian homes, or escort medical personnel to their work.
- Interfering with the construction of the West Bank BARRIER and placing politically motivated graffiti on the Barrier.
- Entering areas designated as "CLOSED MILITARY ZONES" by the Israeli military. (This is not so much a "strategy" as a prerequisite for conducting activities like those above in areas designated as "closed military zones" by the IDF.)
- Attempting to lift the Israeli blockade of Gaza with the "Free Gaza" initiative to send boats to Gaza in August 2008.
- Confronting Israeli soldiers.

—Richard Falk

The activities of the ISM are carried out in dangerous conditions and have often been met with harsh response by the IDF.

- On 2 April 2002, Australian ISM volunteer Kate Edwards sustained severe internal injuries from rounds fired by Israeli forces during a protest in Beit Jala. The incident was captured on film and appears in the documentary by Palestinian filmmaker Leila Sansour, Jeremy Hardy vs. the Israeli Army.
- On 22 November 2002, Caoimhe Butterly, an Irish ISM volunteer, was shot and injured by the IDF in Jenin.
- On 16 March 2003, American ISM volunteer Rachel Corrie was killed while trying to block an IDF armored bulldozer during a house demolition.
- On 5 April 2003, British ISM volunteer Brian Avery was shot in the face by machine gun from an IDF armored personnel carrier while he was outside in the street escorting Palestinian medical personnel.
- On 11 April 2003, British ISM volunteer Thomas Hurndall was left clinically brain-dead after he was shot in the head by an IDF soldier. Initially the soldier claimed the shooting occurred during an armed firefight between Israeli soldiers and Palestinian militants, but later admitted firing a shot near him as a deterrent, which had accidentally hit him. Hurndall died on 13 January 2004.

In 2004, the ISM was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize by Svend Robinson, a Canadian parliamentarian. In 2006 the American Friends Committee (Quakers) nominated Ghassan Andoni for the Nobel Peace Prize together with Israeli Jeff Halper, founder of the ISRAELI COMMITTEE AGAINST HOUSE DEMOLITIONS. (<http://palsolidarity.org/>).

Intifada Elite

The Intifada Elite, or the “young guard” as they are often called, arose in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES in the late 1970s and throughout the 1980s as a cadre who considered the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) their legitimate representative but who wanted to determine political resistance activities in the WEST BANK and GAZA for themselves. Veterans of Palestinian universities and Israeli prisons, they built Palestinian institutions of CIVIL SOCI-ETY IN THE WEST BANK AND GAZA with an eye toward mobilizing society against the OCCUPATION. They were the leaders of the First INTIFADA (1987–1993) and considered themselves future leaders of the Palestinian nationalist movement. However, when PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT and his Tunisian cadres (the “OLD GUARD”) came to Gaza from TUNIS (Tunisia) in 1994, the Old Guard dominated the political and security institutions and sidelined the local leaders. As a result there has been an ongoing struggle, especially within the FATAH party, over who would lead the Palestinian movement during both the OSLO PROCESS and the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. The struggle remains unresolved, but both the Old Guard (personified by MAHMUD ABBAS, the elected president of the Palestinian National Authority after Arafat’s death) as well as the Intifada Elite were dealt a severe setback in the January 2006 PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL ELECTIONS that brought an overwhelming majority of HAMAS members to the Legislative Council. Subsequently in 2007, Hamas expelled Fatah from Gaza and the Intifada Elite were severely humiliated.

Bibliography

- Asali, Ziad. Palestinian Politics in Crisis. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, 3 August 2004.
- Brown, Nathan. Palestinian Politics after the Oslo Accords: Resuming Arab Palestine. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Kershner, Isabel. “The Prison Guard: The Fatah Primaries Produced Clear Results, but Few Solutions.” The Jerusalem Report. December 2005.
- Robinson, Glenn E. “Strategic Insight: After Arafat.” 2002. www.globalsecurity.org/military/library/report/2002/020501-middleEast.htm.
- Shikaki, Khalil. “Life after Arafat.” Foreign Affairs. 10 November 2004.
- . “Strategic Consequences of Palestinian Divisions: Studying the Palestinian Young Guard.” Project No 102990. International Development Center. www.idrc.ca/en/ev-82845-201-1-DO\_TOPIC.html.
- Tamari, Salim. “Who Rules Palestine?” Journal of Palestinian Studies. 31:4 (2002).
- Usher, Graham. Dispatches from Palestine: The Rise and Fall of the Oslo Peace Process. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- . Palestine in Crisis. London: Pluto Press, 1995.

Intifadas: First and Second Compared

In the spring of 2005, in the midst of the Second Intifada, a prominent Palestinian political figure proclaimed in Ramallah that Palestinians should be proud that, in the last four decades of Israeli military OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP, hardly a day had passed without some form of resistance against that Occupation. However, two periods of concentrated resistance have transformed Palestinian society and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict: the First Intifada, which began in December 1987, and the Second, or AL-AQSA, INTIFADA, which began in September 2000.

The word intifada means “shaking off” or “throwing off,” and in both Intifadas the prime target was the Israeli military Occupation. Yet in their practices, the Israeli responses they precipitated, their effects on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict globally, and their local political consequences, the two Intifadas differ significantly. The first Palestinian Intifada was primarily a popular, nonviolent uprising, manifest in civil disobedience and some forms of Palestinian self-rule despite direct Israeli Occupation. It recentered the struggle inside historic Palestine, garnered new international support for the Palestinian cause, and brought Israel and the UNITED STATES into negotiations with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). The Second Intifada was highly militarized and more limited among the population because of Israeli counterinsurgency tactics and the presence of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). Occurring concurrently with the ill-defined but far-reaching US “War on Terror,” this Intifada produced no significant political gains for the Palestinians but instead gave Israel a pretext for intensifying its control over the Occupied Territories.

First Intifada: Roots and Organizational Structures

On 8 December 1987 four Palestinian workers in Gaza died after being hit by an Israeli vehicle. It was not the first time that traffic violence seemed to have a political dimension. Confrontations between Palestinians and Israeli soldiers and settlers in Gaza—including those involving cars—had been on the rise throughout 1987; however, this incident sparked widespread protests in Gaza that quickly spread to the West Bank. Palestinians inside Israel also held demonstrations. The protests only intensified a week later as ARIEL SHARON, then the Israeli minister of industry and trade, moved into an apartment in the Muslim Quarter of JERUSALEM’S OLD CITY, a residence established by the extremist Israeli settler movement in Jerusalem. It soon became clear that this new movement had the energy and will to sustain itself longer than any previous uprising. Moreover, unlike previous strikes and protests, which had been organized around specific goals such as easing conditions for political PRISONERS, the aim of this new uprising was broad—an end to the Occupation.

The Intifada received support from a social institutional structure that had been developing throughout the 1980s, almost as though in preparation for the uprising. Popular committees and service organizations had been building the capacity to serve Palestinian society, especially in times of crisis. The Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees epitomized the role CIVIL SOCIETY played in the First Intifada. Founded by Dr. MUSTAFA AL-BARGHUTHI in 1979, the union was a grassroots medical organization that sought to supplement the weak HEALTH CARE infrastructure that existed under the Occupation. In 1982 the organization saw 2,000 patients with its mobile clinics, in 1987 it saw 50,000, and in the first five months of the uprising the clinics served 28,000 people. In addition, women’s organizations, agricultural committees, and trade unions all mobilized to support the uprising.

The First Intifada also benefited from strong and unified local political leadership, especially in its early years. Before and during the Intifada, the PLO was based in TUNIS, Tunisia, and suffered from organizational problems like splintering. Unlike that in the DIASPORA, the PLO leadership in the Occupied Territories—where members were under constant threat of arrest or DEPORTATION—had resisted such factional splits. Despite its illegal status the PLO had representatives in every town and, indeed, in nearly every family. Local leaders coordinated to form the Unified National Leadership of the Uprising (UNLU), which consisted of members from the four major parties of the PLO: the mainstream FATAH and three leftist parties—the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP), and the Communist Party. In some places the Islamist groups, especially ISLAMIC JIHAD, also participated in the UNLU, but both Islamic Jihad and HAMAS tended to act as rivals to the UNLU. Within the UNLU each party had similar weight, in contrast to Fatah’s clear dominance in the Diaspora; this resulting plurality of voices also invigorated the uprising.

Struggle for an independent authority under Occupation. The First Intifada can be understood as a struggle for Palestinian de facto authority on the ground. The Israeli Occupation ruled by force, controlling every aspect of Palestinian life (for example, schools and other key institutions), co-opting a few key Palestinian leaders, establishing a network of COLLABORATORS, restricting the distribution of work and travel PERMITS, and using shootings, arrests, and CURFEWS to maintain order. During the Intifada the UNLU and other nationalist organizations aimed to establish an independent structure of authority that achieved legitimacy by popular assent. The UNLU asked people for demonstrations of allegiance, such as closing shops in the afternoon during strikes, even though Israeli soldiers punished those who participated. On certain days the UNLU asked Palestinians to have no contact with Israelis, and Palestinians refrained from going to their jobs inside Israel or applying for permits. Palestinians also refused to pay taxes to Israeli authorities. Generally Palestinians endeavored to implement the directives of the leadership, and PLO activists were on the ground to encourage—and sometimes enforce—compliance.

The Intifada was also a precarious assertion of self-sufficiency. Palestinians declined to buy the Israeli goods that flooded their market, and store-owners stopped stocking Israeli products. People planted Intifada gardens so they could enjoy fresh produce during extended curfews. Palestinian organizations were established to offer many of the services usually provided by a state, including health care, alternative schools, and MEDIA—albeit underground media.

With a few exceptions Israel maintained widely effective control over the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Palestinian defenses were barrels filled with concrete and burning tires, while the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) employed guns, jeeps, and tanks. On a few occasions towns were “re-occupied” by hundreds of soldiers. Generally, though, Israel had the power to determine whether or not schools would be open or permits would be granted. Nevertheless, an essential victory of the Intifada was that, despite Israeli control of events on the ground, their control over political meaning and legitimacy was far less secure. When Israel closed schools, for example, Palestinians held smaller sessions in homes and used the opportunity to provide popular EDUCATION on Palestinian history and society of the sort not allowed in the Israeli-controlled schools. When schools were open, youth took the opportunity to gather and stage protests.

Practices of resistance and suppression. The most famous image of the First Intifada is that of a child throwing stones. In these popular protests youths—both boys and girls—threw stones at Israeli soldiers in jeeps or tanks in their neighborhoods, towns, and cities. The figure of the child throwing stones encouraged its own poetics and crushing Israeli counterrevolutionary tactics. Palestinian poets such as MAHMUD DARWISH and Nizar Qabbani wrote paeans to the “children of stones.” Syrian poet Nizar Qabbani’s poem “Children Bearing Stones” begins with a verse that praises the new generation and disparages his own: “With stones in their hands, they defy the world/and come to us like good tidings./They burst with anger and love, and they fall/while we remain a herd of polar bears:/a body armored against weather.”

As the image of the young Palestinian stone thrower confronting the heavily armed Israeli soldier circulated around the world, it helped to transform the United States and European view of Palestinians and their situation under Occupation.

If slender arms were some of the primary instruments of the First Intifada, they were also some of its primary targets. A month and a half after the Intifada began, Israeli defense minister YITZHAK RABIN stated, “The first priority of the security forces is to prevent violent demonstrations with force, power and blows. . . . We will make it clear who is running the territories.” He went on to announce an Israeli policy of beating Palestinian protesters with clubs, fists, and rifle butts to break bones. Although the policy met with widespread global criticism, some in Israel defended it as a nonlethal method to quell the protests, noting that those with a broken arm would be debilitated for at least a month and a half. This aggressive stance resulted, according to the Swedish branch of Save the Children, in “23,600 to 29,900 children requir[ing] medical treatment for their beating injuries in the first two years of the Intifada, one-third of whom were children under the age of ten years old.” Curfews, rubber bullets, tear gas, and arrests were other important Israeli counterinsurgency tactics. According to the Israeli human rights organization B’TSELEM, from the beginning of the Intifada in December 1987 through the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS on 13 September 1993, which some consider the end of the First Intifada, 1,070 Palestinians were killed by Israeli security forces, including 237 children under the age of seventeen, and 54 Palestinians were killed by Israeli civilians. During the same period Palestinians killed 47 Israeli civilians and 43 Israeli security force personnel.

The Intifada had a distinct geography. Protests were strongest in Gaza and within the West Bank in outlying cities such as NABLUS, HEBRON, JENIN, Qalqilya, and Tulkarm, rather than in Jerusalem, Ramallah, and BETHLEHEM. Refugee camps were also centers of resistance, as they were to be in the Second Intifada.

Social dimensions of popular uprising. The First Intifada thrived in part because of the wide participation of people from different parts of society, especially women. Symbolically, mothers, wives, and sisters were the steadfast supporters of men on the front lines, but they were also essential to the practical workings of the Intifada. Women and girls participated alongside men and boys in throwing stones at military positions and often intervened to protect youths from beatings or arrests. Women and girls also acted as guards and lookouts and brought food to wanted men.

Just as important was the women's leadership of the many social activities that gave the Intifada its breadth. When government schools were closed, women provided political and academic education, and they helped institute income-generating and survival strategies such as the Intifada "victory gardens." Because women played such an important role in an uprising that was held in high esteem, women also began to claim extended freedom of movement and association that had formerly been lacking in parts of Palestinian society.

On the other hand, in Gaza the Intifada also strengthened conservative elements in Palestinian society. Before the Intifada, women's dress in Gaza, as elsewhere in Palestinian society, was varied and reflected class, geographic, religious, and generational identities. However, during the Intifada a newly energized Islamic movement encouraged all Muslim women to wear the hijab, or head scarf. Islamic activists wrote graffiti telling women to cover their heads, and children shouted and threw stones at women who refused to do so. After some time (many women said far too long), the UNLU denounced such attacks on women, arguing that these disputes only strengthened Israel. According to UNLU Communiqué 43 in Gaza, as cited by Reema Hammami, "We should value highly the role women have played in our society during these times in achieving our national goals and confronting the Occupation, and they should not be punished without cause. The phenomenon of harassing women contradicts the traditions and norms of our society as well as our accepted attitudes about women. At the same time, it denigrates the patriotism and humanity of each female citizen." The UNLU's statement swiftly changed norms on the street.

The Intifada upset other social hierarchies and values in Palestinian society as well. Upon their release the many young men who had served time in Israeli prisons received the kind of respect usually accorded only to their seniors. They were called upon to resolve internal conflicts and were considered leaders of their communities. This new status often came at a distinct cost, though. The beatings by Israeli soldiers and the detentions, which came to be rites of passage for young men, disrupted other normal aspects of growing up, including freedom of movement.

Underground media. During the First Intifada, Israel used both force and legal measures against Palestinian media. All of the major Palestinian daily newspapers repeatedly lost their licenses to distribute their papers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, sometimes for more than a month at a time. The Palestine Press Service, the main news agency in the Occupied Territories, was closed from March 1988 until at least March 1990. During the first full year of the Intifada (1988) at least forty-four Palestinian journalists were detained for two days or longer, and several were held under ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION for six months without charge. Other journalists were put under house arrest.

To bypass the intense Israeli censorship Palestinians found other means of communicating with the public, all dangerous, and many under the cover of night. Rumor, communiqués, and graffiti became the prime means of communication during the Intifada. The clandestine UNLU leadership issued bayans, or bulletins, distributed by teenagers and young men and women at night or at the mosque during Friday prayers, under risk of arrest or being shot. These communiqués included practical information such as the schedule of strike days, political assertions, and explications of internal social issues.

Graffiti was a more succinct medium for political speech. As with the communiqués, teenagers did the writing, with the leadership often deciding what to write. Graffiti was also posted at night, in dangerous conditions, because the army was constantly on patrol in many areas. Sometimes the army painted over the graffiti only hours later. As Julie Peteet writes, graffiti consisted of slogans and tags for political groups. Some were simple political formulations, like “1948 + 1967 = Palestine,” a clear phrase that soldiers might also understand, meaning that the legitimate state of Palestine consists of the LAND occupied in 1948 (i.e., Israel) and some of the land occupied in 1967 (i.e., the West Bank, Gaza Strip). Others were admonitions to fellow Palestinians: “Don’t paint over graffiti voluntarily. First Warning!” Still others were meant to memorialize those killed during resistance or to encourage resistance and fortitude: “Prison is for relaxation, deportation is for tourism, throwing stones is exercise—UNLU.” Most of the graffiti was written in Arabic, but occasionally English was also used.

Roots of the next uprising. During the First Intifada the struggle for international political recognition of Palestinian nationality, political rights, and the PLO continued in parallel with struggles for Palestinian autonomy on the streets of the Occupied Territories. The Intifada transformed the dominant global image of Palestinians from plane-hijacking terrorists to children using stones to resist one of the world’s most powerful armies in the streets and alleyways of their own cities, villages, and refugee camps. The First Intifada surely contributed to the nearly universal recognition of Palestinians as a national group whose representative was the PLO. The negotiations that started with the MADRID CONFERENCE of 1991 and led to the Oslo Accords of 1993 marked a Palestinian victory with regard to US and Israeli willingness to deal directly with the PLO.

The results of the Oslo Accords themselves were considerably more mixed. Among different Palestinian geographic constituencies, the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza seemed to have benefited most from the agreements, which appeared to put them on the path to statehood. The fates of the REFUGEES in LEBANON, SYRIA, and JORDAN and the status of Jerusalem were more tenuous, as the right of return to Israel and the future of Jerusalem were considered FINAL STATUS issues to be determined at the end of the process. During the OSLO PROCESS of 1993–2000 Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza developed educational, media, and private enterprises, albeit to a limited extent. However, the Israeli policies that prohibit residents of the Occupied Territories from entering Israel without a special permit (CLOSURE) kept many Palestinians from working inside Israel and caused an overall decline in the Palestinian ECONOMY. According to Sara Roy, when the Second Intifada began, less than 4 percent of Palestinians in the Occupied Territories had permission to enter Jerusalem. Despite considerable amounts of foreign assistance, by the year 2000, per capita income levels in the West Bank and Gaza were about 10 percent below what they had been before the Oslo agreements, according to Salem Ajluni, professor in the Department of Economics at Siena College of Loudonville, New York.

Meanwhile, despite the plethora of meetings that constituted the peace process, Palestinians could see scant political progress, while Israel expanded settlements substantially. Excluding the settlements in Jerusalem, from 1993 to 2000 the settler population of the West Bank increased from 110,000 to 195,000. Such settlement expansion necessarily led to extensive land expropriation. At the same time, there were repeated delays in negotiations over such critical issues as the boundaries of a Palestinian state, the status of Jerusalem, and Palestinian refugees’ right to return.

Moreover, the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) was not living up to Palestinian hopes. Dominated by Fatah, it was both corrupt and repressive toward its opponents, most notably Hamas. Although many outside analysts thought the Palestinians were on a path to statehood—with a president, the right to issue passports, and agreements that promised to address long-term issues—Palestinians inside the Occupied Territories could discern only too clearly that Israel continued to control BORDERS, movement, and resources. In the months before the Second Intifada broke out, there was talk that a new uprising would be against the PNA rather than Israel. However, when Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT refused to accept what Palestinians saw as a weak final status agreement at the US-hosted CAMP DAVID SUMMIT in the summer of 2000, Arafat’s support rose slightly, according to polls by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research.

Second Intifada: A New Uprising

As in the First Intifada, an Israeli act set off the second Palestinian uprising. On 28 September 2000, Israeli right-wing opposition party leader Ariel Sharon visited AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, the site of the AL-AQSA MOSQUE, one of Islam's most holy sites. His visit was seen as an act of deliberate provocation, especially because he brought with him a thousand Israeli police in riot gear. A military helicopter hovered above the scene as Palestinians tried to break through the lines of police forces, and conflict ensued between Palestinians and Israeli security forces. The next day Palestinians once again found police reinforcements at al-Haram ash-Sharif, and upon leaving the al-Aqsa Mosque after Friday noon prayers, they began protesting the police presence. The Israeli response was quick and strong. That day seven Palestinians were shot and killed and more than 200 injured by Israeli rubber bullets and live ammunition. When protests spread to Gaza, other places in the West Bank, and among Palestinians inside Israel, a new Intifada had begun.

Both Palestinians and outside observers called this uprising the al-Aqsa Intifada. Because the conflict had started at the important holy site, many Western analysts assumed that it had an essentially religious and Islamist character. Yet, the Islamic character of the Second Intifada cannot be presumed. By the beginning of the new century, Palestinian society, like much of the rest of the Middle East, was more religiously motivated than it had been fifteen years before. However, at the same time, many Palestinians warned that transforming the conflict into a religious one would be deleterious to the Palestinians' cause. For Palestinians the Second Intifada, like the first, was fundamentally focused on ending Israeli Occupation.

Yet Palestinians found that struggle more difficult this time. Before the First Intifada, Palestinian civil society had flourished, despite direct colonial rule and nebulous political leadership. In the years leading up to the Second Intifada the PNA, through its harsh restrictions on NGOs, opponents, and others, had diminished the space for Palestinian civil society. At the same time, as an administrative body, the PNA took over the role that the Israeli Occupation held during the First Intifada, limiting the scope and forms of resistance during the Second Intifada. Along with Israel's excessive use of force during the first months of the uprising, the PNA's role shaped the character of the uprising as one that actively included only a narrow segment of society. More fundamental than this, though, is that the PNA led, albeit indirectly, to the armed nature of the Second Intifada.

Shift in Palestinian tactics and Israeli responses. During the first several months of the Second Intifada, the uprising resembled its predecessor in several basic ways. It consisted primarily of unarmed demonstrators confronting Israeli soldiers and tanks at Israeli checkpoints with stones and occasionally Molotov cocktails. Their actions were met with Israeli use of considerable force but not with the full-blown military operations that would come later. In October 2000 alone, as Michele Esposito writes, the IDF estimated that it "fired between 850,000 and 1.3 million 5.56-bullets."

Even in this early period, however, the differences between the two uprisings were clear. During the Oslo period, Israeli troops were not stationed within PNA-administered areas (Area A), which included most cities of the West Bank and Gaza. As a result, unlike during the First Intifada, when protests against Israeli Occupation were geographically widespread, during the Second Intifada, clashes with Israeli troops were concentrated on the town borders, on settlement ROADS, and at the Israeli-controlled religious sites of Joseph's Tomb in Nablus and Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem. Also in the al-Aqsa Intifada's early months, analysts have argued, Israel exploited the presence of 40,000 armed Palestinian police and security forces to justify Israel's use of more extensive military force, even though the PNA forces were not at first extensively involved in the uprising. This resulted in a high death toll for this early period of the Intifada. By mid-February 2001 more than 350 Palestinians had been killed by Israeli soldiers and civilians, and nearly fifty Israelis were killed by Palestinians. Thus, even before the militarization of the Intifada, casualties were much higher than in the First Intifada.

As the Intifada continued, its most visible components were various types of armed resistance. Both because Palestinians viewed settlements as the paramount obstacle to a Palestinian state in the areas occupied in 1967 and because settlers had themselves carried out acts of aggression against Palestinians, Palestinian militants primarily targeted settlements and bypass roads that served settlements. In the first four years of the Intifada, 190 Israeli settlers were killed, according to the Journal of Palestine Studies. Palestinian militants also attacked Israeli military positions, including CHECKPOINTS: 295 members of the IDF and other Israeli security forces were killed in the first four years of the Intifada.

Yet the form of Palestinian resistance that received the most Western press coverage was undoubtedly the SUICIDE BOMBINGS, a relatively new instrument of Palestinian resistance that was first used after the Oslo Accords were signed. During the first four years of the al-Aqsa Intifada, fifty-four suicide bombings took place, killing at least 349 Israelis, among them both civilians and security forces. The bulk of these attacks were carried out by Hamas, Islamic Jihad, and the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, a splinter group from the Fatah party—with Hamas the most deadly and the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades the least. The leftist PFLP group carried out a handful of bombings as well.

The frequency of suicide bombings increased when Ariel Sharon, an intensely hated figure in Palestinian society because of his role in the SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE (in which hundreds of Palestinians were killed in Beirut refugee camps), became the Israeli prime minister on 7 March 2001. Sharon quickly intensified EHUD BARAK'S strategy to crush the Intifada. As Michelle Esposito explains, "while Barak had intermittently shelled residential areas, demolished buildings, razed Palestinian agricultural lands, and deployed tanks, helicopter gunships, and missiles against demonstrators, alongside the TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS, Sharon's resort to such measures became routine."

By the summer, Sharon put in place new policies to crush the Intifada, including curfews and large-scale closures and invasions of Palestinian cities. In the spring of 2002, Israeli incursions into Palestinian cities intensified, resulting in long periods of curfew in cities already strangled by checkpoints; massive detentions of boys and men, usually from the ages of sixteen to forty-five; and the deployment of one of the world's most powerful armies against lightly armed militants and a civilian population. Israeli use of F-16 fighter planes, Apache helicopters, and missiles in both assassination attempts and attacks in the middle of cities shocked even those Palestinians who had endured decades of military Occupation. By the end of 2002 the PNA security infrastructure was essentially destroyed, while Israel was consolidating control of territory through the construction of the separation BARRIER within the West Bank, undertaken with the stated goal of preventing bombers from entering Israel.

Around the same time, Palestinian leaders were rethinking strategies for resistance. Facing increasing international pressure and devastating Israeli military campaigns that reoccupied Palestinian cities, Palestinian prime minister MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen) called for a halt to the militarization of the Intifada, stating: "We should not expect the Intifada to bear more than it can take. We must ask where we are heading. . . . Whose blood will be cascading? Our children's blood, the blood of your children. . . . Every Jewish person in Israel now is with Sharon because they all believe that he protects them. I want to deprive him from this pretext." Though Palestinians often viewed Abbas as a minion of the United States, by this time in the Intifada many Palestinian analysts concurred that a less militarized popular Intifada would serve Palestinian interests better.

The Palestinian losses from only the first four years of the al-Aqsa Intifada speak to the differences between the First and Second Intifadas. According to the Palestinian human rights organization Health Development Information Project (HDIP), 3,334 Palestinians, including 621 children, were killed during this period of the Second Intifada. Israeli forces used snipers, helicopter gunfire, or missiles to assassinate 273 Palestinians, according to the Journal of Palestine Studies. Assassinations were controversial because they constituted extrajudicial killings of militants who instead might have been arrested and sent to trial, and because so many bystanders—at least 233—died in assassinations or assassination attempts. According to the IDF, 989 Israelis were killed during this time period. The Israeli human rights organization B'Tselem estimated that 3,700 houses were demolished either as punishment to the families of suspected militants, for security reasons, or because of lack of a permit. According to B'Tselem, 7,366 Palestinians were in detention at the four-year anniversary, a number that included 760 held in administrative detention without charge and 386 minors.

Civil society. Popular involvement in the Second Intifada was precluded both by a lack of the kinds of civil organizations that coordinated and sustained the First Intifada and by its militarization. These organizations, such as the popular and neighborhood committees, were crushed by Israeli counterinsurgency tactics at the end of the First Intifada and never fully recovered. Popular organizations were viewed with suspicion and suppressed by the PNA, as it reined in opposition. Moreover, the “state formation” processes of the Oslo period encouraged the growth of professional nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) funded by Western governments and foundations rather than popular organizations. Thus popular organizations faced many obstacles to direct participation in the uprising. According to Johnson and Kuttab, this time was characterized by a system of “‘authoritarian populism,’ which denies specific constituencies and publics in favor of ‘the people.’ The people or ‘the street’ give—or potentially withhold—vital legitimacy to the government, but have weak or absent roles in political interpretation, opinion formation, or, most importantly, decision making.”

Women in particular were disempowered by this political formation. In the First Intifada, popular participation and the need for widespread support gave women a significant role in the uprising. During the Oslo period the professionalization of civil society led to significant gains on issues such as domestic violence and women’s health, but it also caused a loss of power for much of the women’s movement. Moreover, during the Intifada itself the nature of resistance changed, and fewer women participated fully in the armed uprising (although a few did become suicide bombers). Indeed, not only most women but also all those unwilling or unable to carry arms were left at the periphery of the Second Intifada, except as victims of the Israeli siege and violence.

Leadership and authority. Although the First Intifada was mostly directed from inside by the UNLU, it did receive support from the PLO leadership in Tunis, especially from KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad, 1935–1988), who was assassinated at close range in his home in the presence of his wife and son by an Israeli commando team under the command of Ehud Barak on 16 April 1988. Despite its presence within the Occupied Territories, the PLO made little immediate impact on the Second Intifada. Throughout much of the al-Aqsa Intifada the role of the official Palestinian leadership was murky; at times PNA president and PLO chairman Arafat encouraged resistance—the level of popular support for the uprising made it impossible for him to withhold approval—yet sometimes he attempted to limit its extent. After all, he had to uphold the position he had assumed since the beginning of the Oslo Accords: that of a leader supported by the West and tolerated by Israel precisely because he could maintain order. In the first four months of the Intifada, Arafat addressed his people only once.

To the extent that the PNA leadership used the Intifada strategically, they attempted to bring Israel back to the negotiating table—essentially to establish a Palestinian state before more land was lost to settlements or before they lost leadership positions and the potential to capitalize on Palestinian statehood. Meanwhile, many leaders of the Second Intifada, both in Fatah’s oppositional elements and in Hamas, had come of age in the First Intifada and wanted to move beyond the Oslo agreements. In the coming years even some figures inside the PNA would talk about dissolving it and reconstituting the PLO, but that did not come to pass.

These internal fractures and the lack of clear goals limited Palestinian success in the Second Intifada. Although new political and military groups coalesced, there was never unity among these groups, nor was there always coordination between the political and military branches of the same organization. The absence of a central leadership that could narrate the conflict from a Palestinian perspective for influential audiences abroad was another key shortcoming of the al-Aqsa Intifada.

Economics of uprising. Both Intifadas had the goal of affecting the Israeli economy, but the economic strategies that had, at the very least, promoted cohesion among Palestinians during the First Intifada were more difficult to implement during the Second. While refusal to participate in the Israeli economy was an important tactic of the First Intifada, it was harder to separate the Palestinian and Israeli economies in the 2000s. Rather than Palestinians refusing to work inside Israel on special strike days, as in the First Intifada, Israel prevented Palestinians from working both inside Israel and within the West Bank on a massive scale every day by fortifying and vastly complicating the Israeli system of checkpoints and closures.

While Israel estimated that it sustained $12.5 billion in total economic losses for the first four years of Intifada (mostly from the tourist sector), the Palestinian economy suffered tremendously from Israeli military attacks, which destroyed much of the Palestinian infrastructure and the governmental and NGO capacity that had been developed in the 1990s. Through April 2002 alone the World Bank estimated that $650 million in damage had been done to the Palestinian infrastructure, including agricultural land, public buildings, private homes, and roads. According to World Bank statistics as analyzed by Ajluni, the Palestinian per capita gross national income decreased by 40 percent from 1999 to 2002.

In addition to its invasions, Israeli closures drastically constrained the Palestinian economy. In January 2004 the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs counted 763 barriers to movement in the West Bank, including 59 checkpoints, 10 partial checkpoints, 479 earth mounds, 75 trenches, 100 roadblocks, and 40 road gates. In a World Bank report entitled “Four Years—Intifada, Closures, and Palestinian Economic Crisis: An Assessment,” the third of its kind focusing on the issue of closure during the Intifada, the impact of Israel’s closure policy is summarized: “After almost four years of the conflict, average Palestinian incomes have declined by more than one-third, and one-quarter of the workforce is unemployed. Nearly one-half of all Palestinians live below the poverty line. More than 600,000 people (16% of the population) cannot afford even the basic necessities for subsistence. The precipitator of this economic crisis has been ‘closure,’ a multi-faceted system of restrictions on the movement of Palestinian people and goods, which the Government of Israel argues is essential to protect Israelis in Israel and in the settlements.” When construction of the separation Barrier began in 2002, many of these closure policies solidified further, more permanently cutting off Palestinians from agricultural land and severing villages from the metropolitan areas with which they had always been connected.

Role of the media. As in the First Intifada, media played a key role in spreading information within the Occupied Territories and communicating the Palestinians’ message abroad. During the Oslo period, Palestinian broadcast media had developed an extensive local radio and television network. However, the decline in advertising funds during the al-Aqsa Intifada presented tremendous financial challenges to what had been largely commercial ventures. Stations that had played music now provided urgent news updates, both from the streets just below the studios and from regions of the Occupied Territories made inaccessible by closure, and also broadcast practical information about checkpoints so residents could take alternate routes. When Israeli invasions reached their most critical stages, call-in radio shows helped listeners respond to emergencies.

Another major media development that shaped the Second Intifada was the presence of Arab satellite media stations such as Al-Jazeera and Al-Arabia. These networks produced high-quality news programs not subject to the censorship that existed during the First Intifada. With the spread of satellite television, Al-Jazeera became the top news source for Palestinians. For many months Palestinians essentially had their own news at the national or even local level, because these satellite media stations covered the Intifada in extensive detail and at great length.

At the same time, Israeli attacks directly affected Palestinian journalists and media institutions. Many private and PNA radio and television stations were destroyed during the Israeli invasions of 2002. The Israeli Government Press Office also began denying Palestinian journalists press cards, even if they had held them for years previously. Because they were not able to pass through checkpoints, they had limited ability to cover events in the Occupied Territories. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists, Israeli soldiers shot and killed seven journalists between 2000 and 2006, including five Palestinians, one Italian, and one British.

In comparison to Western media coverage of the First Intifada, coverage of the Second Intifada was less sympathetic to the Palestinians. In the First Intifada, Palestinians successfully portrayed themselves as a people struggling against the violent oppression of a much more powerful party. During the Second Intifada, Western media debates often focused, to the exclusion of nearly all else, on the suicide bombings against Israeli civilians, and Palestinians were grouped with other Muslim terrorists who were attacking Western democracies during the international “War on Terror.” The word occupation was excised from the media’s lexicon—especially in the United States. In human rights circles Israel was criticized for its 2002 invasion of Jenin, its massive military campaigns throughout the West Bank and Gaza, and its construction of the Barrier. But as long as Palestinians were carrying out suicide bombings, Western sympathies remained with Israel.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES; JERUSALEM; MEDIA; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS; OPERATION RAINBOW; OSLO ACCORDS; OSLO PROCESS; PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY; REFUGEES AND THE RIGHT OF RETURN; SUICIDE BOMBINGS

Bibliography

- Abdelhadi, Amer. "Surviving Siege Closure, and Curfew: The Story of a Radio Station in Nablus." Journal of Palestine Studies. 34:1 (2004).
- Ackerman, Seth. "Al-Aqsa Intifada and the U.S. Media." Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:2 (2001).
- Ajluni, Salem. "The Palestinian Economy and the Second Intifada." Journal of Palestine Studies. 32:3 (2003).
- Carey, Roane, ed. The New Intifada: Resisting Israel's Apartheid. London: Verso, 2001.
- Finkelstein, Norman. Beyond Chutzpah: On the Misuse of Anti-Semitism and the Abuse of History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Hammami, Rema, and Salim Tamari. "Anatomy of Another Rebellion." Middle East Report. 217 (2000).
- . "The Second Uprising: End or New Beginning?" Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:2 (2001).
- Johnson, Penny, and Eileen Kuttab. "Where Have All the Women (and Men) Gone? Reflections on Gender and the Second Palestinian Intifada." Feminist Review. 69:1 (2001).
- Johnson, Penny, Lee O'Brien, and Joost Hiltermann. "The West Bank Rises Up." Middle East Report. 152 (1988).
- Lockman, Zachary, and Joel Beinin, eds. Intifada: The Palestinian Uprising against Israeli Occupation. Boston: South End Press, 1989.
- Naji, Mahmoud, and Beshara Doumani. "Something Was in the Air All of 1987." Middle East Report. 152 (1988).
- Peteet, Julie. "Male Gender and Rituals of Resistance in the Palestinian Intifada: A Cultural Politics of Violence." In Imagined Masculinities: Male Identity and Culture in the Modern Middle East. Edited by Mai Ghoussoub and Emma Sinclair-Webb. London: Saqi Books, 2000.
- . "The Writing on the Walls: The Graffiti of the Intifada." Cultural Anthropology. 11:2 (1996).
- Roy, Sara. "Palestinian Society and Economy: The Continued Denial of Possibility." Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:4 (2001).
- Stork, Joe. "The Significance of Stones: Notes from the Seventh Month." Middle East Report. 154 (1988).
- Usher, Graham. "Facing Defeat: The Intifada Two Years On." Journal of Palestine Studies. 32:2 (2003).

—Amahl Bishara

Ir Amim: For an Equitable and Stable Jerusalem with an Agreed Political Future

Ir Amim ("City of Nations" or "City of Peoples") is an Israeli nonprofit, nonpartisan organization founded in order to actively engage in those issues impacting Israeli-Palestinian relations in JERUSALEM and the political future of the city. Ir Amim seeks to render Jerusalem a more viable and equitable city, while generating and promoting a more politically sustainable future.

Bearing in mind the symbolic and actual status of Jerusalem as a city of two peoples and three religions, as well as the city's pivotal role in reaching a political agreement, Ir Amim aspires to a stable Jerusalem, equitably shared by Palestinians and Israelis, a city that ensures the dignity and welfare of all its residents and that safeguards their holy places, as well as their historical and cultural heritages.

Ir Amim offers its knowledge and expertise concerning the political, economic, and social conditions in Jerusalem to a range of organizations and individuals, including governmental and municipal authorities who deal with the management of the city, and parties who examine the sustainability of possible political arrangements.

The organization has ongoing working relations with the Palestinian community in Jerusalem, as well as with key players in the international community active in Jerusalem issues.

Ir Amim operates a range of complementary activities, including:

- Monitoring and exposing critical developments in Jerusalem, and informing/alerting target audiences in Israel and in the world
- Legal advocacy aimed at halting or mitigating unilateral actions that harm the fabric of life in Jerusalem and create obstacles to reaching an agreed-upon future for the city and the region
- Policy advocacy with decision makers, both local and international
- Public outreach and media work aimed at raising awareness of developments in the city and understanding of their local and global significance, including study tours of East Jerusalem, professional seminars, and public events
- Strengthening, and working with, civil society organizations in East Jerusalem to advance a more equitable Jerusalem (<http://www.ir-amim.org.il/eng/>).

Iran

Speaking in October 2005 at a program called "A World without ZIONISM," Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad declared that the Jewish state must "vanish from the page of time" in order for a Palestinian state to be established. This type of bellicose anti-Israel statement, reminiscent of earlier speeches by the late Ayatollah Khomeini, had rarely been voiced by top Iranian officials since the 1979 revolution that toppled the Shah's regime. Fearful of mounting international outrage, and alarmed by additional hate-filled speeches by Ahmadinejad, the Iranian government backed off from the president's statement but reaffirmed Iran's continued commitment to a "just" resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The Ahmadinejad controversy, as this affair might be called, clearly represents a radical shift in Iranian views on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Until 1979, Iran was less interested in the internal dynamics of the conflict than in cultivating relations with the Jewish state in various fields. In what an Israeli scholar retrospectively called a "wondrous love affair," Iranian-Israeli relations were founded on a combination of strategic, economic, and ideological interests, many of them inimical both to the "progressive" Arab states and to the Palestinians in their benefits to Israel. The collapse of the Pahlavi monarchy in 1979 destroyed Iran's longtime alignment with Israel. Afterwards the Iranian state emerged as one of Israel's most outspoken rivals, periodically calling for the extinction of the "regime occupying JERUSALEM" and providing logistical, financial, and moral support to the Shiite-Lebanese HIZBALLAH and to various Palestinian movements and groups, most notably HAMAS.

From the time of the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948, the history of Iran's involvement in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has been fraught with many contradictions and tensions and has been heavily influenced by official state ideologies, making it hard to tell myth from reality. Because portions of this history have either been silenced or amplified, depending on the circumstances and on regime changes, the actual extent of Iranian involvement in the conflict remains unclear. This explains why the history of Iran's role in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has been shaped by perceptions no less than by factual sociopolitical processes.

From 1948 to 1979

From a Palestinian perspective the Israeli-Iranian connection as it evolved after 1948 was nothing short of shameful. In 1949, Israel received the tacit agreement of the Shah of Iran, Muhammad Reza Pahlavi (1919–1980), to use Iran as a transit point for the illegal IMMIGRATION of Iraqi Jews, in effect helping to tip the DEMOGRAPHIC balance in Palestine in Jewish favor. Equally detrimental to the Palestinians was the Shah's entanglement in Cold War rivalries, from the mid-1940s through the end of his rule, which drew him into a close strategic alliance with the state of Israel. The Shah sought UNITED STATES protection from his domestic opposition (mainly the Shi'ite clergy and the Tudeh Communist Party) as well as from the radical Arab states (especially Nasirite EGYPT). He hoped that an Iranian connection with the new state of Israel would help achieve that goal. For this reason, among others, the Shah agreed to join Israel in the "alliance of the periphery," originally conceived by Israel's founder DAVID BEN-GURION and his close advisors after the 1956 Suez War. Their basic idea was to forge alliances with the non-Arab states of the Middle East "periphery" (such as Iran, TURKEY, and even Ethiopia) in order to weaken the immediate circle of hostile (and pro-Soviet, pro-Palestinian) Arab states.

Iran and Israel drew closer together in the late 1950s, when the Shah sought the assistance of the MOSSAD (the Israeli intelligence agency) in building and administering the SAVAK, the Shah's notorious secret police. Then, in the 1960s and 1970s, the Shah undertook the responsibility for ensuring peace and stability in the Persian Gulf region, in accordance with the precepts of the Nixon Doctrine, formulated by US president RICHARD NIXON. As a result Iran became a crucial export market for Israeli arms, spending about US $500 million per year. These aspects of the Israeli-Iranian connection fueled Iranian popular hostility to Israel in the years leading to the 1979 revolution and afterwards.

Yet the Israeli-Iranian alliance under the Shah's regime was not limited to military, security, and intelligence matters. When the Shah embarked on his ambitious modernization programs (titled the "White Revolution") in the 1960s, he became increasingly dependent on Israeli expertise in the fields of technology, transportation, construction, and agriculture. Thus the initial security and intelligence alliances between the two countries expanded into sprawling business and financial initiatives that produced large profits for Israeli companies and entrepreneurs. To illustrate, Israeli trade with Iran, which was estimated at US $33 million in 1973–1974, sharply increased to US $250 million on the eve of the revolution in 1977–1978. Iran reciprocated by publicly selling oil to the Israelis, thereby standing out as one of the very few oil-producing countries willing to defy the Arab oil boycott.

The Shah's increasing ties with Israel always risked provoking domestic and external opposition forces. To survive these threats the Shah issued statements with a pro-Palestinian disposition. He was also able to claim that along with Egypt, IRAQ, LEBANON, SAUDI ARABIA, and Yemen, he had voted against the 1947 UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 181, which called for a partition of Palestine into Jewish and Arab states, and that he even endorsed the notion of "the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people." To overcome his internal opposition, the Shah had to conduct his relations with Israel secretly, consistently resisting an open relationship with the Jewish state. This explains why he refrained from granting Israel more than de facto recognition and why Israeli-Iranian relations under the Shah regime came to be known as a "discreet entente" and were likened to "true love that exists between two people outside of wedlock."

Israel's 1967 WAR with Egypt, JORDAN, and SYRIA once again showed the Shah to be a master at calculated ambivalence. In practice the spectacular Israeli victory enhanced Tehran's special relationship with Israel, for it neutralized the threat of Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR's Arab radicalism while also demonstrating that SOVIET power in the region rested on flimsy grounds. In his public pronouncements, however, the Shah prudently denounced the Israeli OCCUPATION of Arab territories and called for Israeli withdrawal from these territories.

A shift in the Shah's policy toward the Middle East conflict occurred after the 1973 OCTOBER WAR. Although the Shah was determined to continue his basic ties with Israel, several developments triggered by the war induced him to take a more evenhanded position toward the Arab states. Because the war created a favorable environment for security and stability in the Middle East by putting Egypt in a better position to make peace with Israel and by producing a coalition of relatively moderate forces within the Arab world, the Shah could afford to show greater sensitivity to the Palestinians' plight. He therefore sharpened his criticism of the enduring Israeli Occupation, voiced strong opposition to the Israeli annexation of Jerusalem, and upheld the RABAT SUMMIT declaration of 1974, which designated the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) as "the sole and legitimate" representative of the Palestinian people.

Because the Iran-Israel relationship was founded, among other things, on the conviction that the PLO belonged to the radical Arab forces in the Middle East, the significance of the Shah's overtures to the Palestinians after 1973 cannot be overstated. From the Palestinian standpoint, however, these overtures were too little, too late. They still remembered that the Shah had joined forces with Israel in 1970 to help the Hashemite King Husayn of Jordan save his throne by crushing the BLACK SEPTEMBER Palestinian uprising. In other words, the Shah could no longer hide his alignment with Israel and the Arab "reactionary" states merely by issuing pro-Palestinian declarations. By 1973, too, Palestinian guerrilla groups in Lebanon were already providing valuable political and military training to various Iranian dissidents who would topple the "Peacock Throne" in the 1979 revolution.

1979 and After

The collapse of the Pahlavi monarchy produced an abrupt severing of Iran's ties with Israel, in part because of Israel's close identification with the Shah's regime and his repressive policies. Another reason was revolutionary Iran's Islamist commitment to worldwide anticolonial struggles, for which the Palestinian struggle soon emerged as a primary emblem. Quite intentionally, the decision to break relations with Israel was announced on the same day that YASIR ARAFAT arrived in Tehran as the first foreign leader to visit Iran after the revolution. Arafat was received like a head of state and was handed the keys to the building formerly belonging to the Israeli diplomatic delegation in Tehran. It was reported that his meeting with Khomeini was so emotional "that Arafat, to his eternal credit, managed to extract a public smile from the Ayatollah—a historic breakthrough that has not been repeated since." Yet, soon after the establishment of an Islamic Republic, PLO-Iranian relations cooled substantially owing to ideological differences between the Islamist Iranian revolutionaries and the secularist PLO, as well as Arafat's open embrace of Saddam Hussein during the IRAN-IRAQ WAR.

Officially the Islamic Republic of Iran does not recognize Israel as a legitimate state. Government declarations and publications often depict Israel as imperialism's "illegitimate child," which was "implanted" in the Middle East to advance the foreign powers' "hegemonic designs." Occasionally Iranian political leaders also praised the goal of Palestinian radical groups to eradicate Israel and replace it with a "reconstructed" Arab and Islamic Palestine. However, behind the rhetoric is a different story. As details revealed by the Iran-Contra scandal in the mid-1980s illustrate, the Khomeini regime, which came to power in 1979, was willing to do business with Israel in ways reminiscent of the Shah's regime. At the outset of the Iran-Iraq War (1980) the Iranian military—already weakened and demoralized by successive revolutionary purges—suffered serious losses in combat with the well-equipped and well-organized Iraqi forces. Faced with a likelihood of military defeat, the Khomeini regime turned to Israel—its avowed enemy—to purchase arms and spare parts on a large scale. According to reliable estimates, Iranian arms deals with Israel after 1979 exceeded the US$3 billion mark, thus proving to be more lucrative for Israel than its pre-1979 sales to the Shah. This, however, did not prevent the Khomeini regime from parroting such slogans as "Today Iran, tomorrow Palestine."

Iranian views on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict have not been devoid of nuances and contradictions as well. The first era of the Islamic Revolution (1979–1989) produced some intense anti-Israeli, pro-Palestinian rhetoric, but it subsided considerably during the second term of Hashemi Rafsanjani's presidency in the 1990s and even more so during the era of reform spearheaded by President Muhammad Khatami (1997–2005). While not recognizing the legitimacy of Israel, Iranian officials stated that Iran was not opposed to Israel and the Palestinians working out a "mutually satisfactory" resolution to their conflict. Looking with trepidation at the US invasion of neighboring Afghanistan and Iraq and, hence, also at the likelihood of the "regime change" policy spilling over into Iran, in 2003 the Khatami government offered the GEORGE W. BUSH administration what was later described as a "grand bargain": in it, Iran offered to open its nuclear program to inspections, to halt its support for Hamas and ISLAMIC JIHAD in the Palestinian territories, to help disarm Hizbullah in Lebanon, and, last but not least, to move toward some sort of recognition of Israel. Significantly, the Bush government, which was at the time still deluded by the hubris caused by its initial military successes in Iraq, never bothered to reply.

Hard-line president Ahmadinejad, who was sworn into office in August 2005, reverted to the "principles" of the revolution's earlier years. His declarations that the Jewish state must "vanish from the page of history," or at least "be moved to Europe," and that the HOLOCAUST was a myth sparked a barrage of international criticism. Explanations of Ahmadinejad's anti-Israeli outlook varied from crude ANTI-SEMITISM, excessive zeal and political inexperience to a deliberate effort at self-aggrandizement. There is also speculation that the president's hate-filled speeches against Israel emanate from Shi'ite apocalyptic beliefs about the End of Time. It is difficult to say how much high-level support Ahmadinejad enjoys inside Iran for his outspoken views. Nevertheless, the controversy surrounding Ahmadinejad's alleged rigged victory at the 2009 presidential elections seems to suggest that his bases of support within the regime remain strong.

Whatever the case may be, Iranian reformists and conservatives seem to share many ideas about the nature and prospects of the OSLO and post-Oslo process. Indeed, Iranians of different political persuasions would agree that the peace process since the 1990s cannot produce a genuine peace, mainly because it fails to address the substantive issues of injustice—such as the rights of Palestinian REFUGEES from 1948, the Israeli annexation of Jerusalem, and the continued presence and expansion of Israeli SETTLEMENTS on occupied Palestinian territories. These reservations were evidenced in the wake of the ARAB LEAGUE Peace Plan of 2002, which was endorsed by the Arab states and by Iran.

Although official statements may help in deciphering Iranian views on Israeli Jews and Palestinians, they leave unanswered the thorny question of the actual extent of Iranian involvement in this conflict. A major charge against Iran by Israel and the United States in recent years is that it has provided planning, training, arming, and funding for some of the Palestinian terrorist attacks inside Israel and the Occupied Territories as well as for Hizbullah. According to these charges, the "collusion" between Iran and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) was greatly enhanced through the mediation of Iran's Lebanese-Shi'a "proxy," the Hizbullah, in the wake of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. This thesis seemed to be credible when in January 2002 the Israeli navy intercepted the Karine-A, a freighter carrying fifty tons of Iranian weapons to the PNA. The official Israeli version of the Karine-A affair was received with great skepticism by the Western and Arab MEDIA, but it was sufficient to convince the Bush administration to include Iran (together with Iraq and North Korea) in an "Axis of Evil."

There is little doubt that the Islamic Republic of Iran has provided financial, military, and moral support to such Palestinian groups as Hamas and Islamic Jihad and that it has used Hizbullah to gain a strategic foothold along Israel's northern border. Surely, it would be terribly foolish to discount Hamas's prime minister ISMAIL HANIYEH's own account of Iran as the Palestinians' "strategic depth." The question of Iran's involvement in the conflict is thus one of proportion. Indeed, it is plausible to argue that Iran's actual involvement in the conflict has been more limited in size and scope than Israel (or the United States) would have us believe. This discursive amplification of the Iranian menace may be traced to the Israeli post-9/11 strategy of imagining the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as an integral part of the "War on TERRORISM." By casting an ominous Iranian shadow over Palestinian realities and placing them within the matrix of the global war on terror, Israel has hoped to gain international consent for—and divert attention away from—its continued Occupation of Palestinian territories.

Few Iranians would disagree with the pro-Palestinian policy of the Iranian government since 1979. In recent years, however, support for the Palestinians has been driven less by ideological fervor than by a discourse on social justice. Indeed, there is clearly a growing consensus among politically aware Iranians that their interests reside not in the annihilation of Israel but in a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Clearly, too, there has been a decreasing interest among other Iranians in issues of the conflict. Although Iran is unlikely to disengage from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict anytime soon, it is fairly plausible to argue that present-day Iran contains multiple perspectives on the conflict, some of which do not support the notion of replacing Israel with Palestine by force. It is also patently clear that the Islamic Republic of Iran has more important concerns than to invest all of its energies and resources in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Bibliography

Amirhamadi, Hooshang, and Nader Entessar, eds. Iran and the Arab World. London: Macmillan, 1999.

- Bar Zohar, Michael. "Ben Gurion and the Policy of the Periphery." In Israel in the Middle East. Edited by Itamar Rabinovich and Jehuda Reinharz. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1984.
- Bialer, Uri. "The Iranian Connection in Israel's Foreign Policy, 1948–1951." Middle East Journal. 39 (Spring 1985).
- Chubin, Shahram, and Sepehr Zabih. The Foreign Relations of Iran: A Developing State in a Zone of Great-Power Conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974.
- El-Din Haseeb, Khair, ed. Arab-Iranian Relations. Beirut, Lebanon: Centre for Arab Unity Studies, 1998.
- Farhang, Mansur. "The Iran-Israel Connection." Arab Studies Quarterly. 11:1 (1989).
- Hatina, Meir. "Iran and the Palestinian Islamic Movement." Orient. 33:1 (1997).
- Hooglund, Eric. "Iranian Views of the Arab-Israeli Conflict." Journal of Palestine Studies. 25:1 (1995).
- Loannides, C. P. "The PLO and the Islamic Revolution in Iran." In The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Edited by A. R. Norton and M. H. Greenberg. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Menashri, David. "What Lies behind Ahmadi-Nejad's Hate Speech?" Tel Aviv Notes. 15 (21 December 2005).
- O'Ballance, Edgar. Islamic Fundamentalist Terrorism, 1979–1995: The Iranian Connection. New York: New York University Press, 1997.
- Parsi, Trita. Treacherous Alliance: The Secret Dealings of Israel, Iran, and the U.S. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2007.
- Ram, Haggai. Iranophobia: The Logic of an Israeli Obsession. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2009.
- . Reading Iran in Israel: The Self and the Other, Religion and Modernity. Tel Aviv: Hakibbutz Hameuchad, 2006.
- Ramazani, R. K. "Iran and the Arab-Israeli Conflict." Middle East Journal. 32 (Autumn 1978).
- . Iran's Foreign Policy, 1941–1973: A Study in Foreign Policy in Modernizing Nations. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1975.
- . Revolutionary Iran: Challenge and Response in the Middle East. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1988.
- Reches, Elie. "The Iranian Impact on the Islamic Jihad Movement in the Gaza Strip." In The Iranian Revolution and the Muslim World. Edited by David Menashri. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Sobhani, Sohrab. The Pragmatic Entente: Israeli-Iranian Relations, 1948–1988. New York and London: Praeger, 1989.
- Weinbaum, Marvin. "Iran and Israel: The Discreet Entente." Orbis. 18 (Winter 1975).

—Haggai Ram

Iran-Iraq War

Initiated by IRAQ in September 1980, the Iran-Iraq War lasted until August 1988. There were multiple sources of the conflict, including Shi'a IRAN's attempts to export radical Shi'ism to Iraqi Shi'ites, arming and training them to attempt an overthrow of the BA'ATHIST government. Other factors in the initiation of hostilities were Iraq's claim of sovereign rights in three islands in the Persian Gulf (Abu Musa, Greater Tumb, and Lesser Tumb) heretofore under Iranian sovereignty, a dispute over sovereign rights to the Shatt al-Arab waterway, both countries arming and encouraging Kurdish separatists in the other country, and Iraq's fomenting of separatism in Iran's provinces of Baluchistan and Khuzestan.

Iraqi president Saddam Husayn was secretly encouraged by US president JIMMY CARTER because Iran held fifty-two US embassy staff hostages and the UNITED STATES supplied weapons to Iraq throughout the war. However, during the RONALD REAGAN administration (1981–1989) the United States also sold weapons to Iran through Israel (with the profits used to fund the Nicaraguan Contras in their attempts to overthrow the leftist government). The war basically ended in a stalemate but with massive material and human losses on both sides; however, Iran is generally considered the loser.

Bibliography

- Hiro, Dilip. The Longest War: The Iran-Iraq Military Conflict, reprint ed. London: Routledge, 1990.
- Karsh, Efraim. The Iran-Iraq War 1980–1988. Oxford, UK: Osprey Publishing, 2002.
- Potter, Lawrence G., and Gary G. Sick, eds. Iran, Iraq, and the Legacies of War. Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
- Tarock, Adam. The Superpowers' Involvement in the Iran-Iraq War. Hauppauge, NY: Nova Science Publishers, 1998.

Iraq

In general, Jews in the Muslim world, including Iraq, had a more stable and less uncertain existence than their coreligionists in Europe. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in Aleppo and Damascus (SYRIA), Muslim-Jewish partnerships and joint business ventures were ordinary, and interreligious membership in occupational guilds was commonplace. According to the late Hanna Batatu, a professor of history at Georgetown University, in 1877, Jews were 25.7 percent of the population in Baghdad; in 1908, they were 35 percent (53,000 persons); and in 1947, with 77,400 persons, Jews constituted 15 percent of Baghdad's total population. In 1936 thirty-five of the thirty-nine sarrafs (bankers or money-lenders) of Baghdad were Jews, and in 1938–1939, Jews comprised over 43 percent of the members of the Baghdad Chamber of Commerce and seven of its twenty-five “first-class” members.

The Jews of Iraq (apart from those in Kurdistan) were profoundly Arabized; not only did they speak Arabic but they also partook of the cultural heritage shared by those around them. (Hebrew was only used in the liturgy.) Iraqi Jews belonged to all social classes, from the poor (the majority) to the very rich; from sophisticated professionals to illiterates and beggars; and, along another spectrum, from the deeply pious and learned to secular agnostics and leftists—indeed, Jews featured prominently in the ranks of the Iraqi Communist Party. Until the middle of the twentieth century, Iraqi Jews were profoundly integrated into Iraqi society at all levels, most prominently as pioneers in journalism and in Arabic fiction and especially as artists, musicians, and singers. In addition they were fairly homogeneous, apart from a few SEPHARDIC Jews who had settled in Iraq after the expulsions from Spain and a handful of Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe who had arrived in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

When ZIONISM emerged in Europe at the end of the nineteenth century, it had little appeal to most Middle East Jews. There were some exceptions, particularly in Morocco and Yemen, where some members of the Jewish communities had traditionally been attracted to a mystical form of Zionism, and among Jews who had emigrated more recently from Eastern Europe to various parts of the Arab world. Contributing to the lack of interest in Zionism among Middle Eastern Jews was the influence of the ALLIANCE ISRAÉLITE UNIVERSELLE, which was decidedly pro-assimilation. A philanthropic association founded in Paris in 1860, the alliance established a network of schools from Casablanca to Tehran (in Baghdad, its first school for boys was founded in 1865 and its first for girls in 1893). Although not explicitly anti-Zionist, the Alliance regarded Zionism as at best something of a distraction from its own mission, which was to educate Middle Eastern Jews in modern European, particularly French, culture.

Immediately after World War I both Iraqi Muslims and Iraqi Jews were almost equally indifferent toward Palestine.

In addition the notion of a common world view shared by most Middle Eastern townspeople, regardless of sectarian affiliation, generally held good until the ARAB REVOLT of 1936–1939 against the BRITISH MANDATE and Zionist settlement of Palestine. News of the political demonstration and British reprisals at the WESTERN WALL in JERUSALEM in 1928 and 1929 attracted the attention of political activists in Baghdad, but it was not until the 1936 Palestinian general strike against the British that the conflict in Palestine began to be noticed more generally by both Iraqis and the rest of the population in the region, and its broader implications for Middle Eastern Jewry began to be more widely perceived by both Jews and non-Jews.

In The Palestine Conflict in the History of Modern Iraq, 1928–1948, Michael Eppel notes that the Palestinian conflict was a favorite means for arousing anti-British sentiment in Iraq by opposition politicians for much of the 1930s and 1940s. (Iraq, too, was under a British mandate.) Pan-Arab propaganda circulated widely in Iraq in those decades, and in 1935 a pan-Arab club, al-Muthanna, was established in Baghdad, which acted as the headquarters for the Committee for the Defense of Palestine, founded after the outbreak of the general strike. The committee attempted to stir up anti-Jewish as well as anti-British feeling in newspapers and through mass meetings and demonstrations. Britain's staunchest political ally in Iraq, Nuri al Sa'id (1888–1958), who served fourteen terms as prime minister both during the Mandate and during the British-imposed monarchy, went to Palestine offering to mediate between the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE and the JEWISH AGENCY, arguing that Jewish IMMIGRATION would need to be halted or drastically reduced. These and other efforts failed and the strike ended in October, but over the next three years Iraq was probably the principal supplier of arms to the Palestinians, who also recruited volunteers from Iraq (in small numbers) willing to fight against the Zionists.

By this time their contacts in Arab nationalist circles made British diplomats in Baghdad increasingly aware of the damage that Britain's role in the Palestinian-Zionist conflict was causing to Anglo-Iraqi relations. How much sympathy the Iraqi public had for the Palestinian cause is a matter of much speculation, but influential members of the Baghdad embassy gradually came to believe the committee's statements that the question of Palestine was the major stumbling block preventing Arab-British cooperation in the Middle East. However, an October 1936 coup in Iraq brought to power a government that was much less concerned with Arab nationalism and far more inclined toward the notion of "Iraq for the Iraqis." The government even received a semi-official delegation from the Jewish Agency in February 1937, although nationalist pressure obliged it to reject the partition plan proposed by Lord Peel (of the PEEL COMMISSION) in July 1937, which would have divided Palestine into Arab and Jewish states.

For much of the period between 1937 and the events leading up to the creation of Israel in 1948, pan-Arab nationalism was a dominant ideology in Iraqi government circles, although, given that Shi'a and Kurds greatly outnumbered Sunnis, the extent of popular commitment to pan-Arabism or to the Palestine cause is very much open to question. In general, Iraqi governments between the late 1930s and the end of World War II employed much rhetoric about the Palestinian cause, but their support consisted mainly of small quantities of arms and calls for the cessation of Jewish immigration. After 1936 there were sporadic attacks on individual Jews and Jewish clubs in Baghdad, which were widely deplored. In October 1939, a few months after the MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, the mufti of Jerusalem arrived in Iraq from his exile in LEBANON after being deported by the British.

Generally regarded as the beginning of the end of the Jewish presence in Iraq after some 3,000 years, the Farhud, a major outbreak of anti-Jewish violence, took place from 29 May to 1 June 1941 after British forces put down a serious revolt against Britain and its local Iraqi allies. The crisis started when the Iraqi government that came to power in April 1941 announced that without British concessions on Palestine it would reject Britain's demands that Iraq immediately sever its relations with Italy and that British troops would not be allowed to cross Iraqi territory in the fight for North Africa. In May 1941 the British army attacked Iraq and within some four weeks defeated its army and proceeded to march on Baghdad. In the meantime, order broke down in Baghdad and approximately 150 to 180 Jews were killed—an extraordinary and uncharacteristic outburst of violence that was as much anti-British as anti-Jewish.

In addition many Muslims were killed while attempting to protect their Jewish neighbors, a fact that speaks to the state of intercommunal relations at that time. After an inquiry in July there were numerous arrests, and three men were executed for their participation in the violence.

Jewish Exodus of the Early 1950s

The British occupation of Iraq allowed Zionist emissaries to work fairly freely in Iraq, although their first efforts were unsuccessful. Between 1939 and 1945, according to the Jewish Agency (which might have been inclined to inflate rather than reduce the figures), slightly over 1,500 Jews left Iraq for Palestine (a further 65 left between 1946 and 1948). The Farhud was seen by most Jews as well as non-Jews in Iraq as an aberration rather than as a symptom of some deeper malaise. Especially in the last year of World War II and in the years immediately after it, the nationalist movement became more inclusive and less pan-Arab. An Anti-Zionist League, which consisted mostly but not entirely of Jews, was established in 1946 by the Iraqi Communist Party and produced a newspaper, al-'Usba, which sold 6,000 copies a day. In the 1980s one prominent member of the Iraqi community commented, "If Israel had not been established nothing would have happened to the Iraqi Jews. They could have stayed as any other religious minority."

In 1948 the events in Palestine changed everything in Iraq. Tensions gradually rose after 1945 as a result of high levels of inflation, poor harvests, and unemployment, creating an opposition that was increasingly restive, organized, and more hostile toward the local status quo. Two events then acted as catalysts to an already unstable situation. UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTION 181, which called for a partition of Palestine into Jewish and Arab states, greatly inflamed public opinion throughout the Arab world. At a meeting of the ARAB LEAGUE in December the Iraqi prime minister called for military intervention in Palestine, although this was widely understood as promising Iraqi assistance to Jordanian king Abdullah's plan to annex the parts of Palestine assigned to the Palestinian Arabs. Also in 1948 the government of Iraq attempted to conclude a revision of Iraq's treaty with Britain, which led to extensive rioting and considerable loss of life, and ultimately to the nonratification of the new treaty. Rumors were spread that the disturbances were the work of "Communists and Zionists."

In response to these and other pressures the government formally joined the Arab-Israeli 1948 WAR, dispatching 3,000 troops that entered Transjordan on 15 May 1948 and came under the command of King Abdullah. The Iraqi forces played a purely defensive role and kept well away from the areas of Palestine assigned to the Jewish state. In fact the Iraqi performance in the Palestinian theater, like that of other Arab states, was utterly dismal, and as time went on (especially after the overthrow of the monarchy in 1958), the failure of Iraq in 1948 became part of the litany of complaints of the "revolutionary" nationalist officers.

As a result of the Arab defeat and Palestinian dispossession, the situation of Iraqi Jews became increasingly precarious. They became targets of suspicion as a potential fifth column, a situation that served to distract attention from the government's own inadequacies. This degenerated to discriminatory legislation that barred Jews from public service, and life was made increasingly difficult for them. In September 1948 the prominent Jewish businessman Shafiq Adas was tried on trumped-up charges and subsequently executed. Although there were widespread protests from non-Jewish Iraqis, the Iraqi Jewish community could not overlook the event and consequently became increasingly fearful and more susceptible to the arguments of Zionist emissaries. At the same time, Jewish newspapers in Britain and the UNITED STATES circulated inaccurate reports that atrocities were routinely being committed against Iraqi Jews.

Over the next few years a combination of Iraqi government measures and Zionist agitation made the position of Iraqi Jews untenable. First, various denaturalization laws were passed. (These may be related to the British government's consideration of a number of impractical TRANSFER schemes, in which Palestinian REFUGEES would move to Iraq in exchange for equal numbers of Iraqi Jews emigrating to Israel.) In 1951 another law froze the assets of Iraqi Jews who wished to leave, although substantial amounts of capital were still being transferred out of the country to Israel. It is worth mentioning that Israel was desperate to find new immigrants, since the supply of potential settlers from Europe, the United States, and the British Commonwealth seemed to be drying up. However, the majority of Jews leaving other Arab countries in the late 1940s and early 1950s preferred to emigrate to FRANCE (99 percent of Algerian Jews, 60 percent of Tunisian Jews) or to the Americas rather than to Israel.

In late 1950 and early 1951 a number of bombs exploded in cafés, synagogues, businesses, and other venues owned or frequented by Jews in Baghdad, and the incidents were accompanied by leaflets urging the Jews to return to their “natural homeland.” Some speculated that the incidents were the work of Zionist agents provocateurs, as Wilbur Eveland, a CIA official in Baghdad at the time, concluded. Nevertheless, these incidents profoundly shook the confidence of the community, and by the middle of 1951 some 105,000 Iraqi Jews had left Iraq for Israel. Six years later (in 1957) the Iraqi census recorded a Jewish population of only 4,906.

Internal Crises and Black September 1970

After the departure of the Jews, Israel and the Palestine question tended to receive considerably less attention in Iraq until the fall of the unpopular and repressive monarchy in July 1958. Led by ‘Abd al-Karim Qasim (president 1958–1963), the coup was heralded as the beginning of a new era, marked the definite overthrow of British tutelage, and enabled the revolutionary government to strike out in several new directions. Qasim’s rule also coincided with the beginnings of a major increase in Iraqi oil revenues, which continued with the price explosion of the early 1970s. Qasim himself was more of an “Iraqist” than an Arab nationalist, and although the achievements of his contemporary, JAMAL ‘ABD AL-NASIR, were undoubtedly admired in Iraq, there was no organized Nasirite movement there. Under Qasim and his nationalist and (from 1968) BA’ATHIST successors, Iraq tilted toward the SOVIET UNION, which remained its principal ally and arms supplier until it drew closer to the United States in the 1980s.

Iraq was too preoccupied by its own internal crises to engage with revolutionary Palestinian groups, such as the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) (which originally derived most of its material support from Algeria and Syria). Iraq did not even take part in the 1967 WAR, although some 17,000 Iraqi troops arrived in JORDAN after the fighting had ceased. But after the Ba’athist party seizure of power in 1968, the Iraqi government quickly aligned itself with those Arab states and factions of the PLO that rejected attempts to find a peaceful solution and in particular UN RESOLUTION 242, which called for Israel’s withdrawal from the Arab territories occupied since June 1967 in exchange for an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In the course of 1969, several show trials were held in Baghdad, in the first of which fourteen people, including nine Jews, were hanged in public for allegedly spying for Israel. In 1969 the Ba’ath also founded its own small Palestinian faction, the ARAB LIBERATION FRONT (ALF), and began to fund GEORGE HABASH and the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP) until 1990. On the other hand, Iraq’s relations with FATAH, the mainstream Palestinian organization headed by YASIR ARAFAT, were often strained.

In the late summer of 1970, there was a heated exchange between EGYPT and Iraq, during which Iraq committed itself to “the goal of liberating the whole of Palestine [by means of] ARMED STRUGGLE,” while after 1971, Egypt was looking for a negotiated settlement. In August 1970, Iraqi-Syrian animosity led to the dissolution of the “Eastern Command,” the two-year-old alliance among Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and Iraq, which left the Salah al-Din forces (the Iraqi contingent) as the only sizable unit of regular troops in the region. Earlier in 1970 various Palestinian guerrilla organizations had clashed more or less seriously with the Jordanian army, largely because Jordan’s King Husayn was unwilling to allow the guerrillas to operate freely in and from Jordan and was increasingly concerned about the challenge they posed to his authority. When the Jordanian army began an all-out attack on the Palestinian guerrillas early in September, Iraq took the side of the Palestinians and pledged its support. However, not only did Iraqi troops play no part in the fighting, but their inaction substantially facilitated the victory of the Jordanian army over the Palestinians in the 1970 BLACK SEPTEMBER conflict.

Iraqi Invasion of Kuwait

During the early 1970s the Iraqi Ba’ath came to acquire a reputation as a maverick in Middle Eastern politics, based partly on its adoption of a consistently hard-line rhetoric against Israel in the Arab-Israeli conflict, its close relations with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries between 1969 and 1973, and its militant declarations on Arab socialism and unity. Although there was a wide gulf between rhetoric and reality, the regime’s more extreme declarations convinced both its more moderate neighbors and much of the rest of the world that Iraq intended to pursue genuinely revolutionary policies. As a result Iraq found itself either feared or loathed by most states in the region. In October 1974, for example, Iraq and Libya supported the formation of a PALESTINE REJECTION FRONT, consisting of the PFLP, the PFLP–GENERAL COMMAND, the ALF, and the PALESTINE POPULAR STRUGGLE FRONT, all of which supported the liberation of all of Palestine, opposed a two-state solution, and had thus broken with the mainstream PLO and in particular Fatah, which was willing to engage in negotiations with Israel.

In some ways the Ba'athist adoption of the extremist Palestinian line was both necessary and inevitable. It had inherited a degree of militancy from its predecessors and it also had to differentiate itself from another Ba'athist regime in Syria with which, apart from a brief reconciliation in 1979, it was in almost continuous conflict. In this situation the Iraqi Ba'athists were more or less forced to try to outdo the Syrians in appearing more truly Arab and more truly nationalist—or perhaps more truly Ba'athist. In fact, Iraq was isolated in the Arab world, as shown by its refusal to participate in the post-1973 War oil embargo and its failure to send representatives to the Arab summit in Algiers in November 1973. Championing the most extremist Palestinian groups was then part of the larger canvas.

After Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's visit to Jerusalem in November 1977 and the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS a year later, Iraq became a leading member of the anti-Egypt coalition. Early in 1978 the Iraq-backed ALF assassinated SA'ID HAMAMI, the PLO representative in London, and Iraq broke off relations with Fatah and declared that the PLO should only receive funds from a source that had been approved by the anti-Egypt coalition. Iraq also backed the extreme anti-PLO Palestinian faction led by ABU NIDAL, whose men assassinated Israeli diplomats and moderate Palestinians in foreign capitals. In March 1979 the much-heralded rift between Egypt and the rest of the Arab world (which Iraq saw itself as leading) was formalized at a conference in Baghdad. Behind the extravagant verbiage, however, the sanctions were modest and mainly symbolic, amounting largely to the expulsion of Egypt from the Arab League and the transfer of the League's headquarters from Cairo to TUNIS.

During the 1980s, Iraq was largely preoccupied with its war against IRAN, which increased its dependence on the West and the West's conservative Arab allies, including Jordan and Egypt.

Meanwhile, in order to prevent Iraq from developing nuclear weapons, the Israeli air force destroyed Iraq's nuclear reactor in June 1981; although there was widespread international condemnation, much of the world was happy to see an end to Iraq's nuclear weapons program. The exigencies of the war with Iran prevented Iraq from taking any hostile action against Israel. For the benefit of his Arab audiences, Iraqi president Saddam Husayn attempted to link Iran and Zionism against the forces of the "noble Iraqi army" and to portray the war with Iran as "an international Zionist conspiracy aimed not only at Iraq but at the entire region."

In the end Iraq's need for weapons and the US desire to ensure Iran's defeat led to increasingly warm US-Iraqi relations, which led to, at Washington's insistence, a considerable reduction of Iraq's belligerent rhetoric on the Arab-Israeli conflict. On 27 October 1984, Iraq resumed full diplomatic relations with the United States (which had been broken off in October 1967), although this was largely a formality because links between the two countries had been close for a number of years. A few days later, in an interview with the Lebanese daily al-Nahar, Iraq foreign minister Tariq 'Aziz declared that his country would support "any just, honorable and lasting settlement between the Arab states and Israel," and went on to say that "Iraq does not consider itself to be a direct party to the conflict because Israel is not occupying any part of Iraqi soil." Given Iraq's previous record of failing to match its actions to its vigorous denunciations, such pronouncements were perhaps less remarkable than they may have seemed.

After the end of the war with Iran the political geography of the Middle East continued to change dramatically. In November 1988, a year after the outbreak of the INTIFADA in the Occupied Territories, the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (the PLO parliament) declared its willingness to negotiate with Israel on the basis of UN RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338. The Israeli government under YITZHAK SHAMIR showed no interest, however, and there was no real support in Washington either, despite some encouragement from JAMES BAKER, the US secretary of state. Because the PLO received no immediate benefits from its various concessions, there was widespread resentment at its evident inability to deliver.

Increasingly, following the precipitous decline in oil prices beginning in 1985, the PLO could no longer rely on its traditional financiers—the Gulf States (and their Palestinian populations). Imprudently, as events were to prove, Arafat turned to Baghdad for financing, where Husayn was making increasingly strident verbal attacks on Israel. Several of Arafat's colleagues, especially SALAH KHALAF, were intensely suspicious of the Iraqi regime, which had since the 1970s sheltered Abu Nidal. In addition they feared the opprobrium of being associated with Husayn, whose viciousness and brutality were well-known. At the end of June 1990, two incidents perpetrated by the Palestine Liberation Front (one of which was the ACHILLE LAURO hijacking) led President GEORGE H. W. BUSH to suspend what had been a rather halfhearted UNITED STATES–PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION DIALOGUE. Some six weeks later the forces of Saddam Husayn, by now the principal financier of the PLO, invaded KUWAIT.

The PLO now faced a dilemma, because condemning the invasion could mean the loss of Iraqi financial and political support and could hurt the 300,000 Palestinians living in Iraq. Furthermore, its efforts to improve relations with the United States (and thus eventually with Israel) had come to nothing, and its rival party, HAMAS, was gaining support daily in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Arafat put himself forward as a mediator between Iraq and Kuwait, but he was brushed aside by the Saudis. His support for Saddam Husayn and Iraq in the GULF WAR won him tremendous support among Palestinians but made the PLO a pariah in much of the Arab world. Kuwait, after all, had supported the Palestinians more or less consistently since the 1950s, and its prosperous Palestinian community had also been a major source of PLO support. Given the PLO's traditional policy of nonalignment, it seems that Arafat could have avoided supporting Iraq. Furthermore, given the possibility that Husayn would threaten SAUDI ARABIA as well as occupy Kuwait, it was inconceivable that the United States would stand idly by.

In many ways it is surprising that the Palestinian leadership survived the Gulf War crisis virtually intact, and, in an important sense, the 1991 peace talks at the MADRID CONFERENCE meant that the dialogue with Washington was resumed, although officially without the PLO. Almost equally incredibly, and in spite of his launching Scud missiles against Israel, Saddam Husayn also survived. For the time being, however, the straitened circumstances within which the Iraqi regime was obliged to operate meant that it could no longer make any impact on Israeli or Palestinian affairs between its defeat in 1991 and its overthrow in 2003.

Bibliography

- Abdullah, Thabit A. J. A Short History of Iraq. Edinburgh: Pearson Longman, 2003.
- Batatu, Hanna. The Old Social Classes and the Revolutionary Movements of Iraq: A Study of Iraq's Old Landed Classes and Its Communists, Ba'athists and Free Officers. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- Cobban, Helena. "The Palestinians and the Iraqi Invasion of Kuwait." In The Middle East after Iraq's Invasion of Kuwait. Edited by Robert O. Freedman. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1993.
- Eppel, Michael. The Palestine Conflict in the History of Modern Iraq: The Dynamics of Involvement, 1928–1948. London: Frank Cass, 1994.
- Eveland, Wilbur. Ropes of Sand: America's Failure in the Middle East. New York: W. W. Norton, 1980.
- Farouk-Sluglett, Marion, and Peter Sluglett. Iraq since 1958: From Revolution to Dictatorship, 3rd ed. London: I. B. Tauris, 2001.
- Marcus, Abraham. The Middle East on the Eve of Modernity: Aleppo in the Eighteenth Century. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.
- Rafeq, Abdul-Karim. "Craft Organization, Work Ethics and the Strains of Change in Ottoman Syria." Journal of the American Oriental Society. 111 (1991).
- Rodrigue, Aron. French Jews, Turkish Jews: The Alliance Israélite Universelle and the Politics of Jewish Schooling in Turkey, 1860–1925. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press for the Institute of Palestine Studies, 1997.
- Shiblak, Abbas. Iraqi Jews: A History of Mass Exodus. London: Saqi Books, 2005.
- Tripp, Charles. "Iraq and the 1948 War: Mirror of Iraq's Disorder." In The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948. Edited by Eugene L. Rogan and Avi Shlaim. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Yaniv, Avner. "Israel Faces Iraq: The Politics of Confrontation." In Iraq's Road to War. Edited by Amatzia Baram and Barry Rubin. London: Macmillan, 1993.

—Peter Sluglett

Irgun Tzeva'i Le'umi

The Irgun Tzeva'i Le'umi (National Military Organization, or Etzel, or Irgun) was a militant Zionist group that operated from 1931 to 1948 in BRITISH MANDATE Palestine. The British authorities classified Etzel as a TERRORIST organization, although others considered it a liberation movement. Its political association with Revisionist ZIONISM, its leadership by MENAHEM BEGIN, and Begin's transformation of the Irgun into the HERUT PARTY make it a predecessor to modern Israel's right-wing LIKUD PARTY coalition.

Etzel was founded in 1931 by Avraham Tehomi after he had assumed leadership over the district of JERUSALEM and after a political/ideological split within the HAGANA, the Jewish underground military organization, which Tehomi and his associates considered too restrained in its relations with the Arabs and the British. Throughout its history Etzel advocated a more aggressive and offensive use of force than did the Hagana against both the Palestinians and the British. In 1936 Tehomi and VLADIMIR (ZE'EV) JABOTINSKY, the founder of Revisionist Zionism, signed an agreement in Paris under which Tehomi was officially commander of the Irgun Tzeva'i Le'umi and president of the NEW ZIONIST ORGANIZATION (Jabotinsky's political movement). Etzel's ideology was based on Jabotinsky's premises that every Jew had the right to enter Palestine, that only force would deter the Arabs, and that only Jewish arms would ensure the Jewish state.

From 1931 to 1937, Etzel was a small, renegade group that undertook random attacks against Palestinian targets. However, during the years of the ARAB REVOLT (1936–1939) against the British Occupation and Zionist SETTLEMENTS, Etzel became more organized and better armed and intensified its assaults, especially against the Palestinians. Following the killing of five Jews at kibbutz Kiryat Anavim on 9 November 1937, Etzel launched a series of attacks that lasted until the beginning of World War II, in which more than 250 Palestinian civilians were killed—a ratio of 50 Arabs killed for each Jew.

The first phase ended when the original group broke up in April 1937. About half the members, including Tehomi, returned to the Hagana, while the rest reasserted the independent existence of Etzel. In the following period the most serious attacks against Palestinians coincided roughly with Etzel's campaign to facilitate illegal IMMIGRATION of European Jews in defiance of British limitations on immigration. After the 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER declared Britain's opposition to Palestine becoming a Jewish state, Etzel concentrated its attacks on the British, whose restrictions on immigration it vehemently opposed and vowed to ignore.

Etzel declared a truce, from 1940 to 1943, suspended operations against the British, and supported Allied efforts against the Nazis by enlisting its members in British forces, including the Jewish Brigade. However, a small group within Etzel, led by AVRAHAM STERN, continued to fight the British and formed an independent group, the LOHAMEI HERUT YISRAEL (Stern Group or LEHI). In 1941, Etzel leader David Raziel volunteered for a dangerous mission in IRAQ to assassinate AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, but was killed by a German bomber before the operation could be finished.

In February 1944, under the new leadership of Menahem Begin, Etzel resumed hostilities against the British by attacks against prominent symbols of the British administration, including blowing up the British military, police, and civil headquarters in the KING DAVID HOTEL in Jerusalem and attacking the British prison in ACRE. Although these operations were largely successful, several Etzel operatives were captured, convicted, and hanged, but they refused to accept the jurisdiction of the British courts and consequently refused to defend themselves. Eventually British authorities arrested many of its members, including Shlomo Ben Yosef, who was hanged for shooting at an Arab bus. The Etzel leadership responded to the executions by hanging two British sergeants, which effectively brought the executions by the British to an end.

Following the assassination of British diplomat LORD MOYNE on 6 November 1944 by Stern Group members Eliyahu Bet-Zuri and Eliyahu Hakim under the leadership of YITZHAK SHAMIR, the Yishuv and the JEWISH AGENCY initiated a "hunting season" on both Etzel and LEHI, resulting in the arrest of some 1,000 members of both organizations. The British deported 251 to camps in Africa, although many others were released and continued their activities against the British and the Palestinians.

From about October 1945 until July 1946, Etzel was part of an alliance with the Hagana and the LEHI called the JEWISH RESISTANCE MOVEMENT, which was organized to fight British restrictions on Jewish immigration. This alliance ended after the bombing of the King David Hotel. From July 1946 until June 1948, Etzel fought informally with Hagana forces against the British and the Palestinians, in particular engaging in campaigns to drive Palestinians from the country. Etzel's participation in alleged war crimes at DEIR YASIN on 9 April 1948, where some 100 unarmed Palestinian men, women, and children were killed, has been widely discussed and documented. However, their largest single operation was a successful assault on JAFFA (an Arab city in northern Palestine) during April and May 1948, in which Etzel forced some 70,000 Palestinian residents to flee. In 1948, Etzel was formally dissolved and its members integrated into the newly formed Israel Defense Forces. This integration coincided with Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION'S sinking of the Altalena, a ship full of fighters that Etzel had recruited and arms it had acquired in Europe. After its dissolution as a commando group Etzel became a political party, the Herut, led by Begin.

See also WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Begin, Menahem. The Revolt: Story of the Irgun. New York: Schuman, 1951.
- Bell, J. Bowyer. Terror out of Zion: The Fight for Israeli Independence, reprint ed. New York: Transaction Publishers, 1996.
- Ben-Ami, Yitshaq. Years of Wrath, Days of Glory: Memoirs from the Irgun, 2nd ed. New York: Shengold Publishers, 1996.
- Lapid, Yehuda. Besieged: Memoirs of an Irgun Fighter. Jerusalem: S. M. Milberg Foundation, 1948.
- Sachar, Howard. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 2nd ed. New York: Knopf, 1996.
- Tavin, Eli, and Yonah Alexander. Psychological Warfare and Propaganda: Irgun Documentation. New York: S. R. Books, 1982.

"Iron Fist" Policy

The First INTIFADA was grounded in civil disobedience and resistance, including mass demonstrations, tax revolts, boycotts of Israeli goods, planting "victory gardens" to become self-sufficient in food production, throwing stones, commercial strikes, burning tires, and setting petrol bombs. The Israeli government, however, chose to meet the uprising with brutal force.

Shortly after the eruption of the Intifada in December 1987, the New York Times reported on Israeli defense minister YITZHAK RABIN'S announcement of new aspects to his "iron fist" policy (first articulated in August 1985, signaling the Israeli government's intention to increase repressive policies in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES), including a policy of "broken bones" that involved "troops [being] sent into homes to break the hands of Arab youth so they could not throw stones" and "might, power and beatings" to suppress the Palestinian uprising.

The New York Times printed a letter from several prominent American Jewish leaders, including Irving Howe, Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, Henry Rosovsky, and Michael Walzer condemning Rabin's policy. It read in part: "We read with shame reports of house-to-house beatings of hundreds of people, leading to broken bones and hospitalization of the aged and children. . . . Let our fellow American Jews speak up in friendly but firm voices, and tell Israeli leaders that we disagree profoundly with the 'iron fist' policy."

Rabin defended Israel's use of force, saying, "We will fight with all our power against any element that tries by violence to upset our full control over Judea, Samaria [WEST BANK] and the GAZA STRIP. . . . The supreme responsibility of our government is to fight the violence in the territories and to use all the means at our disposal to do that. We will do that, and we will succeed." Prime Minister YITZHAK SHAMIR later said, "our task now is to re-create the barrier of fear between Palestinians and the Israeli military and once again put the fear of death into the Arabs of the areas so as to deter them from attacking us anymore."

The iron fist policy in the First Intifada included a shoot-to-kill order against unarmed Palestinian demonstrators (including children), mass detentions without trial, ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, DEPORTATIONS, beatings, as well as the systematic policy of crushing the hand and arm bones of young Palestinian men and boys who threw stones at Israeli soldiers and tanks. Amnesty International's annual report for 1987, published one month after the uprising began, criticized Israel's methods: "In December at least twenty-three Palestinian demonstrators in the West Bank and Gaza were shot and killed by soldiers. . . . There were also severe and indiscriminate beatings of demonstrators and hundreds were summarily tried and imprisoned. There was an increase in reports of ill-treatment and torture of detainees by members of the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCE and the General Security Service [SHIN BET]. Political activists, including prisoners of conscience, continued to be administratively detained or restricted to towns or villages or imprisoned in violation of their right to freedom of expression."

See also INTIFADAS

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Annual Report, 1987. London: Amnesty International, 1988.
- Bassiouni, M. Cherif, and Louise Cainkar. The Palestinian Intifada, December 9, 1987–December 8, 1988: A Record of Israeli Repression. Chicago: The Database Project on Palestinian Human Rights, 1989.
- Al-Haq. Punishing a Nation: Human Rights Violations during the Palestinian Uprising, December 1987–December 1988. Jerusalem: Al-Haq—Law in the Service of Man, the West Bank Affiliate of the International Commission of Jurists, 1988.
- Hunter, F. Robert. The Palestinian Uprising. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.
- Kaye, Joe. The Hidden History of the Israeli Conflict. New York: New York Society for Ethical Culture, 2004.
- Lockman, Zachary, and Joel Benin, eds. Intifada: The Palestinian Uprising against Israeli Occupation. Boston: South End Press, 1989.
- McDowall, David. Palestine and Israel: The Uprising and Beyond. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.
- Mezvinsky, Norton, ed. Report: Human Rights Violations during the Palestinian Uprising, 1988–1989. Tel Aviv: The Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights, 1990.
- Nassar, Jamal, and Roger Heacock, eds. Intifada: Palestine at the Crossroads. New York: Praeger, 1990.
- Schiff, Ze'ev, and Ehud Ya'ari. Intifada: The Palestinian Uprising—Israel's Third Front. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1990.
- Shipler, David K. "U.S. Jews Torn over Arab Beatings." New York Times. 26 January 1988.

Iron Wall

See ARAB STATE PEACE OVERTURES, 1949–PRESENT

Islamic Conference, 1931

On 7 December 1931 the Pan-Islamic Congress met in JERUSALEM, attended by representatives from twenty-two Islamic countries and prominent personalities from throughout the Arab world. The conference was hosted by the Jerusalem mufti AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, who opened it with a passionate speech on the importance of Palestine, the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, and the AL-AQSA MOSQUE to the Islamic world. The conference condemned ZIONISM, British policy in Palestine, and Jewish IMMIGRATION and LAND purchases at the expense of the Palestinians. Additionally, it started an Islamic league in Jerusalem, agreed to boycott all Jewish products, established an agricultural company in Palestine to save Muslim lands, and promoted the idea of reviving Jerusalem's role as an educational center, issuing a call to establish a university carrying the name of "al-Aqsa." The British saw to it that none of these objectives were realized.

Bibliography

- Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Milton-Edwards, Beverley. Islamic Politics in Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 1999.

Islamic Fundamentalism

See HAMAS; ISLAMIC JIHAD MOVEMENT

Islamic Jihad Movement

The Islamic Jihad Movement (harakat al-jihad al-islami) was established in 1980 in GAZA as a splinter group of the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD society. Islamic Jihad encourages the forceful seizure of government power as the main instrument in the "re-Islamization"—increase in Islamic consciousness and practice—of state and society. The movement shares this perspective with another Palestinian Islamist group, the Islamic Liberation Party, hisbul-tahrir al-islami, founded in 1952 by the Palestinian teacher and judge Sheikh Taqiuddeen al-Nabhani. (Nabhani died in 1979, leaving behind branches of his party throughout the Middle East and elsewhere.)

Along with both the Islamic Liberation Party and the better-known Islamic Resistance Movement (HAMAS), founded in Gaza in 1987 by the Palestinian wing of the Muslim Brotherhood, Islamic Jihad has as its ultimate goal an Islamic state based on two pillars. The first pillar is shari'a (Islamic law), and the second is the Islamization of the people through a variety of means, from giving classes in mosques, universities, and homes to demanding the application of shari'a through various institutions. The first leader of Islamic Jihad, Dr. Fathi al-Sheqaqi, was assassinated (allegedly by Israel) in Malta on 26 October 1995. His successor is Abdallah Shalah, who resides in Damascus, SYRIA.

Islamic Jihad developed in response to both the secular nationalism represented by the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and the particular Islamic trend represented by the Muslim Brothers, which Jihad saw as passive and ineffective, especially in the struggle against Israel. Islamic Jihad's vigorous challenge against the Brothers' inaction arose from within the ranks of the Brotherhood itself. The radicalization that led to the birth of Islamic Jihad was made possible in part by the revolution in electronic MEDIA, by means of which a younger generation throughout the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES gained access to the worldwide Islamic revival. Palestinians were fully aware of the militancy of the various Islamic groups that confronted the Sadat regime in EGYPT in the 1970s and eventually assassinated him in 1981. They were aware of the brutal suppression of the Islamic movement in Syria, culminating in the destruction of the city of Hama in 1982. They followed with keen interest the triumph of the Islamic Revolution in IRAN in 1979, the dramatic activities of HIZBULLAH (from the early 1980s to the present) in southern LEBANON, and the victory of the mujahedeen in Afghanistan in 1992.

The Islamic Jihad Movement believes that an understanding of Arab history is important to guide its vision. In the eyes of Islamic Jihad, Palestine has come to its present condition because of the role of non-Islamic Arab leaders. Members of Islamic Jihad believe that the Arab nationalist movement was "a[n] illegitimate son of the Western assault [imperialism, colonialism] against the Islamic nation" and that the Zionist movement began "as an authentic part of the attack." They believe that the Arab defeats were the result of a catastrophe in modern Arab thought: "The disaster in our ideas came before the disaster in our land . . . and was the prelude, and the long term cause for the disaster in the land." The Zionist presence in Palestine is seen as an "embodiment of the modern Western challenge and evidence that this challenge still exists." For Islamic Jihad, the natural reaction to the challenge lies in the trend toward Islamization, which it sees as playing a vital role in restoring the psychological balance of both the Islamic community and the educated individual Muslim. In this view, the Islamic solution—an Islamic state led by a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad—will be the ultimate, divinely guided solution to the ongoing ideological and political struggle. ARMED STRUGGLE, or jihad, is the means to achieve the liberation of Palestine, a necessary step if the Islamic nation is to rise and regain its place in history.

This perspective appeared in sharp contrast to the quietism and inner piety preached by the traditional leadership of the Muslim Brotherhood. As one young leader of Islamic Jihad put it, "Contrary to the Brothers, our priority is not indoctrinating the masses, but direct action"—by which he meant resisting the Israeli OCCUPATION in Palestine. The difference in outlook resulted in the split in the Brotherhood and the birth of Islamic Jihad. The movement believes that its role is to fill the vacuum left by both the Palestinian nationalists who have abandoned Islam and the Muslim Brothers, who have failed to take the lead in the struggle against Israel.

Islamic Jihad thus differs from Hamas in significant ways. Rather than calling for overthrow of the government by force, Hamas advocates the gradual Islamization of the masses through da'wa (proselytizing), until the people themselves call for an Islamic government. Hamas, then, is more a mass-based, grassroots movement that works from the bottom up. In contrast, Islamic Jihad can be understood as an "elitist" top-down group. It targets the elites, the most educated sectors of society; thus Islamic Jihad is also far smaller and has far fewer supporters or activists than Hamas and lacks Hamas's wide social network and mass appeal, which makes sense, since Islamic Jihad's strategy is not one of proselytization but of "direct action" (described below). Finally, the Islamic Jihad Movement differs from Hamas and other Islamic organizations in its internal organization. Inspired by the guerrilla warfare groups of Latin America, the movement avoids the hierarchical structure of the Muslim Brothers, instead building a network of small separate cells of five or six members that work independent of a central command. Islamic Jihad members are known for their organization, strict discipline, and absolute secrecy, especially with regard to armed activities. The majority of Jihad followers, who are recruited in mosques and university campuses and through social activities, come from modest social origins and live in poor neighborhoods and refugee camps, mainly in the Gaza Strip. There are, however, active branches in East JERUSALEM and in other cities and towns throughout the WEST BANK.

Like most other Islamic movements, Islamic Jihad takes its principles from Islamic shari'a and considers the liberation of Palestine its central task. However, in the case of Islamic Jihad, this orientation took the form of a campaign of violent attacks on Israeli settlers and army personnel in the mid-1980s. Its members eschewed attacks on Israeli civilians until an Israeli Jewish settler massacred twenty-nine Palestinians at the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in HEBRON in 1994. Thereafter Islamic Jihad created the Jerusalem Brigades, which first undertook SUICIDE BOMBINGS and other militant operations against Israeli civilians. Ironically, just as the PLO abandoned armed struggle, it was taken up by the Islamic forces. Islamic Jihad conducted a series of dramatic suicide bombings against the Israeli Occupation, which undoubtedly gave the Islamic movement as a whole a credibility it had hitherto lacked. With these actions, a framework was created for those who wanted violent confrontation with the enemy. Significantly, although the stated motivation for these actions was Islamic, the nature of the operations was the same as those that had been carried out by nationalist groups in the not-so-distant past. Islamist thinkers close to Hamas carried this observation further and asserted the existence of intimate ties between FATAH and Islamic Jihad—a relationship that is seen as a combination of radical nationalism (Fatah) and religious radicalism. Accordingly, Islamic Jihad resurrected the historical figure of SHAYKH 'IZZ AL-DIN AL-QASSAM, a religious guerrilla assassinated by the British in 1935, to symbolize the integration of Islam and nationalism, giving his name to the local mosque in Gaza over which the Islamic Jihad had earlier clashed with the Brothers. (Of note, when Hamas established its own military wing in 1992, it named its military organization the IZZ-AL-DIN AL-QASSAM BRIGADES.)

The Muslim Brotherhood originally reacted to Islamic Jihad as an alien organization, accusing it of obstructing the Islamic movement and of aligning with the secularists against the Brothers. Later, however, many sources, including some now inside Hamas itself, agreed that Islamic Jihad's daring military operations, in particular those of 1986 and 1987, pulled the rug out from under the relatively inactive Brothers. For example, on 15 October 1986, a cell of Islamic Jihad attacked a crowd of Israeli soldiers celebrating their graduation in front of the WESTERN WALL in Jerusalem, with the result that a tenth of the soldiers were injured or killed. In May 1987, in another daring act, a group of six Jihad prisoners managed to free themselves from the most heavily guarded Israeli prison in Gaza. The PRISONERS opened fire on the Israeli soldiers, killing four of them. Some attribute the beginning of the 1987 INTIFADA to this incident.

Although Islamic Jihad rejects any form of recognition of Israel and opposes all proposed political settlements, it does not consider itself an alternative to the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). Nor does it oppose the PLO's role in bringing all Palestinian factions under its umbrella. However, it does object to what it calls the "ideological confusion" of the PLO and its factions, which it blames for "abandoning Islam as the nation's belief." It regards the PLO's goal of establishing a secular democratic state in Palestine (later changed to the TWO-STATE SOLUTION) as incompatible with the historical Islamic view of a state ruled according to Islamic law. Accordingly, Islamic Jihad refused to join any Palestinian ELECTION organized under the banner of the OSLO ACCORDS of 1993 and declined to participate in the first PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL election of 1996, the presidential election of 2005, or the legislative election of 2006. The movement also refused to participate in a government led by Hamas, which won the 2006 legislative elections. Since it did not recognize the elections as legitimate, Jihad also does not recognize the Hamas government in Gaza as legitimate, but unlike Fatah, Jihad does not fight against it.

On the other hand, Islamic Jihad has avoided clashes with other Palestinian organizations, whether Islamic or secular, believing that Palestine—all of Palestine—is and should be the common element unifying all political forces working for its liberation. It believes that any ideological or political disagreement with another political group should be solved solely through dialogue and that violence should be directed only against the enemies of the nation. In spite of this principled stand, when Fatah undertook a witch hunt against Hamas members and supporters in the West Bank after the takeover of power in Gaza by the Hamas-led government, among the Islamist militants arrested were many members of Islamic Jihad.

Bibliography

- Abu Amr, Ziad. Al-Haraka al-Islamiyya fil-dhaffa al-gharbiya wa qita' ghazza (The Islamic Movement in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip). Acre, Israel: Dar-al-Aswar, 1989.
- . Islamic Fundamentalism in the West Bank and Gaza. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1994.
- Abul-Omrein, Khaled. Hamas: Harakat al-moqawameh al-islameyya fi falastine (Hamas: The Islamic Resistance Movement in Palestine). Cairo: Marqaz

- al-Hadara al-'Arabeyya/The Arab Civilization Centre, 2000.
- Awad, Saleh. Al-Intifada al-Thawra, Dirassat al-Dakhel (Intifada the Revolution, Study the Interior). Tunis, Tunisia: Al-Zaytona, 1989.
- Al-Bargothi, Eyad. Al-Islam al-seyassi fi falastine: Ma wara al-seyassa (Political Islam in Palestine: Beyond Politics). Jerusalem: Jerusalem Media and Communication Centre, 2000.
- Budeiri, Musa. "Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness." Majallat al-Dirasat al-Filastiniya. 35 (Summer 1998).
- Hirst, David. The Gun and the Olive Branch. New York: D. Appleton, 1977.
- Hroub, Khaled. Hamas: Al-Fekr wal momarasa al-siyasiyya (Hamas: Ideology and Political Practice). Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1996.
- Karam, Azza. Women, Islamisms and the State: Contemporary Feminisms in Egypt. London: Macmillan Press, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Kayyali, Abdel-Wahab. Palestine: A Modern History. London: Croom Helm, 1979.
- Al-Mojahed*. Bulletin Nos. 146, 147, 148, 149 (Palestine). June–July 1992.
- Mostapha, Halah. 'Al-Jihad al-'Islami fil-Ard al-Muhtalla' (The Islamic Jihad in the Occupied Territories). Qadaya Fikriyya (Cairo). 6 (April 1988).
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- Rekhes, Elie. "The Rise of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad." Jerusalem Post. 21 October 1987.
- Sayigh, Rosemary. "Femmes Palestiniennes: Une histoire en quête d'historiens." Revue d'études Palestiniennes. 23 (Spring 1987).
- Swedenburg, Ted. "The Role of the Palestinian Peasantry in the Great Revolt (1936–1939)." In Islam, Politics and Social Movements. Edited by Edmund Burke and Ira Lapidus. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, 1988.
- Zu'aytir, Akram. Yawmiyyat Akram Zu'aytir: Al-haraka al-wataniyya al-Filastiniyya 1935–1939. Beirut: Palestine Studies Association, 1980.

—Islah Jad

Islamic Resistance Movement

See HAMAS

Israel Defense Forces

The Israel Defense Forces (IDF) (Tsva HaHagana LeYisrael) are Israel's military forces, comprising the Israeli army, air force, and sea corps.

The IDF was founded on 26 May 1948 after the establishment of the state of Israel "to protect the inhabitants of Israel and to combat all forms of TERRORISM which threaten the daily life." The IDF succeeded the HAGANA (in particular, its operational branch, the PALMAH) as the permanent army of the Jewish state. It was also joined by former elements of the Jewish Brigade that had fought under the British flag during World War II.

After the establishment of the IDF the two Jewish underground organizations, the ETZEL and LEHI, joined with the IDF in a loose confederation, but were allowed to operate independently of the IDF in some sectors until the end of the 1948 WAR. After the war these two organizations were disbanded and their members integrated into the IDF. The modern IDF came into existence during the period from 1949 to 1956 by experience gained through border conflicts involving Palestinian INFILTRATION and massive Israeli reprisal raids on neighboring Arab states from where the infiltrators presumably had come. The 1956 SINAI/SUEZ WAR was its first state-to-state war since 1948. From 1956 to 1966 the IDF engaged in numerous massive retaliations in response to organized Palestinian guerrilla raids. It used this time to purchase new equipment and to become a formidable professional fighting force. Also during this period Israel developed its nuclear capability with the assistance of FRANCE. By 1967, after these developments the IDF increasingly emerged as one of the most powerful and modern military forces in the world, recognized by many as "the Modern Sparta."

Regular Service

National military service is mandated by law for Jewish and Druze men and Jewish women over the age of eighteen, although exceptions can be made on religious, physical, or psychological grounds. Men serve three years, and women serve two. Women may volunteer for combat duty, in which case they also serve three years. However, in 2007 the IDF produced statistics showing that nearly 28 percent of Jewish males avoided conscription.

Druze and Circassians as well as Jews are subject to mandatory conscription. In proportion to their numbers the Druze achieve much higher levels in the Israeli army than other groups of soldiers. Nevertheless, some Druze still charge that discrimination continues, such as exclusion from the air force. Israel maintains that the official low security classification for all Druze, formerly an obstacle to advancement in the military, has been abolished for some time.

There is a long-standing government policy of encouraging BEDOUIN to volunteer and offering them various inducements. Given the extreme poverty among the Bedouin, a military career offers one of the few means of social advancement available. But Bedouin complain that they do not receive the package of benefits that other conscripts do, and as a result few volunteer.

PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL are prohibited from serving in the IDF. This can be seen as a form of institutionalized discrimination, because Palestinian citizens are thus denied the plethora of advantages that accrue from military service, including housing subsidies and tuition assistance, among many others. Reservists (all men are required to serve one month each year in the IDF until they are forty-three or forty-five) receive special grants amounting to NIS (new Israeli shekels) 4,000 per year, reductions in Transportation Ministry licenses, scholarships and tuition assistance, housing loans on preferential terms, and priority in civil service appointments.

Border Guard Service

Some IDF soldiers serve their mandatory military service in the Mishmar HaGvul (Magav), the Israel Border Police—a section of the Israel Police. Once these soldiers complete their IDF combat training, they undergo additional counterterrorism and border guard training. They are then assigned to any one of the Israeli Border Police units around the country and in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, where they are often more feared than regular IDF soldiers.

General Staff

All branches of the IDF are subordinate to a single General Staff. The chief of the General Staff (Ramailcal) is the only serving officer with the rank of lieutenant general (Ray Aluf'). The chief of the General Staff reports directly to the defense minister and indirectly to the prime minister of Israel and the cabinet. Chiefs of staff are formally appointed by the cabinet, based on the defense minister's recommendation, for three years, but the government can vote to extend their service to four or even five years.

IDF Weapons

The IDF possesses state-of-the-art weapons and computer systems. Some are US-made (with some equipment being modified for IDF use), such as the M4A1 assault rifle, the F-15 Eagle, the F-16 Fighting Falcon jet fighters, and the AH-64 Apache and AH-1 Cobra attack helicopters. Israel also has developed its own independent armaments industry, which has developed weapons and vehicles such as the Merkava battle tank series, the Kfir fighter aircraft, and various small arms such as the Galil and Tavor assault rifles and the Uzi submachine gun.

The IDF also has several large internal research and development departments, and it purchases many technologies produced by companies in the Israeli security industry, such as IAI, IMI, Elbit, El-Op. Rafael, Soltam, and dozens of smaller firms. Many of these weapons and command-and-control systems have been battle tested in Israel's numerous military engagements, resulting in mutually beneficial relationships, with the IDF getting tailor-made solutions and the industry gaining experience and reputation. Israel also exports weapons to a variety of countries.

Wars

The IDF has fought numerous wars—conventional, guerrilla, and the war of OCCUPATION, since its inception, losing none: (1) 1948 War; (2) 1948–1967 infiltration and massive retaliation; (3) 1956 invasion of EGYPT—SINAI/SUEZ WAR; (4) 1967 WAR against Egypt, JORDAN, and SYRIA; (5) 1967–1970 WAR OF ATTRITION with Egypt; (6) post-1967 Occupation; (7) 1967–1982 raids and massive retaliation in LEBANON; (8) 1971–1973 Palestinian-Israeli “Shadow War”; (9) 1973 War between Israel and Egypt and Syria; (10) 1978 Israel's first invasion of Lebanon; (11) 1982 Israel's war in Lebanon (LEBANON WAR); (12) 1983–2000 Israeli and HIZBULLAH conflict in Lebanon (indirectly against Syria); (13) 1987–1993 INTIFADA; (14) 2000–2009 AL-AQSA INTIFADA; (15) 2006 invasion of GAZA (OPERATION RAINBOW); (16) 2006 war against Hizbullah in Lebanon; (17) 2008–2009 war in Gaza (OPERATION CAST LEAD).

The Occupied Territories

The IDF alone controls the Occupied Territories. As a result it has numerous permanent military bases in the WEST BANK (and did in Gaza until ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT of 2005). Legal proceedings in the territories take place entirely in the ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM, and Military Orders (MOs) constitute the laws of the land.

The IDF has become embroiled in a number of controversies over its human rights record and has been increasingly accused by such organizations as B'TSELEM, Amnesty International, and Human Rights Watch of violating the laws of war in the Occupied Territories. Its supporters dismiss such accusations as biased, stating that they do not take into account the reality of the threats on the ground faced by the IDF.

Counterterrorism Tactics

Because of the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the tactics of the IDF have been adapted for low-intensity warfare, primarily against Palestinian militants operating from within densely populated civilian territory.

Targeted Assassinations

The IDF employs a strategy of “focused foiling,” or TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS, of suspected Palestinian terrorists, asserting that the killing of suspected criminals and terrorists prevents potential acts of violence and TERRORISM, such as SUICIDE BOMBINGS. The legitimacy of these assassinations is a major cause of debate in the international community, with many questioning their legality.

House Demolitions

The IDF has historically used a strategy of HOUSE DEMOLITIONS for a variety of reasons; for example, a house may be demolished if it is built without a PERMIT or as punishment for criminal activity of one family member. Recently the IDF has been demolishing the houses of family members of suicide bombers, originally claiming that this was a very effective means of preventing such attacks. Critics, including human rights organizations, contend that this effectiveness of prevention does not legitimize excessive force.

Both Palestinian and international organizations maintain that the use of bulldozers for demolishing civilian structures is illegal. In one well-known incident, INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY MOVEMENT activist Rachel Corrie was killed when she tried to obstruct a Caterpillar D9 armored bulldozer in Rafah.

The IDF has also been accused of engaging in numerous other violations of the laws of war. These include violation of the right to life, torture and ill treatment of Palestinians, arbitrary detention, denial of FAMILY REUNIFICATION, expulsion/

DEPORTATION, withholding WATER, use of collective punishment, RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, use of Palestinians as human shields, denial of access to HEALTH CARE, the PERMIT regime, ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, and tolerance of SETTLER VIOLENCE.

Bibliography

- Ben-Eliezer, Uri. The Making of Israeli Militarism. Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- B'Tselem. Human Rights in the Occupied Territories: Annual Report 2007. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2008.
- Bucaille, Laetitia. Growing Up Palestinian: Israeli Occupation and the Intifada Generation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Cohen, Eliezer. Israel's Best Defense: The First Full Story of the Israeli Air Force. Shrewsbury, UK: Air-life Publishing, 1994.
- Cordesman, Anthony H. Peace and War: The Arab-Israeli Military Balance Enters the 21st Century. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 2001.
- Goldstein, Yaacov N. From Fighters to Soldiers: How the Israeli Defense Forces Began. Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 1998.
- Grinberg, Mijal. “IDF: Nearly 28% of Israeli Males Avoided Conscription in 2007.” Ha'aretz. 11 June 2007.
- Hagee, John. In Defense of Israel. FrontLine, 2007.
- Lissak, Moshe. Israeli Society and Its Defense Establishment: The Social and Political Impact of a Protracted Violent Conflict. London: Routledge, 1984.
- Magnez, R., Y. Weiss, Y. Cohen, and A. Shmueli. “Development of a Capitation Scale for IDF Career Soldiers in Israel.” Health Policy. 80:3 (2003).
- Maoz, Zeev. Defending the Holy Land: A Critical Analysis of Israel's Security and Foreign Policy. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2006.
- Morris, Benny. 1948: A History of the First Arab-Israeli War. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2008.
- Pappé, Ilan. The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine. Oxford, UK: Oneworld Publications, 2007.
- Peri, Yoram. Generals in the Cabinet Room: How the Military Shapes Israeli Policy. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press, 2006.
- Russell, Lee, and Sam Katz. Israeli Defense Forces: 1948 to the Present. Minnetonka, MN: Olympic Marketing Corp., 1986.
- Sofer, Barbara. Keeping Israel Safe: Serving in the Israel Defense Forces. Israel: Kar-Ben Publishing, 2008.
- Van Creveld, Martin. The Sword and the Olive: A Critical History of the Israeli Defense Force. New York: PublicAffairs, 2002.
- Verlinden, François. Warmachines No. 11—Merkava MK2/MK3, Israel Defense Force. O'Fallon, MO: Verlinden Publications, 1992.
- Watzman, Haim. Company C: An American's Life as a Citizen-Soldier in Israel. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2007.

Israeli Arabs

See PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions

The Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions is a nonviolent, direct-action Israeli peace organization established in the early 1990s and based in JERUSALEM. It was originally focused on opposing and resisting Israel's demolition of Palestinian houses in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. As its activists gained direct knowledge of other problems related to the OCCUPATION, it expanded its activities to protests against Israeli practices of LAND expropriation, SETTLEMENT expansion, BYPASS ROAD construction, CLOSURE, the separation BARRIER, and the destruction of fruit and OLIVE TREES, among others. Composed of members of many Israeli peace and human rights organizations, it coordinates closely with local Palestinian organizations in its work in the Occupied Territories. (www.icahd.org/eng).

Israeli Council on Israeli-Palestinian Peace

The Israeli Council on Israeli-Palestinian Peace was formed in late 1975 by a group of prominent Israeli Zionists as a private initiative responding to signs of moderation in the Palestinian national movement that the Israeli government ignored. Among its founders were the late Major General MATTIYAHU PELED (a member of the General Staff of the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES in 1967), the journalist URI AVNERY, and the late economist Dr. Ya'akov Arnon, a former head of the Dutch Zionist Federation and director-general of the Israeli Finance Ministry. The council is based in JERUSALEM and is known for its English-language newsletter, The Other Israel. Its members met with PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION officials long before it was acceptable or legal to do so, and it has consistently supported a TWO-STATE SOLUTION. (<http://otherisrael.home.igc.org/ICIPP.html>).

Israeli Democracy

See ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY

Israeli Militarism

Almost from the outset, fears, suspicion, and even violence were part of the Israeli-Palestinian encounter. If not with the first surge of Jewish IMMIGRATION to Palestine in the late nineteenth century, surely with the so-called Second and Third ALIYAS (waves of Jewish immigration to Palestine), at the beginning of the twentieth century. These relations gradually translated, within the Yishuv (the pre-state Jewish community in Palestine), and later on within the Israeli state, into social, political, and military modes of action that express an Israeli tendency to solve political problems in Israeli-Arab-Palestinian relations by military means. Militarism also presents the way these modes of thought and action have been legitimized by various actors and mechanisms over the years, increasing the probability of war, and reducing the chances for peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Prestate Period

Before World War I, Palestine was populated mainly by Arabs living in small villages and some cities. Among them, a minority of religious Jews lived mainly in four cities, which were considered sacred to Jews since biblical time. During the war, Palestine was conquered by the British, who were sympathetic to the Jews' national aspirations for several reasons: the peculiarities of Jewish history; the fact that they were victims of persecution, racism, and ANTI-SEMITISM; their contribution to the British war effort; British national interests in the Middle East; and the fact that the Jews were regarded as "Europeans," more civilized and modern than the "natives." Additionally, many British officials were Christians with strong affiliation to the Bible, and their religious beliefs inclined them to support a return of the Jews to Palestine. As a consequence, Britain's BALFOUR DECLARATION (1917) provided legal status to the Zionist ideal of a "national home" for the "Jewish People" in Palestine, their "ancestral land." Many leaders of the Zionist movement, which had emerged in Europe, in the second half of the nineteenth century, sought initially to reach their national aspirations through a gradual process of international diplomacy (e.g., THEODOR HERZL, CHAIM WEIZMANN). A minority within the movement believed that a Jewish homeland could only be established by force of arms. Those who practically immigrated to Palestine came mainly from Russia and Poland early in the twentieth century, held socialist principles, and later become the “founding fathers” of Israel. For most, their socialism (universal principles) became transformed into pristine ZIONISM (exclusive and particularistic principles—e.g., the KIBBUTZ, the HISTADRUT). These men and women tried to realize the national goals, not through diplomacy but through the practical methods of immigration, settlements, and cultivation of the land.

The indigenous Arabs soon began to oppose this movement and a conflict ensued between the newcomers and the locals. Until the second half of the 1930s, there is no clear evidence that mainstream leaders within the Zionist movement considered military power as the means for implementing their vision. The main military organizations that they formed (e.g., BAR GIORA, 1907; HASHOMER, 1909; HAGANA, 1920) were mainly responsible for defensive aims. The only exception was the IRGUN TZEVA’I LE’UMI, which was influenced by VLADIMIR (ZE’EV) JABOTINSKY, who left the Zionist movement because of its moderation. However, the ARAB REVOLT of 1936–1939, which started with a general strike against the British occupation and Zionist colonization of Palestine and later evolved into an armed insurgency, shattered many illusions among the Zionists, and changed the perception of the conflict dramatically.

The Palestinians, who were the majority and had lived on this land for generations, could not accept either Jewish dominance or the idea of partition, which was proposed by the BRITISH MANDATE PEEL COMMISSION (1936–1937). For a time, in the face of Palestinian guerrilla warfare against both the British and the Jews, the leadership of the Jewish community clung to a policy of havlagá (restraint), and the British forces quelled the revolt. However, as violence continued, the policy of restraint did not have much support within the Zionist movement, and a new military orientation soon evolved, creating new military organizations with new military offensive methods. Among them were not only the right-wing, highly motivated, and force-oriented underground groups such as Irgun Tzeva’i Le’umi and LOHAMEI HERUT YISRAEL, which also fought the British, along with the unofficial but mainstream LABOR PARTY military organization, the Hagana, and its elite unit, the PALMAH (which was formed in May 1941). These groups were composed of the young generation of native-born Israelis, who came to age in the late 1930s and early 1940s. Among them were many later Israeli leaders, such as MOSHE

DAYAN, YIGAL ALLON, and YITZHAK RABIN. For this generation, whose members made a career through the military, using force against the Arabs became a way of life.

With the end of World War II, the UN partition plan was formally rejected by the Arabs, who were still the majority in Palestine and owned close to 90 percent of the land. The Jews, as well, could not practically accept the problematic plan but they preferred to declare their approval. As such, the two sides fought the bitter and bloody 1948 WAR. Despite the fact that all the surrounding Arab states joined the war (including IRAQ), the highly organized, unified, and militarily stronger Israelis turned the Arab threat into a war of conquest, with the result that most of Palestine’s Arab population was expelled or fled, and a Jewish state, larger than the one envisioned in the UN partition plan, was born. In the first few years of statehood, Israel faced the problem of Palestinian INFILTRATION—dispossessed Palestinian REFUGEES who crossed the BORDERS from where they were sheltering into Israel. Most of them simply sought to return to their homes, rescue their belongings, tend to their fields, harvest their crops, contact their relatives, or reclaim the property that Israel had expropriated. Occasionally a Palestinian sought revenge; others were sent by the Egyptian or Jordanian security forces and operated as spies and as murder squads. The Israelis, for their part, regarded the infiltrations as a serious threat that could disrupt the new state’s ethnonational character and destroy its sovereignty. As a result, the state army and police shot and killed thousands of Palestinian infiltrators, the great majority of them unarmed, and completely blocked the borders.

Eight years after its independence, with the Israeli-Arab conflict unsettled and numerous violent activities along the borders, Israel colluded with Great Britain and FRANCE in an invasion of EGYPT, capturing the entire Sinai Peninsula and reaching the Suez Canal. This SINAI/SUEZ WAR was perhaps the culmination of the new perception that emerged within the Yishuv/Israel’s young generation, during the period 1936–1956, according to which the use of military force was the most appropriate, most efficient, and indeed the only feasible way to solve the problem of the Arab and Palestinian resistance to a Jewish state. This perspective, which was new in the context of Jewish history and tradition, can be defined as “militarism”—a belief in the use of force as a means to solve political problems on the national level. It was then incorporated into Israeli social norms, practices, and institutions, characterizing society and politics at large.

Israel as a Nation-in-Arms

During this early period, Israeli militarism was not characterized by a love of force for the sake of force, even though some of the army units (like UNIT 101) were merciless in the way they treated the Arabs in their frequent border crossings. The myth of the new Jew, the warrior who takes his destiny in his hands, was still restricted to concepts such as nation-building, modernization (and the army as an important agent of modernization), and a definition of reality in terms of “no-choice” (despite the fact that every social reality is always open to various choices) in regard to the relations with the surrounding Arab states and the penetrating Palestinians. In any case, the IDF (ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES) was exalted and presented as the embodiment of the nation and all that is good in it. The new immigrants, who formed the majority in the new state and knew nothing about armies, wars, and modern nationalism, were deeply socialized along this line. The practices and institutions that were responsible for developing a positive attitude toward army and war, and that encouraged sacrifice for the new nation, operated not only through the formal and nonformal educational system (e.g., youth organizations) but also through the mandatory active military service for both men and women, and the required service in the reserves for males. The result was that Israel, in this period, became a nation-in-arms.

The nation-in-arms paradigm derived from such countries as eighteenth-century revolutionary and early nineteenth-century republican France, Prussia, and then GERMANY in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and Japan from the Meiji Restoration until World War II, all of which supported the total engagement of men and resources for war purposes. These nations-in-arms engaged in a massive mobilization of the whole young population for war, while simultaneously attempting to constitute or reconstitute the society into a nation. One defining characteristic was the existence of an army-nation (armée nation in France), created by conscription and a compulsory reserve-service system. The army, which was formed of the mass of the citizens and not an elite group of professional soldiers, was represented as the embodiment of the collective national will, an integrated society, and all that is good in the nation—for example, la France réelle (the real France). In addition, in any nation-in-arms a close collaboration exists between the professional military elite and the political leadership, based on a shared appreciation of the army’s formidable political influence. The most important characteristic of the nation-in-arms, however, is that the boundaries between “civil” and “military” are rendered indistinct in various spheres. Thus preparation for war, and indeed war itself, become a universal project involving men and women (sometimes even children) and both young and old, who were also indirectly involved in the war effort. Finally, in a nation-in-arms, the national military symbolically and ostensibly places itself above “internal” politics, certainly above party politics and domestic disputes, and presents itself as the guardian of the national values and interests.

Israel in the 1950s–1970s was a late version of the nineteenth- and early twentieth-century model. The state’s political configuration attained its zenith in the aftermath of the 1967 WAR. Israel’s victory in the war, along with its OCCUPATION of territories in JORDAN, Egypt, and SYRIA, ushered in the pinnacle of the nation-in-arms. The view of reality that was adopted fused sets of ideas in three basic areas:

1. Military, the need to keep the territories for strategic reasons, based on the professional assessments of the army experts concerning the importance of territorial depth to Israel.
2. Political, the neorealist idea according to which the new territories were a bargaining chip for peace.
3. Social-cultural, a worldview that fused JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST and Greater Israel, ethno-national ideologies, with the feeling of many Israelis that with the territorial conquest they extricated themselves from a long siege. Such feelings inverted the Occupation, presenting it as liberation of Israel’s ancestral land.

In those days many Israelis believed redemption was at hand, and talk of a biblical “war of commandment” became popular. After all, how else could one explain the swift and quick victory over three Arab states? Only a few questioned either Israel’s ability to control the Arab territories and rule another people or its moral right to do so.

In the “six years of Empire,” as one journalist termed the period from the 1967 War to the 1973 War, Israel attempted to translate its military victory and its conviction of superiority into domination of the Palestinian territories as well as the Egyptian and Syrian territories. In fact, Israel refused to accept the claim that the Fourth Geneva Convention applied to the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP, claiming that it was no-man’s-land beforehand. Thus, SETTLEMENTS, military bases, parks and nature resorts, ROADS, and industrial zones were built in the territories, quite often using cheap Arab labor to increase the profits of Israeli entrepreneurs. Certain issues within the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES were more controversial than others: among them, the status of the Jewish settlements, the annexation of JERUSALEM and the Golan Heights, and the attitude toward and treatment of the Palestinians who lived there. Until 1993 the Palestinians were subject to Israeli military administration. They did not receive the same political rights and freedoms or protections under Israeli law as the settlers who lived in the same area. However, as Neve Gordon claimed, until the 1990s, the Palestinians under Occupation enjoyed a certain amount of support and help given by the Israeli military administration. Moreover, many of them were allowed to cross the “Green Line” and to work in Israel itself.

Within Israel, the 1967 war-hero generals became objects of sweeping admiration and emulation. Perhaps the most striking manifestation of this was the pattern of recently retired senior IDF officers turning to politics, a process that came to be known as “parachuting.” Indeed, many Israeli prime ministers and cabinet ministers from that period forward had a significant military career: Yitzhak Rabin, Haim Bar-Lev, ARIEL SHARON, Rafael Eitan, Amnon Lipkin-Shachak, Itzhak Mordechai, EHUD BARAK, Matan Vilnai, Amram Mitzna, and Shaul Mofaz, to name a few. This phenomenon did not hinder Israel’s procedural democracy. However, when parachuting into the political arena, the Israeli generals usually brought their militaristic worldview into politics, proving the proverb “once a soldier, always a soldier.”

Militarism and Praetorianism

In fact, parachuting into politics was just one means through which the generals influenced their country’s politics. Strikingly, even in the 1950s, IDF officers, particularly Chief of Staff Moshe Dayan, could pressure the politicians to adopt belligerent solutions to political problems. With the help of Prime Minister DAVID BEN-GURION Dayan neutralized MOSHE SHARETT, the “civilian,” moderate foreign minister, and turned the army into an influential political actor. On issues involving war or peace and “security,” to a very great extent the IDF’s opinion, at least informally, was highly influential. In 1967, to cite a concrete example, the government was pressured by the generals to start a war, in reaction to provocations by the Egyptian ruler JAMAL ‘ABD AL-NASIR. During the event, which was known as the “revolt of the generals” (though it was far from a revolt), members of the General Staff put enormous pressure on Prime Minister LEVI ESHKOL to launch the 1967 War. The generals also campaigned for Dayan’s appointment as minister of defense and for the formation of a “national unity” government composed of both the Right and the Left. Hence the generals expressed the concept, typical of nations-in-arms, that the army is the unifier, that a common destiny, values, and interests made Israel one nation in which internal differences, should they arise, must be minimized for the sake of the nation-state that is engaged in war. Moreover, the assumption was that a separation of the army from politics was a luxury Israel could ill afford. The result of the war, the capture of so much territory, supposedly affirmed that conception together with the idea that force was the right way to solve the relations with the Arab world.

Militarism can sometimes flourish despite an army’s formal subordination to the political level even in states that are considered democratic, often as a quid pro quo for that formal subordination. On this, the Israeli case is at odds with most conventional views in the scholarly literature, which tend to see militarism and praetorianism as similar phenomena, implying both the army’s takeover of government and the simultaneous dissemination of its worldview throughout society. In contrast, the Israeli situation suggests the possibility of an inverse relation between militarism and praetorianism. In such a case the generals have no qualms about promoting a spirit of militarism in society, a phenomenon that can be termed “cultural militarism.” Militarism may also include the generals’ attempt to influence political leaders to adopt an army’s jingoist perspective in making decisions concerning war or peace, a phenomenon that can be termed “militaristic politics.” Thus, under cultural militarism and militaristic politics, the generals can accomplish their aims without the need for direct and coercive intervention in politics. Indeed for many years, the Israeli high brass successfully influenced the public to adopt their version of Israel's security needs, especially because they did not coerce it but "suggested" and sometimes "subtly implanted" it, because no other institutionalized ideology, or even alternative opinion, to the military one existed, and because the generals succeeded in creating a widely accepted image as reliable, responsible, supposedly apolitical, and indispensable advisors. As long as cultural militarism and militaristic politics prevailed, the army generals did not need to disrupt democratic procedures, because the army enjoyed a central role in society, and the generals had status and prestige, no less than a preeminent influence in the decision-making process. It was what the Israeli scholar Yoram Peri termed "democracy in uniform." All this, however, was about to change.

Gradual Decline of the Nation-in-Arms

With the 1982 LEBANON WAR, hegemonic militarism began to weaken. Indeed, already in the 1973 OCTOBER WAR, the difficulties Israel was facing also raised some doubts concerning the way the army functioned militarily, and the manner in which it succeeded in preserving its relative autonomy vis-à-vis the government. These doubts, however, did not immediately delegitimize the value of the nation-in-arms and the centrality of the army-nation. On the contrary, the conclusion from the Yom Kippur War was that Israel's unpreparedness required increases in state security and defense, and that citizens had to internalize the military's norms more deeply.

In the Lebanon War, the public reaction was different. For the first time, Israel's war was defined as a "war of choice," and the dishonesty of the government concerning the war's objectives was severely criticized. Israel's share of responsibility for the massacre of Muslim civilians in SABRA AND SHATILA by Lebanese Christian forces, raised considerable concern within the Israeli public as well, and led to increasing demonstrations against the war and those who were responsible for its course. A few years later, in 1987, when the First INTIFADA erupted, it became clear that not only had the long period of relative quiet in the territories come to an end but also that the Israeli symbiosis of army, society, and politics was no longer impregnable.

First Intifada

On 8 December 1987, after four Palestinians were killed by an Israeli car in a traffic accident, rioting broke out in the territories. Soon the Intifada was in full force as a protest against Israel's repression, which included mass detentions, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and DEPORTATIONS. The Intifada was characterized by mass protests, tax revolts, strikes, tire burnings, and Palestinian teenagers confronting Israeli soldiers with rocks and occasionally Molotov cocktails. In contrast, the IDF used the latest weaponry and military technologies against the demonstrators. The high-ranking army officers were influenced by Minister of Defense Yitzhak Rabin's militant stance toward the Palestinians, notably an exhortation to the army to "break the bones" of demonstrators. The number of Palestinian fatalities was reduced only after Israel introduced special riot-control methods and Rabin was succeeded by Moshe Arens, who assumed the Defense Ministry in 1990. By the early 1990s the Intifada seemed to have lost direction. The Palestinians were frustrated and many displayed a willingness to negotiate an overall settlement with Israel. In Israel, the Palestinian distress was widely felt and it became clear to many that the army-nation does not perform well as a police force and that its diverse social composition and political differences create special complexities when it confronts civilians who are fighting for their freedom.

During the First Intifada, trials of Israeli soldiers charged with brutality, unnecessary killings, violations of Palestinian civil rights, and other infractions were widely publicized and added to public anger and disappointment concerning the army and polity. Even the soldiers were divided over the question of whether the Occupation was desirable or defensible, and whether the brutal suppression of the uprising was justified. In a dynamic typical of armies based on extensive reserve duty, the disputes in the army affected Israeli society as much as differences in the society influenced the army. In this regard, the Intifada heightened the differences within Israeli society that had begun to appear in the 1982 Lebanon War. The new questioning and dissent exposed the weakening of statist hegemony, and showed that Israeli society was sundered by contradictions, disputes, and disagreements, especially on the issues of peace and war, and was no longer completely mobilized for war as in the past.

One indication of the dissent was the criticism directed at IDF's senior level for military training accidents.irate parents of dead soldiers organized and went to court against the IDF, demanding investigations of such incidents by an external neutral body, without any military intervention in the process. Such demands were regarded in Israel as an almost revolutionary step. Another sign of social unrest and dissatisfaction with the army was the unprecedented refusal of soldiers, particularly reservists, to take part in military action in either the Occupied Territories or southern Lebanon. Although such refusals were relatively few, they challenged the long-standing Israeli axiom that military service is performed at any price, is an unconditional civic virtue, and is an informal confirmation of citizenship.

Another phenomenon that indicated the decline of the nation-in-arms militarism was the emergence of a variety of social peace movements that protested for peace and against Occupation. Movements such as Parents Against Silence, which emerged in 1982 and urged parents to break their silence against the war; WOMEN IN BLACK, who demonstrated against the Occupation weekly at major cities' intersections; YESH G'VUL (There Is a Limit); and Ad Kan (Up to Now) were the among the most prominent groups. Similar to the CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS, these organizations represented a different Israel, one that eschewed militarism and the nation-in-arms and chose a different perspective toward life and death.

Changes and Transitions

A number of factors, both internal and external, converged in the late 1980s to bring about change within Israel. External factors included the end of the Cold War and the collapse of the Soviet Union, after which the Middle East was no longer an arena of superpower rivalry. This factor, plus the pressure that came from the UNITED STATES after the First GULF WAR (1990–1991), brought Israel to the MADRID CONFERENCE. Prime Minister YITZHAK SHAMIR did everything he could to thwart the conference; however, many in Israel began to understand that world politics had changed in the era of globalization, that an opportunity for peace was possible, and that it should be seized because it might not return.

Another factor that contributed to the decline in the nation-in-arms was the profound worldwide economic changes that affected Israel as well. In 1985, Israel signed a major trade agreement with the US, and limitations on government resources led Israel to withdraw most of its armed forces from Lebanon, except for a strip some few miles deep into South Lebanon. To lower the spiraling inflation rate (which then stood at 450 percent a year), the government implemented an austerity program. It privatized the economy, reduced its welfare policy, and created a neoliberal system. The massive immigration of close to one million SOVIET JEWS in the early 1990s—which was another reflection of globalization and the Cold War's end—brought human capital of great economic worth, contributed to neoliberalism in Israel, and generated rapid economic growth.

In the late 1980s, Israel also experienced a serious party-parliamentary crisis caused by a paralyzing electoral stalemate between the two major parties, the greater bargaining power of the small parties, and the failure of “governments of national unity” to resolve political problems. Eventually general disgust with party politics was expressed in public protest, which began in early 1990s. Numerous organizations and associations sprang from local grassroots politics, such as the neoliberal and secular Constitution for Israel; Adam, Teva Va'Din (Man, Nature and Law), which was an environmental movement; and even B'TSELEM, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. Under the influence of these movements and numerous other new associations and groups, many Israelis began to adopt a lifestyle that was more individualistic, universal, and in fact Western. Even if most of these associations did not comprehensively and directly challenge the old militaristic system, they focused attention on individual freedoms and rights, which were not compatible with the collectivistic and nationalist past. Moreover, they contributed to a new perception of politics, which was translated into what Foucault would call “micro-power,” in which the public is more involved in politics at the grassroots and less responsive to government demands. Local politics also took on greater importance then, as many Israelis seemed to have grown weary of the “big” questions—the all-embracing ideologies and their demanding collectivistic and militaristic statism—and preferred to place themselves into a more narrow framework, so that the individual, his/her desires, preferences, identities, and way of life became a major feature of Israeli politics.

The Israeli army itself contributed to the decline of the nation-in-arms. Particularly during Ehud Barak's tenure as chief of staff, in the first half of the 1990s, the IDF was subjected to what some have called "role extraction," in which Barak's goal was to produce a "small, smart army." The reforms, which were the result of budget cuts, included the elimination of various social projects such as youth camps, in which the army had been traditionally involved and through which it maintained its connection with the society. Such organizational changes within the army contributed to the reconfiguration of the relations among army, society, and politics on a new basis, which was meant—among other things—to avoid cleavages on a political basis within the army itself.

Civil Society and the Militaristic-Religious Society

With the Yitzhak Rabin–SHIMON PERES government at the beginning of the 1990s, and the OSLO ACCORDS, it became clear that Israeli society was divided not only along class, ethnic, and religious divisions but along a new division as well. The new dichotomy emerged in the face of two contradictory organizing principles that first coalesced, then confronted each other with harsh animosity: one was civil and antimilitaristic, the other militaristic and usually religious. This split appeared in 1993 and after, when, for the first time in Israel's history, a prime minister expressed willingness, in the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP) with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), to give up territory in exchange for peace with the Palestinians. Yet this decision, which reflected political realism if not a civil, universal, and democratic approach, was opposed by a large sector within society, mainly the settlers and their supporters. This sector accused the prime minister of treason and let it be known that the supreme value was the Land of Israel (Eretz Yisrael), for which they would fight by all possible means.

The divisions inside Israel resembled certain trends that appeared in many places throughout the globe. On the one hand, the ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT had its counterpart in the emergence of globalization, particularly in the role of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in civil society. This new (pre-9/11) universal and democratic mode linked even questions concerning peace and war with the natural rights of humanity while urging political compromises and reconciliations. On the other hand, a counterreaction emerged, grounded in religious fundamentalism, "traditional values," and an atavistic ethnonationalism, that regarded globalization as a menace to tradition and religion. Reflecting the latter in Israel, Jewish fundamentalism and the Greater Land of Israel movements fought against the Oslo Accords and insisted that relations with the Palestinians would not be solved by diplomacy or compromise but by force.

The conflict between the two sectors within Israeli society has been extremely pronounced. The sectors differed profoundly over mega-issues such as peace and war, which in turn led to conflicts over and questions of identity, in particular "what Israeliness is and who the Israelis are." One example of the difference between the two sectors was their orientation toward military service. During the collectivistic nation-in-arms era, it was not possible to avoid military service because it was considered a custom and a duty. Military service signified belonging, identity, and partnership in the Jewish-Israeli community. Those few who declined to serve were effectively kept invisible and mute, and were perceived as marginal to society. In the neoliberal Israel, two different approaches have emerged regarding military service. In army slang the two types were differentiated as "shirkers" and "fanatics" (the Hebrew term for the latter is mur'alim, literally meaning individuals who are "poisoned" with the desire for gung-ho combat and prepare for it accordingly). Each category had its own cultural heroes. Brigadier General Effie Fein, for example, who was bearded and wore a knitted kippa (head-covering) that signified allegiance to national-religious Zionism, projected the tough, bearish exterior of a combat officer or a field soldier who is willing and ready to die for the country. Upon his retirement Fein became a political figure, fighting fervently for Greater Israel. On the other hand, a well-known photograph showed Aviv Geffen, a highly successful Israeli pop singer, in the nude with the inscription on his body "It is good to die for ourselves"—a parody of the famous assertion made by an Israeli national hero eighty years before that "it is good to die for our country."

Another indication of the rift between the two sectors was seen in rituals of mourning and bereavement over the death of soldiers. In the era of the nation-in-arms the state portrayed the death of each individual soldier as serving the goals of commonality. One newspaper put it succinctly: "They overcame their grief, like symbolic monuments of a mother's strength—that is, of a nation's strength. . . . The convoy of the corps of bereaved mothers . . . is the proudest and most wonderful of all flags, the state's most solid security belt." Surely the most effective recruiting mechanism of the nation-in-arms is the incorporation of bereavement and commemoration to elicit the population's identification with military power and war. However, the meaning of such symbols has faded over the years, and the more individualistic modern era has brought additional perspectives. Death, even on the battlefield but certainly in terrorist attacks or training accidents, began to acquire a new meaning for many Israelis, because these deaths could not be explained as a necessary part of the process of nation-building or nation-strengthening.

Commemoration of the dead became an issue of controversy as well: should the tradition of inscribing a standard state text on the gravestones of fallen soldiers be continued, or could the family decide on a personal message? In the modern nation-state (especially a nation-in-arms), as George Mosse noted, state rites for the fallen were part of the unifying ritualistic ethos, meant to emphasize symbolically every citizen's participation in the state and its wars. In the Israel of the 1990s, though, many parents no longer felt comfortable with the uniform text on their sons' gravestones and insisted on a more personal note, such as citing the names of the deceased's siblings. Military cemeteries have also undergone some changes, including "private" additions to graves in the form of different symbols, special landscaping, vases, stone pathways, modest signs, photographs, poems, and so forth. Some families whose sons fell in the Lebanon War fought for nearly ten years to change the gravestone inscriptions that described it as the "Peace for Galilee War."

Bereavement in the 1990s assumed a political character through comments made by parents who lost sons. A striking case in point was Manuella Dviri, who became a preeminent representative of the peace-oriented civil society. The conclusion she drew from her son's death was blatantly political: "My duty toward this child, who dwells within me," she said, "is to say the truth always and not to be silent. Not to allow people to forget that we must get out of Lebanon, that we must make peace with the Palestinians." A different attitude toward bereavement also sprang up in the militaristic-religious society. "If there is no longer any point in dying for one's country," said a settler who lost his son, "and if life is a supreme value, what exactly is supposed to happen when the enemy's final assault comes? . . . Will we be trampled here beneath the boots of a foreign occupier? The dead sacrifice their lives above all to ensure one of the most basic needs of people as such—nationalism. . . . A human creature needs national belonging. . . . His nation exists eternally. . . . It constitutes a considerable part of the things that are worth dying for."

The two contrasting orientations have been translated into collective action to effect political change. For the peace groups, the turning point was the First Intifada, by which time they were no longer willing to accept a "minimal" notion of democracy in which only the state's political and military elites decided security issues that affected everybody, without taking into consideration the public voice. On the other end of the political continuum stood the particularist settlers, who claimed the right to conquer and occupy Palestinian land by any means, including coercive ones. They too were energized, first by the First Intifada, then by the 1993 Oslo Accords, which both delegitimized their presence in the territories. Moreover, the settlers too, like their counterpart, could not accept the idea that the government alone will decide on these issues. Many of the settlers even denounced the army and state leaders, whom they perceived as pursuing a path of undue compromise and moderation. From many of the settlers' perspective, God's land is indivisible and belongs to Israel only, and no democratic or authoritarian procedure can change that.

The peace supporters criticized the settlers for their nondemocratic, religious beliefs. The settlers excoriated the civil society for its antimilitaristic beliefs. REHAVAM ZE'EV (Gandhi), an extreme right-wing politician, expressed this sentiment well by explaining: "The reasons [that fewer Israelis desire military service] must be sought in the crisis of Zionist self-fulfillment. In the post-Zionism of the Israeli left, in their blind belief in peace, in the move away from the Torah of Israel and the Jewish tradition . . . and in education for materialism instead of education for values."

Statements like these, which exposed the neo-militarism that emerged within some sectors in Israel, were translated into policies designed to increase the involvement and influence of the settlers and their supporters not only in politics but in the army as well. Thus, although the settlers continued to criticize the IDF, they also made a concerted effort to join it and influence it from within. This effort began during the First Intifada and was pursued with greater intensity thereafter. Contrary to Israeli tradition in which the religious were exempted from military service to devote themselves fully to religious studies, many religious youths became, during the 1990s, combat soldiers, volunteers for elite units, and graduates of officers' courses. Some even made the army their career, responding to their rabbis who encouraged them to excel in the IDF.

The military proficiency displayed by the settlers and their supporters, and their strong motivation to do military service, which was based on theological ideas, were not always well received by other Israelis, who viewed them as another sign of the growing split in the country and as an attempt by the settlers to influence reality through the military. These feelings became evident with the political assassination that turned the Israeli scene into a nightmare.

Assassination of Rabin

The possibility of a "war of brothers"—the Hebrew term for "civil war"—in the light of the OSLO PROCESS, became part of the regular Israeli discourse. As one settler explained, "The fear of a civil war . . . Please do not make light of this . . . One does not have to be excessively perceptive and sensitive to be aware of the abysmal hate that exists, unfortunately . . . Among too many people, the word 'settler,' for example, arouses rejection, repulsion, even abhorrence." Such sentiments became commonplace and accompanied by the claim that the Israeli "left" had allied itself with the Arabs. As a settler from the Gaza Strip noted, "The deeper the dialogue between the [Israeli] left and the Arabs became in the first seven years after the signing of the Oslo accords, the more the Palestinian stand in the conflict was accepted almost completely. At the same time, the estrangement of the Israeli left from its brethren on the right intensified. The struggle thus became an intra-Jewish one over the Jewish-Israeli identity, a trans-national struggle in which one segment of the nation made the historic common enemy privy to decisions about their shared destiny."

The militaristic-religious society was further aided in its struggle against the peace process by the SUICIDE BOMBINGS throughout Israel. HAMAS, which rejected the Oslo Accords, was mainly responsible for the bombings, but as they continued and more civilians were killed, the Israeli public became more inclined to the militaristic-religion interpretation, according to which the bombings proved that "the Arabs" (as a generalized category) do not want to make peace with Israel. As a result, following the terrorist attacks, for the first time since the Oslo Accords, the majority in Israel preferred the option of increasing Israel's military might to holding peace talks.

Even in the face of the deepening internal rift, Rabin and Peres believed that a government elected by a majority of the nation, most of whom also supported the peace process, was enough to forge ahead. In the meantime, probably at the height of the public protest against the government and the prime minister, there was a rabbinical decision to place a curse on Rabin, involving the invocation of terms taken from traditions thousands of years old—"din rodef" and "din moser," Talmudic injunctions to kill a Jew who imperils the life or property of another Jew—and "pulsá de nura," a kabbalistic curse of death.

Such terms, which were totally unfamiliar to the vast majority of the Israeli public, became now part of a new discourse. In August 1995, after the negotiations with the Palestinians on self-government gathered momentum, a movement called "ZO ARTZENU" (This Is Our Land) declared a civil revolt. In this period, attempts were already being made to attack Rabin physically. The most unruly demonstration, however, took place on 5 October 1995, when the Knesset was about to vote on the Oslo II or INTERIM AGREEMENT, which included the transfer of some territories to the Palestinians (albeit not any of the settlements). Tens of thousands of demonstrators flocked to Zion Square in the center of Jerusalem, blew on shofars (rams' horns), screamed "Death to Rabin," burned his portrait, and distributed a photomontage showing the prime minister in an S.S. uniform. Looking down on the rabid crowd from the balcony was the opposition leadership: Ariel Sharon, BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, and many others. Netanyahu's speech whipped the crowd into a frenzy with his allegation that the government was illegitimate because it relied on the votes of Israeli-Arabs who supported the PLO.

Suddenly, in a sovereign, law-abiding state, in a society that perceived itself as civil and democratic, certain circles began to ask questions such as "Does Rabin deserve death according to halakha [Jewish religious law]?” Then, on 4 November 1995, Rabin was assassinated by a young, religious, Israeli-born Jew, who was influenced by the steady stream of rabbinic and political messages declaring the “illegitimacy” of those who “hand over territories.” “When I shot Rabin,” said the murderer two months later, “I felt as if I shot a terrorist.”

The religious public in Israel rejected the collective accusation that was hurled at it. Many among them deplored the assassination, perhaps as lip service, or out of fear of the consequences for the settlement project, if not for the entire religious society. There were also those who rejected political killing on moral grounds. Some in the religious public expressed contrition and called for a “housecleaning.” However, these voices were soon silenced. And if at first it seemed that the pall of mourning that blanketed Israel—combined with an international show of support for Rabin’s way, seen in the participation of world leaders in his funeral—would advance the peace process, the reverse ensued.

Though the majority of the public deplored the assassin and rejected what he stood for, the militaristic-religious worldview continued to be antiglobal, antidemocratic, neonational, particularistic, ethnocentric, and militaristic. Moreover, under attack from the “left,” they quickly reciprocated, turning from accused to accuser, from a public that had produced the assassin to one that developed a persecution complex and accused those from whose society the victim had come, blaming them for inciting the settlers who brought on the assassination.

The assassination was the climactic event in the struggle against the Oslo Process, demonstrating in no uncertain terms that no one who opposed the idea of “Greater Israel,” not even the prime minister himself, was immune. However, a civil war did not occur. It was actually Shimon Peres—who on the night of the assassination was appointed to succeed the slain prime minister—who decided, in his brief term of office, that relations with the settlers and their supporters would be based on emphasizing not the differences between the sides but what they had in common. Peres declared solemnly that Rabin’s assassination would not bring the peace process to an end. However, instead of invoking the assassination to ensure the continuation of the process, he opted for a politics of compromise. He signed another agreement with the Palestinians but refused to act on requests to dismantle the hesder yeshivas (one of which the assassin had attended in the past), which were based on army-religious arrangements. Even the state commission of inquiry, appointed to investigate the assassination, had no mandate to examine the extensive incitement that led up to the murder. It seemed that the Peres government wanted only to deal with criminal and procedural questions, and to diminish any possible discourse on the cultural and social aspects of the event. Perhaps Peres thought that this approach would win him the support of religious circles in the looming elections. In the event, his decision bore consequences that turned sharply from his expectations and in fact contradicted them. It enabled the settlers to claim, directly or indirectly, that although political assassination as such was unacceptable, in this case Rabin was to blame for his own murder: his scorn for the settlers had dragged him into the Oslo adventure and he had effectively split the nation. Thus, perhaps without intending to, Peres contributed to the coalescence of an institutional structure that encouraged “internal unity” over possible peace. This “unity” was construed to mean that the settlers could act almost as they pleased without the state taking vigorous action against them, whether because they were Jews or because of their strong public support.

During Peres’s short term as prime minister, the horrific terrorist attacks perpetrated by Hamas, which again claimed the lives of dozens of Israelis in the big cities, were interpreted in Israel as proof that the Palestinian people did not want peace. This interpretation of the bombings enhanced a dichotomous ethnonational perspective of “us” versus “them” and practically minimized the internal rift. Israeli politicians tend to attach critical significance to acts of TERRORISM during election campaigns. The great fear of the LABOR PARTY’s election-campaign strategy in 1996 was of terrorist attacks and their impact on the electorate. After the first terrorist attack during the campaign, on 25 February, three months ahead of the election, peace was discarded as a campaign message. Instead of playing up the simple fact that terrorism demonstrated powerfully the urgent need for peace, Peres’s strategists and PR people tried to cast him as “Mr. Security,” packaging him as a product for the public to buy. With Peres having a huge lead over Netanyahu in the polls in the wake of the Rabin assassination, Labor's campaign also was based on the attempt to portray Peres as the prime minister of all the people, statesman-like and judicious. When the election approached, even the Rabin assassination was played down—not only by the LIKUD, which feared an electoral backlash, but also, astonishingly, by Labor, which was concerned that harping on the subject would be perceived as “splitting the nation.”

Peres's strategy of making peace among the Israelis at the expense of a peace with the Palestinians did not help, and Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud representative, was elected prime minister. The Israelis seemed simply to take fright at the “price of peace.” Indeed, even though Netanyahu had promised in his campaign not to discard the agreements with the Palestinians, once elected he showed himself in no hurry to implement the agreements that he voted against as a parliament member in 1993. On 15 January 1997 Netanyahu surprised his supporters when, under intense US pressure, he signed the HEBRON agreement, under which the IDF withdrew most of its forces from most of the city. That he did so only because he feared losing the support of the US administration did not help him to gain the support of moderate Israelis.

Moderate Israelis were still active in the late 1990s. For example, throughout the period of the Oslo Process, IDF units were stationed in an Israeli self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon. But several Israeli groups worked tirelessly in demanding the army's removal from Lebanon, among them a number of mothers of soldiers who constituted a new organization, “FOUR MOTHERS.” The movement engaged in symbolic activity, distributed material, held marches and demonstrations, and formed a political lobby with the aim of bringing about Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon and the termination of the state of war between the two countries. This was an expression par excellence of a civil society and a manifestation of the “feminine voice,” which had long been prominent in Israeli peace and protest movements, the more so as the women of Four Mothers also had to rebuff allegations that they knew nothing about security and that in wartime they would stay behind.

Yet again, civil society and the militaristic-religious society found themselves in a frontal clash. Netanyahu, who lost the trust of the settlers, was defeated in the May 1999 election after three years in office by the leader of the Labor Party, Ehud Barak. Barak brought about the IDF withdrawal from southern Lebanon despite the general's objection. However, as a former chief of staff, Barak could not detach himself from the militaristic mindset, and indeed the expectations that Barak would be the one to bring peace to Israel were soon to be dashed. At the 2000 CAMP DAVID SUMMIT, Barak tried to convince Arafat to accept the Israeli terms of an agreement. His suggestions were presented as “generous,” not only to most Israelis but to the US administration as well. Arafat, however, did not accept them, and the negotiations collapsed. The one who tried to exploit the vacuum that was subsequently created was the opposition leader Ariel Sharon, a militarist of the old school who was soon to rule Israel.

Al-Aqsa Intifada

Sharon's visit to the TEMPLE MOUNT, a part of the Muslim holy site AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF in Jerusalem, on 28 September 2000, triggered Palestinian protest across the Occupied Territories in what came to be known as the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. His visit was regarded as an indication of Israel's intention to maintain sovereignty over all of Jerusalem and as a threat to the integrity of the mosques. The IDF was very quick in responding to the challenge. In the first six days of the Second Intifada, sixty-one Palestinians were killed and 2,657 were injured while no Israelis were killed. The character of Israeli retaliatory actions against the Palestinian population was influenced by the beliefs of the militaristic-religious society, which wanted to prove that the Oslo peace process was false and that drastic military actions provided the only solution to the Palestinian uprising.

The Israeli army used harsh methods of suppression such as CURFEWS—long-term lockdowns of civilian areas, sometimes for months, which generally allowed residents less than two hours per day to get food. Although such tactics were condemned internationally, Israel insisted they were vital to prevent terrorist attacks. Another method of collective punishment was the demolition of homes of suicide bombers. Both because each home generally housed a considerable number of Palestinians and because a large number of homes were destroyed, the tactic created controversy within Israel between the civil and the militaristic society. Additionally the army employed CHECKPOINTS that resulted in severe RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT of the Palestinians. Israel maintained that the checkpoints were essential for military purposes, although many Palestinian, international, and Israeli human rights organizations claimed that they served as a means of humiliation and cruelty against the civilian population. Mass detentions were also common. At any given time about 6,000 Palestinian prisoners were held in Israeli jails, about half of them under ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION without an indictment. Perhaps the most effective but controversial military tactic of the IDF was the policy of “targeted killing,” the term used for the TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS of militants suspected of perpetrating attacks against Israel. The tactic was controversial because it sentenced suspects to death without a trial, and it put at risk many Palestinians who happened to be near the suspects at the time of the attack.

Israel’s harsh suppression of the al-Aqsa Intifada turned it into a war of a new kind. It demonstrated the extent to which the army and soldiering continued to constitute a central value in Israel, and indicated that with the failure of both the Oslo Accords and later the Camp David talks, the Israeli militaristic-religious society gained major influence on political questions of peace and war. The majority of the Israeli public accepted Barak’s claim that Arafat was to blame for the failure of the talks. The consequence of that was thus clear to everybody: the Palestinians have to pay. The discourse on Arafat’s fault was so strong in Israel and the fact that it was the Palestinians who started the violence after the failure of the talks—almost completely silenced Israeli civil society in the first two years of the uprising, and the army under Barak felt free to handle the war as it liked.

However, the differences between the two sectors of society did not disappear. There was a new movement of combat soldiers and reserve officers who claimed that the repressive operations in the territories were illegal and refused to take part in them, and Jewish-Arab partnerships and peace movements were organized as well, linking the local civil society to global human rights movements. In response to reports of atrocities and harsh military methods used by the Israeli army in the territories, public debate began again in late 2002 and continued, producing a new peace discourse alongside the war discourse. Most Israelis, however, did not accept the moderate way, and the Intifada continued.

International intervention appeared in the form of President GEORGE W. BUSH’s ROAD MAP. The formal goal of the plan was to put an end to the Occupation and bring about the establishment of two states with secure borders. As always, the Americans believed that such a conflict could be solved rationally. The Bush administration wanted to remove Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat as it accepted the Israeli claim that the chairman of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY was a terrorist and an obstacle to peace. The result was the appointment of MAHMUD ABBAS as prime minister with executive powers. The Palestinians expressed their readiness for an agreement. The Israeli government also approved the Road Map toward the end of May 2003, though with some fourteen “reservations” that in essence gutted the plan. They included the demand that the “terrorist organizations,” including Hamas and ISLAMIC JIHAD, would give up their weapons and dismantle. These comments were compatible with Bush’s “Global War on Terror,” but they reduced the chances of the Road Map’s success to zero. Sharon knew that this formula would guarantee Israel’s supremacy and effectively block an agreement, and that without the “terror” option the Palestinians’ bargaining power was very limited, while the disagreements among them were so overriding that they would never be able to reach a settlement with Israel.

In a statement to the Knesset, Sharon deplored the Occupation and declared that it was time to end the conflict. His words astounded everyone, including his party and the members of the government coalition. This was not the platform he was elected on, they said. The militaristic-religious society expected Sharon, who was “flesh of their flesh,” to stall the implementation of the Road Map and not make declarations about the evils of the Occupation. Sharon, however, felt confident in his way, which, in fact, was a “third way,” neither the way of the militaristic-religious society nor that of the civil society. However, the “third way,” institutionalized in his new KADIMA PARTY, did not bring peace to the Middle East. It was more an attempt to make internal peace in Israel and external peace with the Americans, but not with the Palestinians. Moreover, in the same breath that Sharon deplored the Occupation, he said that the settlement project would continue.

Nevertheless, some agreements were made, such as that reached by Sharon and Abbas at Sharm al-Shaykh in February 2005, just after the death of Arafat. The SHARM AL-SHAYKH DECLARATION indicated the Israeli-Palestinian war was over. The war, however, was never over, even when Israel evacuated the settlements from the Gaza Strip and withdrew from the area in August 2005. At that time, the al-Aqsa Intifada had been under way for more than five full years. It had claimed 1,064 Israeli victims and 7,462 wounded. The casualties on the Palestinian side were vastly higher: 3,729 Palestinians were killed and nearly 25,000 wounded, and the violence, mainly around the Gaza Strip, continued.

Second Lebanon War and Gaza War

On 4 January 2006, Sharon suffered a stroke and sank into a coma. The new coalition government continued Sharon's "third way" and the Kadima Party. Some observers even anticipated a strategic change under a government headed by two "civilians," EHUD OLMERT as prime minister and Amir Peretz as defense minister. However, this government also did not succeed in releasing Israel from its dependence on its army and the army's ideas about the way to solve the country's problems. Thus, in response to provocations made by Hassan Nasrallah, the HIZBULLAH leader, the IDF's leadership persuaded the "civilian" government to go to war on 12 July 2006 and was cheered on by the public. Israel penetrated Lebanon but, as always, it was the Lebanese civilians who paid the price. The army, in what became habitual in those years, developed military tactics that deliberately used civilians as a bargaining card, and the Israeli chief of staff, Lieutenant General Dan Halutz, who was formerly commander of the air force, believed that the "Kosovo doctrine" could be successfully applied to Lebanon. This strategy, which took its name from the NATO bombing campaign of the former Yugoslavia in 1999, called for Israel to take advantage of its technological superiority and its unchallenged aerial superiority and decide the war swiftly by "remote control" with massive bombing raids and "surgical strikes," which kill civilians as well.

Surprisingly, in the course of the thirty-three-day conflict, Israel was unable to subdue the Hizbullah fighters, who numbered no more than a few thousand. Moreover, the Israeli "home front" became a war front, as the population was unprotected and suffered tremendously from the Hizbullah rockets. The war was a clear Israeli failure. The tide of criticism that was unleashed in Israel after the war targeted the army's inefficiency and the political leadership's inexperience. One of the major lessons Israel drew from the fiasco of the Second Lebanon War was that the IDF must prepare better for the next war. It was also clear that the era of "civilian" defense ministers had ended with the brief tenure of Amir Peretz, who finally resigned in June 2007, and that future holders of the post would come from the heart of the security establishment. Thus, Peretz was succeeded by a former chief of staff, Ehud Barak. Other lessons, of a technical-military nature, were also learned. But there was one issue that was hardly referred to: the fact that the government had allowed the army an almost totally free hand in the war. Again the influence of the army within the military-political nexus in Israel became clear. In the meantime, Israel again turned its attention to the Palestinians.

The Gaza Strip, which was under the full control of Hamas since 14 June 2007, continued to be a source of rocket fire into Israel, and Israel did not stop its military operations there. In fact, the entire Strip was under a tight boycott, electricity and fuel supplies were minimal, and Gaza was completely cut off from the West Bank. Among other things, it seemed that the Palestinians in Gaza paid the price of supporting Hamas and denying the more moderate way of the FATAH-dominated Palestinian National Authority, which still controlled the West Bank. The cycle of QASSAM ROCKET attacks, followed by IDF raids, targeted assassinations, air raids, and attempts to strike at rocket-launching squads, continued as well. Even when Israel and Hamas were engaged in a cease-fire, silence did not occur. On 17 June 2008 an Egyptian-sponsored six-month truce was agreed upon by Israel and Hamas, set to last until 19 December 2008. On 4 November 2008 the Israeli army broke the truce when it sent an assault team backed by air cover into Gaza and killed seven militants. Subsequently Hamas announced the termination of the cease-fire and ratcheted up its rocket attacks. On 27 December 2008, Israel unleashed its massive air, sea, and ground campaign—"OPERATION CAST LEAD"—on Gaza, in a war that lasted twenty-two days, until 18 January 2009. On 19 September 2007, Israel had accorded a new status to Gaza when its Security Cabinet declared it a "hostile territory"—a characterization that was shortly afterward approved by the United States. Although the legal implications that Israel intended to attach to this status remain unclear, the political purpose of this declaration was immediately made known—the further reduction of the supply of fuel and electricity to Gaza.

The Gaza War again demonstrated the influence of the new militarism that prevailed in Israel, which included damage to INFRASTRUCTURE and harm to civilians. The war started with a massive surprise air strike that killed about 270 people and wounded 750 the first day. Most of them were Hamas members; however, among the objectives specifically targeted was a festive ceremony marking the completion of a training course for seventy police cadets. They were not combatants and were not even necessarily supporters of Hamas, but young men looking for gainful work in an area rife with unemployment. Their killing would probably not meet the test of international legal judgment. Indeed, in Israel itself there were deep differences of opinion about the legality of the attack on the ceremony. But IDF officers could not resist the temptation. Hamas, though taken by surprise by the air strike and its scale, continued to fire rockets at Israel and also showed that it had succeeded in vastly increasing their range. Now it was the southern half of Israel that took to the shelters. After a few days of mutual shelling and punishing air and artillery attacks by Israel, the IDF launched a ground operation, this time not delaying as it had done in Lebanon in 2006. In Gaza, the Israeli officers were determined to resuscitate the IDF's prestige, which had been battered in the Second Lebanon War. IDF troops advanced into the outlying neighborhoods of the city, demolishing houses and gunning down Palestinians, both Hamas fighters and noncombatant civilians. Even though Israeli public opinion overwhelmingly supported the war, the recurring questions surfaced again, and as in the past, neither the political nor the military leadership had clear answers: Did the operation have defined goals? Would the attacks on Palestinian civilians produce any concrete results?

The MEDIA was kept out of Gaza, but devastating reports emerged especially from Al-Jazeera, and have been broadcast across the globe. When the scale of the destruction and the number of civilian casualties—including a large proportion of children—began to become apparent, particularly in Europe and the Arab world, international initiatives for a cease-fire followed almost immediately. Though pleased at the blow sustained by Hamas, Israelis could not entirely ignore the hundreds of civilian dead and the thousands of wounded. Many in Israel sought to justify the ferocity of the operation by noting that Hamas had effectively established a small armed state in the Gaza Strip. But the “state” was hemmed in from all sides by the long Israeli-Egyptian siege, and its population of 1.4 million was deprived of basic commodities, including food, medicine, fuel, electricity, and other basic essentials for life. As the days wore on with no appreciable change in the situation and it became increasingly clear that the international pressure would eventuate in a cease-fire, the soldiers were urged by their commanders to “keep up the pressure.” Their rationale, invoked so often by the IDF in the past, and most recently in the Second Lebanon War, was based on the rhetoric that such pressure “will help the government reach the best arrangement possible.” Some again looked for a “victory photo” to satisfy the IDF and perhaps also the political leadership, which waged an election campaign throughout the operation and did not want to be considered “soft” on Hamas. In any war, even if the army is careful, in a new war civilians are being killed constantly. As for the declarations of many Israeli leaders, such as Foreign Minister, TZIPORA LIVNI that “Hamas does not represent any legitimate aspiration of the Palestinian people,” and that the conflict will be resolved when Israel finds a “legitimate partner” to talk to, this was little more than an updated version of the “third way” that was first adopted by Sharon, according to which you do not make peace with your enemy you just please the vast majority of Israelis and your allies, in this case the Bush administration and its demand for Israeli moderation.

Thus, the Gaza War was over, but few basic “truths” concerning the Israeli attitude in the new millennium remained unchanged: First, most Israelis accepted the militaristic-religious definition according to which the reason for the Palestinian war against Israel is not the Occupation but their unwillingness to recognize Israel's right to exist. Second, with the decline of hegemonic statism and the nation-in-arms arrangements, a new version of militarism evolved in Israel. It is no longer the all-embracing statist militarism, which included “everybody,” and it is no longer a “no-choice” militarism that was based on the argument of the small Israel that has to protect itself against its surroundings. It is now the militarism of a sector that gained influence and even predominance in Israel, a militarism that is based on an ultra-ethnonational perspective, a new religious-nationalism, fundamentalism, dehumanization, and even racism. It is a militarism that wants to preserve Greater Israel even at the price of constant war. It is a militarism of a sector that does not form the majority in Israel but that various circumstances, including mistakes that were committed by the Palestinians, have brought to the fore. To conclude, the vast shadow of Israel's new militarism, which flourishes in the global era, can definitely be regarded as one reason for the impossibility of peace in Middle East.

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; INTIFADAS; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Avishai, Bernard. The Tragedy of Zionism: How Its Revolutionary Past Haunts Israeli Democracy. New York: Watson-Guptill Publications, 2002.
- Ben-Eliezer, Uri. "Is a Military Coup Possible in Israel? Israel and French-Algeria in Comparative Historical-Sociological Perspective." Theory and Society. 27:3 (1998).
- . The Making of Israeli Militarism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- . Old Conflict, New War, Israel in the Second Intifada. (Hebrew). Tel-Aviv: Tel-Aviv University Press, 2009.
- . "Post-Modern Armies and the Question of Peace and War: The Israeli Defense Forces in the New Times." International Journal of Middle East Studies. 36:1 (2004).
- Berghahn, Volker R. Militarism: The History of International Debate 1861–1979. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1981.
- Blum-Halevi, Yosi. "A Civil War Will Erupt in the Summer." Gush Katif. www.katif.net.
- Gordon, Neve. Israel's Occupation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2008.
- Grinberg, Lev, ed. Contested Memory: Myth, Nation and Democracy. (Hebrew). Beer-Sheva: Humphrey Institute for Social Research, 2000.
- Kaldor, Mary. "Nationalism and Globalization." In History and National Destiny: Ethnosymbolism and Its Critics. Edited by Montserrat Guibernau and John Hutchinson. Oxford: Blackwell, 2004.
- . New and Old Wars, Organized Violence in a Global Era. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1999.
- Keisari, Uri. "Bereaved Mothers." Ma'ariv, (Hebrew). 5 May 1957.
- Kidron, Peretz, ed. Refusenik! Israel's Soldiers of Conscience. London: Zed Books, 2004.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. The Invention and Decline of Israeliness: State, Society, and the Military. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.
- Levi, Yagil. From "People's Army" to "Army of the Peripheries". (Hebrew). Jerusalem: Carmel, 2007.
- Livne, Neri, "The Sacred Cows of the Bereavement," Ha'aretz. 31 July 1998.

- Lomsky-Feder, Edna, and Eyal Ben-Ari, eds. The Military and Militarism in Israeli Society. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Marantz, Haim. "Insufficient Effort." Nekuda. June 1993. (Hebrew).
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–49. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Peri, Yoram. Between Battles and Ballots, Israeli Military in Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- . Brothers at War: Rabin's Assassination and the Cultural War in Israel. (Hebrew). Tel Aviv: Babel, 2005.
- Ram, Uri. The Globalization of Israel: McWorld in Tel Aviv, Jihad in Jerusalem. (Hebrew). Tel-Aviv: Resling, 2005.
- Segal, H. "Back to Trumpeldor." Ma'ariv. 28 March 1998. (Hebrew).
- Van Creveld, Martin. The Sword and the Olive: A Critical History of the Israeli Defense Forces. New York: PublicAffairs, 1998.
- Ze'evi, Rechavam. "Oh My Beloved Country." Ma'ariv. 9 August 1996. (Hebrew).

—Uri Ben-Eliezer

Israeli Military Court System in the Occupied Territories

The Israeli military court system in the WEST BANK and GAZA is the criminal justice component of the military administration that was established in 1967, when Israel occupied these regions after the 1967 WAR. This court system is different and separate from the system used to court-martial Israeli soldiers and is also distinct from the legal system for Israelis, including those who live in the Jewish SETTLEMENTS. Although the nature of Israel's OCCUPATION of the West Bank and Gaza was somewhat altered by the OSLO ACCORDS and the establishment of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in 1994, the military courts have continued to function and likely will do so as long as the Occupation of any part of these regions endures.

The military courts are used to prosecute Palestinians arrested by the Israeli military and charged with security violations and other offenses, including a wide array of nonviolent activities. Under the Israeli Occupation, punishable activities encompass anything the Israeli authorities deem menacing to Israel's security or disruptive of order. Even Palestinians' normal activities, including EDUCATION, marriage, work, HEALTH CARE, and movement, have been regulated by military and emergency laws that impose criminal sanctions for breaches and violations.

The military court system has been a subject of ongoing controversy. Some of its inherent problems include blurring and contradictions between the military and legal dimensions of Israeli control over foreign civilians, the use of soldiers in a policing capacity, and the complex and unpredictable nature of the laws enforced through the courts. Moreover, military law and practice have no presumption of innocence; the three-pronged practice of arrest, interrogation, and prosecution is premised on the presumption of guilt. This is evident in the fact that any soldier can arrest any Palestinian for the slightest suspicion or cause, and, once arrested, individuals can be held incommunicado for prolonged periods. The presumption of guilt is further confirmed by widespread judicial refusal to release detainees on bail, impediments to and prolonged denials of lawyer-client meetings, and a pattern of judicial concession to prosecutors' requests for extension of detention. Controversies and criticisms of the military court system extend to disputed interpretations about the applicability of international humanitarian and human rights laws to Israeli rule in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, compounded by the combined effects of the enduring conflict, Palestinian statelessness, and Israeli aspirations to retain permanent control over all or part of the territories.

How the System Works

Three bodies of legislation are enforced through the military courts: original Israeli military legislation, the 1945 British Defense (Emergency) Regulations, and local criminal laws (Jordanian in the West Bank and Egyptian in Gaza). Israeli Military Orders (MOs) constitute the main body of law regulating the operation of the military courts. They also designate specific offenses, including the following:

- Violations of security (sabotage or attacks on military installations, possession or carrying of firearms, attacks on ROADS, spying)
- Criminal offenses with security implications (forms of political/national speech and association, failure to prevent or report planned attacks, distribution of literature or organization of activities that disrupt order)
- Offenses relating to the operation of the military courts (escaping from custody, committing perjury, disobeying a summons to appear in court)

- Criminal offenses not related to security (failure to pay taxes, bribery, or trade violations, to cite a few)

By the early 1990s the Israeli military had promulgated over 1,300 MOs for the West Bank and over 1,000 for Gaza. The criminal provisions of the British Defense Regulations outlaw membership in an "illegal organization" (which Israel interprets as including Palestinian nationalist and Islamist organizations and factions), aiding and abetting members of illegal organizations, and threats to public order and safety. Since 1967 hundreds of thousands of Palestinians have been arrested by the Israeli military. Not all Palestinians who are arrested are prosecuted in the military court system; some are released, while others undergo ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION without charges. Of those who are charged, approximately 90 to 95 percent are convicted.

The ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) do not maintain records of the total number of people who have been prosecuted in the military courts. But according to a widely acknowledged rule of thumb, approximately 50 percent of Palestinians who are arrested are released or administratively detained without charges, and the other 50 percent are charged with crimes and prosecuted. Approximately 813,000 Palestinians were arrested between 1967 and 1993. During the First Intifada (1987–1993) at least 20,000 to 25,000 were arrested every year, the highest per capita incarceration rate in the world at that time. In 1994 and 1995, the start of the Oslo Accords, arrest rates declined to approximately 6,000 per year. Between 1996 and September 2000 the annual average varied from 1,200 to 3,600. Between 29 September 2000 (the start of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA) and September 2002 approximately 15,000 were arrested. The total estimated number of prosecutions since 1967 is over half a million.

Main Participants

The military court system has five main categories of participants: judges, prosecutors, defense lawyers, translators, and defendants. All judges, prosecutors, and translators are Israeli citizens and soldiers. All of the judges are Jewish Israelis, as are most of the prosecutors, although a few of the latter are Israeli Druze (an ethnoreligious sect), as are most of the translators. Defense lawyers, all civilians, include Palestinian residents of the Occupied Territories, Jewish Israeli citizens, and PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL (i.e., Arab Israelis). The defendants are Palestinian residents of the Occupied Territories.

The administration of the military court system is under the direct authority of the military advocate general, appointed by the minister of defense. For the judiciary the administrative hierarchy is (1) military advocate general, (2) president of the military court of appeals (established in 1989), (3) presidents of military courts, and (4) other judges. In principle judges are obliged to act impartially and to ensure the fair enforcement of the law. In practice some judges regard their role as complementary to that of the prosecutors and tend to emphasize the need for close coordination of military and legal measures to maintain Israeli security, order, and control, whereas others strive to maintain a degree of judicial impartiality toward prosecution evidence.

The prosecution is administratively distinct from the judiciary, although judges and prosecutors (and translators) are members of the same IDF unit. The administrative hierarchy for the prosecution is (1) military advocate general, (2) legal advisor (West Bank and Gaza), (3) head prosecutor (West Bank and Gaza), (4) head prosecutors of military courts, and (5) other prosecutors. The prosecutors' primary concern is the conviction of the accused. They have less latitude and discretion than prosecutors in civilian courts because their work is overseen and directed by their superiors in the military hierarchy, and their mandate (including penalties for charges and sentencing guidelines) is defined by directives coming from the military establishment.

Translators are required in this court system because many Palestinians from the Occupied Territories cannot speak Hebrew and many Jewish Israelis cannot speak Arabic. Translators use their bilingual Arabic-Hebrew skills during court proceedings to enable judges, prosecutors, and defense lawyers to understand one another and to communicate their points. Translators also assist, when necessary, in out-of-court discussions (e.g., negotiating plea bargains).

The Israeli and Palestinian defense lawyers who practice in the military court system in the West Bank and Gaza provide a variety of legal and extralegal services. They represent people who have been arrested and defend the rights of the accused throughout the legal process. Lawyers also visit clients in prison and many encourage or console PRISONERS as they endure the travails of prosecution and incarceration, and serve as their link to family members. Lawyers who are members of the Israel Bar Association (i.e., Israeli citizens) have the prerogative to submit petitions to the Israel HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (HCJ) in order to challenge military administrative measures, including the treatment of clients at the hands of soldiers or interrogators, or other matters that relate to arrest, interrogation, and pretrial detention. However, the HCJ does not entertain petitions concerning the functioning or decisions of the military courts.

All Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza are potential defendants, because all are subject to the jurisdiction of the military court system. A defendant's participation in the military court system may include arrest, interrogation, prosecution, and imprisonment and/or fining. There is no legal requirement that a Palestinian's arrest be preceded by a detention order or that a person be informed of the reason for arrest when taken into custody. Although there is a provision for habeas corpus (challenging the lawfulness of an arrest and the necessity of detention), in practice this is treated as a request for release on bail, and bail is almost never granted. In most cases people are detained throughout the proceedings until their cases are concluded.

Confessions as Primary Evidence

In the vast majority of military court convictions, the primary (or sometimes only) evidence against the accused is a confession (first- and/or third-party) extracted during interrogations. The IDF and the police conduct some interrogations, but the main agency responsible for interrogation is the General Security Service (GSS, also known by its Hebrew acronyms SHIN BET and Shabak). Interrogations feed the legal process by procuring confessions that are then turned over to police and prosecutors. Over 97 percent of all cases in which charges are brought are concluded through a plea bargain rather than a trial. Plea bargain agreements must be accepted and confirmed by judges in court, and judges have the authority to reject or alter a negotiated deal.

There are three categories of military courts, distinguished by their number of judges (one or three) and their maximum sentencing power. Until July 1991 the maximum sentence that could be issued by a one-judge court was five years in prison, but this was raised to a maximum of ten years. Three-judge courts are empowered to pass sentences up to the maximum of life in prison or the death penalty. Although several death sentences have been handed down by military courts, all were subsequently commuted to life sentences. The military court of appeals, established in 1989, is composed of a three-judge panel, although there is a provision for a five-judge panel. No decision of a military court (including the court of appeals) has status as a legally binding precedent. Consequently there is a great deal of disparity in the sentences issued for similar charges.

Until 1994 the military courts were located in the Palestinian towns of Ramallah, HEBRON, NABLUS, JENIN, Tulkarem, and Gaza; the courts in Jenin and Tulkarem were set up during the First Intifada. After the Israeli military redeployment negotiated under the Oslo Accords, the military courts were relocated to West Bank military bases at Beit El and Adoreim and the Gaza base at Erez. There are also military courts attached to prisons and detention centers to handle hearings for extensions of detention and appeals against administrative detention.

History

The Israeli military court system was established on the third day of the 1967 War as one of the first official acts of the military administration. Its timing suggests a high degree of Israeli preparedness for Occupation. The most extensive prewar planning occurred under the direction of MEIR SHAMGAR, who served as the military advocate general from 1961 to 1968. In the mid-1960s Shamgar developed skeletal exercises in military government problems for his unit and prepared a comprehensive Manual for the Military Advocate in Military Government, which included a large set of precedents from military government proclamations and orders, as well as detailed legal and organizational instructions and guidelines.

Before the 1967 War, Shamgar also conceived the principles of a legal doctrine for Israeli control of occupied territory and rule over Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza. This doctrine incorporates a number of interrelated components and premises. First, Shamgar reasoned that Israeli control of these areas would not constitute a “foreign occupation,” because they were part of the historic Jewish homeland (Eretz Yisrael) and because the displaced rulers, JORDAN and EGYPT, were themselves occupiers who had seized control during the 1948 WAR. In his interpretation of international humanitarian law, territory is occupied in war only if it was clearly part of the sovereign domain of the defeated and expelled state. According to Shamgar’s formulation Israel was not occupying but rather administrating these disputed areas, whose legal status was sui generis.

The original proclamation establishing a military court system in June 1967 declared that the military courts would be run in accordance with the Fourth Geneva Convention (the most important international humanitarian law pertaining to the occupation of conquered territories and their civilian population), and soldiers were instructed to abide by this convention in any instance where there was a contradiction between it and original military legislation. However, the second element of Shamgar’s legal doctrine, which builds on the first, holds that the Fourth Geneva Convention, promulgated in the aftermath of World War II, is not applicable to Israeli rule on a de jure basis. If it were, Shamgar reasoned, this would constitute an acknowledgment of Israel’s own status as an occupier. The Fourth Geneva Convention delineates the rights and duties of “High Contracting Parties” (i.e., signatory states) vis-à-vis territories and populations of other high contracting parties. Because Jordan and Egypt were not sovereigns in the West Bank and Gaza, according to Shamgar’s reasoning, they did not have the status as high contracting parties in these areas. And although Israel is a high contracting party to the Geneva Conventions, this would have no bearing on territories that are not occupied.

A third component of Shamgar’s doctrine was that Israel would abide by the Fourth Geneva Convention on a de facto basis and would respect its “humanitarian provisions.” However, Israeli officials have never specified which provisions of the convention they do—or do not—regard as humanitarian, whereas the International Committee of the Red Cross, the official guardian of the Geneva Conventions, regards them as humanitarian in their entirety and rejects any attempts to interpret this legislation selectively.

A fourth component of Shamgar’s doctrine holds that the Fourth Geneva Convention could not be binding on Israel, even if there were no dispute over the status of the West Bank and Gaza, because at least part of the convention constitutes “conventional” rather than “customary” INTERNATIONAL LAW. Therefore, the convention would not supersede “local” laws unless the Israeli Knesset enacted it as domestic legislation or until the state recognized that it has acquired status as customary international law. However, the international community overwhelmingly regards the Geneva Conventions as customary international law.

Shamgar’s doctrine essentially interpreted Palestinian statelessness as rightlessness and provided the Israeli state with carte blanche for control of legal proceedings in the West Bank and Gaza. By interpreting the Fourth Geneva Convention as pertaining exclusively to the rights and duties of sovereign states, Shamgar asserted that the Palestinian people could not be the rightful sovereigns of the West Bank and Gaza, because nothing in international law prescribes the recognition of sovereignty to a “non-state” or demands the creation of a heretofore nonexistent state in territories seized in war. This doctrine also provided the legal basis for the establishment of civilian (Jewish Israeli) settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. Mentioning a de facto commitment to undefined “humanitarian provisions” was a means of acknowledging that Palestinians have some rights as individuals, but not as a national entity. Shamgar’s doctrine and his interpretations of international law on which it was based became the foundation of official Israeli policy and were reinforced by the HCJ.

Military Courts Established in 1967

Following Israel’s 1967 conquest of the West Bank and Gaza with their 1.5 million Palestinian inhabitants (a population that now numbers over 3.6 million), one-third of the population living under Israeli rule was Palestinian Arab. The Israeli military court system was accorded concurrent jurisdiction with local (Palestinian) courts in the West Bank and Gaza and was empowered to try Palestinian residents of the territories for crimes committed outside the territories (personal jurisdiction), in the territories (territorial jurisdiction), or anywhere that might have an impact on the security situation in the territories (extraterritorial jurisdiction). To ensure that Israeli citizens in the West Bank and Gaza would not be subject to the military and emergency laws or the jurisdiction of the military courts, on 2 July 1967 the Knesset enacted a law giving domestic Israeli courts concurrent jurisdiction with courts in the territories for Israeli settlers.

From the outset, Israel also used the draconian British Defense (Emergency) Regulations of 1945 to govern and punish Palestinians. Although the Defense Regulations were used against Arab citizens of Israel for decades, the first challenges to their legality were mounted in the Israeli Supreme Court on behalf of petitioners from the West Bank and Gaza after 1967. One challenge contested the state’s right to use these laws because the British had revoked the Defense Regulations on 12 May 1948, several days before the BRITISH MANDATE ended, and thus they were no longer in effect when Israel declared independence on 15 May 1948. The official Israeli response was that the regulations had remained in force because the British did not publish the revocation order in the Palestine Gazette, thus terming their cancellation a “hidden law,” a position upheld and confirmed by the HCJ in 1979.

A second challenge contested the legality of the regulations on the grounds that many of their provisions were outlawed by developments in international law since World War II. Israel’s official position held that it was required by the Fourth Geneva Convention to maintain the regulations in the West Bank and Gaza as part of the “local laws” in force at the time of the conquest, implying that the Jordanian and Egyptian governments also rejected the validity of the British revocation, even though the regulations were never used in either region between 1948 and 1967. Thus, the Israeli government used the Fourth Geneva Convention to justify the maintenance of the regulations, while disregarding the convention’s prohibition of their anachronistic and illegal provisions.

In the early years of the Occupation, manifestations of Palestinian resistance were limited for the most part to armed attacks by fida’iyyun (fighters), including both those residing in the Occupied Territories and others who crossed the borders from surrounding Arab states. Some captured fida’iyyun were tried and convicted in the new military courts. But at that early stage the court system was functioning in a rather limited capacity, because the Israeli authorities mainly used administrative detention and DEPORTATION to punish and deter ARMED STRUGGLE. In 1970–1971 the Israeli military undertook a “pacification” campaign to quell the resistance in Gaza. The imposed quiescence provided the authorities with the latitude to institute more legalistic means of control, including expanding the military court system.

Interrogation was increasingly aimed at producing confessions to be used for conviction. Israeli and Palestinian defense lawyers working in the military court system began reporting claims by their clients of beatings, electric shock, death threats, position abuse, cold showers, sexual abuse, and denial of access to toilets. The official response condemned reports of such torture and ill-treatment during Israeli interrogations as anti-Israel lies and smears and asserted that such claims were based on pernicious fabrications by Palestinians and other “enemies of the state.” Consequently, many international observers were skeptical or reluctant to label Israel a torturing state.

In 1977 the Sunday Times (London) published a detailed inquiry into “Arab allegations and official Israeli denials of the use of torture.” The Times reported that “torture of Arab prisoners is so widespread and systematic that it cannot be dismissed as ‘rogue cops’ exceeding orders. It appears to be sanctioned as deliberate policy.” The Israeli government, through its embassy in London, ridiculed the findings and conclusions of the article as “fantastic horror stories” in a response on 3 July 1977. Nevertheless, Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN ordered a curtailment of violent interrogation tactics. As a result allegations of torture declined for the next several years. To compensate, beginning around 1979 the GSS developed a new technique to gather information and extract confessions: the procurement and use of Palestinian COLLABORATORS (‘asafir, literally “birds”) in prisons.

In the late 1970s intensified LAND confiscations and Jewish settlement activity, combined with the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty, led to an escalation of Palestinian protests and resistance, which in turn led to an escalating number of arrests and interrogations. By the early 1980s the hiatus on torture had ended. An important legal development relating to interrogation was instituted in 1981: henceforth, a person could be convicted on the basis of a third-party confession, whereas previously a conviction required either a first-party confession or material evidence. This change institutionalized the admissibility of hearsay in the military court system. It also benefited the GSS agents, because each conviction that resulted from such interrogations was recorded as a credit in an agent’s personnel file.

International Attention to Court System

From the beginning of the Occupation through the end of the 1970s, very little scholarly or political attention was directed to the operations of the Israeli military court system or the legality of the means used to govern Palestinians. The first efforts to redress this lacuna and forge a legal critique of Israeli military rule were undertaken by a few military court lawyers. The process began in 1979 with the creation of Law in the Service of Man (LSM, later renamed AL-HAQ), the first Palestinian human rights organization and a West Bank affiliate of the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ).

In 1980 two of LSM/al-Haq’s founders, Raja SHEHADEH and Jonathan Kuttab, published The West Bank and the Rule of Law. This book described changes in the West Bank legal system since the onset of Occupation and was the first effort to compile a comprehensive account of Israel’s uses of emergency laws and military orders. A rejoinder to Shehadeh and Kuttab’s book was published in 1981 under the title The Rule of Law in the Territories Administered by Israel. Although not an official publication, it was authored by Israeli government lawyers and thus quickly acquired status as one of the most important public articulations of the government’s legal basis for its policies. These publications spurred a mounting body of scholarship and reporting about the military court system and more thorough and sophisticated critiques of Israel’s violations of international law in the Occupied Territories, as well as more detailed elaborations of the legal framework for official policies and rejoinders to critical assessments.

By the mid-1980s more human rights organizations were established in the Occupied Territories and in Israel. In this period international organizations were becoming increasingly attentive to the situation in the Occupied Territories because of escalating tensions in the region, including Israel’s invasion of LEBANON in 1982, the evacuation of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) leadership to Tunisia, and the massacre of hundreds of civilians by the Lebanese PHALANGE in the SABRA AND SHATILA refugee camps outside Beirut. In 1985 the Israeli military administration imposed a harsh “IRON FIST” POLICY in the West Bank and Gaza to crush and punish resistance to the Occupation and any demonstrations of support for other Palestinian communities.

Amnesty International (AI), the most prominent international human rights organization at that time, focused on political prisoners, fair trials, and an end to torture and executions. In its work in Israel, AI refused to accept Israel's argument that membership in the PLO automatically constituted the advocacy or use of violence and was therefore a punishable offense. However, in comparison to its coverage of the situation in apartheid South Africa, AI was more cautious in its support for Palestinian prisoners and more circumspect in its criticisms of Israel. For example, AI did not use the word "torture" in reports on Israel until 1990.

In 1987 two scandals involving the GSS—the summary execution of captured Palestinian prisoners (who had hijacked a bus) and a charge by a Circassian Israeli soldier that he had been tortured to elicit the confession that had been used to prosecute him (for treason)—prompted the government to appoint an official commission of inquiry, headed by MOSHE LANDAU, a retired justice of the Israeli Supreme Court. Among its findings the LANDAU COMMISSION report confirmed that GSS agents had used violent interrogation methods routinely on Palestinian detainees since at least 1971 and that they had routinely lied about such practices when confessions were challenged in court on the grounds that they had been coerced. Although the Landau Commission was harsh in its criticism of GSS perjury, it adopted the GSS's own position that coercive interrogation tactics are necessary in the struggle against "hostile terrorist activity." The Landau Commission accepted the broad definition of TERRORISM used by the GSS, which encompasses not only acts or threats of violence but virtually all activities related to Palestinian nationalism.

The Landau Commission argued that Israeli penal law could be interpreted to give interrogators license to use "moderate amounts of physical pressure" as well as various forms of psychological intimidation as part of the fight against terrorism. The legality of such pressure, the commission reasoned, could be justified under the "necessity defense," which permits people to use violence in "self-defense," thereby mitigating criminal liability on the grounds that they are acting to prevent grievous harm. The specific interrogation methods that the Landau Commission recommended were contained in a classified appendix to the report. The Israeli government adopted the Landau Commission's recommendation to authorize "moderate physical pressure," making Israel the first state in the world to "legalize" and publicly sanction interrogation methods that constitute torture according to international law.

The Landau Commission report's publication (30 October 1987) and its endorsement by the Israeli Cabinet (November 8) coincided with the outbreak of the First Intifada (uprising) on 9 December 1987. Between 1988 and July 1993 some 100,000 Palestinians were arrested by Israeli forces, and 83,321 were prosecuted. This massive increase in arrests, interrogations, prosecutions, and imprisonment focused unprecedented attention on the military court system. Extensive MEDIA coverage of the popular resistance and the military's responses increased international awareness of the Occupation and demands for information; every local human rights organization in Israel/Palestine and many international organizations issued reports on some aspect(s) of the military court system.

Arrest and Interrogation

Arrest and interrogation are two complementary and coordinated means for any state to investigate individuals suspected of crimes. In the West Bank and Gaza, every Israeli soldier has the authority to arrest any Palestinian if he or she suspects that the person has committed, planned, or conspired to commit an offense. These arrests and interrogations of Palestinians are often violent, which is deliberate and calibrated to induce and exacerbate suffering. A second type, "initiated" arrests, generally is ordered by the GSS and carried out by the military, often in the middle of the night. Upon arrest detainees are turned over to the GSS for interrogation. "Roundups," a third type of arrest, sometimes involve mass arrests at demonstrations or public events, or in the course of military operations. In roundups GSS agents do a brief check on each person, keeping people they want to interrogate and turning over those suspected of minor offenses to the IDF or Israeli police for interrogation.

A detained Palestinian from the West Bank or Gaza can be held in custody for up to eighteen days without charges before being brought before a judge. This breaks down as follows: ninety-six hours of detention on the order of any soldier and two seven-day extensions of detention on the order of police officers, usually at the request of the GSS. Following the initial eighteen days, detention can be extended by order of a judge. Extension-of-detention hearings usually take place in prisons, although sometimes extension hearings are held in regular military courts. Typically prosecutors request an extension of detention when the interrogation has not been completed (i.e., the person has not confessed) or when the authorities have not had time to act on the confession (e.g., arresting people implicated in the detainee's statement). A judge can grant an extension of detention without charges for up to six months. In 1992 a new policy was issued that reduced the maximum time allowed before an extension hearing from eighteen to eight days for minors and people suspected of simple crimes. But there was no institutionalized oversight of this shortened detention, and its implementation was irregular.

Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) are authorized to meet with detainees on the fourteenth day of detention to review who is in custody and their conditions and treatment. But by the terms of the agreement between the Israeli government and the ICRC, the latter's representatives are barred from relaying information about detainees' conditions or whereabouts to others, including lawyers and family members. Although, in principle, detained Palestinians have the right to meet with a lawyer, lawyer-client meetings tend to be prohibited as long as the person is undergoing interrogation. Provisions in military legislation can prohibit detainees from any access to lawyers for up to ninety days. Interrogators have the authority to prevent a lawyer-client meeting for up to thirty days (two fifteen-day periods, the second on the order of someone of higher rank than the person who ordered the first period). Following that, a military judge can issue another thirty-day order barring the meeting, and a third thirty-day order can be issued by the president or acting president of a military court. In April 2002, during major offensive operations in the West Bank, the IDF issued MO 1500, reaffirming the policy that allowed eighteen days of incommunicado detention. This order instituted a blanket prohibition of lawyers' right to meet with clients for the first eighteen days. In response to a petition submitted to the HCJ, the order was amended in July 2002. Under MO 1505, prisoners could be held incommununicado for twelve days, but lawyers would have to petition the courts on a case-by-case basis to meet with their clients after that period.

The age of "criminal responsibility" in the Occupied Territories is twelve. Children younger than twelve can be arrested but not interrogated. Palestinians twelve and older are classified legally as "minors"; those aged twelve to thirteen are "juveniles" and those aged fourteen to sixteen are "youths." The maximum sentence is six months for juveniles and one year for youths who are convicted of minor security violations, such as demonstrating, writing graffiti, throwing stones (if no injury resulted), and building or manning barricades. However, maximum sentence restrictions do not apply for juveniles convicted of more serious security violations, including murder and attempted murder, attacks and weapons possession, and membership in an illegal organization. During the First Intifada throwing stones was made into a felony offense and classified as an assault with weapons; Palestinians sixteen and younger have received sentences of up to four years in prison for throwing stones.

Interrogation Techniques

Approximately 85 percent of arrestees are interrogated. In 1993 the Gaza Community Mental Health Programme published findings of a study based on a sample of 477 Palestinian ex-prisoners who had spent between six months and ten years in prison. Of this total, 91.7 percent had spent five years or less in prison, meaning that they were convicted of minor crimes. The findings documented the incidence of specific interrogation methods as percentages of the sample: beatings (95.8 percent), verbal humiliation (94.8 percent), exposure to extreme cold (92.9 percent), prolonged standing (91.6 percent), threats against personal safety (90.6 percent), solitary confinement (86 percent), intense noise (81.6 percent), food deprivation (77.4 percent), exposure to extreme heat (76.7 percent), sleep deprivation (71.5 percent), forced witnessing of torture of other detainees (70.2 percent), pressure applied on the neck (68.1 percent), pressure applied on the testicles (66 percent), witnessing torture of family members (28.1 percent), threats of torture or rape of female family members (27.9 percent), tear gas (13.4 percent), pushing instruments into the penis or rectum (11.1 percent), and electric shock (5.9 percent). Other studies and investigations of interrogation tactics have generated similar findings.

Although far fewer Palestinian women and girls have been arrested than men and boys, the number is nevertheless in the thousands. Palestinian females who are arrested are subjected to many of the same interrogation methods as males. They are also subjected to special methods that exploit their gender, such as sexual harassment and abuse, and techniques and threats that manipulate notions of “female honor” and women’s feelings for their family members, especially their children.

After the publication of the Landau Commission report in 1987, lawyers mounted a protracted campaign of litigation in the HCJ to challenge the legality of interrogation tactics used on Palestinians. In 1990 a group of Israeli lawyers and human rights activists formed the PUBLIC COMMITTEE AGAINST TORTURE IN ISRAEL (PCATI) to spearhead a campaign to end the use of torture. This litigation, along with the hundreds of petitions by lawyers representing Palestinian prisoners, forced the state to admit or acknowledge that its permissible methods included the routine use of threats and insults, sleep deprivation, hooding and blindfolding, position abuse, physical violence (including “shaking,” which produces a whiplash effect and leaves no physical marks), solitary confinement (including in refrigerated or overheated closet-like cells), and subjection to excessively filthy conditions.

In 1993 the Israeli government reported that the GSS had modified its interrogation procedures, although these changes remained classified. The HCJ granted relief in certain cases, but its general pattern of decisions and delays served to preserve the secrecy of GSS interrogation practices and, in effect, to support the state’s refusal to adhere to international law in its treatment of Palestinian detainees. This litigation also revealed information about GSS interrogations. For example, the state confirmed three interrelated types of treatment for detainees: active interrogation, “waiting,” and “rest.” Waiting entailed physical discomfort (often extreme) and sleep deprivation to prepare (i.e., “soften up”) the detainee for the interrogation. Most detainees were held in waiting twenty-four hours a day for five-and-a-half-day intervals, the only interruptions being active interrogation and three daily five-minute breaks when the detainee is placed in a toilet in order to relieve himself and at the same time is given his meal. Detainees are placed in the “rest” position during the Sabbath, when the GSS interrogators go home, at which time they are unhooded and unshackled in cells where they can sleep.

In January 1998 the HCJ combined a number of petitions pertaining to interrogation tactics and convened a panel of nine justices to consider the matter. On 6 September 1999 the court rendered a decision in PCATI v. State of Israel (HCJ 5100/94) that prohibited GSS agents from routinely using physical “pressure,” although the decision neither called these tactics “torture” nor completely excluded their continued use under exceptional circumstances. After the ruling some methods all but disappeared (e.g., violent shaking, covering a detainee’s head with a thick cloth sack, and exposure to extremely loud and constant music). But other methods remain common practice, including sleep deprivation, position abuse and painful shackling, exposure to extremes in temperature, and intense pressure applied to various body parts.

In addition to the use of various physical and psychological “pressure” tactics, interrogators routinely have used Palestinian collaborators in prison (‘asafir) to elicit confessions. The two main tactics in the ‘asafir repertoire, deception and violence, are often used in sequence, and anything prisoners say to ‘asafir is treated as evidence. Some ‘asafir are special agents planted in prisons, but many are prisoners themselves who were recruited while undergoing interrogation or serving a sentence. Although the First Intifada caused a near-total collapse of the Palestinian collaborator network, a reorganization of the military and security apparatus compensated for this collapse by recruiting a new network of informants within prisons and using strategies of entrapment, such as promises of shorter sentences, vital services (e.g., medical treatment), or better prison conditions.

Legal Process

Once the interrogation is finished, the prosecutor prepares the charge sheet if there is a confession and/or other forms of evidence to charge the detainee, and the legal process begins. If a confession is the main evidence, the prosecutor needs an additional scintilla (that is, a minimum of evidence upon which to validate a charge, dvar ma in Hebrew). In the military court system the scintilla could be the protocol of the extension-of-detention hearing; if a detainee failed to tell the presiding judge that he is “innocent,” the prosecutor could use this as an admission of guilt. Given that detainees often are not represented by counsel at extension-of-detention hearings, many are unaware that declaring their innocence is an option. Corroborating evidence can also include the testimony of an arresting soldier, information that a particular event for which the defendant is being charged actually occurred, or secret evidence.

In the domestic Israeli criminal justice system a confession must pass certain logical tests to ensure that it was not invented by the accused, such as a scintilla that the accused had the opportunity to commit the crime or that the confession does not contradict other evidence. However, in the military court system the scintilla does not have to corroborate the confession or even to implicate the accused directly. All it has to show is a possible connection between the accused and the crime. Even when a defendant subsequently rescinds a confession on the grounds that it was coerced or when other exculpatory information becomes available, the military court has the option to retain—and prefer—the confession over other evidence.

In principle a defense lawyer can challenge a confession that a client claims was coerced by calling for a zuta (voir dire; often called a “mini-trial” or a “trial-within-a-trial”). This entails a hearing in camera, in which a judge hears testimony from the defendant, the interrogators, and any others who have relevant information (e.g., police, prison guards, and doctors). But for such a challenge to succeed the judge would have to consider the testimony of the defendant more credible than that of the interrogators. In the history of the military court system, there are almost no instances in which a judge threw out a confession as a result of a zuta, and most defense lawyers are disinclined to attempt using this procedure because the client can face greater punishment as reprisal for “wasting the court’s time.”

Secret evidence is always the basis for extrajudicial incarceration (i.e., administrative detention). Within the military court system prosecutors can use secret evidence as a basis for charges, much of which comes from Palestinian collaborators. The collaborator network forms an integral part of the state’s resources to gather incriminating information that can be used to detain, charge, and prosecute suspects. To ensure a continuing source of information and to protect Palestinians who collaborate from reprisals by other Palestinians, it is crucial to maintain a high level of secrecy. Israeli officials and spokespeople for the military have justified the use of secret evidence as necessary in light of the security situation in the Occupied Territories, where fighting crime and maintaining order are treated as tantamount to counterinsurgency. Secret evidence is unavailable to either the defense lawyer or the defendant, which means that the defense is afforded no opportunity to know its contents or contest its veracity. Under such circumstances a defense lawyer’s only option is to request that the judge evaluate the merits of the secret evidence. Thus, the judge becomes the de facto representative of the defendant, since the lawyer is barred from playing such a role.

The overwhelming majority of the legal work in the military court system involves plea bargaining. Defense lawyers and prosecutors negotiate over the charges and the merits of evidence in a case to come to an agreement on the sentence. For the defense the incentive to plea bargain is a negative one: a defeat at trial is considered the most likely outcome, with the consequence of a higher sentence. For the prosecution the incentive is a positive one: an assured conviction of the accused saves the time, effort, and resources that a trial would entail. In many criminal court systems plea bargaining is the routine and predominant way to resolve most cases. Proponents laud its expediency, while detractors deride the “presumption of guilt.” In the military court system the official Israeli position holds that plea bargaining is a just and efficient resolution to cases in which the defendant has already confessed to the crime(s) and/or there is corroborating evidence that would ensure a conviction at trial.

The prevalence of plea bargaining in this system derives, in large part, from the many advantages that prosecutors enjoy. These include administrative and legal provisions that allow detainees to be held incommunicado for prolonged periods and impede lawyer-client meetings, the prevalent and routine use of coercive interrogation tactics to obtain confessions, the weight given to confessions as evidence and difficulties in challenging them in court, the use of secret evidence that is unavailable to defense lawyers or defendants, and a general tendency by judges to accept prosecution evidence and prefer it to exculpatory evidence or contradictory testimony from defendants and defense witnesses.

Lawyers for Palestinians

In the first years of the Occupation, very few Palestinian lawyers from the Occupied Territories took up military court work. In 1967 the estimated number of lawyers in the West Bank ranged from 50 to 150, and the entire legal profession in the region went on strike to protest the Occupation. Capitalizing on ties with Jordan, lawyers were incorporated into the Jordanian Lawyers' Union (JLU), which provided financial compensation for the lawyers' loss of income during the strike. Although all the lawyers initially joined the strike, ten lawyers from Ramallah decided to break the strike in 1971, and some started working in the military courts. They were condemned as traitors by the JLU and disbarred. Gradually other lawyers joined them, leading to a split in the legal profession in the West Bank between "working" and "striking" lawyers. By 1986 there were approximately 500 lawyers in the West Bank, of whom 280 were receiving compensation from Jordan (i.e., still striking).

In the Gaza Strip there were only eight to ten lawyers in 1967, four of whom began working in the military courts in response to requests from family members of people who had been arrested. Until 1971, when the Israel crushed armed resistance in Gaza, the lawyers were escorted to and from the courts in Israeli military vehicles. In 1976 eighteen Gaza lawyers formed the Gaza Bar Association, which became the corporate affiliation for all lawyers in the region. The Israeli authorities refused to register the organization, claiming it was a front for the PLO.

In January 1980, working West Bank lawyers established the Arab Lawyers' Committee (ALC). In 1984 the ALC applied for a license to function as an independent bar association, which the Israeli authorities refused on two grounds. First, the ALC's inclusion of East JERUSALEM residents contradicted Israeli efforts to enforce a separation between East Jerusalem and the rest of the West Bank (Israel unilaterally annexed East Jerusalem in 1967, and Palestinians were given the status of noncitizen residents of Israel). The second reason was "security considerations," namely suspicion that the ALC would espouse Palestinian nationalist ideology and serve as a front for the PLO. By early 1987 the total number of Palestinian lawyers working regularly in the military court system was estimated to be between 80 and 100.

In 1968 FELICIA LANGER became the first Jewish Israeli lawyer to defend Palestinians in the military courts. The visibility she commanded through her outreach to the media attracted a new generation of leftist Jews and Arab Israelis, who followed her into the military courts. Langer mentored the first generation of Israeli lawyers who decided to work in the military court system, including LEA TSEMEL, who became Langer's estagiere (apprentice). Langer and Tsemel mentored younger Arab and Jewish Israelis who decided to work in the military courts. However, by the early 1980s the difficulty of the work, the scanty material rewards it provided, and the inability to contribute to substantive political change discouraged or deterred younger Israeli lawyers from pursuing this work. Between 1967 and 1987 the number of Israeli citizens (Jews and Arabs) who practiced in the military courts was small and proportionally decreased as the number of Palestinian lawyers grew. By the mid-1980s approximately twenty to thirty Israeli lawyers worked regularly in the military courts. But until the First Intifada, they handled 60 to 70 percent of all cases from the West Bank and a lower but still substantial portion of cases from Gaza.

When the First Intifada erupted in December 1987, there was a massive deluge of arrests and prosecutions, producing increased sentences for minor crimes, longer delays in lawyers' ability to gain access to detainees, and heightened security measures in the courts and prisons. Contesting the deteriorating conditions became a rallying cause for defense lawyers, and ad hoc collaborations among Israeli and Palestinian lawyers strengthened. The escalating demand for legal services drew some 200 additional Palestinian lawyers into the military court system, many with little or no prior experience. To demonstrate collective solidarity with the Intifada, local Palestinian courts were boycotted, and Palestinian civil litigation declined to demonstrate collective solidarity with the Intifada. Criminal litigation was subsumed within the military court system (which has concurrent jurisdiction with Palestinian courts), and by April 1988 most Palestinian police had resigned.

Before the Intifada many of those arrested and prosecuted were well-trained activists organized along the factional lines of the PLO, and some Palestinian and Israeli lawyers had standing arrangements to represent people from particular factions. After 1987 the arrest of vast numbers of people who were only nominally aligned (if at all) with factions and had no political training or previous experience with the military court system strained lawyer-client relations. By the end of the 1980s, Islamist activists affiliated with HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD, who were waging increasingly violent attacks on both Israeli and Palestinian targets, were being arrested in increasing numbers. Because Islamist militancy gained prominence only during the Intifada, there were virtually no prestanding arrangements for legal representation. Lawyers stepped in to meet the Islamist demand for their services, but secular/sectarian political differences, coupled with disagreement over the use of violence that Islamists championed, created new tensions in lawyer-client relations.

During the First Intifada, work conditions in the military courts so seriously eroded that lawyers frequently went on strike to focus attention on violations of the lawyers' own rights as legal professionals as well as those of their clients. The reasons for lawyers' strikes included lack of notification of arrest, difficulty obtaining information about where prisoners were being held or even deliberate misinformation by prison authorities about prisoners' whereabouts, difficulty gaining access to people in custody, mistreatment of detainees and official failure to investigate lawyers' allegations of torture, lack of privacy for lawyer-client meetings at detention centers, long delays in scheduling court dates and cumbersome procedures, mistreatment of lawyers, lack of notification about extension-of-detention hearings, denial of bail, arbitrary sentencing by judges, and judicial refusal to consider the testimony of defense witnesses. However, the strikes often were called off in response to public pressure to continue providing legal services for those being arrested.

The one bright spot sustaining and encouraging defense lawyers was human rights activism and organizations during the First Intifada. Because they could provide information and explanations about the unrest and escalating violence, local human rights organizations were propelled into the international limelight. This provided lawyers with more and better ways to convey information about their work through press conferences and meetings with representatives of international organizations and foreign governments. The more prominent military court lawyers were in heavy demand as expert informants.

Oslo Accords

The Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, which started in 1991 and led to the Oslo Accords and an interim government by the Palestinian National Authority (PNA), also affected the military court system. When the PNA was established in 1994, many Israeli and Palestinian lawyers saw it as an opportunity or reason to quit military court work, because they believed the negotiations would resolve the conflict. Others quit out of frustration with the flawed nature of the negotiations. Although human rights violations did not diminish during the interim period, the concern they commanded dissipated.

In 1994 the military court system was reduced as part of Israel's military redeployment from Palestinian towns, although Palestinians continued to be arrested and prosecuted. Throughout the 1990s the military court system arguably contributed to Palestinians' frustrations and a growing popular opposition to the Oslo Accords, because people were still being arrested and prosecuted for Intifada crimes—activities that allegedly took place before the signing of the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (in 1993) as part of the Oslo Accords. The sentences imposed by the court system during the interim were generally higher than those during the Intifada. For example, whereas a person previously might have been sentenced to a ten-month prison term for "membership in an illegal organization," by 1997 the same charge could bring a sentence of three to four years. The most common charge prosecuted in the military courts during the interim was a violation of the PERMIT system that controlled the movements of Palestinians. With the Israeli use of temporary CLOSURES of the West Bank and Gaza and the dramatic economic decline in PNA areas, permitless Palestinians tried to get to Israel to work or move from one Palestinian area to another (e.g., to study or seek medical treatment), and they were often arrested and subjected to higher penalties than in the past.

During the interim period and its changed political arrangements, the main task of the military court system was to enforce the enclosure and "separation" of Palestinians. The Israeli government told its own citizens these were a compensation for the territorial compromises that were being negotiated. Prosecuting people accused of violence against Israelis was not only a means of exacting retribution, but also an assertion of Israeli jurisdictional control over the Occupied Territories. The PNA was deemed to be failing in its responsibility to police the separation between Israel and the Occupied Territories and prevent Palestinian attacks, which diminished its jurisdictional autonomy. Harsher punishments for all types of crimes cannot be explained simply by the goal of deterrence. Rather, the punishments themselves served a political function by strengthening Israel's hand in the troubled negotiations over the Oslo Accords. Palestinian prisoners were bargaining chips, and the bigger the sentence, the bigger the chip. Releasing prisoners before their sentences were over was a concession that Israel could make to the Palestinians in lieu of other types of concessions.

The strong networks that Israeli and Palestinian lawyers had built during the 1980s broke down during the Oslo period and were exceedingly difficult to rebuild when the Second Intifada started in 2000. The only lawyers who were able or willing to continue working in the military courts during the interim were a small number of leftist Jews, Arab Israelis who decided to remain in Jerusalem, East Jerusalem residents, and the few Palestinians in other parts of the Occupied Territories who were able to attain the necessary permits to access the military courts.

Second Intifada

The second, al-Aqsa Intifada, which began on 29 September 2000, has been the most intensely destructive and deadly period in Israel/Palestine since 1967. According to the Palestine Human Rights Monitoring Group, 2,780 Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza were killed by Israelis between 29 September 2000 and 31 March 2004. Of this total, 167 were TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS and 73 were bystanders killed during assassinations. In the same period 962 Israeli citizens were killed by Palestinians. Although the Israeli military court system continued to function during this period, to some extent it was marginalized because extrajudicial executions (i.e., assassinations) in some ways replaced prosecutions as means of punishment and deterrence for SUICIDE BOMBINGS by Palestinian militants. However, by July 2002, following massive Israeli assaults on West Bank towns and the start of construction of the BARRIER wall surrounding Palestinian areas, the ratio of arrests to assassinations became between ten-to-one and fifteen-to-one. The violence and vastly heightened security measures of the Second Intifada severely impacted lawyers' abilities to do their work and impeded professional and political collaborations. Palestinian lawyers could appear in courts only when they were near areas where they lived, assuming they could get the necessary permits to enter the military compounds. Accessing prisons became exceedingly difficult for everyone, as did face-to-face meetings between lawyers and the families of clients; most contacts were made by phone and fax.

ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in 2005 has again modified but not significantly transformed the practices and function of the military court system. Palestinians, including those from Gaza, continue to be subject to the courts' jurisdiction, and the practices of arrest, interrogation, prosecution, and imprisonment follow earlier patterns.

See also ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION; DEPORTATION; ISRAELI SUPREME COURT; OCCUPATION; PERMITS

Bibliography

- Abrams, Eliahu, et al. Legislation Allowing the Use of Physical Force and Mental Coercion in Interrogations by the General Security Service. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center on Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2000.
- Amnesty International. The Military Justice System in the Occupied Territories: Detention, Interrogation and Trial Procedures. New York: Amnesty International, 1991.
- Be'er, Yizhar, and Saleh 'Abdel-Jawad. Collaborators in the Occupied Territories: Human Rights Abuses and Violations. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1994.
- Bisharat, George. Palestinian Lawyers and Israeli Rule: Law and Disorder in the West Bank. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1989.
- Borger, Julian. "Israeli Government Report Admits Systematic Torture of Palestinians." The Guardian. 11 February 2000.
- B'Tselem. 1987-1997: A Decade of Human Rights Violations. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1998.
- . The Death of Mustafa Barakat in the Interrogation Wing of the Tulkarm Prison. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1992.
- . Human Rights in the Occupied Territories since the Oslo Accords, Joint Report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and Jerusalem/Ramallah: The Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group, 1996.
- . Legislation Allowing the Use of Physical Force and Mental Coercion in Interrogations by the General Security Service. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2000.
- . The "New Procedure" in GSS Interrogation: The Case of 'Abd A-Nasser 'Ubeid. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1993.

- . Oslo: Before and After: The Status of Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1999.
- . Torture during Interrogations: Testimony of Palestinian Detainees, Testimony of Interrogators. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1994.
- . Torture of Palestinian Minors at the Gush Etzion Police Station. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- . Violence against Minors in Police Detention. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1990.
- Cohen, Stanley. "Talking about Torture in Israel." Tikkun. 6 (1991).
- Cohen, Stanley, and Daphna Golan. The Interrogation of Palestinians during the Intifada: Ill-treatment, "Moderate Physical Pressure" or Torture? Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1991.
- . The Interrogation of Palestinians during the Intifada: Follow-up to March 1991 B'Tselem Report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1992.
- Ginbar, Yuval. Back to a Routine of Torture: Torture and Ill Treatment of Palestinian Detainees during Arrest, Interrogation, and Detention, September 1999–September 2001. Jerusalem: Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, 2003.
- . "The Face and the Mirror: Israel's View of Its Interrogation Techniques Examined." LLM dissertation, University of Essex, 1996.
- . Flawed Defense: Torture and Ill Treatment in GSS Interrogations Following the Supreme Court Ruling, 6 September 1999–6 September 2001. Jerusalem: Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, 2001.
- . Legitimizing Torture: The Israeli High Court of Justice Rulings in the Bilbeisi, Hamdan and Mubarak Cases: An Annotated Sourcebook. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1997.
- . Routine Torture: Interrogation Methods of the General Security Service. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1998.
- Golan, Daphna. The Military Judicial System in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1989.
- Hajjar, Lisa. Courting Conflict: The Israeli Military Court System in the West Bank and Gaza. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Al-Haq (Law in the Service of Man). Torture and Intimidation in the West Bank: The Case of al-Fara'a Prison. Ramallah, West Bank: Al-Haq, 1985.
- Al-Hindi, Khalid. The Democratic Practice of the Palestinian Prisoners Movement. Ramallah, West Bank: Muwatin, 2000.
- Human Rights Watch. Torture and Ill-treatment: Israel's Interrogation of Palestinians from the Occupied Territories. New York: Human Rights Watch, 1994.
- Israel National Section of the International Commission of Jurists. The Rule of Law in the Areas Administered by Israel. Tel Aviv: Israel National Section of the International Commission of Jurists, 1981.
- Kretzmer, David. The Occupation of Justice: The Supreme Court of Israel and the Occupied Territories. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2002.
- Landau, Moshe, et al. Commission of Inquiry into the Methods of Investigation of the General Security Services Regarding Hostile Terrorist Activity. Jerusalem: Government Press Office, 1987.
- LAW—The Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment, Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, and The World Organization Against Torture. Submission Concerning Israel's Policies in the Occupied Palestinian Territories Relevant to the UN Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. Jerusalem: LAW—The Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment; Jerusalem: Public Committee Against Torture in Israel; and Switzerland: The World Organization Against Torture, 2002. <http://www.omct.org>.
- Lawyers Committee for Human Rights. Lawyers and the Military Justice System. New York: Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, 1992.
- Moffett, Martha Roadstrum. Perpetual Emergency: A Legal Analysis of Israel's Use of the British Defense (Emergency) Regulations, 1945, in the Occupied Territories. Ramallah, West Bank: Al-Haq, 1989.
- Pacheco, Allegra. Torture by the Israeli Security Services. Jerusalem: Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, 1996.
- Pacheco, Allegra, ed. The Case against Torture in Israel: A Compilation of Petitions, Briefs, and Other Documents Submitted to the Israeli High Court of Justice. Jerusalem: Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, 1999.
- Public Committee Against Torture in Israel. Moderate Physical Pressure: Interrogation Methods in Israel. Jerusalem: Public Committee Against Torture in Israel, 1990.
- Rabah, Jamil, and Natasha Fairweather. Israeli Military Orders in the Occupied Palestinian West Bank, 1967–92. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Media and Communication Centre, 1993.
- Ron, James. "Savage Restraint: Israel, Palestine and the Dialectics of Legal Repression." Social Problems. 47:4 (2000).
- Sarraj, Eyad, and Sohail Salmi. Torture and Mental Health: The Experience of Palestinians in Israeli Prisons. Gaza: Gaza Community Mental Health Programme, 1993.
- Shamgar, Meir. "The Observance of International Law in the Administered Territories." Israel Yearbook on Human Rights. 1 (1971).
- Shamgar, Meir, ed. Military Government in the Territories Administered by Israel, 1967–1980: The Legal Aspects. Jerusalem: The Harry Sacher Institute for Legislative Research and Comparative Law, 1982.
- Shehadeh, Raja. Occupier's Law: Israel and the West Bank, rev. ed. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1988.
- Shehadeh, Raja, and Jonathan Kuttab. The West Bank and the Rule of Law. Ramallah, West Bank: Law in the Service of Man, 1980.
- Stein, Yael. Torture of Palestinian Minors in the Gush Etzion Police Station. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.

- Tamari, Salim. "Eyeless in Judea: Israel's Strategy of Collaborators and Forgeries." Middle East Report. 164: 65 (1990).
- Thornhill, Teresa. Making Women Talk: The Interrogation of Palestinian Women Detainees. London: Lawyers for Palestinian Human Rights, 1992.
- Tsemel, Lea. "Personal Status and Rights." In Occupation: Israel over Palestine, 2nd ed. Edited by Naseer Aruri. Belmont, MA: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1989.
- United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. Adopted and opened for signature, ratification and accession by General Assembly Resolution 39/46, 10 December 1984. Entry into force 26 June 1987, in accordance with Article 27(1). Geneva, Switzerland: UNHCR, 1984. www.unhcr.ch/html/menu3/b/h\_cat39.htm.
- Yahav, David, ed. Israel, the "Intifada" and the Rule of Law. Tel Aviv: Israel Ministry of Defense Publications, 1993.
- Yoaz, Yuval. "Despite Court Rulings, Shin Bet Still Tortures Palestinian Prisoners." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 20 August 2004.

—Lisa Hajjar

Israeli National Institutions

When the Zionist movement was formalized at the first ZIONIST CONGRESS in 1897, the congress created a series of settler-colonial organizations to fulfill political-Zionist objectives of IMMIGRATION, LAND purchase, and "reclamation" in Palestine so the "Jewish people" could create a national home and, subsequently, a national state there. The most important of these new Zionist settler-colonial institutions were the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION (WZO), the JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL (JA), and the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF). Together they birthed, built, and administered the institutions of the settler-colonial Yishuv, which, in turn, gave rise to the state of Israel as an apartheid state.

After the unilateral declaration of the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948 and the ethnic cleansing by the Israeli army of the territories that came under its control in the 1948 WAR, questions arose concerning the relationship between the state and said political-Zionist institutions. Some thought that, once the state was established, all the Zionist institutions should be dismantled and their functions and material holdings—primarily land—should be transferred to the relevant government ministries. By and large, however, this option was rejected by the mainstream LABOR Zionist Party leadership that had dominated both prestate Yishuv politics and that of the first three decades of Israel. Israeli officials quickly realized that regularizing the status of and incorporating the WZO, the JA, and the JNF—referred to as "national institutions"—into the state's legal framework could help portray the state as democratic (or, as its publicists like to argue, "the only democracy in the Middle East"). At the same time, they supported the policy of apartheid "Judaization" of the ethnically cleansed territories through these institutions and created a two-tier legal system that marginalized and discriminated against the remaining disinherited indigenous Palestinian-Arab minority.

Because a legal basis was needed to establish the status and functions of the prestate organizations, their relationship with the state was formalized through a number of laws that incorporated these institutions into the state. This integration ensured the dominance of "Jews" over "non-Jews" in all municipal, social, economic, territorial, and political spheres. Most of the laws that strategically underpin Israel's institutionalized exclusionary system predicated on a "Jew" versus "non-Jew" basis were enacted by the Knesset in the first decade of statehood. They included (1) the LAW OF RETURN, 1950; (2) ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW, 1950; (3) DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY Law, 1950; (4) the World Zionist Organization–Jewish Agency (Status) Law, 1952; (5) the Keren Kayemeth Leisrael (Jewish National Fund) Law, 1953; (6) Land Acquisition (Validations of Acts and Compensation) Law, 1953; (7) Covenant Between the Government of Israel and the Zionist Executive, also known as the Executive of the Jewish Agency for the Land of Israel, 1954; (8) Prescription Law, 1958; (9) Basic Law: Israel Lands, 1960; (10) Israel Lands Law, 1960; (11) ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION Law, 1960; (12) Covenant Between the Government of Israel and the Jewish National Fund, 1961; and (13) in the wake of the 1967 WAR, Agricultural Settlements (Restrictions on Use of Agricultural Land and Water) Law, 1967.

Israel evaded enacting petty blatantly segregationist laws, such as those of apartheid South Africa that had separate benches and parks for "Whites" versus "Blacks" and so on. Yet Israel achieved similar discrimination, which goes to the heart of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, through control of land and subsoil (primarily WATER) and through the regulation of the activities of the WZO, the JA, and the JNF in the first instance, as well as of other groups. Through law, the state gave the tasks of maintaining “Jewish” dominance and Palestinian exclusion/subordination to the “national institutions,” which are committed exclusively to the interests of “Jews only.” Thus, the state has claimed to absolve itself of any institutional discrimination because the “national institutions,” that is, the political Zionist institutions of the WZO, the JA, and the JNF in the first instance, implement the fundamental apartheid segregation on its behalf.

The key distinction between “Jew” and “non-Jew” is first made explicit in the constitutions and articles of association of the WZO, the JA, and the JNF. For example, the JA’s constitution stipulates: “Land is to be acquired as Jewish property and . . . the title of the lands acquired is to be taken in the name of the JNF to the end that the same shall be held the inalienable property of the Jewish people. The Agency shall promote agricultural colonization based on Jewish labor, and in all works or undertakings carried out or furthered by the Agency, it shall be deemed to be a matter of principle that Jewish labor shall be employed (Article 3 [d] & [e]).”

Similarly, the JNF’s 1954 memorandum of association states that the primary object of the organization is “to purchase, acquire on lease or in exchange, etc. . . . in the prescribed region (which expression shall in this Memorandum mean the State of Israel in any area within the jurisdiction of the Government of Israel) or any part thereof, for the purpose of settling Jews on such lands and properties (Article 3 [a]).” Until 1948 it could have perhaps been justifiably argued that the WZO, the JA, the JNF, and the various other bodies of the Zionist movement were institutional expressions of legally voluntary organizations of primarily parochial interests. That situation, however, was radically altered after the state of Israel was established, because the exclusivist constitutional stipulations (for Jews only) of the WZO, the JA, and the JNF were incorporated into the body of the laws of the state of Israel, thereby establishing the state of Israel as an apartheid state. The strategic legislation above that embedded the “national institutions” into the machinery of the state underpins its core apartheid, with one result being that 93 percent of the territory of the state of Israel within the 1949 armistice lines (the “Green Line”) is reserved in law for exclusive use by “Jews” only. In South Africa, at the height of its apartheid regime, 87 percent of the territory of the republic was reserved in law for the exclusive use of “Whites” only.

See also ISRAELI DEMOCRACY; ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION; JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL; JEWISH NATIONAL FUND

Bibliography

- Abu Sitta, Salman. Atlas of Palestine 1948. London: Palestine Land Society, 2004.
- Anglo-American Committee of Enquiry. A Survey of Palestine, Vol. I, Vol. II, and Supplement (Vol. I and Vol. II prepared in December 1945 and January 1947; Supplement in June 1947), reprinted. Washington, DC: Institute of Palestine Studies, 1991.
- Balfour, Sir Arthur James. “Balfour Declaration.” The Avalon Project at Yale Law School, 1917. www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/mideast/balfour.htm.
- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva, Switzerland: COHRE and Badil, 2005.
- Davis, Uri. Apartheid Israel: Possibilities for the Struggle Within. London: Zed Books, 2003.
- . Israel: Utopia Incorporated: A Study of Class, State and Corporate Kin Control. London: Zed Press, 1977.
- Hadawi, Sami. Palestine Rights and Losses in 1948. London: Saqi Books, 1988.
- Israel, Provisional Government of. Declaration of the Establishment of the State of Israel, 15 May 1948. The Knesset. www.knesset.gov.il/docs/eng/megilat\_eng.htm.
- Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel. Foreword by Noam Chomsky. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1976.
- Khalidi, Walid. All That Remains: The Palestinian Villages Occupied and Depopulated by Israel in 1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.
- Lehn, Walter, with Uri Davis. The Jewish National Fund. London: Kegan Paul International, 1988.
- Lustick, Ian. Arabs in the Jewish State: Israel’s Control of a National Minority. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1980.
- Mazzawi, Musa. Palestine and the Law: Guidelines for the Resolution of the Arab-Israeli Conflict. Reading, UK: Ithaca Press, 1997.
- Pappé, Ilan. The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine. Oxford, UK: Oneworld, 2006.
- . Modern History of Palestine. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Storrs, Ronald. Orientations. London: Ivor Nicholson and Watson, 1937.

—Uri Davis

Israeli-Palestinian Center for Research and Information

Founded in JERUSALEM in 1988 by a group of Israeli intellectuals, the Israeli-Palestinian Center for Research and Information is now the only joint Palestinian-Israeli public policy think tank in the world. It is concerned with issues such as the nature of a FINAL STATUS agreement, the placement of BORDERS, and the future of Jerusalem. (www.ipcri.org).

Israeli Peace Movement

Not until 1978 did Israel experience its first mass peace movement. Between 1948 and the end of the 1970s, with the exception of a small minority among the religious communities and a marginal non-Zionist left, the Jewish population of Israel shared the same basic ideology and the same political consensus that can be summarized in twelve points:

1. Historic Palestine is the homeland of the Jewish people.
2. ZIONISM is the national liberation movement of the Jewish people and the tool for its return to its homeland.
3. After 2,000 years the Jewish people are returning to their homeland with the objective of colonizing it and establishing a Jewish state.
4. Jewish IMMIGRATION (ALIYA) is a top priority for Zionism and for the state of Israel.
5. The 1948 WAR was a war of national liberation in which the Jewish community defended itself from overwhelming Arab aggression.
6. Although the goal of the Arabs is to destroy Israel, the state of Israel has always aspired to peace with its neighbors.
7. All the wars between Israel and the Arab states were imposed on Israel by an Arab world that desires the extermination of Israel.
8. Israel is and must stay a Jewish state, the home for all the Jews throughout the world and for Jews only.
9. Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East.
10. Israel is and wishes to be in the advanced position of the West and the free world against the barbarian East; that is, it wishes to be Westernized and part of Western civilization.
11. National unity against the enemy is a duty, and political and ideological debates must be limited by this necessary unity.
12. The government is the expression of the state, which is the expression of the Jewish people, and all Jewish people owe it unconditional obedience.

From Israel's statehood to the 1979 peace agreement with EGYPT, the great majority of the Jewish population of Israel was united around this set of beliefs, so that any political or ideological debates in Israeli society during these three decades were grounded in overall agreement on these twelve points. Even the right-wing opposition remained profoundly loyal to the twelve beliefs and avoided any kind of subversion of the existing political regime, despite its deep disagreement with what they saw as "socialist" and antireligious ideology. Until the late 1970s only the ANTI-ZIONIST far left and the non-Zionist left—MATZPEN and the COMMUNIST Party—challenged these basic principles. Their influence, however, was marginal among the Jewish population of Israel, which ostracized and sometimes repressed them—socially and politically, although later their political opinions gained attention and interest.

Although the Israeli Communist Party considered the 1948 War a war of national liberation and accepted the legitimacy of the Jewish state, it opposed both the domestic policies of successive governments—for example, institutionalized discrimination against the non-Jewish population—and the hostility of Israeli-Arab state relations. Thus the Israeli Communist Party did not share the values and principles on which the state was based and put itself outside the national consensus. On the other hand, the far-left Matzpen stood on a radical anti-Zionist platform that denounced the Zionist enterprise as colonial and called for revolutionary change in the Israeli regime and for an alliance with the Palestinian national movement. After 1967 this anti-Zionist left concentrated on systematically denouncing the OCCUPATION of the Palestinian territories, and therefore became even more isolated in Israeli society. The years 1967–1973 marked the peak of national unity and consensus; even longtime opponents of the LABOR PARTY regime, who before 1967 had been on the margins of the Zionist consensus—for example, journalist URI AVNERY and writers Amos Keinan and Dan Ben Amotz—temporarily supported this atmosphere of national unity.

Beginning of the End of the National Consensus

The 1973 Egyptian-Syrian offensive came as a total surprise for the government. Both the army and public opinion had been lulled by a sense of unlimited power generated by Israel's 1967 victory. In 1973, however, Israel experienced its most severe military defeat, and only due to exceptionally massive US aid did the Israeli army succeed in reversing the situation on the battlefield. As a result the Labor leadership that would be in power for almost half a century—from the early days of the state until 1977—lost significant credibility. Before the war's end a massive and spontaneous movement emerged demanding the resignation of Israel's political and military leadership. Three years later Labor power ended, and the right wing for the first time controlled the government. Yet, ultimately, it was not the Zionist left but the far right that broke with MENAHEM BEGIN's government when he signed the 1979 peace agreement with Egypt that required Israel to withdraw from the whole Sinai Peninsula and dismantle the Jewish SETTLEMENTS established there.

The initiative of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in fact triggered the first mass peace movement in Israel: PEACE NOW. Although there were protest movements against the Occupation and repression in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES during the second half of the 1970s, these were composed essentially of several thousand Palestinian Israelis and non-Zionist Jews. Peace Now, on the other hand, was a Zionist movement that represented the Labor center of the Israeli population and was started by a group of reserve officers who defined themselves as patriots and Zionists. During the two years following the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT between Begin and Sadat, dozens of mass demonstrations mobilized more than 150,000 Israeli Jews who gave Begin the support necessary to fight his own political camp and withdraw from Sinai.

At the beginning of the 1980s, Israeli society was highly polarized between right and left. Led by the settlers' movement GUSH EMUNIM, the right organized mass demonstrations against the withdrawal from Sinai and initiated a new settlement drive throughout the Occupied Territories. Represented by Peace Now, the left not only supported the peace treaty with Egypt but also gradually challenged the Occupation of the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP. Although the Israeli movement against the Occupation is often labeled a peace movement, this definition can be misleading, because most Israeli activists were not anti-militarists or pacifists in the classic sense of the term. The reserve officers who started Peace Now still insisted on total loyalty to the army, and even today Peace Now strongly opposes YESH G'VUL, the movement of the reserve soldiers and officers who refuse to serve in the Occupied Territories. In Israel, being a "pacifist" does not necessarily mean ideological opposition to war but rather opposition to a specific conflict and particular forms of engagement.

Ultimately it was the 1982 LEBANON WAR that split Israeli society and transformed the peace movement into a genuine political opposition that challenged parts of the historic consensus. For the first time an Israeli prime minister described the war as a "choice" made by Israel and not as a result of Arab aggression. For the first time also, the objectives of a war were hidden from the Israeli population (and even from the majority of the government). Although the government spoke about installing a "security zone" of twenty-five miles (forty kilometers) in South Lebanon to protect the Galilee, Israeli soldiers found themselves on the way to Beirut to install the PHALANGE (historic allies of Israel in LEBANON) as head of the Lebanese state, to crush the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), and to expel the Palestinians from Lebanon. When Israelis discovered the deception, demonstrations against the war, initially organized by the radical wing of the peace movement (united into the Committee Against the War in Lebanon), grew from several thousand to more than 100,000 within a few weeks.

During the Lebanon War the Israeli peace movement developed a modus operandi that remained until the OSLO PROCESS. Radical groups began the mobilization against the war, which prompted a reluctant Peace Now, pressured by its grassroots, to organize mass demonstrations. A small organization in Tel Aviv, the Committee in Solidarity with BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY, held a demonstration attended by some 3,000 persons and then transformed itself, that very day, into the Committee Against the War in Lebanon. Three weeks later, with the Israeli army in the suburbs of Beirut, the committee organized a demonstration that attracted more than 15,000 individuals, including many reserve soldiers coming directly from the battlefield. Until then Peace Now had refused to oppose this war publicly (“as long as our soldiers are fighting, we have to support them”), but the mass demonstration spurred it to call for its own mobilization: a week later, more than 100,000 people protested “the widening of the war beyond its original goals” as well as against “the break in the national consensus.”

Impact of Protest Groups

Unlike more radical organizations (e.g., the Committee Against the War in Lebanon and especially the newly established Yesh G’vul), which advocated a confrontation with the government based on an ethical opposition to Israel’s policy of war and Occupation, Peace Now attempted to capitalize on the growing mass opposition to the Lebanon War, while refraining from sundering the traditional national consensus. For this reason Peace Now uncompromisingly rejected Yesh G’vul. However, the borders between Peace Now and the more radical organizations were not impermeable, which allowed the radical groups to affect Peace Now decisionmaking and to radicalize its political demands. A clear example of this influence was Peace Now’s position concerning the Occupation. At first Peace Now refused to take any stand on this central topic, which at the end of the 1970s the Israeli public viewed as a benign or “enlightened Occupation” with limited (Palestinian) resistance. As such, Peace Now saw no urgency in trying to find a solution. The more radical organizations, in particular the Committee in Solidarity with Birzeit University, led campaigns against repressive tactics and settlement activities in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, for recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), and for an end to the Occupation. This approach differed greatly from Peace Now’s position, which was based on the national consensus and pragmatism: that the Occupation corrupted the soldiers or put at risk the “Jewish-Democratic character of Israel.”

While the more radical groups developed a real solidarity with the victims of the Occupation and their struggle, Peace Now did its best to escape such a tendency. The First INTIFADA (1987–1991) gave tremendous impetus to all the protest movements that had focused on the Occupation, as well as producing a variety of new initiatives. In addition to the Birzeit Solidarity Committee (renamed Dai La-Kibbush, or Enough with Occupation) and Yesh G’vul, which attracted a new wave of reserve soldiers who refused to participate in the repression of the Intifada, new movements were formed. WOMEN IN BLACK is the best known, but there were many others—more “specialized” organizations such as the Israeli Committee Against Torture, Israeli and Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights, and RABBIS FOR HUMAN RIGHTS. When united, these organizations could mobilize up to 10,000 demonstrators. The growing impact of this anticolonialist left radicalized the political positions of Peace Now, which finally called for ending the Occupation and for recognizing the PLO. Through Peace Now initiatives from 1988 to 1990, the demonstrations grew from several thousand to tens of thousands of participants, during which Peace Now increasingly advocated a political platform similar to the platforms of the radical groups: withdrawing totally from the Occupied Territories, dismantling the settlements, and negotiating with the PLO. By 1992, for the first time, the main demands of the Palestinian national movement were finally endorsed by a significant part of Israeli society that succeeded in bringing to power a leftist government (Labor-MERETZ) that articulated the main demands of the Israeli peace movement.

In September 1993, the Oslo DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP) between the PLO and Israel, which set the goal of establishing Palestinian self-government, brought euphoria to the Israeli peace movement, because it believed that its program and aspirations were about to be realized. In this euphoria, however, the two components of the peace movement did not draw the same conclusions. For Peace Now the struggle against the Occupation and for an Israeli-Palestinian peace stopped the day YITZHAK RABIN agreed to shake the hand of YASIR ARAFAT. After achieving what it considered a victory, Peace Now believed it was the government’s role to lead the process. The leftist activists, on the other hand, saw that the Occupation did not end with the signing of the DOP and believed that the OSLO ACCORDS’ potential would be realized only by mobilizations and permanent pressure on the government, especially because Israel was implementing a CLOSURE of the Occupied Territories and dramatically increasing settlement activities in the territories that it was supposedly preparing to give back to the Palestinians. Vigilance, mobilization, and solidarity were the focuses of the radical peace organizations, which adopted the slogan “With the government when it is determined to go forwards toward peace; against the government when it is reinforcing the Occupation!”

Peace—and the compromises necessary for an honest implementation of the DOP—produced a political battle throughout Israeli society, among the ruling elites, within the government itself (including inside the Labor Party), and even—as his biographers have pointed out—in Rabin himself. The main issues of contention were whether to allow a Palestinian state, how much of the Occupied Territories to include, and how to hold on to the settlements. Vigilance, therefore, was needed to prevent the peace process from disintegrating completely. Uri Avnery understood this when, together with a few dozen activists (mostly non-Zionists) and some disappointed Peace Now people, he decided to establish GUSH SHALOM (Peace Bloc) to continue the struggle against Occupation. He saw, as did others, that when the left assumed power, Peace Now became comatose, a condition from which it has never recovered. During the crucial years of the Oslo Process, together with the women’s organizations BAT SHALOM and Women in Black, Gush Shalom maintained a permanent mobilization against the ongoing Occupation.

Human rights organizations such as B’TSELEM (the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), HAMOKED (Center for the Defense of the Individual), and others also played a role in this period. Though not directly committed to mobilization against the Occupation, they helped document the reality of the Occupation and Israel’s systematic violations of human rights and INTERNATIONAL LAW by producing and disseminating major reports on conditions there. These human rights organizations are usually ideologically closer to Peace Now than to the radical left, yet their commitment to human rights caused them to align with the more radical wing of the peace movement in an increasingly systematic denunciation of Occupation, even when the Occupation was disappearing from the lexicon of most peace activists.

Gulf between Palestinian and Israeli Activists

The peace process era (1993–2000) was characterized by a central paradox; although reconciliation between the two peoples was on the official agenda, Palestinians and mainstream Israeli peace activists grew further apart in their respective perceptions of reality and in their respective aspirations. Two years after the signing of the DOP, Palestinians were increasingly disappointed in the actions of the Israeli government and skeptical about its intentions. But Peace Now ignored the realities of Occupation, the government’s retreat from real peace, the increased strength of the right, as well as the calls for aid from the Palestinian leaders and activists with whom it had cooperated in the past and who could not understand why the Israeli peace movement did not protest and sometimes even supported a government that violated signed agreements. Gradually the relative trust and partial cooperation that had developed throughout the 1980s were replaced first by indifference (from the Israeli side) and then by disappointment and ultimately a sense of betrayal (from the Palestinian side). For many Israelis peace was equated with security and could only come from negotiations by the Israeli leadership according to the principle that “the smarter is the winner.” If Israel felt “secure,” then there was peace, regardless of what was happening on the Palestinian side. For the Palestinians, the Occupation not only continued but grew worse, and the Israelis systematically violated both the letter and the spirit of the negotiated Oslo Accords by their campaign of settlement expansion, the denial of PERMITS to work in Israel (previously given in large numbers) that sent the Palestinian ECONOMY into free fall, and new and increasingly stringent RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, among others. When, more than ever, they needed the Israeli peace movement to pressure its own government to negotiate and implement agreements, the Palestinians discovered that their previous allies were busy with their own national reconciliation and the rebuilding of the traditional national consensus to avoid a potential confrontation with the right.

When in 1995 the failing peace process led to a renewal of Palestinian acts of resistance, including TERRORIST actions, the Israeli peace camp was taken by surprise. It couldn’t understand why the Palestinians were using violence when supposedly the peace process had put Palestinian statehood on track. It couldn’t understand the impact of Israeli insincerity and the pent-up discouragement of the Palestinians. The Israeli peace movement did not clearly comprehend the real differences between protesting for peace in the “Jewish democratic” state and suffering in Gaza for thirty years in conditions of “de-development” (as Sara Roy has described them). Most peace activists believed that Palestinians would not interfere in Israeli affairs and vice versa, except in the area of “security.” Few in Peace Now challenged this concept or warned against the dangers a deadlock in the peace process could bring. However, some groups and individuals did warn that Israeli policies of repression could lead to revolt; among them were Women in Black, Bat Shalom, and Gush Shalom in the political organizations; Tanya Reinhardt, Baruch Kimmerling, Oren Yiftachel, and Ran Hacoen in the academy; intellectuals such as MERON BENVENISTI, AZMI BISHARA, and Yitzhak Laor; and Gideon Levy, B. Michael, and Amira Hass in the MEDIA. But these few were isolated, while the majority in the peace movement acted as if peace were already a reality. Although Israeli military operations might briefly dampen the euphoria of the peace activists, they remained convinced that the peace process would continue and that the Palestinians would have a state of their own.

The US-sponsored July 2000 Camp David peace talks were a terrible blow to these pro-peace Israelis, who until then were the majority of the population. When Israeli prime minister EHUD BARAK returned from the Camp David Summit to announce the failure of the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, the peace camp was already totally demobilized and mystified that peace had not yet been realized. In Israel, PLO chairman Arafat’s rejection of BARAK’S GENEROUS OFFERS was presented by Barak (and President BILL CLINTON) as not only a lack of moderation by Arafat but also evidence of his real but hidden intention—the destruction of Israel. Israeli public opinion returned to its old position—that the Jews are not accepted and will never be accepted by their neighbors and will have to fight for their survival forever. Although the Palestinians were the main victims, the peace movement also suffered from this dramatic change. As early as July 2000, long before the second or AL-AQSA INTIFADA began, prominent intellectuals on the left and liberal journalists started a campaign of “reassessing” political reality. Writers such as A. B. YEHOASHUA and AMOS OZ stated that the Palestinian demand for the right of return of the REFUGEES (from the 1948 War) was evidence of their bad faith and their aspiration to destroy Israel; journalist Ari Shavit warned the Israeli public to stop dreaming about peace and normality and to remember that the fate of the Jewish people is a permanent war for its own survival. The NEW HISTORIAN Benny Morris wrote that one has to understand the “oriental mentality” that is the root of the Palestinian rejection of Israel’s existence.

Within two months of the Camp David failure the Israeli peace movement disintegrated, not only as a political organization able to mobilize hundreds of thousands of demonstrators but even in political and ethical discourse. Most of its leaders joined the consensus that the conflict with the Palestinians was about survival, and many became—in the media, the universities, and, in general, Israeli public opinion—the loudest advocates of the “we have no partners” argument. From August to November 2000, Israel witnessed a generalized mea culpa from the leaders of the former peace movement, and the most common media headline was “The left lost its way.” After renewed confrontations between the Palestinians and the Israeli army and the beginning of the al-Aqsa Intifada in September 2000, and especially with the new wave of SUICIDE BOMBINGS by Palestinians, the left fully endorsed ARIEL SHARON’S war against the Palestinian people.

Not all Israeli peace activists gave up the belief that peace with the Palestinians was possible. With the renewal of Palestinian resistance to Israeli Occupation at the end of September 2000, the radical organizations of the peace movement—Women in Black, Yesh G’vul, and Gush Shalom—as well as the Palestinian population of Israel mobilized to denounce the repression in the Occupied Territories as well as the Occupation itself as the cause of the dramatic deterioration of the situation. In the media, critical voices were heard, including some from the political establishment, such as former minister SHULAMIT ALONI, who accused Barak and later Sharon of pushing Israel toward a total war against the entire Muslim world. Akiva Eldar, senior journalist at the Jerusalem daily Ha’aretz, reported in autumn 2000 the truth about Barak’s “generous offer”—that Israel had reneged on all promises—while Amira Hass and Gideon Levy also tried to inform public opinion about the harsh repression in the Occupied Territories.

During the years, 2000 to 2005, the peace movement in Israel became synonymous with the movement against the Occupation and was limited to Israel’s more radical wing. As in many other countries in the world, Israel has had a generational vacuum of some twenty years between the 1982 Lebanon War and the al-Aqsa Intifada, during which an entire generation of Israelis avoided political activism. Throughout the First Intifada and during the Oslo era, most of the activists were the ones who had been in their twenties during the invasion of Lebanon. The average age of Gush Shalom activists is fifty, and the Women in Black are mostly in their forties. With the Second Intifada a new generation of Israelis is starting to lead the movement against Occupation. Most members of the Anarchists Against the Wall, an activist organization established in 2003 that organizes daily non-violent confrontations with the army at the BARRIER or separation wall, are teenagers. TA'AYUSH, a movement of Jews and Arabs established in October 2000 as an answer to the repression of the Palestinians, is now active in organizing solidarity convoys to besieged Palestinian villages. A new organization, COURAGE TO REFUSE, consists of soldiers who refuse to serve in the Occupied Territories and was politicized by the wave of repression in the Occupied Territories that began in 2000. MACHSOMWATCH emerged to monitor the behavior of soldiers at the checkpoints. And COALITION OF WOMEN FOR PEACE, ALTERNATIVE INFORMATION CENTER, ISRAELI COMMITTEE AGAINST HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and others are part of a new generation of activists, who often have no political experience or ideology but are motivated by strong feelings against injustice.

Another characteristic of the new anti-Occupation movement is its rejection of realpolitik, in particular its often aggressive and militaristic manifestations. Thus, although one finds in their statements general calls for peace, many more contain firm denunciations of the Occupation. A third characteristic of this new resistance movement is that it considers its struggle in the framework of solidarity and cooperation with Palestinian resistance. Though most of their actions are obviously oriented toward Israeli public opinion, establishing links with Palestinian organizations is a priority—to show to both communities that there is a partner for peace and coexistence. When Israeli politics is focused on building a Barrier aimed to enclose the Palestinians as well as to separate Israel and Palestine, this drive toward cooperation indicates not only the rejection of the Barrier but also the belief in the possibility of coexistence and a partnership based on mutual respect and equality.

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; ISRAELI MILITARISM; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; MEDIA, ISRAELI

Bibliography

- Bar-On, Mordechai. Peace Now: The Portrait of a Movement. Tel Aviv: Hakibbutz Hameuchad Publishing House, 1985.
- Carey, Roane, and Jonathan Shainin, eds. The Other Israel: Voices of Refusal and Dissent. New York: The New Press, 2002.
- Hermann, Tamar S. The Israeli Peace Movement: A Shattered Dream. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2009.
- Kuriansky, Judy. Beyond Bullets and Bombs: Grassroots Peacebuilding between Israelis and Palestinians. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2007.
- Reinhart, Tanya. Roadmap to Nowhere: Israel/Palestine since 2003. London: Verso Press, 2006.
- Rosenwasser, Penny. Voices from a "Promised Land": Palestinian & Israeli Peace Activists Speak Their Hearts. Willimantic, CT: Curbstone Press, 1995.
- Sandercock, Josie, Radhika Sainath, Marissa McLaughlin, Hussein Khalidi, Nicholas Blincoe, Huwaida Arraf, and Ghassan Adoni, eds. Peace under Fire: Israel, Palestine, and the International Solidarity Movement. New York: Verso, 2004.

—Michel Warschawski

Israeli Political Parties and Settlements

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has come to dominate domestic party politics in Israel and is the key issue for an overwhelming majority of the Israeli voters. The main actors in successive Israeli coalition governments' treatment of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict are the political parties. Their internal dynamics and decisionmaking have influenced one main element of the conflict—the establishment of Jewish SETTLEMENTS. While there are numerous other aspects to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, this entry focuses on the relationship between the Israeli political parties and the establishment of settlements in the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP, excluding East JERUSALEM.

Israel is a multiparty parliamentary democracy, with an electoral system providing proportional representation. Given the nature of this system, no single party ever commands a parliamentary majority, so a coalition among several parties is a practical necessity for governing. The Israeli political system has gone through two very different periods. The first encompassed the almost three decades from the first elections in 1949 until the 1977 elections but includes the prestate period (pre-1948) as well. This period was one of MAPAI (the predecessor of the current LABOR PARTY) and later Labor dominance. Although Mapai never won an absolute majority, it outdistanced all of its rivals and headed the coalition governments it formed. The second period stretched from 1977, when Labor lost for the first time, until 2006. This period saw competitive elections between two main parties (Labor and LIKUD), both short of a majority and both surrounded by potential coalition partners of relatively equal size—thereby creating two main camps, or blocs, of parties.

The different coalitions and the dynamics within each of these two periods profoundly influenced the policymaking of the respective governments. The decisions made concerning issues such as settlements must be assessed in light of the particular situation of each coalition government from 1967 until Labor's fall from power a decade later. After 1977 when either the right or the left or both held power, the decisions vis-à-vis the conflict became quite different. Before the 1967 WAR Israeli party, coalition, and electoral politics were not dominated by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. However, after the war and the capture of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, which Israel placed under military administration, Israel's political parties focused their electoral competition predominantly on security issues and in particular the fate of the territories. The left took a more dovish position on issues such as land for peace (Israeli withdrawal from the Arab territories in exchange for peace with Arab countries and the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip) and settlement building, while the right took a more hawkish stand, and both placed less emphasis on their socioeconomic differences. Their different perspectives on Palestinian issues, in turn, defined each party's potential for forming coalitions with other parties.

The religious parties in Israel, which for the first sixty-some years won between 10 percent and 15 percent of the seats in the Knesset, also experienced a dramatic shift in their position in Israeli politics. During the first period, the religious parties focused on domestic religious issues and occupied the middle of the party map. The cooperation between the main Orthodox party, the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY (NRP), and Mapai became known as the "historical partnership." After Israel's capture of biblically significant territories in 1967, however, the NRP began to adopt more nationalistic stands, gradually shifting toward the right. When the Likud won power in 1977 this transformation intensified, and the NRP eventually became part of the rightist bloc. The ultra-Orthodox parties, on the other hand, increased their bargaining power in coalitions by working with both Likud and Labor, yet clearly preferred the right and should thus be seen as belonging to it.

Israel's population has always included a minority of Palestinian citizens, who have the right to vote and have been represented in the Knesset since the first elections. The Israeli-Arab parties have changed over time, originally functioning as client parties affiliated with Mapai/Labor, but that role declined and then disappeared as the nationalist parties became more successful. During the same time the joint Arab-Jewish COMMUNIST Party gradually became a predominantly Arab party, first in terms of its electorate and later in terms of its representation. The number of parliamentary seats won by newer Israeli-Arab parties has increased over time, both as the Arab minority's percentage of the population has grown and as more Arab voters shifted away from Jewish/Zionist parties. Largely because of their non- and ANTI-ZIONIST positions and their clear support of the Palestinian struggle for national liberation, the Arab parties represent the extreme left in Israeli politics.

Israeli politics in the last several decades thus developed four main blocs of parties: two on the left—the dovish Zionist parties headed by Labor and the Arab parties, and two on the right—the hawkish parties led by Likud and the religious parties. Many parties aspired to capture the strategic middle, but few have proved successful until KADIMA in the 2006 elections.

Israeli Coalition Government

The different coalitions and dynamics within each of these two periods had a profound influence on the policymaking of the respective governments.

Table 2 Number of Settlements and Settlers, 1967–2006

Years	Coalition	Settlements Established <sup>a</sup> (Total)	Total Settlers <sup>a</sup>
1967–1969 <sup>b</sup>	Grand <sup>c</sup>	5	NA
1969–1973	Grand (1969–1970)	7 (12)	NA
	Left dominant (1970–1973)	10 (22)	1,500
1974–1977	Left dominant	9 (31)	7,900
1977–1981	Right dominant	38 (69)	21,500
1981–1984	Right dominant	44 (113)	36,800
1984–1988	Grand	12 (125)	66,300
1988–1992	Grand (1988–1990)	6 (131)	81,600
	Right dominant (1990–1992)	1 (132)	104,800
1992–1996	Left dominant	1 (133)	148,300
1996–1999	Right dominant	3 (136)	180,300
1999–2001	Left dominant	– (136)	196,700
2001–2003	Grand	– (136)	226,300
2003–2006	Right Dominant (2003–2004)	– (136)	237,700
	Grand (2005–2006)	– (116) <sup>d</sup>	255,600

Source: Central Bureau of Statistics; Eldar and Zertal 2004.

Notes: a. Total number of settlements and settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip for each coalition government.

b. The previous elections were in 1965, but the first coalition to build a settlement could do so only after the 1967 War.

c. Grand coalitions mean that both major parties were included, along with other smaller parties.

d. Reduced number of total settlements reflects withdrawal from Gaza Strip in August 2005.

The best way to assess the political parties' policies regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is to look at the number of Jewish settlements established by the successive governing coalitions and at the number of settlers. These two measures, rather than party platforms or coalition agreements, provide the most credible indicators of how the political parties in Israel addressed and shaped the most contentious aspect of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict—or failed to do so.

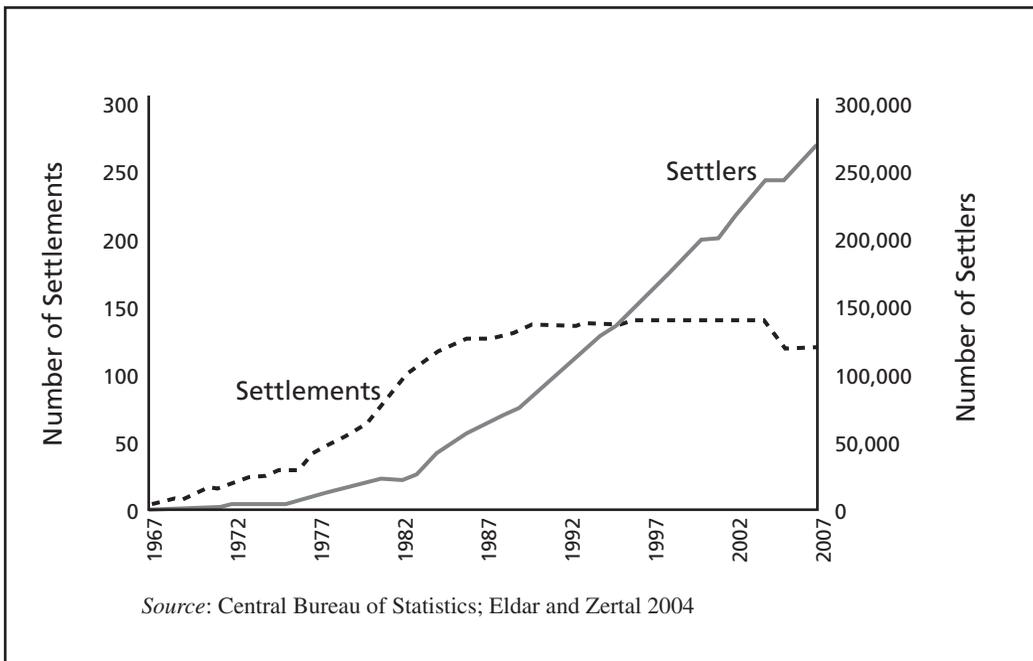

The table showing the number of settlements and settlers from 1967 to 2006 makes the following four points:

1. More than 20 percent of the settlements (31 of 136) were established by coalition governments dominated by the left in the first decade after the 1967 War.
2. Most of the settlements—over 60 percent (82 of 136)—were established after the Likud first came to power in 1977 during the two coalition governments it dominated in the subsequent seven years.
3. Since 1984 there has been a dramatic slowdown in the number of settlements established, and since 1992 the building of new settlements has been all but frozen.
4. The number of settlers has grown constantly, without any connection to the number of settlements. For example, between 1984 and 2004 only twenty-three settlements were created (17 percent of the total number of settlements), but the number of settlers grew sixfold. In 2005, when Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip and thus the number of settlements actually declined, the number of settlers still increased.

The first point shows that left-dominated coalition governments—headed by Mapai/Labor—established settlements immediately after the 1967 War. Although the Labor Party currently opposes the establishment of any new settlements, the party has shifted its position on this issue quite substantially in the last few decades. Immediately after the 1967 War, Labor was divided between a more hawkish faction, led by YIGAL ALLON and MOSHE DAYAN, and more dovish elements. Both Allon and Dayan wanted to maintain control over certain parts of the territories for security reasons and sought to establish settlements that would help the territories serve as a buffer zone. The presence of GAHAL (Likud's predecessor) in the coalition helped lead to support for establishing the first settlements.

The 1973 elections kept the left in power, but as the head of a narrow coalition with the pro-settlement NRP. Moreover, the initial collapse of Israel's lines of defense in the 1973 War convinced many that the territories were vital for Israel's survival. The hawkish elements within the dominant

Figure 1. Number of Settlements and Settlers, 1967–2007

Labor Party helped stimulate the first group of settlements, even though their overall number was quite small. Only in 1975 was the first political settlement established (that is, a settlement not in accordance with the security parameters of the ALLON PLAN).

The second point indicates that when Likud first assumed power in 1977, it sought to implement its ideology of a Greater Israel by building settlements. After the peace treaty with EGYPT in 1979, which included a complete withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula and the dismantling of all settlements there, Likud wanted to make sure that land for peace would not become a precedent. Moreover, after the early collapse of its coalition partner, the Democratic Movement for Change, no forces within the coalition—or the subsequent one in 1981—strongly opposed the policy of settlement building. During these two coalition governments the number of settlements more than tripled and the number of settlers more than quadrupled.

The third point indicates a reversal in settlement policy by the Israeli coalition governments, a result of two developments. First, the Labor Party had shifted to a more dovish stand by the mid-1980s and opposed the establishment of new settlements. Second, the 1984 election results were a stalemate, forcing the two main parties to govern together in a grand coalition that included mutual veto powers. Thus Labor was able to extract concessions from Likud that dramatically curtailed the establishment of new settlements.

The subsequent 1988 election produced another close result, which forced the main parties to govern together and to continue the previous understanding concerning settlements. Meanwhile, the long-term consequences of the First INTIFADA, which erupted in 1987, began to change many Israelis' attitudes about settlements and the viability of the territories as security buffer zones. After two years the grand coalition collapsed, leaving Likud in power and Labor in the opposition. This time international pressure, in the form of economic penalties levied by the GEORGE H. W. BUSH administration, restrained Likud from building further settlements, although the number of settlers practically tripled during this eight-year period (1984–1992).

In 1992, Labor returned to power, formed a coalition that was decisively dovish, and within a year embarked on the OSLO PROCESS with the Palestinians. From this point on, the establishment of new settlements—even after the return of Likud to power in 1996—basically ceased, although the number of settlers increased by 50 percent.

The increase in the number of settlers, in an almost linear fashion during the entire post-1967 period, is the most intriguing question. Did the settler movement (GUSH EMUNIM) and, since the 1980s, the YESHA COUNCIL (Judea, Samaria, and Gaza) successfully circumvent the political parties' changed positions on settlements by increasing the number of settlers? Or did the political parties themselves decide to curtail the building of new settlements for domestic and international reasons and instead to push ahead with the expansion of the existing settlements?

Settler Movement and the Political Parties in Israel

There is little doubt that the establishment of settlements and their expansion are connected to the influence of the settlers' leadership and their supporters on the political parties, even though the settlers were never a substantial electoral force. Despite their ever-increasing numbers, in 1977 they were less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the electorate, and circa 2005 they reached only 2 percent—a negligible electoral constituency. Moreover, the settlers were never a significant part of the electorate, even for those parties on the right who championed the settler cause. The data until the late 1990s show the settlers amounted to no more than 10 percent of the electorate for any of the smaller right-wing parties and no more than 3 percent of the Likud voters.

In the Knesset the settlers had a greater representation than their actual electoral strength. At the height of the settlers' influence, the number of Knesset members who were settlers reached 7 percent. Although this is more than three times their electoral size, it is still far from being a parliamentary contingent that could significantly influence the parties' agendas. In fact the settlers' power and influence are not based on electoral or party variables but rather on a combination of ideological and organizational factors. Their organizational infrastructure, coupled with ideological unity, produced a cohesive and easily mobilized constituency. Furthermore the settlement movement did not have a coherent and significant opposition; indeed, during its early years it received support not only from elements on the right but also from some on the left. But it was right-wing politicians and parties who saw it as a powerful ally during election campaigns and often during the parties' internal candidate selection procedures. The increasing inability or reluctance of the political system and the government to confront the settlers allowed them to advance their policy—even when it acted against declared government policies.

The settlers also enjoyed generous subsidies from the state, and their people held senior posts in the administration. Often they mobilized state resources to protest government policies and even to build illegal OUTPOSTS, contrary to the declared policy of the state. In short the settler lobby, in spite of its electoral weakness and small number of representatives in the Knesset, could advance its agenda because the movement had a dedicated and expanding base of followers that were mobilized around a single cause, access to many elements in the government, and a weakened opposition at a time when the party system was coalescing into two equally sized camps. The settler lobby was a force that could successfully manipulate either a policy vacuum or an inactive government, not to mention a favorable government.

However, as soon as significant segments of both the public and the party system began to perceive the settlements in somewhat negative terms—from either the increased expense of maintaining the settlements, international pressure, or a belief that the OCCUPATION led to the First Intifada in the late 1980s—the settler lobby was forced to switch tactics. Rather than adding new settlements, they expanded existing settlements, which could be presented to both domestic and foreign audiences as “natural” growth and hence almost a humanitarian necessity. The very high birthrate of the religious settlers, along with the expanding outer neighborhoods adjacent to Israel's main population centers, let much of the growth take place without adding new settlements.

This arrangement, which created a favorable climate for the settler movement, continued for almost two decades. However, once a combination of domestic political shifts, international pressure, and the nonsettler majority in Israel coalesced against the settlements, the lobby's influence proved to be either evanescent or largely mythical.

Israel's erection of the BARRIER security fence, which leaves a large majority of the settlements on the outside of the Barrier, was unsuccessfully opposed by the settlers. And in 2005, ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT from all of the settlements in the Gaza Strip and four additional settlements in the northern part of the West Bank—which many settlers saw as a symbolic battle over the settlements in general—was implemented more easily, quickly, and quietly than many in Israel expected.

Role of the "Pivotal Party"

In Israel's party system, the "pivotal party" is the party with no majority to its right or its left after an election. This means that this party is essential for building a majority coalition government. In a multiparty system the pivotal party is usually close to the center and can be crucial in allowing, or opposing, the implementation of a specific policy. Throughout the history of Israel's party system, the pivotal parties—or the pivotal elements within those parties—have never been strongly opposed to the establishment of settlements. During the decade between 1967 and 1977, when governing coalitions were dominated by the left, Mapai held the pivotal position. However, it was the right wing of Mapai that made the party the pivot of the party system. This part, which included hawks such as Dayan, Allon, SHIMON PERES, and YITZHAK RABIN, supported the establishment of settlements in accordance with Israel's security needs. Between 1977 and 1984, when governing coalitions were dominated by the right, the religious parties held the pivotal position. The orthodox NRP, the largest of the religious parties, was in favor of settlements, while the ultra-Orthodox parties were not opposed to them. Likud's pro-settlement policy, along with the acquiescence or support of the pivotal religious parties, allowed the major thrust of settlement building to take place. Afterward, during the period between 1984 and 1992, the two major parties formed a grand coalition in which each was granted veto power over major decisions. Labor was able to use its veto to slow down the building of settlements substantially during this period.

In the 1992 elections Labor regained the pivotal position, but once again the hawks within Labor (who would subsequently split to form the Third Way party) comprised the pivot, and they opposed the more dovish positions expressed by the party as a whole at that time. From 1996 to 2003, when the two main parties lost many seats, a combination of parties in the middle of the party system—religious, immigrant, center, and so forth—held the pivot, but none of them actively opposed the expansion of settlements and some even actively supported it. In 2003–2005, Likud was the pivotal party; until ARIEL SHARON convinced a majority of the party to support disengagement from Gaza, the party in control supported settlements. In 2006–2009, Kadima captured the pivot, and although identified with the disengagement from Gaza, and hence the removal of settlements, Kadima had numerous legislators who were sympathetic to the settlers and their cause—exemplified by the inability to remove even the illegal outposts, despite promising repeatedly to do so. The combination of a united, mobilized, and expanding settler lobby on the one hand, and a party system with a pivotal position always controlled by those either passive toward or overtly supportive of the settler lobby on the other hand, created a situation that the settlers were able to exploit.

Twice in Israel's history the pivot has swung against the settlers, with the result that settlements were forcibly removed. Both times the dominant Likud Party divided and a portion joined with the left, resulting in both a majority in the Knesset and a shift in the pivot of the party system. The first time was the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS between Israel and Egypt, and the second was the disengagement from Gaza.

Another source of strength for the settler lobby is the diffusion of power in Israeli politics in general and in the Israeli party system in particular. Israeli politics has gone through a process of "de-alignment," in which the political parties have over time lost their exclusive role as agenda-setters and policymakers to competing organizations, including interest groups, the MEDIA, and business interests, among others. In this aspect, Israel is no different from most advanced Western democracies. Almost concurrently the Israeli party system has gone through a process of realignment, in which Mapai's domination during the first three decades was replaced by two-bloc competition in the subsequent decades, then by the growth of smaller sectoral parties at the expense of the major ones, and more recently by a very fluid party system. In short, Israeli democracy and the Israeli party system have become more pluralist, which allows smaller organizations, particularly if they are united, mobilized, and expanding, to gain a foothold. The settler lobby benefited from a polity in which no single party (or nonparty actor) could veto its agenda and from the increasing opportunities produced by maneuvering between the multiple power centers emerging in Israel.

The process of de-alignment, unlike that of realignment, shifted power away from the parties in general, rather than away from certain parties and toward others. As the political parties lost some power to competing organizations, and as their grand coalitions immobilized the government, the settler lobby was able not only to become an important actor in Israeli politics but also to use successfully its relative strength vis-à-vis the other emerging actors. Also, most of these new actors were not strongly opposed to the settlers, and those that were (such as PEACE NOW) were not powerful enough to constrain successfully the influence of the settler lobby. By then the party system lacked the power to oppose the shift from building new settlements to expanding the existing ones, and the viable alternative actors in Israeli politics generally did not see settlement expansion as a major concern of their limited agendas.

Two final points illustrate the relative strength of the settler lobby in a party system where the pivotal party does not oppose them and in a democracy undergoing a process of power diffusion. First, the settlers and their political allies were willing to topple coalitions dominated by the right if they did not support the settlers, even if this would bring the left to power. No competing organization on the left was willing to take such an extreme position, so this stance helped foster an environment of acquiescence to the policies of the settler movement in order to avoid dire political consequences—particularly since the majority in the Knesset, including the pivotal party, did not oppose the settlements. Second, the policies espoused by the settlers were unilateral in nature, while those advanced by the peace camp were dependent on the Palestinians' willingness to reach and to implement agreements. When international pressure came to bear on Israel in the mid- to late 1980s, the shift from settlement building to settler expansion was also unilateral and became possible because of developments in both the party system and the political system.

See also GREATER LAND OF ISRAEL MOVEMENT; GUSH EMUNIM; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; ISRAELI SUPREME COURT; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL; SETTLEMENTS

Bibliography

- Admoni, Yehiel. Decade of Discretion: Settlement Policy in the Territories, 1967–1977. Ramat Efal: Hakibbutz Hameuchad, 1992.
- Arian, Asher, and Michal Shamir. "On Mistaking a Dominant Party in a Dealignment System." In The Elections in Israel 2003. Edited by Asher Arian and Michal Shamir. London: Transaction Press, 2005.
- Diskin, Abraham. "Rethinking De Swaan (1973): A Note on Closed Coalitions, Uni-dimensionality and the Role of Sectarian Political Parties." In Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. Edited by Reuven Y. Hazan and Moshe Maor. London: Frank Cass, 2000.
- Eldar, Akiva, and Idith Zertal. Lords of the Land: The Settlers and the State of Israel, 1967–2004. Or Yehuda: Kinneret, Zmora-Bitan, Dvir, 2004.
- Gazit, Shlomo. Trapped Fools: Thirty Years of Israeli Policy in the Territories. London: Frank Cass, 2003.
- Goldberg, Giora. Political Parties in Israel: From Mass Parties to Electoral Parties. Tel Aviv: Ramot, 1992.
- Harnoy, Meir. The Settlers. Or Yehuda: Zmora-Bitan, 1994.
- Hazan, Reuven Y. "Kadima and the Centre: Convergence in the Israeli Party System." Israel Affairs. 13:2 (2007).
- . "Party System Change in Israel, 1948–1998." In Comparing Party System Change. Edited by Paul Pennings and Jan-Erik Lane. London: Routledge, 1998.
- Inbar, Efraim. War and Peace in Israeli Politics: Labor Party Positions on National Security. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1991.
- Kieval, Gershon R. Party Politics in Israel and the Occupied Territories. London: Greenwood Press, 1983.
- Korn, Dan. Time in Gray. Tel Aviv: Zmora-Bitan, 1994.
- Korn, Dan, and Boaz Shapira. Coalition Politics in Israel. Tel Aviv: Zmora-Bitan, 1997.
- Lijphart, Arend, Peter J. Bowman, and Reuven Y. Hazan. "Party Systems and Issue Dimensions: Israel and Thirty-Five Other Old and New Democracies Compared." In Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. Edited by Reuven Y. Hazan and Moshe Maor. London: Frank Cass, 2000.
- Lochery, Neill. The Israeli Labour Party in the Shadow of the Likud. Reading, UK: Ithaca Press, 1997.
- Naor, Arye. Greater Israel: Theology and Policy. Haifa: Haifa University Press, 2001.
- Neuberger, Benyamin. "Between Ideology and Sociology—Parties in Israel, 1950–2000." State and Society. 1:1 (2001).

- . Political Parties in Israel. Tel Aviv: Open University, 1991.
- Norell, Magnus. A Dissenting Democracy: The Israeli Movement "Peace Now." London: Frank Cass, 2002.
- Pedahzur, Ami. The Extreme Right-Wing Parties in Israel: Emergence and Decline? Tel Aviv: Ramot Publishing, 2000.
- Pedatzur, Reuven. The Triumph of Embarrassment: Israel and the Territories after the Six-Day War. Tel Aviv: Bitan Publishers, 1996.
- Roth, Anat. The Secret of Its Strength: The Yesha Council and Its Campaign against the Security Fence and the Disengagement Plan. Jerusalem: Israel Democracy Institute, 2005.
- Rubinstein, Danny. On the Lord's Side: Gush Emunim. Tel Aviv: Hakibbutz Hameuchad, 1982.
- Sartori, Giovanni. Parties and Party Systems: A Framework for Analysis. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- Shamir, Michal, and Asher Arian. "Collective Identity and Electoral Competition in Israel." American Political Science Review. 93:2 (1999).
- Sasson, Talia. Summary of the Opinion Concerning Unauthorized Outposts. (Israel) Prime Minister's Office. Press releases, 2005. <http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Government/Law/Legal+Issues+and+Rulings/Summary+of+Opinion+Concerning+Unauthorized+Outposts--+Talya+Sason+Adv.htm>
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- . "Gush Emunim: The Iceberg Model of Political Extremism." State, Government and International Relations. 17:2 (1981).

—Reuven Y. Hazan and Gideon Rahat

Israeli Regime and the Question of Democracy

The Israeli regime has actively facilitated an ethnic (and religious) project of Judaization. This political and historical setting, and the associated Jewish colonization of the contested LAND, present structural problems to the implementation of many democratic principles. The lack of genuine democratization has had powerful consequences for Jewish-Palestinian relations both in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, and within Israel Proper (the recognized Israeli sovereign area, within the 1949 Green Line). A recent process of liberalization is yet to make a significant impact on the attainment of full democratic rights by Palestinians, other non-Jews and women.

Since 1967 Israel has been deeply involved in its colonial rule in the Occupied Territories. Nearly half a million Jews have settled in the territories, while the state has imposed military rule over the local Palestinians. Jewish colonialism has eroded the level of democracy within Israel, by exacerbating the Zionist-Palestinian conflict, deepening racism toward PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL, and reinforcing the impact of MILITARISM on Israeli society. Jewish colonialism has also sharpened the Orthodox-secular conflict within Jewish society over such divisive issues as the future of the biblical lands in the WEST BANK and JERUSALEM, the fate of the Jewish SETTLEMENTS (inhabited by large numbers of Orthodox Jews), women's rights, and the Jewishness of Israel. The colonization of the West Bank has also imposed considerable costs on the Israeli public, thereby shifting resources away from social welfare and causing long-lasting economic and political inequalities—especially among Israel's ethnic minorities.

Democracy

Democracy is a form of rule established "by the people, for the people." Modern democratic regimes developed after generations of political struggle that broadened the boundaries of citizenship and political participation to previously excluded sectors, such as women, slaves, immigrants, and the poor. There is not one, absolute definition of democracy, which is a regime that can never fully attain its lofty goals. However, most political thinkers agree on a few key principles—aimed at promoting the two fundamental democratic values of equality and liberty. These include the following:

- Equal citizenship for all the state's permanent residents
- Universal and free ELECTIONS at regular intervals or according to a regular process
- Protection of the rights of all citizens, especially minorities, from "tyranny of the majority"
- A range of civil liberties, such as freedom of expression, religion, movement, political organization, and demonstration

In most democratic states these principles are established by a stable constitution and are overseen by an accountable government, an elected legislature, and an independent judiciary.

A debate exists whether democracy should be limited to the protection of individual personal liberties or can be extended to the facilitation of collective and substantive (social) rights. Most scholars agree that a reasonable balance needs to be maintained between the rights and responsibilities of individuals, on the one hand, and those of collectivities (minorities, workers or women), on the other. Advanced democracy, most agree, should also include substantive rights such as housing, HEALTH CARE, and EDUCATION. Because no state fulfills its principles completely and thus no state is a perfect democracy, it is preferable to measure the democratic state of affairs by assessing key issues such as civil equality, minority and gender rights, theocratic impositions, and legal inequalities. By placing these on a continuum extending between the poles of advanced democracy and authoritarianism, regimes can be characterized as “more” or “less” democratic in the various fields of governance.

Despite inevitable deviations in certain spheres, most Western states fit into the “advanced democratic” classification. The situation in Israel is more problematic, for there are structural deviations on almost all of the democratic principles listed, which raise questions about its common classification as a democracy. Accordingly, recent critical scholarship has challenged Israel’s classification as a democracy and has instead proposed such categories as “ethnocracy,” “colonial state,” “ethnic state,” “ethnic democracy,” or “deeply flawed democracy.”

The democratic achievements of Israel are significant. Defining itself as “Jewish and democratic,” Israel holds relatively open elections at regular intervals, which have led to multiple changes of government (though Palestinians residing in the Occupied Territories are not enfranchised). There is almost full freedom of political organization, relatively high levels of freedom of expression, an open MEDIA, and numerous civil rights anchored in laws, regulations, and conventions. The judiciary is relatively independent and exercises judicial review of legislative and executive authorities. The state also ensures basic protection of its citizens and extends (basic) economic assistance to needy population sectors.

The Role of Judaization

However, structural barriers to full democratic rule exist. The central one is the colonial process of Judaization (and the associated process of de-Arabization), which has been a central pillar of ZIONISM since its inception and continues through this day. This process tries to deepen and broaden Jewish control over state institutions, territory, economy, and public sphere. In the early years of Zionism there were compelling (if controversial) reasons for promoting Jewish domination, namely to secure the survival of a small Jewish community in a state of war with local and neighboring Arabs and to facilitate the absorption of Jewish refugees and immigrants after the HOLOCAUST. Today circumstances are different, so that the ongoing Judaization project seriously impedes the consolidation of a democratic regime. Judaization is based on the concept that Israel “belongs” to world Jewry with a mission of concentrating Jews in Israel. Because the Jewish state was created in a territory that had a Palestinian-Arab majority, the goal could have been achieved only by the creation of an immigrant-colonial Judaizing society, and by jealously guarding the outcome of the 1948 WAR, which saw the ethnic cleansing of large parts of historic Palestine, the erasure of hundreds of Palestinian villages and towns, and the creation of the REFUGEE problem and the denial of their right of return.

A central problem to democracy therefore derives from the definition of the polity as “Jewish.” Given the geopolitical and ideological circumstances, a Jewish state must continue the Judaization project, which undermines two major principles of modern democracy: civil equality and minority protection. The definition of the state has produced legal and institutional discrimination against the state’s Palestinian-Arab minority, which is enshrined in a series of laws. First among these is the LAW OF RETURN, which grants any Jew in the world a permanent right of IMMIGRATION to Israel. At the same time immigration of Arabs to Israel—including those (refugees) born in the country before 1948—has been largely prohibited. A range of other discriminatory legislation exists, including two notable examples in Israel’s BASIC LAWS: Israel’s Lands and the structure of the Knesset. Both ensure Jewish control over the territory and government while curtailing political representation to citizens opposing the Jewish nature of the state. Several additional discriminatory laws include those regulating the state’s military and security apparatus, public education, national broadcasting, and state religious services.

In addition Israel has used several discriminatory executive practices, such as applying the British DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS (used almost entirely against Arabs, most recently to prevent FAMILY REUNIFICATION with Palestinians from the Occupied Territories), preferential mortgage and child allowances to (predominantly Jewish) ex-soldiers, budget allocations skewed in favor of Jewish localities and projects, and severe constraints on Palestinian land control and housing mobility. Judaization is the reason scholars have described the Israeli regime as “ethnocratic.” In such a regime a dominant ethnonational group uses the state apparatus to expand its influence and control while maintaining a democratic facade. In Israel the dominance of one ethnonational group is buttressed by a hegemonic regime structure, which reinforces the state’s Jewish character through immigration, land policy, development and flow of capital, constitutional settings, public culture, and the role of the armed forces.

Israel’s land and planning systems have constituted a central pillar of its ethnocratic regime. The state expropriated, nationalized, and transferred the vast majority of previously owned or held Palestinian lands, and then made it subject to exclusive Jewish control by incorporating the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (a body representing world Jewry) as an equal partner in the ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION. At the same time laws and regulations have prevented the sale or lease of STATE LAND, in most areas, to non-Jews. Although Israel established more than 700 Jewish communities, no Arab communities were established except for twenty-two small towns built for the coerced urbanization of the BEDOUIN.

Judaization also explains the official role played in Israel by international Jewish organizations such as the JEWISH AGENCY and the Jewish National Fund. These organizations, which have a semiofficial role in Israel, function solely for the benefit of Jews as determined by several laws, including the 1952 WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION–Jewish Agency (Status) Law between Israel and these two global Zionist organizations. These arrangements allow “discrimination by proxy” on behalf of the state and accelerate Judaization, mainly by aiding Jewish immigration, allocating land to Jews alone, establishing hundreds of Jewish communities, promoting afforestation, and protecting Judaized “open spaces” from Arab settlement.

Undemocratic practices are also prominent in housing and development rights. Because of the legal and institutional involvement of the Jewish Agency and Jewish National Fund and the total Jewish domination of the land and planning systems, Arab citizens are effectively prevented from residing in over 80 percent of Israel’s territory. In those same areas DIASPORA Jews can purchase or lease land even if they are not citizens of the state. In its Qa’adan decision of 2000 the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT ruled that the allocation of state lands to Jews alone, in certain circumstances, is illegal. However, later institutional readjustment by the Land Authority has enabled Jewish communities to continue to exclude Arabs, and the landmark Qa’adan decision has to date had little impact on Israel’s ethnic geography.

Other, less conspicuous, policies facilitate the unequal distribution of public resources between Jews and Arabs. Among these are the classification of Jewish localities as “frontier regions” (which results in beneficial budget allocations), the methods of funding local authorities, the exclusion of Arabs from various employment fields (such as Israel’s Electric Company and high-tech industries connected to the armed forces) for security reasons, and wide disparities in the funding of Arab and Jewish schools and community facilities. Several studies suggest, however, that these gaps in public allocations are narrowing.

In addition, the state’s security forces and pervasive militarism constitute a central pillar of the regime. These are totally identified with Jewish society (except for the participation of Druze and a few Bedouin), thereby causing pervasive inequalities in access to the centers of power and legitimacy. While Jewish secular women are drafted for a short military service, the security services are totally male dominated, causing further marginalization of women in Israel. Finally, ultra-Orthodox Jews are exempt from military service, and are hence also excluded from the important centers of power associated with state security, its apparatus, and surrounding institutions and culture.

Ethnonational Sphere

As noted, a modern democracy is synonymous with a state and thus must be territorial—that is, limited to a well-bounded space. All who live in this space—the demos (the people)—have equal civil rights and are subject to the same laws. Thus the basis for sovereignty and self-determination is territorial. Accordingly France belongs to the French (those who live in France), Italy to the Italians, and Great Britain to the British. This structure ensures that only the body politic of all citizens in a given territory—who are ruled by the government of that territory—have the right to participate in the political process. But in Israel the principles of sovereignty and self-determination are ethnic, not territorial. The state belongs to all the Jews in the world, not necessarily to its own inhabitants, among them the Arabs, whose lives are affected daily by the regime. A manifestation of this is the “nationality” category in the Israeli registration of citizens, which lists various ethno-religious groups (Jewish, Arab, Druze, non-Jewish Russian, etc.) and thus prevents through institutional means the creation of a Palestinian nationality.

Was the “Jewish and democratic” concept—so dominant in Israeli political and legal thinking—doomed to failure from its very inception? The answer to this is not unequivocal, despite the structural problems outlined above. Many believe it would be more democratic to transform Israel into a secular (multicultural, binational, but not Jewish) state. But if we return to the definition of democracy as a complex set of rules and institutions, even within the structure of “Jewish and democratic,” there is room for much democratic improvement. Just as Finland is defined as a Lutheran democratic state and Italy is both Catholic and democratic, so too Israel can be Jewish but at the same time more democratic. But a clear difference exists between a “Jewish” and a “Judaizing” state. Israel cannot aspire to become a democracy while continuing its colonial strategies both within and beyond the Green Line. It cannot democratize while maintaining and deepening disproportionate Jewish control over DEMOGRAPHY, land, resources, and institutions of Israel/Palestine, because those produce a clearly undemocratic category of second- and third-class citizenship for Palestinians in Israel proper and in the West Bank, respectively.

For genuine democracy Israel must therefore put an end to the OCCUPATION, and change its discriminatory laws and practices, by treating all the citizens of the state as equals. The state can still form the main organ of Jewish self-determination while maintaining civil equality and protecting the collective rights of the Arab national minority—that is, its identity, representation, property, resources, and autonomy.

The Religious Sphere

A basic democratic principle that is absent in Israel is religious freedom (including freedom from religion). Although well-established democracies do not coerce religious affiliation, in Israel such affiliation is inscribed at birth. The law specifies fourteen religious communities based on the Ottoman millets (communities of minorities). Unless there is civil legislation on personal matters, citizens are subject to the rule of their religious communities in matters such as marriage, divorce, custody, and burial. This practice causes widespread violation of civil rights, especially among women and the some 300,000 immigrants who belong socially and ethnically to the Jewish majority but are denied religious recognition of their Jewish affiliation.

Officially, intermarriage between Jewish-Israeli citizens and citizens belonging to other religions is prohibited by Israeli law (although the state accepts intermarriages registered elsewhere). Also prohibited are marriages conducted by non-Orthodox Jewish authorities such as those from the Reform and Conservative movements, which are not recognized in Israel. Recent years have witnessed an erosion of this religious monopoly over personal matters, in part from the growing popularity of offshore civil marriages (recognized by Israel) and the establishment of a Civil Court of Family Affairs. However, the religious establishment still has considerable power over the personal matters of the vast majority of citizens.

In addition to its influence over marital issues, the religious establishment was instrumental in establishing a series of laws and practices that impinge on basic liberties. First, it uses exclusively Orthodox criteria to determine who is a Jew. In Israel this is not just a religious issue but a legal-civil one that determines if a person is entitled to full citizenship. Orthodox laws and regulations impose Sabbath observance on public companies, prevent the Sabbath opening of private businesses, enforce Jewish dietary laws (Kashrut) in public institutions, prohibit the import of nonkosher meat, and provide funding for nondemocratic Orthodox education.

How can one explain the success of a religious establishment in imposing undemocratic measures on the lives of the vast majority of non-Orthodox citizens? Most secular Jews accept the undemocratic characteristics of religious control because they believe the religious establishment strengthens the Jewish character of the state vis-à-vis the Arab-Palestinian challenge. The influence of the religious establishment is seen in concrete legal structures (such as rabbinical control over Jewish identity and hence the identity of immigrants) and in Jewish control of public spaces and state culture. For these religious groups, then, democratization would neutralize their political powers, though not necessarily their cultural or faith-based influence. The examples of Finland and Britain demonstrate that stable democracies can thrive even in states with “national churches” (Lutheran and Anglican, accordingly). A key factor is ensuring that religious institutions lack coercive political or institutional power. In addition, the existence of a state-supported church does not impinge on the religious freedom or freedom from religion of Finnish and British citizens. This model could provide a realistic option for democratization of the governmental apparatus in Israel.

Liberalization

Since the early 1990s a number of important human rights were secured by new Basic Laws that have semiconstitutional status. The new rights include human dignity, liberty, property, and freedom of employment. (Such laws do not apply in the Occupied Territories, however.) There has also been much discussion regarding the drafting of a constitution, and the Knesset published several proposals during the 2006–2009 period, aiming to produce a draft in the near future. In addition the economy and capital markets have been significantly deregulated, and key assets of the state, including large tracts of land and key infrastructures, have been gradually privatized. Liberalization has also been evident in the increased activity of civil society organizations and in the growing freedoms enjoyed by Arab citizens, in terms of both political organization and access to some domains in Israeli society, particularly culture, sports, and media. However, this freedom is largely confined to individual mobility or to civil society activities that do not challenge the Jewish nature of the state, typically in fields such as the environment, welfare provision, and women’s rights.

But this process is partial and incomplete. First, most of the changes promote liberalization rather than democratization, although there are links between the two. In other words, the individual has more rights and liberties, but the ethno-religious definition of the state remains unchanged. Second, many of these changes have been produced by economic forces that have privatized public resources in the name of the free market, not by a drive for civic equality. In addition the liberalization of the economy, especially the privatization of public assets and services, has significantly widened socioeconomic gaps and increased poverty, thus weakening an important foundation of substantive democracy—the equitable distribution of public resources.

Finally, since the second LEBANON WAR, and more intensely since the election of a right-wing Likud-led government in 2009, a plethora of new legislation and policies have been launched by the new government, with the aim of marginalizing and weakening the state’s Palestinian citizens. These have demonstrated again the deeply ethnocentric nature of the Israeli regime and its substantial distance from genuine democracy.

See also ABANDONED AREAS ORDINANCE; ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW; BEDOUIN IN ISRAEL; CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY; DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY; ISRAELI MILITARISM; ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION; JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL; JEWISH NATIONAL FUND; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL; PRESENT ABSENTEES

Bibliography

- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva, Switzerland: COHRE and Badil, 2005.
- Gavison, R. “Jewish and Democratic? A Rejoinder to the ‘Ethnic Democratic’ Debate.” Israel Studies. 4:1 (1999).
- Ghanem, A. “The Palestinian Minority: Challenging the Jewish State and Its Implications.” Third World Quarterly. 21:1 (2000).
- Kimmerling, B. The Invention and Decline of Israeli-ness: State, Society and the Military. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2001.
- . “Religion, Nationalism and Democracy in Israel.” Constellations. 6:3 (1999).
- Neuberger, B. Democracy in Israel: Origins and Development. Tel Aviv: Open University, 1998.
- Peled, Y. “Ethnic Democracy and the Legal Construction of Citizenship: Arab Citizens of the Jewish State.” The American Political Science Review. 86:2 (1992).
- Peleg, I. “Jewish-Palestinian Relations in Israel: From Hegemony to Equality?” International Journal of Politics, Culture and Society. 17:3 (2004).
- Rouhana, N. “Israel and Its Arab Citizens: Predicaments in the Relationship between Ethnic States and Ethnonational Minorities.” Third World Quarterly. 19:2 (1998).
- Smootha, S. “The Israeli Regime: Civil Democracy, Non-Democracy or Ethnic Democracy?” (Hebrew) Israeli Sociology. 2:2 (2000).

Yiftachel, O. Ethnocracy: Land and Identity Politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.

Yiftachel, O., and A. Ghanem. "Understanding Ethnocratic Regimes: The Politics of Seizing Contested Territory." Political Geography. 22:4 (2004).

—Oren Yiftachel

Israeli Supreme Court and the Occupation

THE WEST BANK and GAZA were conquered by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) during the 1967 armed conflict among Israel, EGYPT, and JORDAN. As territories captured by a hostile party during an international armed conflict, these territories became subject to a regime of belligerent OCCUPATION. Hence the main international instruments dealing with such a regime, the Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention (IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, 1907 (Hague Regulations), and the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, 1949 (Geneva Convention IV), were applicable. Recognizing this, the first military order promulgated when the IDF entered the areas provided that the military courts established there would observe the provisions of Geneva Convention IV, and that in case of a conflict between the Convention and military orders, the Convention would prevail.

Soon after military operations ended in June 1967, some in Israel began questioning whether the West Bank and Gaza should indeed be regarded as occupied territory. They argued that neither area was part of the sovereign territory of the two belligerents in the 1967 conflict (Jordan and Egypt), so their status was unclear. The provision in the military order referring to Geneva Convention IV was revoked, and the government of Israel adopted the political position that the West Bank and Gaza were "disputed territories." It challenged de jure application of Geneva Convention IV, but declared that the Israel Defense Forces would respect its humanitarian provisions. Government spokesmen never clarified what distinguished humanitarian provisions from others in the Convention.

The government's approach was rejected by most experts in INTERNATIONAL LAW, foreign governments, and international organizations. On a number of occasions the UNITED NATIONS Security Council has declared that Geneva Convention IV applies to the West Bank and Gaza. In its advisory opinion on the Legal Consequences of Construction of a Wall (2004) the International Court of Justice also affirmed that the Convention applies to the West Bank.

Soon after Israel's Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, Palestinian residents of these territories submitted petitions to the Supreme Court of Israel challenging the legality of actions of the Israeli military authorities. Although there was no precedent for judicial review by a national court over actions of the state's military forces in occupied territories, Israeli authorities did not question the Court's jurisdiction to entertain the petitions. At first the Court accepted the government's acquiescence as sufficient basis for its jurisdiction, but later it ruled that its statutory jurisdiction as a high court of justice to issue writs against all authorities in Israel "exercising public functions under law" covers review of IDF actions, wherever they are performed.

Alongside the issue of jurisdiction, petitions by Palestinian residents could potentially have met two other procedural obstacles. First, Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza are not Israeli nationals and given the ongoing conflict they could be regarded as enemy aliens who may not challenge the actions of Israel's authorities before its own courts. This argument, which was recently raised to avoid judicial review of actions by another occupying power, never came before the Supreme Court of Israel. Second, the political nature of some Israeli actions in the West Bank and Gaza arguably made them nonjusticiable (i.e., unsuitable for resolution in a court of law), either as "acts of state" or under a "political-questions doctrine." In a few cases the Israeli authorities did indeed try to avoid judicial review by claiming that the specific issue before the Court was nonjusticiable. The Court was not receptive to the argument. It has consistently held that acts which have allegedly harmed the rights of specific individuals are always justiciable.

Having established its jurisdiction to entertain petitions relating to the West Bank and Gaza, the Court had to decide whether to resort to international law relating to belligerent occupation in assessing the legality of acts performed there by Israeli authorities. In the first cases to reach the Court, government counsel asked it to refrain from ruling on the status in international law of the West Bank and Gaza. They declared that the military authorities were convinced that they had complied with norms of belligerent occupation and were thus prepared for the Court to assess their actions according to these norms, even if they were not formally binding. Initially the Court went along with this approach. However, later it ruled that the West Bank and Gaza are indeed subject to a regime of belligerent occupation. The one exception relates to East JERUSALEM, which was annexed by Israel in 1967 pursuant to a statute enacted by the Knesset. The Supreme Court regards itself as bound to apply this statute, even if it is incompatible with Israel's international obligations.

In enforcing international norms relating to belligerent occupation, the Supreme Court's approach was shaped by the role of international law in Israel's domestic legal system. Following the British approach, courts in Israel enforce customary international law unless it is incompatible with a statute passed by the Knesset, Israel's parliament. On the other hand, because the power to make binding treaties on behalf of the state is in the hands of the executive branch of government, the courts do not enforce international treaties unless they have been incorporated in domestic law by parliamentary legislation. They will, however, interpret legislation so as to avoid incompatibility with Israel's international obligations.

Applying that approach, the Supreme Court ruled that the Hague Regulations reflect customary law, while not all provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention are reflective of such law. Provisions that do not reflect customary law will not be enforced, since even though the Geneva Convention was ratified, it was not incorporated by Knesset legislation. The distinction between customary and conventional international law allowed the Court to avoid confronting the government's contention that the Fourth Geneva Convention is not formally applicable. After violence erupted in September 2000, the Court gradually modified its approach and used the standards of the Fourth Geneva Convention to assess the legality of government action, without formally ruling that the Convention applies.

Respecting Local Law

The primary duties of an occupying power are contained in Regulation 43 of the Hague Regulations. According to this provision, the occupying power "shall take all the measures in his power to restore, and ensure, as far as possible, public order and civil life, while respecting, unless absolutely prevented, the laws in force in the country." The meaning of this provision was the focus of a number of Supreme Court decisions delivered during the first two decades of the Occupation.

Regulation 43 deals with two issues: the duty to restore and ensure public order, and the duty to respect the laws in force when the Occupation began. Although these were originally regarded as two separate issues, the Supreme Court forged a strong connection between them, holding that the occupying power's duty to respect the local laws is subject to its obligation to restore and ensure public order. When changes in the local law are required for reasons of public order and civil life, they cannot be "absolutely prevented."

The Court has given a wide interpretation to the term "public order and civil life" (an interpretation of the original French "l'ordre et la vie publique"). It has ruled that any measures whose motive is to benefit the local population may be regarded as promoting public order and civil life, even if this is not their sole, or even dominant, motive, and if they also further Israeli interests, including those of the Israeli settler population. Thus, for example, in 1982 the Court upheld the imposition of a new tax, value-added tax (VAT), in the Occupied Territories, when the same tax had been instituted in Israel. Given the free flow of services and goods at the time, this was clearly in the economic interests of Israel. However, in upholding the tax the Court held that if VAT had not been imposed, restrictions would have been required on the free flow of goods and services between Israel and the Occupied Territories and that these restrictions would not have been beneficial for the local population (i.e., the Palestinians).

Under the Court's jurisprudence, the actions of military commanders in the Occupied Territories must be guided by one or both of two considerations: security and the good of the local population. As both of these considerations have been broadly defined, the Court has rarely interfered with decisions or actions of the military. This has been especially noticeable in the field of lawmaking. While in theory the prevailing law when the Occupation began remains in force, even before the OSLO ACCORDS and the changes in law and administration effected under those accords and subsequent agreements, there had been wide-scale changes in many fields of law.

Israeli Settlements in Occupied Territories

One of the most contentious policies of successive Israeli governments since 1967 has been establishment of Israeli SETTLEMENTS in the West Bank and in Gaza. In the view of most experts in international law, foreign governments, United Nations bodies, and the International Court of Justice, in establishing these settlements Israel violated Article 49, paragraph 6, of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which prohibits an occupying power from transferring part of its own civilian population into the occupied territory. It would also seem that taking private or public LAND for such settlements is incompatible with the obligations of an occupying power under international law.

The settlement issue has reached the Supreme Court several times. In the initial cases the Court held that Article 49 is not reflective of customary international law. It therefore refused to rule whether this provision applies to any settlement of civilians of the occupying power in occupied territory, or only, as some Israeli lawyers have claimed, to forcible transfers of civilians. Instead of ruling on the legality of settlements under international law, the Court's decisions focused on the legality of taking the land on which settlements were established. In the Beth El case (1978) the Court ruled that settlements established in strategic positions could fulfill a security function and that Palestinians' private land requisitioned for military purposes could therefore be used for such settlements. Soon after this decision, in the famous ELON MOREH SETTLEMENT (1979), the Court held that it was unlawful to requisition private land for a settlement if the primary motivation for the settlement was political rather than military, and the settlement was intended to be permanent. In this particular case the Court ordered the authorities to disband the settlement and return the requisitioned land to its Palestinian owners.

In response to the Elon Moreh ruling, Israeli authorities adopted a policy of declaring uncultivated land in the Occupied Territories public or STATE LAND and establishing settlements on such land. The Supreme Court has avoided ruling on the legality of this practice. In one case it held that the petitioners had no property rights to the land and thus lacked legal standing to challenge its use; in another it held that a petition challenging the whole settlement policy on various grounds, including use of public land, was too general to be justiciable.

The Elon Moreh precedent, which declared that establishing settlements with intention that they should be permanent is unlawful, became highly relevant when the government decided to remove Israeli settlers and settlements from Gaza in the framework of ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT plan (2005). Settlers challenged the legality of the decision and the constitutionality of the Knesset statute enacted to implement it. Their main argument was that the government was violating their fundamental rights by forcing them to leave the homes in which they had lived for many years. In reply, government lawyers argued that the settlements were established in occupied territory and were thus by their very nature temporary. They could therefore be removed as part of a political agreement or political decision to withdraw from the territories. The Court accepted the argument, dismissed the settlers' petition, and upheld both the constitutionality of the Knesset statute and the legality of the government decision to force settlers to leave Gaza. In doing so, it stated that "according to the legal outlook of all successive Israeli governments, as it was presented to the Supreme Court—an outlook that has always been accepted by the Supreme Court—the [West Bank and Gaza] are held by the State of Israel by way of belligerent occupation."

The legality of settlements on the West Bank returned to the Court in cases dealing with the separation BARRIER that was constructed there. The International Court of Justice opined that as the settlements were established in violation of international law, routing the Barrier to protect them was unlawful. The Supreme Court refused to accept this argument. Rather it held that whether the settlements were established lawfully or not is irrelevant in examining the lawfulness of the Barrier's route, because even if the settlements are unlawful, their residents are civilians who are entitled to protection against security threats. The Court did not examine whether, under international law, removing the settlers, rather than including the settlements on the western side of the Barrier, would have been the appropriate measure to protect them.

Security Measures

During the Occupation, the Israeli authorities have employed various security measures against the Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza. These have included DEPORTATIONS, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION. There have been numerous challenges to such measures before the Supreme Court.

The first cases relating to deportation of Palestinians to Jordan or LEBANON reached the Court in the 1970s. The main legal argument rested on Article 49, paragraph 1, of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which prohibits deportations of protected persons from occupied territory, regardless of their motive. The Court held that a total ban on deportations is not part of customary law and that, in any event, paragraph 1 does not apply to deportations of individuals on security grounds. Despite strong criticism of this interpretation, the Court refused to reverse its stand in later cases. In 1992, 415 members of HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD, who the security services maintained were involved in attacks against Israelis, were deported without a hearing, which was required by law and by the Court's previous jurisprudence. The Court refused to grant an injunction to stop the deportations, although it later ruled that the authorities were bound to allow the deportees a hearing after their deportation.

Deportation orders against Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza were halted after the Oslo Accords. However, when terrorist attacks by SUICIDE BOMBERS increased before and during the Second INTIFADA, the authorities proposed to deport West Bank family members of the bombers to Gaza. After the attorney general of Israel ruled out measures against persons who were not personally involved in the activities of bombers, the IDF authorities issued deportation orders against three persons who had allegedly been involved in the terrorist activities of family members. When the orders were challenged in court, the authorities maintained that rather than deportation, the orders involved "assigned residence" within the occupied territory, which is allowed under Article 78 of the Fourth Geneva Convention when necessary for imperative reasons of security. The Court rejected the legal argument that the West Bank and Gaza should be regarded as two separate occupied territories, relying, inter alia, on a clause in the Oslo agreements between Israel and the PLO that the parties "view the West Bank and the Gaza Strip as a single territorial unit, the integrity and status of which shall be preserved during the interim agreement." Ordering a West Bank resident to live in Gaza was therefore to be regarded as "assigned residence within occupied territory" rather than deportation. The Court emphasized that since this measure could be used only when necessary for imperative reasons of security, there had to be a strong connection between the activities of the suicide bomber and the person subject to "assigned residence." In two of the cases the Court found such a connection, but in the third case it held that the connection was not strong enough, and the "assigned residence" order was therefore revoked.

Punitive house demolitions are based on a provision in the BRITISH MANDATE DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS that were promulgated in the whole of Palestine in 1945. Regulation 119 grants the military commander power to order forfeiture and demolition of any house if an inhabitant of the house participated in a crime involving use of violence. The Supreme Court ruled that the Defense Regulations were still valid in the Occupied Territories when Israel entered in 1967 and were therefore part of the prevailing law. It has heard hundreds of cases challenging punitive house demolitions. In all cases the Court issues a temporary injunction to stop use of the measure pending its decision, but it has rejected substantive arguments that would prohibit all punitive demolitions. The Court rejected the argument that punitive demolitions are a form of collective punishment, because the main victims are family members of the alleged perpetrator, and it refrained from considering other arguments that such demolitions are incompatible with international humanitarian law and international human rights law. On the other hand the Court subjected the practice of demolitions to some constraints. First, it ruled that the measure may not be employed unless the inhabitants have been afforded a hearing and allowed time to petition the Court. This has proved a significant constraint, because in many cases once the matter reaches the Court the authorities either withdraw the order or agree to less harsh measures (such as sealing rooms in the house). Second, the Court has held that house demolitions are subject to the "proportionality rule." In the context of demolitions, the Court has interpreted this rule to imply that a house may not be demolished if persons other than the nuclear family of the perpetrator live there.

The Court has never addressed the argument that house demolitions are not an effective deterrent against terror, stating that this was a decision for the security authorities. In 2005 the authorities suspended use of the measure, after a task force established by the military opined that the measure was on the “borderline of legitimacy” and that its use caused resentment among Palestinians that probably outweighed its deterrent effect. However, after a terrorist attack on a religious seminary in Jerusalem, they reverted to use of the measure. The Court refused to interfere in that decision.

Administrative detention was widely used by the authorities during various periods of the Occupation, especially during the First Intifada, when hundreds of Palestinians were held in detention camps for long periods of time. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the problematical nature of detaining persons who have not been charged with a criminal offense (let alone convicted) and has stressed that such detention may not be used as an alternative to the criminal system. Administrative detention can be justified on security grounds only when less severe preventive measures are unavailable. All detention orders are reviewed by military judges, and consequently the Court has seldom been prepared to examine whether these stringent conditions have been met. Its approach has been to stress procedural aspects of the review process but to refrain from intervening on the merits. There have, however, been exceptional cases in which the Court has ordered revocation of a specific detention order.

From the above cases one can draw a general picture of the Court’s approach to security measures. The Court has refused to prohibit various measures entirely, even in light of weighty arguments that such measures are incompatible with standards of international humanitarian law. It has, however, sought to constrain the use of such measures by laying down procedural demands, reviewing the use of the measures in concrete cases, stressing that the measures may be employed only when demanded for security reasons, and interfering in rare cases that do not meet these requirements. The Court’s willingness to grant temporary injunctions to allow judicial consideration of each concrete case has led in practice to a large number of cases being resolved out of court.

Interrogation Practices

During the first twenty years of the Occupation, serious allegations were raised regarding use of force during interrogations of Palestinians suspected of involvement in violence against military or civilian targets. These allegations were strenuously denied by the IDF authorities. However, when in 1987 it was discovered that an Israeli army officer had been convicted of serious security offenses on the basis of a confession extracted by use of force, the government established a commission of inquiry to look into the interrogation practices and to make recommendations.

The Commission of Inquiry, headed by the former president of the Supreme Court, MOSHE LANDAU, found that force had indeed been used in interrogations in the past and that members of the security services had perjured themselves in court by denying its use. Although highly critical of this policy, the commission accepted that in fighting organized and ideological violence, it was not possible to restrict interrogators to normal police practices and that when it was essential to elicit information from detainees to frustrate terrorist attacks, use of moderate physical pressure could be justified. The commission opined that an interrogator who used such force could be protected from criminal liability under the defense of necessity. Following the commission’s report, use of various forms of pressure in the interrogation of Palestinians, including sleep deprivation, tying interrogatees in uncomfortable positions, hooding, and shaking detainees, was institutionalized. The authorities argued that the measures employed did not amount to torture.

A large number of petitions were submitted to the Supreme Court challenging the interrogation practices, some by individual detainees and others by human rights NGOs. The interrogation methods were also criticized by international human rights bodies, including the UN Committee Against Torture and the Human Rights Committee. The Supreme Court dragged its feet in ruling on the petitions. Eventually, in September 1999 the Court handed down a major decision in which it ruled that the security authorities were not legally empowered to use any of the described methods of interrogation or any other physical force, and that they were bound to conduct investigations according to accepted police methods of interrogation. It added, however, that while the necessity defense in criminal law could not provide the executive with the legal power to depart from regular interrogation techniques, the authorities could refrain from prosecuting officials who departed from these techniques in cases of necessity.

The Court based its judgment on Israeli domestic law rather than on standards of international law. It even intimated that the Knesset had the power to change the law but stressed that any such change would have to meet the strict requirements of one of Israel's BASIC LAWS, Human Dignity and Liberty. It is unlikely that any law that would have permitted use of force in interrogations would have met these requirements and the Knesset didn't change the law. However, following the judgment the attorney general issued guidelines in which he stated that he would consider not prosecuting officials who have "used means of interrogation needed immediately in order to gain essential information for the purpose of preventing a concrete danger of severe harm to state security, human life, liberty or bodily integrity," provided the methods used were reasonable and did not amount to torture. The Court has not interfered in this policy.

Military Operations

Until violence broke out in September 2000 in the Occupied Territories, the Supreme Court had not had to deal with combat situations. The First Intifada, which began in December 1987, was essentially a popular uprising in which the use of force by the Palestinian population was limited and did not involve wide-scale use of firearms. The response of the IDF was to be judged on standards of law enforcement in what may have been considered an emergency-type situation. It certainly did not amount to hostilities or active armed conflict.

Soon after the start of the Second or AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the Israeli authorities claimed that the situation was one of "armed conflict short of war." In support of this position they cited the large number of incidents involving use of firearms by Palestinians and the fact that there were organized armed groups behind the incidents. After a series of serious TERRORIST attacks and suicide bombings by Palestinians inside Israel in March 2002, in which over 100 civilians were killed, the IDF embarked on a campaign termed OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD, in the course of which there was heavy fighting between armed Palestinians and the IDF in JENIN, NABLUS, and other parts of the West Bank. At various times Israeli forces also entered areas of Gaza that were under Palestinian control, and this too involved heavy fighting.

While fighting was going on, petitions were submitted to the Supreme Court to enjoin certain actions of the Israeli military or to force them to comply with requirements of international humanitarian law. Although it is unprecedented for national courts to interfere in military operations in real time, the Supreme Court was not prepared to dismiss such petitions as nonjusticiable. In many cases, rather than ruling on the merits of the case, it served as a mediator between the military authorities and the petitioners—Palestinians affected by the fighting or human rights NGOs. Thus, in a case relating to the siege of the CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY in 2002, the Court held special sessions during the siege to determine the plight of civilians who were apparently being held hostage in the church by Palestinian fighters who had taken refuge there. Only after being satisfied that civilians were allowed to leave to get food and water did the Court dismiss the petition. In a case related to a battle in the Rafah area in May 2004, the Court mediated between the lawyers of Palestinian civilians trapped in the fighting and the IDF officer in charge of humanitarian matters. By the time the Court wrote its judgment, most of the major issues had been resolved. In other cases the Court stressed that its role during ongoing hostilities is limited. At times the most it can do is to demand explanations from the authorities, who are required to show that their operations are being conducted in conformity with international humanitarian law. This pattern repeated itself during Israel's military campaign in Gaza in December 2008 and January 2009. While the Court refused to accept that a petition relating to humanitarian concerns during the hostilities was nonjusticiable, rather than ruling on the merits the Court demanded an explanation from the authorities for their actions, stressed the norms of international humanitarian law that apply, and pressured the authorities to mitigate burning problems.

In the case of house demolitions during military operations, the Court has been highly reluctant to interfere when the authorities have argued that the demolitions are necessary in order to safeguard the lives of soldiers. It has, however, stressed that the decision to demolish houses must be seriously considered and that, where possible, persons in the house should be afforded a hearing before the house is demolished.

One of the controversial actions of the Israeli military authorities has been "TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS" of persons suspected of involvement in planning and executing terrorist attacks on Israelis. In November 2006 the Supreme Court handed down a judgment that examines the legality of the practice under international humanitarian law. The Court held that active members of organized Palestinian armed groups are civilians who may be targeted only for such time as they take a direct part in hostilities. However, the Court adopted a wide interpretation, both of the term “direct participation” and the time frame in which persons will be regarded as taking such part. It held that active members of armed groups will be regarded as taking a direct part in hostilities even while resting between attacks. On the other hand, the Court circumscribed the authority to target such persons with a number of conditions. There must be well-based evidence of the participation of the targeted person in hostilities; nobody may be targeted if he could be arrested, investigated, and tried; after every targeted killing there must be a thorough investigation to see that the above conditions were met; and, finally, in every attack the expected collateral damages must meet the demands of proportionality.

Despite the Court’s general reluctance to interfere in policies of the military or the government, there have been important exceptions. In one major case the Court ruled that the use by the IDF of Palestinian residents of the West Bank to warn neighbors who are about to be arrested is incompatible with international humanitarian law. In another case the Court overruled a statute enacted by the Knesset that denied compensation to persons harmed by Israeli forces during the Intifada.

Separation Barrier

Following a series of terrorist attacks in Israel by Palestinian residents of the West Bank, in 2002 the government of Israel decided to construct a barrier that would make the entry of West Bank residents to Israel more difficult. The Barrier’s original route ran mainly through the West Bank and included a number of Israeli settlements on the west (Israeli) side of the Barrier. During its construction private land was requisitioned, and in many cases OLIVE TREE GROVES, WATER wells, and other Palestinian property were severely damaged. The Barrier’s route cut off many Palestinians from their agricultural land and from access to educational, HEALTH CARE, and other services.

Palestinian landowners turned to the Supreme Court to challenge the Barrier’s legality. Initially the Court was unreceptive to these petitions, relying on the argument that the Barrier was needed for security reasons. However, in June 2004, ten days before the International Court of Justice delivered its advisory opinion on the legality of the separation Barrier, the Supreme Court handed down its judgment in the Beit Sourik case, in which it took a radically different approach. Construction of a twenty-five-mile (forty-kilometer) portion of the Barrier northwest of Jerusalem caused extensive damage to Palestinians in the area, which included taking large parcels of land, uprooting thousands of olive trees, and separating villagers from their agricultural lands. The Court accepted the government’s argument that the Barrier itself as well as the route of the section under consideration was motivated by security concerns. However, it held that the harm caused by the route chosen in the particular section was disproportionate to its security advantages. In reaching this conclusion, the Court was guided by an opinion submitted by a group of retired army officers, who argued that the route chosen by the authorities was not optimal from a security perspective. The Court revoked the orders requisitioning land for this part of the Barrier and ordered the authorities to find an alternative route.

The Beit Sourik judgment related to one portion of the separation Barrier, but it laid down principles that were relevant in assessing the legality of other portions. The Court accepted that building the Barrier on the east side of the Green Line is legal if the route chosen is justified on security grounds and the damage caused is not disproportionate to its security advantages. In another judgment, delivered after the International Court’s Advisory Opinion, the Court again held that the route of the Barrier section under review was dictated by legitimate security considerations. However, it ruled that the route did not meet the demands of proportionality, because the authorities had not shown that it had the least harmful effects on Palestinian residents of villages entrapped in an enclave around an Israeli settlement, Alpehi Menashe. The Court therefore ordered the authorities to find an alternative route that would have less impact on the Palestinian villagers but would still provide security to persons in Israel and surrounding Israeli settlements. However, the few cases in which the Court has interfered in the Barrier’s route are the exception. In most of the cases the Court has refused to interfere in the route chosen, even when the damage to Palestinian civilians has been significant.

Gaza and the Disengagement

Following withdrawal of Israeli settlements and forces from Gaza, the 2006 Palestinian ELECTIONS and the establishment of a Hamas government in the area, Israel's cabinet passed a decision placing sanctions on Gaza, which included cuts in fuel and electricity supply and RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT for leaving and entering the territory. The one limitation was that a "humanitarian crisis" should be avoided. The Court considered a number of petitions challenging this policy. It refused to interfere in restrictions on the right of persons to leave Gaza so as to study in the West Bank or abroad. When human rights NGOs attacked the decision to restrict supply of fuel and electricity, the Court ruled that since Israel no longer had effective control over Gaza, it was not bound by the full range of obligations imposed on an occupying power. Without clearly defining Israel's status vis-à-vis Gaza, the Court held that in light of the hostilities between Israel and Hamas and Israel's control over the entry points to Gaza, it retained certain duties under international humanitarian law. These were restricted to allowing the minimum flow of fuel and electricity needed to sustain the essential humanitarian needs of the population. The Court accepted the authorities' view that the amounts of fuel and electricity that were being supplied met these needs. In subsequent cases the Court has not been prepared to interfere in government policy relating to entry of supplies into Gaza, provided the authorities assure them that the "essential humanitarian needs" of the Palestinian population there are being met.

General Assessment of Court's Function

In the Court's review of the authorities' actions in the Occupied Territories one detects two conflicting trends. On the one hand, the Court has no doubt fulfilled a legitimizing function. This is most apparent in the Court's interpretation of provisions in the Fourth Geneva Convention; its refusal to interfere in the use of highly questionable security measures, such as punitive house demolitions and deportations; its reluctance to question the lawfulness of Israeli settlements; and its acceptance of the notion of "essential humanitarian needs" as the criterion for restrictions on supplies to Gaza. On the other hand, the mere existence of the Court's power of review, and its demand that the authorities provide legal grounds for their actions, have mitigated arbitrariness by the IDF and allowed for some measure of accountability.

Judicial review in real time over actions of the military in the Occupied Territories set a precedent for domestic courts. In recent years the Supreme Court has gone even further in reviewing the legality of ongoing military actions during active hostilities. Although the Court has been reluctant to interfere in operational decisions, it has forced the authorities to relate to the demands of international humanitarian law and has often helped to negotiate local agreements that mitigate the harsh conditions of armed conflict. The Court has seldom overruled the authorities in the Occupied Territories. However, many cases are settled in the Court's shadow, either after a petition has been submitted or when legal action is threatened.

In summary, judicial review by the Supreme Court of Israel over actions of the military in the Occupied Territories has not served to guarantee the rule of law there. Existence of such review has, however, provided for some restraint on the military.

See also ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Bibliography

- Amit-Kohn, Uzi, et al. Israel, the "Intifada" and the Rule of Law. Tel Aviv: Israel Ministry of Defense Publications, 1993.
- Dotan, Yoav. "Judicial Rhetoric, Government Lawyers and Human Rights: The Case of the Israeli High Court of Justice during the Intifada." Law and Society Review. 33:3 (1999).
- Hajjar, Lisa. Courting Conflict: The Israeli Military Court System in the West Bank and Gaza. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Kretzmer, David. The Occupation of Justice: The Supreme Court of Israel and the Occupied Territories. Albany: SUNY Press, 2002.
- . "The Supreme Court of Israel: Judicial Review during Armed Conflict." German Yearbook of International Law. 47 (2005).
- Peleg, Ilan. Human Rights in the West Bank and Gaza: Legacy and Politics. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1995.
- Playfair, Emma, ed. International Law and the Administration of Occupied Territories: Two Decades of Israeli Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Shamgar, Meir, ed. Military Government in the Territories Administered by Israel: 1967–1982. Jerusalem: Harry Sacher Institute for Legislative Research and Comparative Law, 1982.
- Shehadeh, Raja. Occupier's Law: Israel and the West Bank, 2nd ed. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1988.

—David Kretzmer

Israel-Jordan Peace Agreement

The Treaty of Peace between the state of Israel and the Hashemite Kingdom of JORDAN was signed on 26 October 1994. It made Jordan the second Arab country (after EGYPT) to normalize relations with Israel and was closely linked to the OSLO PROCESS initiated in September 1993. The basis for the treaty's implementation was the signing and ratification of fifteen bilateral agreements in economic, scientific, and cultural spheres.

In addition to normalizing relations between the two countries, the treaty resolved territorial disputes, and provided for more substantial economic connections that would reach into the wider Middle East region. According to the treaty both countries would refrain from acts of belligerency, ensure that no threats of violence to the other would originate within their territory, prevent TERRORISM, and act together to achieve security and cooperation in the Middle East by replacing military preparedness with confidence-building measures, such as trade.

Other provisions include specifying allocations from existing WATER resources, freedom of passage for nationals of both countries, efforts to alleviate the Palestinian REFUGEE problem, and cooperation in the development of the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY. The treaty contained little in the way of LAND transfers, but one is worth mentioning: Israeli land in the area on the northern Jordanian/Israeli border, known in Israel as Naharayim and in Jordan as Baqura, came under official Jordanian sovereignty. Israeli landowners, however, along with their employees and guests, are permitted freedom of movement in the area, with no customs or immigration restrictions of any kind. In an unusual move, the treaty declares that, although the land is under Jordanian sovereignty, the Israeli police department has jurisdiction over incidents "solely involving the [Israeli] landowners, their invitees or employees." Furthermore, Jordanian law does not apply to activities in which only Israelis are involved. Land purchases by non-Israelis, however, can only be made with Jordanian approval.

The Jordan-Israel peace treaty formalized private talks between the countries that had been occurring for many years. The 1991 GULF WAR and, most importantly, the Oslo Process finally made it acceptable for an Arab government to be in peace negotiations with Israel. Another contributing factor was the UNITED STATES, which wrote off over $700 million of Jordan's debt to Washington and supplied Jordan with modern military hardware—for example, F-16 aircraft—in exchange for Jordan's cooperation in making peace.

Bibliography

- Astorino-Courtois, Allison. "Transforming International Agreements into National Realities: Marketing Arab-Israeli Peace in Jordan." The Journal of Politics. 58:4 (1996).
- Gazit, Mordechai. "The Israel-Jordan Peace Negotiations (1949–51): King Abdallah's Lonely Effort." Journal of Contemporary History. 23:3 (1988).
- Government of the State of Israel and the Government of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. "Treaty of Peace between the State of Israel and the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan (October 26, 1994)." www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Peace/Isrjor.html.
- Lukacs, Yehuda. Israel, Jordan, and the Peace Process. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1999.
- Plotkin, Lori. Israel-Jordan Peace: Taking Stock, 1994–1997. Washington, DC: Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1997.
- Segev, Samuel. Crossing the Jordan: Israel's Hard Road to Peace. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- . The Politics of Partition: King Abdullah, the Zionists, and Palestine 1921–1951. (Abridged version of Collusion across the Jordan). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Israel Lands Administration

The Israel Lands Administration (ILA) was created in the 1960 Israel Lands Law to manage the land in Israel that is in the "public domain." These lands either are property of the state, belong to the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF), or belong to the ISRAEL DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY (DA). This land comprises some 4,820,000 acres (19,508 square kilometers), or 93 percent of all the land within the Green Line. The ILA is a government agency that closely collaborates with the JEWISH AGENCY (JA), an organization that promotes Jewish IMMIGRATION to Israel and develops residential areas on both public land and land owned by the JNF; the JA as a matter of policy does not lease land to non-Jews, and the JNF's charter prohibits it from selling or leasing land to non-Jews.

The ILA ensures that the ownership of Israeli lands ("lands" in this law means land, houses, buildings, and anything permanently fixed to land)—whether the lands of the state of Israel, the DA, or the JNF—will not be “transferred” by sale or lease or in any other manner to non-Jews, namely, non-Jewish PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL. As such, some 18–20 percent of the total population is excluded from purchasing, renting, subletting, or in any other way using 93 percent of the land in Israel.

The ILA has several specific functions, including guaranteeing that the national lands are used in accordance with Israeli laws; regulating, managing, registering, actively protecting, and supervising STATE LAND; making state land available for public (Jewish) use; planning, developing, and managing state land reserves; initiating and planning development programs (including relocation of existing occupants, i.e., Arabs); and authorizing contracts and agreements with other parties.

Four Israeli laws form the “legal” basis of its land policy:

- Basic Law establishing the Israel Lands Administration (1960)
- Israel Lands Law (1960)
- Israel Lands Administration (1960)
- Covenant between the State of Israel, the World Zionist Organization (WZO), and the Jewish National Fund (1962)

The Israel Lands Council sets policy for the ILA. It is chaired by Israel’s vice prime minister and the minister of industry, trade, labor, and communications. The council has twenty-two members; twelve represent government ministries and ten represent the JNF. The director general of the ILA is appointed by the government. The JNF appoints half, less one, of the members of the council, while the government appoints the other half, plus one. The director of the ILA is directly subordinate to the minister of agriculture.

Background

Despite tremendous efforts over more than fifty years, Jewish institutions were able to purchase only 6–8 percent of the land of Palestine by 1948. Thus soon after its DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE the state of Israel undertook an intensive process of “land nationalization.” This process was intended to systematically transfer Palestinian lands to the possession and use of the new Jewish community, with the purpose of redesigning the geographical space and maintaining a DEMOGRAPHIC balance between the group of some 150,000 Palestinian inhabitants who remained after 1948 and the group of some 660,000 Jews.

On 2 December 1948, the Israeli government declared the enactment of the Emergency Regulations on Property of Absentees, generally referred to as the Absentee Property Act. Accordingly, the government established the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY, a division within the Finance Ministry, to take charge of the recently created REFUGEES’ property. These regulations reclassified most abandoned Arab property as absentee and, in effect, prevented the return of any of their Palestinian owners.

In the nationalization process Israel gained control of over 7,482,000 dunums (approximately 1,850,000 acres) of Palestinian-owned property. As regards immovable property, in 1949, Israel reported—in a partial count—that 73,000 dwellings and 7,800 premises, such as warehouses, workshops, shops, and offices plus bank accounts and movable property (e.g., jewelry, furniture), were under the control of the Custodian of Absentee Property.

In March 1950 the Knesset officially approved the ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW, which also stipulated the creation of the Development Authority (Transfer of Property Law 5710-1950), and was put into effect on 9 August 1950. Generally speaking, the new law legalized the de facto situation that grew out of the wartime abuses that gave rise to the abandoned Palestinian property. While the task of the Custodian of Absentee Property was intended above all to administer and to preserve the absentee property for future Jewish use, the DA was authorized to take measures to distribute that property to Jews and to sell land to the government, to the JNF, and to other public agencies.

The Israel Lands Administration at Work

When on 19 July 1960 the ILA was formalized in a BASIC LAW, it officially provided that the ILA would manage the lands of Israel, which are divided among three bodies as follows: the state of Israel, which owns about 14.5 million dunums (approximately 3.6 million acres); the DA, which owns about 2.5 million dunum (approximately 618,000 acres); and the JNF, which owns about 2.6 million dunums (approximately 640,000 acres or 13 percent).

The Lands Administration Law also specified the exceptions to it, including the activities of the Development Authority. The law established, among other things, that all the lands and properties belonging to the Palestinian refugees were transferred to the state of Israel as the sole owner, regardless of their use or who was using them, and that apart from exceptional cases, they could not be sold, leased, or transferred to others (i.e., non-Jews).

After its official establishment the ILA, armed with an arsenal of documents “legalizing” the confiscation of refugee property and the lands of Israel’s Palestinian citizens, continued the expropriation process and the leasing of these properties, whether to the de facto Jewish occupiers or to new immigrants, including for the establishment of new Jewish settlements and neighborhoods.

Until the early 1960s, the JNF managed its own landholdings. However, in 1962 it signed a covenant with the state of Israel whereby it agreed to place JNF landholdings, without transferring title, under the administration of the ILA and its governing body, the Israel Lands Council. The ILA was allowed to lease its land to Jews only, in keeping with the JNF’s mission to purchase and develop land for Jewish settlement.

The specificity of this landownership, with 93 percent in the hands of the state or parastate Zionist organizations, has significant consequences: the vast majority of Jewish Israelis live on land that cannot change hands without the formal consent of the ILA. The “nationalization” of virtually all the land has to do, then, not with a socialist vision but with a Zionist one. The point is to affirm the right of the Jewish people as such to the land of Eretz Yisrael. Conversely, Palestinian citizens of Israel, some 18–20 percent of the population, are prohibited from buying, leasing, renting, or living on this land.

From 1948 to 1977, Israel confiscated the major part of Arab land in the Galilee and in the Arab-populated northern and southern “triangles” in the center of the country as well as in the Negev. One result has been the proletarianization of this population (especially in the Galilee), the majority of whom were originally farmers. While the Arab villages have preserved their rural appearance, most of their inhabitants travel to the cities to work.

In the Negev the ILA has seized hundreds of thousands of dunums—the exact number is not clear—and has repeatedly expelled the BEDOUIN. The Bedouin, who are Palestinian Arabs, are still suffering from measures taken in the early years of Israel’s statehood on the pretext of sorting out the ownership of about 700,000 dunums (approximately 175,000 acres). Not only has their land been confiscated but they are refused PERMITS to build homes, even provisional ones, and, if they proceed without permits, they are made to demolish their “illegal” dwellings and assessed heavy fines. Now half the 80,000 Negev Bedouin have been forcibly regrouped into seven reserves or townships.

The ILA has used a variety of coercive mechanisms to facilitate the transition of Negev Bedouin from rural to urban life, to discourage subsistence herding and encourage the indigenous Bedouin population to concentrate in the government-built townships. For instance, the state does not provide electricity, running WATER, telephone, access ROADS, sanitation services, schools, or HEALTH CARE clinics in the traditional Bedouin villages, many of which are “UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES.” The situation of the “unrecognized villages” is perhaps the worst of all Israeli-Arab communities. There are several such unrecognized villages in the Galilee, but most are in the Negev, where some forty-six unrecognized villages do not appear on any Israeli map and face the same total lack of services as do the Bedouin in traditional villages. The Bedouin have faced myriad problems in conjunction with the confiscation of agricultural and herding lands and the subsequent loss of means of self-subsistence. Life in the ILA “urban townships” is rife with the social breakdown resulting from near-total joblessness, crime, and drug use. In 2006 the JNF signed a forty-nine-year lease agreement with the state of Israel that gives it control over 30,000 hectares (74,132 acres) of Negev land for development of forests. More recently the JNF has undertaken a $600 million project entitled “Blueprint Negev,” which aims to attract and build infrastructure for 250,000 new Jewish settlers.

While, as noted, Palestinian citizens of Israel account for 18–20 percent of its population, they own a mere 3 percent of the land that has typically been passed down from parents and grandparents. Nevertheless, they face restrictions on its use. Much of the land that Palestinians own has purposefully been designated by the ILA for “agricultural purposes” only. Unable to purchase or lease land elsewhere, Palestinians have often built on these lands, only to have their “illegal” homes destroyed. Moreover, while the state of Israel confiscated most lands owned or held by its Palestinian citizens (as well as the refugee lands), and the ILA allotted many of these lands to the Jewish settlements, there was no such allotment of lands to the Arab towns and villages. Since the establishment of the state, not even one Arab town has been established (apart from the imposed townships/reserves created for the Arab Bedouins in the Negev), which contrasts sharply with Israel's destruction of more than 500 Palestinian villages in the lead-up to, and after, the 1948 WAR and despite the fact that its Palestinian population has increased almost tenfold (from 150,000 to some 1.3 million, and more if one includes the Palestinian residents of occupied East JERUSALEM). The government allocates vast areas for Jewish settlement only, often at the expense of Arab communities. The ASSOCIATION FOR CIVIL RIGHTS IN ISRAEL (ACRI), among others, contends that this practice violates Israel's democratic principles and restricts Arab citizens from living on the state's land. Moreover, land for new Jewish townships is regularly expropriated from the private and public holdings of neighboring Palestinian towns, resulting in disproportionately large amounts of land reserved for the use of Jewish townships and citizens.

As a result of the above, combined with the fact that the state has allocated very few resources to Palestinian towns, the Arab towns and villages in Israel suffer from severe problems of housing shortages, high density, dilapidated INFRASTRUCTURE, overcrowded schools and high dropout rates, lack of public areas, and lack of land reserves for construction and environmental and industrial development, resulting in high unemployment. The problem is even more critical in the unrecognized villages. In order to solve these problems, there is need for a significant allotment of lands owned by the state and/or the ILA to the Palestinian communities. If, however, the process of "privatization" continues and accelerates, there will be no land available for the state to apportion even if at some point the government chooses to pursue democratization.

Privatization—New Wine in Old Bottles

Since the late 1980s, the Israeli government has been steadily transferring key state assets, including land, and services into private hands. There has been an ongoing debate over "privatization" of land, although such privatization has been based on the premise of preventing land from passing into non-Jewish hands. But far-reaching changes have begun to take place in the structure of land possession, especially in the agricultural settlements. These changes began while the influx of Jewish immigration from the former Soviet Union was at its peak. The absorption of over one million SOVIET JEWS over the decade of the 1980s caused an increasing housing shortage and a lack of available lands for construction. At the same time, Jewish farmers in the KIBBUTZIM and MOSHAVIM were suffering from a serious economic situation. The changes in land possession and classification took place relatively rapidly, without primary legislation in the Knesset, but rather through the decisions of the Israel Lands Administration Council.

The main decisions in the privatization process were taken while ARIEL SHARON was both minister of infrastructure and chairman of the ILA Council. According to these decisions, holders of agricultural lands in the Kibbutzim and Moshavim were given the option to "change the purpose" of their land (i.e., from agricultural to housing developments or commercial undertakings) and to receive a significant cut of the land with the new purpose. The implication in terms of benefits exceeds many times more the compensation the Jewish farmers would have been entitled to according to the situation preceding these decisions.

In his first year as minister of national infrastructure (1997), Ariel Sharon commissioned a study for reform of the landholding system. Though the debate was fractious, everyone agreed on the need to prevent "foreigners" from buying land, whether it was private or not. Headed by Boaz Ronen, the commission defined a foreigner as anyone who is not a citizen of the state of Israel and who does not have the right to become one under the LAW OF RETURN. Under the proposal, Jewish citizens of another country could acquire land in Israel before they even move there and establish Israeli citizenship, but Palestinian refugees, whose land was expropriated and transferred to Jews, were excluded.

The Ronen Committee published its recommendations in 1997 with suggestions relating to the privatization of the state's lands and improving the functions of the ILA. The committee only dealt with lands held by Jewish farmers and deferred in most cases to previous decisions of the ILA Council. The Jewish agriculture lobby, which has a great influence on political life in Israel, with the unprecedented support of representatives of Zionist parties from both the left and right wings (LABOR, MERETZ, SHAS, MAFDAL, and LIKUD), rose against the recommendations of the Ronen Committee, not because they did not do well by the Jewish farmers, but because the use of the term “citizens” implied the right of Israeli-Arabs to participate. The recommendations were tabled in the summer of 1997.

Following the disappointment with the Ronen Committee’s recommendations, an intensive legislative process began, initiated by the agriculture lobby and interested real estate entrepreneurs. Through this process emerged the Farmers Land and Rights Bill for anchoring farmer rights to the land. This bill was intended to transfer the effective possession of the lands from the state to the hands of the Jewish farmers in the Kibbutzim and Moshavim. Clause 2 of the bill provided that holders of agricultural land would have a perpetual lease right for 196 years divided into periods of 49 years each. In addition, the bill set a generous compensation mechanism for farmers whose land undergoes a process of “change of purpose” and release for construction. This bill passed the first phase of legislation in the Knesset in 1998.

In opposition to the legislation, several petitions were submitted to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT or High Court of Justice by the Oriental Democratic Spectrum (ODS), ACRI, and the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel. They demanded the cancellation of the ILA’s decisions with regard to the “change of purpose” of agricultural land, compensation, and other benefits given to agricultural landholders at the time of the change of purpose. These petitions requested that the status quo, which existed prior to the decisions of the ILA in relation to land privatization and the change of their purpose, be maintained. The petitions of ACRI and the ODS emphasized the importance of the “civil equality” principle in dividing state lands and actually referred to the Arab minority in the state as another deprived group, similar to the Jewish residents of development towns, which can also benefit from the implementation of the equality principle when dividing state lands. The petitions were either denied a hearing or ruled against, although the government tabled the bill in 1999.

The process of land privatization and the bestowing of ownership rights to the land only to residents of the Kibbutzim, Moshavim, or companies of agricultural cultivation, are clearly harmful to Palestinian rights. These lands, consisting of many millions of acres, will be removed from the land reserves of the state and transferred to private hands in a way that will not enable their future allotment to Arab towns and villages.

Nevertheless, the JNF and several government ministries have found privatization to be a useful tool in engaging in controversial activities. For the purpose of purchasing land in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES (OT), the JNF uses Himnuta, a private company in which the JNF owns 99 percent of the shares. Since 1967, tens of thousands of acres of land have been purchased by the JNF in areas of strategic importance in the WEST BANK. Himnuta buys properties inside the OT, often using money from the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION and government ministries. The majority of its purchases lie just outside the Green Line, areas key to negotiations with the Palestinians. Even if these lands are eventually returned to Palestinian control, Himnuta stands to gain, as evidenced by the generous compensation packages given to the settlers in Gaza after Israel’s 2005 withdrawal. It is not only the JNF that uses Himnuta’s services. Government ministries have done so frequently. In 1990, for example, the Housing Ministry transferred NIS 3.6 million ($1 million) to Himnuta to buy the St. John’s Hospice building in the Muslim Quarter of Jerusalem’s OLD CITY. The transaction was made through the Jerusalem settler organization ATERET COHANIM.

The Qa’adam Case: A Legal Challenge to the ILA

On 2 April 2000, after five years of judicial dithering, nondecisions, petitions, and counter-petitions, the Israeli Supreme Court reached a decision in Qa’adam v. the Israel Lands Administration. The court ruled in a landmark decision (though in a ruling that was limited to the facts of that case) that Palestinian citizens of Israel could no longer be discriminated against in the provision of state lands.

The case involved a married couple of Israeli citizens, Adel and Eeman Qa’adam, inhabitants of the run-down, overcrowded Arab town of Baka’h-el-Garbiya, who wanted to buy a house in the new middle-class suburb of Katzir, which lies just north of Tel Aviv—itself an act of demographic engineering, an attempt to change the Arab-Jewish balance in the area. But because the Qa’adams were Arab Israelis, the Katzir Building Association and Katzir Municipal Council informed them, quite openly and with no vague excuses, that Katzir was to be a Jewish-only town.

In itself, there was nothing new in the rejection—such policies had been implemented in Israel since its creation—but the Qa’adams appear to be the first Palestinians to sue the state. Israeli Arabs like the Qa’adams pay taxes, vote in Israeli elections, and speak Hebrew.

ACRI, acting on behalf of the couple, asked the Supreme Court to rule on the discriminatory practice. The state defended the Jewish-only policy. In effect, the Supreme Court was asked to choose between ZIONISM and democracy. Supreme Court president Aaron Barak, normally assertive and even aggressive in his judicial rulings, was reluctant to rule on this case, and pleaded with the sides to reach a compromise out of court.

On paper the Qa’adams won with the Supreme Court’s 2000 decision. In practice, however, they, and many other Arabs, are still waiting for Israel to uphold their basic human rights. The court’s verdict had little effect on the discriminatory policies of the ILA or the Katzir Municipal Council. Eight years later the Qa’adams still lived in Baka’h-el-Garbiya, prohibited from building a house in Katzir. Similar examples of Israeli Arabs who have attempted to lease or rent apartments or homes have been stymied by community selection committees. The selection committees have the right to refuse admission by applicants to any area. Typically the rejections are couched in the language of preserving homogeneity utilizing a “legal” stipulation allowing these bodies to prevent those “ill-suited to the community” from moving in.

A New Proposal: The Land Swap

In May 2004, EHUD OLMERT, then minister of industry, trade, and labor, established the Gadish Committee to investigate reform in the ILA. The committee’s principal recommendations “included the transfer of urban residential land ownership rights to private owners of apartments and buildings, and the streamlining of the process surrounding land-ownership rights.” In this context, on 15 June 2005 the JNF and the ILA agreed to a massive land swap involving an exchange of 70,000 state-held, urban, developed dunums (17,000 acres), which contain some 750,000 apartments and properties, for undeveloped periphery lands. The swap was intended to allow the government to privatize urban properties in the country’s central region while enabling the JNF to develop more of the land in the Galilee and the Negev. By exchanging already built-up municipal properties, ostensibly worth more because of their urban location, for “undeveloped” lands in the Galilee and the Negev, the JNF is hoping to increase the Jewish population there through the building of new settlements.

In January 2005, Israel’s attorney general, Menahem Mazuz, ruled in response to a Supreme Court petition that lease restrictions violated Israeli antidiscrimination laws. Nevertheless, in early June 2005, the government accepted the Gadish Committee’s recommendations without signing a formal agreement.

In June 2005, ADALAH sent a letter to Israel’s Prime Minister Sharon and Attorney General Mazuz, calling on them to reject the Gadish Committee’s recommendations on land exchange. Adalah argued that such a transfer would violate the rights of Palestinian citizens of Israel and exacerbate the discrimination they face in accessing lands. Adalah further contended that the discriminatory division of land between Jewish and Arab local authorities, which creates severe housing and residential shortages, also prevents Arab communities from developing and thereby contributes to the poor socioeconomic status of Arab towns and villages.

ACRI also condemned the land-swap process because “it does not truly provide non-Jews with equal access to land. The ILA, as a public body, must function for the benefit of all its citizens.” The case languished in the courts until July 2005, when the ILA cancelled the land-swap process.

Shortly thereafter, the JNF issued a tender for residential land plots in the Givat Hamakosh neighborhood of Carmiel (in the Galilee). This was in accordance with the terms of the JNF’s agreement with the state and its functionary the ILA, and it effectively excluded non-Jews from bidding. In response, ACRI and the Arab Center for Alternative Planning submitted a petition to the Haifa Administrative Court against the ILA, the JNF, the Carmiel Municipality, and Arim, the Enterprise for Urban Development, claiming that the tender was discriminatory. In the petition, ACRI argued that the tender was illegal because a public body (the ILA) manages JNF land and the restrictive terms of the tender were therefore tantamount to state discrimination.

On 7 September 2005, the court declared that the ILA must allow Palestinian citizens to participate in the tender or suspend or cancel it. The JNF elected to cancel the tender. In response, ACRI submitted a petition to the Israeli High Court demanding that the state force the JNF to cease its discriminatory policy altogether. ACRI requested an interim order freezing all JNF tenders in the country. The JNF opposed the petition, stating that its most basic and historic policy was to develop lands for the Jewish people. Both the JNF and ILA chose to suspend all new tenders in the Galilee until the High Court ruled. The case sparked intense national and international debate about the JNF's role in Israel.

In January 2006, in response to the petitions submitted by ACRI and other organizations, Attorney General Mazuz declared in a nonbinding decision that the ILA is forbidden to discriminate against citizens on the basis of national affiliation in the administration and marketing of land. However, he added that the ILA could continue its previous land-swap policy with the JNF. In April 2007, the JNF published new tenders in Givat Hamakosh for Jews only. Again, ACRI appealed to the State Attorney's Office, and the JNF cancelled the tender rather than allow non-Jews to participate in the bidding. In May 2007, the State Attorney's Office wrote that the ILA cannot discriminate based on "national belonging" in administering JNF lands.

The Knesset Intervenes

In opposition to the court's ruling, on 18 July 2007 the Knesset passed legislation that would legalize the JNF practice of refusing to lease land to Arab citizens and allow it to lease lands to Jews only. The bill called for a new provision to the 1960 Israel Lands Administration Law. "Despite whatever is stated in any law, leasing of Jewish National Fund's lands for the purpose of the settlement of Jews on these lands will not be seen as improper discrimination." Further, "For the purpose of every law, the association documents of the Jewish National Fund will be interpreted according to the judgment of the Jewish National Fund's founders and from a nationalist-Zionist standpoint."

The bill, entitled the "Jewish National Fund Law," passed its preliminary reading in the Knesset plenum by a large majority—sixty-five in favor to sixteen against. While JNF lands constitute only 13 percent, it could involve, for example, the establishment of a university only for Jews, or a hospital, or a cultural center. The law has the support of BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, AMI AYALON, Michael Eitan, Reuven Rivlin, and Shalom Simhon, but must go through several readings before becoming law.

The legislation triggered campaigns for and against it, both in Israel and abroad. In the rendering of some Israeli analysts it does not matter. Said one member of the Knesset, "The Qa'adam ruling was exceptional in setting red lines, allowing a broad range for change, establishing norms and preventing the debasement of the rule book, [but] it turns out that the Supreme Court is not omnipotent. In an instant, a racist Knesset can overturn its rulings."

In the fall of 2007 the High Court heard a petition from Adalah seeking cancellation of a provision in the original Lands Law whereby ILA policy (supporting the JNF's policy) as well as Article 27 of the "Regulations of the Obligations of Tenders," in which the ILA would compensate the JNF with an equivalent amount of land in any transaction, thus ensuring the total amount of land owned by Jewish Israelis remains the same. Given that the JNF law would effectively remove the privatization and sale of vast land tracts from the purview of the Supreme Court, the impact of this legislation on future land rights battles and ethnic relations, while not immediate, could have a seriously negative impact on Israeli Arabs.

Jaffa and the ILA: A Case Study

JAFFA is one place to begin to understand how the ILA works and the nature of the discriminatory land laws. In 2009 the Bemuna Company completed construction of "housing for the religious public" in places attractive to Jewish families, including from the hills of the Galilee in northern Israel to Jerusalem ridgetops overlooking the Old City. Bemuna also built sixty apartments in the middle of a somewhat run-down neighborhood (Ajami) of mostly Palestinian residents in Jaffa, a seemingly anomalous site compared to its other more appealing places. There are no plans to market the apartments to the Palestinians. "We are a homogenous group. We do not want to live together with Arabs in the same building," lawyer David Zeira said during an Israeli Knesset hearing on the project. Rather, he said, Bemuna hopes to bolster the Jewish presence and "improve the population" in Ajami, the center of Jaffa's Arab community. In Jaffa, as elsewhere, the ILA and JNF's marketing policy highlights the state's systemic discrimination against Israel's Arab citizens, specifically in housing and land distribution.

The ILA and West Bank Settlements

Since 1967, each Israeli government has invested significant resources in establishing and expanding the SETTLEMENTS in the Occupied Territories. Israel has used a complex legal and bureaucratic mechanism to take control of more than 50 percent of the land in the West Bank, a process in which the ILA has played a major role. Land seized was used mainly to establish settlements and to create reserves of land for the future expansion of the settlements.

All Israeli administrations have implemented a consistent and systematic policy intended to encourage Jewish citizens to migrate to the West Bank. One of the tools used to this end is to grant financial benefits and incentives to citizens—both directly and through the Jewish local authorities. The purpose of this support is to raise the standard of living of these citizens and to encourage migration to the West Bank. Most of the settlements in the West Bank are defined as national priority areas. Accordingly, the settlers and other Israeli citizens working or investing in the settlements are entitled to significant financial benefits. These benefits are provided by six government ministries.

The ILA provides discounts of from 49 percent to 69 percent from the value of the land in the payment of lease fees for residential construction, and a discount of 69 percent on leasehold fees for industrial and tourism purposes. The ILA also issues tenders for housing in the West Bank and Jerusalem. The other five ministries provide additional financial incentives and benefits to the settlements.

Jerusalem

Since the mid-1990s, the ILA has been deeply involved with settler groups in acquiring Palestinian property and transferring it to Jews in Jerusalem. One case will illustrate. The ILA is working together with Ateret Cohanim, a religious, ultranationalist organization, whose main objective is “Judaizing” Jerusalem. Ateret Cohanim promotes settlement of Jews in and around the Old City and takes over Palestinian assets in the HOLY BASIN.

The project on which they collaborated involves the effort to wrest from Palestinian landowners’ control 30 dunums (7.5 acres) of land in East Jerusalem and to transfer it to the ILA without a tender. According to Israeli and Jordanian documents, in the early 1960s the land was purchased by the Arab Hotels Company of East Jerusalem. After the area was annexed to Israel following the 1967 WAR, the Finance Ministry stated its intention to expropriate the land “for public purposes,” but this was never carried out, and the Palestinian owners continued to cultivate it. Several times over the years an Israeli court confirmed that the Arab company is indeed the owner of the property.

In 2000 the Palestinian owners submitted to the planning authorities a request to build a hotel, a conference center, and a cultural center on the land. Architect Moshe Margalit, who drew up the plan, related that at the time the district planning commission confirmed that the Arab Hotels Company has ownership rights to the land. The Interior Ministry confirmed to Ha’aretz that the company has been allowed to continue the planning, as it has been proved that it “has an interest in the land.” From the summaries of meetings concerning the property at the Interior Ministry, it emerged that representatives of the ILA were present.

Margalit related that the Palestinian landowners’ plan was presented “to the most senior people at the Jerusalem Municipality” and received their blessing. The petition also states that the mayor of Jerusalem at the time, Ehud Olmert, and his deputy, Yehuda Pollack, the chairman of the Local Planning and Building Committee, supported it. However, at some point, said Margalit, it seemed that Ateret Cohanim also submitted a plan for this parcel of land. Some two years before (circa 1998), the ILA had granted permission to IRVING MOSKOWITZ, an American Jewish millionaire who supports Ateret Cohanim, to plan a Jewish neighborhood on the plot. A person close to Ateret Cohanim stated that the group aims to build 250 housing units there and pressured ministers in former prime minister Ariel Sharon’s first government to approve it.

In June 2000, immediately after the plan by Moskowitz and Ateret Cohanim was revealed, the Arab landowners’ attorneys applied to Jerusalem’s Local Planning and Building Committee with a request to dismiss the Moskowitz and Ateret Cohanim scheme. The committee told the attorneys that the plan had been “shelved.”

In March 2007, however, at the request of the ILA, the state formally expropriated the land under the rubric of “acquisition for public needs.” The Arab Hotels Company immediately petitioned the High Court, asking for the expropriation to be prohibited. The ILA's response says that the state owns about 20 percent of the land under the Absentee Property Law; however, the Palestinian landowners' lawyers insist that the law does not apply to the property because it was purchased before Israeli rule began in East Jerusalem in 1967. Attorney Danny Kramer, the representative of the official guardian of absentee property, supports the ILA position and is a signatory to the petition, which states that Arab Hotels has no connection to the land and that the ILA has been leasing it to Ateret Cohanim "for some years now." As of this writing the matter remains in the courts.

Israel's successful colonization of Palestine owed much to the brutality of the expulsions in 1948, followed by the creation of a complex web of legislation "legalizing" the seizure of Palestinian land and its transfer to Jews in which the Israel Lands Administration stands at the epicenter.

See also BEDOUIN IN ISRAEL; HEBRON DISTRICT, SOUTHERN AREA; HOLY BASIN; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION DEMOCRACY; ISRAELI NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS; LAND; SETTLEMENT; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Abdelrazek, Adnan. "The Fate of Palestinian Property in Israel Highlights the Need to Revive the UNCCP." Palestine-Israel Journal of Politics, Economics and Culture. 15:4 and 16:1 (2008–2009).
- Adalah. Adalah to Israeli Government: Proposed Exchange of Land between the State and JNF Will Exacerbate Discrimination against Arab Citizens of Israel and Violate Their Basic Rights. Haifa, Israel: Adalah, The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel, 2005.
- . The Jewish National Fund: Challenging the Discriminatory Land Policies of the Jewish National Fund (JNF). Haifa, Israel: Adalah, The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel, 2007.
- Algazy, Joseph. "Palestine 1947–1997: From Partition Plan to 'Allon Plus.'" Le Monde diplomatique (English). September 1997.
- Alternative Information Center. "From the Ground to the Court." The Other Israel: Newsletter of the Israel Council for Israeli-Palestinian Peace. 83–84 (April–May 1998).
- Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem. Deir Razih's Land under Constant Threat by Omi'el Settlers. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem: 1 April 2008.
- Arab Association for Human Rights. "18 Houses Demolished in Kafr Qasim." Nazareth, Israel: Arab Association for Human Rights, 5 March 2003.
- Association for Civil Rights in Israel. Tenders for Jews Only Violate Rights of Arab Citizens: High Court to Deliberate on JNF's Discriminatory Land Policy. Tel Aviv: The Association for Civil Rights in Israel, 2007.
- Association for Distributive Justice. "Absence of Land Policy Coverage: A Media Failure." Landwatch. 24 (February 2008). <http://www.adj.org.il/english/en/landwatch>.
- Audeh, Ida. "A Constant Nakba for Palestine's Bedouin." Electronic Intifada. 11 July 2008. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.
- Barkat, Amiram. "JNF-Owned Company [Himnuta] Bought Land in the Territories." Ha'aretz. 20 February 2005.
- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Badil: Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva: Center on Housing Rights and Evictions, and Badil: Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights, 2005.
- Cheslow, Daniella. "Is Israel on the Brink of a Suburban Sprawl-a-Thon?" Green Prophet. 8 May 2009. <http://www.greenprophet.com/2009/05/08/8825/israeli-suburban-sprawl/>.
- Cook, Jonathan. "Israel's Latest Land Grab Is Part of an Old Strategy." The Daily Star (Beirut, Lebanon). 4 February 2005.
- Curiel, Ilana. "Israel Land Administration Demands Evacuation of 7 Negev Farms." Ynetnews.com. 24 May 2009. <http://www.ynetnews.com>.
- Dakwar, Jamil. The Palestinians in Israel: Between the Hammer of Land Privatization and the Anvil of Land Nationalization. Haifa: Adalah, The Legal Center for the Arab Minority Rights in Israel, 2005.
- Forman, Jeremy. "Law and the Historical Geography of the Galilee: Israel's Litigatory Advantages during the Special Operation of Land Settlement." Journal of Historical Geography. 32 (2006).
- . "Military Rule, Political Manipulation, and Jewish Settlement: Israeli Mechanisms for Controlling Nazareth in the 1950s." Journal of Israeli History. 25:2 (September 2006).
- . "Re-approaching the Borders of Nazareth (1948–1956): Israel's Control of an All-Arab City." In Re-approaching the Border: Toward a New Historiography of Palestine/Israel. Edited by Mark Levine and Sandy Sufian. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2007.
- . "Settlement of Title in Northern Israel in Light of Sir Ernest Dowson's Colonial Guiding Principles." Israel Studies. 7:3 (Fall 2002).
- Dakwar, Jamil, with Alexandre Kedar. "Colonialism, Colonization and Land Law in Mandate Palestine: The Zor al-Zarqa/Barrat Qisarya Land Disputes in Historical Perspective." Theoretical Inquiries in Law. 4:2 (July 2003).
- . "From Arab Lands to 'Israel Lands': The Legal Dispossession of the Palestinians Displaced by Israel in the Wake of 1948." Environment and Planning D: Society and Space. 22:6 (December 2004).

- Grinberg, Mijal. "ILA Destroys Bedouin Homes to Make Way for Jewish Town." Ha'aretz. 26 June 2007.
- Gur, Haviv Rettig, and Ron Friedman. "JNF Rejects Land Swap with ILA." The Jerusalem Post. 17 June 2009.
- Harel, Israel. "Netanyahu vs. Herzl (and Jabotinsky)." Ha'aretz. 26 June 2009.
- Ha'aretz*. "Land Grab in East Jerusalem." Ha'aretz. 21 August 2007.
- . Editorial. "A Racist Jewish State." Ha'aretz. 20 July 2007. <http://www.haaretz.com/hasen/pages/884358.html>.
- ISA Consulting. A Controversial Israeli Land Bill Is Imperiling Racial Relations. ISA Consulting, Or Akiva, Israel. 1 August 2007. http://www.isaintel.com/site/index.php?option=com\_content&task=view&id=60.
- Isaac, Jad, and Fida Abdel Latif. Jerusalem: The Strangulation of the Arab Palestinian City. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute, 9 July 2005.
- Israel Business Today*. "Israel Land Administration Trying to Attract American Investment." Israel Business Today. 1 January 2007.
- Israeli Government. "Israel Land Administration." http://www.mmi.gov.il/Envelope/indexeng.asp?page=/static/eng/f\_general.html.
- Izenberg, Dan. "Petitioners: Gov't Seized Arab Land and Gave to Jews." Jerusalem Post. 21 August 2007.
- Jewish National Fund. Blueprint Negev. New York: Jewish National Fund, 2008.
- Jewish Virtual Library. Israel Lands: Privatization or National Ownership? Jewish Virtual Library. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsources/Society.../land.html.
- Kelley, Ron. "Israel's Bedouin: The End of Poetry." The Link (Americans for Middle East Understanding). 31:4 (September–October 1998).
- Land Laws. Passed by the Knesset on the 1st Av, 5720 (25 July 1960) and published in Sefer-Ha-Chukkim No. 312 of the 5th Av, 5720 (29 July 1960). (The Bill and an Explanatory Note were published in Hatza'ot Chok No. 413 of 5720).
- Land Research Center. In Al Sheikh Jarrah Neighborhood in Occupied East Jerusalem Israel Engages in Effective Ethnic Racist Steps to Forcibly Alter the Residency of a Palestinian Neighborhood. Jerusalem: Land Research Center, Applied Research Institute Jerusalem, and POICA Monitoring Israeli Colonization Activities in the Occupied Territories. 12 July 2008. http://www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=1472.
- Leibowitz, Ruthie Blum. "One on One: Seeing the Forest for the Trees." Jerusalem Post. 8 May 2008.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Land Grab: Israel's Settlement Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Manski, Rebecca. "Self-Distracted from the Environmental Crisis: Bedouin Vilified among Top 10 Environmental Hazards in Israel." News from Within. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 2006.
- Mouammar, Leila Khaled. "Privatizing Apartheid in Israel." No Simple Matter: Experiments with Politics and Poetry. 11 December 2005. <http://nosimplematter.blogspot.com/2005/12/privatizing-apartheid-in-israel.html>.
- Ne'eman, Yaakov. "Factors Impeding the Implementation of Privatization." Jerusalem Letter/Viewpoints. 442 (15 November 2000).
- Pr'neuf, Flore de. "Israel's Apartheid." Salon.com. 3 November 2000. http://archive.salon.com/news/feature/2000/11/03/israeli\_arabs/index.html.
- Rapoport, Meron. "ILA Leasing Arab-owned Land in Jerusalem to Ateret Cohanim." Ha'aretz. 20 August 2007.
- . "Land Grab in East Jerusalem." Ha'aretz. 20 August 2007.
- . "The Selling of Lot 62." Ha'aretz. 5 April 2005.
- Rinat, Zafir. "The Privatization of the Landscape." Ha'aretz. 4 May 2009.
- Roffe-Ofir, Sharon. "Palestinian Citizens of Israel Mark Land Day by Calling for BDS." Ynetnews. 30 March 2009. <http://www.ynetnews.com>.
- Schneider, Howard. "Jaffa: Coastal City Offers Glimpse into Deep-Seated Divide." Washington Post. 26 May 2009.
- Silver, Eric. "Israel Accused of 'Racist Ideology' with Plan to Prevent Arabs Buying Homes." The Independent (UK). 9 July 2002.
- White, Ben. "Bureaucratic Dispossession." The Electronic Intifada. 29 August 2007.
- Yiftachel, Oren. Ethnocracy: Land and Identity Politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.
- . "Writing from within the Conflict." HAGAR: International Social Science Review. Special Issue: "Critical Reflections on Israel/Palestine." 4:1–2 (Fall 2003).
- Yiftachel, Oren, Adriana Kemp, David Newman, and Uri Ram, eds. Israelis in Conflict: Hegemonies, Identities and Challenges. Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 2004.
- Yiftachel, Oren, Jo Little, David Hedgcock, and Ian Alexander Springer, eds. The Power of Planning: Spaces of Control and Transformation. New York: Springer Publications, 2002.
- Yonah, Y., and I. Saporta. "The Politics of Lands and Housing in Israel: A Wayward Republican Discourse." Social Identities. 8:1 (March 2002).

Israel's Search for Water, 1950–1965

See UNITED NATIONS TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION

Israel's Unilateral Disengagement from Gaza

During August and September 2005, Israel carried out a unilateral withdrawal from the GAZA STRIP (and from four small isolated OUTPOSTS in the northern WEST BANK). Some 8,000 Jewish settlers who had lived in twenty-one SETTLEMENTS under constant guard by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES left Gaza during that period, and numerous military bases and encampments were moved.

Of the 1.5 million Palestinian inhabitants of the Gaza Strip, most are REFUGEES (or descendants of refugees) from the 1948 WAR. When some 750,000 Palestinians fled or were driven out of JAFFA, HAIFA, JERUSALEM, and elsewhere, a large portion of the dispossessed settled in refugee camps in Gaza. The former homes of the refugees, especially those from the urban areas, were given to immigrant Jews. After 1967, Jewish settlers illegally moved into newly constructed modern homes in settlements in the Gaza Strip, where the refugees continue to reside in shanties in dilapidated camps. When Israel decided to withdraw, the settlers were handsomely compensated: forty-one families from what Israel considered “legal” settlements received advances of around NIS 600,000 ($160,000) as well as $500 or so as a monthly housing allowance for up to two years. Yet the Gazan refugees were not permitted to move into the houses in the former settlements in Gaza; some settlers destroyed their own homes to prevent Palestinians from having them, and whatever was left was reduced to rubble by the Israeli army.

Israel's decision to leave Gaza without a negotiated agreement with the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) was portrayed as a major step toward peace; however, while Israel had several reasons for withdrawing from Gaza, none of them involved peace with the Palestinians. Gaza does not hold any significant Jewish historical places, nor does it have valuable resources as does the West Bank. Israel wanted to extricate itself from the morass and expense of protecting the Gazan settlers from Palestinians (it has been reported that one settlement alone, Netzarim, required the protection of an entire battalion of Israeli troops), and it wanted to avoid the DEMOGRAPHIC effects of retaining Gaza, with its overwhelming ratio of Palestinians to Israelis. In terms of human and capital resource commitment, Gaza had become a liability.

The most important reason, however, for the withdrawal was Israel's desire to consolidate its control over the West Bank and East Jerusalem. This was explained by Dov Weisglass, one of the initiators of the disengagement plan and senior advisor to Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON: “The significance of the disengagement plan is the freezing of the peace process and when you freeze that process, you prevent the establishment of a Palestinian state, and you prevent a discussion on the refugees, the BORDERS, and Jerusalem. Effectively, this whole package called the Palestinian state, with all that it entails, has been removed indefinitely from our agenda. And all this with . . . a [US] presidential blessing and the ratification of both houses of Congress. . . . what I effectively agreed to with the Americans was that [the majority of the West Bank] settlements would not be dealt with at all, and the rest will not be dealt with until the Palestinians turn into Finns. That is the significance of what we did.”

Sharon and Weisglass received US president GEORGE W. BUSH's blessing for the disengagement plan during a visit to Washington on 13–14 April 2004, even though the unilateral redeployment contradicted the QUARTET'S ROAD MAP of April 2003, which proposed a final and comprehensive resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in three phases by 2005, and to which the UNITED STATES was supposedly committed. In December 2004 Sharon stated: “The understandings between the US president and me protect Israel's most essential interests, first and foremost, not demanding a return to the . . . borders [before the 1967 WAR]; allowing Israel to permanently keep large settlement blocs which have high Israeli populations; and the total refusal of allowing Palestinian refugees to return to Israel.” As the withdrawal from Gaza began, Israel's minister of defense, Shaul Mofaz, announced that Israel intended to hold on to the core of the settlements in the West Bank—about half the territory.

Withdrawal from Gaza allows Israel to concentrate on fulfilling the ALLON PLAN of 1967, the original scheme for disposing of the West Bank by annexing most of the LAND and WATER, securing Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem, and handing back what remains to JORDAN or Palestinian self-rule in small, isolated, disarticulated areas. This scheme, developed during the tenure of Sharon, was officially announced by his successor, EHUD OLMERT, as the “Convergence Plan” and was carried forward by Olmert's successor, BENJAMIN NETANYAHU. Concerning the connection for Israel between withdrawing from Gaza and tightening its control in the West Bank, Israeli analyst Peretz Kidron wrote, “as for ‘abandoning’ Gaza . . . Sharon is drawing in his exposed Gaza flanks the better to reinforce Israel's hold on the main prize—the West Bank, the historical Jewish heartland of biblical times and an area of far greater strategic and economic value than the Gaza Strip. When Sharon speaks of a TWO-STATE SOLUTION, he intends to grant the Palestinians nothing more than the bare minimum of territory, on which they can achieve no viable sovereignty—particularly when their state will be a subdivided BANTUSTAN entirely surrounded by Israeli territory and under almost total Israeli economic and military domination.”

The unilateral nature of the withdrawal, excluding any PNA involvement or negotiations, was a slap in the face to the Palestinians as well as a strong signal that the bilateral peace process was at an end. President MAHMUD ABBAS said that the PNA was kept “in the dark” about Israel's plans. As such it was unable to prepare or coordinate a PNA role in the postwithdrawal era of Gaza.

Under the disengagement, Israel continues to control Gaza's borders (with the partial exception of the RAFAH CROSSING), the entire coastline and seawaters, and its airspace, as well as its telecommunications, water, electricity, and sewage networks. Gaza continues to use Israeli currency, and Tel Aviv maintains complete authority over the Population Registry, by which it continues to determine who is a “Palestinian resident” and who is a “foreigner,” which among other things impedes FAMILY REUNIFICATION. Additionally, through its control of the border crossings, Israel continues to regulate the movement of people and goods between the Gaza Strip and the outside world, including the West Bank, even when transit is not across Israeli territory. An Israeli military order classifies the entire West Bank as a “CLOSED MILITARY ZONE,” and a PERMIT issued by the military is required for entry and exit. Because a high fence with Israeli control towers encircles the Gaza Strip, it remains sealed off from the rest of the world, and Israeli forces remain stationed along the length of the borders. According to the terms of the unilateral plan devised by Sharon, Israel retains the right to conduct military operations inside Gaza to search for “terrorists.” In September 2007, Israel declared Gaza an “enemy entity.”

The three crossing points designated primarily for the movement of goods—Karni, Sufa, and Kerem Shalom—remained under Israel's sole control. In 2006, Israel closed the KARNI CROSSING, the major point of transit for goods, to all movement for a total of 175 days and partially for a further 169 days, resulting in severe shortages in Gaza, including essential medicines and foodstuffs, which have been aggravated by restrictions on the entry of humanitarian supplies and workers. From mid-June 2007 through all of 2008, Israel imposed a total blockade on Gaza, sealing all its crossing points and prohibiting any movement of goods and persons into or out of Gaza.

The Rafah Crossing between Gaza and EGYPT is primarily the means of access for people, but it has a terminal for the passage of goods. However, according to the 15 November 2005 “Agreed Documents by Israel and Palestinians on Movement” and its annex, “Access from and to Gaza and Agreement on Movement and Access and Agreed Principles for Rafah Crossing,” signed by Israel and the PNA, the Rafah Crossing is limited to “exports.” Further, if a truck leaves Gaza for Egypt via Rafah, it is prohibited from returning to Gaza. The PNA's independent ability to export goods via the Rafah Crossing is further limited by the fact that most of Gaza's exports are intended for Israel or are shipped abroad via Israeli ports. It is necessary to note here that in the OSLO ACCORDS, Gaza was to have a seaport. The Gaza seaport was mentioned in the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (1993) and detailed in the INTERIM AGREEMENT (1995); however, it was never built. Israel's “security concerns” were a major factor in this failure, but had it been constructed, Gaza might have had an independent outlet to the world that, in turn, could have mitigated some of its problems, although Israel could have closed a port or damaged it beyond use as it did the Gaza airport.

According to the November 2005 agreement between Israel and the PNA, the PNA may permit entry into the Strip via Rafah only to “Palestinian residents,” namely individuals who are registered in the Palestinian Population Registry and hold Palestinian identity cards. Also, the PNA must prevent the entry of Palestinian residents if Israel opposes them for security reasons. To ensure the PNA's compliance with the agreement, European observers are posted at the Rafah Crossing. “Foreign” residents, except those in a few categories, are only allowed to enter the Gaza Strip via the Kerem Shalom and Eretz crossings, which are under Israel's unilateral authority.

Tel Aviv also continues to control most elements of the taxation system of the Gaza Strip: according to the Interim Agreement, Israel is responsible for setting the VAT and customs rates on goods intended for consumption in the Gaza Strip (and the West Bank), collecting these taxes for the PNA and remitting them to the PNA. In June 2007 it ceased all remittances to Gaza—a collective punishment that contributed significantly to Gaza's humanitarian crisis. Israel's hegemony over all these elements clearly constitutes OCCUPATION as defined by INTERNATIONAL LAW.

One test of occupation in international law is the concept of "effective control," which exists if the military forces of the adversary could "at any time they desired assume physical control of any part of the country." By stating that "Israel will guard and monitor the external land perimeter of the Gaza Strip, will continue to maintain exclusive authority in Gaza air space, and will continue to exercise security activity in the sea off the coast of the Gaza Strip," Israel demonstrated its intention to maintain effective control. Furthermore, Israel's provision for a military presence along the border for an indeterminate length of time ensured that military control of the entire Gaza Strip would be maintained.

Principle Six of Israel's unilateral disengagement plan states that "completion of the plan will serve to dispel the claims regarding Israel's responsibility for the Palestinians within the Gaza Strip." This principle has created a great deal of opposition within the human rights and international law communities. B'TSELEM, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, for example, argues that according to the parameters of the disengagement, "Israel's claim of an 'end of the Occupation' is questionable. . . . So long as these methods of control [security, utilities, airspace, seacoast, etc.] remain in Israeli hands," B'Tselem concludes, Israel has responsibility for the Gazan population's welfare.

Human Rights Watch (HRW), a US-based organization, argues more emphatically that Israel is responsible for the population of Gaza. "Whether the Israeli army is inside Gaza or redeployed around its periphery and restricting entrance and exit, it remains in control." While Israel works to reconfigure its Occupation of the territory, it will remain an occupying power with obligations for the welfare of the civilian population, the HRW maintains. According to John Dugard, then UN special rapporteur on human rights in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, "the withdrawal of Jewish settlers from Gaza will result in the decolonization of Palestinian territory but will not result in the end of Occupation."

Israel, then, is legally responsible for the welfare of the people of Gaza; however, it has not fulfilled any of its duties to the Gazan population—not even humanitarian ones; moreover, it has relentlessly and brutally punished Gaza from the time of its departure through June 2009. After the disengagement, Israel immediately introduced a new tactic against the Gazan people—deafening sonic booms over the entire strip. Flyovers by air force jets created dozens of sonic booms by breaking the sound barrier at low altitude and sending shock waves across the region, often at night. Human rights agencies and the UNITED NATIONS urged Israel to stop, because the sonic booms are considered a form of severe collective punishment that can cause nosebleeds, widespread fear, and heart problems, and induce miscarriages and traumatize children with symptoms such as anxiety attacks, bedwetting, muscle spasms, temporary loss of hearing, and breathing difficulties. Palestinian human rights agencies petitioned the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT to end the sonic booms, but in January 2006 the court refused to stop them.

In the years that followed Israel's redeployment, the Gaza Strip also endured multiple short military incursions; shellings; attacks on INFRASTRUCTURE; TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS; aerial surveillance and bombardments; sporadic border closures; fishing restrictions; and the bombardment of Gaza's only power generator, followed by a cutoff of fuel, spare parts, and other items. From 28 June to 26 November 2006, Israel undertook a six-month large-scale military invasion of Gaza, OPERATION SUMMER RAINS, ostensibly because Hamas captured an Israeli soldier, Gilad Shalit, stationed on Gaza's border. (Shalit remained in HAMAS custody as of June 2009.) This was followed by another major military campaign—Operation Autumn Clouds from 1 to 8 November 2006. After Hamas seized power in June 2007, Israel imposed the eighteen-month punitive boycott during which no goods or persons could enter or leave the Strip. From 27 December 2008 to 8 January 2009, Tel Aviv carried out a massive air, land, and sea attack, OPERATION CAST LEAD, which killed 1,415 Palestinians, justified because of the firing of QASSAM ROCKETS into southern Israel by Hamas and ISLAMIC JIHAD.

During its forty-year Occupation, Israel did nothing to encourage economic growth in Gaza, and international and Palestinian efforts during the Oslo years (1994–2000) to improve the economy were frequently frustrated by the difficulty of getting goods and services in and out of Gaza as well as by other Israeli-imposed impediments. As a result, unemployment rates of around 50 percent have been the norm. Further, over 60 percent of the population of Gaza lives below the poverty line. In the postwithdrawal situation, Gazans have been unable to engage in commerce with Israel and the West Bank, making a resuscitation of their economy all the more difficult. Indeed, in the first four years after Israel's unilateral withdrawal, Gaza experienced the almost total destruction of its infrastructure, a humanitarian crisis of staggering proportions: clean water was unavailable; power was only sporadic (residents typically received it for two hours daily if at all); sewage overflowed the streets and was dumped into the sea; hunger prevailed; and unemployment and extreme poverty were at their worst ever. In the same period Israeli settlement expansion in the West Bank and East Jerusalem accelerated, and throughout the Occupied Territories the quality of life for Palestinians deteriorated significantly.

See also GAZA STRIP; HEALTH CARE; INFRASTRUCTURE; KARNI CROSSING; EHUD OLMERT; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; RAFAH CROSSING; RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT; SETTLEMENTS; ARIEL SHARON; UNITED STATES

Bibliography

- Anderson, John Ward. "Sharon Aide Says Goal of Gaza Plan Is to Halt Road Map: Key Adviser: Israel Got U.S. Blessing." Washington Post Foreign Service. 7 October 2004.
- Barnard, Anne. "Life in Gaza Steadily Worsens: Economic Woes, Violence after Israeli Withdrawal." Boston Globe. 22 October 2006.
- Bishara, Marwan. "Disengagement from Peace?" The Nation. 18 August 2005.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). "The Scope of Israeli Control in the Gaza Strip." Jerusalem: B'Tselem, ca. 2006. www.btselem.org/english/Gaza\_Strip/Gaza\_Status.asp.
- Elfarra, Mona. "Gaza under Large-scale Attack." Live from Palestine. 28 June 2006.
- Gresh, Alain. "Israel's Offensive against Peace." Le Monde diplomatique. June 2006. <http://mondediplo.com/2006/06/19palestine>.
- Ha'aretz. "Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Four-stage Disengagement Plan." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 18 July 2004.
- Al-Haq. A Year after "Disengagement": Gaza Still Occupied and under Attack. Ramallah, West Bank: Al-Haq, West Bank Affiliate of the International Commission of Jurists, 11 September 2006.
- Hass, Amira. "Words Have Failed Us." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 3 March 2004.
- Human Rights Watch. Israel: "Disengagement" Will Not End Gaza Occupation: Israeli Government Still Holds Responsibility for Welfare of Civilians. New York: Human Rights Watch, 2005.
- International Middle East Media Center. "Israel's Withdrawal from Gaza Report." 6 September 2006. www.imemc.org.
- Israeli Prime Minister's Office. The Cabinet Resolution Regarding the Disengagement Plan: Revised Disengagement Plan of 6 June 2004. Jerusalem: Government of Israel, 2004.
- Kampeas, Ron. "Israel Details Gaza Aid Request, Estimated at More Than $2 Billion." Jewish Telegraph Agency. 12 July 2005.
- Khalidi, Rashid. The Iron Cage: The Story of the Palestinian Struggle for Statehood. Boston: Beacon Press, 2006.
- Kidron, Peretz. "Middle East Report Online. Sharon's Sights on Strategic Objective." Middle East International. 14 April 2004.
- Lein, Yehezkel. One Big Prison: Freedom of Movement to and from the Gaza Strip on the Eve of the Disengagement Plan. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) and HaMoked, Center for the Defence of the Individual, 2005.
- Levy, Gideon. "Who Started?" Ha'aretz. 9 July 2006.
- Li, Darryl, and Yehezkel Lein. Act of Vengeance: Israel's Bombing of the Gaza Power Plant and Its Effects. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2006.
- McGreal, Chris. "Israel Unveils Plan to Encircle Palestinian State." The Guardian (UK). 8 February 2006.
- Murphy, John. "Israel's Withdrawal from Gaza." 2 parts. Baltimore Sun. 18 August 2005.
- Plitnick, Mitchell. "Gaza Withdrawal Background." Znet. 17 August 2005.
- Reinhart, Tanya. "Sharon's Disengagement: The Reality behind Sharon's Gaza Withdrawal Plan." Redress Information and Analysis, Spotlight. 22 March 2004. www.redress.btinternet.co.uk/treinhardt3.htm.
- Roy, Sara. "Praying with Their Eyes Closed: Reflections on the Disengagement from Gaza." Journal of Palestine Studies. 34:136 (Summer 2005).
- Scobbie, Iain. "Is Gaza Still Occupied Territory?" Forced Migration Review. n.d. www.fmreview.org/text/FMR/26/08.doc.
- Shavit, Ari. "The Big Freeze: Interview with Dov Weissglass." Ha'aretz. 10 October 2004.
- . "Gaza Plan Aims to Freeze the Peace Process." Ha'aretz. 6 October 2004.
- Shikaki, Khalil. "Since Israeli Withdrawal from Gaza, Palestinians Now Give Top Priority to Improving Living Standard, Not End to Occupation." Interview with Bernard Gwertzman. Council on Foreign Relations, 19 October 2005.

United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. Report on UNCTAD's Assistance to the Palestinian People. Prepared by the UNCTAD Secretariat (TD/B/52/2), 21 July 2005.

Westervelt, Eric. "Israeli Military Rolls into Southern Gaza Strip." National Public Radio. All Things Considered. 27 June 2006.

World Bank. Disengagement: The Palestinian Economy and the Settlements. Rome: World Bank, 23 June 2004.

—Saree Makdisi

Israel-Syria Water Disputes, 1950–1965

See SYRIA; UNITED NATIONS TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION

Istiqlal Party

The reconstitution of the Istiqlal (Independence) Party in 1932 marked the first Palestinian pan-Arab political party. AWNI 'ABDAL-HADI was elected as its first president. The party was established by activists from an earlier pan-Arab party of the same name; the new party's main objective was to end the BRITISH MANDATE as the first step to establishing a Palestinian state in the pan-Arab context. Several decades later, when al-Istiqlal Party was the only mass-based pan-Arabist party in Palestine, al-Istiqlal began to mobilize Palestinians around an ANTI-ZIONIST and anti-imperialist program. However, it was opposed by factions of the JERUSALEM parties of the AL-HUSAYNI and NASHASHIBI families, because al-Istiqlal had criticized clan-based parties and because al-Hadi belonged to a family of large landowners in the JENIN (NABLUS) area.

Throughout the 1920s and 1930s, there was conflict between Palestinian nationalists and various types of pan-Arabists, but the latter became increasingly marginalized. By 1937 only the Istiqlal Party promoted political absorption into a greater Arab nation as its main agenda.

Bibliography

Lesch, Ann Mosely. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.

Izz-al-Din al-Qassam Brigades

Izz-al-Din al-Qassam Brigades constitute the armed, underground wing of the HAMAS party. Based mainly in the GAZA STRIP, the brigades have carried out both military and terror attacks against Israel, including SUICIDE BOMBINGS. The name commemorates SHAYKH 'IZZ AL-DIN AL-QASSAM, the father of modern Arab resistance, who was killed by the British in 1935. The brigades were created in 1992 under the direction of YAHYA AYYASH, and thus members sometimes refer to themselves as "Students of Ayyash," "Students of the Engineer," or "Yahya Ayyash Units" to commemorate Ayyash, who was assassinated by Israel in 1996. The primary objective of the group is to build a coherent military organization to fulfill the goals of Hamas, which at the time was primarily interested in blocking the OSLO ACCORDS negotiations. The brigades operate on a decentralized model of independent cells, and even high-ranking members are often unaware of the activities of other cells.

Between 1994 and 2000 the al-Qassam Brigades carried out a number of attacks against both Israeli soldiers and civilians; however, with the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the group became a central target of Israel, which assassinated many of its militants and leaders. The brigades regrouped during 2003–2004 and recommenced operations.

See also HAMAS

Bibliography

Mishal, Shaul, and Avraham Sela. The Palestinian Hamas: Vision, Violence and Coexistence. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

---

Jabotinsky, Vladimir (Ze'ev) Yevgenievich (1880–1940)

Writer, orator, political organizer and leader, thinker, and rebel Vladimir Jabotinsky (commonly known as Ze'ev) remains a controversial figure whose early death has allowed his legacy to be interpreted in a multiplicity of ways. Most significantly, Jabotinsky has been understood as the inspiration for what became the right-wing Zionist movement in Israel and the hero of MENAHEM BEGIN, among others. Jabotinsky, however, lived only briefly in Palestine despite dedicating his life to the creation of a Jewish state there, and his life and legacy are as intimately tied to Europe (East and West) of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries as to the Middle East. As with THEODOR HERZL, Jabotinsky's conceptualization of ZIONISM was rooted in his particular experience as a cosmopolitan Jewish intellectual witnessing the power of European nationalisms as well as the ANTI-SEMITISM that created heightened awareness of Jewish vulnerability. Jabotinsky remained throughout his life a gifted writer as well as translator who utilized his knowledge of languages in the service of a central paradox. He was popularly known as the leader of a militantly nationalist movement that was dedicated to Jewish statehood in Palestine. Yet Jabotinsky remained an individualist whose life embodied immersion in an international environment.

Jabotinsky was born in Odessa, Russia, to a Jewish bourgeois family. He was educated in Russian-language schools that were typical of his class and milieu. Odessa, known as a city of mixed population and later as the home of the Hebrew Renaissance, was for Jabotinsky the cosmopolitan origin of a search for recognition as a writer and for experience beyond the bounds of his home. He left Odessa in 1897 for Switzerland, where he began a career as a journalist reporting from Europe to Russia under the pen name of Altalena. It is only beginning in 1902 that there is evidence in his writings and commentary of a gradual identification with the movement for Jewish statehood. Jabotinsky's participation in the Sixth WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS in Bern that year signaled a decisive shift toward activist political engagement, although he continued his work as a journalist; his writings, political and literary, remain important sources for the evolution of his thought.

Among the first of Jabotinsky's Zionist initiatives was the call for the formation of a JEWISH LEGION to participate in the First World War. He argued for such an armed presence because he believed that the war would lead to the dismemberment of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE and he hoped that Zionist service in a national brigade allied with British forces would strengthen postwar Zionist claims. The Jewish Legion came into existence in 1917 and Jabotinsky, who served as an officer, arrived in Palestine at a time when the British commitment to a Jewish national homeland (in the BALFOUR DECLARATION) was being translated into what became the League of Nations Mandate for Palestine. Initially Jabotinsky worked with the ZIONIST COMMISSION sent to Palestine to examine conditions, and he simultaneously argued the need for a Jewish military force able to defend the Zionist project in conjunction with British control. Although no formal army emerged at this time, Jabotinsky was later instrumental in organizing such a military—the HAGANA. In 1920, he was arrested for his role in the Palestinian-Jewish (AL-NABI MUSA) clashes in JERUSALEM.

When the British commuted his sentence (and those of others arrested with him) Jabotinsky left Palestine and returned to Europe, where he became a member of the ZIONIST EXECUTIVE. By 1923, however, he was in open disagreement with the official Zionist policy of cooperating with the British, “cooperation” he then saw as subjugation to British policies that he deemed insufficiently committed to Zionism. Thus, he resigned.

Beginning in 1925, Jabotinsky's followers, dedicated to revising official Zionist policies, were organized in the WORLD UNION OF ZIONIST REVISIONISTS. He laid down two principles that formed the core of Revisionist Zionist ideology and its political program. The first was the territorial integrity of Eretz Yisrael, the Land of Israel, which Jabotinsky perceived as indivisible over both banks of the River Jordan, including the original borders of the Palestine Mandate. The second was the immediate declaration of the Jewish right to political sovereignty over the whole of this area. Central to the ideology of the Revisionists was the call for immediate large-scale Jewish migration to Palestine and continuing pressure on the government of Great Britain to interpret its commitment to the Zionist movement as one of enabling Jewish majority and statehood.

Linked to the Revisionist movement was a paramilitary youth group that had originated in Lithuania in 1923, called Betar. Betar developed organizations throughout Europe and had a branch in Palestine as well. In subsequent years, Betar became a significant vehicle for recruiting youth into the Revisionist movement, inculcating Jabotinsky's beliefs in the concept of hadar (literally defined as beauty or glory but elaborated by Jabotinsky as critical to the training of youth), described by Yaacov Shavit as "an idealized code of behavior."

Jabotinsky held a distinctly different view of the Palestinian Arabs than did the more mainstream Zionists. Jabotinsky's perspective is contained in two highly important articles he published in 1923 in the Russian Zionist journal Raysvet under the heading "The Iron Wall." They provided the essence of Revisionist theory on the Palestinian Arab question.

The first article was entitled "On the Iron Wall: We and the Arabs." It begins on a personal note in which Jabotinsky described his emotional attitude toward the Arabs as one of "polite indifference." But he went on to reject as totally unacceptable any thought of removing the Arabs from Palestine. The real question, he said, switching to a philosophical mode, was whether one could always achieve peaceful aims by peaceful means. The answer to this question, he insisted, depended without a doubt on the attitude of the Arabs toward Zionism, not on Zionism's attitude toward them.

Jabotinsky's analysis of the Palestinians' attitude led him to state categorically, "There can be no voluntary agreement between ourselves and the Palestine Arabs. Not now, nor in the prospective future." As most moderate Zionists came to discover, there was not the slightest chance of gaining the agreement of the Palestinian Arabs to turn Palestine into a country with a Jewish majority. Jabotinsky strongly rejected those Zionists who portrayed the Palestinian Arabs either as fools who could be easily deceived by a watered-down version of Zionist objectives or as a tribe of mercenaries ready to give up their right to a country in exchange for economic advantage. "Every native population," he wrote, "resists colonists as long as it has the slightest hope of being able to rid itself of the danger of being colonized. That is what the Arabs in Palestine are doing, and what they will persist in doing as long as there remains a solitary spark of hope that they will be able to prevent the transformation of 'Palestine' into the 'Land of Israel.'"

After explaining the logic of Palestinian hostility to Zionism as he saw it, Jabotinsky turned to the policy implications. "So that all those who regard such an agreement as a condition sine qua non for Zionism can now say 'no' and withdraw from Zionism. Zionist colonization must either stop, or else proceed regardless of the native population. Which means that it can proceed and develop only under the protection of a power that is independent of the native population—behind an iron wall, which the native population cannot breach."

On the need for an iron wall of force, he claimed there was agreement among all Zionists. The only slight difference was that "the militarists" wanted an iron wall constructed with Jewish bayonets, whereas "the vegetarians" wanted it built with British bayonets. Constant repetition of Zionist willingness to negotiate with the Arabs was not only hypocritical but harmful, Jabotinsky argued, and he regarded it as his sacred duty to expose this hypocrisy.

Toward the end of the article, Jabotinsky went to some length to dispel any impression his analysis might have given that he despaired of the prospect of reaching an agreement with the Arabs of Palestine: "this does not mean that there cannot be agreement with the Palestine Arabs. What is impossible is a voluntary agreement. As long as the Arabs feel that there is the least hope of getting rid of us, they will refuse to give up . . . because they are not a rabble but a living people. And when a living people yields in matters of such vital character it is only when there is no longer any hope, . . . because they can make no breach in the iron wall. Not till then will they drop their extremist leaders whose watchword is 'Never!' And the leadership will pass to the moderate groups, who will approach us with a proposal that we should both agree to mutual concessions. Then we may expect them to discuss honestly practical questions, such as a guarantee against Arab displacement, or equal rights for Arab citizens or Arab national integrity."

Jabotinsky did not spell out in this article what precisely he meant by "national integrity," but other pronouncements suggest that what he had in mind was political "autonomy" for the Palestinians within a Jewish state. What does emerge from the article is that he recognized that the Palestinian Arabs formed a distinct national entity and that he accordingly considered them entitled to some national rights, albeit limited ones, and not merely to individual rights.

Shortly thereafter Jabotinsky wrote a second piece entitled "The Ethics of the Iron Wall," in which he further elaborated his views on the moral basis of Zionism despite Palestinian Arab opposition. In the realm of ideas Jabotinsky's contribution was highly significant. In the realm of politics, his impact was much greater than is commonly realized. It was not only Revisionist Zionists who were influenced by his ideas, but the Zionist movement as a whole.

Before 1948 and after, the Labor movement implemented these ideas even as they decried them. The Zionist movement was never monolithic but rather contained a collection of rival political parties, the largest being the LABOR PARTY, which was inspired by socialist ideas. Jabotinsky believed in capitalism, though not without some accommodations for the poor, and rejected socialism. Another fundamental difference between Labor Zionism and Revisionist Zionism related to the use of force. Labor Zionists were reluctant to admit that military force would be necessary if the Zionist movement was to achieve its objectives. Jabotinsky faced up to this fact realistically. He went further in suggesting a reversal of the Zionist order of priorities. Labor Zionists wanted to proceed toward statehood by IMMIGRATION and SETTLEMENT and initially accorded a lower priority to the buildup of military capability, though DAVID BEN-GURION relatively quickly came to appreciate the importance of military force. Jabotinsky never wavered in the conviction, or in its public advocacy, that Jewish military power was the key factor in the struggle for a state. Labor Zionists in general gradually came around to his point of view. Thus in historical perspective the gap was not as great as it appeared in the heat of political competition.

In the early 1930s several developments contributed to what was to become a bitter division between the dominant Labor Zionist movement and that of Jabotinsky's Revisionist Zionism. The first, as noted, was the role of force. In 1931, activists in the Hagana, dissatisfied with what they perceived as its restrained stance with regard to the use of military power, joined Betar members in Palestine to form the IRGUN TZEVA'I LE'UMI, which became a militant underground organization. Jabotinsky supported the Irgun and in 1937 officially became its supreme commander. Yet he never exercised complete control over the organization, even though it remained linked to the Revisionist Party, which was under his leadership, and its actions were associated with his ideology. Nevertheless, Jabotinsky's involvement with the Irgun was a point of contention with the Labor leaders. In addition, the success of fascism in Europe, including Nazi accession to power in GERMANY, generated significant differences. While Jabotinsky called for a boycott of Germany, the official Zionist leadership chose to negotiate an agreement known as HA'AVARA (Transfer) with the German government. On these and other issues, Zionist parties were hardening their own identities, often in competition with one another. Similarly, competition became fiercer for certificates allowing immigration to Palestine, especially after the Revisionists charged Labor with using their institutional position in the Yishuv to deny those in need for partisan reasons. During this time, the Revisionist Party also undertook the beginning of a project to enable illegal Jewish immigration in the face of British limitations.

The relationship between Ben-Gurion, in the early thirties the leader of Labor Zionism, and Jabotinsky was one of deep enmity, particularly on Ben-Gurion's side. Nevertheless, in 1934 he and Jabotinsky made personal efforts to arrive at a rapprochement and in an agreement called for efforts to end the conflict within Zionism as well as to resolve differences with regard to employment of workers and immigration certificates. Opposition from the left of the Labor movement led to the efforts' failure and in 1935 the Revisionist Party left the World Zionist Movement to form the New Zionist Organization. As spokesperson for his movement, Jabotinsky gave testimony to the PEEL COMMISSION investigating the ARAB REVOLT in Palestine in 1937; in that testimony he argued forcefully for the ethical basis of Jewish claims to statehood. Speaking from his position of being in Europe during the growing prewar crisis, Jabotinsky's point of view remained that of a nationalist separated from the Jewish community, which by now had taken institutional shape in Palestine. The tensions involved were evident not only in his dealings with the Labor leadership but equally in his relations with representatives of the Irgun in the late thirties, when differences were resolved only with difficulty and never entirely.

A recent biography of Jabotinsky, Lone Wolf, written by a political sympathizer, Shmuel Katz, conveys a striking image of singularity and power. It is suggestive of the fact that its subject combined enormous influence over others, as charismatic orator and political leader, with a personal, interior life known only partially to those closest to him. Jabotinsky, whose political activism was publicly evident, combined frequent changes of residence and travel with the protectiveness of a continuing intellectual and creative literary life. He was well-known for his extraordinary gift in mastering a multiplicity of languages (in addition to his native Russian, he was fluent in Hebrew, Yiddish, English, French, Italian, and German, with a working knowledge of others). The love of language was evident as well in Jabotinsky's prodigious literary output, which went well beyond his journalism and political writings to include novels, stories, and poetry as well as numerous translations (including that of a large portion of Dante's Inferno into Hebrew). In both realms, political and literary, language remained a passion. Jabotinsky was actively involved in the development of Modern Hebrew both in his own writings and in his campaign to ensure the teaching of Hebrew to Jewish youth in the DIASPORA.

Another biographer, Joseph Schechtman, illuminates the ways in which the political work of the Revisionists was reinforced by the strong personal relationships that the inner circle had with their leader. Perhaps linked to the complexity of these relationships and reflective of his individualism was the fact that Jabotinsky's creativity in organizing political movements was often accompanied by internal rifts, which in turn reinforced his solitude. Despite such differences, it is clear that he awakened deep loyalty among his followers, who felt inspired not just by his ideas, but by his personal impact.

Although Jabotinsky had returned to Palestine for one year in 1928, his return visa was invalidated by the British in 1930 and he lived out the rest of his life in Paris, London, and eventually New York. Jabotinsky arrived in New York in February 1940 hoping to gain support for his project of creating a Jewish army to participate in the war. His life ended abruptly with a heart attack during a visit to a Betar camp in upstate New York. He was initially buried on Long Island; however, he had requested in his will that his remains be transported to Palestine when a Jewish government made the request. This wish remained unfulfilled while David Ben-Gurion was in office, but in 1964 when LEVI ESHKOL was prime minister, Jabotinsky's body was reinterred on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem.

Bibliography

- Jabotinsky, Vladimir. "The Iron Wall." (Original in Russian, Razsviet. 4:11 [1923]) Ramat-Gan, Israel: Vladimir Jabotinsky Institute in Israel. http://www.jabotinsky.org/multimedia/upl\_doc\_191207\_49117.pdf.
- Katz, Shmuel. Lone Wolf: A Biography of Vladimir Jabotinsky, 2 vols. New York: Barricade Books, 1996.
- Lustick, Ian. "To Build and to Be Built By: Israel and the Hidden Logic of the Iron Wall." Israel Studies. 1:1 (Spring 1996).
- Rose, Jacqueline. "The Hidden Life of Vladimir Jabotinsky." In The Last Resistance, by Jacqueline Rose. London and New York: Verso, 2007.
- Schechtman, Joseph B. The Jabotinsky Story, 2 vols. New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1956 and 1961.
- Shavit, Yaakov. "Fire and Water: Ze'ev Jabotinsky and the Revisionist Movement." Studies in Zionism. (Autumn 1981).
- . Jabotinsky and the Revisionist Movement, 1925–48. London: Frank Cass, 1988.
- Stanislawski, Michael. Zionism and the Fin de Siècle. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.

—Ylana Miller

Jabra, Jabra Ibrahim (1919–1994)

Jabra I. Jabra was a distinguished Palestinian novelist, poet, and critic and the first Palestinian writer to achieve fame outside Palestine. Born in BETHLEHEM, he moved to IRAQ after the 1948 WAR and lived there the rest of his life. Two of Jabra's most famous novels, Hunters in a Narrow Street (1960) and The Ship (1970), take a historical perspective of JERUSALEM during the pre-1948 period. As a Palestinian Christian, Jabra draws heavily on Christian pastoral traditions in his representation of Jerusalem and its surrounding countryside, where the “good Palestinian shepherd” is born in Bethlehem and grows up in Jerusalem. According to literary critics, Jabra’s protagonists can be seen as Palestinian figures who, like Jesus Christ or other martyrs, are destined to redeem Jerusalem and hence their country.

Although Jabra published seven novels, his fictional fame was not recognized until the publication of The Ship and Looking for Waleed Masoad. Also well-known is his autobiography Princesses’ Street: Baghdad Memories, which continues the personal story that Jabra began with The First Well: A Bethlehem Boyhood. In addition to being one of the Middle East’s leading novelists and poets, he was a painter and translator (notably, of James George Frazer’s 1890 Golden Bough and William Faulkner’s The Sound and the Fury).

See also PALESTINIAN POETRY

Bibliography

- Boullata, Issa J., Terri DeYoung, and Mounah Abdallah Khouri. Tradition and Modernity in Arabic Literature. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1997.
- Elad-Bouskila, Ami. Modern Palestinian Literature and Culture. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Harb, Ahmad. “Representations of Jerusalem in the Modern Palestinian Novel.” Arab Studies Quarterly. 26 (Summer 2004).
- Jayyusi, Salma Khadra, ed. Anthology of Modern Palestinian Literature. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Meyer, Stefan G. The Experimental Arabic Novel: The Postcolonial Literary Modernism in the Levant. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.
- Parmenter, Barbara McKean. Giving Voice to Stones: Place and Identity in Palestinian Literature. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994.
- Taha, Ibrahim. The Palestinian Novel: A Communication Study. London: Routledge, 2002.

Jaffa

Jaffa, or Yaffa, was an ancient port city and major commercial center located on the central coast of Palestine. Its natural harbor on the Mediterranean Sea has been in use since the Bronze Age, and its strategic position exposed it to a series of conquests from the fifteenth century BCE. King David and King Solomon conquered Jaffa; however, it also has significance for Christians. The New Testament records that in Jaffa, Saint Peter resurrected the widow Tabitha, whose tomb remains a site of popular pilgrimage. In 636 CE, Arab armies took Jaffa from the Byzantine Empire, and in 1099 it fell to the Crusaders, after which it served as the gateway to the Latin kingdom of JERUSALEM. Jaffa was the site of a series of major battles between Muslim leader SALADIN and England’s King Richard the Lionhearted, who fought over control of the city for almost a year until Richard surrendered in September 1192, at which time the city was in ruins. In 1268, Jaffa was conquered by the Egyptian-Muslim MAMLUKS, who in the fourteenth century destroyed the city again, fearful of new Crusades. Jaffa did not begin to revive until the start of OTTOMAN rule in 1517, when the city gradually became an import-export center and a hub of the soap-making industry. In the early 1800s, Jaffa was reconstructed by its Ottoman governor, and further reforms were initiated during the short reign of Ibrahim Pasha.

After 1840, and especially after the 1869 opening of the Suez Canal, maritime trade was enhanced by the arrival of steamships and by a new road between Jaffa and Jerusalem. Increased trade and tourism promoted Jaffa’s international status and brought European merchants, missionaries, foreign consuls, and Zionist settlers hoping to establish agricultural colonies. Immigration to the city from other areas of Palestine increased, and after the 1880s a surge of Jewish immigrants began to expand the population in Jaffa and the surrounding areas. By the end of the nineteenth century, oranges were Jaffa’s leading export. However, many of the groves owned by Palestinians were sold to Jews by ABSENTEE LANDLORDS. At the turn of the century there was an increase in industry, including the establishment of metal plants and factories, many owned by Zionist immigrants or funded by wealthy Zionist organizations.

By the beginning of the twentieth century the population of Jaffa had swelled. Rabbi AVRAHAM YITZHAK KOOK moved to Palestine and took up the position of chief rabbi of Jaffa. Until the establishment of Tel Aviv in 1909, Jaffa had the most advanced commercial, banking, fishing, and agriculture industries in Palestine as well as many factories producing a variety of goods. When the British took control of Palestine, there was an increase in Zionist IMMIGRATION and ownership of LAND and commercial enterprises that caused Muslim and Christian Arabs, who were predominant in Jaffa, to rise up in rebellion. By 1921, Britain had placed the city under martial law. Arab organizations such as the MUSLIM-CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS were active, and two prominent Arabic newspapers in Jaffa articulated ANTI-ZIONIST feeling. The uprisings of the ARAB REVOLT in the 1930s pitted Palestinian protesters in Jaffa against the British military. The Royal Air Force destroyed much of the old city in 1936 as punishment for its continued support of the general strike. Although the strike paralyzed the port, Jaffa remained the primary export center for the citrus industry in spite of the growth of HAIFA, also a seaport, and the newly built port at Tel Aviv. In 1945, Palestinians planted 146,316 dunums (36,000 acres) of citrus, while Jews planted 66,403 dunums (16,400 acres).

Although the 1947 UN SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PALESTINE recommended that Jaffa become part of the planned Jewish state, the UN General Assembly Partition Resolution (UN RESOLUTION 181) designated Jaffa as an enclave in the Arab state due to its large Palestinian majority. Palestinians rejected Resolution 181 and the day after the adoption of the resolution, on 29 November 1947, large spontaneous demonstrations erupted in Jaffa, during which several Jewish establishments were looted. In December 1947, Zionist forces attacked Palestinian residents of Jaffa and the nearby village of Salame. The militant Zionist group IRGUN launched major assaults against Palestinian positions in Jaffa, often targeting the civilian population. In response, in February 1948, Jewish workers were slain by Arabs in a factory after being disarmed by the British, and Jaffa became a battleground between Arabs and Jews.

On 13 March 1948, Zionist forces first used Davidka mortars against Jaffa, and the bombardment caused many Palestinians, especially from the middle and upper classes, to flee the city. The Palestinian flight may also have been accelerated by the news of the 9 April 1948 massacre in the Arab village of DEIR YASSIN, where Zionist militias murdered over one hundred men, women, and children. But the brutal capture of Jaffa also prompted many residents to leave. According to Shmuel Toledano, a Jewish intelligence officer, although other factors played a part, “the Irgun had been shelling Jaffa for three weeks before the HAGANA [the underground military organization] entered, making the Arabs very much afraid.” On 10 May 1948 the Irgun began a full-scale assault on the city, causing the mass flight of the remaining inhabitants. At one point British forces, attempting to prevent the expulsion of Jaffa’s Palestinians, engaged the Irgun in battle. Initially the Irgun retreated but Hagana fighters came to its assistance, and the British withdrew. On 13 May, Jaffa formally surrendered to Jewish forces, shortly before Israel’s DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. To commemorate the fall of Jaffa, Israel planted the Conquest Garden in the center of the city. Before the 13 May 1948 surrender, the Arab population of Jaffa had decreased from 75,000 to 55,000. On the day of surrender less than three weeks later, only about 3,500 Palestinians, the poorest of the city dwellers, remained, and they formed the basis of the modern Palestinian population of Jaffa. Those who fled have never been allowed to return to their homes and are now scattered throughout the world, many living in refugee camps.

Immediately after the conquest, Irgun forces indulged in widespread looting. Jon Kimche, former editor of the Jewish Observer and Middle East Review, the official organ of the Zionist Federation of Britain, reported: “for the first time in the still undeclared war, a Jewish force commenced to loot in wholesale fashion.” At first, the young Irgunists pillaged only dresses, blouses, and ornaments for their girlfriends. But, according to Kimche, “soon everything that was movable was carried from Jaffa, including furniture, carpets, pictures, crockery and pottery, jewelry and cutlery.” Historian Michael Palumbo also wrote about the pillaging: “Not content with looting, the Irgun fighters smashed or destroyed everything which they could not carry off, including pianos, lamps and window-panes. [Israel’s founder DAVID] BEN-GURION afterwards admitted that Jews of all classes poured into Jaffa from Tel Aviv to participate in what he called ‘a shameful and distressing spectacle.’”

Shortly after Jaffa fell, Israel blew up and bulldozed most of Jaffa’s Arab sector—some 75 percent of the city—leaving only the al-Ajami neighborhood of the Old City and a small part of al-Manshiya. Most, if not all, of Jaffa’s sucs (markets) were obliterated. The small group of Palestinians who managed to stay in Jaffa was literally imprisoned in a part of the al-Ajami neighborhood, surrounded by a barbed-wire fence with sentries at the neighborhood’s entrances and exits. Shortly thereafter Jewish immigrants from Bulgaria, Morocco, Romania, and other countries were settled in Jaffa, causing severe housing problems. One solution was housing the immigrants in the al-Ajami neighborhood. As a result the fence came down, and the old Palestinian family mansions were subdivided into smaller flats. Jewish and Palestinian families lived next door to each other, usually sharing the same kitchen and bathroom. Because the neighbors were all poor with shared problems, friendships were created, and many Ajami residents remember Jewish-Palestinian relations from this period as good; they shared family feasts and provided help and support in times of need. In the 1960s and 1970s, modern homes were constructed in Jaffa's destroyed neighborhoods, and many of the Jewish families moved to those newer flats, while others moved to nearby Bat Yam, Holon, and Rishon LeZion. Al-Ajami slowly turned into a slum, populated almost exclusively by Palestinians (or "Israeli Arabs"). Today Jaffa's old Palestinian neighborhoods are being renovated and inhabited mostly by artists and are frequented by tourists.

See also WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Graham-Brown, Sarah. Palestinians and Their Society 1880–1946: A Photographic Essay. London: Quartet Books, 1980.
- Issawi, Charles. "The Trade of Jaffa, 1825–1914." In Studia Palaestina: Studies in Honor of Constantine Zurayk. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1988.
- Kark, Ruth. Jaffa: A City in Evolution 1799–1917. Jerusalem: Yad Izhak Ben Zvi Press, 1990.
- Kimche, Jon. Seven Fallen Pillars: The Middle East, 1915–1950. London: Secker and Warburg, 1950.
- Kimche, Jon, and David Kimche. Both Sides of the Hill: Britain and the Palestine War. London: Secker and Warburg, 1960.
- . A Clash of Destinies: The Arab-Jewish War and the Founding of the State of Israel. New York: Praeger, 1960.
- Landau, Jacob M. Abdul Hamid's Palestine. London: Andre Deutsch, 1979.
- LeVine, Mark. Overthrowing Geography: Jaffa, Tel Aviv, and the Struggle for Palestine 1880–1948. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Moran, William. The Amarna Letters. Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987.
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestine Refugee Problem. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Naffa', Muhammad. "The Uprooted." In Anthology of Modern Palestinian Literature. Edited by Salma Khadra Jayyusi. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Nijim, Basheer K., and Bishara Muammar. Toward the De-Arabization of Palestine/Israel, 1945–1977. Dubuque, Iowa: Kendall/Hunt, 1984.
- Palumbo, Michael. The Palestinian Catastrophe: The 1948 Expulsion of a People from Their Homeland. Boston: Faber and Faber, 1987.

- Quigley, John. Palestine and Israel: A Challenge to Justice. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1990.
- Savaya, Rivka. "The Development of an Outreach Strategy in the Jaffa Arab Community." Community Development Journal. 32:2 (1997).
- Segev, Tom. 1949: The First Israelis. New York: The Free Press, 1986.
- Silver, Eric. Begin: The Haunted Prophet. New York: Random House, 1984.

—Betsy Folkins

Jenin, 2002

The Battle of Jenin took place from 3 April to 11 April 2002 in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY-administered refugee camp of Jenin in the WEST BANK. It occurred in the context of OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD as part of the Second or AL-AQSA INTIFADA and was an intense military confrontation. The battle was fought between the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) and several Palestinian factions. It gave rise to a number of myths, especially concerning the number of Palestinians killed, a number that was widely exaggerated. Nevertheless, the destruction wrought on Jenin by the IDF was severe.

On the eve of Israel's April military incursion, the Jenin refugee camp, established in 1953, was home to roughly 13,055 registered REFUGEES, of whom approximately 47 percent are either under 15 or over 65 years of age. It is the second most populous refugee camp in the West Bank, with a very high density, covering an area of only approximately 373 dunums (92 acres). The Jenin refugee camp came under full Palestinian (PNA) civil and security control in 1995 with the INTERIM AGREEMENT. It abuts the town of Jenin, overlooks both the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY to the east and the Marj Ibn Amer (Jezreel Valley) to the north, is near the Green Line, and is in close proximity to several Israeli SETTLEMENTS. The Jenin camp is administered by the UNITED NATIONS Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA).

In the early hours of 3 April 2002, the IDF entered the city of Jenin and the refugee camp adjacent to it, declared them CLOSED MILITARY ZONES, prevented all access, and imposed a round-the-clock CURFEW. According to both Palestinian and Israeli observers, the Jenin camp had, by April 2002, some 200 armed men from the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, Tanzim, ISLAMIC JIHAD, and HAMAS operating from the camp. The government of Israel has charged that from October 2000 to April 2002, 28 SUICIDE BOMBINGS were planned and launched from the Jenin camp.

The Israeli government and the IDF have stated that their soldiers were unprepared for the level of resistance they encountered in the Jenin camp, noting that it was “probably the most bitter and harsh” that they had faced. The IDF soldiers who took part in the operation were, for the most part, reservists who had been mobilized only on or after 17 March. Many were called up only after the Passover bombing on 27 March in Netanya.

In the account of the operation by the Israeli government, the IDF first surrounded and established control of access into and out of the Jenin camp, allowing its inhabitants to depart voluntarily. Using loudspeakers, the IDF urged civilians in Arabic to evacuate the camp. Some reports, including interviews with IDF soldiers, suggest that those warnings were not adequate and were ignored by many residents. Many of the inhabitants of the Jenin camp fled the camp before or at the beginning of the IDF incursion. Estimates vary on how many civilians remained in the camp throughout the fighting, but there may have been as many as 4,000.

According to Israeli sources, in their incursion into the camp the IDF relied primarily on infantry rather than airpower and artillery in an effort to minimize civilian casualties, but other accounts of the battle suggest that as many as sixty tanks may have been used, even in the first days. Interviews with witnesses conducted by human rights organizations suggest that tanks, helicopters, and ground troops using small arms predominated in the first two days, after which armored bulldozers were used to demolish houses and other structures so as to widen alleys in the camp.

As described by the Israeli government, “a heavy battle took place in Jenin, during which IDF soldiers were forced to fight among booby-trapped houses and bomb fields throughout the camp, which were prepared in advance as a booby-trapped battlefield.” The Palestinian National Authority (PNA) acknowledges that “a number of Palestinian fighters resisted the Israeli military assault and were armed only with rifles and . . . crude explosives.” An IDF spokesman offered a slightly different portrayal of the resistance, stating that the soldiers had faced “more than a thousand live explosive charges and some more sophisticated ones . . . hundreds of hand grenades . . . [and] hundreds of gunmen.” Human rights reports support the assertions that some buildings had been booby-trapped by the Palestinian combatants.

That the IDF encountered heavy Palestinian resistance is not in question. Nor is the fact that Palestinian militants in the camp, as elsewhere, adopted methods that constitute breaches of INTERNATIONAL LAW that have been and continue to be condemned by the United Nations. Clarity and certainty remain elusive, however, on the policy and facts of the IDF response to that resistance. The Israeli government maintains that the IDF “clearly took all possible measures not to hurt civilian life” but were confronted with “armed TERRORISTS who purposely concealed themselves among the civilian population.” However, several human rights groups and Palestinian eyewitnesses assert that IDF soldiers did not take all possible measures to avoid hurting civilians, and even used some as human shields.

As the IDF penetrated the camp, the Palestinian militants reportedly moved further into its center. The heaviest fighting reportedly occurred between 5 and 9 April, resulting in the largest death tolls on both sides. There are reports that during this period the IDF increased missile strikes from helicopters and the use of bulldozers—including their use to demolish homes and allegedly bury beneath them those who refused to surrender—and engaged in “indiscriminate” firing. In this period, the IDF lost 14 soldiers, 13 in a single engagement on 9 April. The IDF incurred no further fatalities in Jenin after 9 April.

By the end of May 2002, 52 Palestinian deaths were confirmed by the hospital in Jenin, and the IDF also placed the death toll at approximately 52. A senior Palestinian Authority official alleged in mid-April that some 500 were killed, a figure that has not been substantiated in light of the evidence that has emerged, but which many Palestinians continue to cite.

It is impossible to determine with precision how many civilians were among the Palestinian dead. The Israeli government estimated that during the invasion there were “only dozens killed in Jenin . . . and the vast majority of them bore arms and fired upon [IDF] forces.” Israeli officials informed UN personnel that they believed that, of the 52 dead, 38 were armed men and 14 were civilians. The PNA has acknowledged that combatants were among the dead, and has named some of them, but has placed no precise estimates on the breakdown. Human rights organizations put the civilian toll higher. Human Rights Watch documented 22 civilians among the 52 dead, while Physicians for Human Rights noted that “children under the age of 15 years, women and men over the age of 50 years accounted for nearly 38 percent of all reported fatalities.” The final death toll was confirmed at 52 to 56 Palestinians—anywhere between 5 and 26 of whom were estimated to have been civilians—while 23 IDF soldiers were killed. Approximately 150 buildings were destroyed, and many others were rendered structurally unsound. Four hundred fifty families were rendered homeless. The cost of the destruction of property is estimated at approximately $27 million.

In the second part of the operation, the IDF appeared to have shifted tactics from house-to-house searches and destruction of the homes of known militants to wider bombardment with tanks and missiles. The IDF also used armored bulldozers supported by tanks to demolish portions of the camp. The Israeli government maintains that “IDF forces only destroyed structures after calling a number of times for inhabitants to leave buildings, and from which the shooting did not cease.” Witness testimonies and human rights investigations allege that the destruction was both disproportionate and indiscriminate, some houses coming under attack from the bulldozers before their inhabitants had the opportunity to evacuate. The PNA maintains that the IDF “had complete and detailed knowledge of what was happening in the camp through the use of drones and cameras attached to balloons . . . [and that] none of the atrocities committed were unintentional.”

Human rights and humanitarian organizations have also questioned whether this change in tactics was proportionate to the military objective and in accordance with humanitarian and human rights law. The PNA account of the battle alleges the use of “helicopter gun-ships to fire TOW missiles against such a densely populated area . . . anti-aircraft guns, able to fire 3,000 rounds a minute . . . scores of tanks and armored vehicles equipped with machine guns . . . [and] bulldozers to raze homes and to burrow wide lanes.” Other sources point to an extensive use of armored bulldozers and helicopter gunships on 9 and 10 April, possibly even after the fighting had begun to subside.

Much of the physical damage was done during this period, particularly in the central Hawashin district of the camp, which was effectively leveled. Many civilian dwellings were completely destroyed and many more were severely damaged. Several UNRWA facilities in the camp, including its HEALTH CARE center and sanitation office, were badly damaged.

Within two days after 9 April, the IDF brought the camp under control and defeated the remaining armed elements. On 11 April, the last Palestinian militants in the Jenin camp surrendered to the IDF, having requested mediation by B’TSE-LEM, an Israeli human rights organization that operates in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, to ensure that no harm would come to them. According to PNA sources, those surrendering included wanted Islamic Jihad and FATAH leaders, as well as three wounded and a 13-year-old boy.

As the IDF incursion into Jenin wound down, a range of humanitarian problems arose or worsened for the estimated 4,000 Palestinian civilians remaining in the camp. Primary among these was the prolonged delay in obtaining medical attention for the wounded and sick within the camp. Ambulances and medical personnel were prevented by the IDF from reaching the wounded within the camp, despite repeated requests to the IDF to facilitate access for ambulances and humanitarian delegates, including those of the United Nations. From 11 to 15 April, the United Nations and other humanitarian agencies petitioned the IDF and negotiated for access to the camp, to no avail. At IDF headquarters on 12 April, UN officials were told that UN humanitarian staff would be given access to the affected population. However, such access did not materialize on the ground, and several more days of negotiations with senior IDF officials and personnel of the Israeli Ministry of Defense did not produce the necessary access despite assurances to the contrary. On 18 April, senior UN officials criticized Israel for its handling of humanitarian access in the aftermath of the battle and, in particular, its refusal to facilitate full and safe access to the affected populations in violation of its obligations under international humanitarian law.

The UNRWA mounted a large operation to deliver food and medical supplies to needy refugees who had fled the camp and to Jenin hospital but was not allowed to enter the camp. The humanitarian crisis was exacerbated by the fact that, on the first day of the offensive, electricity in both the city and the camp was cut by the IDF. Electric power was not restored until 21 April.

Many of the reports of human rights groups contain accounts of wounded civilians waiting days to reach medical assistance and being refused medical treatment by IDF soldiers. In some cases, people died as a result of these delays. In addition to those wounded in the fighting, there were civilian inhabitants of the camp and the city who endured medication shortages and delays in medical treatment for preexisting conditions. For example, it was reported on 4 April that there were 28 kidney patients in Jenin who could not reach the hospital for dialysis treatment.

The functioning of Jenin Hospital, just outside the camp, appears to have been severely undermined by IDF actions, despite IDF statements that “nothing was done to the hospital.” The hospital’s supplies of power, water, oxygen, and blood were significantly limited by the fighting and consequent cuts in services. On 4 April, the IDF ordered the Palestinian Red Crescent Society (PRCS) to stop its operations and sealed off the hospital. Hospital staff contend that shells and gunfire severely damaged equipment on the top floor and that at least two patients died because of damage to the oxygen supplies. None of the Palestinians within the hospital were permitted to leave until 15 April.

It appears that, in addition to the denial of aid, the IDF in some instances targeted medical personnel. Before the Jenin incursion on 4 March, the head of the PRCS Emergency Medical Service in Jenin was killed by a shell fired from an Israeli tank while he was traveling in a clearly marked ambulance. On 7 March, a staff member of UNRWA was killed when several bullets were fired by Israeli soldiers at a UNRWA ambulance in which he was riding near Tulkaram in the West Bank. On 3 April, a uniformed Palestinian nurse was reportedly shot by IDF soldiers within Jenin camp, and on 8 April an UNRWA ambulance was fired upon as it tried to reach a wounded man in Jenin.

The Israeli government repeatedly charged that medical vehicles were used to transport terrorists and that medical premises were used to provide shelter. This, according to Israel, necessitated the severe restrictions on humanitarian access. Furthermore, in the specific case of Jenin camp, IDF spokesmen attributed denials of access to the clearance of booby traps after the fighting had subsided. The IDF spokesman also maintained that the “Palestinians actually refused our offers to assist them with humanitarian aid” and that “everyone who needed help, got help.” There is, however, a consensus among humanitarian personnel who were present on the ground that the delays endangered the lives of many wounded and ill within. UN and other humanitarian personnel offered to comply fully with IDF security checks on entering and leaving the camp, but were not able to enter the camp on this basis. Furthermore, UN staff reported that the IDF had granted some escorted Israeli journalists access to the camp on 14 April, before humanitarian personnel were allowed in. UN personnel requested similar escorted access to assess the humanitarian condition of people in the camp, but were unsuccessful, despite assurances from senior IDF officials that such access would be possible.

On 15 April, 12 days after the start of the military operation, the IDF granted humanitarian agencies access to the Jenin refugee camp. The PRCS and the International Committee of the Red Cross were permitted to enter the camp under military escort but reported that their movement was strictly confined to certain areas and further constrained by the presence of large quantities of unexploded ordnance, including booby traps. After evacuating only seven bodies, they aborted their efforts. A UN team with two water trucks and other supplies was forbidden from unloading and was also forced to withdraw. Supplies were not distributed to the camp inhabitants until the following day, 16 April. Acute food and water shortages were evident, and humanitarian personnel began calls for specialized search-and-rescue efforts to extract the wounded and the dead from the rubble.

Once the IDF granted full access to the camp on 15 April, unexploded ordnance impeded the safe operations of humanitarian personnel. Non-UN humanitarian agencies reported that large amounts of unexploded ordnance, explosives laid by Palestinian combatants as well as IDF ordnance, slowed their work. Negotiations carried out by UN and other international agencies with the IDF to allow appropriate equipment and personnel into the camp to remove the unexploded ordnance continued for several weeks, during which time at least two Palestinians were accidentally killed in explosions.

There was a battle in Jenin. It was real urban warfare, as a modern, well-equipped army met an armed and prepared group of guerrilla fighters intimately familiar with the local terrain. For both sides, Jenin has been added to the memories that invest the conflict in the Middle East with such bitterness. Because Jenin has become so potent a symbol, a new battle erupted over what precisely happened there and what its wider significance will be.

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Israel Committed War Crimes in Jenin, Nablus. London: Amnesty International, 11 May 2002.
- . Israel and the Occupied Territories: Shielded from Scrutiny: IDF Violations in Jenin and Nablus. London: Amnesty International, 4 November 2002.
- Bakri, Mohammed. Jenin, Jenin. Film. 2002.
- Baroud, Ramzy, ed. Searching Jenin: Eyewitness Accounts of the Israeli Invasion. Seattle: Cune Press, 2002.
- BBC. "The Battle of Jenin." BBC Online. 15 August 2002. http://www.bbc.co.uk/worldservice/programmes/archive/020814\_battlejenin.shtml.
- B'Tselem B'Tselem Photo Archive: Jenin Refugee Camp. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002. http://www.btselem.org/English/Photo\_Archive/One\_Photo.asp?start=144.
- . Human Shield: Use of Palestinian Civilians as Human Shields in Violation of High Court of Justice Order. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Impeding Medical Treatment and Firing at Ambulances by IDF Soldiers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Lethal Curfew: The Use of Live Ammunition to Enforce Curfew. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Operation Defensive Shield: Soldiers' Testimonies, Palestinian Testimonies. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Electronic Intifada. Destruction of Jenin Refugee Camp. Video. 25 April 2002. <http://www.electronicintifada.org>.
- Harel, Amos, and Avi Issacharoff. "Jenin: From Terror Capital to Model of Peace." Ha'aretz. 19 September 2008.
- Human Rights Watch. Jenin: IDF Military Operations. New York: Human Rights Watch, 2002.
- Jenin Inquiry Report*. (The Jenin Inquiry, a group of concerned human rights workers from the United States, Scotland, Ireland, Canada, and Norway, conducted detailed, in-depth interviews with people of the Jenin refugee camp from 11 April until mid-May 2002). <http://www.jenininquiry.org>.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. "The Battle of Jenin as an Inter-Ethnic War." Counterpunch. 1 May 2002. <http://www.counterpunch.org/kimmerling0501.html>.
- Rees, Matt. "The Battle of Jenin." Time. 13 May 2002.
- Reinhart, Tanya. "Jenin: the Propaganda Battle." Counterpunch. 24 April 2002.

Sadeh, Sharon. "How Jenin Battle Became a 'Marsacra.'" The Guardian. 6 May 2002.

United Nations. Report of the Secretary-General Prepared Pursuant to General Assembly Resolution ES-10/10 (Report on Jenin). Tenth emergency special session, Agenda Item 5. Illegal Israeli Actions in Occupied East Jerusalem and the Rest of the Occupied Palestinian Territory. New York: United Nations Publications, 2002.

Jericho

The ancient city of Jericho, thought to be the oldest and lowest city on earth (at 830 feet below sea level), is situated in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY about seven miles (eleven kilometers) west of the Dead Sea and twenty miles (thirty-two kilometers) east of JERUSALEM. Extensive excavations place the earliest settlement at about 8000 BCE. Layers of human habitation on the site reveal evidence of hunting-and-gathering groups, followed by an urban culture with defensive walls and indications of more complex social organization, including agriculture and craft production between 7000 and 6000 BCE.

The site was continuously inhabited by various peoples and destroyed and rebuilt many times. The Egyptians occupied it from the fifteenth to thirteenth centuries BCE, followed by the Israelites in the twelfth to sixth centuries BCE. Under the Romans the city moved further west, and in the time of Herod, aqueducts were built. Jericho was destroyed during the Jewish wars in 66 CE, rebuilt by the emperor Hadrian, and under the Byzantines moved about one mile east of its present location. Beginning in the early fourth century, there was a Christian presence in the area, and in 325 CE, Jericho became the center of a bishopric. In the sixth century the emperor Justinian built a church there and constructed a road connecting the city to Petra (now in JORDAN) on a main caravan route. The city began to attract a large number of pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem, and several monasteries were established. After the caravan route was diverted, the city fell into decay. In the seventh century, Jericho was captured by Arab armies, and in 724 the Umayyad Caliph Hisham built a grand winter palace nearby. By the ninth century, Jericho was a district capital, whose importance was enhanced by the production of sugarcane and indigo. In 1099 the city was captured by the Crusaders and served as an encampment before it was recaptured by the Muslim leader SALADIN in 1187.

For several centuries Jericho was no more than a small village. Because it lay on the pilgrimage route from Damascus to Medina and Mecca, for security reasons the OTTOMANS maintained garrisons to protect tourists and hajj pilgrims. In 1840, Jericho was razed by the departing troops of Ibrahim Pasha, son of the Egyptian conqueror Mohammed Ali, and in 1871 destroyed again by fire. During World War I, in 1918, British general Allenby captured the city from Ottoman troops, securing the eastern front. The main bridge over the southernmost crossing of the Jordan River, the Ghoraniyya Bridge, was destroyed during the war and replaced in 1935 by the Allenby Bridge. According to Muslim belief, a few miles to the southwest of Jericho lies the tomb of Nabi Musa (the prophet Moses), which has been the site of an annual pilgrimage and festival since the end of the Crusades. In the 1920s and 1930s it was the scene of demonstrations against Zionist IMMIGRATION, which were always quelled by the British army.

Not until the arrival of the British after World War I did Jericho begin to revive and become a winter resort for wealthy Jerusalem Palestinian families. The increases in fruit production, mainly from orange and banana groves, led to population growth, and by the 1940s Jericho had some 3,000 inhabitants. Jordanian forces occupied Jericho in 1948 as part of the WEST BANK, and it soon became the site of three teeming refugee camps after the 1948 WAR, housing REFUGEES from the coastal areas of Palestine. In the 1967 WAR Israel captured the city. When the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) was established in 1994, Jericho was the first West Bank city to come under autonomous Palestinian rule.

Jericho became prominent during the period of PNA governance for the establishment of a casino there. Situated left of the Dead Sea–Jericho highway and across the road from the squalid Aqbat Jabar refugee camp, the Oasis Casino opened in October 1998, claiming to be the largest in the Middle East. An opulent construction project, the $50 million Oasis development was intended by the cash-strapped PNA to be a source of revenue and to draw further private investment. Recurrent Israeli CLOSURES had left the West Bank economy suffering, taking a particularly heavy toll on earnings from tourism. Controversies surrounded the casino from the outset—for example, who owned it, who invested in it, how the PNA spent the earnings, the presence of gambling and alcohol in a predominantly Muslim society, the prohibition on Palestinians (unless they held foreign passports) entering the casino (though Palestinians constituted 435 of 2,000-plus staff), and other issues. Israelis came to the casino in large numbers, and for a time the casino seemed hugely successful. On peak days up to 3,000 gamblers packed its two large rooms and VIP lounge, staking their bets on baccarat, blackjack, roulette, and craps. However, in October 2000, shortly after violence broke out, the casino closed, and Israel barred its citizens from traveling to the area. In February 2005, the casino was reopened, but there were no gamblers. Following years of violence and depression, Palestinian businessmen hope Israelis will quickly return to Jericho and jump-start tourism there, but Israel has not yet allowed its citizens to return.

By 2006, Jericho was a Palestinian island in a sea of Israeli SETTLEMENTS—three large settlements and several smaller OUTPOSTS. The small town is surrounded by a trench and sealed off by Israeli troops. At the CHECKPOINT at the entrance to the town near the defunct Oasis Casino, two Israeli soldiers control all movement into and out of town.

See also JORDAN RIFT VALLEY; AL-NABI MUSA DEMONSTRATIONS PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY

Bibliography

- Amundsen, Inge, and Basem Ezbid. Clientelist Politics, State Formation and Corruption in Palestine 1994–2000. Bergen, Norway: Michelsen Institute Development Studies and Human Rights, 2002.
- Claudet, Sophie. “Jericho Looks to Security Handover to Revive Tourism: Palestinian Businessmen Hope Israelis Will Quickly Return to Jericho, Jumpstart Tourism after Four Years of Violence.” Middle East Online. 18 February 2005. <http://www.middle-east-online.com/english/?id=12699>.
- Friedberg, Asher, William N. Thompson, and Carl Lutrin. “Gambling in Israel and the Jericho Casino: Moralistic Political Culture Bends toward Pragmatism.” Gaming Law Review. 5:1 (July 2004).
- Graham-Brown, Sarah. Palestinians and Their Society 1880–1946: A Photographic Essay. London: Quartet Books, 1980.
- Harding, G. Lankester. The Antiquities of Jordan. London: Lutterworth Press, 1959.
- Hazboun, Ibrahim. “Jericho Casino Owners Sue Palestinian Insurance Company.” The Associated Press. 2 January 2002.
- Jansen, Michael. “Palestinians’ Life Is Precarious These Days.” Jordan Times (Amman). 18 September 2003.
- Landau, Jacob M. Abdul Hamid’s Palestine. London: Andre Deutsch, 1979.

Miller, Edward B. "An Oasis or Just a Mirage: The Jericho Casino and the Future of the Israeli-Palestinian Peace Process." Richmond Journal of Global Law and Business. 2:1 (Winter–Spring 2001).

Travarthen, Simon. "A Gamble in the Desert." The Middle East. November 1988.

—Betsy Folkins

Jerusalem

Jerusalem is at the physical and symbolic core of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, representing both the political and religious aspirations of Israelis and Palestinians and the ebb and flow of relations between them. Because both communities claim that the city is their spiritual center and political capital, there will be no resolution to the conflict unless there is a mutually acceptable agreement on sharing Jerusalem and its holy sites. Because Israel has been reluctant to relinquish significant parts of the city to the Palestinians and the Palestinians have refused to accept Israeli claims to certain parts of the city, resolution of this component of the conflict has been especially intractable. At the same time, Israel's military control over the city since 1967 has been marked by political limits on its authority and sovereignty through the presence of strong religious institutions and historical practices and has not removed either the Palestinian presence or Palestinian resistance to the Israeli OCCUPATION. This in turn has provided space for a continued and realistic Palestinian claim to the city.

History of Change

The history of Jerusalem is characterized by the constant succession of changing rulers and dynasties, the dominance of different religions at various times—though almost always in a multi-denominational context and relative tolerance—and continuous construction, destruction, and reconstruction. The earliest archaeological evidence for human settlement in Jerusalem can be traced to around 1800 BCE, known as the Jebusite period. Remnants include some city walls, foundations of houses, water-supply installations, and some tombs and caves. Following its conquest by the Israelite tribes under King David in 1003 BCE, the city acquired political importance as being midway between the two tribal areas of Judah and Benjamin and became the capital of a united kingdom. Further expansion continued under David's successor, Solomon, when the first Jewish Temple was built and its fortifications were enlarged. During this period, Jerusalem also became a commercial center with major trading routes from the Mediterranean coast to the Arabian interior passing through the city.

The Babylonian invasion of 587 BCE ended the longest period of unbroken Israelite rule in the city; ruling members of the Israelite population were executed, and the remainder deported to Babylonia. The Babylonians, in turn, were conquered in 539 BCE by the Persians, who allowed the Jewish exiles to return but prevented the Israelites or Hebrews, as they were then called, from establishing independent political control over the city. During the subsequent Hellenic period (332 BCE to 168 BCE) there was a renewed flowering of Jewish ritual and law in Jerusalem, but this was crushed under Antiochus Epiphanies, who destroyed the city and made Torah observance punishable by death. However, a succession of revolts against the Seleucid Greeks reestablished Jewish control over the city under the Maccabeans in 141 BCE.

The Roman period, which succeeded the Hellenistic and Maccabean, lasted from 63 BCE until the Muslim invasion in 638 CE. In the first half of this period, the empire was ruled from Rome, and its citizens worshiped pagan gods, although the Jews (as they were now called) enjoyed an initial period of religious autonomy in Jerusalem. Jewish attempts to gain political independence from Rome, however, were crushed, culminating in the destruction of the Second Temple in 69–70 CE. During this period the first Christian community was also established, and the city saw the beginnings of the Christian pilgrimage trade. The second half of the Roman period was characterized by a growing movement away from paganism and the acceptance of CHRISTIANITY throughout the empire, as well as its division into two parts. In the eastern half, Byzantium was ruled from Constantinople. One of the most significant events of the period was the conversion of Emperor Constantine to Christianity. In 336 CE, Helena, Constantine's mother, visited Jerusalem, identified the supposed site of the crucifixion of Jesus, and commissioned the construction of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, which became the holiest place in Christianity. As a result, Christian pilgrimages to the city became central to the economic and cultural life of Jerusalem, while churches, infirmaries, hospices, and hostels were built on an extensive scale.

Rule by Islam. The next major epoch in Jerusalem's history was its conquest by the adherents of Islam, a new religion born in Arabia. The arrival in Jerusalem in 638 CE of Caliph 'Umar ibn al-Khattab, the second successor to the Prophet Muhammad and the Islamic caliph, opened an era of Muslim rule in the city that, excluding an interruption during the period of the Crusades, lasted for over 1,300 years until the Israeli conquest in 1967. Throughout its history Jerusalem has been of little military significance in terms of strategic location or vital resources, and its succeeding conquests were mainly for religious purposes. In Islam, Jerusalem was the first qibla, the direction to face during the prayers that Muslims are obliged to carry out five times a day; it was also the destination of Muhammad's mystical "night journey" and the site where it is believed he ascended briefly to heaven, both events being recorded in the Quran. Early Islam was renowned for its inclusiveness, and the caliph 'Umar made an agreement with the city's Christian population that in exchange for the payment of a poll tax, their property, churches, and personal safety would be assured. Jews were allowed to return to Jerusalem for pilgrimage purposes only, but over time more and more began to settle in the city. Between 685 and 709 CE the DOME OF THE ROCK and the AL-AQSA MOSQUE were built, possibly on the site of the Jewish Temple, in an enclosure that became known as the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF. Jerusalem is the third holiest city in Islam after Mecca and Medina.

Subsequent Muslim rulers elevated the status of Jerusalem. The Umayyads, for example, drew pilgrims away from Mecca, where their political rivals held sway, and enhanced their own political position by emphasizing the holiness of Jerusalem. Up until the eleventh century the praises of Jerusalem, collectively known as the fada'il al-quds, were sung, and it became known as the bayt al-maqdis, or the House of Holiness, from which the Arabic name for the city, al-Quds, is derived. The rise of the Abbasids in 750 CE and the subsequent transfer of the seat of the caliphate from Damascus to Baghdad led to a relative decline in the importance of Jerusalem. However, the fortunes of Jerusalem as a religious city in general did not suffer, because Christians and Jews were allowed additional freedoms. The caliph Harun al-Rashid, for example, opened diplomatic relations with Charlemagne that led to the construction of many new buildings in Jerusalem in order to cater to Christian pilgrims. Similarly, during the Muslim Fatimid dynasty, as Cairo became more important to Islam, the number of Muslim pilgrims to Jerusalem decreased, and Christians and Jews became involved in the government and administration of the city—so much so that, in approximately 985 CE, the celebrated Muslim geographer al-Muqaddasi observed that the Christian holy days marked the rhythm of the year for the Muslim population as well.

Increasing Christian pilgrimage continued to have a considerable impact on the city and to cause disaffection among the Muslims. For example, in 1065 CE nearly 12,000 pilgrims, a number that exceeded the native inhabitants of the city, arrived on a mass pilgrimage. By the late tenth century and throughout the eleventh century, the Muslim domination of Jerusalem weakened, and by 1099 CE, Crusader armies had laid siege to its gates and entered the city—a period that was inaugurated by the mass slaughter and expulsion of its existing Muslim and Jewish inhabitants.

Period of construction. The Crusader Kingdom of Jerusalem lasted for approximately 100 years and saw a massive program of construction. The remains of some sixty-one churches have been found dating from this era. With Jerusalem's capture by Salah al-Din (SALADIN, the commander of the caliph's armies) in 1187 CE, this era, known as the Muslim Ayyubid period, was marked by an enormous investment in the construction of houses, markets, public baths, and pilgrim hostels. Large waqfs (Muslim religious endowments) brought income into the city and provided funds for refurbishing the al-Haram ash-Sharif. For the greater part of the thirteenth century, Jerusalem lacked any strategic or military value for the Ayyubid leaders, who were beset by their internecine struggles. However, Jerusalem's importance as an Islamic sacred place returned under the next dynasty, that of the Muslim MAMLUKS, who ruled from approximately 1250 to 1517. The Mamluks used the city as a home for exiled and retired princes and dignitaries, and gave large and wealthy endowments. As a result, Mamluk monumental building attained a level of rare architectural magnificence, which in the twentieth century contributed to Jerusalem being listed as a World Heritage Site by UNESCO. A bureaucracy was set up to introduce some coherence into all the endowments that were being made, and this became the basis of the continuity of Muslim presence in the city to this day. An increase in Muslim pilgrimages to Jerusalem contributed to its economy. The sanctity of Jerusalem to Islam was reinforced through writings of poets and religious scholars; at least thirty fada'il (cardinal virtues) can be traced to this period. In addition, the small Jewish community in the city, as well as the Christians, attained what was known as dhimmi status under the Mamluks, meaning they were recognized and protected as religious minorities, and they were allowed to own property and set up business enterprises.

The Mamluks were followed by the Muslim OTTOMANS, whose rule in Jerusalem was the longest virtually unbroken dynasty, lasting until the twentieth century. Originally Turks from Central Asia, the Ottomans occupied Jerusalem in 1517 CE, with Sultan Selim receiving the keys to the Dome of the Rock and the al-Aqsa Mosque. The Ottomans were responsible for the construction of the city walls standing today. In 1551 the largest waqf in Palestine, the Khasski Sultan Waqf, was set up to raise money for charity and other purposes. Much of Ottoman economic life in Jerusalem was based on religion. Revenue from the pilgrim industry, and endowments and bequests to the Islamic, Christian, and Jewish communities, sustained a city that was some distance from ports and the trade routes of the coastal plain and lacked natural resources or a manufacturing base.

During the Ottoman period significant developments laid the foundations for Jerusalem as a modern city. First was the reassertion of a Christian and European presence in the city. From the signing of the first "capitulation" treaty in 1535 CE with FRANCE to the arrival of British general Allenby at Jaffa Gate in 1917, European involvement and interference in the affairs of Jerusalem began to advance slowly but significantly. The capitulation treaties gave different European countries various powers over the administration of Christian holy places, which they exercised either through the churches under their tutelage or through their consuls. By the late nineteenth century the French and British consuls had considerable influence over political developments in Jerusalem.

Second was the intervention of the state in the regulation of religious life. Violent, bloody clashes between different denominations periodically erupted during the Ottoman era and were severe enough that the sultan in Istanbul was obliged to intervene. These interventions eventually produced an edict issued by Sultan Uthman III in 1757 CE that codified the conduct of ritual and the maintenance of the holy places, which became known as the "Status Quo."

During the nineteenth century, Jerusalem developed as a major administrative center in the region. Following a brief interlude of Egyptian rule from 1830 to 1840, minority religious groups and foreigners were allowed relatively greater freedom by the Ottomans. When they regained power in Jerusalem, the Ottomans made it the administrative capital of the province of Jerusalem. This was both a recognition of the city's religious and political importance and an attempt to exert closer control over its affairs by making the city directly accountable to the Ottoman central government in Istanbul. However, despite this reform, Ottoman state power weakened, creating greater opportunities for European intervention. Britain, for example, took on the protection of Jews in the city as a means of furthering its influence.

Modern Developments

By the beginning of World War I, Jerusalem had become the largest city in Palestine. The transfer of political and military power to the British in 1917 hastened its transformation into a more European city, in terms of both physical appearance and demographic composition and culture. In addition, for the first time a political territory approximately congruent with the geographical area known as Palestine was established; not since the Crusader period had Jerusalem been the administrative and political capital of an integrated region.

Nevertheless, during the BRITISH MANDATE the dominant Palestinian Muslim community and the major Jerusalemite families were cut off politically from the Islamic hinterland. To some extent this loss was balanced by the establishment of a SUPREME MUSLIM COUNCIL in 1921, which had jurisdictional powers over Muslim religious (Shari'a) courts and control over the vast array of Islamic waqfs. The geographical and political separation of Palestine from the larger Arabic-Islamic world allowed for a much more unified and centralized administrative system of the Muslim community, which enhanced the power and influence of the elite Jerusalem landowning families that dominated these structures. The loss of Muslim dominance over Jerusalem in general political terms was partially offset by a greater direct involvement in the administration at a local level. This, along with the growth in the Christian institutional presence and the exponential growth in the Jewish population by the end of the British Mandate, explains to some extent the hostilities in 1948 that tore Jerusalem in half.

The tripling of the Jewish population in Jerusalem between 1922 and 1946, from 34,000 to 99,000, which in 1946 was just less than half the total population of the city, was a direct consequence of British support for ZIONISM and the establishment of a Jewish “homeland.” Disputes over access to holy sites and the balance of political representation in the Municipal Council became the main flashpoints in the relations between Zionist Jews and Palestinian Muslims and Christians, whose influence with the British administration was gradually eclipsed by Jewish demographic preponderance. The resulting communal tensions led the British in 1947 to turn the issue of Palestine over to the UNITED NATIONS, which proposed in UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 181 the partition of Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state, with Jerusalem under a permanent UN trusteeship—namely, the creation of an international zone, or corpus separatum, around Jerusalem that would be administered by the United Nations for a ten-year period, after which there would be a referendum to determine its future. The Palestinians did not accept Resolution 181 because it gave more than half of Palestine to the Jews, and therefore rejected the internationalization proposals for Jerusalem. Following the withdrawal of British forces in 1948 and the inter-communal fighting that accompanied it, the city was severed into two parts: an eastern Jordanian-held (East Jerusalem) sector and a western Israeli-held sector (West Jerusalem).

Over the nineteen years from 1948 to 1967, when Jordan occupied East Jerusalem, its population remained surprisingly static, despite the thousands of REFUGEES absorbed from the western part of the city and a high birthrate. The reason for the stasis was the large number of Palestinians who emigrated to the Gulf States and elsewhere, in search of work, security, and a stable future. In addition, the Jordanian government was unwilling to see a Palestinian Jerusalem develop at the expense of the Jordanian capital in Amman and relocated its administrative offices to Amman. The city fell back onto its traditional economic base of pilgrimage, which in the postwar era took the form of tourism. Deprived of access to the ports and agricultural wealth of the coastal plain and prevented from developing as the political center of Palestinian nationalism, East Jerusalem declined.

In contrast, Israeli West Jerusalem was made the capital of the new state. To overcome its geographic disadvantages (the loss of its hinterland and access to the Arabian interior), the government invested heavily in the city in order to attract IMMIGRATION and promote employment. Most government offices and national institutions, such as the Knesset, a new university, and the Great Synagogue, were built there. Israel had captured the main WATER supply to Jerusalem, and power was transmitted from sources on the coastal plain. As a result of these activities, the population of West Jerusalem doubled to 200,000 Israeli Jews from 1948 to 1967. However, Jerusalem’s economy was dependent upon government and public sector employment. With no access to the holy sites, it had little attraction for tourists, and its frontier-like status deterred private investment for industrial enterprises.

The concluding phase of this historical background is the Israeli capture of East Jerusalem during the 1967 WAR with the army’s entry into the OLD CITY and the placing of an Israeli flag on the roof of the Dome of the Rock—emblematic images of the latest period.

New Regime: Jerusalem after 1967. On 11 June 1967, the Israeli government annexed East Jerusalem to the Israeli state. On 27 June 1967, Israel approved an amendment to the Law and Administration Ordinance as follows: “The jurisdiction and administration of the State shall extend to any area in the Land of Israel designated by the government by order.” A second amendment to the Municipalities Ordinance Law allowed the prime minister to enlarge by proclamation the area of the municipality by inclusion of an area designated by order. Concurrently, an Israeli ministerial committee was formed in 1967, and its first decision was to declare an acceptable demographic ratio of 76 percent Jews to 24 percent Palestinians in the city.

Israel also immediately redefined the borders of East Jerusalem. Under Jordanian rule the city had covered 6.5 square kilometers (2.3 square miles); Israel expanded it to 64 square kilometers (24.7 square miles), or some 64,000 dunums (16,000 acres). The newly designated area of “East Jerusalem” contained twenty-eight Palestinian villages together with their grazing and farming lands. According to Cheshin, Hutman, and Melamed, Israel had “purposely” drawn the new city borders “to include the maximum territory possible, with the minimum possible Palestinian population.” They described it thus: “The government simply issued orders to expropriate [land that was owned by Palestinians] . . . taking advantage of a legal system in Israel that gives [Arab] owners little recourse against the authorities taking away private property. . . . In January 1968, Israel carried out its first major expropriation . . . some 3,345 dunum (826 acres) were taken from . . . Arab landowners to build the Jewish [SETTLEMENT] of Ramot Eshkol; 486 dunum (120 acres) were expropriated for [a second settlement]. Four months later another 900 dunum (220 acres). . . . But Israel’s land grab in 1968 was nothing compared with the one that occurred at the end of August 1970, when eight separate expropriation orders were carried out, covering 10,000 dunum (2,470 acres) of land.”

By 1970, at the end of the first three years of Occupation, Israel had expropriated more than 16,000 dunums (3,950 acres) of Palestinian land to construct East Jerusalem. Following the land confiscations from 1967 to 1970 there was a ten-year hiatus, until 1980 when Israel seized 4,400 dunums (1,090 acres) from Palestinian landholders. The next confiscation was in April 1991, with the seizure of 1,850 dunums (457 acres) of Jabal Abu Ghanem. Today, Palestinians inhabit small areas in East Jerusalem, constituting only 7,000 dunums (1,730 acres), or 10 percent of the land. Conversely, by the year 2000, Israel had transferred approximately 180,000 Jewish settlers to East Jerusalem in twelve major settlements. No new Palestinian neighborhoods have been established since 1967.

In addition to confiscating LAND, constructing settlements and increasing the number of Jews in the newly expanded borders of Jerusalem, and concomitantly greatly reducing the spatial area in which Palestinians are allowed access, Israel has employed a variety of policies to encourage Palestinians to leave the city, including withholding of municipal services, coercive unilateral measures such as HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and restrictive demographic and planning policies designed to ensure an Israeli Jewish majority on both sides of the city. In addition, the Israeli government has enacted policies designed to obscure the reality of Israeli military and political dominance over the city so Jerusalem is perceived as a peaceful city under benevolent and just Israeli rule. Questions of citizenship, electoral participation, and the application of Israeli laws have all been applied with qualification and tacit anomalies to smooth the impact of Israeli rule. Palestinians in East Jerusalem have residency, not citizenship, of Israel; they are permitted to vote in ELECTIONS for the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL but not for the Knesset. Not all Israeli laws have been extended to East Jerusalem, particularly in the banking, religious, and commercial sectors. Indeed the very borders of the city themselves have been obscured by ad hoc administrative measures. The Armistice Line that once divided the city has ceased to be prominent as new Israeli settlements straddle both sides and the provision of municipal services to them has further obscured the relevance of the extended Israeli municipal borders. More recently, the ring of settlements outside the new municipal borders of Jerusalem and in the WEST BANK have created the concept of a GREATER JERUSALEM and a METROPOLITAN JERUSALEM. By blurring the distinction of what is Israel and what is the West Bank and by blurring the concept and practice of Israeli sovereignty in this way, incremental change can be introduced without provoking overwhelming resistance. Nevertheless, these Israeli actions were forcibly imposed; its Occupation of the eastern section of the city has still not been accepted by the Palestinians, by the international community, or by Israel’s Arab neighbors. Over the years of Occupation, successive Israeli governments may have consolidated and extended their military control over both parts of the city, but they have not succeeded in putting to rest the final status of Jerusalem.

Politics of demography. The issue of DEMOGRAPHY has been central to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict from its inception, and demographic changes in Jerusalem are a reflection of this broader struggle. While Jerusalem is predominantly an Arab city, the Jewish population increased during the last century of the Ottoman period, although precise figures are difficult to establish. Nevertheless the political implications of Jerusalem having a sizable Jewish minority are important. Palestinian Arabs were, at the early stage of the Zionist colonization venture, the overwhelming majority in the areas that became

Map 26. East Jerusalem Closures

© UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), Geneva, reprinted with permission.

Palestine. However, in the city of Jerusalem itself, which became the administrative capital of Mandatory Palestine, Jews were beginning to make their presence felt in both spatial and political terms. At the same time, the increase in the Jewish population in the city did not lead to a corresponding increase in Jewish landownership. Palestinian Arabs continued to own most of the land in and around Jerusalem.

The main Jewish areas of residence were also in the western parts of the city. Neighborhoods erected along communal lines expanded, and infilling linked them to each other and to the central business district along the Jaffa Road running westward from the Old City. The Old City saw a relative decline in the Jewish population as living opportunities increased outside its walls. While the total population of the Old City increased from 22,000 in 1922 to approximately 34,000 in 1944, the Jewish population there dropped from 5,600 in 1922 to approximately 3,000 in the 1940s. By 1947 only 2 percent of the Jewish population of the city was in the Old City. They were replaced by Palestinian Arab traders and their families from the HEBRON area, confirming the essentially Arab and Islamic nature of the Old City.

Often overlooked is the rise in the population of Palestinian Christians in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. By 1948 nearly half of the Christian Arab population of Jerusalem lived in the western half of the city. Wealthy and educated Christian Arab families resided in the southwest sector of Jerusalem, just outside the Old City, in places such as Upper and Lower Baqa'a, Katamon, Talbiyye, and an area known as the German Colony. In fact, during the British Mandate period, the Christian community attained the highest number of inhabitants ever recorded for Christian residents in the Old City, that is, 31,300, 17,528 of whom were Palestinian Arab Christians. The 13,772 remainder were mostly European Christian diplomats, educators, missionaries, and churchmen. These wealthy suburbs of Jerusalem fell to the Israelis in 1948, and their Palestinian residents were dispossessed.

During the period between 1948 and 1967 the Jewish population of Israeli-held West Jerusalem fluctuated. Immediately after the 1948 WAR it fell to about 58,000 inhabitants, but through heavy government investment and directed immigration policies it rose quickly, so that on the eve of the 1967 War it had nearly quadrupled to approximately 193,000. We should note that virtually the entire Palestinian Arab population of the areas that became West Jerusalem fled or were evicted. Thus, some 28,000 Palestinians were made refugees. In Jordanian-held East Jerusalem there was an initial corresponding rise in population from approximately 45,000 to 70,000 inhabitants as a result of the war. However, as noted, this number remained relatively static.

Since 1967, Jerusalem has seen a further dramatic rise in population. (See Table 3.) To attain control over East Jerusalem and the annexed areas of the West Bank and to prevent any possibility of these areas becoming part of a Jordanian or Palestinian state, the government had to increase the Israeli Jewish population substantially and place them in the eastern, Palestinian-inhabited part of the city. The Israeli government sought to consolidate its hold over the eastern section of the city by encouraging the settlement of Israeli Jews there. The growth of these settlements and the political and legal issues surrounding them are well documented and need not be repeated here. From the early 1990s onward, there have been more Israeli Jews than Palestinians living in the eastern part of the city.

Two objectives were achieved by these policies. First, as the Israeli Jewish settlements spread and became more established, Palestinian areas, particularly in and around the Old City, became enclaves within a modern Israeli city, which in turn hampered their mobility, restricted areas for Palestinian residential and institutional development, and undermined the original Arab and Islamic culture of the city. Second, the Palestinian enclaves themselves became increasingly cut off from the West Bank hinterland, affecting their economic development and reducing their role in Palestinian society. By the year 2000, Israel had transferred approximately 180,000 Jewish settlers to East Jerusalem in eleven major settlements. In 2007 the total population of Jerusalem was estimated at 743,000, with approximately 505,000 Jews, 223,000 Muslims, and 14,900 Christians.

The effects of these settlement policies are exacerbated by two supplementary policies. The first is the CLOSURE of Jerusalem to West Bank and GAZA STRIP Palestinians. Imposed in 1992, the closure is enforced by ROADBLOCKS and CHECKPOINTS that ring the city, and Palestinians without a Jerusalem residency PERMIT have to obtain special

Table 3 Residents of Jerusalem According to Population Groups in Selected Years, 1967–2002

Year	Number of Residents (thousands)			Percentage
	Palestinians	Israelis	Total	Palestinians	Israelis
1967	68.6	197.7	266.3	25.8	74.2
1970	76.2	215.5	291.7	26.1	73.9
1975	96.1	259.4	355.5	27.0	73.0
1980	114.8	292.3	407.1	28.2	71.8
1985	130.0	327.7	457.7	28.4	71.6
1990	146.3	378.2	524.5	27.9	72.1
1995	174.4	417.0	591.4	29.5	70.5
1998	200.1	433.6	633.7	31.6	68.4
2002	221.9	458.6	680.5	32.6	67.4

permission to enter. This has dramatically contributed to the separation between East Jerusalem and the West Bank described above, disrupting economic, cultural, religious, and political activities in East Jerusalem and the Old City. The second policy is the withdrawal of residency permits and the confiscation of a Jerusalem IDENTITY CARD from those Palestinians who cannot prove that Jerusalem is their “center of life.” Many Palestinian Jerusalemites had moved out of the city in order to seek better housing conditions, as the prospect of receiving a building permit in East Jerusalem is virtually impossible. At the same time they retained their residency permit and the ownership or tenancy of their property in East Jerusalem or the Old City. The main reason for this is that as Jerusalem residents they are entitled to Israeli NATIONAL INSURANCE INSTITUTE (NII) benefits such as child allowances.

However, in 1996, the new Israeli government, led by Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, in conjunction with the more anti-Palestinian mayor of Jerusalem, EHUD OLMERT, began a policy of withdrawing residency permits from individuals who had moved outside the municipal borders, compounding an already complex problem of FAMILY REUNIFICATION. By September 1999, 2,812 residency permits had been withdrawn. However, the policy appeared to backfire. The major effect was to induce those wishing to keep their NII benefits and access to schools and hospitals in East Jerusalem to seek housing in East Jerusalem. The result was that tens of thousands of families relocated back into Palestinian areas where they were able. This development is confirmed by population figures of the Old City where there is still Palestinian dominance. (See Table 4.)

This migratory drive back to East Jerusalem was accelerated with the construction of the Separation BARRIER or Wall. Many Palestinian families sought to find accommodation on the west side of the wall to ensure access to services and employment. Precise figures are unavailable, but in 2006 an Israeli think tank, the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, produced figures that showed that the hitherto Israeli goal of maintaining an overall population ratio for the city of 70 percent Israeli Jews to 30 percent Palestinian Arabs had been breached. And, indeed, their projections showed that if current trends continued, there would be parity between the two ethnic groups by 2035, in which case the Israeli policy of engineering Jewish demographic dominance in the city would have failed.

Table 4 Population of the Old City by Religious Group, 31 December 2003

Religious Group/ Quarter	Jews	Muslims	Christians	Unclassified	Total
Christian Quarter	143	1,242	3,888	3	5,276
Armenian Quarter	748	504	1,205	4	2,461
Jewish Quarter	1,811	560	12	4	2,387
Muslim Quarter	431	23,461	1,354	2	25,248
Total	3,133	25,767	6,459	13	35,372

Note: All population figures come from the Israeli Central Bureau of Statistics as of 31 December 2003.

Religious Communities

As emphasized above, Jerusalem's main importance lies not in its economic wealth or strategic military significance, but in the centrality of the city to the three monotheistic religions. Over time, it became to different religions the city of the greatest concentration of their holy places. The definition of the term "Holy Place" is of great importance to the history and politics of Jerusalem. Over the centuries, a Holy Place in Jerusalem has accrued a special status. In addition to its role in ritual and worship, it is also exempt from civil legislation and issues such as taxation and HEALTH CARE and safety regulations. As such, the Ottomans, British, Jordanians, and Israelis have all been obliged to recognize limits on their jurisdiction and administrative authority in dealing with them. Thus the designation of a particular site as a Holy Place is of some legal, political, and economic significance.

Historically, the term "Holy Places" did not encompass all the holy sites in the city belonging to the three religions. Initially, it was used by scholars and jurists to refer strictly to the Christian Holy Places listed in a number of Ottoman edicts, in particular the firmans of 1757 and 1852, which laid down a series of ritualistic arrangements known as the Status Quo. The sites mentioned in this context are the Church of the Holy Sepulcher and its dependencies (Old City), the Convent of Dayr al-Sultan (Old City), the Sanctuary of the Ascension (Mount of Olives), the Tomb of the Virgin Mary (near Gethsemane), the Church of the Nativity (BETHLEHEM), the Milk Grotto (Bethlehem), and Shepherd's Field (near Bethlehem).

This definition of "Holy Place" continued until the British Mandate period, during which the authorities extended the list to include the Western or (Wailing) Wall (Jewish, Old City), Rachel's Tomb (Jewish and Muslim, between Jerusalem and Bethlehem), and the Cenacle on Mount Zion (Jewish and Christian, historically administered by a Muslim family). Of note is that this British list introduced non-Christian sites into the collective term "Holy Places." Following UN Resolution 181, a greatly expanded list of Holy Places also came into use. The UN list compiled by the UN CONCILIATION COMMISSION FOR PALESTINE in 1949 added the following sites to the ones already listed. Muslim: Dome of the Rock (Old City), al-Aqsa Mosque (Old City), Mosque of the Ascension, and the Tomb of David. Christian: Church of St. Anne (Old City), Church of St. James (Old City), Church of St. Mark (Old City), House of Caiaphas, and the Pool of Bethesda. Jewish: Tomb of Absalom, Synagogues (some in the Old City, e.g., Hurva synagogue), Bath of Rabbi Ishmael, Pool of Siloam, Cemetery of Mount of Olives, and the Tomb of Zachariah.

This extended UN list of Holy Places is significant in that it is the last list on which there is some international consensus and therefore has the support of INTERNATIONAL LAW. But it must be observed that there are much greater numbers of Christian and Jewish holy sites on the list compared to the relatively few Islamic ones. This is a reflection of the dominance of the UN at that time by Christian powers and supporters of Zionism.

Israeli policies toward the Holy Places and the religious communities in Jerusalem were designed on one level to reassure the international community that Israel would safeguard the existing rights of the communities, access to the Holy Places, and thus preclude any need for external intervention. At the same time, however, Israel's policies also developed in directions that extended the control of the Israeli state in the city, extended the influence of the Jewish religious hierarchy, and curtailed the independence of the non-Jewish communities.

During the early months of the Israeli Occupation, Israeli government policy toward the Muslim and Christian communities and their respective hierarchies revealed this contradiction. Immediately following the Israeli entry into the Old City, the whole Moughrabi quarter close to the Western Wall, including its two mosques, was demolished. In addition, an Israeli police station was installed on the al-Haram ash-Sharif. Neither of these unilateral steps was a continuation of previous arrangements, nor did it receive the consent of the Muslim leadership. These acts also set a precedent for further alteration of the religious Status Quo.

Muslim community. In the first few weeks following the Occupation, the Israeli Ministry of Defense was placed in charge of dealings with the Muslim religious establishment and Muslim HOLY SITES. It was faced with the practicalities of disentangling those parts of the bureaucracy that dealt with the West Bank from those that dealt primarily with Jerusalem and the adjacent areas that were now incorporated into the new Israeli municipal boundaries. Following passage of Israeli legislation (Law and Administration Ordinance, Amendment No. 11, and Municipalities Ordinance, Amendment No. 6), which incorporated East Jerusalem and parts of the West Bank into Israel, the government transferred responsibility to the Ministry of Religious Affairs.

The Religious Ministry, controlled by members of the Orthodox Jewish NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY, embarked upon the aggressive application of Israeli law to these areas. It meant, for example, that the qadis of East Jerusalem would not be allowed to adjudicate on Shari'a matters unless they renounced their Jordanian citizenship and swore allegiance to the state of Israel. In addition, if they accepted these conditions, they would have to accept the amendments to Shari'a law enacted by the Knesset and adopted by the Israeli qadis. Furthermore, all the holy sites that were waqf, that is, the vast majority of them, would be covered by the Israeli ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW of 1950 and be placed under the jurisdiction of the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY. Finally, the ministry would also have the right to censor the Friday sermon delivered in all Old City mosques, including the revered al-Aqsa Mosque. However, as these conditions were not acceptable to the Muslim leadership in Jerusalem, a campaign of resistance was initiated that threatened to destabilize the introduction of Israeli military government in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Therefore, in January 1968 responsibility for Muslim affairs was transferred back to the Ministry of Defense. The result of this move was that the administrative framework established by the Jordanian government remained in operation, provided a relatively advanced degree of autonomy, and has formed the basis of Muslim religious administration in Jerusalem until the present.

Christian communities. For the plethora of Christian communities, accommodation to the Israeli Occupation was not quite so contentious. During the period of the city's partition (1948–1967), Israel officially recognized over twelve different Christian denominations inside Israel. These communities were given freedom to appoint their own clergy, to retain independent administration over church property (save for a number of long-running disputes), to run their own schools, and to have matters of personal status dealt with by their own religious courts. Prior to 1967, the Armistice Lines of 1949 separated ecclesiastical superiors based in Jerusalem from their subordinates, congregations, institutions, and communal assets. They had been able, however, to coordinate activities with their coreligionists in Israel by frequent visits across the lines. Therefore, in 1967 the removal of the frontier through the middle of the city made their life much easier. On the other hand, Christian communities were concerned that the Israeli Occupation of Jerusalem would alter the Status Quo arrangements at their expense. Despite repeated lobbying by church leaders of the Israeli government, the Christian communities in Jerusalem were unable to secure an unequivocal commitment to maintain the Status Quo arrangements and not to intervene in favor of one or another of the Christian denominations or the internal affairs of the denominations. This provided the Israeli government with an important instrument for leverage over the Christian communities and meant that their relations with the Israeli state were continually subject to pressures and piecemeal agreements.

The Jewish community. The Jewish community also experienced considerable change brought about by the Israeli Occupation of the Old City. During most of the period under review the Ministry of Religious Affairs had been a virtual fiefdom of the National Religious Party, a hawkish, largely ASHKENAZI party of Jewish Orthodoxy. In the 1980s and 1990s the ministry came under the influence of GUSH EMUNIM, the militant settler movement. One of the most important changes at this time was the enlargement and reconstruction of the Jewish Quarter in an attempt to slow the rate of growth of Palestinians in the other quarters of the Old City. The ministry has been able to secure considerable autonomy over its activities around the Western Wall area, including the long-term project of tunneling along and beneath the wall to the north under Palestinian residences, which has caused some of them to collapse. This has brought the ministry into conflict not only with the Palestinian residents but also with the Israeli Department of Antiquities. In addition, disagreements over the best use to make of the razed Moughrabi quarter have led to the paralysis of plans for its development as a Jewish Holy Place, with the result that it remains an open plaza with only security and toilet facilities installed. Most contentious has been the tunneling along the Western Wall and the edge of the al-Haram ash-Sharif. When the HASMONEAN TUNNEL was opened to the public in 1996 with an entry in the heart of the Muslim Quarter, it provoked a riot and major violence between Palestinian and Israeli security forces and temporarily derailed the OSLO PROCESS. Continuing support by the ministry and other agencies in the Israeli government for militant Israeli SETTLER GROUPS and their colonizing activities in the vicinity of the Haram have led to Palestinian suspicions that there is covert government support for an Israeli takeover of the al-Haram ash-Sharif.

Infrastructure and Physical Changes

Relative to other important cities in the region, such as Cairo, Damascus, and Istanbul, Jerusalem is a small compact city based around the Old City. Its physical shape did not change dramatically until the second quarter of the twentieth century.

In the sixteenth century, the Ottoman sultan Suleiman the Magnificent built the walls that still enclose the Old City today, and it was not until the end of the nineteenth century and the early part of the twentieth that any notable construction took place outside the Old City walls. This recent change was undertaken to accommodate the influx of new Jewish immigrants and the establishment of Jerusalem as an administrative center for the British Mandatory government. These factors were further emphasized in 1948, when West Jerusalem became the political capital of the new state of Israel and government offices and other national administrations were established there. In addition, the new Israeli government sought to broaden the economic base of the western part of the city to consolidate its hold on what was essentially, prior to 1967, a frontier town. It created educational and medical institutions and industrial zones on the urban peripheries that served to stimulate the urban spread of Jerusalem. Nevertheless, trade and commerce were discouraged by its proximity to a hostile border, and its major industry, tourism, was stymied by the lack of access to the important religious sites in the Old City.

The period of Jordanian government rule in the eastern part of the city (1948–1967) also left a distinctive imprint upon urban development in Jerusalem. As a result of the Armistice Agreements with Israel, only 11 percent of the former municipal area of Jerusalem came into Jordanian hands. While the Jordanians secured control over the prime religious sites in the Old City, Palestinian Arab inhabitants of the city lost access to the main commercial area along Jaffa Road, to their affluent suburbs with good-quality housing in the western part of the city, and to many of the key services they were used to receiving. The impact of these factors was heightened by poor economic opportunities in Jordan. At the same time, however, the eastern part had an important advantage over the western part. East Jerusalem's tourist economy and its ancillary services benefited from the presence of the key Holy Places in the Old City. Indeed, the perceived threat to the Muslim shrines of the Dome of the Rock and the al-Aqsa Mosque as a result of the conflict with Israel increased Muslim pilgrimage to East Jerusalem.

Zoning and housing. Since 1967, in addition to its visible and constant military presence and its aggressive settlement construction, the main instrument by which the Israeli government has secured its control over East Jerusalem has been through the imposition of ZONING LAWS AND REGULATIONS. Through highly restrictive and discriminatory zoning policies, Israel has ensured that Palestinian areas of residence are tightly constricted, while areas where there has been no building have been given special designations that have served as a reserve for the expansion of settlements for the exclusive use of Israeli Jews.

Zoning laws have primarily applied to the Palestinian neighborhoods in the HOLY BASIN, the areas of East Jerusalem outside the Old City—for example, SILWAN, RAS AL-AMUD, SHAYK JARRAH, and ABU DIS, among others. Although Israel has expanded the Jewish Quarter in the Old City at the expense of the Muslim Quarter, there is no overall zoning plan. Settler groups, however, have been acquiring properties in the Muslim and Christian quarters methodically and with alacrity. On the other hand, Palestinians wishing to build a house, enlarge an existing one, or open a shop in the Old City must obtain a permit from the municipal authority on an individual basis. These requests have been typically denied.

A Regional Planning Board was established to review and evaluate all development projects. According to Cheshin, Hutman, and Melamed, “The board was the guardian of the limitation system . . . [and] was famous for blocking development projects in Palestinian communities in East Jerusalem.” For example, Israeli planners zoned vast tracks of land as “GREEN AREAS,” making them “off-limits to development.” Ostensibly these areas were intended to protect the environment and enhance the beauty of the city through open views of the landscape. In reality, however, green areas have served as a means of containment and demarcation as well as land reserves for future Jewish settlement. For example, Jabal Abu Ghanem was originally zoned “green” to prevent the neighboring Palestinian villages of Sur Baher and Um Tuba from expanding. Later it was “rezoned” for construction of the HAR HOMA SETTLEMENT. Other areas were left “unzoned,” but here, too, Palestinian housing and development were prohibited.

Housing restrictions. Another zoning restriction placed on Palestinians (but not on Israeli Jews) is that building—residential or commercial—is permitted only in areas that are already built up; it is prohibited in vacant areas. Buildings may be no more than two stories high. There is a strict limitation on the number of dwellings that can be built in any given area as well as on the height and size. Thus, for example, while a Jewish Jerusalemite owning a plot of 50 square meters (538 square feet) can build an eight-story building of 200 square meters (2,152 square feet), a Palestinian Jerusalemite owning the same-size plot can only build a two-story building of 50 square meters (538 square feet). Additionally, as B’Tselem documented, “The Israeli authorities prepared town plans which, instead of developing Palestinian neighborhoods, prevent such development. Over a third of East Jerusalem lacks town-planning schemes, making construction impossible. . . . In fact, Palestinian building is allowed in only 7 percent of East Jerusalem.” Thus the municipality rejects most building permits either because of “zoning plans” or because the land is claimed by Israel as “absentee property.” Moreover, projects that are submitted to the relevant authorities for approval experience inordinate delays—often as long as ten years—before receiving an answer.

Permits. Permits are an important means by which Israel limits the development of Palestinian neighborhoods and prevents the construction of homes. Between 1967 and 1999, only 15 percent of all new housing units in Jerusalem were built for Palestinians in East Jerusalem (i.e., 21,490 housing units for Palestinians as compared to 122,376 housing units for Jews).

In consequence, considering the Palestinian growth rate since 1967, there is an acute housing shortage and extreme residential overcrowding among East Jerusalem Palestinians. In 1996 in East Jerusalem as a whole, there were 43,000 homes in Jewish neighborhoods (all built on expropriated Palestinian land), compared to 28,000 homes in Palestinian neighborhoods. The housing density of the Palestinian community in Jerusalem is 2.1 persons per room, twice as high as that of Jewish residents of the city. Some 40 percent of the houses are severely substandard, and about half of all residents rent their homes. (The population density in the Muslim Quarter of the Old City is 487 persons per hectare [or 197 persons per acre: one hectare = 2.47 acres] compared to the Jewish Quarter, where it is 183 persons per hectare, or 74 persons per acre.)

Zoning and housing policies plus the permit system, coupled with the demographic policies outlined earlier, illustrate several means by which the Israeli government has sought to curtail any Palestinian growth in the city. These measures have been backed up by the extensive use of house demolitions and land confiscations to prevent unregistered Palestinian construction.

Discrimination in municipal services. The desire to have a Jewish majority in East Jerusalem and to encourage Palestinian emigration is also reflected in the highly discriminatory disbursement of resources for municipal services to the Jewish and Palestinian sectors of the city. Palestinian residents of Jerusalem pay the same amount of taxes—in some cases they pay more—as do Jewish residents. The weighty arnona (occupancy) tax is especially burdensome, but it is paid into the National Insurance Institute and is intended to provide benefits and services. Yet Palestinians receive a very small proportion of services relative to what they pay in taxes. For instance, there has been virtually no municipal or government funding allocated to Palestinian neighborhoods. After forty years of Occupation, entire Palestinian neighborhoods are not hooked up to sewage systems, do not have paved roads or sidewalks, and do not have regular electricity—indeed, lengthy blackouts are typical. Phone service is sporadic. Houses are grossly overcrowded and severely substandard. The poverty rate is high, at an estimated 45 to 60 percent of the population. Cheshin, Hutman, and Melamed, all former Jerusalem municipal employees, write: “There are Arab neighborhoods where human waste literally pours out into the streets. Some Arab neighborhoods do not have trash pick-up and debris piles up in abandoned lots. The streets in many Arab neighborhoods have not even been given names by the local authorities [making mail delivery, among other things, impossible]. . . . Those that have been named still do not have signs. . . . Some East Jerusalem neighborhoods still do not have proper water lines.”

The following set of comparisons demonstrates that Jerusalem is not a “united” city. In fact, Jerusalem is distinctly divided between a modernized Jewish sector and a backward Palestinian sector. In 1998, according to the (Israeli) Jerusalem Statistical Yearbook, there were 433,600 Jews in all of Jerusalem (east and west) and 200,100 Palestinians. (Israel does not disaggregate east from west because it considers the city “unified.”) This is a ratio of 68.4 percent Jewish to 31.6 percent Palestinian—not quite the desired ideal, but close. There are virtually no Palestinians in West Jerusalem, although there are some 200,000 Israeli settlers in East Jerusalem. Put differently, services for “Jerusalem Jews” include Jews in both the eastern settlements and western sectors, whose combined total makes up 68.4 percent of the total population. East Jerusalem Palestinians constitute 31.6 percent. Palestinians pay 31 percent of the taxes, but receive only 2–12 percent of the services of the municipal budget. On a per capita basis, the city spends six times more on each Jewish resident than it does on each Palestinian resident. The paucity of services, benefits, and basic municipal obligations is a stark illustration of one aspect of Israel’s efforts to induce Palestinians to leave the city.

The monopoly on and discriminatory practices related to service provision have resulted in some unintended consequences. For example, the gradual and incremental interference by the Israeli government meant that the independent Palestinian Jerusalem Electric Company slowly lost its customer base and was consigned to being a contractor of the Israel Electric Company. Fierce resistance by Palestinians at interference of their EDUCATION system led to the Israeli acceptance of a Palestinian curriculum taught in municipality schools in East Jerusalem. Similarly, an independent Palestinian health sector has emerged and expanded in East Jerusalem with the assistance of religious groups and NGO support, despite attempts to bring it in line with Israeli regulations. Finally, the complexity of service provision in the Jerusalem area can be seen in the way the Israeli municipality came into dispute with the Israeli military government of the West Bank over the operations of the Jerusalem Water Undertaking (Ramallah District), the JWU. Due to the enlargement of the municipal borders, the northern suburbs of Jerusalem along the road to Ramallah were supplied by the JWU. Both the JWU and its Palestinian customers inside the enlarged municipality insisted that their agreements should stand. They were supported by the military government, which did not wish to see the JWU being forced to cease operations in the Ramallah area simply because of the loss of its main customers to the south. The municipality of Jerusalem was obliged to back down and negotiated an agreement with the JWU in which it would continue to supply water to existing and new Palestinian customers and be able to purchase water from the Israeli water agency, Mekorot, via the municipality. New Israeli settlements such as Neve Ya’acov would be the responsibility of the municipality. Thus, there are a number of functional borders based on service provision that are not congruent with the political borders of the municipality.

From these examples it is possible to understand that on some levels, Israel has failed to incorporate East Jerusalem into the Israeli state despite its declarations to the contrary. In spite of nearly forty years of Occupation, Jerusalem is still not like the other mixed Jewish-Palestinian cities of Israel, such as Acre, RAMLA, and LYDDA. Indeed, adding to the difficulties of incorporating a hostile population have been ideological factors intrinsic to the Zionist project. There is a great reluctance to expend effort and resources on non-Jewish population groups. One result of this abdication of responsibility is that other actors—political parties, Islamic and church groups, community groups, nongovernmental organizations, and so on—have stepped into the vacuum and provided institutional alternatives to the Israeli state and municipal structures. To this extent there is a fundamental contradiction in Israeli approaches to the city: the intention to secure control of the city is undermined by the ideological preference for Jewish exclusiveness.

Barrier Wall

A more recent development that seriously affects Palestinian Jerusalem is Israel’s construction of a separation Barrier through the suburbs of the city. In effect, the wall is a repartitioning (of the original 1948 partition) of the city, but the line has been moved further east to ensure that significant amounts of territory acquired in 1967 remain under Israeli military control, pending a FINAL STATUS agreement with the Palestinians or, more likely, to preempt the possibility that these areas will even be open for negotiation—Israel’s long-standing “facts on the ground” policy.

Comprising over twenty kilometers (twelve miles) of concrete walls with heights varying between four and nine meters (thirteen and thirty feet) and another fifty-seven kilometers (thirty-five miles) of fencing, the Barrier will separate 80,000 Jerusalemites on the West Bank side of the Barrier from families, schools, hospitals, religious sites, and commercial networks, among other things. In the education sphere alone, the wall, not yet complete, has cut off some 18,000 pupils and 800 teachers from their schools. One report concluded that 17 percent of those who have moved from their residences in occupied East Jerusalem did so because of the effects of the wall. Similarly, the wall cuts off 90 percent of households on the eastern side from health services in Jerusalem’s center. In the four years since the beginning of the Barrier’s construction in 2002, 20 percent of households have been divided, which is expected to increase the internal displacement of Palestinians. Already 64 percent of Palestinians in East Jerusalem may be obliged to change their place of residence. According to John Dugard, UN special rapporteur on human rights in the Palestinian territories, the Barrier results in the “forced displacement of Palestinians,” which sustains “Israel’s policy of population TRANSFER.”

The Barrier cuts through the middle of many Palestinian neighborhoods, separates neighborhoods from each other, and isolates the central Jerusalem suburbs from the West Bank and Palestinian hinterland. The government’s plan calls for the separation Barrier to surround East Jerusalem and detach it from the rest of the West Bank. B’Tselem outlines the relevant decisions and approvals to begin construction that were made in three principal stages:

1. In June 2002, as part of the decision in principle to build the whole separation Barrier, the government approved Stage A, which included two sections north and south of Jerusalem. The northern section extends for some 10 kilometers (6.2 miles) from the Ofer army base on the west to the Qalandiya checkpoint on the east. The southern section, also about 10 kilometers (6.2 miles) in length, runs from the Tunnels Road on the west to Beit Sahur (south of Har Homa) on the east. The two sections were completed in July 2003.
2. In September 2003, the Political-Security Cabinet approved the Barrier’s route in the other areas around Jerusalem, except for the section near the MA’ALE ADUMIM SETTLEMENT. These approvals were made in the framework of construction of Stages 3 and 4 of the entire Barrier. The approval related to three subsections. One section is 17 kilometers (10.6 miles) long, extending from the eastern edge of Beit Sahur on the south to the eastern edge of al-‘Eizariya on the north. The other section covers a distance of 14 kilometers (8.7 miles), from the southern edge of ‘Anata to the Qalandiya checkpoint on the north. The third section is also 14 kilometers (8.7 miles) and surrounds five villages northwest of Jerusalem (Bir-Nabala, al-Judeireh, al-Jib, Beit Hanina al-Balad, and Nebi Samuel), which are situated near the city’s municipal border. Most of the Barrier in these sections will be a wall. The progress in building these sections varies: some parts have been completed while in others work has not begun.
3. In February 2005, the Israeli government approved an entirely new route for the Barrier following the High Court of Justice’s decision in June 2004 that voided a section of the Barrier on the grounds that it disproportionately harmed Palestinians in the area. However, in the Jerusalem area the route largely remained as it was, except for an addition of 40 kilometers (24.8 miles) that will surround the Ma’ale Adumim Settlement and settlements near it (Kfar Adumim, Anatot, Nofei Prat, and Qedar). The government did not, however, approve commencement of work on this section and conditioned confirmation on “further legal approval.”

The dominant principle in setting the route of the Barrier in the Jerusalem area is to run the route along the city’s municipal border; however, there are two sections in which the Barrier does not run along the municipal border. One is in the Kufr ‘Abeq neighborhood. The other is in the area of the Shu’afat refugee camp. These are separated from the rest of the city by the Barrier, even though they lie within the city’s jurisdictional area.

Palestinian towns and villages (Ramallah and Bethlehem, for example) are situated not far from Jerusalem’s border. These communities are home to hundreds of thousands of Palestinians who have ties with Jerusalem. These ties with Jerusalem are especially close for residents of communities situated east of the city: a-Ram, Dahiyat al-Barid, Hizma, 'Anata, al-'Eizariya, Abu Dis, Sawahreh a-Sharqiya, and a-Sheikh Sa'ad (hereafter "the suburbs"). The suburbs, with a population in excess of 100,000, are contiguous with the built-up area of neighborhoods inside Jerusalem. Until recently, the city's border had an inconsequential effect on the daily lives of the residents on both sides of the border. Residents of the suburbs who carry Palestinian identity cards officially need permits to enter East Jerusalem, but many routinely enter without a permit. Running the Barrier along the municipal border completely ignores the fabric of life that has evolved over the years, and threatens to destroy it altogether. B'Tselem elaborates:

- In light of the housing shortage in East Jerusalem, over the years tens of thousands of residents of East Jerusalem have moved to the suburbs. They still hold Jerusalem identity cards and receive many services in the city.
- Thousands of children living in the suburbs study in schools in East Jerusalem, and many children living in Jerusalem study in schools outside the city. Similar reciprocal relations, albeit on a lesser scale, occur in higher education.
- The suburbs do not have a single hospital. Most of the residents use hospitals and clinics in East Jerusalem. Women from the suburbs almost always give birth in Jerusalem hospitals because they would have to cross a staffed checkpoint (the "container" checkpoint and the Qalandiya checkpoint, respectively) to get to hospitals in Bethlehem and Ramallah, which may entail long delays.
- A large proportion of the workforce in the suburbs is employed in Jerusalem, East and West. Shops, businesses, and factories in the suburbs rely on customers coming from Jerusalem. Many businesses have closed since construction on the Barrier began.
- Residents of East Jerusalem have close family and social relations with residents of the West Bank and with residents of the nearby communities in particular.

Israel contends that gates in the barriers will enable residents to cross from one side to the other and to maintain the existing fabric of life. However, experience regarding the operation of the gates in the northern West Bank section of the Barrier raises grave doubts about the ability of the gates to provide a workable solution: crossing through the gate requires a permit, and many persons wanting to cross are listed as "prevented" for varied reasons; most of the gates are open only a few hours a day, far less than is needed to meet the residents' needs; residents must often wait a long time at the gates, sometimes because the gates do not open on time, and sometimes because of long lines.

Israeli officials state at every occasion that two considerations were instrumental in choosing the route: maintaining security and obstructing Palestinian life as little as possible. However, using the municipal border as the primary basis for determining the route is inconsistent with these two considerations. On the one hand, the route leaves more than 200,000 Palestinians, who identify with the struggle of their people, on the "Israeli" side of the barrier; on the other hand, the route separates Palestinians and curtails the existing fabric of life on both sides of the Barrier.

The decision to run the Barrier along the municipal border and the weak arguments given to explain that decision lead to the conclusion that the primary consideration was political, that is, the unwillingness of the government to pay the political price for choosing a route that will contradict the myth, that unified Jerusalem is the eternal capital of Israel. In light of the way of life that has been created in large parts of the city since East Jerusalem was annexed by Israel in 1967, any security solution based on the unilateral construction of a physical barrier, including a barrier that runs along the Green Line, will severely violate Palestinian human rights.

Jerusalem and the International Community

Despite the long-running dispute among Israel, the Arab states, and the Palestinians over the future of Jerusalem, the international community and the decisions of the UN have been remarkably clear and consistent about the city. As discussed above, UN General Assembly Resolution 181 (UNGA 181) proposed the establishment of a corpus separatum for Jerusalem for a ten-year period under UN administration, after which there would be a referendum. This proposal for internationalization remained the basis for the international community's efforts until 1967, with various permutations suggested to break the diplomatic logjam. However, it was never implemented.

Following the Israeli Occupation of East Jerusalem and its incorporation of adjacent parts of the West Bank into an enlarged Israeli municipality, the United Nations Security Council passed Resolution 237, condemning Israel's annexation of East Jerusalem. Further Israeli steps to incorporate East Jerusalem provoked additional UN resolutions. UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242 called for the withdrawal of Israeli forces to the 1949 armistice lines, and this has formed the basis of all peace overtures. Together these resolutions comprise a powerful corpus of binding international law denying legitimacy to Israeli acquisitions in the city.

Additional international condemnation took place in 1980 when Israel passed a new law entitled "BASIC LAW: Jerusalem," which asserted that "complete and united Jerusalem is the capital of Israel," and it is "the seat of the President of the state, the Knesset, the Government and the [ISRAELI] SUPREME COURT." The law was seen by the international community as a further attempt to prevent and forestall previous UN resolutions on Jerusalem. Indeed, the Israeli member of Knesset who introduced the bill, Geula Cohen, affirmed: "This Bill is designed to ensure that there will never be any compromise over the sovereignty of Jerusalem." The UN Security Council passed a strongly worded resolution condemning the Israeli action and urged those remaining countries that had diplomatic representation in Jerusalem to remove their embassies. As a result, several more countries moved their embassies from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv. Finally, in 2004, an Advisory Opinion by the International Court of Justice on the separation wall firmly asserted the illegitimacy of the Occupation and the rights of the Palestinians to self-determination. In doing so it emphasized the illegality of Israeli actions in East Jerusalem. Thus the international community, through its actions in the UN bodies and through bilateral diplomatic measures, has made completely clear the inadmissibility of the acquisition of East Jerusalem by force. However, the lack of political will by key players to enforce these positions has meant that Israel can continue to act with relative impunity. A brief overview of the key players—the UNITED STATES, the EU, and the Arab states—will give an indication of the dynamics at play.

The official policy of the United States since the 1947 Partition Resolution has been that Jerusalem should remain a unified city but with its final status to be determined by negotiations. However, over the specific question of the construction of Israeli settlements in East Jerusalem after 1967, successive US administrations have either vetoed or abstained from UN General Assembly or Security Council resolutions that demanded an Israeli cessation. For Palestinians, this lack of effective action is evidence that the United States is only paying lip service to its publicly stated policy of pursuing negotiations while in reality it is content to leave Israel in control over both sides of the city. By refraining from public criticism or effective action on Jerusalem, the United States is able to maintain cordial relations with an essential ally in the region, Israel, while simultaneously placating the influential pro-Israel lobbies in Washington. At the same time that it continues to withhold recognition of Jerusalem as Israel's capital, the United States asserts that Israeli unilateral actions do not affect the US commitment to a negotiated future for Jerusalem. In this way the United States is also able to maintain its relations with the majority of the Arab and/or Islamic states. The United States also refrains from exerting pressure on Israel with regard to the separation Barrier.

European Community (EC), and later EUROPEAN UNION (EU), policy toward the Jerusalem issue has been marked by a lack of coordination among the member states and by a lack of "follow-up" after various positions have been articulated. In part this has been in deference to the US monopoly over Palestinian-Israeli mediation, but it has also been a result of the discrepancy between EC/EU policy as such and the policy of its individual member states. This latter point has allowed member states to take heed of domestic constraints in pursuit of their own foreign policy, but at the same time espouse more principled and universalistic policies at the EU level without fear of domestic political reaction. This lack of consistency should not obscure the fact that in the main, EC/EU policy, based firmly on adherence to international legal norms, has been broadly sympathetic to Palestinian and Arab perspectives on Jerusalem. UN Security Council Resolution 242 is the basis of EU policy on Jerusalem, and hence the EC/EU has never accepted the 1980 Israeli Basic Law on Jerusalem; moreover, EC/EU member states have their embassies in Tel Aviv.

In the early 1990s, the EU established an office in East Jerusalem to coordinate its funding policies in the Occupied Palestinian Territories and appointed a special envoy to the Middle East peace process, both of which have ensured that the EU plays an active role in discussions concerning the city's future. A report by the heads of mission in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, compiled in 2005 but never approved, gives an indication of the thinking of some of the EU member states. The report concluded that Israeli policies are decreasing the chances of reaching an agreement on Jerusalem and furthermore clearly intend to make the annexation of East Jerusalem permanent. In addition, the EU has accepted the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice regarding the separation Barrier and has made representations to Israel to that effect.

The Arab and Islamic world has never held a united or consistent position on the question of Jerusalem. Immediately after 1948, despite the opposition of the Jordanian regime, there was broad support for internationalization of the city. In the post-1967 period an Arab consensus emerged regarding Israeli withdrawal from East Jerusalem, but abandoned support for internationalization in favor of supporting Palestinians having their capital in East Jerusalem.

The fragile consensus that emerged after 1967 was shattered when in 1977, Egyptian president Anwar Sadat shocked the Arab world by flying to Jerusalem and formally addressing the Israeli nation from the Knesset rostrum. Indeed the peace treaty signed by Israel, EGYPT, and the United States in 1978 failed to resolve the issue of Jerusalem and simultaneously destroyed Arab unity on the subject for almost a decade. A further important milestone in the Arab world in regard to Jerusalem occurred in 1988, when King Husayn announced that Jordan was severing its political and administrative ties with the West Bank and East Jerusalem and only retaining an enduring link to the Holy Places through its funding of the waqf system and the Shari'a courts.

Despite the lack of success in advancing Arab and Islamic positions on Jerusalem in the political sphere, Jerusalem has continued to play an important role in intra-Arab and intra-Islamic deliberations. In the wake of the 1973 War and the subsequent quadrupling of oil prices, a greater pan-Islamic consciousness of the role of Jerusalem in Islamic culture and Arab history led to the release of large sums of money for Palestinian institutions and groups in Jerusalem. The Islamic Conference Organization (ICO), backed principally by SAUDI ARABIA, established the al-Quds Committee, which was devoted to restoration of Islamic buildings in the Old City and the preservation of Islamic culture. Other funds were made available through the ARAB LEAGUE, the Islamic Bank, and their subsidiary bodies and provide an important counterbalance to Israeli attempts to determine the future of the city. The Arab League and the ICO continue to affirm East Jerusalem as the capital of the future Palestinian state.

Jerusalem and the Peace Process

Jerusalem continues to play a central role in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and it is impossible to envisage a stable agreement between Israelis and Palestinians without an agreement over Jerusalem, whether it be a phased agreement or under international supervision. An additional complicating factor is that due to the city's long history, its sacredness to three major religions, and the interests that many states have in it, the question of its future is not one that can be decided only by the main protagonists. Other important regional and international players are also concerned about the details of any agreement.

Prior to the launching of the peace process through the OSLO ACCORDS in 1993, there were a number of informal (Track II) discussions between Israelis and Palestinians. An important example was the agreement between the Israeli justice minister YOSSI BEILIN and the PLO general secretary MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen), known as the BEILIN-ABU MAZEN ACCORD. The plan proposed a framework for a Joint Higher Municipal Council with an Israeli and Palestinian submunicipality and a special regime for the Old City. This agreement marked an important opening in the possibility of a negotiated solution on the basis of the Israeli government conceding control over significant parts of the city. The plan was never officially published but was widely seen as an important step toward later Israeli and US proposals.

The DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP), signed in September 1993 between the PLO and Israel, the first and most fundamental document in the Oslo Accords, hedged on the issue of Jerusalem, leaving it for final status talks. Moreover, there are contradictory views regarding the legal basis of a settlement over Jerusalem. On the one hand, the Oslo Accords are based upon UN Resolution 242, which states that Israel should withdraw from territories occupied in 1967, which includes East Jerusalem. Israel, however, does not accept that Resolution 242 requires it to withdraw from all the territories occupied in 1967 and changed the terms of reference in the DOP from “occupied territories” to “disputed territories.” On the other hand, the permanent status issues identified by the accords refer to “Jerusalem,” and not simply “East Jerusalem,” implying that Palestinian claims to West Jerusalem were also to be part of the discussions. Partly due to this confusion, serious dialogue on the future of the city did not commence in 1996, as required in the DOP, but has been continually deferred.

The next important milestone in the peace process was the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT in 2000. The Israeli proposals comprised two main elements: they would relinquish control over the northern Palestinian-dominated suburbs of the city to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY and devolve administration in the central areas of East Jerusalem to Palestinian bodies. In exchange, Israel would retain sovereignty and security control over all East Jerusalem, including the Old City. From the Israeli perspective, this was seen as a generous offer. However, for the Palestinians what was being offered was simply a de jure recognition of their de facto dominant position in those areas. From their perspective, when Israel occupied East Jerusalem in 1967, the neglect of the Palestinian residential areas by both the Israeli Municipality of Jerusalem and the central government led to the virtual absence of basic services, INFRASTRUCTURE development, and welfare programs in Palestinian areas; and Palestinian and foreign charitable associations, religious organizations, the PLO, and the Jordanian government attempted to fill the vacuum left by the Israeli state. In these areas, the only elements of the Israeli state that are visible are the restrictive planning and zoning laws and the security forces. The Israeli proposals were therefore not much more than what the Palestinians already had, and certainly not enough for them to surrender their claims to sovereignty over the central parts of the city. Not surprisingly, in view of these diametrically opposed views of the situation, the Camp David talks failed.

In 2001, talks were held at the Egyptian resort of Taba, although no formal agreement was achieved. However, unlike at Camp David, a record of the meetings indicates a number of important developments: both sides agreed that Jerusalem would be the capital of two states; Palestinians were willing to discuss Israeli sovereignty over Israeli settlements in East Jerusalem and to accept Israeli sovereignty over parts of the Old City; and Israel accepted Palestinian sovereignty over Palestinian suburbs up to the Green Line. There was no final agreement on the Holy Places, only agreement to continue discussions on the concept of a “Holy Basin” to encompass religious sites and special arrangements regarding the al-Haram ash-Sharif/TEMPLE MOUNT. These were important steps toward the implementation of UN Resolution 242, yet Taba also recognized that 242 (simple withdrawal to the 1949 armistice lines) could not be the sole framework of a long-term agreement that met the interests of both sides simultaneously.

Following the collapse of the formal peace process in the wake of the second Palestinian INTIFADA in 2000, a new round of ad hoc and uncoordinated Track II discussions took place. Among the most significant were those known as the Geneva Initiative, the interim plan of which was launched in December 2003. Although having no official status, these talks made further progress on a number of key issues and a possible trajectory for future official negotiations. As at Taba, they also proposed two capitals for two states, with two municipalities responsible for their respective areas. There would be a coordination committee appointed by the municipalities to oversee the economic development of the city as a whole. As opposed to a Holy Basin discussed in Taba, there would be a special regime for the Old City with Israeli sovereignty over the cemetery on the Mount of Olives and the Western (Wailing) Wall. Palestinian sovereignty over the al-Haram ash-Sharif would be phased in according to an agreed timetable. A key instrument in the Geneva Initiative is that of third-party intervention and monitoring. On the central issue of the areas of respective sovereignty, the initiative is not clear, as it references a map that has not been published.

At the time of this writing (July 2009), no significant discussions for a negotiated settlement are in the offing. Indeed, on one level prospects for a negotiated solution appear to be receding with an Israeli policy of ongoing unilateral action, such as the completion of the separation Barrier, which will act as a border around the eastern part of the city. No legitimate Palestinian leadership will accept this outcome as a permanent solution for Jerusalem. In this context, no realistic solution is in sight. However, it is also possible to take a longer view and recognize that there have been significant shifts over the past fifteen years. Taken together, the various Track II discussions, the Oslo Accords, the Camp David Summit, and the TABA TALKS reveal a gradual movement away from the maximalist positions of both sides prior to the peace process and toward positions based upon UN Resolution 242. We can see this in the form of proposals for an Israeli withdrawal and Palestinian sovereignty over large areas of East Jerusalem, and a tacit parallel acquiescence on the part of Palestinians to the new realities in Jerusalem. The fact that this movement is limited and incremental cannot disguise the fact that for the Israelis, the issue of Jerusalem has shifted from being non-negotiable in the 1980s (pre-Oslo), to negotiable at some deferred stage in the 1990s (Oslo), to negotiable in detail, including land exchanges, in the twenty-first century (post-Camp David and Tabá). The current alteration of the landscape and physical use of the city by the separation wall and the unilateralist policies of recent Israeli administrations (i.e., ARIEL SHARON, LIKUD/KADIMA, March 2001–January 2006; Ehud Olmert, Kadima, 2006–2009; and Benjamin Netanyahu, Likud, March 2009), who maintain that a united Jerusalem is the indivisible and permanent capital of Israel, do not, for the time being, alter this trend. There is still sufficient ground for hope that this city of three faiths and of international concern is one that can be politically shared and revived as a city of peace and religious inspiration.

See also EI PLAN; FAMILY REUNIFICATION; GREATER JERUSALEM; HOLY BASIN; KLUGMAN REPORT; METROPOLITAN JERUSALEM PLAN; IRVING MOSKOWITZ; OLD CITY; SETTLEMENTS (B'TSELEM); SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; TEMPLE MOUNT; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT; WESTERN WALL

Bibliography

- Akash, Munir, and Fouad Moughrabi, eds. The Open Veins of Jerusalem. New York: Syracuse University Press, 2005.
- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. Expanding Jewish Presence in the Old City of Jerusalem. Jerusalem: ARIJ, 1998.
- . The Status of Jerusalem Reconstructed: Israel's Unilateral Actions Determine the Future of Jerusalem. Jerusalem: ARIJ, 1998.

- Armstrong, Karen. Jerusalem: One City, Three Faiths. New York: Knopf, 1996.
- Asali, Kamil J., ed. Jerusalem in History. Los Angeles: Scorpion Publishing, 1989.
- Bahat, Dan. Carta's Historical Atlas of Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Carta, 1986.
- Baskin, Gershon. Jerusalem of Peace. Jerusalem: Israel/Palestine Center for Research, 1994.
- Beckerman, Chaia, ed. Negotiating the Future: Vision and Realpolitik in the Quest for a Jerusalem of Peace. Jerusalem: Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information, 1996.
- Benvenisti, Meron. Jerusalem: The Torn City. Minneapolis: Israeli Typeset Ltd. and the University of Minnesota Press, 1976.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Separation Barrier: Route of the Barrier around East Jerusalem. n.d. http://www.btselem.org/english/Separation\_Barrier/Jerusalem.asp.
- . Services and Infrastructure, Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2000.
- . Urban Planning. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, n.d.
- . Wall in Jerusalem: Obstacle to Peace in the Holy Land. Jerusalem, B'Tselem, 2006.
- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Choshen, M., and N. Shahar, eds. "Residents of Jerusalem According to Population Groups in Selected Years 1967–1998." In Statistical Yearbook of Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, 1999.
- Davis, Rochelle. "A Social Profile of Jerusalem before 1948: The Growth of the Western Communities." In The Arab Neighborhoods of West Jerusalem and the Fate of Their Inhabitants in the War of 1948. Jerusalem: Institute for Jerusalem Studies and the Alternative Information Center, 1994.
- Dumper, Michael. The Politics of Jerusalem since 1967. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- . The Politics of Sacred Space: The Old City of Jerusalem in the Middle East Conflict. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2002.
- Duri, A. A. "Jerusalem in the Early Islamic Period." In Jerusalem in History. Edited by Kamil J. al-'Asali. Los Angeles: Scorpion Publishing, 1989.
- European Union, Jerusalem and Ramallah Heads of Mission. EU Report on East Jerusalem. 2005. www.nodo50.org/CSCA/agenda05/palestina/jerusalem-ue\_eng.pdf.
- Friedland, Roger, and Richard Hecht. To Rule Jerusalem. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Friedman, Lara, with Daniel Seidemann. "Targeting the Old City's Muslim Quarter." Foundation for Middle East Peace. 19 August 2005. www.fmep.org/analysis/articles/targeting\_the\_old\_citys\_muslim\_quarter.html.

- Habash, Dalia. "West Jerusalem Properties: Losses and Claims." In The Arab Neighborhoods of West Jerusalem and the Fate of Their Inhabitants in the War of 1948. Jerusalem: Institute for Jerusalem Studies and the Alternative Information Center, 1994.
- Halper, Jeff. "The Three Jerusalems and Their Role in the Occupation." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 15 (2002).
- Hirsch, M., D. Housen-Couriel, and R. Lapidot. Whither Jerusalem? Proposals and Positions Concerning the Future of Jerusalem. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 1995.
- Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Policy Background (324/1.11.02). Jerusalem: Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Information Division, 17.8.80, 1980.
- Al-Ju'be, Nazmi. "The Ghettoization of Arab Jerusalem." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 16 (2002).
- Kaminker, Sarah. "East Jerusalem: A Case Study in Political Planning." Palestine/Israel Journal. 2:2 (1995).
- Klein, Menachem. The Jerusalem Problem: The Struggle for Permanent Status. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2003.
- Knesset (Israel). "Basic Law: Jerusalem." Policy Background (324/1.11.02). Jerusalem: Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Information Division, 17.8.80, 1980.
- Krystall, Nathan. "The De-Arabization of West Jerusalem." Journal of Palestine Studies. 27:2 (1998).
- . "War in Jerusalem: The De-Arabization of the Western Suburbs." The Arab Neighborhoods of West Jerusalem and the Fate of Their Inhabitants in the War of 1948. Jerusalem: Institute for Jerusalem Studies and the Alternative Information Center, 1994.
- LAW. Land and Settlement Policy in Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Unit of the Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment, 2000.
- Nashashibi, Amal. "The Israeli Master Plan Jerusalem 2000." Jerusalemites. 10 August 2006.
- Peters, Francis. Jerusalem. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1985.
- Regular, Arnon. "Ethnic Cleansing of Jerusalem Directly after the Occupation." Kol Ha'ir Magazine (Hebrew). 26 July 2001.
- Rempel, Terry. "International Law and the Principle of Restitution as It Pertains to West Jerusalem." In The Arab Neighborhoods of West Jerusalem and the Fate of Their Inhabitants in the War of 1948. Jerusalem: Institute for Jerusalem Studies and the Alternative Information Center, 1994.
- Rose, John. Armenians of Jerusalem: Memories of Life in Palestine. London: The Radcliffe Press, 1993.
- Rouhana, Kate B. The Reality of Jerusalem's Palestinians Today. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Media and Communication Center, 2001.
- Schmelz, U. O. Modern Jerusalem's Demographic Evolution. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, 1987.
- Schwartz, Michael. "Collusion in Jerusalem: How the Government and the Settlers Conspire to Take Over Houses and Land." Challenge: A Jerusalem Magazine on the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. 50 (1998).
- Shragai, Nadav. "The Sewer Flows in the East, the Money Flows in the West." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 7 June 2000.
- Stein, Yael. The Quiet Deportation: Revocation of Residency and Denial of Social Rights of East Jerusalem Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and HaMoked, Center for the Defense of the Individual, 1998.
- . The Quiet Deportation: Revocation of Residency of East Jerusalem Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and HaMoked, Center for the Defense of the Individual, 1997.
- Tamari, Salim. "Jerusalem 1948: The Phantom City." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 3 (1999).
- . "Jerusalem's Western Villages: Impact of the 1948 War." The Arab Neighborhoods of West Jerusalem and the Fate of Their Inhabitants in the War of 1948. Jerusalem: Institute for Jerusalem Studies and the Alternative Information Center, 1994.
- Teel, Hanna. "The Mavrides Diaries and War in the Old City." The Arab Neighborhoods of West Jerusalem and the Fate of Their Inhabitants in the War of 1948. Jerusalem: Institute for Jerusalem Studies and the Alternative Information Center, 1994.
- Tsemel, Lea, et al. The Trap Is Closing on Palestinian Jerusalemites: Israel's Demographic Policies in East Jerusalem from the 1967 Annexation to the Eve of the Final Status Negotiations (1996). Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 1996.
- Tsimhoni, D. Christian Communities in Jerusalem and the West Bank since 1948: An Historical, Social and Political Study. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1993.
- Usher, Graham. "Returning to the Source: The Politics of Housing in East Jerusalem." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 1:1 (1998).
- Vitullo, Anita. "Israel's Social Policy in Arab Jerusalem." Jerusalem Quarterly File. (Fall 1998).
- Welfare Association. "Population of the Old City by Religious Group." In Jerusalem Old City Revitalization Plan: Interim Summary Report. Jerusalem: Welfare Association, 1999.

—Michael Dumper

Jerusalem Center for Social and Economic Rights

The Jerusalem Center for Social and Economic Rights (JCSER) is a Palestinian nongovernmental human rights organization. Established in 1997 by lawyers and members of the Palestinian community of JERUSALEM, the center uses the Israeli legal system to provide legal assistance and representation to Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem and provides extensive information about news and issues concerning Jerusalem. JCSER assists Palestinian Jerusalemites in finding ways to take the initiative to proactively fight discrimination and improve conditions of daily life in the short term without conferring political legitimacy on Israel's illegal annexation of East Jerusalem. (www.jcser.org).

Jerusalem Center for Women

The Jerusalem Center for Women was established in March 1994 as a Palestinian nongovernmental women's organization located in East JERUSALEM. Founded simultaneously with the Israeli women's center BAT SHALOM, located in West Jerusalem, the two groups carry out joint Palestinian-Israeli programs through a coordinating body known as the Jerusalem Link. This joint initiative marks the first time that Palestinian and Israeli organizations have worked so closely for the advancement of women's and human rights, as well as toward resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. (www.j-c-w.org).

Jerusalem Forum: The Amuta for Settling Jerusalem

The Jerusalem Forum, or The Amuta for Settling Jerusalem, is an amuta (Hebrew—nonprofit organization) that unites and provides a framework through which all the settler organizations working to Judaize the OLD CITY and the HOLY BASIN in East JERUSALEM—including ELAD, ATERET COHANIM, ATARA L'YOSHNA, BEIT OROT, and SHIMON HA'TZADIK, plus the Messianic groups hoping to build the THIRD TEMPLE on the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF—can concentrate and organize their efforts. The idea behind unification in the Jerusalem Forum is to focus the activity of all the settler amuta and coordinate efforts in matters of common interest. The defining ideology of the amuta is “redemption of LAND in Jerusalem,” with emphasis given to land near the WESTERN WALL of the TEMPLE MOUNT. Many activists in the settlement movement are also activists in Temple Mount organizations.

See also HOLY BASIN; JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- European Union. EU Heads of Mission Report on East Jerusalem. EUObserver Document. 9 March 2009. euobserver.com.
- Hutman, Bill. “Plan to Expand Settlements Unveiled by Jerusalem Activists.” Jerusalem Post Service. 7 June 1996.

Jerusalem Forum/ Jerusalemites

The Jerusalem Forum, also known as Jerusalemites, is an Amman-based nongovernmental organization whose Internet site tells the story of the Palestinian people in the hope of building a database of documented, credible information for posterity. It intends to become interactive with the world, pass on the Palestinian message to a worldwide audience (scholars and general-interest readers alike), and expose them to Palestinian culture, life, and history.

A significant portion of Jerusalem Forum content centers on the Holy City of JERUSALEM. This is because, for Palestinians, Jerusalem is the embodiment and symbol of Palestine. Jerusalemites puts forward challenging topics written by various members and friends of the Jerusalem Forum, as well as speaking up for the Palestinians living under Israeli OCCUPATION and testifying about Palestinian existence (historically and in the present).

Jerusalemites believe that it will be possible to clear the air, to come to a mutual Israeli-Palestinian understanding, and to speak on equal ground only when the truth becomes known and is acknowledged by all parties. (<http://www.jerusalemites.org/index.htm>).

Jerusalem Is Ours

Jerusalem Is Ours (Yerushalayim Shelanu) is an organization of mainly secular Jews founded in 1997 that works closely with ATERET COHANIM (a yeshiva settler group) to “ensure a united Jerusalem under Israel.” Its focus is on acquiring Palestinian properties and encouraging Palestinians to leave JERUSALEM, which it envisions as completely Jewish. Jerusalem Is Ours receives support from Christian Zionist groups in the UNITED STATES.

See also JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Anonymous. “Jerusalem Is Ours.” Middle East Digest. 9:5 (May 1998). <http://christianactionforisrael.org/medigest/may98/ours.html>.
- La Guardia, Anton. War without End: Israelis, Palestinians, and the Struggle for a Promised Land. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2002.

Jerusalem Media and Communication Center

The Jerusalem Media and Communication Center was established in 1988 by a group of Palestinian journalists and researchers to provide information on events in the WEST BANK (including East JERUSALEM) and the GAZA STRIP. As the first Palestinian group to engage in professional public opinion polling, the center is best known for its high-quality survey research and public opinion polls, which reflect Palestinian views in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES about the peace process, Palestinian leaders, the economy, and other social and political issues. It has offices in Jerusalem and Gaza that provide services to journalists, researchers, international agencies, and other individuals and organizations interested in obtaining information on the Palestinian territories. (www.jmcc.org).

See also POLLS AND PALESTINIAN PUBLIC OPINION

Jerusalem Prayer Team

The Jerusalem Prayer Team (JPT) is a Christian Zionist organization that opposes Israel giving up LAND in exchange for peace. The mission of the JPT is “to guard, defend and protect the Jewish people and the ERETZ YISRAEL until Israel is secure, and until the redeemer comes to Zion.” The group’s members are Christian fundamentalists, overwhelmingly from the UNITED STATES. It is nondenominational and does not receive support from Israel. Among the more than 300 Christian leaders who the Prayer Team states are part of the movement are Dr. Tim LaHaye, Mrs. Anne Graham Lotz, Mr. Pat Boone, Mr. Bill McCartney, Ms. Kay Arthur, Pastor John Hagee, the Rev. Tommy Tenney, Evangelist Mike Evans, Dr. A. R. Bernard, and Dr. Jay Sekulow. Not listed officially, Pat Robertson and the late Jerry Falwell are said to have been active on the Prayer Team’s board.

The Prayer Team—which claims two million members—states that it has invested millions of dollars in Israel since the organization was founded in the mid-1990s, supporting hospitals, schools, and other public works projects. By circulating petitions, making use of television, and other means, it vigorously fought against the implementation of the ROAD MAP proposed during US president GEORGE W. BUSH’s administration.

The Jerusalem Prayer Team is also committed to rebuilding the THIRD TEMPLE and works closely with the myriad Jewish groups involved in that effort, providing essential funding and other material support. In 2005 the group began a new project, “Adopt-a-Settler,” conceived after leaders met with Israeli tourism minister BENYAMIN ELON. The program aims to raise money through donations, which will be directly given to settlers. (www.jerusalemprayerteam.org).

See also CHRISTIANITY; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Berkowitz, Bill. “The Most Influential (and Self-Promotional) Christian Zionist You’ve Never Heard Of.” Inter Press Service News. 24 February 2009.
- Brog, David. Standing with Israel. Peterborough, Cambridgeshire, UK: Frontline, 2006.
- Evans, Mike. The Final Move beyond Iraq: The Final Solution While the World Sleeps. Peterborough, Cambridgeshire, UK: Frontline, 2007.
- Gross, Max. “Christian Evangelicals Adopt Settlers.” The Forward. 13 June 2003.
- Hagee, John. Jerusalem Countdown, revised and updated. Internet Online Publisher (Amapedia Community), 2007. (<http://faves.com/url/46485/amapedia.amazon.com/>).
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford. The Wrath of Jonah: The Crisis of Religious Nationalism in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 2nd ed. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2002.
- Sizer, Stephen R. Christian Zionism: Road-Map to Armageddon? Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2005.
- Spector, Stephen. Evangelicals and Israel: The Story of American Christian Zionism. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Teplinsky, Sandra. Why Care about Israel? How the Jewish Nation Is Key to Unleashing God’s Blessings in the 21st Century. Ada, MI: Chosen Books, 2004.
- Weber, Timothy P. On the Road to Armageddon: How Evangelicals Became Israel’s Best Friend. Ada, MI: Baker Academic, 2005.

Jerusalem Quarterly File

The Jerusalem Quarterly File is a scholarly journal first published in 1998 by the INSTITUTE FOR JERUSALEM STUDIES, an affiliate of the INSTITUTE FOR PALESTINE STUDIES. Published in JERUSALEM, the English-language publication provides articles on Jerusalem’s history and on the dynamics and trends currently shaping the city. (www.jerusalemquarterly.org).

Jerusalem Reclamation Project

The Jerusalem Reclamation Project is the English name for ATERET COHANIM, a militant settlement group in East JERUSALEM.

See also ATERET COHANIM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Jerusalem Temple Foundation

See THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Jewish Agency for Israel

The Jewish Agency for Israel is a Zionist organization originally established in 1923 to represent the Jewish community in Palestine during the BRITISH MANDATE. The Palestine Mandate called upon Britain to “secure establishment of the Jewish National Home” with “an appropriate Jewish agency” to be set up for advice and cooperation. In 1929 the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION (WZO), which was specifically recognized as the appropriate vehicle, formally designated the Jewish Agency to fulfill the Mandate stipulation.

During the Mandatory period the Jewish Agency organized itself and soon emerged as the quasi-government of the Yishuv, serving the administrative needs of the Jewish community. In 1920 the Jewish Agency established the HAGANA, the military organization of the Yishuv, in cooperation with the Va’ad Le’umi (the supreme institution of the organized Jewish community in Palestine, which was founded in 1920).

In October 1945, under the leadership of the Jewish Agency, the Hagana signed an agreement with the IRGUN TZEVA’I LE’UMI and LEHI to establish the United Resistance Movement, which primarily carried out joint operations against the British, although some were directed against the Palestinians. The Jewish Agency officially dissolved the United Resistance Movement after the bombing on 22 July 1946 of the KING DAVID HOTEL; however, beginning in 1946 the Jewish Agency instructed the Hagana to defend all Jewish settlements and neighborhoods, set up the elite PALMAH commando units, and took on the task of procuring weapons, ammunition, and other matériel.

After the UN vote to partition Palestine into Jewish and Arab states on 29 November 1947 (UN RESOLUTION 181), the Jewish Agency and the Va’ad Le’umi set up a National Council and a National Administration that became the state of Israel’s provisional legislature and government with the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE in May 1948. DAVID BEN-GURION, chairman of the Jewish Agency Executive, became the first prime minister. With the establishment of the state, the Jewish Agency relinquished many of its functions to the new government but retained responsibility for Jewish IMMIGRATION, land purchases, Jewish settlements, youth work, and relations with the DIASPORA.

In 1952 the WZO, as the proprietor of the Jewish Agency, and the government of Israel signed a covenant, or “Status Law,” which was followed by Knesset legislation that established the basis for the relationship among the WZO, the Jewish Agency, and the state of Israel. Under the terms of this covenant, the Jewish Agency was recognized as the third element in the constellation of ISRAEL’S NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS but was subordinate to the government of the state. This quasi-governmental status allowed the Jewish Agency to fulfill specific nongovernmental functions, even though at the same time it was an arm of the state. During Israel’s early years, the Jewish Agency provided important services in the area of Jewish immigration, absorption, and settlement. In the first two decades it established a wide variety of companies to develop the country’s cultural and economic INFRASTRUCTURE, including El Al (the national airline), Mekorot (the water supply company), land development companies, agricultural companies, real estate management companies, Binyanei HaOoma (the national theatre and convention center), museums, and others.

The Jewish Agency’s real significance, however, resides in its status as one of Israel’s “national institutions” (together with the WZO and the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND [JNF]). For example, under the terms of the 1952 Status Law the government entrusted the Jewish Agency with the planning and funding of new settlements (towns, villages, urban areas, etc.). It is also responsible for funding the development projects necessary to create new settlements, including building access roads, financing public buildings, and connecting settlements to the national electricity and water grid. The Jewish Agency, though in general secular, follows the biblical injunction of “redeeming the land,” a concept appropriated by political ZIONISM and transformed into nationalist terms. The state, instead of God, would return the people from exile and restore the relationship between the “Jewish People” and the “Land of Israel.” This mandate to develop the country for the Jewish people is carried out by the WZO, the Jewish Agency, and the JNF (Keren Kayemeth le-Yisrael), the third element in the troika of Jewish national institutions that work to keep Israel permanently in Jewish hands through its land-leasing policy. (Until quite recently when “privatization” began to be implemented, even Jews did not “own” land in Israel; they leased it for forty-nine or ninety-nine years, at which time it reverts to the Jewish Agency or the state of Israel. Through the laws and institutions concerned with land, the land is guaranteed for Jewish use in perpetuity.) When the state assumed control of the majority of national land in 1960 (in the form of the ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION), it agreed to continue to abide by the Jewish Agency and the JNF’s mandate for those lands.

Ninety-three percent of all Israel’s land (within the Green Line) is “national” land—that is, for exclusive use by Jews. It is developed, leased, and administered by the Jewish Agency for Israel’s national constituency, the Jewish people. The meaning of this Jewish exclusivity for PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL, who make up 18–20 percent of the total population, is that they are completely excluded from access to 93 percent of the land of Israel. They cannot lease, sublet, buy, or in any other way make use of the land or anything affixed to the land (for example, they cannot build apartments, homes, educational or economic facilities, or develop new agricultural area). Since 1948 no new Arab settlements, towns, villages, or infrastructure have been established in the Arab areas. Palestinian-Arab citizens of Israel are disqualified by virtue of their ethnicity from establishing and developing a town or village or even expanding one that they already own, while the Israeli state has continually confiscated Palestinian land.

The Jewish Agency also facilitates the provision of government services exclusively to the Jewish population. The government, serving a “citizen” constituency, can at any time give the Jewish Agency authority to deliver services to its “national” constituency. In this way, services can be legally withheld from non-Jewish citizens. For example, Ian Lustick relates in his Arabs in the Jewish State how a program providing special incentives for large families was administered by the Jewish Agency, instead of by the government, to ensure that only Jews would be motivated to have more children. The rationale was DEMOGRAPHIC in that it is the interest of Israel to increase the Jewish, but not the Arab, population.

See also ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION; JEWISH NATIONAL FUND; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Bibliography

- Ahren, Raphael, and Nir Hasson. “Natan Sharansky Sworn in as Jewish Agency Chief.” Ha’aretz. 25 June 2009.
- Arab Association for Human Rights. Discrimination in the Israeli Law. Nazareth, IL: The Arab Association for Human Rights, n.d. www.arabhra.org/factsheets/factsheet1.htm.
- Arbel, Andrea S. Riding the Wave: The Jewish Agency’s Role in the Mass Aliyah of Soviet and Ethiopian Jewry to Israel, 1987–1995. Lynbrook, NY: Gefen Books, 2001.
- BBC. “Arab Ban Proposed in Jewish Areas.” BBC World News. 8 July 2002. http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/middle\_east/2115857.stm.
- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva: COHRE and Badil, 2005.
- Elazar, Daniel J. The Jewish Agency and Other Instrumentalities of the Jewish People: Reinventing World Jewry: How to Design the World Jewish Polity. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, 1996.
- . The Jewish Agency: Historic Role and Current Crisis. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, 1992.
- . On Restructuring the World Zionist Organization. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, 1994.
- Harel, Amos. “WZO Suspected of Giving Settlers Palestinian Land.” Ha’aretz. 19 July 2009.
- Jewish Agency. The Story of the Jewish Agency for Israel. New York: Jewish Agency American Section, 1964.
- Khalifa, Osama Fouad. “Arab Political Mobilization and Israeli Responses.” Arab Studies Quarterly. (Winter 2001).
- Kretzmer, David. The Legal Status of the Arabs in Israel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Lustick, Ian. Arabs in the Jewish State: Israel’s Control of a National Minority. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1980.
- Rubinstein, Amnon. “The JNF and Land Transfers.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 13 October 1999.
- Stock, Ernest. Chosen Instrument: The Jewish Agency in the First Decade of the State of Israel. New York: Herzl Press, 1988.

Tekiner, Roselle. "Israel's Two-tiered Citizenship Law Bars Non-Jews from 93 Percent of Its Lands." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. January 1990.

Jewish Colonial Trust

The Jewish Colonial Trust (JCT), the first Zionist bank, was founded at the Second WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS and incorporated in London in 1899. Intended to be the financial instrument of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, the purpose of the JCT was to procure capital and credit to obtain a charter for Palestine from the OTTOMAN government. It quickly became clear, however, that the amount of capital raised by the JCT was far from sufficient for this goal; the total was only £395,000 ($1,925,000) of the £8 million ($39 million) needed.

The JCT's main activities in Palestine were carried out by the Anglo-Palestine Bank, which was formed in 1902 as a subsidiary to JCT. With seed capital of £40,000 ($195,000), it opened its first branch in JAFFA in 1903 and quickly made a name for itself as a reliable, trustworthy institution—one that did not consider business transactions and profitability its only goals. In its early years the bank conducted transactions in support of the Zionist enterprise: LAND purchases, imports, obtaining of concessions, and so on. Branches were opened in JERUSALEM, Beirut (then the region's main commercial center), HEBRON, SAFED, HAIFA, TIBERIAS, and GAZA.

The Anglo-Palestine Bank established a network of credit unions in the moshavot (loosely organized KIBBUTZ) and gave farmers long-term loans. It also helped with the construction of the first sixty houses in Tel Aviv. When the Zionist enterprise faced severe difficulties during World War I, the bank managed to keep its funds intact, transferring them to safe locations. The Ottoman government, considering the bank an enemy institution because it was registered in Britain, ordered its branches shut and its cash confiscated. While the liquidation of the bank's branches proceeded slowly, business continued surreptitiously. After the war the bank's operations expanded, and branches were established in Palestine. In 1932 the main office of the Anglo-Palestine Bank was moved from Jaffa to Jerusalem. In 1934 the JCT terminated its banking activity and became a holding company for Anglo-Palestine Bank shares only.

During World War II the Anglo-Palestine Bank was able to use its large reserves to finance the developing industries in Palestine that supplied provisions to the British army. When the state of Israel was established, the bank was given the concession to issue new banknotes and to become the government's banker and financial agent. In 1950 the bank's registration was transferred from Britain to Israel, and it was renamed Bank Leumi Le-Israel (National Bank of Israel). When the Bank of Israel was founded as Israel's central bank (1954), Bank Leumi became a commercial bank.

Bibliography

Razily, H. The Jewish Colonial Trust Dilemma: An Appeal to Common Sense. Publisher unknown, 1927.
Zakim, Eric Stephen. To Build and Be Built: Landscape, Literature, and the Construction of Zionist Identity. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.

Jewish Colonization Association

The Jewish Colonization Association (JCA) was founded by Baron de Hirsch (Moritz von Hirsch auf Gereuth), a German-Jewish businessman, in 1891 to facilitate the IMMIGRATION and settlement of poor and oppressed Jews from Eastern Europe to agricultural colonies in North and South America. The organization was also committed to establishing and maintaining educational and training institutions, model farms, loan banks, industries, factories, and any other institutions or associations that would assist the settlement of Jews in the New World.

The first settlements were in Argentina, followed by others in Canada, Brazil, the UNITED STATES, and later Cyprus, Galicia, and elsewhere. In 1896 the JCA began taking an interest in Palestine, and in 1924 a sister organization, the PALESTINE JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION (PJCA), was created by some of Hirsch's associates. BARON EDMOND DE ROTHSCHILD used the JCA as a mechanism to support early Jewish colonization in Palestine, and when he was ill in 1899, he turned over the administration and support of his Palestine settlements to the JCA, giving it 15 million francs ($30 million). By 1986 the JCA had participated with the Israeli government and the JEWISH AGENCY in the establishment and consolidation of eighty-seven settlements. The work of the JCA continues to this day, supporting the far-flung communities established decades ago.

Bibliography

- Grenwald, Kurt. Turkenhirsch: Study of Baron Maurice de Hirsch. Somerset, NJ: Transaction, 1966.
- Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora. A Worldwide Philanthropic Empire: The Life and Work of Baron Maurice de Hirsch. Tel Aviv: Beth Halesfulsoth/Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, 1982.
- Norman, Theodore. An Outstretched Arm: A History of the Jewish Colonization Association. Oxford, UK: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1985.
- Tolkowsky, S. The Jewish Colonization Association in Palestine: Its History and Its Prospects. London: Zionist Organisation, ca. 1920s.
- Tuten, Eric. Between Capital and Land: The Jewish National Fund's Finances and Land-Purchase Priorities in Palestine, 1939–1945. London: Routledge/Curzon, 2005.

Jewish Defense League

The Jewish Defense League (JDL) was established in the UNITED STATES in 1968 for the declared purpose of protecting Jews by whatever means necessary. The founder, national chairman, and leader of the JDL was MEIR KAHANE, a thirty-eight-year-old ordained rabbi from Brooklyn, New York, who was assassinated in 1990 in New York by an Arab extremist. Rabbi Kahane believed that American Jews were living in a fiercely hostile society and faced many of the same dangers as the Jews in Nazi GERMANY, which led to the creation of the JDL as an extremist and violent organization. Kahane also believed that the major Jewish organizations in the United States had failed to protect America's Jews from ANTI-SEMITISM, which he saw as “exploding” all over the country. “If I have succeeded in instilling fear in you,” Rabbi Kahane often said in the closing statement of his standard speech, “I consider this evening a success.”

The JDL describes itself as “the most controversial, yet the most effective, of all Jewish organizations.” The group has been responsible for publicizing such issues as SOVIET JEWS, Nazi war criminals, anti-Semitism/Jew-hatred, and Jewish self-defense. The JDL's motto, “Never Again,” has been used to fuel the group's actions.

Kahane consistently preached an extremist form of Jewish nationalism that included racism and violence, and the JDL engaged in violent activities from its founding through the 1990s, when its activism tapered off somewhat in the United States. In 1994 the JDL defended the massacre of twenty-nine Palestinians at prayer in HEBRON by DR. BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, an American Israeli physician and JDL activist.

In both the United States and Israel the majority of Jews and Jewish organizations condemned and rejected the JDL. In 1973 it established a political party (KACH) in Israel and repeatedly ran for the Knesset but did not win a seat until 1984. After Kahane's assassination in 1990, Kach split into two groups—Kach and KAHANE CHAI—the first led by Baruch Marzel from Hebron, and the second by Meir Kahane's son, BINYAMIN ZE'EV KAHANE, from the settlement of Kfar Tapuach. In 1994 the Israeli government outlawed both organizations, although they continue to have followers among a radical group of settlers in the WEST BANK. The Southern Poverty Law Center, a US anti-hate group, has added the JDL to its list of watched groups. Similarly, the Jewish ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE has a website that chronicles every act of violence perpetrated by the JDL.

In the United States in 2005, the Jewish Defense League was chaired by the prominent Chicago Jewish activist Ian Sigel, East Coast Director Robert Turk, and West Coast Director Jim Nutting. Since 2000, the JDL has been showing a rapid increase in chapters and membership worldwide.

On 12 December 2001, Irv Rubin, international chairman of the JDL since 1985, and Earl Krugel, a member of the organization, were charged with conspiracy to commit acts of TERRORISM. The two were accused of planning attacks on Arab-American congressman Darrell Issa's office and on the King Fahd Mosque in Culver City, California. Rubin proclaimed his innocence, but, after awaiting trial for eleven months, he committed suicide on the morning of his first scheduled trial hearing. On 4 February 2003 Krugel pled guilty to conspiracy and weapons charges stemming from the terrorist plot and was sentenced to twenty years in prison. However, Judge Ronald Lew subsequently ruled that Krugel “broke conditions” of his deal and ordered him to face trial on further charges. If convicted, he faces a sentence of up to fifty-five years. (www.jdl.org).

See also KACH; MEIR KAHANE; KAHANE CHAI

Bibliography

- Anti-Defamation League. “Backgrounder on Kahane.” n.d. www.adl.org/extremism/jdl\_chron.asp.
- Kahane, Libby. Rabbi Meir Kahane: His Life and Thought, Vol. 1 1932–1975. New York: Institute for Publication of Writings of Rabbi Meir Kahane, 2008.

Kahane, Meir. The Story of the Jewish Defense League. New York: Institute for Publication of the Writings of Rabbi Meir Kahane, 2000.

Rosenthal, Richard. Rookie Cop: Deep Undercover in the Jewish Defense League. Falmouth, MA: Leapfrog Press, 2000.

Jewish Fundamentalism

Based on conservative interpretations of religious dictums and precepts, Jewish fundamentalism is a radical and uncompromising element in Israeli politics and society. It steadfastly opposes any attempts by Israel to withdraw from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES or to accept Palestinian collective rights. Consisting of various groups and factions, Jewish fundamentalism can be seen not only as part of a general trend in Israeli society toward spirituality and religious revival but also as a part of a wider global change in the role and characteristics of faith. Like US Protestant fundamentalism and radical Islamist groups, Jewish fundamentalism relies on its ancient holy texts for values and precepts and is critical of the moral changes of the modern and postmodern ages. Like other fundamentalist activists, Jewish fundamentalists attempt to reconstruct a moral society based on their interpretation of religious truths. And similar to their monotheistic cousins, they are highly politicized, with their main interests relating to ensuring Israel's perpetual control over the Occupied Territories and bringing about a mass migration of Jews to ancient biblical sites, such as JERUSALEM, HEBRON, and NABLUS.

Historical Background, Pre-Israel State

Jewish history has many fundamentalist and messianic movements, which have grown out of the same structure of power and myth that constituted political authority in ancient Israel. Several central biblical motifs are crucial in the fundamentalist worldview, the most important the belief that the Jews are God's chosen and holy people, and are destined to play the central role in a divinely orchestrated redemptive drama. From the time of the early prophets (in the eighth century BCE) to the destruction of the last vestiges of Jewish political autonomy in Persia and Palestine in the first century CE, beliefs in and struggles to achieve God's redemption of his people formed the ideological core of Jewish political life.

This central belief led to numerous attempts to activate the messianic era. The Maccabees (Hasmoneans), who defeated the Syrian-Greek (Seleucid) empire in 165 BCE, declared themselves motivated by faith in the God of Israel and his commandments. Although the Maccabees were not descendants of the House of David and therefore did not declare their own kingdom as messianic, they claimed they were preparing the way for the Messiah and would deliver the kingdom to him when he appeared. In Roman-ruled Judea during the first century CE, the Zealots advocated immediate rebellion against Rome on behalf of a reconstituted Davidic kingdom that would herald the advent of the redemption, and they ruthlessly persecuted other Jews who held more moderate views. In spite of the political issues the Zealots raised, they preached in apocalyptic terms, including the redemption and the Messiah.

Two major revolts against Rome erupted within the space of seventy-five years in Judea—the Great Revolt (66–73 CE) and the Bar Kochba Rebellion (132–135 CE). Each was based on fundamentalist appeals about God's direct commandments to his people regarding Jewish independence in the land of Israel and the integrity of the Temple cult. The first revolt resulted in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Second Temple. The second was led by Simon Bar Kochba, who was declared the Messiah by the leading rabbi of the period, Akiva, who also announced that the redemption had begun. The Bar Kochba Rebellion ended in the deaths of more than a half million Jews, the mass enslavement of survivors, and the elimination of a Jewish majority in Judea.

Subsequently the rabbis adopted an intense and near-unanimous opposition to all apocalyptic, messianic, and redemptionist themes. However, it proved impossible in the context of exilic Judaism to purge the religion of all expectations of the "dawn of redemption." Jewish mysticism, which remained a potent influence, was heavily involved with speculation about the end of the world and revered those charismatic individuals who attempted to hasten redemption through direct communion with God. From 1665 to 1667 a wave of messianic enthusiasm swept over world Jewry. Responding to reports of the Messiah's appearance in Palestine in the person of Shabbatai Zevi, accompanied by "his prophet" Nathan of Gaza, the majority of Jews in virtually all major centers of the Jewish world were persuaded of his legitimacy for a time. Yet whether mystical or Orthodox, all forms of worship were inextricably linked to contemplation of redemption, which assumed the eventual end of Jewish exile and the rebuilding of the Temple in the land of Israel. The return to Zion was, in fact, the cornerstone of the Jewish messianic ideal.

Ideology and Theology in Contemporary Israel

In light of Jewish history and religious beliefs, it should not be surprising that a movement of messianic fundamentalism has emerged in Israel. Such fundamentalism existed from the early years of the state and before. Contemporary Jewish fundamentalism in Israel relies to a large extent on the writings of RABBI AVRAHAM YITZHAK HACOEN KOOK (1865–1935), as interpreted by his son, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda HaCohen Kook (1891–1982), and taught in the MERCAZ HARAV KOOK YESHIVA in Jerusalem. The students of this yeshiva and their disciples have generated leaders and activists and have provided a theological justification for political action.

Rabbi Kook the elder was the first ASHKENAZI (of European descent) chief rabbi during the BRITISH MANDATE years and founded the still-functioning institution of the chief rabbinate. Although he grew up in ultra-Orthodox circles and never renounced that camp, he became an important spiritual leader of the national religious camp and had good relations with many secular intellectuals. He died before the establishment of the state of Israel, and at the time of his death his teaching had fallen into partial oblivion and his yeshiva had become marginal among the religious institutions of Jerusalem.

One of Rabbi Kook's precepts was that the redemption had already arrived. He believed that ZIONISM was visible proof that God had decided to return the people of Israel to their land. The disciples of Mercaz HaRav added to his ideas by incorporating the 1967 WAR and the 1973 War into the divine historical scheme, interpreting them as stages in the process leading to full national and cosmic redemption. A second principle found in Rabbi Kook's writings is the sacredness of the entire land of Israel, whose BORDERS should be determined through halakhic (Jewish religious law) deliberation, rather than historical contingency or diplomatic negotiation. The redemption of the people is inextricably connected to the redemption of the land, with the final goal being the gathering of the entire people of Israel into Greater Israel, living according to precepts of the Torah.

Although Jewish fundamentalist theology holds that the three components of land, people, and Torah are inseparable, the more politicized believers have declared that the struggle over the land takes precedence. Political scientist Ian Lustick has defined and enumerated seven deeply held beliefs that underpin the thinking and behavior of Jewish fundamentalists:

1. The abnormality of the Jewish people. This tenet of Jewish eternal uniqueness derives from the covenant God made with the Jews at Mount Sinai—for fundamentalists it is a real historical event with eternal and inescapable consequences for the entire world. The implication of chosenness is that the transcendental imperatives to which Jews must respond effectively nullify the moral laws that bind the behavior of normal nations, and Jews are not required to abide by codes of "justice and righteousness" that bind other peoples. Chosenness equals abnormality.
2. The meaning of Arab opposition to Israel. From the fundamentalist view, the conflicts Israel encounters with its neighbors are not normal but involve Israel's eternal battle to overcome the forces of evil. The wars with the Arab states and the conflict with the Palestinians are simply the most recent and most crucial episode in the struggle against absolute evil. Jewish fundamentalists' assumptions about the world make it essentially impossible for them to see Jews and Palestinians in comparable terms. Nor can fundamentalists acknowledge any real tie between the Palestinians, or any human group other than the Jewish people, and the land of Israel. Fundamentalists believe that the Jews are authorized by the living God and creator of the universe as a legitimate, eternal people with unalienable rights to the entire land of Israel. The Palestinians have absolutely no legitimate claim to nationhood or to any part of the country.

The image of the Palestinians as doomed in their opposition to Jewish rule in the land of Israel corresponds to a yet more fundamental categorization of them. Fundamentalist rabbis and ideologues regularly refer to the local Arabs as "Canaanites" or "Ishmaelites." They weigh the implications of the terms Joshua offered the Canaanites before his conquest of the land, or the circumstances under which Abraham expelled Ishmael, for the determination of policy in current circumstances. Thus Rav Tzvi Yehuda cited Maimonides to the effect that the Canaanites had three choices—to flee, to accept Jewish rule, or to fight. Moreover, “humane treatment” of Palestinians is appropriate “only for those Arabs ready to accept the sovereignty of the People of Israel.” From this general principle comes a duty to make merciless war against Arabs in the land of Israel who reject Jewish sovereignty, which translates into specific requirements such as the rule to deport the families of Arab juveniles who throw stones at the passing automobiles of Jewish settlers.

3. Israel’s international isolation as proof of Jewish chosenness. Jewish fundamentalists hold a deep-seated belief that almost the only distinction worth making among human groups is that between Jews and Gentiles. Thus, fundamentalists interpret what they consider the extremely irrational opprobrium heaped on Israel by the world community as yet more evidence of the Jewish people’s special, divine destiny—“a theological sign of election.” Considering this belief, the state of Israel, by attracting “outrage and persecution,” merely continues the traditional role of the Jew in world history—that of a “barometer for registering the moral state of the nations.”

The concept of an ontologically based opposition between Jews and Gentiles is so central to fundamentalist thinking that a GUSH EMUNIM ideologue could write: “All the nations of the world well know that the goal of the Arabs is to destroy the people of Israel, God forbid, and nonetheless they take their side. All except the UNITED STATES of America, who stands by the side of Israel; truly this is a miracle from heaven.”

4. The impossibility of arriving at a negotiated peace. According to fundamentalist thinking, the scale and pervasiveness of Gentile hostility to Israel reflect the underlying spiritual tension that God introduced into the world via his covenant with the Jews and cannot be assuaged through negotiation or compromise. All efforts, no matter how structured or under whose auspices, are bound to fail. This is so because the conflict is not a “normal” one; territorial and political problems are but superficial aspects of the metaphysical struggle being waged. Real peace (shalom-emet) will come only when Israel possesses the whole land and the Messiah then comes to rule over the reunited people of Israel. For this reason the fundamentalists vehemently opposed the 1979 Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty accomplished in the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS and ISRAEL’S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA IN 2005.

5. The cardinal importance of the land of Israel. Jewish fundamentalists are wont to proclaim “the Land of Israel, for the People of Israel, according to the Torah of Israel.” The primacy of the land relates to motivation. The Jews’ return to Israel must be based on their love of the land of Zion rather than an attempt to find refuge from persecution. In the covenant between God and the Jewish people, the land is holy because God dwells in it and chooses the Jews to dwell with him. Nonfundamentalist Orthodox Jews often criticize what they consider the fundamentalists’ tendency toward “idolatry” in their focus on Eretz Yisrael (GREATER LAND OF ISRAEL) as the supreme value in Jewish life. But for all Jewish fundamentalists, an attachment to the entire land of Israel is at the core of their worldview. They believe that while other people may feel an attachment to their homeland, only the Jews in fact have a divinely ordained relationship to their land. The entire land of Israel is the promised land to be “conquered, possessed, and settled,” and Jews must rely on this promise despite Arab and other Gentile opposition to the land’s habitation and rule by Jews. One implication of this belief is that political debates over territorial questions are absurd from the fundamentalist perspective. In this context it is also inappropriate and even dangerous to justify the need to maintain Jewish rule of this or that piece of the land because of security, economic, or DEMOGRAPHIC necessities, because the right to the whole land is not based on such essentially changeable and conditional considerations.
6. Current history as the unfolding of the redemption process. A key element in Jewish fundamentalism, as in many fundamentalist movements, is its adherents’ belief that they possess special and direct access to transcendental truth, to the future course of events, and to an understanding of what the future requires. For Jewish fundamentalists history is God’s means of communication with his people. Political trends and events contain messages that provide instructions, reprimands, and rewards. Political and historical analysis, properly undertaken, is equivalent to the interpretation of God's will. Together with interpretations of religious texts, this analysis guides the continuing struggle toward redemption.

7. The faith and ideological dedication of the Jews as decisive factors. Although they believe that God has the dominant role in shaping human history, Jewish fundamentalists are not fatalists. Their call for sustained political mobilization is based on their view of the Jewish people as God's chosen assistants in the process of tikkun olam (repair of the world), which will culminate in complete redemption and establishment of the messianic kingdom. Accordingly, a key belief of the fundamentalists is that the success of efforts to accomplish the political objectives necessary for redemption will be determined by the vision of Jewish leaders, their sensitivity to the imperatives of the hour, and, especially, the single-minded faith and spiritual discipline of the Jewish people as a whole. Virtually all political contacts are therefore construed as tests of the vision, courage, and will of the Jewish people and its leadership.

Emergence of Jewish Fundamentalist Groups

Gush Emunim is not the only fundamentalist group in Israel, but largely because of its actions in the SETTLEMENT movement, it has garnered significant attention. Like other fundamentalist movements, it evolved as a response to crisis both in the wider world (modernity, secularism) and in the national group to which it belongs. Ironically, the crisis addressed by Jewish fundamentalist ideology and the Jewish fundamentalist movement originated with the success of secular Zionism and the establishment of the Jewish state. The drama of national salvation was, to the disappointment and surprise of observant Jews, performed by non-observers. Between the secular pioneers on the one hand and the ultra-Orthodox on the other, young religious Zionists felt marginalized and second best. They were neither the vanguard of the nation nor the exemplars of religious commitment. Their frustration was fueled by their conviction, based on the teachings and influence of the two Rabbis Kook, that the Zionist project was divinely orchestrated. In the view of the national religious adherents, secular Zionists had ignored the divine basis of the Zionist imperative, while the ultra-Orthodox erred in not seeing the Zionist enterprise as part of the process of divine redemption. The 1967 War, in which Israel triumphed over its Arab neighbors, and the subsequent crisis of the 1973 War gave the fundamentalists the opportunity to correct what they saw as the blindness of other groups in Israeli society.

In his research on the origins of the Gush Emunim, sociologist Gideon Aran focused on the group of young religious Zionists who comprised the GACHELET. In the early years of the state, the group arrived at the Mercaz HaRav Yeshiva, where its members encountered the younger Rabbi Kook. Developing the writings of his father, Kook presented them with an ideology that placed the victorious Zionist project within a religious framework and assigned his followers a privileged position with respect to other groups. This combination of an enthusiastic young group, the message of the yeshiva, and the historical opportunity provided by the two wars helps to explain why the movement emerged in its current form.

Political scientist Ehud Sprinzak points out that in many respects Gush Emunim is not as revolutionary as it may seem, especially not from the perspective of the National Religious camp. In their ideology and religious practice there is little difference between the Gush Emunim believers and the rest of the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY (NRP) from which they emerged. Although they founded new settlements in the Occupied Territories, the religious communities within Israel serve as the bases from which the groups leave on their missions and provide logistic aid and moral support. Gush Emunim can be viewed as the tip of the iceberg for the rest of the National Religious camp and the Jewish fundamentalists.

Gush Emunim initially constituted an ideological group within the NRP, but in the wake of the trauma of the 1973 War, ideological differences emerged and the Gush split. The Gush Emunim people—mostly yeshiva graduates, rabbis, and teachers—immediately launched a vigorous information campaign to explain their position. Through kaffeeklatsches, meetings in schools and yeshivot, and so on, they carried their campaign to all parts of the country. At the same time they began organizing people to live in the settlements they planned to set up in the WEST BANK. Gush Emunim did not require formal membership, which meant that people could participate in particular activities without any obligation to support Gush's other activities or broad platform. The absence of formal membership, however, makes it impossible to confirm or refute Gush Emunim's claims regarding the size of its following.

History of Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel

Some three weeks before the outbreak of the 1967 War, on the eve of Israeli's Independence Day, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook delivered a sermon in which, according to his disciples, he stated: "Nineteen years ago, on the very night that the decision of the UNITED NATIONS to create the state of Israel was handed down, as the entire people rejoiced, I was unable to join in their happiness. I sat alone—quiet and depressed. In those very first hours I was not able to accept what had been done, that terrible news, that indeed 'my land they have divided' had occurred! Yes, where is our Hebron—have we forgotten it?! And where is our Schechem [Nablus] and our JERICHO, where—will we forget them?! And all of Trans-Jordan—it is all ours, every single clod of earth, each little bit, every part of the land is part of the land of God—is it in our power to surrender even one millimeter of it?!" Later, the words and the timing of their utterance were taken by the fundamentalists as a sign of the coming of the Messiah.

The 1967 Six Day War, in which Israel gained the Sinai Peninsula, the GAZA STRIP, the West Bank, eastern Jerusalem, and the Golan Heights, can be seen as the watershed event that brought Jewish fundamentalism to the fore of Israeli politics. For the fundamentalists the war was a cataclysmic event that opened up the territories for settlement and allowed movement activists to create a public atmosphere that would enable the emergence of a religious-messianic movement. Immediately after the war the idea of Greater Israel was affirmed by a group of mostly secular public figures, including some of Israel's best-known authors and poets, but within the first year after the war, the National Religious camp took the first steps to settle the area of Judea (the West Bank). The "Children of Kfar Etzion" returned to rebuild their village, and a group headed by RABBI MOSHE LEVINGER went to settle in Hebron in the West Bank. Meanwhile, other Jewish settlements that were mainly secular were established with governmental assistance, especially along the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, in the Yamit region in Sinai, and on the Golan Heights, so that strategic areas would remain under Israeli rule after any peace agreements. In the early 1970s the Elon Moreh gari'in was organized to settle in the vicinity of Nablus, and the Gush Emunim movement was formally established in 1974, holding its first meeting in Kfar Etzion.

The history of the fundamentalist movement can be roughly divided into six periods, with some overlap. In the formative phase during the LABOR-led government of YITZHAK RABIN (1974–1977), Gush Emunim pursued three types of activity: it protested Israel's interim agreements with EGYPT and SYRIA; it staged demonstrations in the West Bank to underscore the Jewish attachment to Judea and Samaria, part of Eretz Yisrael; and it carried out settlement operations in the Occupied Territories.

Gush Emunim's protest activity began with active support of a hunger strike that leaders of the Greater Israel Movement started on Independence Day in May 1974 outside the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. There were repeated protests against US secretary of state HENRY KISSINGER, who was shuttling to and from Israel as a peacemaker after the Yom Kippur War. Participation in these demonstrations, which continued sporadically until the fall of 1975, ranged from the scores of people blocking traffic in Jerusalem, thereby obstructing official motorcades, to the thousands who filled Jerusalem's Zion Square and clashed with the police. This activity peaked in October 1974, when a mass rally was held in Tel Aviv's Malkhei Yisrael Square to urge recognition of Judea and Samaria as inseparable parts of the national territory. After the Interim Agreement with Egypt and the end of Kissinger's visits, smaller protest demonstrations opposite the Knesset building or the prime minister's office reminded policymakers that the Gush had not abandoned this avenue of activity.

Additionally, the first phase witnessed strong efforts by the Elon Moreh gari'in to establish new settlements. After their eighth attempt the gari'in received permission to settle, forming the ELON MOREH SETTLEMENT and that of Kdumim, and another part of the group formed the settlement of Ofra.

The second period began with the change of government in 1977. Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN began his term of office with the declaration "there will be many Elon-Morehs." The Israeli government, however, proceeded to conduct peace talks with Egypt and curtailed the establishment of more settlements in response to international pressure. But Gush Emunim succeeded in privately establishing more settlements and began a process of institutionalization, setting up a coordinating agency (Amana) in 1977 and in 1980 the YESHA COUNCIL, a body representing the heads of religious councils in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Some of the former leadership figures found formal roles within newly formed local governments, and local leaders began to assume leadership roles in the movement.

The third period began with the struggle against the Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai, a major blow to imagined future prospects of the West Bank settlements. Subsequently, in 1985 a plan was uncovered to blow up the mosques on the TEMPLE MOUNT by the Jewish Underground (TERROR AGAINST TERROR), a group of settlers that had targeted Palestinians. When its leaders and activists were found to be important members of Gush Emunim, there were heated internal debates and the movement's standing with the Israeli public was jeopardized. Gush Emunim ceased to exist as an organization and was replaced by various settler organizations, some ad hoc and some permanent, but most were fundamentalist in nature. Throughout the period, however, the settlement project gained in power and political influence.

The fourth period began in December 1987 with the first Palestinian INTIFADA, whose most violent events were directed against isolated settlements on the West Bank's hilltops. The settlers retaliated, and numerous violent encounters took place between them and their Palestinian neighbors. While the settlements continued to increase in population, they found themselves under constant physical attack and had to change tactics in order to maintain their momentum.

A fifth period started with the OSLO ACCORDS. Certain areas in the Occupied Territories were handed over to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, and weapons-bearing Palestinian policemen patrolled in close proximity to the settlers, who feared that the new government would evacuate them.

The final period began with the second or AL-AQSA INTIFADA in September 2000. Although the hallmark of that Intifada is the murderous SUICIDE BOMBINGS in Israeli cities, over 95 percent of the terrorist attacks took place in the Occupied Territories, targeting settlers and the soldiers guarding them. Consequently, settlement growth slowed somewhat, and some secular and less ideological settlements were partially abandoned. An emerging phenomenon is the dramatic appearance of the young second-generation settlers, nicknamed "the youth of the hills," who attempt to settle in OUTPOSTS (ma'ahazim) on virgin areas in the territories.

In the wake of the second Intifada the fundamentalist settlers have suffered two major setbacks. To prevent terrorist infiltration into Israeli cities a BARRIER was built, roughly along the pre-1967 borders, although partially within the West Bank. This leaves some of the settlers behind a physical barrier, alongside their hostile Palestinian neighbors, and strongly hints that many of the ideological settlements will not remain in place. Second, in 2005 the Israeli government, headed by ARIEL SHARON, implemented a plan of unilateral disengagement from Gaza, evacuating all Jewish settlements from the Gaza Strip as well as four settlements in the northern West Bank.

Attitudes toward the Palestinians

Fundamentalist Jewish settlers in the Occupied Territories regard the Palestinians as both a theological challenge and a practical problem. Given their ideology—that they are prepared to engage in an eternal struggle with the Arabs to realize their worldview—it is difficult to imagine that the fundamentalists would compromise with Palestinians or even engage in negotiations that acknowledge collective Palestinian rights to the land. In fact, SETTLER VIOLENCE against the Palestinians, extensively documented by B'TSELEM and other human rights groups, has been a continuous phenomenon from the beginning of the settlement project. Moreover, the fundamentalists have had the open or tacit assistance of Israeli governmental ministries, including all of Israel's law enforcement authorities—the military, the police, the state prosecutor, and the judicial system. As detailed by the KARP COMMISSION, the SHAMGAR COMMISSION, and numerous detailed reports from B'Tselem, the government has had an undeclared policy of absolute, compromise, and mitigation for Israeli citizens who violate the law vis-à-vis Palestinians. Thus the fundamentalists have not only been able to control much of the LAND and WATER resources of the settlement areas, but have also engaged with impunity in egregious acts of intimidation, harassment, and worse against Palestinians.

For the fundamentalists the solution to the Israeli-Arab conflict resides in Israel's annexation of the Occupied (in their terms "liberated") Territories. The Palestinian population would be given residential rights rather than citizenship, and those who oppose Israeli rule would be evicted. From the fundamentalists' perspective, the Intifadas represent not group feelings of rage or a surge of nationalistic sentiments but rather the work of isolated provocateurs who should be removed from the territories.

Over the years the relations between Palestinians and fundamentalists have been characterized by increasing violence, which seems to be related to the emergence of a new generation of settler-fundamentalists. When Gush Emunim and other fundamentalist groups started out, conflict with the Palestinians was still limited, but for the younger generation the violence has been a real experience and continuous part of life, resulting in intense hostility toward the Palestinians. Also, the younger generation is less attached to the elaborate teaching of Rabbi Kook and Mercaz HaRav and is much more willing to demonstrate their hostility to the Palestinians as well as to express blatantly racist attitudes.

These second-generation fundamentalist settlers have made a strong attempt to assert themselves in the public sphere. For example, the settler youth have formed a group that opposes the Yesha Council, the more established leadership of the fundamentalist settler community. Although many young settlers follow the lead of their parents and attempt to establish new settlements or neighborhoods adjacent to already established settlements, others prefer to act individually and create illegal outposts on hilltops. The rapid growth of outposts is in part connected to new spiritual influences on the young settlers. They incorporate trends taken from Kabbalism and other contemporary examples.

Radicalization of Jewish Fundamentalism

Although Jewish fundamentalism is itself a radicalization of Israeli politics, religion, and positions regarding the Palestinians, the fundamentalist camp has undergone a radical transformation through the years. Alongside the main camp, splinter groups have emerged and have expressed greater urgency, more extremism, increased willingness to engage in direct conflict with Israeli authorities and the public, and far deeper racist attitudes toward the Palestinians than Gush Emunim did. Where Gush Emunim worked for a gradual evolution of Israeli society, new fundamentalist sectors have pushed toward a faster revolution.

The first and most important group to emerge as radical-right opposition to Gush Emunim was the KACH movement, created in the early 1970s and headed by RABBI MEIR KAHANE. The leader of the US-based JEWISH DEFENSE LEAGUE, he made his reputation in the radical and highly contested struggle to get MOSCOW to allow Jewish emigration. Arriving in Israeli in 1971, he resided in KIRYAT ARBA, which became the stronghold of his new movement. Kahane proposed to implement the religious law (halakah) in Israel immediately. Unlike Gush Emunim, which indirectly pressured the Palestinians to leave with unfavorable policies, his trademark was to demand the forced eviction of Palestinians, including Israeli citizens, from the land of Israel. In the Knesset he promoted a law stating that only Jews can be Israeli citizens.

After Kahane was assassinated in New York in 1990, his son, BINYAMIN ZE'EV KAHANE, formed a competing group called KAHANE CHAI (Kahane Lives). Both Kahane Chai and Kach were disqualified from the 1992 Knesset election on the basis of racism, and after BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, a Kach activist, committed the mass murder of twenty-nine Muslims at prayer in Hebron, both were declared illegal. Kahane's son was himself killed with his wife by Palestinians near the settlement of Ofra in 2000.

Another radical fundamentalist group that emerged in the 1980s was the Jewish Underground (or Terror Against Terror). The group emerged from Kiryat-Arba, Ofra, and religious settlements in the Golan Heights, and over a period of five years organized various acts of violence against Palestinians. Among these were the booby-trapping of cars of Palestinian mayors and the random shooting spree at the Islamic College of Hebron, but their most radical act was the attempt to blow up the mosques on AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF/Temple Mount. This plan was foiled, and the group was captured in 1986 while attempting to blow up buses containing Palestinian workers. The group's members were brought to trial and received long terms in jail; however, after public protests and demonstrations by their communities, they were released after serving less than five years of their sentence.

Fundamentalist groups are currently dispersed in various settlements in the West Bank. A nucleus of radicals remain in Kiryat Arba and several other settlements that are known for radicalism—Yitzhar and Tapuah in Samaria and Bat Ain in the Etzion Bloc. In the OLD CITY of Jerusalem a variety of groups, including the Temple Institute, the TEMPLE MOUNT Faithful, and ATARA L' YOSHNA, are involved in plans to build the THIRD TEMPLE on what is now al-Haram ash-Sharif.

New and more radical fundamentalist groups constantly emerge while older groups, such as Gush Emunim, develop new reservations and responses with regard to their goals and situation. Starting with the evacuation from the Yamit settlement in the Sinai after the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty, the fundamentalists have experienced setbacks, which they consider the state's betrayal of its own sacred trust. The Oslo Accords were another crisis, in which Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated by a fundamentalist student, and so were further agreements with the Palestinian National Authority as well as Israel's unilateral disengagement from Gaza and evacuation of settlements. These government acts raised basic questions for the fundamentalists: Is the state really sacred? Is the Israeli army sacred after evacuating settlers from their homes? Will the Israeli public eventually see the light, or should more radical measures be taken? By the end of 2008 the conflict between the more radical religious Zionists and the state could lead to further radicalism, including a greater propensity toward violence on the part of the growing fundamentalist movement, especially in the settler community.

Bibliography

- Abromowitz, Leah. "'Gahalet' Embers Ignite Israel's Towns." Jewish Action. Summer 2008.
- Aran, Gideon. "From Religious Zionism to Zionist Religion: The Roots of Gush Emunim." Studies in Contemporary Jewry. 2 (1986).
- . "Jewish Zionist Fundamentalism: The Bloc of the Faithful in Israel." In Fundamentalism Observed. Edited by Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- . "A Mystic-Messianic Interpretation of Modern Israeli History: The Six Day War as a Key Event in the Development of the Original Religious Culture of Gush Emunim." Studies in Contemporary Judaism. 4 (1988).
- Aronoff, Myron J. "Gush Emunim: The Institutionalization of a Charismatic, Messianic, Religious-Political Revitalization Movement in Israel." In Religion and Politics, Political Anthropology, Vol. 3. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction, 1984.
- Aviad, Janet. "The Contemporary Israeli Pursuit of the Millennium." Religion. 14 (1984).
- . "The Messianism of Gush Emunim." Studies in Contemporary Jewry. 7 (1991).
- Aviner, Shlomo. "Messianic Realism." In Whose Homeland. Edited by Avner Tomaschoff. Jerusalem: World Zionist Organization, 1978.
- Be'er, Haim. "Gush Emunim—Canaanites Who Wear Phylacteries." Davar. 15 October 1982.
- Benvenisti, Meron. Intimate Enemies: Jews and Arabs in a Shared Land. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.
- Biale, David. "The Messianic Connection: Zionism, Politics, and Settlement in Israel." The Center Magazine. 18:5 (1985).
- Don-Yehiya, Eliezer. "Jewish Messianism, Religious Zionism and Israeli Politics: The Impact and Origins of Gush Emunim." Middle Eastern Studies. 23:2 (1987).
- Feige, Michael. "Jewish Settlement of Hebron: The Place and the Other." GeoJournal. 53 (2001).
- . One Space, Two Places: Gush Emunim, Peace Now and the Construction of Israeli Space. Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 2002.
- . Settling in the Heart: Jewish Fundamentalism in the Occupied Territories. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2009.
- Grant, Michael. Jews in the Roman World. New York: Dorset Press, 1973.
- Grossman, David. The Yellow Wind. Translated from the Hebrew by Haim Watzman. New York: Delta, 1988.
- Harnoi, Meir. The Settlers. Jerusalem: Ma'ariv, 1995.
- Inbari, Motti. Jewish Fundamentalism and the Temple Mount: Who Will Build the Third Temple? Albany, NY: SUNY Press, 2009.
- Isaak, R. Israel Divided: Ideological Politics in the Jewish State. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1976.
- Klausner, Joseph. The Messianic Idea in Israel: From Its Beginning to the Completion of the Mishnah. New York: Macmillan, 1955.
- Kniel, Shlomo. "The Settlers of the Hill—the Biblical Sabra? A Pilot Study of the Hill Settlers in Judea and Samaria." In The Religious Zionism: An Era of Change: Studies in Memory of Zvulun Hamer. Edited by A. Cohen and I. Harel. Jerusalem: Bialik Institution, 2004.
- Liebman, Charles, and Eliezer Don-Yehiya. Religion and Politics in Israel. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press, 1984.
- Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1991.
- . Unsettled States, Disputed Lands. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993.
- Medoff, R. "Gush Emunim and the Question of Jewish Counterterrorism." Middle East Review. 18:4 (1986).
- Morgenstern, Arie. "Messianic Concepts and Settlement in the Land of Israel." In Vision and Conflict in the Holy Land. Edited by Richard I. Cohen. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985.
- Neusner, Jacob. First Century Judaism in Crisis: Yohanan ben Zakkai and the Renaissance of Torah. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1975.

- Newman, David, ed. The Impact of Gush Emunim. London: Croom Helm, 1985.
- Ohana, David, "Kfar Etzion: The Community of Memory and the Myth of Return." Israel Studies. 7:2 (2002).
- Ravitzki, Avi. Messianism, Zionism and Jewish Religious Radicalism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Scholem, Gershom. "The Messianic Idea in Judaism." In The Messianic Idea in Judaism and Other Essays on Jewish Spirituality. New York: Schocken Books, 1971.
- Segal, Haggai. Dear Brothers: The West Bank Jewish Underground. New York: Beit-Shamai Publications, 1988.
- Shafat, Gershon. Gush Emunim: The Story behind the Scenes. Beit El, West Bank, 1985.
- Shafir, Gershon. "Institutional and Spontaneous Settlement Drives: Did Gush Emunim Make a Difference?" In The Impact of Gush Emunim. Edited by David Newman. London: Croom Helm, 1985.
- Sheleg, Yair. The New Religious Jews: Recent Developments among Observant Jews in Israel. Jerusalem: Keter, 2000.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- . "Gush Emunim: The Iceberg Model of Political Extremism." Jerusalem Quarterly. 21 (1981).
- . Gush Emunim: The Politics of Zionist Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: American Jewish Committee, 1986.
- Weisburd, David. Jewish Settler Violence: Deviance as Social Reaction. University Park: Pennsylvania State University, 1989.
- Yadgar, Ya'acov. "Between 'the Arab' and 'the Religious Rightist': 'Significant Others' in the Construction of Jewish-Israeli National Identity." Nationalism and Ethnic Politics. 9:1 (2003).
- Yiftachel, Oren. Ethnocracy: Land and Identity Politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.

—Michael Feige

Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

Jewish Legion

The Jewish Legion was a military formation of Jewish volunteers in World War I who fought in the British army to liberate Palestine from Turkish rule. When Britain waged war against the OTTOMAN Turks, Zionists around the world saw it as an opportunity to promote British sympathy for a Jewish national homeland.

In December 1914, revisionist leaders VLADIMIR (ZE'EV) JABOTINSKY and JOSEPH TRUMPENDOR first raised the idea of the formation of a Jewish unit, and by the end of March 1915, 500 Jewish volunteers, originally from EGYPT (who had been deported by the Turks), had started training. Before the war ended, five battalions of Jewish volunteers were established for the British army: the 38th through 42nd (Service) Battalions of the Royal Fusiliers. Together they were known as the Jewish Legion.

The British initially opposed the participation of Jewish volunteers on the Palestinian front and ordered Zionist volunteers to serve as a detachment for mule transport in another sector of the Turkish front. Trumpendor formed the 650-strong ZION MULE CORPS, of whom 562 were sent to Gallipoli, where he led his troops with great distinction. Jabotinsky served as an officer and advocated a Jewish Legion on the Palestinian front. In August 1917, Britain announced the formation of a Jewish regiment designated as the 38th Battalion of the Royal Fusiliers.

In April 1918 the 38th was joined by the 39th Battalion, made up almost entirely of Jewish residents of the UNITED STATES and Canada. In June 1918 the volunteers of the 38th Battalion fought for the liberation of Eretz Yisrael (Palestine) from Turkish rule some twenty miles north of JERUSALEM. In the fighting in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, more than twenty legionnaires were killed, wounded, or captured, and the rest came down with malaria, which caused thirty deaths. In its next mission, crossing the Jordan River, Jabotinsky led the effort, for which he was later decorated.

Ninety-two Turkish Jews who had been captured in earlier fighting were also permitted to enlist and became the 40th Battalion. In late 1919 the Jewish Legion was reduced to one battalion, titled First Judeans, which was awarded a distinctive cap-badge inscribed with a menorah and the Hebrew word Kadima (forward). Immediately after the end of World War I in November 1918, almost all the members of the Jewish regiments were discharged. Some of them returned to their respective countries, while others settled in Palestine, hoping to realize their Zionist aspirations, and later used their military training to fight the Palestinians and the British.

Bibliography

- Gilner, Elias. War and Hope: A History of the Jewish Legion. New York: Herzl Press, 1969.
- Jabotinsky, Vladimir. Story of the Jewish Legion. New York: Bernard Ackerman, 1945.
- Watts, Martin. The Jewish Legion and the First World War. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.

Jewish Lobby

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS

Jewish National Fund

The Jewish National Fund (JNF, or Keren Kayemeth L'Yisrael) is one of the major ISRAELI NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS. It was proposed at the First World ZIONIST CONGRESS in 1897 by Hermann Shapira (1840–1898), a Lithuanian-born scientist and mathematician, as an institution that would purchase LAND in Palestine that could neither be sold nor mortgaged, thus remaining in perpetuity the property of the Jewish people. Land owned by the JNF would be leased only to Jews, initially for forty-nine-year periods (later ninety-nine years). The proposal was adopted at the Fifth World Zionist Congress in 1901, together with two fund-raising tools: blue collection boxes for Jewish homes and the JNF stamp. In 1905 the JNF purchased its first tract of land in Palestine. It was registered in Britain under the British Companies Act, established its headquarters in Cologne (moved to The Hague at the outbreak of World War I), and opened an office in JAFFA in 1908 (moving to JERUSALEM in 1922).

The JNF's engagement in reclaiming the "Land of Israel" for the Jewish people has involved a range of land infrastructure development projects, including reservoir construction (it built 180 dams and reservoirs), river rehabilitation, afforestation (it planted over 240 million trees in Israel), construction of hundreds of miles of roads, development of new towns, and establishment of more than 1,000 parks. However, its most important, and controversial, role has been in the acquisition of land for the exclusive use of Jews.

After its establishment, the JNF immediately began making small land purchases, and by 1920 was able to acquire large tracts, mainly in the Jezreel Valley. Continual land purchases followed, some in urban areas but primarily in agricultural areas. The JNF played a central role in establishing the first modern Jewish city, Tel Aviv, as a suburb of the well-established and ancient Arab city of Jaffa. By 1932 the JNF had acquired 75,000 acres and, by 1938, 125,000 acres. At the time of the UN Partition Resolution (UN RESOLUTION 181) in November 1947, the JNF had acquired a total of 936,000 dunums (approximately 232,000 acres); however, this constituted only 3.55 percent of the total land of Palestine. Moreover, together with all other Jewish holdings, the Zionists owned merely 7 percent of Palestine. Nevertheless, the Partition Resolution gave the Zionists 5,500 square miles for a Jewish state (consigning the indigenous majority of Palestinians to a 4,500-square-mile allotment).

As early as the beginning of February 1948, two months prior to the commencement of the takeover of Arab villages, DAVID BEN-GURION told JNF leaders: "The war will give us the land. Concepts of 'ours' and 'not ours' are peace-time concepts only, and they lose their meaning during war." In a similar vein, Ben-Gurion asked YOSEF WEITZ (1890–1970), director of the JNF Lands Department/Development Division and head of the TRANSFER COMMITTEE, whether the JNF was ready to buy "from him" land at £25 a dunum, to which Weitz replied that they would buy if the land was Arab-owned and if they received the deed of property and possession. Of course, Ben-Gurion could not provide such deeds. On 13 May 1948, just before the state of Israel was declared, Ben-Gurion offered to "sell" a massive 2 million dunums of land to the JNF for £0.5 per dunum. He was, in fact, trying to sell land his forces did not yet occupy to raise money for arms.

As the Israeli conquest of Palestine proceeded and its inhabitants were expelled or fled the hostilities, more Palestinian land became available to the JNF. On 19 August 1948 the JNF formally asked to lease 193,500 dunums (47,000 acres) of "abandoned" land from the Ministry of Agriculture. In November 1948, it leased 154,000 dunum (38,000 acres) for one year from the Ministry of Agriculture. The JNF then sublet the land to new Jewish settlements. Weitz continued to press for expanded JNF control over refugee property. He wanted legal JNF ownership of the land, not merely leases. He was anxious to open up the lands for Jewish immigrants and expressed his impatience shortly after the JNF acquired its first refugee land from the state in 1949: "Of the entire area of the State of Israel only about 300,000–400,000 dunums [74,000–99,000 acres] . . . are state domain which the Israeli government took over from the mandatory regime. The JNF and private Jewish owners possess under two million dunums [494,000 acres]. Almost all the rest belongs at law to Arab owners, many of whom have left the country. The fate of these Arabs will be settled when the terms of the peace treaties between Israel and her Arab neighbors are finally drawn up. The JNF, however, cannot wait until then to obtain the land it requires for its pressing needs [settlement of new immigrants]. It is, therefore, acquiring part of the land abandoned by the Arab owners, through the government of Israel, the sovereign authority in Israel.”

Following passage of UN RESOLUTION 194 of 11 December 1948, which endorsed the refugees’ right of return, and in the context of Israel’s completion of the Occupation of the most fertile and most populated areas of Palestine, the JNF was seen by the government as the mechanism by which land that was previously owned by Arabs could be “legally” purchased by Jews from the state. Accordingly, the government began to sell absentee lands left behind by their Arab owners to the JNF. Ben-Gurion told Weitz and Ezra Danin (1903–1985, also of the Transfer Committee) on 18 December 1948 that “the JNF would buy land only from the State. There was no need to buy land from Arabs.” Ben-Gurion perhaps entertained the hope that the Palestinians would sell their land; however, there is no evidence to support that. The refugees assumed that they would return to their homes and land after the hostilities concluded.

On 27 January 1949, one month after Ben-Gurion told Weitz not to buy land directly from Palestinians, the government and the JNF concluded a major deal by which the JNF would “purchase” 1 million dunums (247,000 acres) of refugee land for $44 million (£11 million Israeli), although the actual price, payable in installments, would be determined by a joint state-JNF committee and would vary according to location and type of land. In addition, the JNF agreed to pay an additional $29 million (£7,250,000 Israeli) to the state and the JEWISH AGENCY to assist in settling immigrants on the land. The JNF insisted that the land be legally transferred to it within one year of signing the contract in order to ensure the JNF right of ownership.

Of this massive real estate transaction, the largest such transaction ever carried out in Israel, Meron Benvenisti commented, “the uprooted Palestinians including tens of thousands of ‘PRESENT ABSENTEE’ citizens, did not get a single agora for their land that was given to the JNF, while the government of Israel was compensated in their stead in a deal that was illegal even according to the heads of the JNF.” This was followed later by additional sales of some 250,000 dunums (62,000 acres). Indeed, after independence, it was the confiscated land of the refugees and the “present absentees”—seized by the Israeli state government—that the JNF purchased from the government.

In 1954 more than a third of Israel’s population lived on property that had belonged to Arab refugees or to “present absentees” (some 30,000 Palestinian Arabs with Israeli citizenship whose property was confiscated because they had fled to other places in Israel during the war). Though Arabs account for some 18–20 percent of Israel’s population, they own only 3 percent of the land. The real problem posed by the JNF is that in acting as caretaker of the land for the Jewish people only in a period of protracted national conflict, it was bound, whatever the intention, to be discriminatory. However, it seems that most Jews did not ask the question: from whom was the land “redeemed”? The JNF published a survey in 2005 showing that over 70 percent of the Israeli-Jewish public opposed allocating JNF land to non-Jews (over 80 percent preferred that Israel be defined as the state of the Jewish people and not the state of all its citizens).

In 1960 the JNF and the Israeli government negotiated a covenant that provided for the establishment of two separate bodies. The first was a government land authority headed by the minister of agriculture—the ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION (ILA)—that would manage all state and JNF lands (by then about 13 percent of the total) and follow a unified policy that ensured perpetual ownership of the land and its use by Jews only. The second was a land DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY, which was to be in charge of land reclamation, afforestation, and certain other forms of land development. This agreement was based on the BASIC LAW: Israel Lands (19 July 1960). By 2006, about half of the total JNF land had once belonged to Palestinian refugees, having been seized without compensation.

According to the Israel Lands Law the JNF appoints 49 percent of the council members (the government appoints 51 percent) of the ILA, which controls 93 percent of the land in Israel and grants leases rather than selling land. Much of this land is “STATE LAND” that was either acquired from Palestinians dispossessed during the 1948 WAR or confiscated from Palestinian citizens of Israel.

Following the 1967 WAR and Israel’s OCCUPATION of the Golan Heights, the WEST BANK, the GAZA STRIP, the Sinai, and East JERUSALEM, the JNF undertook unprecedented land reclamations in coordination with the Jewish Agency in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. It acquired massive amounts of land, which were designated “state land” and therefore reserved for Jewish use only, as well as the major WATER resources in the occupied areas.

Of the JNF’s role in the Occupied Territories, Israeli writer and editor Dan Leon reported the following: “The JNF claims that it does not operate over the ‘green line’ [the 1967 border] but the JNF subsidiary Himnuta, as an instrument for the implementation of JNF policies, makes no such claim. Himnuta was established by the JNF in 1938 and registered in Ramallah in 1971. Its original function in the 1930s was mainly to circumvent legal restrictions on land dealings, so there is a degree of continuity in its current endeavors. As a private rather than a public company it enjoys the advantage that its activities are not properly supervised. Hence it can avoid most public exposure.

“When the public eye is turned upon Himnuta, it appears, for example, under the headline ‘Ring suspected of trading in stolen Palestinian land’ in Ha’aretz. We read that Haim Cohen, the former director of Himnuta, and four others, were suspected of ‘purchasing stolen Palestinian lands in exchange for bribes . . . police suspect that the ring was responsible for at least five deals in which West Bank lands were stolen from their Palestinian owners and sold to Himnuta for a total of more than NIS 20 million. Nineteen lawyers were said to be involved in the fraud. The stolen lands are located near HEBRON, Gush Etzion, JERICHO, [MA’ALE] ADUMIM and Givat Ze’ev. All these areas are located in the occupied West Bank, or in formerly Palestinian-owned Jewish neighborhoods in Jerusalem, settled since 1967.’ Apart from the criminal aspects, the major issue is the involvement of the JNF with its ‘Jews-only’ policies in the Occupied Territories.”

Leon continues, “It is also known that in 1972 the JNF paid half the cost of a highway through the West Bank linking Jerusalem with the upper JORDAN [RIFT] VALLEY. JNF Director Shimon Ben Shemesh said on Israel Radio on 23 September 97 that during the past year the JNF had purchased lands in the territories for the sum of over US$66 million, including lands in the Nebi Samuel area, huge tracts in the area between Ramallah and Latrun. Another report spoke of JNF land deals in the northern part of the Jordan Valley, southeast of NABLUS, near KIRYAT ARBA, south of Ramallah, east of Kafr Qasim, and in Gush Etzion.

“The JNF itself sometimes inadvertently lets the cat out of the bag in connection with the Occupied Territories. For instance in a reference in the official 2003 JNF website we read that the 1967 Six Day War ‘started a fresh page in the history of Israel and the JNF was enlisted to develop new areas for settlement.’ In addition to areas within the green line, one of the areas developed for settlement was none other than Rafah [in the Gaza Strip, then occupied by Israel]. In general, since, as we have noted, such activities in the territories are not publicized and do not appear in JNF reports, the random examples quoted here, which somehow manage to escape the secrecy, may well be only the tip of the iceberg. At any rate, all this is summed up in the statement by Amiram Barkat in Ha’aretz of 28 February 2005 that ‘Himnuta has made extensive purchases in the territories, where the JNF does not operate.’”

Other controversial JNF programs are its efforts to build up Jewish communities in the most densely populated Palestinian areas—the Galilee and the Negev. All Israeli Palestinians have suffered from ZIONISM’s discriminatory policies but perhaps none more than the Negev BEDOUIN. According to the Israeli Foreign Ministry, 110,000 Bedouin live in the Negev (plus 50,000 in the Galilee and 10,000 in the central region of Israel). Prior to the establishment of Israel in 1948, there were an estimated 65,000–90,000 Bedouin living in the Negev. Like other Palestinian Arabs, their land and water resources have been taken by the state. Today roughly half of Israel’s Bedouin population lives in seven government-built townships/reserves, where they were essentially forcibly relocated after losing their grazing lands and means of livelihood. The other half of the Negev Bedouin population continues to live in forty-five “UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES,” some of which predate the existence of Israel. These villages do not appear on any commercial maps and are denied basic services like water, electricity, schools, access roads, clinics, or sewage systems. It is forbidden by the Israeli authorities for the residents of these villages to build permanent structures, though many do, risking fines and home demolition.

Nevertheless, in 2006 the JNF signed a forty-nine-year lease agreement with the state of Israel that gives it control over 30,000 hectares (74,132 acres) of Negev land for development of forests. More recently the JNF has undertaken a $600 million project entitled “Blueprint Negev,” which aims to attract and build infrastructure for 250,000 new Jewish settlers. There is no recognition on the JNF website of the existence or rights of the Palestinians in these unrecognized villages. (<http://www.jnf.org>).

See also BEDOUIN IN ISRAEL; ISRAEL'S NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION; JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL; LAND; WAR, 1948; WATER

Bibliography

- Abu Sitta, Salman. JNF: Financing Racism and Apartheid: Jewish National Fund's Violation of International and Domestic Law. Palestine Land Society. 29 August 2005. <http://www.plands.org/>.
- Adalah. “Jewish National Fund: We Act for the Benefit of the Jewish People Only, Not for the General Public in Israel.” News from Within. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 28 December 2004.
- Bar Gal, Yoram. Propaganda and Zionist Education: The Jewish National Fund 1924–1947. Rochester, NY: University of Rochester Press, 2003.
- Barkat, Amiram. “Himnuta: State-Funded Yet Private.” Ha'aretz. 28 February 2005.
- Benvenisti, Meron. “A Shameful Kind of Zionist.” Ha'aretz. 10 February 2005.
- Beuttel, Ashley C. “Policies of Ethnic Preference: Collective vs. Individual Rights in Israel.” Middle East Policy. 5 (1997).
- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions (COHRE) and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva: COHRE and Badil, 2005.
- Davis, Uri. Israel and the Palestinians. Ithaca, NY: Ithaca Press, 1975.
- Davis, Uri, and Jon Elmer. “Apartheid Israel: An Interview with Uri Davis.” ZNet. 19 September 2004. www.zmag.org/znet.
- Davis, Uri, and Walter Lehn. “And the Fund Still Lives.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 7: 4 (Summer 1978).
- Eldar, Akiva. “Zionism on Trial.” Ha'aretz. 31 January 2005.
- Farsoun, Samih K., and Naseer Aruri. Palestine and the Palestinians: A Social and Political History, 2nd ed. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2006.
- Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1976.
- Kressel, Getzel. “The Jewish National Fund.” In New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel. Edited by Geoffrey Wigoder. A Herzl Press Publication. Teaneck, NJ: Farleigh Dickinson University, 1994.
- Lehn, Walter. To Acquire Jewish Land: The Jewish National Fund, 1901–1948. Nablus: An-Najah National University, 2005. http://www.zajel.org/article\_view.asp?newsID=4518&cat=15.

- . “Between Capital and Land: The Jewish National Fund's Finances and Land-Purchase Priorities in Palestine, 1939–45.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 35:3 (Spring 2006).
- . Jewish National Fund. London: Kegan Paul International, 1988.
- Leon, Dan. “The Jewish National Fund: How the Land Was ‘Redeemed.’” Palestine-Israel Journal of Politics, Economics and Culture. 12:4, 13:1 (May 2006).
- . Who's Left in Israel? Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 2004.
- Palestine Land Society. From Refugees to Citizens at Home. Palestine Land Society. 2001. http://74.125.47.132/search?q=cache:WfLCbtKiUBkJ:www.plands.org/books/citizen/The\_Legal\_Status\_of\_Palestinian\_Land.htm+1948+JNF+land+acquisition&cd=25&hl=en&ct=clnk&gl=ca.
- Pappé, Ilan. The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine. Oxford, UK: Oneworld Publications, 2007.
- . The Israel/Palestine Question. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Shilony, Zvi. Ideology and Settlement: The Jewish National Fund 1897–1914. Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1998.
- Shva, Shlomo. One Day and 90 Years: The Story of the Jewish National Fund. New York: Jewish National Fund, 1991.
- Tuten, Eric. Between Capital and Land: The Jewish National Fund's Finances and Land Purchase Priorities in Palestine, 1939–45. London: Routledge, 2005.
- Yiftachel, Oren. Ethnocracy: Land and Identity Politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.
- Yoaz, Yuval. “JNF Not Required to Act for Good of All, Court Told.” Ha'aretz. 17 December 2004.

Jewish People Policy Planning Institute

The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute was established in JERUSALEM in late 2002 by the JEWISH AGENCY, which was concerned about the “Jewish demographic emergency”—the higher birthrate among Israeli Arabs and Palestinians in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES than among Jewish Israelis. The DEMOGRAPHIC concerns also included the decline in IMMIGRATION to Israel, increasing assimilation of Jews in their countries of origin, increasing intermarriage, increasingly secular identities among Jews, and similar trends. Although based in Jerusalem, the institute operates worldwide. Former US ambassador DENNIS ROSS, who played a major negotiating role in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict especially during the Oslo years (1994–2000), heads the organization as chairman of the board of directors. The institute functions as a subsidiary of the Jewish Agency, which owns 50 percent of its shares. (www.jpppi.org.il).

See also DEMOGRAPHY; DIASPORA, JEWISH, FROM THE PERSPECTIVE OF ISRAEL

Jewish Quarter Development Company

The Jewish Quarter Development Company (JQDC) is a state-owned firm that owns most of the property in the Jewish Quarter of the OLD CITY and funnels government money to settler groups active in acquiring Palestinian properties in and around other sectors of JERUSALEM—especially in Palestinian neighborhoods. For example, in 1987 the redevelopment company transferred NIS 4.215 million ($1.7 million) to four major Jerusalem settler groups—ATERET COHANIM, ATARA L'YOSHNA, Magaleh Orot, and ELAD. The money came from a Housing Ministry fund totaling some NIS 7.2 million ($3 million) that is earmarked for acquiring Palestinian homes in East Jerusalem.

In 2002, the Jewish Quarter Development Company decided to rebuild the Hurva synagogue and entrusted Israeli architect Nahum Meltzer with producing a nearly exact replica of it. The synagogue dates back to the year 1701, when a group of newly arrived Polish Hasidic Jews led by Rabbi Yehuda ha-Hasid began constructing a new house of worship for their small congregation. Two decades later, the building was still unfinished when the congregation ran out of money and was expelled from the city by local Arab creditors, who proceeded to tear down the incomplete structure. The ruined remnants of the building stood, untouched, for a century, giving the synagogue its name—Hurva, Hebrew for “ruin.” Then, in a project that began in 1836, disciples of the Vilna Gaon rebuilt the synagogue. For the next eighty years, the domed, neo-Byzantine synagogue dominated the skyline of the Jewish Quarter. But its architectural reign came to an end in 1948, when the Jordanian army destroyed the Hurva during the 1948 WAR. However, with Israel’s victory over JORDAN in the 1967 WAR, the Hurva’s remnants once again fell into Israeli hands.

Gavriel Rosenfeld, associate professor of history at Fairfield University, has noted that the decision to rebuild the Hurva reflects a variety of motives. One is the desire of the JQDC to complete its forty-year project of renovating the Jewish Quarter of the Old City. From 1967 through the 1980s, the pace of redevelopment in the long-neglected district was slow. But the construction of apartments, shops, and restaurants (and a corresponding rise in real estate values and tourism) in recent years has enhanced the quarter’s status to the point where the Hurva’s ruins appeared anomalous.

Political motives have also played a role. Ever since the late 1960s, the proponents of reconstructing the Hurva have seen the project as a way of increasing the comparatively small Jewish architectural presence in the Old City and symbolically asserting sovereignty over the city more broadly. The rebuilt synagogue is slated to tower over the DOME OF THE ROCK.

The project has adherents and detractors within Israel. Some say that rebuilding the Hurva will obscure traces of eternal Jewish victimization. As long as the Hurva stood as a hulking ruin, it served the same kind of function as sites such as Masada and Yad Vashem—which, by highlighting the tragedies of the Jewish past, helped to confirm the Israeli state as the chief guarantor of the Jewish people’s future.

At the same time, however, it seems the Hurva’s existence as a ruin conflicted with the state of Israel’s Zionist master narrative: the idea that ultimately, heroic achievement triumphs over helplessness. In fact, in the end it may be the project’s ability to confirm the national desire to control its own destiny that best explains its appeal. It might be questioned, though, how its transformation into an icon of redemption from one of victimization will be read within the context of the larger Arab-Israeli conflict. Skeptical observers will likely argue that the Hurva’s restoration may impede peace by functioning as an aggressive symbol of Israel’s commitment to maintaining a permanently united Jerusalem.

The Jewish Quarter Development Company reports the following on the progress of the synagogue: “[In 2007] the frame of the Hurva was completed when the cement dome of the structure was poured. As of November 2008 the Jerusalem stone covering of the frame is almost done. Next the JQDC needs to reach an agreement on the planning for the interior of the building . . . at least 2 years to go until the synagogue is anywhere near completion.”

See also JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM

Bibliography

- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- European Union. EU Heads of Mission Report on East Jerusalem. EUObserver Document. 9 March 2009. <http://www.euobserver.com>.
- Kahn, Kenneth R. "Israel Denies Muslim's Right to Live in Jerusalem's 'Jewish Quarter.'" Washington Report on the Middle East. July–August 1993.
- Ricca, Simone. Reinventing Jerusalem: Israel's Reconstruction of the Jewish Quarter after 1967. London: I. B. Tauris, 2007.
- Rosenfeld, Gavriel. "A New Ruin Rising: The Hurva Synagogue's Latest Incarnation." TheForward.com. 7 November 2007.
- Zohar, Gil. "Trouble in the Jewish Quarter." The Jerusalem Post. 1 November 2007.

Jewish Resistance Movement

With the end of World War II in 1945, the JEWISH AGENCY organized the Jewish Resistance Movement (JRM), which was composed of the military organizations HAGANA, PALMAH, ETZEL, and LEHI, to fight Great Britain in the hope of forcing it out of Palestine.

The JRM's first operation occurred in October 1945, when a Palmah unit attacked the Atlit internment camp and freed 208 illegal Jewish immigrants whom the British had arrested. In November 1945 the JRM launched a major attack on railroads all over Palestine and sank several British coastal patrol launches. In the following months the movement carried out attacks on British police posts, coast guard stations, radar installations, and airfields. In June 1946 it blew up the bridges linking Palestine with neighboring states.

The British authorities reacted on 29 June 1946 (Black Saturday) by arresting the members of the Jewish Agency Executive and undertook a large-scale operation against the Hagana, including the arrest of 3,000 of its members. In searches of the offices of the Jewish Agency, the HISTADRUT (the labor federation), and twenty-seven SETTLEMENTS, British officials discovered a large arms cache at Kibbutz Yagur. The British detained "important" prisoners and women at the Latrun camp and more than 2,000 other militants were held in camps at Rafah.

In response to the British operation the Jewish Agency ordered a halt to armed attacks against the British, but ETZEL and LEHI refused to comply.

In July 1946, ETZEL blew up the central government offices at the KING DAVID HOTEL in Jerusalem, killing eighty people, including government officials and civilians, Britons, Jews, and Arabs. After this operation, condemned explicitly by the Jewish Agency and the Hagana, the JRM ceased to exist, although the resistance continued.

Bibliography

- Bauer, Yehuda. From Diplomacy to Resistance: A History of Jewish-Palestine 1939–1945. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1970.
- Charters, David A. The British Army and Jewish Insurgency in Palestine 1945–47. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.
- Cohen, Michael J., ed. Jewish Resistance to British Rule in Palestine, 1944–1947. New York: Taylor and Francis, 1988.
- Levine, Danny. The Birth of the Irgun Zvai Leumi: The Jewish Resistance Movement. Lynbrook, NY: Gefen Books, 1996.
- Sicker, Martin. Pangs of the Messiah: The Troubled Birth of the Jewish State. Westport, CT: Praeger/Greenwood, 2000.
- Syrkin, Marie. Blessed Is the Match: The Story of Jewish Resistance. New York: Jewish Publishing Society, 1947.
- Zadka, Saul. Blood in Zion: How the Jewish Guerrillas Drove the British out of Palestine. London: Brassey's, 1995.

Jewish Underground, 1980s

See TERROR AGAINST TERROR

Jibril, Ahmad (1938–)

Ahmad Jibril, a Palestinian guerrilla leader, was the founder and head of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND (PFLP-GC). He was from Yazur, a town near JAFFA, and with his family was dispossessed during the 1948 WAR, fleeing Palestine and settling in SYRIA. After Jibril graduated from Britain's royal military academy in Sandhurst, he became a Syrian army cadet and then an officer, rising to the rank of captain in the Syrian army. However, he was expelled from the army for opposing the 1958 union between Syria and EGYPT.

In 1966 Jibril established the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT and until the 1967 WAR carried out a number of military operations against Israel under its banner. In December 1967 he joined the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP) and held operational leadership while its founder, GEORGE HABASH, was imprisoned. However, he disagreed with the PFLP's Marxist turn, and only a year later left the PFLP and formed the PFLP-GC. The PFLP-GC undertook numerous ruthless military operations, and Jibril argued consistently that Israel must be continually subjected to the type of force (airplane hijackings and similar violent attacks) used by some factions within the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION in the 1970s and 1980s.

The PFLP-GC never had a large mass following, especially not in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, and by the 1990s the group was engaged in very few guerrilla actions. Jibril, however, was among the group of Palestinian "rejectionists" who disagreed with Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT's decision to pursue peace negotiations with Israel and a two-state solution. His eldest son, Muhammad Jihad Jibril, was killed on 20 May 2002 in Beirut, Lebanon, by a car bomb attack that Ahmad Jibril blamed on Israel.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Norton, Augustus, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Quandt, William B., Faud Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Resistance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: the Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Jiryis, Sabri (1938–)

Sabri Jiryis is a Palestinian lawyer, scholar, and activist. Born in Fassuta in the Galilee, he obtained a law degree from the Hebrew University in JERUSALEM and practiced law in Israel. He became a leading figure in the AL-ARD movement—a pan-Arabist, noncommunist vehicle for Palestinian political activism—and beginning in 1958 helped to edit its newspaper, al-Ard. Israel considered the movement subversive and outlawed it in 1964, although by that time, Jiryis had been placed under house and town arrest several times. In 1966, he published in Hebrew his highly acclaimed Arabs in Israel, still read today.

During the 1967 WAR, Israel arrested Jiryis, and when he was released, he joined the FATAH party and assumed responsibility for its operations in northern Israel. When Jiryis was arrested again in 1970, his French publishers intervened and facilitated his release after three months. At that point he left Israel for LEBANON and became active in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). In 1973 Jiryis began to work for the Palestine Research Center in Beirut, serving as head of its Israel section, and by 1978 he was the center's director-general, a position he held even after the 1982 LEBANON WAR, when the center moved to Cyprus.

In 1976–1977 Jiryis, together with the Fatah leader ISAM SARTAWI, was involved in a series of contacts with Israeli leftists associated with the ISRAELI COUNCIL ON ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN PEACE. In 1976 both the American Friends Service Committee and the US Jewish peace group Breira invited Jiryis to come to the UNITED STATES and address their constituencies. The US government, however, denied him a visa.

After the OSLO ACCORDS, Israeli authorities gave permission for the Palestine Research Center's archives to be moved back to Palestine, and in 1995 Sabri Jiryis and his files came home. The files went to Arafat's new government, the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY in the GAZA STRIP, but Jiryis himself, though a supporter of the PLO-Israel peace accord, returned to his village in the Galilee, and Israel quietly restored his citizenship. He now appears as a commentator on Israeli television, appealing for a confederation of Israel, Palestine, and JORDAN. He has warned that Israel's peacemaking with neighboring Arab states will not end the dilemma of PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL. "The only real solution to our problem is for the Zionist component of Israel's identity to become less important. . . . Otherwise, Israel's Arabs will remain second-class citizens, non-Jews in a country that defines its essence as a Jewish state."

See also ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Bibliography

- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.

Fischbach, Michael R. "Sabri Jiryis." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.

Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel 1948–1966. Beirut, Lebanon: The Institute for Palestine Studies, 1969.

Said, Edward. The Politics of Dispossession: The Struggle for Palestinian Self-Determination, 1969–1994. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.

Johnson, Lyndon Baines (1908–1973)

Lyndon Johnson was the thirty-sixth president of the UNITED STATES, serving from 1963 to 1969. He assumed the presidency after the 22 November 1963 assassination of President JOHN F. KENNEDY. After serving six terms in the House of Representatives beginning in 1937, Johnson was elected to the Senate in 1948. In 1953 he became the youngest minority leader in Senate history. In the 1960 presidential campaign, Johnson ran on Kennedy's ticket and was elected vice president.

Johnson was the first openly pro-Israel president, strongly advocating the "STRATEGIC ASSET" idea, sending Israel large amounts of sophisticated military technology; greatly increasing economic aid; supporting its preemptive attack against EGYPT, JORDAN, and SYRIA in the 1967 WAR; backing it at the United Nations; and covering up its attack on the LIBERTY, a US military ship. Despite the 1964 emergence of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION and several years of Palestinian commando activities, Johnson ignored the Palestinians during his tenure, even the REFUGEE issue, which preceding presidents had addressed. The one issue on which Johnson could have demonstrated some concern for the Palestinians, the Joseph Johnson Plan, he shelved. He deeply opposed Arab nationalism and NASIRISM, attempted to stop MOSCOW from selling weapons to the Arab states, and supported only those Arab states—especially Jordan and Lebanon—deemed friendly to the United States.

During his many years in the House and Senate Johnson had been a strong supporter of Israel, and he came to the presidency imbued with sentimental admiration for the state. Additionally, he was surrounded in office and in his private life by individuals who had intense commitments to Israel, including National Security Adviser McGeorge Bundy, Secretary of Defense Clark Clifford, Ambassador to the United Nations Arthur Goldberg, Special Counsel Harry McPherson, speechwriter John Roche, Special Assistant for National Security Affairs Walt Rostow, his brother Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Eugene Rostow, and presidential aide Ben Wattenberg. In his private life one of Johnson's closest informal advisers was Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas, a warm friend of Israel. Two of Johnson's closest outside advisers were Abraham Feinberg and Arthur B. Krim, both strong supporters of Israel. Johnson routinely consulted Feinberg, who was president of the American Bank and Trust Company of New York and a vocal supporter of increased aid to Israel, on Middle East policy. At various times Feinberg owned the Coca-Cola franchise in Israel and was a part owner of the Jerusalem Hilton Hotel. When his bank fell into trouble in the 1970s and two of its officers were convicted of misappropriating funds, the Israeli bank Leumi, in a generous act of reverse aid, purchased the American Bank and Trust Company. Krim, whose attachment to Israel was intense, was president of United Artists Corporation of Hollywood, a New York attorney, and a major Democratic fund-raiser. He served as chairman of the Democratic National Party Finance Committee and chairman of the President's Club of New York, the most important source of Johnson's campaign funds.

The US policy of providing Israel with the most advanced weapons in the US arsenal began with a decision by Johnson on 9 October 1968 that was incorporated into the Foreign Assistance Act of that year. In the largest single arms deal with Israel to that point, the United States sent Israel fifty Phantom jets plus 100 Skyhawk jet attack aircraft and other equipment, at a cost of $285 million. Assistant Secretary of Defense Paul Warnke explained the importance of the sale in a discussion with Israeli ambassador to the United States YITZHAK RABIN: "We will henceforth become the principal arms supplier to Israel, involving us even more intimately with Israel's security situation and involving Israel more directly in the security of the United States."

The Johnson administration also moved closer to Israel on the issue of JERUSALEM. Although the United States continued to withhold recognition of Jerusalem as Israel's capital, it ceased putting pressure on other countries that wished to establish their diplomatic missions there. During the Johnson years, aid to Israel climbed steadily. In 1964 total economic and military aid was $37 million, in 1965 $61.7 million, in 1966 $126.8 million, in 1967 $31.1 million, and in 1968 $76.9 million. In the 1967 War there were numerous, though unproven, allegations that the US Air Force flew aerial reconnaissance for Israel. On the other hand, the US was conducting reconnaissance of Israel from the Liberty in international waters off the Sinai coast when Israel torpedoed the ship and then strafed it, killing thirty-four and wounding 171 others. The Johnson administration decided to cover up the fact that the perpetrator was Israel and that the attack was intentional.

Johnson's pro-Israel policies became institutionalized in US politics, and every administration since has provided more assets to the Jewish state.

Bibliography

- Bard, Mitchell G. "The 1968 Sale of Phantom Jets to Israel." The Jewish Virtual Library. n.d. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/US-Israel/phantom.html.
- Brecher, Michael, with Benjamin Geist. Decisions in Crisis: Israel, 1967 and 1973. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.
- Eban, Abba. An Autobiography. New York: Random House, 1977.
- Green, Stephen. Taking Sides: America's Secret Relations with a Militant Israel. New York: William Morrow, 1984.
- Isaacs, Stephen D. Jews and American Politics. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1974.
- Johnson, Lyndon B. The Vantage Point: Perspectives of the Presidency, 1963–1969. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971.
- Miller, Merle. Lyndon: An Oral History. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1980.
- Neff, Donald. Fallen Pillars: U.S. Policy towards Palestine and Israel since 1945. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1995.
- . Warriors for Jerusalem: The Six Days That Changed the Middle East. New York: Linden Press/Simon and Schuster, 1984.
- Parker, Richard B., ed. The Six-Day War: A Retrospective. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1996.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Rusk, Dean (as told to Richard Rusk). As I Saw It. Edited by Daniel S. Papp. New York: Penguin Books, 1990.
- Spiegel, Steven L. The Other Arab-Israeli Conflict. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- Wilson, Harold. The Chariot of Israel: Britain, America, and the State of Israel. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson and Michael Joseph, 1981.

Johnson Plan

See JOHN F. KENNEDY

Johnston Plan (1956)

During the early 1950s, Middle Eastern states competed bitterly over the scarce WATER resources of the region. As the issue became increasingly contentious, fear grew in the West that if left unresolved, the struggle for water held the potential for another Arab-Israeli war. Thus the US government moved toward deeper involvement with the issue. On 16 October 1953 President DWIGHT EISENHOWER appointed Eric Johnston as a special ambassador to mediate a comprehensive plan for the regional development of the Jordan River system, which runs along the borders of Israel, the WEST BANK, JORDAN, and SYRIA, with tributaries in LEBANON. Based on the philosophy of the Marshall Plan in Europe, it sought to reduce the conflict potential of the region by promoting cooperation and economic stability. In particular, it sought to resolve the Palestinian REFUGEE situation by making more land arable and thus available for settlement and development within the Arab states.

There had been many plans for water-sharing in the post-1948 period, though none had been successful. But Johnston considered them bargaining stages in the negotiations over the sharing of the Jordan River system. The main bargaining issues pertained to (1) the water quotas for the riparian states, (2) the use of Lake Tiberias as a storage facility, (3) the use of Jordan waters for out-of-basin areas, (4) the use of the Litani River as part of the system, and (5) the nature of international supervision and guarantees. Allocation of water quotas was by far the most difficult issue, and the disparity between the opening demands was considerable.

The base plan for Johnston's mission was a study sponsored by the UN RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (UNRWA) and prepared by Charles T. Main, under the supervision of the US Tennessee Valley Authority, with the backing of the US State Department.

The plan featured:

- A dam on the Hasbani River (Lebanon) to provide power and irrigate the Galilee area
- Dams on the Dan and Baniyas rivers (Golan Heights) to irrigate Galilee
- Drainage of the Huleh swamps

© Sharif S. ElMusa. Toward a Unified Management Regime in the Jordan Basin: the Johnston Plan Re-visited. Yale F & ES Bulletin. Washington, DC: Institute of Palestine Studies, reprinted with permission.

Map 27. The Johnston Plan

- A dam at Maqarin (Jordan) with 175 million cubic meters of storage capacity that would be used for power generation
- A dam at Addassiyah to divert water to Lake Tiberias and into the east Ghor area (Jordan)
- A small dam at the outlet of Lake Tiberias to increase the lake's storage capacity
- Gravity-flow canals down the east and west sides of the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY to irrigate the area between the Yarmouk River and the Dead Sea
- Control works and canals to utilize perennial flows from the wadis (riverbeds)

The Main Plan favored primary in-basin use of the Jordan waters and ruled out integration of the Litani. Provisional quotas gave Israel 394 million cubic meters, Jordan 774 million cubic meters, and Syria 45 million cubic meters.

Israel countered with its own seven-year plan, whose main features included the integration of the Litani, the use of Lake Tiberias as the main storage facility, and out-of-basin use of the Jordan waters and the Mediterranean–Dead Sea canal. Since water flow was based on the combined Jordan-Litani output of 2,500 million cubic meters, Israel sought an initial quota of 810 million cubic meters. Israel's proposals were elaborated from an earlier plan prepared for it by Josep Cotton in 1954. The combined annual Litani-Jordan water resources were estimated at 2,345.7 million cubic meters. Israel was to receive 1,290 million cubic meters per year. The Arab share of 1,055.7 million cubic meters per year was to be divided by allocating 575 million cubic meters to Jordan, 450.7 million cubic meters to Lebanon, and 30 million cubic meters to Syria.

The Arabs responded to the main "base plan" with the Arab Plan of 1954, which reaffirmed the principles from other earlier plans for exclusive in-basin use of the water, rejected storage in Lake Tiberias, and rejected integration of the Litani. Because 77 percent of the water of the Jordan water system originated in the Arab countries, it objected to the quota allocations proposed in the Main Plan. According to the Arab proposal, Israel was to get 200 million cubic meters per year, Jordan 861 million cubic meters, and Syria 132 million cubic meters. The Arab Plan recognized Lebanon as a riparian of the Jordan River system and allocated it 35 million cubic meters per year.

As negotiations progressed, disagreements were gradually reduced. Israel gave up on integration of the Litani and downgraded its quota demand to 550 million cubic meters per year, and the Arabs dropped their objection to out-of-basin use of water; however, they rejected use of Lake Tiberias as a reservoir for Yarmouk water. An alternative Arab proposal to treat Lake Tiberias (without diversion of the Yarmouk) as a regional storage center to benefit all riparians was rejected by Israel. Significantly, the Arabs demanded and Israel refused international supervision over withdrawals of water.

After extremely hard bargaining the so-called Gardiner Formula was adopted as the final version of the "Unified (Johnston) Plan." Compared to the Main Plan figures, the Johnston Plan quotas are significantly different only with regard to Syria and Lebanon. Jordan's share was slightly scaled down, and Israel was to receive the variable residue after other quotas had been met; most estimates place this average residue at 400 million cubic meters per year.

The Unified Plan stipulated that supervision would be exercised by a three-member Neutral Engineering Board. The board's mandate included the supervision of water withdrawal, record keeping, and preserving the spirit and letter of the agreement.

The Unified Plan was accepted by the technical committees from both Israel and the ARAB LEAGUE; however, the Israeli cabinet discussed the plan in July 1955 without taking a vote—a decision that constituted a de facto refusal. The Arab Experts Committee approved the plan in September 1955 and referred it for final approval to the Arab League Council. The council decided on 11 October 1955 not to ratify the plan. According to most observers, including Johnston himself, the Arab nonadoption of the plan was not total rejection; while they failed to approve it politically, they were determined to adhere to the technical details. The issue of impartial monitoring was not resolved, which made for problems in the future—most importantly Israel's National Water Carrier project.

After in effect rejecting the Johnston Plan, in 1953, Israel launched a massive diversion project on a nine-mile channel midway between the Huleh Marshes and Lake Tiberias in the central Demilitarized Zone (DMZ). The plan was to divert enough water to help irrigate the coastal Sharon Plain and eventually the Negev desert. Syria claimed that would dry up 12,000 acres of Syrian land. The UNTSO chief of staff, Major General Vagn Bennike of Denmark, noted that the project was denying water to two Palestinian water mills and thus to several villages, was drying up Palestinian farmland, and was of substantial military benefit to Israel against Syria. For a time, the United States cut off aid to Israel because of the project. The Israeli response was to increase work, albeit under extremely secret conditions. UN Security Council Resolution 100 (S/3122 27 October 1953) asked Israel to stop work pending an investigation. Israel finally desisted—temporarily.

In late 1956, Israel quietly resumed work on its National Water Carrier but avoided the DMZs, and thereby US objections. It diverted water directly from Lake Tiberias, sending it to irrigate the northern section of the Negev desert. It did this without consulting Syria and Jordan, riparian states with the right of consultation on usage of joint waters.

The precedent was set, and the Arab states felt free to develop their own schemes. In August 1956, Jordan began work, without consulting Israel, on the East Ghor canal to siphon water from the Yarmouk River before it joined the Jordan. There was a major difference between the Israeli National Water Carrier and the Jordanian plan: the Jordanian plan returned the water within the Jordan River complex while the Israeli plan removed the water to the Negev, thus depriving Syria and Jordan of their share.

On 17 January 1964, Arab leaders gathered in Cairo for their first summit and in their final communiqué called the National Water Carrier an “aggressive plan to divert the course of the River Jordan, thereby grievously endangering the riparian rights of the Arabs.” The Arabs, however, had no significant military force, and the Israelis completed the project on 28 May 1964.

In retaliation for Israeli projects, the Arabs vowed to draw water from the Baniyas in Syria and send the water east through Syria and Jordan to south of Lake Tiberias. They began digging in February 1964, but the Israelis then destroyed their bulldozers with artillery fire. In the summer of 1966, Syria tried to resume work. On 14 July Israeli planes bombed the equipment and the engineering works, permanently destroying the Syrian project.

Near the end of 1964, Israel laid claim to the River Dan, the largest of the headwater rivers of the Jordan; a reservoir; and all the springs in the area. Syria claimed several of the springs and part of the reservoir and pointed out that the road Israel had built to patrol the area intruded on Syrian territory. From then on the region devolved in ever-accelerating acts of violence, culminating in Israel launching a preemptive war against Egypt, Jordan, and Syria in June 1967. Water, of course, was not the only issue in the 1967 WAR.

See also JOHN F. KENNEDY; UNITED NATIONS TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION; WATER

Bibliography

- Amery, Hussein A., and Aaron Wolf, eds. Water in the Middle East: A Geography of Peace. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2000.
- Bitar, Maher. Water and the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict: Competition or Cooperation? Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, 22 December 2005. <http://www.medeas.be/en/index247.htm>.
- Collins, Gerard. Water and the Arab-Israeli Conflict. Extracted from a paper prepared by the MEDEA Institute (Brussels) and delivered by Gerard Collins, former foreign minister of Ireland, member of the Dail Eireann (House of Representatives of Ireland) and the European Parliament, before the Diplomatic Institute of Oman. 14 October 1997.
- Dolatyar, Mostafa, and Tim S. Gray. Water Politics in the Middle East: A Context for Conflict or Cooperation? Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 1999.
- Elmusa, Sharif S. Negotiating Water: Israel and the Palestinians. Portsmouth, NH: Boynton Cook Publishers, 1996.
- . Water Conflict: Economics, Politics, Law and Palestinian-Israeli Water Resources. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1998.
- . The Water Issue and the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict. Washington, DC: Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine, 1993.
- HistoryLink. “The Eric Johnston Story”. HistoryLink.org. Essay 7339. n.d. http://www.historylink.org/essays/output.cfm?file\_id=7339.
- Kliot, Nurit. Water Resources and Conflict in the Middle East. London: Routledge, 1993.
- Libiszewski, Stephan. Water Disputes in the Jordan Basin Region and Their Role in the Resolution of the Arab-Israeli Conflict. Occasional Paper No. 13. Environment and Conflicts Project, Swiss Peace Foundation. August 1995.
- Murakami, Masahiro. Managing Water for Peace in the Middle East: Alternative Strategies. UNUP-858. Tokyo/New York: United Nations University Press, 1995.
- Naff, Thomas, and Ruth C. Matson, eds. Water in the Middle East: Conflict or Cooperation? Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1984.
- Selby, Jan. Water, Power and Politics in the Middle East: The Other Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. London: I. B. Tauris, 2003.
- Shapland, Greg. Rivers of Discord: International Water Disputes in the Middle East. Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 1997.
- Shuval, Hillel, and Hassan Dweik, eds. Israel-Palestinian Water Issues: From Conflict to Cooperation. New York: Springer Publishers, 2007.

Soffer, Arnon. Rivers of Fire: The Conflict over Water in the Middle East. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1999.

Joint Israeli-Palestinian Declaration, 2001

The Joint Israeli-Palestinian Declaration was the result of a meeting in early July 2001 in which Israeli and Palestinian intellectuals, under the leadership of Palestinian YASIR 'ABD RABBU and Israeli YOSSE BEILIN, drafted a statement made public on 25 July 2001 that said "No to Bloodshed, No to Occupation. Yes to Negotiations, Yes to Peace." The declaration, the first joint Israeli-Palestinian document after the start of the 2000 AL-AQSA INTIFADA, addressed many core issues of a future peace agreement and called for specific measures aimed at ending the violence and resuming negotiations.

The document declared: "In spite of everything we still believe in the humanity of the other side, that we have a partner for peace and that a negotiated solution to the conflict between our peoples is possible. . . . The way forward lies in international legitimacy and the implementation of UNSCR [UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION] 242 AND 338 leading to a TWO-STATE SOLUTION based on the 1967 borders, Israel and Palestine living side-by-side with their respective capitals in JERUSALEM. Solutions can be found to all outstanding issues that should be fair and just to both sides and should not undermine the sovereignty of the Palestinian and Israeli states as determined by their respective citizens, and embodying the aspirations to statehood of both peoples, Jewish and Palestinian. This solution should build on the progress made between November 1999 and January 2001."

Initial signatories to the declaration included about thirty intellectuals and prominent political activists from each side. Among the Israeli signatories were Haim (Jumes) Oron, DAVID GROSSMAN, Galia Golan, Avishai Margalit, AMOS OZ, and A. B. YEHOASHUA. Among the Palestinians were HANAN ASHRAWI, SARI NUSEIBEH, Gabi Baramki, Salim Tamari, Mahdi Abdul-Hadi, and Sama'an Khoury.

Bibliography

For a transcript of the document see Le Monde diplomatique.
www.monde-diplomatique.fr/cahier/procheorient/peacedeclaration.

Jordan

The Kingdom of Jordan has long had an intimate relationship with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, even before either of today's states of Jordan or Israel existed. Jordan's approach to the conflict and its participation in the search for a resolution to the Palestinian question have always been grounded in Jordan's self-interests: maintaining the HASHEMITE monarchy, ensuring the regime's ability to preserve domestic security and promote economic development and modernization, and navigating the shoals of inter-Arab politics on Jordan's terms. Although a peace treaty signed with Israel in 1994 has ostensibly put Jordan on the periphery of the conflict, the country remains deeply affected by and a central player in the dynamics of Israeli-Palestinian politics.

After World War I, Transjordan was part of the BRITISH MANDATE of Palestine given by the League of Nations. In 1921 the British gave semi-autonomous control of Transjordan to the Hashemite family, in the person of the emir Abdullah Ibn Husayn al-Hashem. Early that year Abdullah, the second son of the grand Sharif of Mecca, Husayn Ibn Ali, first established a presence in Amman while en route to SYRIA, where he intended to lead an army to expel French forces from Damascus, reinstate his younger brother Faysal as king of Syria, and secure the kingdom of IRAQ for himself. Britain, however, opposed his plans and instead offered to recognize Abdullah's rule in Transjordan if Abdullah accepted the British mandate over Transjordan. Abdullah consented on the condition that any national home created for the Jews in accordance with Britain's BALFOUR DECLARATION would not include Transjordan. The British tacitly agreed and in 1923 recognized Transjordan as an autonomous emirate under Abdullah's authority, thereby beginning its separation from the Palestine mandate. In return for a secure throne, Abdullah remained financially and militarily dependent upon the British to protect his reign from external and internal challenges. However, his ambitions to rule larger parts of the Arab world, in particular Damascus, did not diminish. The British, for their part, continually debated Abdullah's usefulness to them. On the one hand, he checked ANTI-ZIONIST and anti-French activities and served as a bulwark against Wahhabi expansionism led by Ibn Saud. On the other hand, the British viewed Abdullah as a potentially divisive figure in the region, especially because he increasingly challenged the leadership of AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, the British-installed grand mufti of Jerusalem. For the British, Transjordan's place in Zionist ambitions also remained ambiguous. Britain's agreement with Abdullah clearly excluded the possibility of Jewish settlement in Transjordan, though some in Britain held out hope that this condition could be reversed.

During the British Mandate, Zionists in Palestine sought to engage Abdullah under the belief that Transjordan was an integral part of Palestine and therefore potentially part of any Jewish national home. Although early attempts to foster economic cooperation between Transjordan and Jewish firms amounted to little, British efforts to limit Jewish IMMIGRATION to Palestine in the aftermath of the 1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES intensified Zionist interest in gaining land rights inside Transjordan. The JEWISH AGENCY targeted large landowners in the country, hoping that they would pressure the Transjordanian government to permit land acquisitions. When their efforts were repeatedly rebuffed, Zionists turned their attention toward enticing Abdullah himself to intercede on their behalf with the British. In the 1930s, reports that Abdullah had granted the Jewish Agency an option to buy land in Ghawr al-Kibd produced great distrust of the emir within the Arab world. Nonetheless, by that time, Zionists and Abdullah shared important interests: both chafed under British authority, both sought changes in the regional status quo, and both increasingly came into conflict with Amin al-Husayni.

For Abdullah, a combination of pragmatism and ambition motivated his contacts with Zionists. On the one hand, he felt that Jewish interests in the region, as expressed in the Balfour Declaration, could not be denied entirely. Some of Abdullah's initiatives toward Jewish leaders, such as his efforts to convince them to limit immigration to Palestine voluntarily, were motivated by his desire to make himself an indispensable mediator between Britain and Palestine. Though this goal was often undermined by the suspicions that his negotiations aroused among both the Palestinians and the British, his contacts with Zionists also kept alive Abdullah's larger territorial leadership quest—one that amounted to ruling an expansive Arab kingdom. He counseled the Jews that they would have difficulty reaching any satisfactory accord with Palestine Arabs, so it would be to their advantage to strike a deal with him that would allow Jews to live freely in an Arab state under his rule.

Abdullah's Ambitions Thwarted

The idea of a "Semitic kingdom" encompassing both Palestine and Transjordan, in which Jews and Arabs could live as relative equals under Abdullah as hereditary monarch, was never acceptable to Zionists and was resented by many in the Arab world, who regarded Abdullah as usurping the prerogatives of the Palestinian leaders. Similarly, many in Britain harbored serious misgivings about merging the Arab part of Palestine with Transjordan, as called for in Britain's 1937 PEEL COMMISSION report, because this support for Abdullah would antagonize other Arab states and undermine support for the entire concept of partition—dividing the mandate area into Arab and Jewish areas. As momentum for partition waned, Britain's 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER proposed as an alternative to partition a unified state in Palestine for Arabs and Jews, with limited Jewish immigration. Abdullah again offered his support and promised not to pursue independence for Transjordan during the war years as a concession to the British. But Abdullah did not give up his dreams of territorial expansion, hoping in vain that the British would reward his loyalty by making him ruler of greater SYRIA. However, Britain's priority at the time was to find common cause with Arab nationalism, which was at odds with Abdullah's aspirations in Syria. At the same time, Abdullah maintained contact with the Jewish Agency, hoping to get Zionist support for his goals in Syria, but without success. Instead, as articulated in the 1942 BILTMORE PROGRAM, Zionists chose to pursue a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine.

The end of World War II brought a new intensity to Transjordan's involvement with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Though Britain had dashed Abdullah's hopes vis-à-vis Syria, it felt compelled to reward his loyalty. Thus, in spite of objections from Zionists, Transjordan in 1946 was granted independence, which, combined with Britain's imminent divestiture of the Palestinian mandate (after the November 1947 Partition Resolution—UN RESOLUTION 181), led the Jewish Agency back to Abdullah. In secret meetings held in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, representatives of each party agreed to the partition, and Abdullah was expected to deploy the Arab Legion to ensure that the Arab portions of Palestine were peacefully absorbed into Transjordan. Both considered this an efficacious way to avoid what neither Abdullah nor the Zionists wanted to see: al-Amin al-Husayni in control of an independent Palestinian state in Palestine. The extent and ultimate meaning of these arrangements and the core of Abdullah's long-standing contacts with Zionists still remain a topic of intense scholarly debate. For political purposes, Abdullah continued to disparage the idea of partition publicly. Although disagreement with partition was only beginning to coalesce inside Transjordan itself, there was significant opposition within surrounding Arab communities, where Arab leaders suspected that Abdullah was using the UN plan with British help to further his own territorial ambitions at the expense of the Palestinian Arabs. Moreover, although Britain no longer opposed the idea that Transjordan would absorb the Arab areas of Palestine, London expected the Arab Legion not to engage Jewish forces in the process.

According to historian Philip Robins, the aftermath of the 1948 massacre at DEIR YASSIN, where Zionist militias murdered some 250 Palestinians (more recent research puts the figure at a little over 100), and the waves of Palestinians entering Transjordan seeking its help led Abdullah to seize the initiative. He appealed to the ARAB LEAGUE (composed of Arab states) to allow him to take charge of the military operations in Palestine. At the same time, he continued to push Zionists for a federation. In a secret meeting between Jordan and Zionist leaders in late 1947, GOLDA MEIR, acting head of the Jewish Agency's Political Department, firmly rejected the federation proposal and placed in doubt the entire postmandate set of understandings. Moreover, each Arab country announced it would fight in Palestine using its own command structure and take responsibility for administering whatever territory it controlled. Abdullah would be only a nominal supreme commander of the Arab effort. With Abdullah's hope of peacefully assuming control of partitioned Palestinian territory now in serious question, his agreements with London that ensured the continued existence of Transjordan were imperiled.

Role in the 1948 War

Transjordan's role in the 1948 WAR initially centered on JERUSALEM. Upon peacefully occupying several parts of the WEST BANK, the Arab Legion engaged Israeli forces in Jerusalem after the Israelis entered the city, which the Partition Resolution designated to remain independent of either Arab or Jewish control. Arab Legion forces managed to take control of significant pieces of territory in and around Jerusalem before a truce with Israel was declared. However, the fighting was costly to Transjordan, both in men and finances, and Palestinian REFUGEES were entering Jordan in growing numbers. Moreover, a proposal by UN mediator COUNT FOLKE BERNADOTTE to allow Transjordan to annex Arab Palestine and form a union between Transjordan and Israel was rejected by both Israel and the Arab League. While Abdullah pursued diplomacy in the Arab world to extend the truce and prevent renewed hostilities with Israel, members of his armed forces pushed to reengage and fight for the liberation of Palestine. The failure of the UNITED NATIONS to broker a cease-fire ensured that the Arab Legion was drawn into further fighting, but it relinquished control of RAMLA and LYDDA—two major Palestinian cities—at the start of the second round of fighting in July 1948. This resulted in widespread criticism that implied the Arab Legion and Abdullah were working against the interests of the Palestinian Arabs and in concert with the Israelis, who had immediately assumed control of the cities.

The loss of Lydda and Ramla was damaging for Transjordan for additional reasons. The Arab Legion had been commanded by British general John Bagot Glubb, who had ordered Transjordanian forces to abandon Lydda and Ramla without a fight, and as soon as they were in Israeli hands, British foreign secretary Ernest Bevin called for a renewed truce. Thus, throughout the Arab world Transjordan and the Arab Legion were blamed for the failure to save Palestine. The stream of Palestinian refugees to Transjordan continued unabated, and in their wake came domestic unrest. The creation of an ALL PALESTINE GOVERNMENT in Gaza in September 1948, led by al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni and under the apparent influence of the Egyptian government, further constrained Abdullah. Tensions between EGYPT and Transjordan mounted, and when fighting erupted again in October 1948 and Israeli forces pushed Egypt from positions it held in southern Palestine, Cairo claimed that its forces were defeated because Transjordan had abandoned nearby positions of support.

Meanwhile, during the months of fighting, contacts between Transjordan and Israel had persisted, first in London during summer 1948 and later in Jerusalem, with Israel searching for acceptable terms to forge reconciliation. In a secret meeting in December, Abdullah defined his position: Arab Palestine and Transjordan should be united, Lydda and Ramla should be returned to Jordanian control, and the Arab sector of Jerusalem should remain with the Arabs while the Jews would stay in the Jewish half. In addition, the status of the Palestinian refugees and of JAFFA, the Galilee, and the Negev would be open to negotiation. Abdullah's proposal came with a warning to the Israelis: "unacceptable results" would "bring trouble from our political enemies on the Arab side worse than you can imagine." Through the early months of 1949 and even after Egypt reached an ARMISTICE AGREEMENT with Israel, both public and secret talks between Abdullah and the Israelis continued without much progress. The conflict between Egypt and Transjordan and Israel's success at wresting the Negev from Cairo undermined a great deal of Abdullah's leverage. By the end of the talks in March 1949, Israel had used a combination of military threats, acquisition of more territory around Tulkarm and JENIN, and diplomatic maneuvers to undermine Transjordan's claims with Britain and the UNITED STATES, which then withdrew support from Abdullah's position. Announcement of the armistice terms at Rhodes in April sparked rioting in the West Bank, as Palestinians charged that Abdullah cared more about obtaining an agreement with Israel than about protecting Arab territorial claims. Meanwhile, the Americans and British accused Abdullah's negotiators of sloppiness and incompetence and blamed them for Transjordan's unfavorable outcome.

Even though Britain had permitted the Arab Legion to enter Arab Palestine to secure it for Transjordan and had consented to a union between Transjordan and Palestine, the Arab Legion paid a high price to control far less territory than Abdullah had imagined, and his state lacked the diplomatic recognition already extended to Israel by the world's new great powers: the United States and the USSR. West Bank Palestinians under Transjordan's control regarded King Abdullah as despotic and untrustworthy. Jordan itself contained some 100,000 Palestinian refugees, with over 400,000 more refugees residing in the West Bank. In the preliminary stages of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, accusations of self-interest and betrayal cast a shadow over Transjordan's conduct, which persisted for some time.

Control of the West Bank

Once Transjordan had obtained the West Bank, its main tasks were to exercise effective sovereignty and establish legitimacy with its populations. That meant creating a dynamic in which the Palestinian population of the territories would come to welcome rule from Amman rather than regard it as an undesired inevitability. To confront these challenges, Abdullah responded with both stylistic and substantive initiatives. The name of the country was changed to Jordan, implying that both West and East banks belonged to one sovereign state. Jordan offered Palestinians citizenship in Jordan, appointed Palestinian ministers to its royal cabinet, and relaxed customs and trade restrictions to foster economic integration between the two banks. Abdullah granted economic favors to notable West Bank families who, he hoped, would tacitly support the Hashemite agenda of integrating the two banks on the monarchy's terms. Though state coffers were depleted, the government also provided aid to the refugees, but the money dispensed paled in comparison with the needs. Politically, too, Abdullah undertook maneuvers. In the 1950 elections he took steps to unify the East and West banks by dividing parliamentary seats equally between the two regions and making investments in the populations of both banks. Nonetheless, although the West Bank had twice the population of the East Bank, the representation of the East Bankers outweighed that of the West, thereby institutionalizing East Bank dominance over Palestinians, which would come to define Jordan's political and economic systems. In the end, Abdullah's efforts to begin the "Jordanization" of the West Bank failed almost as soon as they began.

Many West Bank Palestinians accepted the union offered by Amman because they had few viable alternatives coming out of the 1948–1949 period. But assenting to Jordanian rule did not imply an allegiance to the Jordanian state. Although Palestinians under Abdullah's rule were typically better educated than native East Bankers, many found it difficult to fit into the government-subsidized economic system Jordan was fostering. Taking on another million people not only tripled Jordan's population, but also altered the nature of the territory Abdullah sought to remake. There were now two Palestinians for every Jordanian citizen of the state. Because its needs were so much greater than its resources, Jordan's economic prospects were gloomy. The range of political debate, particularly with regard to the monarchy versus Palestinian nationalism, had also widened markedly and ensured a continuing undercurrent of discontent between Palestinians and Jordanians. The discord bred by Abdullah's efforts to "Jordanize" the Palestinians played out dramatically in 1952, when a lone gunman assassinated Abdullah after prayers at the AL-AQSA MOSQUE in Jerusalem.

Throughout the 1950s the state was strained by the conflict's legacy. Squalid refugee camps run by the UNITED NATIONS Relief and Works Agency produced a sense of frustration and betrayal among many Palestinians after the war. Other Palestinians sought power in the new Jordanian state, thereby challenging the emerging dominance of the East Bankers and creating structural tensions. As political challenges emerged in the late 1950s to the successor of the hereditary monarchy, King Husayn used the threat to the stability of Jordan as a justification for marginalizing Palestinian political power and creating a system of political rule that rewarded loyalty to the throne. Experiments with political pluralism inside Jordan came to an abrupt end.

Emergence of the PLO

Jordan's evolving relationships with the Arab world during the 1950s were shaped by the country's place in the Arab-Israeli conflict. Of particular note was the ongoing tension with Egypt, in which hostilities deepened when Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR attempted to undermine Husayn's stature in Jordan in order to pursue Egyptian socialism and pan-Arab nationalism. By the mid-1960s the Palestinian issue again dominated Jordanian politics, both domestically and regionally. Like his grandfather Abdullah, King Husayn pursued secret meetings with the Israelis to reach some understanding that would stabilize Jordan's place in the region, but his initial bids bore little fruit. More profoundly, however, Egypt's move in the Arab League summit of 1964 to create the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) had an immense and immediate impact on Jordan. The new PLO leader, AHMAD SHUQAYRI, demanded that the PLO have the right to tax Palestinians in Jordan, to form a liberation army, and to disperse troops to border villages in Jordan. Husayn rejected all of these demands as steps that could undermine Jordan's border security with Israel and encroach on the sovereignty of the Jordanian state. Moreover, the creation of the PLO, along with the expanding profile of armed guerrilla groups such as FATAH and the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), signaled a growing Palestinian nationalism, which state leaders in the Arab world sought to control and harness for their own purposes. All of these changes undermined Jordanian efforts to unify the East and West banks. At the same time, resurgent Palestinian nationalism helped spawn a renewal of Jordanian nationalism that had been born some forty years before.

Though Husayn found ways to temporarily paper over differences with Shuqayri and the PLO, by mid-1966 tensions again spilled into the open, prompting the PLO and Syria to threaten to overthrow the Hashemite monarchy as a precursor to liberating Palestine. Once Nasir joined in the rhetoric directed at undermining Husayn's regime, Jordan began to press its claims to speak authoritatively for the political interests of Palestinians in the region. When Israel attacked the West Bank village of as-Sammu in November 1966 and killed many Jordanian troops and civilians in the process, the weak Jordanian military response called into question the state's commitment to protect and promote the Palestinian cause. Ensuing riots in the West Bank that called for Husayn to abdicate in favor of a PLO government shifted his perspective on the conflict significantly. He was now convinced that Israel was an expansionist power in the region that sought his political demise in order to claim the West Bank for itself. Because clandestine political discussions with Israel had done little to safeguard Husayn's position, he chose to move Jordan closer to Egypt, signing a joint defense agreement with Cairo in May 1967 and reconciling with the PLO leadership. This, in turn, fueled Israeli fears of Arab encirclement and helped set in motion the dynamics for the 1967 WAR.

By virtually all measures the 1967 War was devastating for Jordan. Territorially, Israel occupied the West Bank, unified Jerusalem, and sent some 300,000 more refugees into Jordan. Economically, the war did great damage, stripping the country of valuable agricultural land and industrial and tourism resources. The war left Jordan politically and economically vulnerable and compelled Husayn again to pursue policies designed to secure the Jordanian state. The military dominance displayed by Israel convinced Husayn that the Arabs could not defeat Israel militarily and that a renewed secret dialogue to stabilize Jordan's relationship with Tel Aviv was vital. Jordan publicly signaled its acceptance of UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242, which enshrined the principle of peace in exchange for occupied territory.

The renewed vigor of the Palestinian resistance after the 1967 War posed more challenges for Jordan and Husayn. Increasingly larger segments of the Palestinian community inside and outside the West Bank came to believe that relying on the Arab states to fulfill Palestinian aspirations was unwise and unrealistic, and the reconstituted PLO, now controlled by YASIR ARAFAT and Fatah, gave added voice to these sentiments. Such ideas found wide support among Palestinians in Jordan, causing Jordan to monitor Palestinian affairs closely, and mutual suspicion between Husayn and the PLO leadership grew. Tensions rose in 1968 with the confrontation at Karameh, where Jordanian forces joined Palestinian guerrillas in facing an Israeli incursion. Israel successfully crushed the Palestinian guerrillas, but the combined Jordanian army and Palestinian guerrillas inflicted enough casualties on the Israelis to make it a painful victory. For the Palestinians Karameh became an important turning point in their struggle with Israel. In its aftermath recruits increasingly gravitated toward the PLO, whose supporters in Amman and elsewhere in Jordan openly defied Jordanian authority. For their part many Jordanians resented that Palestinian versions of the Karameh battle played down Jordanian participation, while Palestinian defiance gradually escalated to open disdain of Jordan. Nonetheless, the political impact of Karameh domestically and throughout the Arab world made it more difficult for Husayn to confront the Palestinian resistance movement openly. As he continued to pursue secret contacts with the Israelis to explore possibilities of accommodation, tensions further escalated.

Escalation of Tensions with Palestinians

By late 1968, signs were emerging that open confrontation was imminent. Although the PLO pledged to avoid actions that could undermine Jordanian sovereignty, clashes between Israeli troops and Palestinian commandos based in Jordan undercut that promise. In addition, although most in the PLO had no intention of taking control of Jordan, confrontations between Jordanian troops and Palestinian guerrillas were becoming more numerous, and some within the Jordanian armed forces were pressing Husayn for a comprehensive crackdown. Simultaneously, the initial development of Palestinian institutions was beginning to create the elements of a state within Jordan. Although Husayn and the Fatah-Arafat-led PLO sought to prevent open confrontation, other resistance groups, most notably the PFLP, increasingly regarded Husayn's pursuit of accommodation with Israel as grounds for challenging the Hashemite monarchy. Throughout the middle of 1970, PFLP forces repeatedly challenged Husayn's rule, culminating in the hijacking of four Western-owned airliners, three of which were blown up on Jordanian runways after the passengers were allowed to leave. Husayn's response, known as BLACK SEPTEMBER, drew all Palestinian military and civilian groups into a series of battles that lasted nine days and completely crushed all resistance groups in the country. Only a hastily arranged summit in Cairo stemmed the bloodshed; ultimately the fighting killed some 20,000 Palestinians and approximately 1,000 Jordanians. Although several Arab regimes condemned Husayn's military campaign against the Palestinian resistance, Jordan was not censured in the next Arab League summit, and little effort was made to constrain Jordan's continued crackdown against the PLO presence in the country. Despite their public rhetoric, all the Arab governments, including that of al-Nasir, tacitly approved the crackdown, viewing radical Palestinian nationalism as a threat to regional stability. The effects of Black September, however, left many West Bank Palestinians deeply embittered over Jordan's conduct and its subsequent expulsion of all remnants of the Palestinian resistance to LEBANON.

After Black September, PLO forces were gradually evacuated from Jordan, leaving Irbid in March 1971 and Amman the following month. The last Palestinian units were defeated around Jerash and the Ajlun hills in July. The encounter had left deep wounds in both communities, as evidenced by the assassination of Jordanian prime minister Wasfi al-Tal in November 1971. It was now essential for Jordan to reestablish a stable relationship between the Palestinian and Jordanian populations inside the country. Within the Palestinian community in Jordan, refugees from the 1948–1949 fighting were more committed to remaining in Jordan than were refugees from the 1967 War, who regarded Jordan as a temporary and hostile refuge. Among Jordanians, too, some elements believed that Palestinians from both the West and East banks should return to a liberated Palestine, leaving Jordan for the Jordanians, while others advocated that the two banks be reunified and regarded the PLO as leading the Palestinians in pursuit of a contrary agenda. King Husayn clearly fell into this latter camp, and his desire to restore authority over the West Bank put him at odds not only with most of the recent wave of Palestinian refugees but with many Jordanian nationalists as well. Politically Husayn's Jordan remained relatively isolated in the region after Black September, as Arab popular opinion clearly sympathized with the Palestinians, even though Arab governing elites supported the king's moves.

Husayn's attempts to bridge these gaps emerged in the plans for a United Arab Kingdom that he began to articulate in 1972. According to this plan, the East and West banks would be reunified, but each would be granted autonomous status as provinces under the king's more flexible leadership. In taking such a step, Husayn attempted to accommodate the Palestinians' growing national consciousness by providing autonomous federal structures. However, the plan failed to consider the growing strength of the PLO and the Palestinian nationalism it represented. Nor did it adequately address the Israelis, who under the ALLON PLAN were offering Husayn a truncated part of the West Bank to lure Jordan into peace talks. As a result Husayn's moves were largely ignored. In addition, Syria and Egypt excluded Husayn from their plan to wage war against Israel in 1973. Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, in particular, suspected that Husayn's periodic secret diplomacy with Israel might warn Tel Aviv of the plan to attack. Once the fighting was under way, Damascus and Cairo pressured Jordan to join the war, but Jordan remained largely removed from the events.

After the 1973 War the "battle over representation" was in full swing, as the Arab states debated who constituted the legitimate voice of Palestinian interests in any postwar negotiations. There had long been questions about Jordan's capacity to speak on behalf of the Palestinians in the region, especially after the creation of the PLO in 1964, and these doubts had grown substantially after Black September. Protecting his role as spokesman for the majority of Jordan's Palestinian population remained a key priority for Husayn, who argued that although the PLO had the duty to speak for Palestinians in Lebanon and other Arab states, Jordan represented Palestinian interests in Jordan and the West Bank. The result of the 1973 Algiers summit of Arab leaders, who took up this question, was ambiguous. Although a resolution stated that the PLO was the sole representative voice of the Palestinians, several Arab leaders appeared reluctant to accept publicly that the decision included all Palestinians, in light of Husayn's stance.

By the 1974 Arab summit in Rabat, Morocco, Jordan had no choice but to relent. Although Husayn made an impassioned plea that Israel's refusal to engage the PLO diplomatically gave Jordan the better chance of retrieving the West Bank, Arab leaders sided with Arafat's claim that PLO representation of the Palestinians would compel Israel and the United States to confront the conflict directly or risk diplomatic isolation. The defeat was all but complete for Husayn, whose only tangible victory was a statement implying that Jordan still spoke for the Palestinians on the East Bank. Although the prevailing regional dynamic was moving toward separate Palestinian and Jordanian states, Husayn continued to hope that reunification of the West and East banks under Jordanian sovereignty was possible.

Realignment after Camp David

US diplomacy initiated by the JIMMY CARTER administration severely complicated such calculations, particularly given Sadat's willingness to engage the Israelis at the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS, an initiative rejected by most in the Arab world. Suddenly Jordan became the object of attention for all sides. For Sadat and the United States, King Husayn's participation would broaden the process and undermine efforts to isolate Egypt in the Arab world. For the Arab states implacably opposed to Sadat's gambit, keeping Husayn in the fold was necessary to maintain a united opposition to the peace process. The primary Arab opponents—Iraq, Syria, SAUDI ARABIA, and the PLO—offered Jordan a range of political and economic inducements to stay on the sidelines, including economic aid and authority to distribute money in the West Bank, thereby underscoring that it shared a place with the PLO in representing Palestinian interests. As it became clear to Husayn that the US-led process would not result in the international conference that Jordan sought, and after the United States failed to offer Jordan sufficient assurances of the final outcome of the talks with Israel, Husayn joined Arab leaders in the 1978 Baghdad summit that began the isolation of Egypt. Jordan's decision to forgo participation in the Camp David process had wide-ranging implications for the state. Most notably, it was drawn closer to Iraq politically and economically, and Baghdad became a major source of aid. During this period, Husayn continued to hope for a reunification of the West and East banks, but for the time being he would rely upon Arab diplomatic moves to pursue his goal.

The early 1980s brought a great deal of Arab diplomatic activity devoted to the conflict with Israel, much of it in response to continued US intervention (both military and political) in the region. After Israel's 1982 LEBANON WAR, the United States advanced a proposal (the REAGAN PLAN) that declared its opposition to both an independent Palestinian state and permanent Israeli control of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and instead proposed to give the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip political autonomy in association with Jordan. Jordan responded favorably to the US initiative and sought to ensure that a moderate PLO leadership emerged from the siege of Beirut to pursue the US offer. Although Jordan's first attempt at engaging the PLO under Arafat in 1982 foundered, shifting regional developments and Jordan's decision to reconvene its parliament (with 50 percent of its delegates drawn from the West Bank) created new opportunities for a Jordan-PLO dialogue to reemerge. On 11 February 1985 Arafat and Husayn signed a joint agreement proposing the confederation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza with Jordan and resolution of the Palestinian issue in accordance with UN Resolutions 242 and 338 at an international conference, in which the PLO and Jordan would be represented by a joint delegation.

Within a year, however, Husayn's coordination with the PLO came to an end—this time permanently. Ostensibly the breakdown centered on the PLO's failure to accept explicitly the terms of UN Security Council Resolution 242, because the United States refused to commit to an independent Palestinian state. Yet the talks were ultimately ended by Jordan's failure to obtain all the necessary commitments to ensure the country's complex interests regarding the Palestinian issue. In particular, changes in the internal politics of the PLO made constituencies in the West Bank and Gaza more important in Palestinian politics, and this shift was drawing Jordan and the PLO closer. But the inability to channel these changes into a clear dynamic left Husayn exposed politically and willing to restore back-channel negotiations with Israeli leader SHIMON PERES. The result, in spring 1987, was the LONDON AGREEMENT, in which Israel and Jordan sought to realize the "legitimate rights of the Palestinian people" through a comprehensive settlement to be negotiated at an international conference that would include a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. This attempt was scuttled by both internal Israeli politics and Jordan's inability to obtain the assurances it needed to go forward. Soon all of this diplomacy was overtaken by the spontaneous rebellion of young Palestinians to the Israeli OCCUPATION of the West Bank and Gaza.

The scope and intensity of the First INTIFADA, which erupted in December 1987, shook the region noticeably and compelled further recalculations of the situation. For Jordan the recalculation was fundamental: renunciation of the Hashemite monarchy's claims to the West Bank. To some within the Jordanian regime, the move was vital in order to pursue political and economic reform in Jordan proper. Others speculated that the PLO would eventually fail to meet its responsibilities and Palestinians would again look to Jordan for help and leadership. Regardless of the analyses, the consequences were clear: the PLO now had proprietary rights over the West Bank, thereby providing the Palestinians de facto sovereignty over the territory.

Opportunities from the Gulf War

The aftermath of Iraq's August 1990 invasion of KUWAIT started another series of developments that further redefined Jordan's role in Israeli-Palestinian affairs. The invasion and subsequent war to evict Iraq from Kuwait caused severe economic problems when 350,000 Jordanian expatriate workers, mostly Palestinian, were driven back to Jordan. The loss of their remittance revenues hurt financially, and the burdens of accommodating their return grew quickly. Jordan was trapped by the war—its economic dependence on oil from and trade with Iraq made it impossible for it to turn on Baghdad, but its reluctance to do so alienated Amman from the United States and aroused suspicions within Israel. Yet the end of the war to evict Iraq from Kuwait created opportunities for Jordan to mend fences with Israel and Washington, with the start of the process to pursue Israeli-Arab political settlement at the MADRID CONFERENCE.

Although the conference's plans called for Jordan and Palestinians unaffiliated with the PLO to negotiate jointly with Israel, the delegation soon split into two separate sets of bilateral negotiations, coupled with multilateral talks. Although the Israeli-Palestinian talks stalled, negotiations between Jordan and Israel focused on developing bilateral terms of peace that had long been under discussion. When it was announced that a framework for peace had been negotiated secretly between Israel and the PLO in Oslo, a surprised and agitated Jordan moved quickly and quietly to solidify its own accord with Israel. Husayn concluded that the move was politically safe because it came after the PLO initiative, and he was determined not to be left exposed by any Israel-PLO treaty.

The terms of the Israeli-Jordanian peace agreement, signed in October 1994, ended the state of war between the two states, established a full and formal peace with discernable borders (though the borders with the West Bank were not formalized), acknowledged Jordan's role regarding the Muslim shrines in Jerusalem, and outlined the future expectations of relations over a host of bilateral issues, including WATER sharing, tourism, trade, agriculture, and information exchanges. None of the treaty's clauses stipulated any coordination with the Palestinians, and only marginal concern was shown for their interests. The stated expectation of King Husayn was that peace would attract investment and revenue to Jordan, which had long been blocked by its conflict with Israel. The treaty did help ease economic difficulties resulting from the Iraq war, primarily by rehabilitating Jordan's relations with the United States, which directed significant aid and debt relief toward Jordan over the coming years. In combination with Oslo's creation of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) government, the Israel-Jordan treaty also ended, in the monarchy's view, any Israeli claims that Jordan was Palestine and therefore the rightful place for Palestinians currently in the Occupied Territories. Internationally, King Husayn was given credit for the accord, thereby linking opposition to it with opposition to the monarchy inside Jordan, effectively heading off domestic protest within the country.

Given the speedy and largely secretive dynamic behind the Israeli-Jordanian accord, however, the treaty became controversial in many political quarters of Jordan, where some derisively called it "the King's peace." Along with the gradual but perceptible narrowing of political reform in Jordan (which Husayn used to gain approval for the treaty from a largely sympathetic parliament engineered through changes to Jordan's electoral law in 1993), Jordan's peace with Israel became the target of latent and occasionally explicit opposition in the kingdom. The "anti-normalization" movement, which at first included leftist and Islamic opponents of the government as well as many of Jordan's professional associations, believed the king had wrongly abandoned Arab coordination of peace efforts in response to US and Israeli pressure. They argued that Husayn had shunted the responsibility for the Palestinian refugee issue to future undefined multilateral talks, failed to reclaim all of Jordan's lost land and water rights, and used domestic opposition to the treaty as justification for further curbing the political rights of Jordanian citizens. Sympathy for this movement's view was relatively contained until the economic expectations of peace failed to materialize. Frustration grew significantly in 1996 when Israeli attacks against the PNA and HIZBULLAH positions in Lebanon became more frequent and Israeli political pressure on Arafat increased. The prevailing fear in Jordan was that peace treaties were not enough to stem the dynamics of confrontation. This fear seemed justified after a Jordanian soldier killed seven Israeli schoolgirls and Israel botched the assassination of a HAMAS official in the streets of Amman. Even for the many Jordanians who sympathized with the Israeli victims of the soldier's shooting spree, King Husayn's offer of personal condolences to the individual Israeli families contrasted unfavorably with the lack of official concern historically shown for Arab victims. Conversely, the regime's relatively mild public response to the attempted assassination of a Palestinian leader on the streets of Amman underscored its failure to understand the public's outrage over Israel's actions on Jordanian territory.

Although King Husayn intervened from his sickbed in 1998 to help the United States forge a limited agreement between Israel and the PNA at WYE RIVER, Jordan gradually became less directly involved in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process after its own accord was completed. In reality, since 1994 both Jordan and the Palestinians finally possessed their own territorial entities, however contested they remained. For Jordan the central challenge is to create a working relationship with the PNA while addressing the outstanding issues that remain central to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, including BORDERS with the West Bank, the status of refugees, Jerusalem, and water rights.

With the transition from Husayn to his son Abdullah II, Jordan increasingly focused on pursuing internal economic development while offering rhetorical support for the Palestinians. The end of day-to-day worries about the West Bank gave Abdullah II a chance to modernize Jordan in order to solidify the monarchy, which after 2000 was once again threatened by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The AL-AQSA INTIFADA produced fear among the citizens of the kingdom that Jordan might once again be the destination for hundreds of thousands of Palestinian refugees if Israel decided to assert its sovereignty over part or all of the territory. Although Jordan has long sought to secure its own national interest through a combination of engagement with and detachment from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the intertwining of this issue with Jordan's own national existence ensures that its quest remains elusive.

See also ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; GULF WAR; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Abdullah, ibn Husayn. Memoirs of King Abdullah of Transjordan. Edited and translated by Philip P. Graves. London: Jonathan Cape, 1950.
- . My Memoirs Completed. Edited and translated by Philip P. Graves. London: Jonathan Cape, 1954.
- Abu Jaber, Kamel S. The Jordanians and the People of Jordan. Amman, Jordan: Royal Scientific Society Press, 1980.
- Abu-Odeh, Adnan. Jordanians, Palestinians and the Hashemite Kingdom in the Middle East Peace Process. Washington, DC: United States Institute for Peace Press, 1999.
- Al Madfai, Madiha Rashid. Jordan, the United States and the Middle East Peace Process, 1974–1991. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Bailey, Clinton. Jordan's Palestinian Challenge, 1948–1983: A Political History. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1984.
- Dallas, Roland. King Husayn: A Life on the Edge. New York: Fromm International, 1999.
- Eisenberg, Laura Zittrain, and Neil Caplan. "The Israel-Jordan Peace Treaty: Patterns of Negotiation, Problems of Implementation." Israel Affairs. 9:3 (2003).
- . Negotiating Arab-Israeli Peace: Patterns, Problems, Possibilities. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Evron, Yair. "Time to Revive a Jordanian Option?" Daily Star (Beirut, Lebanon). 8 July 2004.
- Frisch, Hillel. "Jordan and the Palestinian Authority: Did Better Fences Make Better Neighbors?" Middle East Journal. 58:1 (2004).
- Gelbar, Yoav. Israeli-Jordanian Dialogue, 1948–1953: Cooperation, Conspiracy or Collusion? Brighton, UK: Sussex University Press, 2004.
- Glubb, John Bagot. A Soldier with the Arabs. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1957.
- . The Story of the Arab Legion. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1948.
- Gubser, Peter. Jordan: Crossroads of Middle Eastern Events. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1983.
- Husayn, H. M., King of Jordan. Uneasy Lies the Head: An Autobiography. London: Heinemann, 1962.
- Kerr, Malcolm. The Arab Cold War: Gamal Abd Al-Nasir and His Rivals, 1958–1970, 3rd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.
- Khalidi, Walid. "Toward Peace in the Holy Land." Foreign Affairs. 66:4 (1988).
- Kirkbride, Sir Alec S. From the Wings: Amman Memoirs, 1947–1951. London: Frank Cass, 1976.
- Lucas, Russell E. "The Death of Normalization in Jordan with Israel." Middle East Journal. 58:1 (2004).
- . Institutions and the Politics of Survival in Jordan: Domestic Responses to External Challenges, 1988–2001. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2005.
- Lukacs, Yehuda. Israel, Jordan, and the Peace Process. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1999.
- Lunt, James. Hussein of Jordan: Searching for a Just and Lasting Peace, A Political Biography. London: Macmillan, 1989.
- Mutawi, Samir. Jordan in the 1967 War. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Nevo, Joseph. King Hussein and the Evolution of Jordan's Perception of a Political Settlement with Israel, 1967–1988. Eastbourne, East Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 2006.
- Nevo, Joseph, and Ilan Pappé, eds. Jordan in the Middle East 1948–1988: The Making of a Pivotal State. Essex, UK: Frank Cass, 1994.
- Nowar, Ma'an. The History of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. Oxford, UK: Ithaca Press, 1989.
- Pappé, Ilan. "Jordan between Hashemite and Palestinian Identity." In Jordan in the Middle East, 1948–1988: The Making of a Pivotal State. Edited by Joseph Nevo and Ilan Pappé. Essex, UK: Frank Cass, 1994.
- Robins, Philip. A History of Jordan. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Rogan, Eugene. "Jordan and 1948: The Persistence of an Official History." In The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948. Edited by Eugene Rogan and Avi Shlaim. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Ryan, Curtis. Jordan in Transition: From Hussein to Abdullah. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2002.
- Sahliyah, Emile. "Jordan and the Palestinians." In The Middle East: Ten Years after Camp David. Edited by

- William Quandt. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 1988.
- Satloff, Robert B. From Abdullah to Hussein: Jordan in Transition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Scham, Paul, and Russell Lucas. "'Normalization' and 'Anti-Normalization' in Jordan: The Public Debate." Israel Affairs. 9:3 (2003).
- Shalom, Zakai, and Avi Shlaim. The Superpowers: Israel and the Future of Jordan, 1960–1963: The Perils of the Pro-Nasser Policy. Eastborne, East Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 2000.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan: King 'Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1988.
- . Israel and the Arab Coalition in 1948. Six Sessions. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, n.d. www.fathom.com/course/72810001/session1.html.
- . The Politics of Partition: King Abdullah, the Zionists and Palestine, 1921–1951, abridged. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Stewart, Dona. Good Neighbourly Relations: Jordan, Israel and the 1994–2004 Peace Process. London: Tauris Academic Studies, 2006.
- Susser, Asher. "Jordan, the PLO and the Palestine Question." In Jordan in the Middle East 1948–1988: The Making of a Pivotal State. Edited by Joseph Nevo and Ilan Pappé. Essex, UK: Frank Cass, 1994.
- Tell, Ahmad. "The Jordanian Option." Jerusalemites. 25 July 1999.
- Vatikiotis, P. J. Politics and the Military in Jordan: A Study of the Arab Legion, 1921–1957. New York: Praeger, 1967.
- Wilson, Mary Christina. King Abdullah, Britain, and the Making of Jordan. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Wilson, Rodney, ed. Politics and the Economy in Jordan. London: Routledge, 1991.
- Ya'ari, Ehud. "Dreams across the River." Jerusalem Report. Jerusalem: Jews for Justice for Palestinians, 14 June 2004.

—John C. Creed

Jordanian Option

The "Jordanian option" is an idea for settling the Palestine question—that is, the stateless and homeless condition of the Palestinian population—by associating the Palestinians with JORDAN. Both Israel and Jordan, albeit for different reasons, have had an interest in such a solution. The idea was originally raised in Britain's PEEL COMMISSION Report of 1936 and later by COUNT FOLKE BERNADOTTE, the UN mediator on Palestine in 1948. In his report to the UN General Assembly of 16 September 1948 (A/648), Bernadotte suggested the possibility of merging the territory of Palestine earmarked for an Arab state (the WEST BANK), in accordance with the UN Partition Resolution (UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 181), with Transjordan (Jordan after 1950) in full consultation with the Arab inhabitants of Palestine. Before 1948, Zionist leaders and Emir Abdullah, who controlled Jordan, had met on several occasions to discuss dividing between them the area to be allotted to the Palestinian state. In 1948 Abdullah actualized the merger of Jordanian and Palestinian territories when he annexed the West Bank to Jordan. This action, however, was unacceptable to the Palestinians.

Since the 1930s, Jordan has considered the West Bank an integral part of the HASHEMITE kingdom, and from 1948 through 1967 the monarchy appeared to have achieved its objective. However, Jordan's situation changed radically after the 1967 WAR, when Israel gained control of the Sinai Peninsula, the GAZA STRIP, the West Bank, eastern JERUSALEM, and the Golan Heights, even though King Husayn, Abdullah's successor, made persistent attempts to regain control. To counter Israeli efforts to annex the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES by the creation of Jewish SETTLEMENTS, the king proposed, on 15 March 1972, the unification of the West Bank and the East Bank of the Jordan River in a "United Arab Kingdom." The proposal was rejected by both the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and Israel. On 22 June 1977, Jordan again revived the proposal and suggested a federation between an autonomous West Bank of Palestine and the East Bank state of Jordan. The proposal was again rejected by the PLO and by Israel.

When, in 1982, President RONALD REAGAN proposed a peace plan that included Palestinian autonomy in association with Jordan, King Husayn seized the occasion to offer to the Palestinians a confederation between the West Bank and Jordan. This assumed the future establishment of a Palestinian state and was meant as a compromise between the FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE and the REAGAN PLAN. The PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL discussed King Husayn's proposal at Algiers in February 1983 and approved a Palestinian-Jordanian confederation in principle, but only on condition that each member of the federation was established as an independent state.

At the urging of King Husayn, Jordan reached an agreement with the PLO on 11 February 1985 for a joint initiative to establish a Jordanian-Palestinian federation as part of a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict on the basis of UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338. Husayn took advantage of the weakness of the PLO after the devastating 1982 LEBANON WAR and a tripartite split in the organization, as well as a civil war among Palestinians in LEBANON and an AMAL militia onslaught against the refugee camps in Lebanon. The Husayn-Arafat agreement included the following principles:

- Total withdrawal by Israel from the territories it occupied in 1967
- Right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, to be exercised within the context of the proposed confederated Arab states of Jordan and Palestine
- Solution of the Palestine REFUGEE problem in accordance with the UN resolutions
- Solution of the question of Palestine in all its aspects
- Negotiations to be conducted by a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation under the auspices of an international conference, including the five permanent members of the UN Security Council

The joint peace initiative, however, encountered a number of difficulties. The UNITED STATES and Israel opposed holding negotiations with PLO representatives in the context of an international conference. In addition, the United States and Israel claimed the right to approve the Palestinian members of the Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. Moreover, Jordan and the PLO disagreed over the use of Security Council Resolution 242, which called for Israel's withdrawal from the Arab territories occupied since June 1967, as the guideline for the negotiations. King Husayn was ready to accept 242, but the PLO rejected it because it does not guarantee the national rights of the people of Palestine. The joint initiative was abrogated in 1986.

In 1988, after the end of the Jordan-PLO agreement and the outbreak of the First INTIFADA, Jordan formally disengaged from the West Bank but still did not give up its hope of recovering the coveted area. King Husayn had the following interests in the Occupied Territories: (1) the monarchy considered the West Bank an integral part of the Hashemite kingdom and sought to restore its sovereignty there; (2) control over the Muslim holy places in Jerusalem was a critical objective for Amman both for religious and tourist reasons—it provided Jordan with a major part of its GNP; and (3) King Husayn feared that a Palestinian state in the West Bank could lead to irredentist claims on the East Bank and to the politicization of the Palestinian citizens in Jordan, who constitute more than half the population. All these factors mandated an active policy of Jordanian engagement.

Between 1967 and 1993 some Israeli leaders, mainly from the LABOR PARTY, considered the possibility of a “compromise” with Jordan over the West Bank. They saw such a compromise as a way of managing the DEMOGRAPHIC problem that resulted from the OCCUPATION—that is, the growing Arab population relative to the Jewish one. Israel would achieve several objectives in such an initiative; it could divest itself of a large number of Palestinians, retain certain strategic areas of the West Bank, obtain Arab ratification of its conquests, and end the Palestine question. When the LIKUD PARTY came to power in 1977, the Jordanian option was shelved. But it reemerged in 1987 in the HUSAYN-PERES AGREEMENT. Indeed, throughout this period Labor leaders and King Husayn retained a strong interest in the possibility of some sort of agreement, despite the 1974 ARAB LEAGUE decision at the RABAT SUMMIT designating the Palestine Liberation Organization as the claimant for the future of the territories.

The 1987 Husayn-Peres Agreement, negotiated between the king and Foreign Minister SHIMON PERES, appeared auspicious for Jordan, but the proposal was rejected by Prime Minister YITZHAK SHAMIR. That same year the outbreak of the Intifada and the subsequent upsurge in Palestinian nationalism lessened King Husayn's interest in acquiring the radicalized population, and the following year he disengaged. Still, in the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE, Israel required a joint Jordanian-Palestinian negotiating team in hopes that Jordan could speak for the Palestinians, and thus kept open an option for an agreement with Jordan over the West Bank.

The Jordanian option has been distorted by some extremist Israeli factions, including former prime minister ARIEL SHARON, who use the slogan “Jordan is Palestine” to mean that all the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories should undergo TRANSFER to Jordan and their land (the West Bank) should become part of Israel.

See also JORDAN

Bibliography

- Abu Jaber, Kamel S. The Jordanians and the People of Jordan. Amman, Jordan: Royal Scientific Society Press, 1980.
- Aruri, Naseer. "The PLO and the Jordan Option." Third World Quarterly. 7:4 (1985).
- Bailey, Clinton. Jordan's Palestinian Challenge, 1948–1983: A Political History. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1984.
- Evron, Yair. "Time to Revive a Jordanian Option?" Daily Star (English-language daily, Beirut, Lebanon). 8 July 2004.
- Gubser, Peter. Jordan: Crossroads of Middle Eastern Events. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1983.
- Khalidi, Walid. "Toward Peace in the Holy Land." Foreign Affairs. Spring (1988).
- Lynch, Marc. "No Jordan Option." Middle East Report. 2004. www.merip.org/mero/mero062104.html.
- Al Madfai, Madiha Rashid. Jordan, the United States and the Middle East Peace Process, 1974–1991. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Mutawi, Samir A. Jordan in the 1967 War. London: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan: King 'Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1988.
- . Israel and the Arab Coalition in 1948. Six Sessions. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, n.d. www.fathom.com/course/72810001/session1.html.
- . The Politics of Partition: King Abdullah, the Zionists and Palestine, 1921–1951, abridged. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Tell, Ahmad. "The Jordanian Option." Jerusalemite. 25 July 1999.
- Ya'ari, Ehud. "Dreams across the River." Jerusalem Report. Jerusalem: Jews for Justice for Palestinians, 14 June 2004.

Jordanian-Palestinian Agreement, 1985

See HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT

Jordan Rift Valley

The Jordan Rift Valley technically refers to the area at the bottom of the mountain ridge (the valley) abutting the western side of the Jordan River, which runs from the north to the south, connecting the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. However, common references to the Jordan Valley typically include a much broader strip of land—an area bordered on the north and south by the Green Line, to the east by the Jordanian border, and to the west by Route 80 (consisting of Routes 458, 508, and 578) and known as the Allon Road. The area includes the Jordan Valley itself, as well as the coastline area of the Dead Sea, and the mountain ridge's eastern slopes. In the following analysis, then, the term "Jordan Valley" refers to this larger area.

Settlement of this area began almost immediately after the 1967 WAR, led by Minister of Labor YIGAL ALLON. In July 1967, Allon unveiled to Prime Minister LEVI ESHKOL his plan to consolidate Israel's hold on what he believed to be crucial areas of the WEST BANK. The ALLON PLAN called for Israel to retain the Jordan Valley and the eastern slopes of the mountain ridge running through the West Bank in order to protect against an Arab attack from the east. The plan also called for establishing Israeli settlements in these areas as a way of defining the land that would eventually be annexed to Israel. While the Allon Plan was never formally adopted by any Israeli government, it nonetheless became the framework for the LABOR PARTY policy vis-à-vis the West Bank. In 1968, Eshkol declared, "The Jordan River is the State of Israel's security border." In the next ten years twenty-one SETTLEMENTS were established in the Jordan Valley and along the eastern slopes of the West Bank's central mountain ridge, all under the leadership of Labor governments. The settlement boom in the Jordan Valley cooled somewhat after 1977 when the LIKUD PARTY came to power, largely due to a shift in Israeli government policy to permit settlement in areas of the West Bank previously considered off-limits.

According to PEACE NOW, whose research on and analysis of settlements in the Occupied Territories are considered the most reliable, as of 2008 there were twenty-seven settlements in this area, with a combined total population of 9,358 people. There are also nine "illegal" OUTPOSTS in the area. Three of them, together with the settlements of Yitav and Na'omi, are located in such a manner as to surround JERICHO from the north and east, and to prevent Jericho from expanding to connect with the neighboring village of Auja. These outposts are attractive sites for ideological settlers who see the area as an important and strategic location that should be kept under Israeli control. Four of the outposts are at the edge of the central ridge (three near the settlements of Kochav Hashahar and one near Mitzpe Yericho). One, Mitzpe Jericho North East, is located along the strategically important road connecting JERUSALEM and the Jordan Valley.

In addition, a series of outposts have been established in recent years east of the (non-Jordan

UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs
West Bank-Jordan Valley
 November 2005

Closures

- Checkpoint
- ◐ Partial checkpoint
- 🗼 Observation tower
- ✕ Road gate
- Roadblock
- ▲ Earth mound
- ▬ Earth wall
- Trench

Oslo Agreement

- Area (A)<sup>1</sup>
- Area (B)<sup>2</sup>
- Area (C)<sup>3</sup>

1-Full Palestinian civil and military control.
 2-Full Palestinian civil control and joint Israeli-Palestinian military control.
 3-Full Israeli civil and military control.

▨ Nature Reserve
 □ Special Case (H2)

Road Network

- ▬ Restricted road
- ▬ Road with restrictions for Palestinian vehicle use.
- ▬ Regional or main road
- ▬ Other road
- 90 Road number

Barrier

- ▬ Constructed Barrier
- ⋯ Under construction
- ⋯ Projected Barrier

Planned Barrier - path based on Israeli Government (Ministry of Defence - Seam Zone Authority) maps, published 30 June 2004 and IDF land seizure orders.

- Palestinian built-up area
- Israeli settlement
- Israeli military base
- ▬ Area of settlement municipal boundary

0 5 10 Kilometers

OCHA  Cartography: OCHA dPT - November 2005.
 Base data: PA MoP, July 2000, OCHA update 2005.
 For comments contact <ochaopt@un.org> or Tel. +972 (02) 582-9982, http://www.ochaopt.org

© UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), Geneva, reprinted with permission.

Map 28. Jordan Valley, Eastern West Bank, 2005

Valley) settlements of Shilo, Itamar, and ELON MOREH. The apparent purpose of these outposts is to connect isolated mountain ridge settlements to the Jordan Valley. Some settlers and their supporters hope that Israel not only will retain the Jordan Valley, but will extend “fingers” into the West Bank heartland to incorporate these veteran ideological settlements as well. As Israeli map expert Shaul Arieli wrote for the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies in August 2004: “Their [the settlers’] assumption is that the lightly populated Jordan Valley, which constitutes Israel’s ‘eastern security region’ in the ‘essential interests map’ approved by the Israeli government during Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU’S first term [1996–1999], can remain under Israeli control for the foreseeable future. . . . For example, seventeen outposts are located between Ariel and Mevo Shiloh approaching the Allon Road, six outposts are designed to connect Itamar eastward to the hill range, and fourteen outposts connect Ofra and Beit El to northern Jerusalem.”

According to the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, as of mid-year 2005 the Palestinian population in the Jordan Valley was around 53,000 (this includes all the villages in the Jericho governorate, as well as a handful of villages from the governorates of Tubas and Nablus, but not Nablus itself). The population is broken down as follows (numbers are rounded): Jericho/Auja area (including Aqabat Jabr refugee camp): 35,000; Jiftlik area: 6,700; North Jordan Valley: 3,150; Nablus/Tubas area (i.e., the eastern slopes of the mountain ridge): 7,700. In addition, the area is home to an unknown number of BEDOUIN (probably a few thousand) who maintain a seminomadic lifestyle.

RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT and access for Palestinians into and within the Jordan Valley are especially severe. Beginning in 2001, Israel set up seven permanent CHECKPOINTS west of the Jordan Valley and north of the Dead Sea, including four around the Jericho enclave. In 2005 the army placed much harsher restrictions on Palestinians wanting to cross these checkpoints. In response to an inquiry by B’TSELEM, an ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) spokesperson said that only Palestinians whose IDENTITY CARDS indicate that they live in one of the villages in the Jordan Valley are allowed to cross the checkpoints. Other residents of the West Bank are permitted to cross only if they have a special PERMIT issued by the CIVIL

ADMINISTRATION. In reality, only in “humanitarian cases” can Palestinians cross without a permit. Travel from Jericho north to other parts of the valley, including travel by residents of Jericho, is also forbidden except by permit. “Palestinians caught in the Jordan Valley without a permit,” the IDF spokesperson said, “are handed over to the police.”

On 12 January 2006, Israeli leaders officially announced the isolation of the Jordan Valley from the rest of the West Bank, dropping the status of the Jordan Valley from FINAL STATUS TALKS. In addition to the foregoing, Israeli policies in the Jordan Valley from 2001 to 2008 included the following:

- Imposing strict military procedures on areas inhabited by Palestinians, such as placing watchtowers at the entrances of Jordan Valley villages and along Road 90, setting up twenty-four-hour military routes, breaking into villages and houses, and imposing regular and continuous CURFEWS
- Preventing landowners whose IDs do not show a Jordan Valley residential address from reaching their lands, resulting in loss of sources of income and making it easier for Israel to confiscate their LAND under Israel’s ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW
- Preventing Palestinian farmers from selling their produce to Israeli traders at Bardala-Bisan checkpoint 5 kilometers (3 miles) away, forcing them to travel 50 kilometers (30 miles) to get to Al-Jalameh, increasing the cost and leading to far more damage and spoilage of agricultural goods
- Preventing traders from 1948 land from entering Palestinian villages or farms based on the excuses of “security, creating problems with regard to quality, price and payments”
- Closing thousands of dunums of pastures and surrounding some with trenches and designating others as CLOSED MILITARY ZONES
- Forcing Palestinians to deal with the Israeli Civil Administration for their daily affairs
- Restricting access to and from Jericho by placing seven checkpoints manned by Israeli soldiers around the city; surrounding Jericho with a trench 30 kilometers (8.5 miles) long, 2 meters deep, and 2 to 5 meters wide; closing all entrances and exits to Jericho with permanent ROADBLOCKS and controlling movement through two permanent checkpoints; and preventing Palestinian vehicles and tourist guides from moving out of Jericho toward the Dead Sea

Following major protests, the situation was somewhat improved as of 2009. Palestinians who do not live in the Jordan Valley are generally, though not automatically, permitted to enter, but the IDF still bars entry of the cars of any Palestinians who do not live in the area. So any Palestinian not a Jordan Valley resident who wants to come to the area must enter via special taxis that are permitted by the IDF to pass through the checkpoints. The exception is the city of Jericho itself, where access into the city is normally open, but via only one road. However, Palestinians cannot leave Jericho to travel into the rest of the Jordan Valley.

Since early 2001 the IDF has barred all Palestinian access to the Dead Sea. A checkpoint south of Jericho (or north of the Dead Sea) prevents any Palestinian vehicle from entering the region. According to B'Tselem, testimonies of soldiers who served at this checkpoint reveal that the checkpoint was established in response to pressure from Israeli settlers in the area who are trying to develop resort sites along the shore of the Dead Sea. These settlers fear that Israelis will be reluctant to come to their resorts due to the presence of Palestinians in the area. The Dead Sea has traditionally been a popular site for Palestinian visitors and vacationers from throughout the West Bank, especially since the early 1990s, when Tel Aviv began to bar Palestinian entry into Israel, thus closing off access to the Mediterranean to Palestinians in the West Bank. Now, some Israelis have concluded that in order to permit the settlers to develop resorts in the area, the entire Dead Sea has been made inaccessible to Palestinians. On 10 June 2008 the ASSOCIATION FOR CIVIL RIGHTS IN ISRAEL (ACRI) filed a petition (HCJ 5148/08) against the checkpoint with the Israeli High Court of Justice, but it remains without adjudication.

On 28 June 2009, the Israeli Land Registry Office at MA'ALE ADUMIM SETTLEMENT published twelve public notices in the local Palestinian al-Quds newspaper for the registration of 139,000 dunums (34,000 acres) located along the northern and western shores of the Dead Sea to the property of the Custodian of State Land of Israel. The public notices requested that any individual or entity affected by the registration process be entitled to "file an objection" to the Beit El District coordination office within forty-five days. The Land Registry will not deal with any objection, as it considers the state of Israel the rightful heir and owner of all the public lands of the state in addition to most land in the West Bank.

Peace Now asserts that Israel is planning to declare ownership of the West Bank's Dead Sea shore as "state property," in order to acquire more Palestinian land. "Israeli authorities have announced that they intend to declare as STATE LAND some 138,600 dunum (34,650 acres) that has emerged along the Dead Sea in the occupied West Bank," said Hagit Ofra of Peace Now.

The land, part of which has emerged as a result of Dead Sea shrinkage, is located along the shore of the Dead Sea in the West Bank. According to Peace Now the amount of land involved may go beyond the shoreline that has surfaced as a consequence of an estimated one-meter (yard) drop in the water level per year. "It would appear that the primary purpose of registering this area as 'state land' is to prevent Palestinian use of the land or any Palestinian assertion of ownership over it," Ofra added.

In the West Bank, the designation of "state land"—land to be held in trust by the occupying power and to be used for the benefit of the indigenous population—has long been abused as a form of de facto expropriation. Israel occupied the West Bank during the 1967 WAR, and it has so far "declared or registered huge areas of the West Bank as 'state land' and virtually all of which has been given over for the exclusive use and exclusive benefit of Israeli settlers and the Israeli military."

Almost all of the land in the Jordan Valley, other than actual built-up areas of the Palestinian population, has been placed under the jurisdiction of the settlement regional councils in the area ('Arvot Hayarden and Megillot). This means that land not defined as belonging to a specific settlement is still under the control of the settlements' regional councils (and off-limits to Palestinians), and in some cases is actively farmed by settlers. Almost all of the settlements, despite having tiny populations, have huge footprints on the land, with extensive agricultural areas (large fields, greenhouses, etc).

Israel's policy of demolishing Palestinian homes has been especially focused on the Jordan Valley. Looking only at the first quarter of 2008 (the first regular report period following the November 2007 Annapolis Conference and the re-launching of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks), the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) noted in a May 2008 report that “eighty-six percent of the demolitions in Area C due to lack of permit in the first quarter of 2008 (107) were in Jordan Valley locales.” Within the Jordan Valley, certain areas have been the particular focus of HOUSE DEMOLITION efforts. The OCHA report notes, for example, that on 11 March 2008 twelve structures in the northern Jordan Valley village of Al Hadidiya were demolished by Israel. OCHA observes that the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT rejected a petition from the villagers against the demolition orders on the grounds that the affected buildings were located in an area defined as agricultural in the Mandatory Regional Outline Plans, and the buildings posed a security threat to the Ro’i settlement. The plight of the village of Al ‘Aqaba has drawn a great deal of attention—in part because of a campaign by local and international activists. OCHA reports that “the village of Al ‘Aqaba lies at the edge of the Jordan Valley and comprises 3,500 dunums [865 acres] of land. It is entirely situated in Area C, between two military bases . . . 35 of the 45 structures in the village have received demolition orders due to lack of permit.”

According to Peace Now, “The restrictions on movement and access in the Jordan Valley, combined with the restrictive land use policies, have resulted in a situation where the Israeli public, to the extent that it is aware of the Jordan Valley, does not really view it in the same light as the rest of the West Bank. Israelis driving through the area—and historically, the main Jordan Valley road, Route 90, was and to some extent remains the primary route used by Israelis to travel from southern Israel or Jerusalem to reach the Galilee—do not see many Palestinians using the highway or living along it. What they see are other Israeli vehicles and the IDF, and alongside the route, desert or Israeli agricultural development. By keeping the area free of Palestinian traffic, Israelis and tourists who use this route can feel they are traveling a road that is no different than any road inside Israel.

“More broadly speaking, many Israelis still believe that the Jordan Valley must remain eternally part of Israel—the vital security buffer between Israel and Arab lands to the east. According to this perspective, the Palestinian population of the area—which is sparse and spread out over a huge area—is at best an inconvenience to be minimized, and at worst a liability that must be overcome. Israeli policies in the area, historically and through the present day, would appear to seek to minimize the number of Palestinians in the area, while maximizing Israeli control over the land and Israeli control over the transportation routes.”

During the 1999–2001 final status negotiations, initial Israeli proposals placed the Jordan Valley under various levels of Israeli control, with part of it annexed to Israel and other parts left under Israeli control via long-term lease arrangements, with the understanding that such areas would eventually come under full Palestinian sovereignty. These proposals were rejected by the Palestinians, who view the Jordan Valley as the only land reserve that could be used by a future Palestinian state to absorb large population increases expected from natural growth and refugee absorption. Additionally, Palestinians view control over their own BORDERS as an important attribute of sovereignty.

At some point during the final status negotiations some participants claimed that Israel gave up its demand for control over the Jordan Valley. For example, US special Middle East coordinator DENNIS ROSS pointed to oral Israeli proposals made at the end of the July 2000 CAMP DAVID SUMMIT. Others, like Israeli negotiator Shlomo Ben-Ami, point to the CLINTON PARAMETERS, presented by President BILL CLINTON on 23 December 2000 and accepted by Israel, which called for Israeli annexation of 4–6 percent of the West Bank, an amount inconsistent with Israeli annexation of the Jordan Valley. Given, however, the strategic importance Tel Aviv has accorded the Jordan Valley since 1967, it seems unlikely that Israel would ever give it up.

The Jordan Valley has come into play more recently with regard to Israel’s West Bank security BARRIER (fence/wall). In March 2003, during a cabinet ministers’ tour of the route of the separation Barrier, Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON (2001–2006) declared that he intended to build an eastern separation fence. This new section of the fence would span some 300 kilometers (185 miles), running from the Green Line in the north, along the Jordan Valley and the Allon Road, and ending in the southern Hebron hills (and keeping the Jordan Valley outside the territory to be bounded within the separation fence). The original map with the route of the Barrier issued by the Israeli Ministry of Defense in October 2003 appeared to include the first stage of this plan, depicting a barrier running close to the Green Line along the northern end of the West Bank, and also including a section jutting out from the main barrier running south along the central mountain ridge. Faced with international and internal opposition, Israel dropped the plans for an eastern barrier.

In mid-July 2008, Israeli defense minister EHUD BARAK approved a plan to turn a long-disused military outpost in the Jordan Valley originally established in the 1980s, called Maskiyot, into a new permanent civilian settlement. If the decision is implemented, this transformation of Maskiyot will represent the first new settlement in the Jordan Valley since the mid-1980s and would conflict with the government of Israel's long-standing and much-repeated commitment not to establish any new settlements.

Supporters of the plan have argued that this is not the establishment of a new settlement, but the expansion of an existing one. This logic is inconsistent with both the letter and the spirit of Israel's commitment not to establish new settlements. With respect to the former, a military outpost is not the same as a civilian settlement, and the transformation of a disused military outpost into a permanent civilian settlement represents the transformation of an arguably temporary, limited-use, limited-needs site into something entirely new, with new legal, security, financial, infrastructure, and political implications. With respect to the latter, the Israeli commitment not to establish new settlements was made as a sign of good faith and support for a peace process that was predicated on the understanding that further expansion of settlements undermined the chances of achieving a two-state solution. To seek to exploit a dubious technicality in order to circumvent this unambiguous commitment would have troubling implications.

Maskiyot is what is known as a NAHAL outpost (Pioneering Fighting Youth), a term that dates back to pre-1948 Jewish militia terminology and has been adopted by the IDF. Among their other activities, Nahal units are responsible for creating military outposts in the West Bank. In 1982 the army established Maskiyot. In 2002, the IDF left Maskiyot, and a pre-army religious education program, with a few dozen students in temporary residence, moved in. Then, in September 2005, the Israeli press reported that settlers evacuated from the GAZA STRIP settlement of Shirat Hayam (as part of ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA) were planning to move to the site. At that time, it was reported that approximately twenty families were planning to move to Maskiyot sometime after October 2005, and that some twenty prefabricated structures, removed from the Gaza Strip and the northern West Bank, would be moved to the Maskiyot to accommodate them in the short term. In the longer term the families reportedly expected to receive permanent housing and land for agricultural use.

Subsequently, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon ordered that the planning process for the site commence (checking the status of the land and preparing a master plan for the settlement, intended to accommodate up to 100 families). On 12 May 2005, the official "municipal borders" of the settlement were announced in an order issued by the commander of the IDF's Central Command, the official sovereign in the Occupied Territories. A master plan for 100 housing units was prepared and approved by the planning authority, awaiting only the approval of the minister of defense to validate the plan.

During the last week of 2006 it was made public that Defense Minister Amir Peretz had approved the plan and that the construction of thirty homes to accommodate new civilian settlers in Maskiyot was set to start. This decision was widely recognized, both within Israel and by the international community, as tantamount to a decision to establish a new settlement. After strong criticism from within Israel and from abroad, including pointed criticism from US secretary of state CONDOLEEZZA RICE, in mid-January 2007 Peretz froze the approval, taking construction at Maskiyot off the table. A few months later, a group of some eight families from the evacuated Gaza settlement of Shirat Hayam moved into trailer homes in Maskiyot, apparently deciding that they would not wait for approval to build at the site.

Maskiyot then fell off the world's radar screen for more than a year, until 23 July 2008, when an announcement was published in an Israeli newspaper by the High Council for Planning in the Civil Administration informing the public of the approval of Plan Number 303 for the construction of residential units in Maskiyot.

Numerous articles in the Israeli press about Maskiyot, however, noted that the plan (as of 2009) has not been formally approved, as required to begin construction. In theory, it might still be possible for the Israeli government to freeze the plan. For example, in some cases, after the final approval of a plan for construction in West Bank settlements, the minister of defense must approve the beginning of the development before the bulldozers can start to work. There are no indications that Prime Minister Netanyahu intends to pursue such a course. Indeed, the apparent perspective of the Defense Ministry is clearly summed up by one Israeli Defense Ministry official who stated, "Maskiyot is a settlement that exists and has been on the map. . . . The place is bubbling with life. There is no intention to relent on the decision."

The Maskiyot plan is extremely important in terms of the scope of settlement in the Jordan Valley. As the head of the Jordan Valley regional council (the settlement governance body in the area), Dubi Tal, recently told Israel Radio, "Twenty units in the Jordan Valley is significant, as there are only 1,000 [housing units for Israelis] in the entire Jordan Valley." It is even more significant in light of the fact that in almost all other Jordan Valley settlements, the population is either stagnant or shrinking. In political terms it is also extremely significant. The future of the Jordan Valley is one of the most important territorial questions that must be addressed in order to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Unilateral actions that seek to cement Israel's hold on the area undermine the chances of achieving any peace agreement, including one in which Israel could retain some control over the area through a bilateral arrangement with the Palestinians.

The character of the proposed Maskiyot settlers makes this plan even more problematic. Currently, the settler population of the Jordan Valley is generally nonideological and the vast majority would likely cooperate with, if not support, a future peace agreement that required them to relocate. A new settlement in this area, populated by some of the most hardline ideological settlers (a category into which virtually all of the former Gaza Strip settlers fall), would significantly change the political coloration of the Jordan Valley, greatly complicate future negotiations over the area, and open the door for an influx of additional ideological settlers to the area. Indeed, some observers have suggested that this is one of the goals, if not the major goal, of the plan.

See also ALLON PLAN; BEDOUIN IN ISRAEL; HOUSE DEMOLITIONS; SETTLEMENTS

Bibliography

- Arieli, Shaul. "Disengagement, the 'Seam' Zone, and Alternative Conflict Management." Strategic Assessment. 7:2 (August 2004).
- Benn, Aluf, and Yossi Verter. "A Country That's Fun to Live In." Interview with Israeli Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Ha'aretz. 14 March 2006.
- B'Tselem. "Israel Has de Facto Annexed the Jordan Valley." Land Expropriation and Settlements. 13 February 2006. www.btselem.org/English/Settlements/20060213\_Annexation\_of\_the\_Jordan\_Valley.asp.
- Dearden, Nick. "Life on the Other Side of Palestine: Crime in the [Jordan] Valley." Counterpunch. 30 June 2006.
- Eldar, Akiva. "Israel Weighs Confiscation of More Palestinian Land." Ha'aretz. 21 July 2009.
- . "Some 2,000 Palestinians Banned from Entering Jordan Valley." Ha'aretz. 14 March 2006.
- Friedman, Lara, and Hagit Ofra. A New Jordan Valley Settlement: Facts, Background, and Analysis. Tel Aviv: Peace Now, 2008.
- Glazer, Hilo. "Palestinian Child Labour in Jordan Valley Israeli Settlements." Kav LaOved (Israel). 6 June 2009. http://www.kavlaoved.org.il/media-view\_eng.asp?id=2327.
- Habitat International Coalition—Middle East—North Africa. Palestine: Call for Dead Sea Shorelands Registry. Cairo: Habitat International Coalition—Middle East—North Africa, 2009.
- Hass, Amira. "In Ze'evi's Footsteps." Ha'aretz. 15 February 2006.
- . "Israel Cuts Jordan Rift from Rest of West Bank." Ha'aretz. 13 February 2006.
- Jordan Valley Solidarity. "Settlement Expansion and Ethnic Cleansing in Palestine: A Jordan Valley Case Study." Jordan Valley Solidarity Campaign, West Bank. 19 July 2009. http://www.jordanvalleysolidarity.org/index.php?option=com\_content&task=view&id=180&Itemid=97.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Land Grab: Israel's Settlement Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Levy, Gideon. "Herding the Shepherds." Ha'aretz. 2 July 2009.
- Lieberman, Guy. "Build Yourself a House at the Dead Sea and Live in the Lowest Community on Earth." Ha'aretz. 11 December 2008.
- Lynfield, Ben. "Israel Is Accused of Dead Sea Land Grab for Political Gain." NEWS.scotsman.com. 24 July 2009.
- McGreal, Chris. "Israel Excludes Palestinians from Fertile Valley." The Guardian. 14 February 2006.
- . "Israel Unveils Plan to Encircle Palestinian State." The Guardian. 8 February 2006.
- OCHA. Lack of Permit Demolitions and Resultant Displacement in Area C. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, May 2008. http://74.125.95.132/search?q=cache:Mn9YZ\_vE\_cwJ:www.ochaopt.org/documents/Demolitions\_in\_Area\_C\_May\_2008\_English.pdf+OCHA,+May+2008+house+demolitions&cd=1&hl=en&ct=clnk&gl=ca.
- Ofra, Hagit. "Israel to Declare Dead Sea Shore State Land: Peace Now." Agence France-Presse. 21 July 2009.

Palestine Monitor. "Jordan Valley: Struggling for Existence in the Midst of Occupation." Palestine Monitor. 25 June 2009. <http://www.palestinemonitor.org/spip/spip.php?article991>.

Shragai, Nadav, Nir Hasson, and Yair Ettinger. "New Settlement Planned for Former Gaza Settlers." Ha'aretz. 26 December 2006.

United Nations Office of the Coordinator of Humanitarian Affairs. "The Jordan Valley." Humanitarian Update: Occupied Palestinian Territories. 2005. www.ochaopt.org/documents/ochaHU1005\_En.pdf.

White, Ben. "The Jordan Valley's Forgotten Palestinians." The Electronic Intifada. 30 May 2008. <http://electronicintifada.net/v2/article9573.shtml>.

area now divided among Israel, JORDAN, and the WEST BANK. Judea is mainly used in modern times by Jewish religious fundamentalists and secular ultranationalists in a conscious attempt to reassociate the region with its biblical past.

See also SAMARIA

June War

See WAR, 1967, CONSEQUENCES FOR ISRAELI; WAR, 1967, CONSEQUENCES FOR THE PALESTINIANS

Judea

The word Judea is derived from the Hebrew word for the mountainous southern part of Palestine, an

---

K

---

Kach

Kach (Only Thus) was a far-right political party in Israel founded by RABBI MEIR KAHANE in the early 1970s. Kach advocated two central principles: the forced TRANSFER of all Palestinians from Greater Israel, including Israeli Arab citizens; and the establishment of a Jewish theocracy in ERETZ YISRAEL (the biblical land of Israel). Kach believed that biblical Israel should be reestablished in its entirety and that any Arabs who occupy those lands should be evicted to make room for Jews.

Kahane expressed opposition to Western-style democracy for Israel, arguing that it was incompatible with authentic Judaism. He advocated the consistent application of Orthodox Jewish laws and standards to the whole of society, even if that meant undermining liberal democratic institutions. Kahane said that “secular government is the enemy” and opposed a secular Jewish state. Supporters of such a state were, for Kahane, a major obstacle to the coming of the Messiah—an obstacle that could not be tolerated passively. It was an important principle of Kahane and his followers that “miracles don’t just happen, they are made.” Kach believed that its efforts would help change the course of world history, even if violence was required, and members of Kach were involved in countless acts of TERRORISM against Palestinians.

Only three years after Kahane’s arrival in Israel, Kach candidates ran for seats in the Knesset in 1973 but failed to attract the minimum number of votes. Attempts in 1977 and 1981 also failed, but the party finally gained a Knesset seat in 1984 with Kahane as its only representative. This caused significant alarm among the Israeli public, and in 1985, the “BASIC LAW: The Knesset” was amended with the provision that a candidate’s slate could not participate in elections if it (1) negated the existence of Israel as the state of the Jewish people, (2) negated the democratic character of the state, or (3) incited racism. This effectively ended Kach’s existence as a political party, although it remained highly influential as a movement with certain segments of the settler population.

Following Kahane’s assassination in 1990, the movement split into two groups with similar ideologies and somewhat overlapping memberships: Kach, led by Baruch Marzel; and KAHANE CHAI, led by Meir’s son, BINYAMIN ZE’EV KAHANE. Both groups were outlawed in 1994 following statements in support of the massacre of Arabs in the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE by BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, a Kach member. Marzel ran for the Knesset in 2003 on the HERUT PARTY list but failed to win a seat.

A reinvented Kach continues to organize protests against the Israeli government, harasses and threatens Palestinians and Israeli government officials, and has vowed revenge for the death of Binyamin Kahane and his wife, who were murdered by Palestinians on 31 December 2000. Since the start of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000, Kach is suspected of involvement in a number of attacks against Palestinian civilians, although the government appears not to interfere with these activities. Kach sympathizers were vocal and active against the Israeli government during the August 2005 ISRAELI UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA.

“The New Kach Movement” is another offshoot of the original group, active during 2001–2003 and headed by a charismatic young student, Efraim Hershkovits. In August 2005 he was arrested after attending the funeral of Eden Natan-Zada, an ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES soldier who on 4 August 2005 murdered four Israeli-Palestinians and wounded twenty-two others on a bus in the northern Israeli town of Shfar’am, after which he was beaten to death by bystanders. (www.kahane.org.il).

Bibliography

- Council on Foreign Relations. Kach, Kahane Chai: Israel, Extremists. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, in cooperation with the Markle Foundation, 2004.
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, and Michael Swirsky. Messianism, Zionism, and Jewish Religious Radicalism. Translated by Jonathan Chipman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

Sprinzak, Ehud. Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination. New York: Free Press, 1999.

———. Kach and Meir Kahane: The Emergence of Jewish Quasi-Fascism. New York: The American Jewish Committee, 1985.

US Department of State. Patterns of Global Terrorism. Washington, DC: Counter Terrorism Office, US State Department, 2003.

Kadima Party

The Kadima (Forward) Party was formed by Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON on 21 November 2005 as a splinter from the LIKUD PARTY, largely as a consequence of the opposition from within the Likud to the ISRAELI UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in August 2005. At least half of the members of Likud rejected Sharon's withdrawal, which ended Israel's thirty-eight-year presence in Gaza. After Sharon suffered a massive stroke on 5 January 2006 that ended his political life, the leadership of Kadima passed to EHUD OLMERT. In the March 2006 election, Kadima won twenty-nine seats in the new Knesset, and Olmert became prime minister. Several Likud ministers and Knesset members joined Kadima, as did Knesset members from the LABOR PARTY and members of other parties. In the 2009 elections Kadima won twenty-eight seats in the 120-seat Israeli Knesset, the most seats of any single party. The Likud Party, led by BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, came in second with only one less seat than Kadima, twenty-seven. Kadima leader Tzipi Livni was unable to form a coalition, thus Netanyahu became prime minister and formed the government.

Kadima's "Main Foundations of the Peace Process" include the following:

- A FINAL STATUS agreement leading to the establishment of a Palestinian state must mark the cessation of all Palestinian claims toward Israel, including that no Palestinian REFUGEES be allowed entry into Israel.
- A future Palestinian state must be free of terror and exist as a peaceful neighbor to the state of Israel. In order to prevent it from becoming a staging ground for attacks against Israel, it must be demilitarized. Therefore, the Palestinians must totally renounce terror and dismantle all TERRORIST infrastructure prior to the establishment of such a state.

- Determination of Israel's future BORDERS will be part of a final status agreement.
- Israel will retain areas that are crucial for its security.
- Israel will retain Jewish holy places that are of central religious and symbolic national importance, in particular a unified JERUSALEM as the capital of Israel.
- Israel will retain the large Jewish SETTLEMENT blocs.

(<http://kadimasharon.co.il/15-en/Kadima.aspx>).

Bibliography

Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.

Hoffman, Gil, and Jerusalem Post Staff. "Sharon Gets Boost to New Party." The Jerusalem Post. 22 November 2005.

Maor, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2000.

McCarthy, Rory. "Israeli Rivals Livni and Netanyahu Try to Woo Small Parties after Inconclusive Poll." Guardian. 11 February 2009.

Susser, Leslie. "In Israel, Sifting the Aftermath of Sharon's Political Earthquake." Jewish Telegraph Agency. 21 and 29 November 2005.

Wilson, Scott. "Israeli Premier Quits Party and Forms His Own." Washington Post. 22 November 2005.

Kafr Qasim

On 29 October 1956, the Israel Border Police (MAGAV) massacred forty-eight Palestinian civilians in the Israeli Palestinian village of Kafr Qasim. At the time, Israel had stationed soldiers along the Israeli-Jordanian frontier in preparation for its invasion of EGYPT. Several battalions of the Israeli BORDER POLICE under the command of ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) brigade commander Colonel Issachar Shadmi were ordered to prepare the defense of a section officially known as the Central District of Galilee and colloquially as the "Little Triangle." It contained seven villages close to the border in which about 40,000 PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL lived and was regularly patrolled by soldiers to prevent INFILTRATION of Palestinians into Israel.

During the period from 1949 to 1966, Arab citizens were under an Israeli military regime and were treated as a hostile, enemy population. The seven villages were under a nightly 10:00 P.M. CURFEW, but on the morning of the massacre, Shadmi changed the curfew to 5:00 P.M. He then gathered all the border patrol battalion commanders under his command and ordered them to “shoot on sight” any villagers violating the curfew. One of the men, Major Shmuel Malinki, asked Shadmi how to react to those villagers who were unaware of the curfew.

Malinki later testified as follows: “[Shadmi said] anyone who left his house would be shot. It would be best if on the first night there were ‘a few like that’ and on the following nights they would be more careful. I asked: in the light of that, I can understand that a guerilla is to be killed but what about the fate of the Arab civilians? And they may come back to the village in the evening from the valley, from settlements or from the fields, and won’t know about the curfew in the village—I suppose I am to have sentries at the approaches to the village? To this Col. [Shadmi] replied in crystal clear words, ‘I don’t want sentimentality and I don’t want arrests, there will be no arrests.’” Malinki issued a similar order to the reserve forces attached to his battalion shortly before the curfew was enforced: “No inhabitant shall be allowed to leave his home during the curfew. Anyone leaving his home shall be shot; there shall be no arrests.”

At 4:30 P.M., the mukhtar (village elder) of Kafr Qasim was informed of the new time, and he asked what would happen to the 400 villagers working outside the village in the fields who were not aware of the earlier curfew. An officer assured him that they would be taken care of. Most villagers returned immediately, but others, working fields too far away to get the news, did not. Between 5:00 and 6:30 P.M., in nine separate shooting incidents, the platoon led by Lieutenant Gabriel Dahan killed nineteen men, six women, ten teenage boys (age 14–17), six girls (age 12–15), and seven young boys (age 8–13). Palestinians from Jaljuliya, a nearby village, were brought in to dig a mass grave.

News of the massacre leaked out almost immediately, despite a MEDIA blackout imposed by Prime Minister DAVID BEN-GURION. To limit publicity, a military cordon was maintained around the village for months, preventing journalists from approaching and talking to survivors. It took two months of lobbying by communist Knesset member Tawfik Tubi and members of the press before the government lifted the blackout, though the cordon remained. Meanwhile, the government started to conduct an internal inquiry.

Following public protests, eleven Border Police officers and soldiers involved in the massacre were charged with murder. On 16 October 1958, eight of them were found guilty and sentenced to prison terms. Malinki received seventeen years and Dahan fifteen years. The fact that other local commanders had chosen to disobey Shadmi’s order was cited by the court as one of the reasons for denying Dahan’s claim that he had no choice. The court placed great emphasis on the fundamental responsibility of Shadmi, though he was not a defendant. Shadmi was subsequently charged as well, but his separate court hearing (29 February 1959) found him innocent of murder and only guilty of extending the curfew without authority. His symbolic punishment, a fine of one grush (a small coin), became a standard metaphor in Israeli political debate.

All the men convicted in the affair had their sentences drastically reduced in the next few years: In April 1959 the court of appeal reduced Malinki’s sentence to fourteen years and Dahan’s to ten. The Israeli chief of staff further reduced them to ten and eight years, respectively, and then the Israeli president reduced them to five years each. Finally, the Committee for the Release of Prisoners ordered the remission of one-third of the prison sentences, resulting in all the convicted persons associated with the massacre being out of prison by November 1959. Soon after his release, Malinki was promoted and put in charge of security at the top secret DIMONA nuclear reactor. In 1960 Dahan was placed in charge of Arab affairs by Israeli officials in the Palestinian town of RAMLA.

Bibliography

- Bilsky, Leora Y. Transformative Justice: Israeli Identity on Trial: Law, Meaning, and Violence. Detroit: University of Michigan Press, 2004.
- Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel, rep. ed. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1977.
- Lippman, M. R. “Humanitarian Law: The Development and Scope of the Superior Orders Defense.” Penn State International Law Review (Fall 2001).
- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. London: Routledge, 2006.
- Morris, Benny. Israel’s Border Wars, 1949–1956: Arab Infiltration, Israeli Retaliation, and the Countdown to the Suez War. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Prior, Michael. Zionism and the State of Israel: A Moral Inquiry. London: Routledge, 1999.

Robinson, Shira. "Commemoration under Fire: Palestinian Responses to the 1956 Kafr Qasim Massacre." In Memory and Violence in the Middle East and North Africa. Edited by Ussama Samir Makdisi and Paul Silverstein. Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 2005.

———. "Local Struggle, National Struggle: Palestinian Responses to the Kafr Qasim Massacre and Its Aftermath, 1956–66." International Journal of Middle East Studies. 35 (2003).

Segev, Tom. The Seventh Million. New York: Owl Books, 2000.

Al-Shaybani Society of International Law. "Israel Military Court of Appeal, Judgment." Palestine Yearbook of International Law, Vol. II. Nicosia: Al-Shaybani Society of International Law, 1985.

Kahan Commission Report, 1983

The Kahan Commission Report, released on 8 February 1983, is the Israeli Commission of Inquiry's report on the massacre in the Palestinian REFUGEE camps of SABRA AND SHATILA in Beirut, LEBANON, on 16–18 September 1982. The commission was chaired by ISRAELI SUPREME COURT president Yitzhak Kahan, and its other two members were Supreme Court judge Aharon Barak and Major-General Yona Erfat. The commission was to make recommendations for action on Israelis involved in the massacre through an investigation of "[a]ll the facts and factors connected with the atrocity carried out by a unit of the Lebanese Forces against the civilian population in the Shatila and Sabra camps."

The commission's main conclusions were the following:

- The massacre at Sabra and Shatila was carried out by a unit of the PHALANGE, a Lebanese Christian political party, acting on its own, although its entry was known to Israel.
- No Israeli was directly responsible for the events that occurred in the camps.
- Israel had indirect responsibility for the massacre, because the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) held the area of the refugee camps.
- Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN was found responsible for not exercising greater involvement and awareness in the matter of introducing the Phalangists into the camps.
- Defense Minister ARIEL SHARON was found responsible for ignoring the danger of bloodshed and revenge when he approved the entry of the Phalangists into the camps as well as not taking appropriate measures to prevent bloodshed.

- Foreign Minister YITZHAK SHAMIR erred by not taking action after being alerted by Minister of Communications Mordechai Zippori.
- Chief of Staff Rafael Eitan did not give the appropriate orders to prevent the massacre.

The commission recommended that Sharon resign, that the director of military intelligence Major General Yehoshua Saguy be relieved of his post, and that other senior officers be removed.

Israeli critics of the commission pointed to its limited scope, and some argued that the recommendations amounted to a whitewash. Most analysts believe that the commission's conclusions constituted the minimum that could be deduced from the evidence and that the facts warranted a finding of more than just indirect responsibility. For example, General Rafael Eitan ordered the Phalangist militia into the camps, while Phalangist commanders met with General Amir Drori, commander of Israeli troops in Lebanon, and General Amos Yaron, commander for West Beirut, to "coordinate the militia's entry into the camps and arrange communications." The Israeli army gave the Phalange logistical support during the massacre, and they received orders, salaries, and training directly from Israel. Sharon and the Israeli army knew that the Phalange leaders planned to expel most of the Palestinians from Lebanon, and the Phalangists were at all times under IDF orders. The Kahan Report revealed that "only one element of Israeli Defense Forces will command all forces in the area," which means, according to the Israeli head of intelligence, "that all forces in the area, including the Phalangists, will be under IDF command and will act according to its instructions."

See also LEBANON WAR; SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE

Bibliography

Benziman, Uzi. Sharon, an Israeli Caesar. New York: Adama Books, 1985.

Chanoff, David. Warrior: The Autobiography of Ariel Sharon. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989.

Council for Arab-British Understanding. The Complaint against Ariel Sharon. 2001. www.caabu.org/campaigns/complaint-against-sharon.html.

International Campaign for Justice for the Victims of Sabra & Shatila. Ruling from the Belgian Court of Cassation. 12 February 2003. www.indictsharon.net.

- Kahan Commission. Beirut Massacre: The Complete Kahan Commission Report. Princeton, NJ: Karz-Cohl, 1993. www.caabu.org/press/documents/kahan-commission-contents.html.
- Kapeliouk, Amnon. Sabra and Shatila: Inquiry into a Massacre. Belmont, MA: AAUG Press, 1984.
- Malone, Linda A. "Trying to Try Sharon." MERIP. 11 October 2001.
- Rabinovich, Itamar. The War for Lebanon, 1970–1985. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1985.
- Randal, Jonathan. Going All the Way. New York: Random House, 1984.
- Sayigh, Rosemary. Too Many Enemies: The Palestinian Experience in Lebanon. London: Zed, 1994.
- Schiff, Ze'ev, and Ehud Ya'ari. Israel's Lebanon War. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984.
- Verhaeghe, Michael, and Laurie King-Irani. "Outline and Explanation of Court Hearings during the Pre-trial Procedure, June 2001–January 2002." The Case against the Accused: Indict Sharon. 7 February 2002.

Kahane, Binyamin Ze'ev (1966–2000)

Binyamin Ze'ev Kahane was the son of activist RABBI MEIR KAHANE. Born in New York, he immigrated to Israel with his family in 1971. He was an Orthodox Jewish scholar and rabbi who studied at the MERCAZ HARAV KOOK YESHIVA and cofounded the JERUSALEM-based Yeshivat Ha Ra'yon Ha Yehudi (the Yeshiva of the Jewish Idea) with his father in 1987.

He was most well-known, however, for his leadership of KAHANE CHAI, a far-right-wing extremist settler party that grew out of Meir Kahane's KACH party after Meir's assassination in 1990. Binyamin Kahane and Kahane Chai advocated the replacement of democracy in Israel with a Jewish theocracy, the forced expulsion of the PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL, as well as all the Palestinians in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, and the annexation of the WEST BANK to "force the hand of God" and bring about the Messianic age. In 1994, following their statements in support of BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, who perpetrated the mass murder of twenty-nine Palestinians at prayer in AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE, both Kahane Chai and an offshoot of the original Kach were declared TERRORIST organizations and outlawed by the Israeli government. Binyamin Kahane and his wife Talia were murdered on 31 December 2000 by Palestinian assassins near the SETTLEMENT of Ofrah as they were driving home. They left behind six children.

Bibliography

- Ari, Rabbi Michael Ben. "About Binyamin Zev Kahane." The Internet's Ultimate Rabbi Kahane Resource. n.d. <http://kahane.hameir.org/content/blogsection/4/29/>.
- Jaffa, Lawrence. "Binyamin Kahane." Special Report: Israel and the Middle East. Guardian. 9 January 2001.
- Kahane, Binyamin Zev. "Parshat Ki-Tisa'—The Seven Canaanite Nations: A People or a Concept?" The Internet's Ultimate Rabbi Kahane Resource. n.d. <http://kahane.hameir.org/content/blogsection/4/29/>.
- . "Removing the Mosques: Part One of the Mitzvah of Building the Temple." The Internet's Ultimate Rabbi Kahane Resource. n.d. <http://kahane.hameir.org/content/blogsection/4/29/>.
- . "And Yehuda Also Will Fight against Jerusalem." Smooth Stone. 1996. http://smoothstone.blogspot.com/2003\_12\_21\_smoothstone\_archive.html.
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, and Michael Swirsky. Messianism, Zionism, and Jewish Religious Radicalism. Translated by Jonathan Chipman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- . Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination. New York: Free Press, 1999.

Kahane, Rabbi Meir David (1932–1990)

Meir Kahane was an American Orthodox rabbi, author, violent activist, founder of the JEWISH DEFENSE LEAGUE (JDL) in the UNITED STATES and the right-wing KACH party in Israel, and a member of the Israeli Knesset. Born in Brooklyn, New York, to a family that adhered to Orthodox Judaism—his father was a rabbi—Kahane received rabbinical ordination from the Mir Yeshiva in Brooklyn. He was fully conversant with the Talmud and Tanakh and worked as a pulpit rabbi and teacher in the 1960s. Subsequently, he earned a degree in international law from New York University.

As a teenager, Kahane became an admirer of VLADIMIR (ZE'EV) JABOTINSKY, the militant revisionist Zionist leader, who was a frequent guest in his parents' home, and he joined Jabotinsky's paramilitary movement, BETAR. He personally led protests against British minister for labor Ernest Bevin, who was visiting New York in the 1940s, for which Kahane received his first arrest. Later he organized public demonstrations in the United States against the SOVIET UNION's policy of refusing to permit Jewish IMMIGRATION to Israel and was a central activist in the Free SOVIET JEWRY movement, for which he was widely credited with the release and subsequent immigration of Russian Jews to Israel.

During the 1960s, the FBI recruited Kahane by alleging that the Black Panthers and other black nationalists were ANTI-SEMITIC, and Kahane worked undercover in COINTELPRO. In 1968, Kahane founded the Jewish Defense League in response to a perceived mass wave of anti-Semitism in the United States, including supposed threats of violence against Jews by the Black Panthers and members of the black power movement. Also during the 1960s, Kahane was an editor of the largest Anglo-Jewish weekly, Brooklyn's The Jewish Press, and was a regular correspondent until his death for the paper, which served as one of his most important propaganda organs.

At the same time, Kahane became entangled with Mafia boss Joseph Colombo Jr., who paid a $25,000 bond after Kahane and a dozen other JDL members were arrested on 12 May 1971 by federal agents for conspiracy to manufacture explosives. The following day, Kahane publicly announced an alliance with the Colombo family. Israeli journalist Yair Kotler wrote that "Kahane received substantial aid from the New York Mafia." Not only did Colombo provide bail money and attorneys for countless JDL activists in trouble with the law, but the JDL received weapons and "tons of money" from Colombo. "Colombo thought he got respect from being seen with a famous rabbi, even though at the time most Jews didn't respect Kahane." When, in late 1971, Colombo was shot dead by the Gallo family, Kahane was at his side.

Late in 1971 Kahane was convicted in a New York federal court for conspiracy to manufacture explosives and received five years' probation. That same year he immigrated to Israel and soon established the Kach party. The following year, 1972, he was arrested in Israel for attempting to smuggle explosives to Europe to blow up the Libyan Embassy in Brussels. Kahane's lawyer argued that he had acted out of patriotism, and Kahane received a two-year suspended sentence. In 1980 he stood unsuccessfully for election to the Knesset, after which he was sentenced to six months in prison for plotting to attack the AL-AQSA MOSQUE in JERUSALEM. In 1984 Kahane stood again for election to the Knesset and was successful, serving for one term. He was arrested more than two dozen times in Israel for a wide range of offenses but served little time in prison. Kahane's main legislative proposals involved revoking Israeli citizenship from non-Jews and banning Jewish-Gentile marriages or sexual relations.

A six-month investigation of Kahane's political activities in the United States in 1989 revealed that the rabbi's support was far broader than the radical, ultranationalist fringes of New York's Jewish community. Kahane's organizations set up several charitable tax-exempt foundations in the United States that were used to funnel hundreds of thousands of dollars to his movement in Israel. Kahane boasted that after his election to the Knesset, donations had increased "especially from Jewish millionaires." Even after moving to Israel, Kahane swept across the United States four or five times a year in search of funds to support his political goals. His largest bastions of support were in New York, south Florida, the Baltimore-Washington, DC, area, and Los Angeles. Despite the wealthy businessmen who supported him, Kahane's backbone was the Orthodox Jewish community. One of Kahane's successes was to attract major financial support from the Aleppo (Syrian) Jewish community of Flatbush, New York, perhaps one of the wealthiest Jewish communities in the world. Initially Syrian Jewish leaders had barred Kahane from even speaking in neighborhood synagogues. But opposition to him slackened with his growth in popularity in the Israeli polls. Nevertheless, some donors were so worried about being tied to Kahane that they passed money to him through a sympathetic New York yeshiva rather than make out checks or give cash directly to his organizations.

Several individuals from Kahane's core group were the prime suspects in the October 1985 pipe-bomb murder of Alex Odeh, an official of the Arab-American Anti-Discrimination Committee (ADC) in Santa Ana, California; the August 1985 house-bomb slaying of Tscherim Soobzokov of Paterson, New Jersey, an alleged Nazi war criminal; the September 1985 bomb explosion at the Brentwood, Long Island, home of Elmars Sprogis, another alleged Nazi, in which a twenty-three-year-old musician who had been passing by lost his leg; and the August 1985 attempted bombing of an ADC office in Boston in which two police officers were severely wounded when the bomb blew up in their hands. Although Kahane's JDL initially took credit, in anonymous calls to the MEDIA, for these bombings, JDL officials later denied responsibility but applauded the attacks on Odeh, Soobzokov, and Sprogis.

On 5 November 1990 Meir Kahane was assassinated in New York by Egyptian Islamist El Sayyid Nosair. His son Binyamin then founded and led KAHANE CHAI, which means “Kahane Lives.” (www.kahane.org).

Bibliography

- Cohen-Almagor, Raphael. The Boundaries of Liberty and Tolerance: The Struggle against Kahanism in Israel. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.
- Friedman, Robert I. The False Prophet: Rabbi Meir Kahane—From FBI Informant to Knesset Member. Chicago: Lawrence Hill and Co., 1990.
- . “Rabbi Kahane.” APF Reporter. The Jewish Week (New York). n.d. www.thejewishweek.com/news/newscontent.php3?artid=6418.
- . The Sayings of Rabbi Kahane. New York: A.W. Ellsworth, 1986.
- Kahane, Meir. Israel: Revolution or Referendum. Secaucus, NJ: Barricade Books, 1990.
- . Listen World, Listen Jew. New York: Institute for Publication of the Writings of Rabbi Meir Kahane, 1995.
- . Never Again! A Program for Survival. Los Angeles: Nash Publishing, 1971.
- . The Story of the Jewish Defense League. Radnor, PA: Chilton Book Co., 1975.
- . They Must Go. New York: Grosset and Dunlap, 1981.
- . Why Be Jewish? Inter-marriage, Assimilation, and Alienation. New York: Stein and Day Publications, 1977.
- Kent, Douglas. Thunder of Zion: The Story of the Legendary Rabbi Meir Kahane. New York: Keter Kehunah Publications, 1993.
- Kotler, Ya’ir. Hail Kahana. Tel Aviv, Israel: Modan, 1985.
- Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1988.
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, and Michael Swirsky. Messianism, Zionism, and Jewish Religious Radicalism. Translated by Jonathan Chipman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Simonnot, Philippe, and Raphael Mergui, eds. Israel’s Ayatollahs: Meir Kahane and the Far Right in Israel. London: Saqi, 2000.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel’s Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- . Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination. New York: Free Press, 1999.
- . Kach and Meir Kahane: The Emergence of Jewish Quasi-Fascism. New York: The American Jewish Committee, 1985.

Stern, Sol. Time Bomb: Meir Kahane’s Deadly Obsession. New York: New Group Publications, 1984.

Wolf, Paul. “COINTELPRO: The Untold American Story.” Third World Traveler. n.d. www.icdc.com/~paulwolf/cointelpro/coinwcar3.htm.

Kahane Chai

Kahane Chai (Kahane Lives) is an extremist, violent religious-nationalist Jewish group that was formed in and mostly operates in Israel and the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, although it has carried out operations outside that area. It is an offshoot of the original KACH party, which was formed by Rabbi MEIR KAHANE, whose assassination in 1990 propelled his son BINYAMIN KAHANE to start Kahane Chai. Kahane Chai and Kach have a shared core leadership and are referred to interchangeably in the Hebrew MEDIA.

In 1993 Kahane Chai claimed responsibility for an explosion near the French Embassy in Tel Aviv to protest PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION leader YASIR ARAFAT’s visit to FRANCE. In 1994 the group publicly supported Kach member BARUCH GOLDSTEIN’s massacre of twenty-nine Muslims at prayer and was thereafter banned from politics in Israel. In 1995, Kahane Chai claimed responsibility for an assassination attempt on the Iranian chargé d’affaires at the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires. From 2002 through 2004, the group refrained from major TERRORIST activity, because it was attempting to convince the Israeli government to lift its ban on the group. In 2005, however, Kahane Chai increased its level of activity in protest of Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON’s plan to disengage from the Gaza Strip and leveled serious threats against politicians who supported the withdrawal. Kahane Chai remains active in Israeli society, as its leaders openly recruit new members and membership appears to be growing significantly, and as it holds public demonstrations in which its speakers excoriate the government and its policies.

Bibliography

- Council on Foreign Relations. Kach, Kahane Chai (Israel, Extremists). New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 2008.
- Gunitskiy, Seva. Terrorism Project: In the Spotlight Kach and Kahane Chai. Washington, DC: Center for Defense Information, 2002.
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, and Michael Swirsky. Messianism, Zionism, and Jewish Religious Radicalism. Translated by Jonathan Chipman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

Roberts, Samuel J. Party and Policy in Israel: The Battle between Hawks and Doves. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.

US Air Force. Terrorist and Insurgent Organizations: Kach and Kahane Chai—Israel. Maxwell AFB, AL: Air University Library Publications, 2000. <http://www.au.af.mil/au/aul/bibs/tergpps/tgkac.htm>

Kanafani, Ghassan Fayiz (1936–1972)

Ghassan Kanafani was a Palestinian journalist, writer, intellectual, and revolutionary. He edited al-Hadaf (The Target), the weekly publication of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), and published some twenty novels and collections of short stories.

Kanafani was born in ACRE but was dispossessed and fled with his family in the 1948 WAR, staying briefly in LEBANON before settling in Damascus, SYRIA, as REFUGEES. After finishing his secondary education in 1952, Kanafani received a teaching certificate from the UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY (UNRWA). He then studied Arabic literature at the University of Damascus but was expelled in 1955 as a result of his involvement in the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN), to which he had been recruited by GEORGE HABASH. In 1955, Kanafani left Syria for a teaching position in KUWAIT, and the following year he became editor of the MAN newspaper al-Ra'i (Opinion) until Habash persuaded him to move to Beirut, Lebanon, and join the staff of MAN's official mouthpiece, al-Hurriyya (Freedom), in 1960. He also edited the leftist, pan-Arabist paper al-Muharrir (The Liberator) and its weekly supplement, Filastin (Palestine). During these years, as Kanafani's political sensibilities became more acute, he began to take an interest in Marxism and joined the PFLP, becoming its chief spokesperson and the editor-in-chief of its weekly al-Hadaf. He wrote the founding documents of the PFLP, introducing a new communist political and revolutionary philosophy to the Palestinian milieu.

During the early 1960s, Kanafani also began to take his writing more seriously and published the first of numerous short stories. His first novel, Men in the Sun, appeared in 1963 and was adapted into a film, al-Makhdun, by the Egyptian director Tawfiq Salim. The movie was banned in some Arab countries for its criticism of Arab regimes. Kanafani's ambitious and experimental second novel, All That's Left to You (1966), is considered one of the earliest and most successful modernist experiments in Arabic fiction. He used multiple narrators, of which two, the clock and the desert, were inanimate.

Kanafani's life and career as a writer were closely connected to the situation of the Palestinians, and his main themes are uprootedness, exile, and national struggle. He often used the desert and its heat as a symbol for the plight of the Palestinian people. Kanafani's intense involvement in Palestinian affairs gave him a unique vantage point. Another novel, published in 1969, Umm Sa'd (Mother of Sa'd), reflects the situation of the Palestinians following the defeat of the Arab armies in 1967 and the rise of the Palestinian resistance movement.

On 9 July 1972, at the age of thirty-six, Kanafani was assassinated, along with a young niece, by a bomb planted in his car by the Israeli MOSSAD. Several weeks earlier, the PFLP had claimed responsibility for an attack by three Japanese Red Army gunmen at Lod (Ben Gurion) Airport that left twenty-six dead, and Kanafani was presumably targeted for revenge.

Shortly after his death his only historical study, The 1936–1939 Revolution in Palestine, was published. It examined the popular rebellion that began the month he was born. He was posthumously awarded the Lotus Prize for Literature by the Conference of Afro-Asian Writers and left fragments of three novels that were published posthumously. Besides his novels, Kanafani published four collections of short stories, literary criticism, plays, and historical expositions.

Bibliography

- Abdul Hadi, Fayha. Ghassan Kanafani: A Study of His Novels and Short Stories. Ramallah, West Bank: Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs, 1990.
- Harlow, Barbara. After Lives: Legacies of Revolutionary Writing. London and New York: Verso, 1996.
- Kanafani, Ghassan. Al-Athar al-Kamila (Collected Works), 7 vols. Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Thli'a, 1972.
- . Palestine's Children: Returning to Haifa & Other Stories. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2000.
- Rabbani, Muin. "Ghassan Kanafani." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Siddiq, Muhammad. Man Is a Cause: Political Consciousness and the Fiction of Ghassan Kanafani. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1984.
- Wild, Stefan. Ghassan Kanafani: The Life of a Palestinian. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1975.

Karama

Karama, a town in JORDAN, was the site of a 21 March 1968 battle between Palestinian guerrillas, mainly from FATAH, together with the Jordanian army, and the Israeli army. In an effort to suppress guerrilla forces, approximately 15,000 armed Israelis entered Jordan with two armor and infantry brigades and three paratroop, tank, and engineer battalions, backed by five artillery battalions. On the other side were approximately 330 to 350 Palestinian guerrillas with sketchy armament, a handful of antitank mines, seven antitank rocket launchers, and two 82-millimeter mortars. Jordan contributed its First Infantry Division with attached tank and artillery battalions.

Initially, Israeli paratroopers unexpectedly came under fire from Palestinian gunmen hiding in caves outside the town, while the main Israeli force faced heavy fire from Jordanian units nearby. The Palestinian fighters forced the Israelis to take Karama street by street—fighting that resulted in unforeseen Israeli casualties. However, by noon, Israel had full control of Karama and systematically destroyed the town, completing its withdrawal by 5:30 P.M.

Israel lost 28 men, with another 90 wounded, plus four tanks, five other vehicles, and an aircraft. The Jordanian army, which did most of the actual fighting against Israel, lost 61 men, with 108 wounded and 12 taken prisoner; in addition, 13 tanks were destroyed, 20 seriously damaged, and 39 other vehicles were disabled. The Palestinian guerrillas suffered the highest cost: 120 were killed, 100 were wounded, and some 40 to 66 were taken prisoner by Israel.

Nevertheless, Karama immediately became a byword for valor in Palestinian symbolism and mythology. Less than a year after the combined Arab armies were overwhelmed by the Israelis in the 1967 WAR, the Palestinian fighters had inflicted painful losses on a superior enemy. Karama was seen not as a victory in battle but as survival against overwhelming odds. Despite the limited guerrilla role in the battle, it became a pivotal event in the emergence of a new Palestinian political identity and placed the Palestinians back on the political map. After the battle, there was a burst of enthusiasm for the Palestinian revolutionaries: recruitment skyrocketed, the semidormant PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION was revived and YASIR ARAFAT was named chairman, and the organization's charter was rewritten to declare that "ARMED STRUGGLE is the only way to liberate Palestine." The myth about Karama grew, for the most part spontaneously, because it met critical psychological needs among the demoralized Palestinians. Although Jordan and Israel provided alternative descriptions of the same events, the battle remains today a significant element in Palestinian historiography.

Bibliography

- Christoff, Stefan. "The Geneva Accord and the Right of Return: Reported from Al-Baqa'a Palestinian Refugee Camp in Jordan." ZNet. 21 December 2003. www.zmag.org/znet.
- Cooley, John K. Green March, Black September: The Story of the Palestinian Arabs. London: Frank Cass, 1973.
- Hirst, David. The Gun and the Olive Branch, 3rd rev. ed. London: Faber and Faber, 2003.
- Massad, Joseph Andoni. Colonial Effects: The Making of National Identity in Jordan. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Telegraph.co.uk. "1968: Karamah and the Palestinian Revolt." Telegraph.co.uk. 29 August 2005. www.telegraph.co.uk/news/main.jhtml?xml=/news/campaigns/middle\_east/xmid68.xml.
- Terrill, Andrew W. "The Political Mythology of the Battle of Karamah." The Middle East Journal. 55:1 (2001).

Al-Karmel Journal

Al-Karmel is a pioneering Arabic-language literary journal, published quarterly in Israel, and founded in 1981 by Palestinian poet and intellectual MAHMUD DARWISH, who served as editor until his death in 2008.

The journal emphasizes poetry, though not to the exclusion of literary contributions. Darwish was impressed by the Arab poets Abd al-Wahhab al-Bayati, Al-Mutanabbi, and the Mahjar poets (emigrant poets such as Kahlil Gibran), as well as the modern Arab poets such as Badr Shakir al-Sayyab. But he was also influenced by such Western poets as Arthur Rimbaud (French), García Lorca (Spain), Pablo Neruda (Chile), William Butler Yeats (Ireland), Derek Walcott (West Indies), Wislawa Szymborska (Poland), and Allen Ginsberg (United States); he also admired the Hebrew poet Yehuda Amichai. These diverse styles and themes, including Arab, Western, and modern influences, are reflected in the pages of Al-Karmel. (www.alkarmel.org)

See also MAHMUD DARWISH; PALESTINIAN POETRY

Bibliography

- Ghanem, As'ad. The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel, 1948–2000: A Political Study. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Rouhana, Nadim. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities and Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Al-Karmi, 'Abd-al-Karim (1907–1980)

'Abd-al-Karim Al-Karmi (Abu Salma) was a leading Palestinian poet. He was born in HAIFA, where he studied law and worked until April 1948, when the Israelis occupied the city. He then moved to Akka, but shortly he left Akka for Damascus as a REFUGEE from the 1948 WAR. Abu Salma kept the keys to his house and office in Haifa until he died, hoping to return.

Abu Salma was above all a poet, and he belonged to the generation of poets who wrote the classical qasidah, a form of poem from pre-Islamic times often consisting of an atlat (a remembrance sparked by the remains of a campsite) and a rahil (journey). He loved poetry and used it as a vehicle to write about his attachment to and yearning for Palestine. Abu Salma was a close friend of IBRAHIM TUQAN; their friendship was built on their love of poetry and Palestine. In 1978 he was awarded The Lotas International Prize for Literature by the Association of Asian and African Writers. He was also given the title The Olive of Palestine (a reference to the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION).

See also PALESTINIAN POETRY

Bibliography

- Jayyusi, Salma Khadra, ed. Anthology of Modern Palestinian Literature. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.
- Al-Messiri, Abdul Wahab, ed. A Lover from Palestine and Other Poems: An Anthology of Palestinian Poetry. Beirut: Free Palestine Press, 1970.

Karni Crossing

Karni Crossing is one of the border passages, indeed the most important, along the Israeli–GAZA STRIP barrier, a 60-kilometer (36-mile) separation barrier first constructed under the leadership of Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN in 1994 after the signing of the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (1993). Completed in 1996, it entirely encircles the Gaza Strip and is made up of wire fencing with posts, sensors, and buffer zones on Gazan lands bordering Israel, and concrete and steel walls on lands bordering EGYPT. There are four additional border-crossing points along the barrier: ERETZ, Nahal Oz, Sufa, and Kerem Shalom. The Karni Crossing is managed by and under the control of the Israeli Airports Authority (IAA) backed by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF).

Karni is a cargo terminal located in the eastern end of the Gaza Strip and was intended to allow Palestinian merchants to freely export and import goods. It was constructed for “back-to-back” transfer use, in which merchandise and produce for the Israeli market or for export overseas are removed from a Palestinian truck and placed in an Israeli truck, or vice versa for incoming goods. Additionally, a single-lane conveyor belt runs next to the Karni Crossing, intended to transport grain and animal feed into Gaza.

In the 29 April 1994 “Economic Protocol,” which was appended to the “GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT (CAIRO II)” signed on 4 May 1994 as “Annex IV,” it states that “the security fence erected by Israel around the Gaza Strip shall remain in place and that the line demarcated by the fence, as shown on the map, shall be authoritative.” Additionally, according to the Economic Protocol, Gaza’s foreign trade is permitted almost solely with Israel or via Israeli ports. Karni is critical for the Palestinian ECONOMY because it is the only conduit for Palestinian exports and is the main gateway for goods entering Gaza. However, Israel’s repeated CLOSURE of Karni has caused hardships for ordinary Palestinians, who have experienced intense shortages of food, medicine, fuel, and other basic necessities, as well as for farmers, manufacturers, and merchants who have been unable either to import or export goods.

Subsequent to the August 2005 ISRAELI UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA, including all its SETTLEMENTS and its military posts, Israel continued to control, among other things, Gazan airspace, its territorial waters, and all the crossing points (with the partial exception of RAFAH CROSSING on the Egyptian border). Though the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) had no part in the unilateral withdrawal, in November 2005, Israel signed an accord with the PNA, the “Israeli-Palestinian Agreement on Movement and Access” (AMA), under which it committed to enable the regular and continuous movement of goods through the crossing and to adhere to clear goals regarding the scope of activity at the crossing. Israel agreed that the number of export trucks to be processed through Karni would reach 150 per day by the end of 2005 and that it would rise to 400 per day by the end of 2006.

In fact, just the opposite occurred: Karni was completely closed on 15 January 2006 for 100 days, which, according to Ha'aretz (Israel's preeminent newspaper), resulted in a critical humanitarian situation in Gaza. For example, because no flour was able to enter, there was no bread, and bakeries and mills closed, increasing the already high (60 percent) unemployment level. From September 2006 until June 2007, Karni was mostly open, but with significant restrictions on traffic and goods, and with numerous short-term closures in response to Palestinian actions. On 13 June 2007, Israel closed Karni completely, this time for eighteen months until January 2009, when it was partially reopened. Complicating matters is the fact that Israel does not allow Egyptian trucks to enter Gaza, and if Palestinian trucks leave for Egypt, they are not allowed to return. Moreover, movement of goods through Karni, when it is open, is conducted at a pace far too slow to allow for effective foreign trade.

According to the World Bank, “Karni represents a serious physical barrier to Palestinian trade, embodying a design that introduces unnecessary delays, inflicts damage on goods and severely limits the movement of cargo.” The World Bank deems essential for a functioning Palestinian economy the passage of a minimum of 150 trucks per day, while during the years 2000–2006 an average of only 43 trucks a day managed to pass through Karni. The UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY (UNRWA) alone needs 100 trucks a day at Karni with just its bulk grain flour. Additionally, the amount of cargo allowed through the terminal varies from day to day, making it extremely unreliable. The World Bank also charges that Karni “acts as a significant non-tariff barrier to trade, as a result of controls and processes, which (a) makes it difficult for Palestinian exporters and importers to avoid using Israeli middlemen and traders, (b) discriminates against goods entering from the WEST BANK and exiting Gaza, and (c) obliges Palestinian importers and producers to pay Israeli truckers to sit idle for long periods at the crossing.” The movement of cargo through Karni is also impeded by a number of technical issues related to Israel's security demands, but the World Bank states that even if these problems are fixed, there will be no real improvement unless the entire system at Karni is changed.

There is a permanent traffic overload at Karni crossing; however, the crossing does not function at full capacity. For one thing, working hours at Karni are limited. According to the IAA website, the crossing operates between 7:00 and 5:00 Monday through Thursday, and between 7:00 and 1:00 on Fridays. The crossing is closed on Saturdays and on Jewish and Muslim holidays. Other sources, including the UN and the World Bank, report that in practice the crossing operates for an average of only six to seven hours a day. In the past, the authorities justified these limited working hours by claiming that operating the crossing when it is dark entails a security risk. According to B'TSELEM, “this claim is completely unfounded. In the past the crossing was kept open from time to time, on some occasions until midnight, in order to facilitate the export of farm produce or for other reasons, clearly indicating that it is feasible to operate the crossing more hours of the day.” Moreover, Israeli officials have acknowledged that the limited operating hours stem from financial rather than security concerns. According to state officials, the IAA refuses to bear the costs that an additional work shift at Karni would entail, and government departments have failed to agree which of them is to provide the required funding. It was only after this matter was published and publicly criticized that Prime Minister EHUD OLMERT instructed, at a government meeting held in February 2007, that operating hours at Karni on weekdays would be extended until 11:00 P.M. The prime minister also instructed the Ministry of Finance to provide the IAA with the funding necessary to implement this decision. The decision was meant to come into force as of 15 April 2007, but it was not implemented as of July 2009.

Even during the limited hours of the day in which it is open, Karni Crossing does not function at full capacity. Representatives of the IAA place the blame for this on the Palestinian authorities, arguing that “there is a regular shortage of equipment and personnel on the Palestinian side, due to unpaid wages and internal problems, which often cause the terminal to be closed early or not to be opened at all.” It seems that budget problems and organizational failures on the Palestinian side do indeed hamper the functioning of the crossing. This notwithstanding, the crossing would be less inefficient if these problems were not compounded by a shortage of personnel on the Israeli side of the crossing resulting from budgetary problems and organizational failures on the part of the Israeli authorities.

B’Tselem comments, “Had Israel fulfilled its obligations and allocated the sums required in order to extend the scope of activities at Karni, much of the devastation which has beset the economy of Gaza might very well have been prevented and the people of Gaza would thus have been spared much suffering.”

The goods that pass through Karni, particularly those being exported from Gaza, are examined in stringent and lengthy procedures, and in many cases goods are damaged as a result of the examination process. There are potential security threats at Karni and thus a need for security measures; however, the examination procedures at the crossing are extremely cumbersome and could be made significantly more efficient without compromising security.

The principal system for moving goods through Karni is, as noted, the “back-to-back” method. This is required because Israel does not permit Israeli trucks to enter the Gaza Strip or Palestinian trucks to enter Israel. Consequently, Israeli trucks stop at the Israeli side of the crossing, where they are unloaded, and the goods are placed in special storage areas (“checking compartments”) for examination. After the goods are checked, they are loaded on Palestinian trucks and taken to their destination. The procedure is the same in the opposite direction. When the goods are transported in a shipping container, they must be unloaded from the container to the checking compartments and then returned to the container after the check is completed. The goods are passed through a scanning device such as is common at airports. After the container is taken to its destination and unloaded, it is brought back to Karni, checked, and returned to its owner on the other side of the crossing.

This bulky procedure slows the movement of goods at the crossing to a crawl, resulting in long delays and uncertainty as to when goods can be delivered. Also, during the unloading and reloading of the containers, goods—especially agricultural goods—are liable to be damaged, causing a loss of value. Moreover, due to structural deficiencies at the crossing, goods of different types are treated in proximity and without adequate separation, so that agricultural products and consumer goods may be contaminated and ruined as a result of coming into contact with “dirty” products.

Technologies available today make it possible to conduct much quicker and far more efficient security checks. By using suitable scanners it is possible to carry out a thorough examination of the contents of an entire container along with the trucks on which they are being conveyed. According to the World Bank, a great deal of time and money would be saved if such technology were to be used at Karni, since it would render the “back-to-back” method superfluous. Even if one accepts Israel’s position that security threats mandate an absolute prohibition on the movement of trucks from one side of the border to the other, existing technologies make it unreasonable to demand that goods be unpacked from containers for examination: a scanner could be used to carry out a thorough check of the contents. Such devices are in use in many locations around the world, including Israel’s Ashdod Port. Scanners of this type are in fact already in place at Karni Crossing. The first of them was purchased in October 2004 with funds provided by the PNA, and more scanner equipment and supporting infrastructure were purchased for Karni by the US Agency for International Development. However, due to dubious managerial or political considerations, this equipment is only used to scan empty containers.

Representatives of the IAA claim that more sophisticated scanners able to scan entire containers will be put into use upon the completion of construction work being conducted at the crossing. Similar claims made in the past were never put into practice. The delay in upgrading the crossing is due to the fact that the IAA refuses to fund such upgrading from its existing resources. The Israeli government itself has been unwilling to allocate the required funds, even though Israel controls the crossing and is responsible for the damage (though it has never paid compensation) that has been inflicted on Palestinians as a result of the convoluted and superfluous security checks it has imposed.

The problems created by the cumbersome security checks at the crossing are compounded by the fact that Gaza imports and exports are checked more than once before they reach their final destination. For example, goods from Europe intended for Gaza are checked first at Ashdod Port and again at Karni. Goods produced in NABLUS in the West Bank that are intended for Gaza are liable to be checked three times: when leaving Nablus, at the checkpoint into Israel, and at Karni. Israel claims that the duplication is needed to detect weapons that are placed in the container after the first check. This problem, too, could be solved by modern technology, such as with hermetic sealing of the checked containers. The use of such technologies would eliminate the need for duplicate checks and shorten the time needed to get the goods to the customer.

The decision as to what types of goods will be permitted to go through the crossing at a given time is coordinated between the Israeli and Palestinian authorities on an ad hoc basis in a non-transparent process, though more often than not Israel dictates what goods may or may not pass. B'Tselem's research indicates that actors involved in the Palestinian side of the decisionmaking process are prone to give preference to goods of certain types in return for payment or other privileges provided by merchants and manufacturers.

Other acts of corruption involve exploitation of the scheduling system operated by the IAA. Under this system, the unloading of goods for transport through Karni must be arranged in advance via a telephone ordering center. The ordering center allocates places within the schedule based on various categories of merchandise. Because the limited number of trucks allowed to unload at Karni on each day is far from sufficient to meet demand, there is a great deal of pressure on the ordering center. The telephone lines at the center are constantly busy, and callers are forced to wait on hold for extended periods and to call again and again until one of the operators is available. Even when one reaches an operator, it is only possible to schedule an unloading date a few weeks in advance. Business owners who need to deliver goods urgently are thus compelled to accept offers by profiteering Israeli carriers who schedule unloading dates in advance and then offer to transport goods on the dates allotted to them in return for hefty sums, sometimes as much as ten times higher than the typical cost of transportation.

Testimonies collected by B'Tselem further indicate that certain carriers are given preferential treatment in the allocation of unloading dates in return for bribes. These carriers then charge exorbitant prices to deliver goods on the dates allotted to them.

All of these issues have had a disastrous effect on the Gazan economy and on the well-being of the Palestinian residents of Gaza. Despite the November 2005 "Agreement on Movement and Access" that was supposed to regularize and improve trade through Karni, data for each of the following years demonstrate that Israel did not fulfill its commitments. According to a report published by the World Bank in association with Paltrade (Palestine Trade Center, with offices in Ramallah and Gaza City), during 2006 the Karni Crossing operated fully (allowing the passage of both exports and imports) on 171 of the 313 available working days (54.6 percent). The crossing was completely closed for 86 days. On 12 of these days the crossing was closed for holidays, whereas on the remaining 74 days it was closed by the Israeli authorities for unspecified security reasons. On an additional 55 days the crossing was open for imports only, and on one day the crossing was open for exports only. The average number of monthly working hours at the crossing in 2006 was 122.5 of the 331 working hours possible (37 percent). According to the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), the number of truckloads exported from Gaza in 2006 was, on average, only 12 per day, just 8 percent of the 150 trucks-per-day quota established for the beginning of the year and a mere 3 percent of the 400 trucks-per-day target set for the end of the year.

Ninety-five percent of Gazan industry is based on enterprises that rely on the importation of raw materials. Eighty percent of these enterprises need machines and replacement parts, which are imported, to operate. During 2006, due to the lack or absence of raw materials entering Gaza, 80 percent of the enterprises were forced to close down operations. The remaining enterprises operated at 60 percent capacity. During the same year more than 1,300 shipping containers of imported products intended for Gaza were prohibited by Tel Aviv from entering and were thus stuck in Israel, forcing importers to pay storage costs and late fees and bear the heavy loss of expensive perishable goods. In the construction sector, building stopped or was delayed because of the lack of raw materials. The total economic losses during the first month of 2006 alone were estimated at $20.6 million. In this period, 3,190 businesses closed temporarily and 65,800 workers, who support 450,000 dependents, lost their jobs. As each day of siege passed, more business shut down and more Gazans found themselves without a means of livelihood.

United Nations data show that as of March 2007, Karni Crossing was still operating only during half of its scheduled working hours, the scope of import remained low, and export was being conducted at a rate of approximately forty trucks per day, just 10 percent of the quota that, according to the AMA, should have already been reached by the end of 2006.

B'Tselem analyzed the situation at Karni in terms of Israel's security needs and had the following to say: "The cessation of trade flows due to closures enforced by the Israeli authorities for security reasons has inflicted a great deal of harm on the population of the Gaza Strip.

"[During the period from January 2006 through June 2007] various Palestinian factions have repeatedly attempted, and on some occasions have succeeded, to smuggle arms and suicide attackers into Israel via Karni crossing. The crossing itself was the target of a number of attacks by Palestinians which resulted in injuries and deaths at the crossing. The Israeli authorities, who are obligated to defend Israeli civilians, have a right and indeed a duty to thwart such threats. However, even when they do so, they are not at liberty to ignore the rights and needs of the Palestinian civilians over whom they wield effective control. Israel must endeavor not to inflict damage on this population beyond the minimum necessary to achieve legitimate security objectives. The frequent and prolonged closures enforced at Karni crossing failed to meet this requirement.

"An equitable balance between Israel's security needs and the needs of the people of Gaza would require that the movement of goods between Gaza and Israel not be prevented except where and when necessary in order to neutralize a security threat. In practice, however, since the outbreak of the second intifada, Karni crossing has repeatedly been closed for extended periods even in the absence of a concrete security threat. Moreover, when the crossing was closed no effort was made to provide for a reasonable alternative which might allow for trade to continue. Such an alternative could have been created, for example, by permitting the movement of goods via one of the other border crossings between Israel and Gaza, or by allowing for the establishment of a sea port, if only of a temporary and restricted nature.

"Since it would have been possible to thwart security threats directed at Karni by more restricted means focused on the time and place of the threat, it appears that the comprehensive closures enforced on Gaza for extended periods were in fact not legitimate security measures, but rather a form of collective punishment or a means of applying pressure on the people of Gaza. This impression is reinforced in view of the tight economic blockade which Israel placed on Gaza after the kidnapping of Corporal Gilad Shalit on 26 June 2006, which has caused a steep deterioration in Gaza's already weak economy." (Shalit is an Israeli soldier who was kidnapped by Palestinian militants in a cross-border raid from the Gaza Strip and has been held hostage by HAMAS since.)

In June 2007, Hamas carried out a successful coup against FATAH in Gaza. During fighting between Fatah and Hamas militants, some of the equipment at Karni was destroyed, including damage to the container loading platforms. In response to the coup, Israel closed Karni completely on 12 June 2007 for the next eighteen months. The total boycott resulted in a humanitarian crisis of staggering proportions as even essential medicine and food were prohibited.

On 27 December 2008, Israel unleashed OPERATION CAST LEAD, a massive land, sea, and air assault against Gaza that lasted until 18 January 2009. By January 2010, a year after Operation Cast Lead, Karni was still not fully open, and the residents of Gaza continued to suffer. Israel's sweeping ban continued on the import of construction materials, spare parts for public infrastructure, and industrial inputs into Gaza, along with restrictions on the entry of cash, which prevented the implementation of almost all planned early recovery activities.

See also GAZA STRIP; INFRASTRUCTURE IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES; ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA; OPERATION CAST LEAD

Bibliography

- Beatty, Andrew. "Solana Urges Israel to Open Gaza Border." EuropeanVoice.com. 12: 39 (26 October 2006).
- Benn, Aluf. "World Bank: Karni Crossing a 'Serious Barrier' to Trade." Ha'aretz. 8 March 2006.

- B'Tselem. Blocked Arteries: Israel's Responsibility for Gaza's Failing Foreign Trade. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, April 2007.
- . The Siege on the Gaza Strip. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 24 July 2007. http://www.btselem.org/English/Gaza\_Strip/20070724\_Siege\_on\_Gaza.asp.
- Eldar, Akiva. "IDF Extends Seal on Territories as Humanitarian State Worsens." Ha'aretz. 19 March 2006.
- Hass, Amira. "Economic Pressure to Secure Control." Ha'aretz. 9 June 2004.
- Human Rights Council. Tenth session. Human Rights Situation in Palestine and Other Occupied Arab Territories. Report of the Secretary-General. Human Rights Council Resolution S-3/1—/HRC/10/27. 6 March 2009.
- Lein, Yehezkel. One Big Prison: Freedom of Movement to and from the Gaza Strip on the Eve of the Disengagement Plan. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, March 2005.
- Myre, Greg. "As Gaza's Plight Worsens, Palestinian Businesses Leave." New York Times. 5 July 2006.
- . "Gaza Crossings: Choked Passages to Frustration." New York Times. 4 March 2006.
- UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. The Agreement on Movement and Access One Year On. UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. November 2006.
- . Consolidated Appeals Process (CAP): Occupied Palestinian Territory—Gaza Flash Appeal 2009. UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. 2 February 2009.
- . Gaza Situation Report. UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. 29 March 2006.
- . Gaza Strip Situation Report: The Humanitarian Impact of the Karni Crossing Closure—Bread Running Out in Gaza. UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. 19 March 2006.
- . Protection of Civilians Weekly Report. UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. 21–27 January 2009.
- . Report No. 63, Implementation of the Agreement on Movement and Access and Update on Gaza Crossings. UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. 2–15 April 2008.
- US Department of State. Agreement on Movement and Access. Washington, DC: US Department of State. 15 November 2005. <http://usinfo.state.gov/menu/Archive/2005/Nov/15-381874.html>.
- World Bank. Analysis of Potential Improvement in Karni Performance. Washington, DC: World Bank, 13 October 2005.
- . Gaza May Face "Irreversible" Collapse. Washington, DC: World Bank via Reuters, 7 December 2007.
- . An Interim Assessment of Passages and Trade Facilitation. Washington, DC: World Bank, 28 February 2006.
- . Short Term Improvements for Trade Facilitation and Passages: Improvements to the Karni Crossing, Gaza–West Bank Link and Internal Closures. Washington, DC: World Bank, 8 July 2005.

http://siteresources.worldbank.org/intwestbankgaza/Resources/Short-term\_improvements.pdf.

———. World Bank Sees Scant Progress Boosting Gaza Trade. Washington, DC: World Bank, 6 March 2006.

———. World Bank Urges Opening Gaza Border for Trade. Washington, DC: World Bank, 26 March 2007.

Karp Commission, 1981

In April 1981, a commission headed by Deputy Attorney General Yehudit Karp was established in the Israeli Ministry of Justice "to ensure, as far as possible, that suspicions about offenses committed by Israelis [settlers] in the Judea and Samaria Region [WEST BANK] against Arab residents of that region be investigated speedily, substantively and efficiently." The Karp Commission examined some seventy incidents of SETTLER VIOLENCE that had been reported, including killings, armed threats, trespassing, assault, property damage, and disturbances of public order.

The commission's conclusions criticized the violence by Jewish settlers against Palestinians living under Israeli OCCUPATION and stated that Israeli troops and Jewish settlers were engaged in a massive miscarriage of justice against Palestinians. The Karp Report further declared that the Israeli administration of justice in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES was in need of "a radical reform of the basic concept of the rule of law in its broadest and most profound sense."

The report found that Jewish settlers were regularly protected by the army and seldom arrested for offenses ranging from shootings to massive destruction of property against Palestinians. It found that settlers considered themselves above the law and refused to cooperate with Israeli police investigating Palestinian complaints: "Israeli [civilian] residents of the territories are given to understand that they are soldiers to all intents and purposes. . . . Israeli residents of Judea and Samaria, explicitly relying on this assurance, refuse to cooperate with the police or provide information; they reject any contact with the police, basing themselves on 'high-level policy' and declaring that they are under no obligation to cooperate in this matter." The report cited the radical settlers living in KIRYAT ARBA and the adjoining Palestinian city of HEBRON as being of particular threat to Palestinians and stated that the settlers' refusal to cooperate with civilian police was "tantamount to civil rebellion."

The Karp Commission's conclusions were considered so critical of Israel's Occupation policies that the government, which had commissioned the inquiry, kept them secret for twenty months, until 9 February 1984, and then only released a highly censored version (the full report has never been released). Government officials condemned the report, charging that it was unfair and misleading, and no policies were undertaken to remedy the situation. Still, on the basis of the censored report, the Jerusalem Post editorialized: "The Karp Report bears out the initial suspicion that a systematic miscarriage of justice is being perpetrated in the West Bank. Jewish settlers wishing to assert their rights to the area take the law into their own hands and refuse . . . to cooperate in police investigations. . . . The police, deferring to the army, fail to stand on their own rights and the army tends to look benignly on those it views as its soldiers. The result . . . is that files are closed without anyone being booked."

The Karp Commission's conclusions were validated a decade later, in the aftermath of the 1994 massacre of Arabs in the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE by a Jewish settler, when Israeli police and troops told the special SHAMGAR COMMISSION that there were different laws for Jews and Palestinians. The chief inspector of the border police stationed in Hebron testified that troops had standing orders never to shoot at Jewish settlers even if the settlers were shooting at Palestinians, stating, "Even if I had been there I would not have been able to do a thing because there were special instructions regarding this. The open-fire orders were that if a settler in Hebron fires purposefully, under no circumstances should he be shot at." Also, in 1994, B'TSELEM, the Israeli human rights group, published a major report on settler violence in which it declared nothing had changed since the Karp Commission's report.

See also HEBRON AND JEWISH SETTLEMENTS; SASSON REPORT; SETTLER VIOLENCE

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Amnesty Report: Annual Report. London: Amnesty International, 1988.
- B'Tselem. Handling of Complaints of Settler Violence by the Israel Police Force. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1994. www.btselem.org/english/Settler\_Violence/Police.asp.
- Cohen, Stanley. "Talking about Torture in Israel." Tikkun. November–December 1992.
- Dudai, Ron. Free Rein: Vigilante Settlers and Israel's Non-Enforcement of the Law. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- . Tacit Consent: Law Enforcement towards Israeli Settlers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- Findley, Paul. Deliberate Deceptions: Facing the Facts about the U.S.-Israeli Relationship. Brooklyn, NY: Lawrence Hill Books, 1993.
- Karp, Yehudit. Investigation of Suspicions against Israelis in Judea and Samaria. The Karp Report: An Israeli Government Inquiry into Settler Violence against Palestinians on the West Bank, reprint ed. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1984.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Foreseen but Not Prevented: The Israeli Law Enforcement Authorities' Handling of Settler Attacks on Olive Harvesters. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Neff, Donald. "Israeli Commission Calls Occupation Policies Systematic Miscarriage of Justice." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. January–February 1995.
- Shahak, Israel. "Israel's State-Assisted Terrorism: 'Settlers' as Armed Combatants." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. February–March 1994.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Stein, Yael. Illusions of Restraint: Human Rights Violations during the Events in the Occupied Territories, September 29–December 2, 2000. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Standing Idly By: Non-enforcement of the Law on Settlers: Hebron, 26–28 July 2002. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Swisa, Shlomi. Hebron, Area H-2: Settlements Cause Mass Departure of Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2003.
- US Department of State. Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1993. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1994.

Kennedy, John F. (1917–1963)

John F. Kennedy was the thirty-fifth president of the UNITED STATES, governing from 20 January 1961 through 22 November 1963, when he was assassinated. His political career started as a Democratic congressman from the Boston area and advanced to the Senate in 1953. Kennedy came to the presidency with an energetic and ambitious program. He was sympathetic to third world nations in general, and in the Middle East he worked to improve relations with EGYPT and other states; considered ways to resolve the Palestinian REFUGEE issue, although he never viewed the Palestine question as one of national rights; and forged a close and intimate relationship with Israel, selling it Hawk missiles and turning a shaded eye to its nuclear proliferation.

Almost immediately on assuming office, Kennedy undertook an initiative to address the Palestinian refugee issue, based on UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 194, which called for repatriation or compensation for the refugees. He encouraged the UN CONCILIATION COMMISSION FOR PALESTINE (UNCCP) to reenergize and appoint a special representative to discuss the refugee issue with Israel and the Arab states involved and come up with a plan. Joseph E. Johnson, president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, was selected to head the commission and held talks with the heads of state in the Middle East in September 1961 and May 1962. Although he acted independently, he consulted with and reported to US Department of State officials on a regular basis. Johnson also worked closely with UNCCP land expert Frank Jarvis, who, along with UNCCP principal secretary John P. Gaillard and UN RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY official Sherwood G. Moe, studied several methods for estimating the value of land, movable property, and so forth for purposes of compensating the refugees.

The four men met in March 1962 to discuss the specifics of a plan. After numerous ideas were presented a proposal emerged containing five main points: (1) Each Palestinian would be given an opportunity, free from all external pressures, to express whether he preferred repatriation or resettlement; (2) Israel's legitimate security interests would be safeguarded by allowing it, subject to UN review, to reject individual Palestinians as a security risk; (3) both repatriation and resettlement would be handled in a gradual, step-by-step process and would be undertaken simultaneously; (4) a special fund, to which Israel would be expected to make a substantial contribution, would be set up to pay compensation for Palestinian properties expropriated by Israel as well as to provide financial help to assist the resettled Palestinians to become self-supporting; and (5) the United States would play a vital role in supervising all aspects and stages of the program.

In total, the plan to pay compensation based on the value of land, movable property, interest, and so forth totaled some 400 million Palestinian pounds, or US $1.125 billion. Word of the various general figures being discussed began to leak out almost immediately, and some people with connections to the UN began talking of US $1.5 billion in compensation while other figures cited at that time were between two and seven times as large. But like the estimate of refugee property values itself, the overall compensation plan never was made public and has lain hidden in the UNCCP archives for four decades.

More important, the "Johnson Plan," or "Palestine Refugee Initiative" as it was also called, was rejected in November 1962 by the Israeli Knesset, which opposed any significant repatriation of refugees to Israel, while the Arab states remained unwilling to deal with Israel and thus were cool to a comprehensive resettlement.

At the same time, Kennedy began secret negotiations with Israel over arms sales. In May 1961, Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION, in a private meeting with Kennedy in New York, requested Hawk missiles. Although the president failed to make the sale formally conditional, Kennedy had expected that in return for the sale of Hawk anti-aircraft missiles, Israel would react favorably to the Johnson Plan, especially with the United States underwriting the attendant financial costs. As it turned out, Israel received the Hawk missiles in the fall of 1962 and at the same time again rejected the Johnson Plan. In December, under intense Israeli and US pro-Israel pressure, Kennedy abandoned the plan altogether.

At the 1961 meeting between Kennedy and Ben-Gurion, according to Israeli professor Zaki Shalom, "The issue of Israel's nuclear activity naturally headed the president's agenda." The tone of their conversation was relaxed, according to Shalom, following the Kennedy administration's decision "to avoid an open dispute [with Israel] over the [nuclear] Project." The new president told Ben-Gurion that he wanted more inspections, but it was phrased as a "request" rather than a demand. The reason for the soft approach was apparently the Kennedy administration's assessment "that Israelis, especially David Ben-Gurion, perceived the 'Dimona [NUCLEAR] Project' as a matter of supreme national importance and that Israel considered any concessions on that question unthinkable." Under such circumstances, Kennedy apparently thought it pointless to pressure the Israeli government, and Ben-Gurion seems to have thought it politic to permit US limited inspections.

But Israel controlled the inspections very tightly. Through ruse and deception, inspectors never saw the most sensitive and serious activities at Dimona. The first tour, after much Israeli stalling, occurred on 18 May 1961 when two scientists from the US Atomic Energy Commission spent the day being shown around Dimona, saw no plutonium-separation plant, and gave the reactor something close to a clean bill of health. Not until sixteen months later were two other commission scientists taken on another tour around Dimona—this time for just forty minutes. Kennedy was most displeased.

In 1963 the president finally attempted something of a showdown. Secretary of State Dean Rusk told the Israelis that Kennedy now wanted semiannual, unhindered visits of Dimona by US experts. The president insisted on two inspections per year to see how fast the Dimona reactor was burning through fuel—a telltale sign of a weapons program, but Ben-Gurion defiantly offered one supervised visit per year. That spring, Kennedy sent Ben-Gurion two letters warning that US-Israel relations would be “seriously jeopardized” without real inspections. When Ben-Gurion resigned over an unrelated domestic political scandal, Kennedy repeated the warning to the new prime minister, LEVI ESHKOL, whose policy was to mollify Washington without abandoning the secret program of nuclear weapons production. He agreed to regular US visits, hinting that the six-month schedule would not be a problem, and promised to return plutonium produced at Dimona to FRANCE. Meanwhile, as the Federation of American Scientists later reported, Eshkol ordered the installation of false control-room panels and bricked over passages leading to Dimona’s innards so that inspectors were completely deceived.

By mid-1963, buoyed by the Limited Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, Kennedy intended to take a firmer approach toward the Israeli nuclear program, although he died before taking any action and, given his successor LYNDON B. JOHNSON’s highly sympathetic view toward the Jewish state, little else was ever raised about the issue.

Kennedy’s positive rhetoric vis-à-vis Israel went significantly beyond anything said by previous presidents. For example, he told a gathering of Jewish leaders: “This nation, from the time of President WOODROW WILSON, has established and continued a tradition of friendship with Israel. . . . In the prophetic spirit of ZIONISM, all free men today look to a better world and in the experience of Zionism we know that it takes courage and perseverance and dedication to achieve it. . . . Israel was not created in order to disappear—Israel will endure and flourish. It is the child of hope and home of the brave. It can neither be broken by adversity nor demoralized by success. It carries the shield of democracy and it honors the sword of freedom.” When Foreign Minister GOLDA MEIR visited the United States in December 1962, Kennedy told her that the United States has a “special relationship” with Israel “really comparable only to that which [the US] has with Britain over a wide-range of world affairs.” The president also told Meir at this meeting that the Johnson Plan was dead.

Bibliography

- Bass, Warren. Support Any Friend: Kennedy’s Middle East and the Making of the U.S. Israel Alliance. Council on Foreign Relations. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Ben-Zvi, Abraham. Decade of Transition: Eisenhower, Kennedy, and the Origins of the American-Israeli Alliance. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.
- . John F. Kennedy and the Politics of Arms Sales to Israel. London: Taylor and Francis, 2002.
- Bustami, Zaha. “The Kennedy-Johnson Administrations and the Palestinian People.” In U.S. Policy on Palestine from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Normal, IL: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1995.
- Christenson, Kathleen. Perceptions of Palestine: Their Influence on U.S. Middle East Policy. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.
- Cohen, Avner. Israel and the Bomb. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.
- Druks, Herbert M. John F. Kennedy and Israel. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2005.
- Fischbach, Michael R. “The Usefulness of the UNCCP Archives for Palestinian Refugee Compensation/Restitution Claims.” Paper presented at the Stocktaking Conference on Palestinian Refugee Research, Ottawa, Canada, 17–20 June 2003. http://www.idrc.ca/en/ev-33113-201-1-DO\_TOPIC.html.
- Jewish Virtual Library. “U.S. Presidents on Israel.” n.d. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/US-Israel/presquote.html.
- Johnson, Joseph E. “Arab vs. Israeli: A Persistent Challenge.” Address given before the American Assembly, Arden House, Harriman, NY, 24 October 1963. Reprinted in Fred J. Khouri. The Arab-Israeli Dilemma, 2nd ed. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1976.
- O’Brien, Michael. John F. Kennedy: A Biography. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2005.
- Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr. A Thousand Days: John F. Kennedy in the White House. New York: Mariner Books, 2002.
- Shalom, Zaki. Bain dimona lewashington: Hama’avak al pituah haoptzia hagarinit shel yisrael, 1960–1968

[Between Dimona and Washington: The Development of Israel's Nuclear Option, 1960–1968]. Ben-Gurion Research Institute. The Negev, Israel: Ben-Gurion University Press, 2004.

Telhami, Shibley. The Stakes: America and the Middle East. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2002.

US Department of State. Foreign Relations of the United States: The Near East. Vol. XVII, 1961–63. Washington, DC: Office of the Historian, Bureau of Public Affairs. United States Department of State, 1995.

———. “Meir Rejects Johnson Plan for Refugees (November 21, 1962).” Telegram to the US Embassy in Israel. Foreign Relations of the United States, 1961–1963: Near East, 1962–1963, XVIII. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 2000. Posted on website: Jewish Virtual Library: http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsources/US-Israel/FRUS11\_21\_62.html.

Khalaf, Salah (1933–1991)

Salah Khalaf (Abu Iyad) was the second-in-command, after YASIR ARAFAT, of the FATAH movement and was in charge of intelligence and counterintelligence in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). Khalaf was born in JAFFA but was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and fled with his middle-class family to GAZA, where he received his diploma from a UN RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (UNRWA) school and then went to EGYPT for university studies. In Cairo, Khalaf met Arafat, and the two established the team that would later lead to Fatah and the PLO, as well as the Palestinian resistance movement in general.

In Egypt, Arafat, Khalaf, and others formed the General Union of Palestinian Students, and in 1956 Khalaf succeeded Arafat as president. In 1957, he earned a degree in philosophy and returned to Gaza to pursue a career in teaching, but in 1959 he joined Arafat in KUWAIT, where, with Arafat and KHALIL AL-WAZIR, the seeds for the Fatah organization were planted. Later Khalaf, together with the core Fatah members, moved to SYRIA, which at the time was hospitable to the Palestinian movement. There he emerged as one of the architects of the PLO policy toward Arab governments and helped the PLO establish ties with Egyptian president JAMAL ‘ABD AL-NASIR, who had initially been suspicious of Fatah’s intentions.

Khalaf was a private man who remained out of the spotlight; he lacked the mass appeal of other leaders, but within the Fatah movement he was second only to Arafat. Khalaf participated in the “JOR-DAN experience” of the development of PLO institutions there, and, like the rest of the PLO leaders, had to relocate to LEBANON in its aftermath. That and the later massacres of BLACK SEPTEMBER, 1970, in which some 2,500 Palestinians were killed in the conflict with Jordan, left their mark on him. He is credited (or blamed) for the creation of the secretive BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION within Fatah that claimed responsibility for numerous attacks. Israeli intelligence would mistakenly credit the braggart young PLO leader ABU ‘ALI HASAN SALAMAH, but it was Abu Iyad who was the real leader. In the Lebanon sojourn of the PLO experience, Khalaf remained in the shadows and cultivated a wide intelligence network that proved highly useful for the PLO in its planning and activities. He maintained a wide network of agents and spies for his secret apparatus and was quite eager to cultivate ties on college campuses and in schools. His department (of intelligence and counterintelligence) was also active in recruiting Arab students in Europe, the UNITED STATES, and around the world. For his operations, he required constant financial support and often clashed with the mercurial Arafat, who controlled the flow of money.

First in Fatah and then in the PLO, Arafat demonstrated his trust of Khalaf, and the relationship between the two men was strong enough that Khalaf was viewed as the person who could disagree with Arafat over major issues of policymaking. Yet politically the two were often at odds. Khalaf was a firm believer in the efficacy of ARMED STRUGGLE and opposed the US-led peace process and Arafat’s secret negotiations with US emissaries going on at the time. He also did not support Arafat’s cautious approach in the Lebanese civil war and wanted more vocal and active support for the leftist coalition. Instead, Arafat maintained ties with the right-wing militias through secret emissaries. In 1991 Khalaf clashed with Arafat over Arafat’s decision to support IRAQ president Saddam Husayn, because Khalaf didn’t trust Husayn, who had pursued a long war and campaign of terror against Palestinian activists when they disagreed with the Iraqi regime. So strongly did Khalaf feel about this issue that, in a rare move, he made his position public.

In the meetings of the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE, Khalaf often clashed with Arafat and not infrequently headed the faction that opposed the chairman. But they both needed one another, and Arafat could not promote policies in Fatah unless he had the support of Khalaf. In January 1991, Khalaf was assassinated in TUNIS by an ABU NIDAL operative.

Bibliography

- Abu Iyad. With Eric Rouleau. My Home, My Land: A Narrative of the Palestinian Struggle. New York: New York Times Books, 1981.
- Egan, John. "The PLO Split." MERIP Reports. 119 (November–December 1983).
- Khalidi, Rashid. "Remembrance: Abu Iyad." Middle East Report. 169 (March–April 1991).

—As'ad AbuKhalil

Khalid, Layla (1944–)

Layla Khalid was politically active in the Palestinian resistance movement and is most remembered for her part in two airline hijackings. She was born in HAIFA, was dispossessed with her family in the 1948 WAR, and became (with her family) a refugee in LEBANON. After completing her secondary education, Khalid entered the American University of Beirut and, in 1962, joined the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN). She left Beirut for a year to teach in KUWAIT and during her stay joined the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP) in 1968. When Khalid left Kuwait, she moved to Amman, JORDAN, where she attended paramilitary training courses. On 29 August 1969, she participated in the hijacking of a Trans World Airlines plane en route to Damascus, SYRIA. On 6 September 1970, she participated in an unsuccessful hijacking of an El Al plane, for which she was sentenced to prison in London. After she was released, several weeks later, Khalid became a member of the PFLP's Central Committee. Later she married, had a family, and wrote an autobiography entitled My People Shall Live. When YASIR ARAFAT convened the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL in Gaza in 1998, Khalid attended.

Al-Khalidi Family

The Khalidi family is one of JERUSALEM'S oldest and most prestigious Palestinian families. Known especially for their scholarship and for being a part of the city's fiber and history, the Khalidis have lived in Jerusalem since 1187 and have left their mark on the city in many ways, notably by bequeathing to it a library of untold value.

The Khalidi Library is one of the most significant sites in Jerusalem and is housed in a thirteenth-century Mamluk building that recalls the city's medieval grandeur. The family's collections were officially organized into a library in 1900 under the terms of a private family trust, or Waqf thurri, established by Hajj Raghīb al-Khalidi, a Palestinian judge. Although the architectural features of the library summarize much of Jerusalem's history, it is its intellectual composition that comprises the real treasure as an indigenous collection built by Palestinians. The library contains some 1,200 precious manuscripts: 18 in Persian, 36 in Turkish, and the rest in Arabic, and a catalogue released in January 2007 that was prepared by Dr. Lawrence I. Conrad. Not yet catalogued are well over 5,000 printed volumes and countless documents and letters. The collection is distinguished by its medieval manuscripts and the fact that it spans a broad spectrum of subjects with religious law at its center. Other fields include medicine, history, geography, astronomy, Quranic exegesis, rhetoric, logic, philosophy, and poetry. In all, its holdings reveal the concerns and interests of educated Palestinians during the Mamluk and OTTOMAN periods and shed light on the intellectual heritage of Palestinians in Jerusalem from medieval times to the present.

The Mamluk structure that houses the collection is known by its abbreviated Arabic name, al-Khalidiyyah (the Khalidi Library), and it is the turbah (burial site) of Amir Husam al-Din Barkah Khan, a thirteenth-century military chieftain, and his two sons, Husam al-Din and Badr al-Din. The Khalidis undertook numerous phases of construction and restoration that are mainly Ottoman in character. In 1876, they constructed a family mosque on part of the site, which is presently the library's reading room. The Khalidi family has traditionally preserved the core of the collection. This was true of Sun 'Allah al-Khalidi, who held the position of chief secretary to the Religious Court of Jerusalem for forty years and died in 1726. He secured the various family collections, which were then consolidated in the late nineteenth century. But it was Khadijah al-Khalidi, great-grandmother of the family's present-day senior member Walid, who endowed with her own money the Waqf that her son Raghīb established and who persuaded other family members to contribute to it and its future.

During the Mamluk period, at least three members of the Khalidi family served as qadi al

qudat (chief justice). For most of the Ottoman period as well, Khalidi scholars served in the judiciary, and in the decades preceding World War I they also served as administrators, diplomats, and members of parliament. Shortly after the turn of the century, Ruhi Khalidi (1864–1913) served as a member of parliament for Jerusalem and as consul-general in Bordeaux, FRANCE. He lectured at the Sorbonne and wrote a book on Victor Hugo, recently reprinted with an introduction that identifies it as the first work in Arabic on comparative literature.

In the twentieth century, Ahmad Samih al-Khalidi (1896–1951) was a prominent Palestinian educator who served in the BRITISH MANDATE government's education department; was principal of the Teacher's College, which he renamed The Arab College in Jerusalem; was appointed deputy-director of education in 1941; and was the author and translator of many books on education and psychology. He is best known for the role he played in developing the Palestinian Arab educational curriculum, focusing on nationalism and Arabism.

Samih al-Khalidi's wife was a Lebanese feminist, writer, translator, and educator. Anbarah Salam al-Khalidi (1897–1986) translated Homer's Odyssey and Virgil's Aeneid into Arabic for the first time. She was also the first woman in Greater SYRIA to unveil her face, in 1927. In October 1929, Anbarah attended the first nationalist meeting for women at a general conference held in Jerusalem and organized a demonstration to protest the increasing Jewish IMMIGRATION.

The family tradition of scholarship in the context of Palestine continues today. The family's senior living member, Harvard University professor Walid Khalidi, son of Ahmad Samih al-Khalidi, was born in Jerusalem in 1925 and educated at Oxford and the University of London. He is cofounder of both the Royal Scientific Society in Amman, JORDAN, and of the INSTITUTE FOR PALESTINE STUDIES, of which he has been general secretary since 1963. His most recent book is the 700-page volume All That Remains, which painstakingly documents the disappearance of 416 Palestinian villages during the 1948 WAR. Walid's younger cousin Rashid, born in 1950, holds the EDWARD SAID Professor of Arab Studies chair at Columbia University, where he is the director of the Middle East Institute, and it is he who is presently directing the work on the private papers of the Khalidi Library.

Bibliography

- Ajami, Jocelyn M. "A Hidden Treasure." Saudi Aramco World. 44:6 (1993).
- Khalidi, Walid. All That Remains: The Palestinian Villages Occupied and Depopulated by Israel in 1948. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.
- . Before Their Diaspora: A Photographic History of the Palestinians, 1876–1948. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1991.
- . From Haven to Conquest: Readings in Zionism and the Palestine Problem until 1948. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1987.
- . Palestine Reborn. London: I. B. Tauris, 1993.
- The Palestine Chronicle Weekly Journal*. "Ahmad Samih al-Khalidi." 1 October 2003.

Kibbutz

A kibbutz (plural is kibbutzim) is an Israeli collective community. Initially, the kibbutzim combined socialism and ZIONISM into a communal movement that lasted for several generations (circa 1910–1970) as relatively utopian communities. Today, however, they are scarcely different from the capitalist enterprises and regular towns to which the kibbutzim were originally supposed to be alternatives. Though the kibbutz movement never accounted for more than 7 percent of the Israeli population, it has given Israel a disproportionate share of its military leaders, intellectuals, and politicians.

In 1909 the first viable kibbutz, called Degania, was established at the southern end of the Sea of Galilee near the Arab village Umm Juni. By the end of the 1920s, there were twelve kibbutzim with a combined population of 805 persons. Most kibbutzim were founded on land that had been cultivated by Palestinians. For example, the land on which Degania was established had previously been occupied by Palestinian tenant farmers, who were evicted when the land was purchased from ABSENTEE LANDLORDS by a Zionist SETTLEMENT agency. Because the founders of the kibbutz movement wanted to redeem the Jewish nation through work, they refused to hire non-Jews to do hard tasks. This exclusivity in agricultural and industrial hiring was a major issue of contention with the Palestinians, who felt discriminated against at a time when they were losing their LANDS to Jewish purchasers and Jewish IMMIGRATION was overwhelming the country.

In the 1930s, the role of the kibbutzim in the pre-state Jewish Yishuv began to increasingly involve military activities equal to or greater than their economic endeavors of farming and industry. Kibbutzim played a role in defining the BORDERS of the Jewish state-to-be: by the late 1930s, when it appeared that Palestine would be partitioned between Arabs and Jews, kibbutzim were planted in remote parts of the BRITISH MANDATE to make it more likely that the land would be incorporated into Israel rather than a Palestinian state. Many of these kibbutzim were founded, literally, in the middle of the night. In 1946, in one day a dozen new “Tower and Stockade” kibbutzim, as they were called, were hurriedly established in the northern part of the Negev to give Israel a better claim to this arid but strategically important region. By 1948 there were over 100 kibbutzim.

One kibbutz, Maagan Michael, manufactured the bullets for the Sten guns that helped win the 1948 WAR. Maagan Michael’s clandestine ammunition factory was later separated from the kibbutz and grew into TAAS (Israel Military Industries). In the war kibbutzniks were considered to have fought especially bravely, emerging from the conflict with enhanced prestige in the nascent state of Israel. For example, members of Degania, using homemade gasoline bombs, were instrumental in stopping the Syrian tank advance into the Galilee.

After the war, kibbutzim continued to play an outsized role in Israel’s defense apparatus. In the 1950s and 1960s many kibbutzim were established by an ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES group called NAHAL on the precarious and porous borders of the state. In the 1967 WAR, Israel lost 800 soldiers, fully 200 of them from kibbutzim. The prestige that kibbutzniks enjoyed in Israel in the 1960s was reflected in the Knesset, where they made up 15 percent of Israel’s parliament while comprising only 4 percent of the Israeli population. There are currently approximately 250 kibbutzim.

By the 1970s, the kibbutzim were hiring large numbers of Palestinians from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES as cheap laborers, and 38 percent of kibbutz employees were kibbutz members. With the OSLO ACCORDS, Israel began prohibiting Palestinians from entering Israel; thus temporary workers from Thailand and elsewhere have now replaced Palestinians as the non-Jewish physical work element at kibbutzim.

In his history of Palestine under the British Mandate, One Palestine, Complete, Israeli historian

Tom Segev wrote of the kibbutz movement: “The kibbutz was an original social creation, yet always a marginal phenomenon. By the end of the 1930s no more than 4,000 people, children included, lived on some thirty kibbutzim, and they amounted to a mere 2.5 percent of Palestine’s Jewish population. The most important service the kibbutzim provided to the Jewish national struggle was military, not economic or social. They were guardians of Zionist land, and their patterns of settlement would to a great extent determine the country’s borders.”

See also HISTADRUT; ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION

Bibliography

- Baratz, Joseph. A Village by the Jordan: The Story of Degania. Tel Aviv: Ichud Habonim, 1956.
- Gavron, Daniel. The Kibbutz: Awakening from Utopia. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000.
- Laquer, Walter. A History of Zionism. New York: MJF Books, 1972.
- Rayman, Paula. The Kibbutz Community and Nation Building. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2000.

King Abdullah (1882–1951)

See ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; JORDAN

King-Crane Commission, 1919

The King-Crane Commission was a US commission of inquiry sent to the Middle East to ascertain the attitudes and views of the Arab people on the proposed British and French MANDATES for the region. On 20 March 1919, US president WOODROW WILSON proposed that an Inter-Allied Commission visit SYRIA and Palestine “to elucidate the state of opinion” and to report its findings to the Paris Peace Conference. The French refused to appoint representatives, and, although the British named theirs, London later withdrew. As a result, only the two US members, Henry C. King and Charles R. Crane, proceeded with their staff, arriving at JAFFA, Palestine, on 10 June, and submitted a report late in the summer. In the end, neither the European powers nor the UNITED STATES, both focusing energy on the new League of Nations, gave the King-Crane inquiry serious consideration. Politics, not principle, triumphed in Paris. Nevertheless, the report remains of considerable historical significance and here a small segment of it is printed that bears on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Fundamentally, King and Crane recommended “serious modification of the extreme Zionist Program for Palestine of unlimited IMMIGRATION of Jews, looking finally to making Palestine distinctly a Jewish State.” The commissioners noted that they began their study of ZIONISM with “minds predisposed in its favor,” but that the actual facts in Palestine had led them to make the recommendation they did. The commission was abundantly supplied with literature on the Zionist program by the ZIONIST COMMISSION to Palestine, heard testimony in conferences concerning the Zionist colonies and their claims, and personally saw something of what had been accomplished. They found much to approve in the aspirations and plans of the Zionists and had warm appreciation for the devotion of many of the colonists and for their success in overcoming great natural obstacles.

They also noted their awareness of the promises given by the British in the BALFOUR DECLARATION. But, they averred, if the strict terms of the Balfour Declaration were adhered to, “the extreme Zionist Program must be greatly modified.” A “national home for the Jewish people,” they declared, “is not equivalent to making Palestine into a Jewish State.” Such a Jewish state, they argued, could only be accomplished with the gravest harm to the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine. In the commission’s conference with Jewish representatives, the Zionists repeatedly indicated that they expected a practically complete dispossession of the present non-Jewish inhabitants of Palestine.

King and Crane reiterated that the Zionists and others must remember that the non-Jewish population of Palestine—nearly nine-tenths of the whole—are emphatically against the entire Zionist program, and that to subject a people so opposed to unlimited Jewish immigration and to steady financial and social pressure to surrender the LAND would be a gross violation of the principle just quoted, and of the people’s rights, though it kept within the forms of law.

They also dismissed as absurd the claim by the Zionists that they have a “right” to Palestine, based on an occupation of 2,000 years ago.

King and Crane further addressed the fact that CHRISTIANITY and Islam both have religious attachments to Palestine and that it is doubtful “whether the Jews could possibly seem to either Christians or Moslems proper guardians of the holy places, or custodians of the Holy Land as a whole.” They further argued that Jewish control over all the holy sites in Jerusalem and the remainder of Palestine “would intensify, with a certainty like fate, the anti-Jewish feeling both in Palestine and in all other portions of the world which look to Palestine as ‘the Holy Land.’”

Thus, expressing a genuine sense of sympathy for the Jewish project, the commissioners felt bound to recommend that “only a greatly reduced Zionist program be attempted by the Peace Conference, and even that, only very gradually initiated. This would have to mean that Jewish immigration should be definitely limited, and that the project for making Palestine distinctly a Jewish commonwealth should be given up.”

Bibliography

- Howard, Harry N. The King-Crane Commission: An American Inquiry in the Middle East. Beirut: Khayats, 1963.
- King-Crane Commission. “Final Report of the King-Crane Commission.” Foreign Relations of the United States 12. Washington, DC: US Government Printing Office, 1919.
- Lesch, David W. The Middle East and the United States. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1996.
- Speiser, E. A. The United States and the Near East. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1947.

King David Hotel, 1946

The King David Hotel in JERUSALEM was the base for the British secretariat, the military command, and a branch of the Criminal Investigation Division (police) during the BRITISH MANDATE. On 22 July 1946, members of the IRGUN, a militant Zionist group intent on driving Britain out of Palestine, exploded a bomb at the hotel. Ninety-one people were killed, most of them civilians: twenty-eight Britons, forty-one Arabs, seventeen Jews, and five others. Approximately forty-five people were injured.

The attack was initially ordered by DAVID BEN-GURION, who was in the UNITED STATES, but he later changed his mind and ordered the bombing cancelled. But MENAHEM BEGIN, the head of Irgun, went ahead anyway. Both Ben-Gurion and Begin would later become Israeli prime ministers.

Bibliography

- Bell, J. Bowyer. Terror out of Zion: The Fight for Israeli Independence. Edison, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 1996.
- Sinai, Anne, and I. Robert Sinai. Israel and the Arabs: Prelude to the Jewish State. New York: Facts on File, 1972.

King Husayn

See ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; JORDAN

Kiryat Arba Settlement

Kiryat Arba is one of the oldest Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the WEST BANK, abutting the city of HEBRON. It is also home to the most ideologically extremist elements in the settlement movement, including GUSH EMUNIM and KACH. It was started on 4 April 1968, when RABBI MOSHE LEVINGER, his wife Miriam, and a small group who called themselves Gush Emunim rented rooms in the Park Hotel in downtown Hebron for Passover, then refused to leave, announcing that they had come to reestablish Hebron's Jewish community. Initially, the government was uncertain how to react, but with the support of Deputy Prime Minister YIGAL ALLON and MOSHE DAYAN, former defense minister and at the time administrator of the Occupied Territories, the government approved a permanent settlement for the group. The settlers were moved from the Park Hotel to a special area in the Military Administration Building in Hebron, where they lived while the government built permanent homes for them in Kiryat Arba. By 1972, the settlement was flourishing and had 105 housing units.

Today, Kiryat Arba is a self-sufficient community with preuniversity through postsecondary educational institutions, medical facilities, shopping centers, a bank, and a post office. It encompasses 2,543 dunums (635 acres), which does not include the area of Kiryat Arba that blocks the developmental capacity of Hebron in the east. The population of Kiryat Arba in 2005 was approximately 6,500 (including the settlers in the center of Hebron), with an additional 2,700 Israelis living in a number of smaller satellite settlements. In the heart of Hebron, more than 600 settlers live in six enclaves. The Palestinian population of Hebron, in contrast, is approximately 160,000.

Residents of Kiryat Arba and the surrounding settlements have perpetrated continuous violence against the Palestinians living in the area. BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, who murdered twenty-nine Muslims at prayer in the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE, was from Kiryat Arba, and his settlement neighbors erected a monument to him declaring him a righteous man of God.

See also GUSH EMUNIM; HEBRON; JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM; SETTLER VIOLENCE

Bibliography

- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. "Kiryat Arba Settlers in Hebron Carry Out Continuous Attacks against the Palestinian Family of Dana." Monitoring Israeli Colonization Activities. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem, 30 July 2003.
- Ashkar, Antigona. Means of Expulsion: Violence, Harassment and Lawlessness against Palestinians in the Southern Hebron Hills. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2005.
- Bannoura, Saed. "Israeli Settlers Attack Palestinian Women and Children in Hebron, Seven Injured." International Middle East Media Center. 21 January 2008. <http://www.imemc.org/article/52382>.
- Dudai, Ron. Free Rein: Vigilante Settlers and Israel's Non-Enforcement of the Law. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- Ecumenical Accompaniment Program in Palestine and Israel. "Renewed Settler Activity between Hebron and Kiryat Arba." Ecumenical Accompaniment Program in Palestine and Israel. 3 March 2008. <http://www.eappi.org/en/news-events/ea-reports/r/browse/6/article/4837/renewed-settler-activity.html>.
- Keinon, Herb. "Kiryat Arba Is an Image-Maker's Nightmare." Jerusalem Post. 30 June 1995.
- Lein, Yehezkel. The Performance of Law Enforcement Authorities in Responding to Settler Attacks on Olive Harvesters. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1991.
- Relief Web. Israel-OPT: Settler Violence against Palestinians on the Rise. United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs—Integrated Regional Information Networks (IRIN). 31 August 2008. <http://www.reliefweb.int/rw/rwb.nsf/db900SID/RMOI-7J2LPT?OpenDocument>.
- Selig, Abe. "The Young Men from Kiryat Arba Exact Their 'Price' in the Valley." Jerusalem Post. 5 December 2008.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Swisa, Shlomi. Hebron, Area H-2: Settlements Cause Mass Departure of Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2003.

Kiryat Shmona

On 11 April 1974, a team of three members of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND penetrated the Israeli bordertown of Kiryat Shmona from LEBANON. Although they had apparently been instructed to take hostages, they instead entered an apartment building and killed all eighteen residents, including nine children. The TERRORISTS then barricaded themselves in one of the apartments and were eventually killed in an exchange of fire with Israeli forces. Subsequently, the prevention of such attacks was cited by the Israeli government for the 1978 invasion of Lebanon in OPERATION LITANI.

Kissinger, Henry Alfred (1923–)

Henry Kissinger was the fifty-sixth US secretary of state, serving from 1973 to 1977, and assistant to the president for National Security Affairs (NSA) from 1969 until 1975. His tenure spanned the terms of both Presidents RICHARD NIXON and GERALD FORD. In 1973, together with Le Duc Tho, Kissinger received the Nobel Peace Prize for ending the Vietnam War. After leaving government service, he founded Kissinger Associates, an international consulting firm of which he is chairman. Born in GERMANY, Kissinger came to the UNITED STATES in 1938 and was naturalized in 1943. He received all his higher education from Harvard University and was a faculty member there from 1954 until 1971. Kissinger wrote numerous books and articles on US foreign policy, international affairs, and diplomatic history, for which he has received prestigious awards.

Kissinger's entry into Middle East politics came early in his tenure as National Security Council adviser when he worked to undermine the efforts of Secretary of State WILLIAM P. ROGERS. Kissinger's worldview centered on the bipolar Soviet-American competition, in which every regional problem was seen as an aspect of the conflict between the two world powers. Rogers, on the other hand, was attuned to the indigenous nature of the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli conflict, believed that a solution to the problem could be found, worried about the decline in influence of the United States with the Arab states, and was concerned about the trends toward radicalization and polarization in those countries as well as emerging Palestinian militancy.

President Nixon authorized Rogers to pursue two sets of parallel talks—one between Moscow and the United States and the second among FRANCE, Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States. Kissinger did everything he could, successfully, to ensure that no initiatives came out of these talks, because he thought any peace plan would be an appeasement of the Soviets. Frustrated, Rogers put forward his own initiative on 9 December 1969—the ROGERS PLAN. Instead of supporting it, however, Kissinger worked to torpedo it—primarily by backing Israel's rejection of the proposal and at the same time facilitating an increase in sophisticated weapons and aid to the Jewish state.

As a consequence of their experience in Vietnam, Kissinger and Nixon developed the idea of "regional surrogates," known as the Nixon Doctrine, and they designated IRAN and Israel as the Middle Eastern surrogates for US intervention in the region. This was the beginning of the concept of Israel as a "STRATEGIC ASSET," which became the dominant perception in US political culture and provides the backdrop to the massive armament and aid the US annually provides Israel. When the Palestinian-Jordanian civil war erupted in September 1970 (BLACK SEPTEMBER), Kissinger was certain that the Soviets were behind it, although all Western intelligence agencies had evidence that Moscow had tried to defuse the crisis. Moreover, Kissinger asked Israel to mobilize and come to Jordan's defense if JORDAN was unable to manage the conflict. Amman effectively handled the crisis on its own, but Israel's readiness to act cemented for Washington the state's role as a surrogate power.

In the first months of the Nixon administration, senior officials such as Secretary of Defense Melvin Laird believed it was important that Washington try to check Israeli nuclear progress for the sake of stability in the Middle East. In April 1969, NSA adviser Kissinger issued National Security Study Memorandum 40, requesting the national security bureaucracy to develop options for dealing with the Israeli nuclear program. A Senior Review Group, chaired by Kissinger, proposed initiating a probe with Israeli ambassador YITZHAK RABIN designed to achieve its policy objectives of reducing Israel's NUCLEAR PROGRAM. Nixon approved the group's proposal for action but, on Kissinger's advice, declined to use deliveries of advanced F-4 Phantom jets as leverage for the investigation. This decision was fateful for the entire exercise, convincing Israel that it could pursue its nuclear program without facing a reduction in US arms sales.

On 29 July 1969 Ambassador Rabin was summoned by Acting Secretary of State Elliott Richardson and Deputy Secretary of Defense David Packard as the first step in the probe. The two officials pressed Rabin on three issues: (1) the meaning of Israel's "non-introduction" pledge, claiming that it would not be the first to introduce nuclear weapons into the Middle East; (2) pursuit of Israel's signature on the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT); (3) Israel's intentions on the nuclear missile issue. Rabin provided no replies and subsequently proposed to leave the whole issue for a meeting between President Nixon and Prime Minister GOLDA MEIR scheduled for late September. On the eve of Meir's visit, the State Department prepared a background paper for the president, concluding that "Israel might very well now have a nuclear bomb" and certainly "had the technical ability and material resources to produce weapons grade uranium for a number of weapons." No written record of the meeting between Nixon and Meir on 26 September is available, but it was a key event in the emergence of the 1969 US-Israeli nuclear understanding. Subsequent documents suggest that Meir pledged to maintain nuclear restraint—no testing, no public declaration, no visibility—and, after the meeting, Nixon, at Kissinger's importuning, decided to "stand down" on pressure on Israel.

On 7 October 1969 Ambassador Rabin formally provided his belated answers to the US questions: Israel would not become a nuclear power, would decide on the NPT after Israel's election in November, and would not deploy strategic missiles until 1972. On 23 February 1970 Rabin informed Kissinger that, in light of President Nixon's conversation with Meir in September 1969, Israel "has no intention to sign the NPT." Subsequently, the White House decided to end the secret annual US inspections of the Israeli nuclear facility at Dimona begun under President JOHN KENNEDY. Lower-level officials were not told of the decision and, as late as May 1970, were under the impression that the visits could be revived. By 1975, in keeping with the secret understanding with Israel, Kissinger's State Department refused to tell Congress that it was certain that Israel had the bomb, even though US intelligence was convinced that it did.

In 1972, under Kissinger's direction, the United States employed its veto in the UN Security Council for only the second time—to protect Israel's new policy to combat "TERRORISTS." The draft resolution had condemned Israel's heavy air attacks against LEBANON and SYRIA, which killed between 200 and 500 Lebanese, Syrians, and Palestinians, mostly civilians. In 1975–1976, Washington used the veto four more times while Kissinger was secretary of state. Kissinger's precedent was important: the United States used its veto thirty-two times between 1972 and 1997 to shield Israel from critical draft resolutions. Most of the vetoes protected Israel from censure for violating a broad range of INTERNATIONAL LAWS.

Some months before the outbreak of the 1973 War between Israel and EGYPT and Syria, the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) initiated contact with Washington through US ambassador to Iran Richard Helms. Most of the documents on the contacts are still classified in the Nixon papers, because they were conducted through CIA channels. According to Kissinger's account, however, PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT sent a message on 10 October expressing interest in talks. Arafat predicted defeat for Egypt and Syria in the war but opined that they had achieved enough "face" to enter into negotiations with Israel. On 23 October, Arafat sent another message suggesting a meeting on 26 October. Kissinger turned this down but, wanting some "maneuvering room" during the crisis of the 1973 War, arranged for an early November meeting between deputy director of central intelligence Vernon Walters and an Arafat representative. In the meantime, Peter Rodman, a member of Kissinger's staff, prepared a position paper, at Kissinger's direction, that suggested a narrow basis for communication. Although making some noises about the importance of the Palestinian issue in regional negotiations and expressing gratitude that the PLO had taken a "responsible position" during the war, the United States would take no position on Palestinian political claims: Washington had "no proposals" on the "future political role of the Palestinians." And there was a warning: the United States "does not betray its friends," namely Israel. Hostile moves against King Husayn's Jordan were out of the question and by implication, threats to Israel, another US friend, would not be tolerated. For Kissinger, until the Palestinians were ready for a compromise with Israel, substantive discussions were impossible. However, although Kissinger would later comply with an Israeli demand that Washington not recognize or negotiate with the PLO, he would not close the door to lower-level, informal contacts.

Throughout the 1973 War and its aftermath it was Kissinger, by then both National Security Council adviser and secretary of state, who alone made US policy, mainly due to Nixon's immobility as a result of Watergate. The degree of support that Kissinger provided Israel—diplomatic, economic, and military resupply—was unprecedented. By 13 October, seven days after the outbreak of hostilities, a massive military airlift of equipment was under way, paid for by a congressional grant of $2.2 billion. The resupply was so huge that it triggered the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) to institute an oil embargo against the United States in opposition to US support for Israel and led to a series of hikes in the price of oil. In the war's aftermath Kissinger tried to shatter the alliance between Syria and Egypt. He undertook a trip to Moscow to rewrite UN Resolution 242 into Resolution 338, to ensure that there would be no "comprehensive" settlement after the war, and during his time in the Soviet capital Kissinger ignored instructions from President Nixon to arrange a comprehensive settlement for the Middle East with the Soviets. On returning to Israel, the secretary gave the go-ahead to Israel to break the cease-fire with Egypt and Syria, which provoked the Soviets to the point that a nuclear confrontation became a distinct possibility.

Kissinger convened a summit conference in Geneva with Israel and the Arab states on 21 December 1973, then recessed it indefinitely, ensuring that Israel would not have to make any concessions to the Arabs and Palestinians. Moreover, as compensation for Israel's brief attendance at the GENEVA CONFERENCE, Kissinger made numerous concessions to Israeli demands that affected US foreign policy for decades. Most important was Kissinger's promise that the PLO would be barred from Geneva and that the United States would never negotiate with the PLO until it first recognized Israel's right to exist. Between 22 October 1973 and 1 September 1975, Kissinger visited Israel thirty-one times, in what came to be called "shuttle diplomacy," to secure a second cease-fire agreement between Israel and Egypt. Finally, on 1 September 1975, Israel agreed to sign the Sinai II accord but only after Kissinger made a series of extraordinary concessions to the Jewish state. Through all these policies, Kissinger tied the United States and Israel in an impenetrable union.

Bibliography

- Burr, William, ed. Document 78. "Talking Points for Meeting with General Walters." (Initialed by Peter W. Rodman, 26 October 1973.) The October War and U.S. Policy. The National Security Archive. 7 October 2003. <http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB98/index.htm#doc78>.
- Christison, Kathleen. "Bound by a Frame of Reference, Part II: U.S. Policy and the Palestinians, 1948–88." Journal of Palestine Studies. 27:3 (1998).
- Cohen, Avner, and William Burr. "Israel Crosses the Nuclear Threshold." Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. May–June 2006.
- Eldar, Akiva. "Israel's Excuses Are Running Out." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 10 January 2005.
- Feith, Daniel. "The Costs of U.S. Aid to Israel." Harvard Israel Review: A Student Publication of Israeli History, Politics, and Culture. 2003.
- "Henry Kissinger's Prescription for Suppressing the First Intifada, 31 January 1988." Journal of Palestine Studies. 31:4 (2002).
- Hersh, Seymour M. The Price of Power: Kissinger in the Nixon White House. New York: Summit Books, 1983.
- Hutchings, N. W., and Carol Rushton. "Henry Kissinger: The Real Prime Minister of Israel?" Israel Resource Review. 1 December 1997.
- Isaacson, Walter. Kissinger: A Biography. London: Faber and Faber, 1992.
- Jawad, Dr. Saleh Abdul. "Myth: Israel's War Is a Struggle for Survival." Arab Media Internet Network. 27 April 2002.
- Kissinger, Henry. "To Isolate the Palestinians." Memorandum doi:10.2307/3011393. MERIP Reports. 96 (May 1981).
- . White House Years. Boston: Little, Brown, 1979.
- Neff, Donald. "U.S. Vetoes of U.N. Resolutions on Behalf of Israel." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. September–October 1993.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Schulzinger, Robert D. Henry Kissinger: Doctor of Diplomacy. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.
- Shalom, Zakai. "Kissinger and the American Jewish Leadership after the 1973 War." Israel Studies. 7:1 (2002).

Klugman Report, 1993

The Klugman Report, issued on 13 September 1993, uncovered evidence that tens of millions of dollars had been given illegally to JERUSALEM-focused SETTLER GROUPS by Israeli government ministries, especially Housing and Justice. It demonstrated that false documents supplied by Palestinian COLLABORATORS and Jewish front organizations had been used to classify Palestinian houses as “ABSENTEE PROPERTY,” that the ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION (ILA) and the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF) had allotted this property to the settlers without offering it up for tender, and that public funds had been used to finance the settlers’ legal expenses. In short the ILA, the JNF, and government ministries had all aided settler groups with the objective of ousting Palestinians and taking over their property to Judaize Jerusalem.

The investigation was spurred by a strong rebuke from Washington to Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN concerning settlers who had taken over another dwelling in the Muslim Quarter of the OLD CITY in Jerusalem. After its publication, Rabin gave the Klugman Report to State Comptroller Miriam Ben Porat for further scrutiny. Because this was a highly political case, she did not recommend legal action. On 14 June 1998, Ir Shalem, a nonprofit Israeli organization affiliated with PEACE NOW, stated in a press release: “The State Comptroller approached Rabin [in 1995] and suggested ending the investigation because of the damage it would cause Israel’s good name. Unbeknown to the other ministers, Rabin and the State Comptroller [had earlier] decided to halt the investigation.”

In November 1997 Ir Shalem and other groups, plus several Knesset members, demanded that the investigation be continued. In May 1998 Ben Porat notified Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU that the inquiry would begin again within a month unless he ordered otherwise. On 4 June 1998 she announced: “I have received an order from the Prime Minister. . . . In accordance with this message, I have informed my office to stop the investigation.” Ir Shalem petitioned the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT, but as of 2006 the court had not rendered a decision. None of the recommendations of the Klugman Report were ever implemented.

Nevertheless, the Klugman Commission’s findings are significant. According to the report, increased settler activity in East Jerusalem was focused on the neighborhood of SILWAN, near Herod’s Gate in the Old City, and the adjoining Muslim Quarter. Klugman found that, in addition to secretly transferring funds, the government colluded with the settler groups in locating properties vulnerable for takeover. In 1982, under the direction of ARIEL SHARON, then agriculture minister, the government set up a special committee to locate Arab properties in the city for purchase or acquisition by the state under the ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW. Often the settler groups themselves undertook to find properties. The government took the settlers’ word that the owners had left the country and transferred the properties to the settler groups without conducting their own investigation, as required by law. While supposedly “selling” the properties to the settler groups, the government was in fact giving them the money to make the purchases. Such illegal transfers were stepped up in the late 1980s and early 1990s when Sharon became the minister of housing. In July 1991 he established a special committee to acquire properties and transfer them to the settlement groups through the ILA.

Some of the funds transferred to the ATERET COHANIM, a settlement group, went to finance the purchase of the sublease on St. John’s Hospice in the Old City’s Christian Quarter. Klugman discovered that the Housing Ministry had secretly paid Himnuta (a subsidiary of the JNF) a sum of NIS 3.6 million (around $800,000) for transfer to SBC, a front company for the JNF, to help it buy the sublease. The GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH petitioned the Supreme Court and seemingly prevailed. However, by exploiting a loophole in the court’s ruling that allowed security personnel to stay, pending further litigation, the settlers continue to occupy the building.

In April 1990 the LIKUD Cabinet allocated NIS 7.5 million (around $1.65 million) for purchasing properties in East Jerusalem, and as part of the initiative, in December 1991, the ELAD group spearheaded a move into Silwan under the slogan “No Judenrein [free of Jews] in Jerusalem.” In 1992, the LABOR PARTY came to power, and, though Yitzhak Rabin did not accelerate the settlement drive in the Old City, he did nothing to undo changes already introduced under the Likud. Rabin, in fact, shared the broad Israeli consensus regarding the permanence of Jewish rule over East Jerusalem and the need to Judaize it. He stated repeatedly that “united Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty will remain our capital forever. For us it is the heart and soul of the Jewish people.” As Cheshin, Hutman, and Melamed observe, “the new [Rabin] government took virtually no steps to put an end to the wrongdoing and to discipline or prosecute those involved. . . . None of the recommendations of the [Klugman] committee were implemented.”

See also ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION; JERUSALEM; JEWISH NATIONAL FUND; SASSON REPORT; SETTLEMENTS; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM.

Bibliography

- Abramowitz, Leah. "Jerusalem Forest." The Jerusalem Post. 14 April 1976.
- Abu Shamseyeh, Haleem. "Settling the Old City: The Policies of Labor and Likud." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 6 (1999).
- Aronson, Geoffrey. Settlements and the Israel-Palestinian Negotiations. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1987.
- Ben Arie, Yehoshua. Jerusalem in the 19th Century: The Old City. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984.
- Benvenisti, Meron. Jerusalem, the Torn City. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1976.
- Cheshin, Amir. Municipal Policies in Jerusalem: An Account from Within. Jerusalem: Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA), 1998.
- Cheshin, Amir, Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Dumper, Michael. "Israeli Settlement in the Old City of Jerusalem." Journal of Palestine Studies. 3:4 (1992).
- . Israeli Settler Activities and Claims to Properties in the Muslim Quarter of Jerusalem. London: World of Islam Festival Trust, 1986.
- . The Politics of Jerusalem since 1967. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. "Building Settlements Quietly." Report on Israeli Settlement in the Occupied Territories. 6:1 (1996).
- Friedman, Lara, with Daniel Seidemann. Settlements in Focus: East Jerusalem. New York: Peace Now, and Jerusalem: Ir Amim, 2005.
- Hirschberg, Peter. "Holy War." Jerusalem Report. 4:26 (1994).
- Hirst, David. "Rush to Annexation: Israel in Jerusalem." Journal of Palestine Studies. 3:4 (1974).
- Hodgkins, Allison B. Israeli Settlement Policy in Jerusalem: Facts on the Ground. Jerusalem: PASSIA, 1998.
- Maguire, Kate. The Judaization of Jerusalem. London: Arab Research Centre, 1981.
- Peace Now. "The Absentee Property Law in East Jerusalem: Recent Developments and Their Significance." Ir Amin/Peace Now, 2005. www.ir-amim.org.il/Activities/AbsenteeProperty.html.
- Rubinstein, Danny. "The Settlers Are above the Law." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 8 September 1995.
- Schwartz, Michal. "How the Government and the Settlers Conspire to Take Over Houses and Land: Collusion in Jerusalem." Challenge: A Jerusalem Magazine on the Israeli-Palestine Conflict. 50 (1998).

Susser, Leslie. "The Mayor and the Millionaire." The Jerusalem Report. 8:12 (1997).

Knesset

Israel's parliament, located in JERUSALEM, is the legislative branch of the government. Members are elected on the basis of proportional representation by parties. There are 120 seats, so a party must win 61 seats to govern alone. However, no party has ever garnered enough votes to rule by itself, and thus the majority party in an election must cobble together a coalition to govern.

See also ISRAELI POLITICAL PARTIES AND SETTLEMENTS

Koenig Memorandum, 1976

The Koenig Memorandum was a set of Israeli proposals issued in 1976 for dealing with the "Arab problem." Labeled "top secret," it was written by Israel Koenig, a Polish-born member of Israel's highly conservative NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY and, since 1967, the Interior Ministry's top officer for Galilee. It was sent to Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN on 1 March 1976 and was leaked to the press in September 1976. The report was written in the context of a growing resistance movement among PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL, triggered by the government's plans to expropriate 5,500 acres of Palestinian-owned LAND. The villages of Arraba, Sakhnin, Deir Hanna, and other smaller communities in the Galilee were particularly affected. Thousands of indigenous Palestinians were preparing for a general strike on 30 March 1976, and Israeli authorities were increasingly concerned about the strike and the restiveness of the Palestinians in general.

Koenig's recommendations were aimed at repressing the growing Palestinian movement, plus suggesting long-term solutions. Some of the policy recommendations included reducing the "DEMOGRAPHIC threat" (i.e., countering Palestinian population growth), destroying independent Palestinian leadership (e.g., through DEPORTATIONS or repeated ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTIONS), disrupting Palestinian strength in the economy, redirecting Palestinian education to reduce the numbers of educated Palestinians capable of assuming leadership roles in a nationalist movement, and harsher use of the law under a system of "punishment and reward" to decrease Palestinian participation in nationalist political activities.

Koenig further suggested: "Expand and deepen Jewish settlement in areas where the continuity of Arab population is prominent and where they number considerably more than the Jewish population; examine the possibility of diluting existing Arab population concentrations. Special attention must be paid to the border areas in the country's northwest and to the NAZARETH region. . . . At the same time, a strong and solid Jewish leadership should be fostered in Upper NAZARETH and in ACRE capable of facing the expected crucial developments." Subsequent to this report, Israel undertook an intensive effort to develop an exclusively Jewish Upper Nazareth (NAZARETH ILLIT) that overlooks Palestinian Nazareth.

These recommendations were implemented through the policies of the Misgav Regional Council and the recommendations of the Markovitz Commission, which placed the agricultural land and natural resources of the northern region exclusively in the hands of Jewish settlers and directly intervened through urban planning to stop the growth of Palestinian villages and to demolish some of the existing ones.

The Koenig Memorandum also discussed the "danger" of a Palestinian labor force capable of exacting a cost on the Israeli economy through strikes and other methods. Koenig called for strategic reductions in Arab labor and economic strength in key areas because, "by [Arabs] having significant control over various spheres of the economy there is the possibility of striking or of non-cooperation and thus causing serious damage to the economy and the state, and especially political damage by emphasizing their strength as a factor in the country's economy. . . . The number of Arab employees [in any firm] should not exceed 20 percent. . . . [It is necessary to] reach a settlement with central marketing factors of various consumer goods that would neutralize and encumber Arab agents, particularly in the northern areas, in order to avoid dependence of the Jewish population on those agents, especially in times of emergency."

At the same time, the report recommended the deliberate creation of a parallel Palestinian opposition leadership aimed at undercutting effective resistance to Israel and providing an "escape valve" for the repression. Specifically, Koenig recommended denying RAKAH (Communist Party of Israel) its "priority" in carrying out a national struggle for Palestinian equality in Israel and in representing Israeli Arabs and advocated providing a safety valve for communities still "sitting on the fence," by establishing a "sister Labor Party." "The establishment," Koenig declared, "has to prepare itself to maintain covert presence and control in that [sister] party." Additionally, the memorandum said that the Palestinian citizens of Israel were "a cancer in the Jewish body that had to be curbed and contained" and argued for a policy of "terror, ASSASSINATION, intimidation, land confiscation, and the cutting of all social services to rid the Galilee of its Arab population."

The Koenig Memorandum led to a wave of Israeli confiscations of Palestinian land and the establishment of Jewish settlements known as mitzpin (lookouts) in the Galilee. The net effect of these policies resulted in increasing general strikes and protests by Israeli Arabs. On 30 March 1976, Palestinians held widespread demonstrations, called "LAND DAY," throughout the Galilee to protest Israel's seizures of land. The police responded with violence, killing six unarmed Palestinian youths, wounding another 100 activists, and arresting over 300 people. The protests and the authorities' response highlighted the Israeli government's strategy of yehud ha-galil (Judaizing the Galilee), which was a clandestine program until 1976, when it was openly adopted as a slogan of the Israeli Housing Ministry.

See also PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Bibliography

- Arab Association for Human Rights. "Land and Planning Policy in Israel." n.d. www.arabhra.org/factsheets/factsheet2.htm.
- Falah, Ghazi. "Israeli 'Judaization' Policy in Galilee." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:4 (1991).
- al-Hamishmar*. "Koenig Memorandum." 7 September 1976.
- Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel, 1948–1966, 2nd ed. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1976.
- Koenig, Israel. "The Koenig Report: Top Secret: Memorandum-Proposal: Handling the Arabs of Israel." Full report. Journal of Palestine Studies. 6:1 (1976). (Translated from the Hebrew. Originally published in SWASIA. 3:41 [15 October 1976].)
- Lustick, Ian. Arabs in the Jewish State. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1980.
- Sa'di, Ahmad. "The Koenig Report and Israeli Policy towards the Palestinian Minority, 1965–1976: Old Wine in New Bottles." Arab Studies Quarterly. Summer 2003.

Kollek, Teddy (Theodor) (1911–2007)

Teddy Kollek was an Israeli civil servant and long-time mayor of JERUSALEM from 1965 to 1993. Born in Vienna, he was active in the HeHalutz pioneering movement and immigrated to Palestine in 1934. During World War II, he served abroad in many capacities, one of which involved meeting with high-ranking Nazi Adolf Eichmann and arranging for the transfer of 3,000 Jewish youth to England. From 1940 to 1947, Kollek worked with the JEWISH AGENCY in Europe, maintaining close contact with the Jewish underground movement in Palestine, including both the militant Zionist groups IRGUN and LEHI, and he was active in the Berihá (Flight; an underground operation conducted from 1944 to 1949 to move Jews from Europe to Israel, largely through means of illegal IMMIGRATION). He also represented the HAGANA in Washington and, despite the US arms embargo on Palestine, helped to amass essential ammunition for the Jewish underground military organization. Kollek served as minister to Washington early in the 1950s but, at the request of DAVID BEN-GURION, returned to Israel in 1952 to head the prime minister's office, where he remained until 1964. He was founder and director of the Israel Museum, the national museum complex, which he felt was essential to Jerusalem's political prestige as a capital city. In 1965, Kollek was elected mayor of Jerusalem and served in that office for the next twenty-eight years.

As mayor, Kollek did more to Judaize Jerusalem than any other single individual. His policy toward the city had four interrelated objectives: (1) to rapidly expand the Jewish population in the extended Greater East Jerusalem, (2) to hinder the growth of the Palestinian population, (3) to induce Palestinian residents to move out of the city into the WEST BANK, and (4) to surround East Jerusalem with a barrier of Jewish SETTLEMENTS separating it from the Palestinian population of the West Bank.

To realize these ends, Kollek used ZONING LAWS AND REGULATIONS aimed against Palestinians; strict limits on construction of new Palestinian housing; denial of basic municipal services to Palestinian areas (i.e., WATER, sanitation, electricity, trash collection, ROAD pavement and maintenance, parks and sports facilities, and adequate schools); subsidization of housing for Jewish families in East Jerusalem; expropriation of Palestinian land (23,378 dunums—about 5,800 acres—over twenty-five years) for construction of eleven Jewish settlements that closed a “ring” around Arab Jerusalem; and the construction of housing units in the West Bank to lure Palestinian residents out of the city. Of his DEMOGRAPHIC policy, Kollek once said: “Like all of us here, it seems to me, I am worried about the balance of forces and about the Arab growth within Jerusalem and around Jerusalem.”

B'TSELEM writes in this regard, “Official documents of the Jerusalem Municipality and statements made by [Kollek and] the Israeli policymakers demonstrate that the urban development has been dictated chiefly by national-political considerations intended to achieve one central goal: to create a demographic and geographic reality that would pre-empt any future attempt to challenge Israeli sovereignty over East Jerusalem.”

By 1996 some 157,000 Jews had moved into East Jerusalem, almost matching the 171,000 Palestinians then living there. This demographic change is particularly notable given the far higher birthrate of the Palestinian population, yet the overall population balance in the whole city remained about the same as in 1967: approximately 71 percent Jewish and 29 percent Palestinian.

Israelis generally, and certainly Mayor Kollek, understood the political importance of presenting their policies in a humane and gentle light, and Kollek was a master at persuading visitors to Jerusalem and the international public as a whole that his administration was acting with enlightenment and compassion toward the Palestinians of the city. He understood the risks Israel ran by not doing more to improve the Palestinian standard of living and repeatedly but unsuccessfully tried to obtain more resources for East Jerusalem by promoting the international Jerusalem Fund and appealing to a succession of Israeli prime ministers from GOLDA MEIR to YITZHAK RABIN. At the same time, he failed to allocate a proportional share of his regular budget to the Palestinian neighborhoods. In 1990 and on the mayor's behalf, Foreign Ministry director general Reuven Merhav conducted a historical analysis of the city budget, which illustrated that Palestinians had been allocated 2 to 12 percent of the budgets of the various municipal departments, although they comprised 28 percent of the population of Jerusalem. Kollek shelved the report and, when queried about services for the Palestinian residents of the city, declared: “I am seeing to the Jewish majority . . . the majority in Jerusalem. That is why we are here, to see to that.”

Kollek's mismanagement of Jerusalem during his twenty-eight years as mayor is reflected in this comment of Amir Cheshin, Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed, three former officials who worked closely with him: “Do not believe the propaganda the rosy picture Israel tries to show the world of life in Jerusalem since the 1967 reunification. Israel has treated the Palestinians of Jerusalem terribly. As a matter of policy, it has forced many of them from their homes and stripped them of their land, all the while lying to them and deceiving them and the world about its honorable intentions. And what makes all this so much more inexcusable is that there was no reason for it. Governing Jerusalem properly would not have jeopardized Israel's claim to the city. Indeed, it likely would have eased the growing conflict over Jerusalem's future. That massive error in judgment, we believe, is the tragedy of Israel's rule in East Jerusalem since 1967." In his final and unsuccessful campaign for reelection in 1993, Kollek was eighty-two years old and wanted to retire, but Yitzhak Rabin urged him to run in order to save the Jerusalem portfolio for the LABOR PARTY.

See also FAMILY REUNIFICATION; GREATER JERUSALEM; JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM.

Bibliography

- Amir, Shaul, Rachel Alterman, and Amnon Frankel. Evaluation of the Expected Effects of the Proposal to Expand the Borders of Jerusalem Westward. Tel Aviv: Center for Urban and Regional Research, The Technion—Israel Institute of Technology, 1990.
- Amirav, Moshe. Israel's Policy in Jerusalem since 1967. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Center on Conflict and Negotiation, 1992.
- Benvenisti, Meron. City of Stone: The Hidden History of Jerusalem. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- . "City with a Wall at Its Center." Ariel: A Journal on the Land of Israel. (Hebrew). 44–45 (March 1986).
- . Jerusalem: A Study of a Polarized Society. Jerusalem: West Bank Data Base Project, 1983.
- . The Torn City. Jerusalem: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1973.
- . The West Bank Handbook: Settlements, State and Society. Jerusalem: Cana, 1987.
- Cheshin, Amir. "East Jerusalem—Policy versus Reality." The New East. (Hebrew). 34 (1992).
- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Felner, Eitan. A Policy of Discrimination: Land Expropriation, Planning and Building in East Jerusalem: Comprehensive Report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1995.
- Greenwood, Christopher. "The Administration of Occupied Territory in International Law." In International Law and the Administration of Occupied Territories. Edited by Emma Playfair. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Haber, E. Expected Changes in the Population Distribution and in the Ratio between Jews and Non-Jews until the Twenty-first Century, in the Light of Trends in Population Growth and Existing Housing Data. Jerusalem: Building and Housing Ministry, 1986.
- Khamaiseh, Ghassem. Planning and Housing among Arabs in Israel. Tel Aviv: International Center for Peace in the Middle East, 1990.
- Kimhi, Israel. "An Overview of the Development of Jerusalem 1988–1993." In Twenty-five Years of the City's Unification: Chapters in Jerusalem's Urban Geography. (Hebrew). Jerusalem: The Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, 1993.
- Kollek, Teddy. For Jerusalem: A Life. New York: Random House, 1977.
- . "Sharing United Jerusalem." Foreign Affairs. Winter (1988–89).
- Olmert, Ehud. Background Document for Discussion before the Ministerial Committee for Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Ministry of Housing, 25 October 1994.
- Peres, Shimon. Letter from Foreign Minister Peres to Norwegian Foreign Minister Johan Jorgen Holst, October 11, 1993. Jerusalem: Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1993.
- Rabinovich, Abraham. Teddy Kollek, Builder of Jerusalem. Jewish Publication Society of America, 1995.
- Sha'ar, Shlomit. "Ministry of the Interior, Planning Department. Summary of Meeting Held on 21 March 1988 Concerning 'North Jerusalem Town Planning Scheme 3000a,' Recorded by Ministry of the Interior Planning Department and the Finance Ministry Economic Planning Authority." Plan for the Geographical Distribution of an Israeli Population of Five Million, vol. 2. Jerusalem: Ministry of Interior Planning Department, 1988.
- Shepherd, Naomi. Teddy Kollek, Mayor of Jerusalem. New York: HarperCollins, 1988.
- Steinberg, Natalie. "Background Paper on Federalism and the Question of Jerusalem." World Federalist Movement, 2001.

Kook, Rabbi Avraham Yitzhak HaCohen (1865–1935)

Rabbi Avraham Kook is considered by many to have been the spiritual father of ZIONISM. He is indisputably the father of "Religious Zionism," an ideology combining Zionism and Judaism, which views the Zionist project within a religious framework. The first ASHKENAZI chief rabbi of Palestine, Kook was highly influential in bringing Orthodox Jews to the secular Zionist movement. The outbreak of World War I caught him in Europe, and he was forced to remain in London and Switzerland for the remainder of the war. While there, he was involved in the activities that led to the British BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine.

Born in Latvia, Rabbi Kook immigrated to Palestine in 1904, where he initially served as chief rabbi of JAFFA. In 1921 the British appointed him to the office of the chief rabbinate of Palestine, which he believed was the first step toward the reconstitution of the Sanhedrin, the highest judicial and ecclesiastical council of the ancient Jewish nation. Rabbi Kook believed that the return of the Jews to ERETZ YISRAEL (the biblical land) was the beginning of the divine redemption and thus participated in a range of Zionist activities aimed at those ends. Unlike other members of the Orthodoxy who shunned the Zionist movement because of its secular and materialist nature, Kook embraced all Jews, arguing that secular Jews have a distinct role in the divine plan. Most Orthodox Jews, especially in the early days of Zionism, believed that THEODOR HERZL, the father of political Zionism, and his comrades were heretics and that the Jews would return to Zion only when God wanted them to. Kook's important contribution to this argument was to see in Herzl not a heretic working against God but a man unknowingly guided by God. It was God, Kook argued, who placed Zionism in the hearts of the disbelieving.

In the Yishuv and, after 1948, in Israel, Rabbi Kook played an important role in the infusion of religion into politics. Within a short time after the issuance of the Balfour Declaration, Kook founded the Degel Yerushalayim (Banner of Jerusalem) organization, which aimed to introduce the rules of Halakha (Jewish law) and religion into the Jewish renaissance in Palestine. In March 1924 he made his first visit to the UNITED STATES to attend a Zionist conference held in New York. After the 1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES, Rabbi Kook became highly critical of the British for not being supportive enough of the Jews.

In 1924 Kook established a yeshiva in JERUSALEM (later known as MERCAZ HARAV and headed by his son), which has since produced many of the most messianic WEST BANK settlers—for example, MOSHE LEVINGER, David Sampson, Moshe Feiglin, Benzi Lieberman, and the GUSH EMUNIM movement. Graduates of Kook's yeshiva tend to be active in the education of youth in the Bnei Akiva Yeshivot and in the religious Zionist movement. When Rabbi Kook died, his son, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook, continued to run the yeshiva and to strongly support the SETTLEMENT movement.

Rabbi Kook's legacy is found in the religious Zionist movement and in JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST circles that flourish today. Most religious Zionists are right-wing politically and belong to the Mafdal (NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY), LIKUD, and NATIONAL UNION. Many of the religious Zionists are settlers in Jerusalem, the West Bank, and, prior to 2005, the Gaza Strip.

See also GUSH EMUNIM; JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM

Bibliography

- Agus, Jacob B. Banner of Jerusalem: The Life, Times, and Thought of Abraham Isaac Kook, the Late Chief Rabbi of Palestine. New York: Bloch Publishing Co., 1946.
- Ben Zion, Bokser. Abraham Isaac Kook: The Lights of Penitence, The Moral Principles, Lights of Holiness, Essays, Letters, and Poems. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1978.
- Elkins, Dov Peretz. Shepherd of Jerusalem: A Biography of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson, 1995.
- Gellman, Ezra, ed. Essays on the Thought and Philosophy of Rabbi Kook. Madison, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1991.
- Goldberg, Jeffrey. "Among the Settlers: Will They Destroy Israel?" The New Yorker. 31 May 2004.
- Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

Kuwait

The relationship between the state of Kuwait and the Palestinian people is a tortuous tale of two emerging nations. With the intertwining of regional strategies for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, for several decades their political, economic, and communal lives were compatible and mutually reinforcing. However, relations were strained in the 1980s and were ruptured entirely after the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait in 1990–1991. It was more than a decade before the two sides formally reconciled and reestablished a cool friendship that is a faint echo of times past.

In the period from the late 1940s to the mid-1980s, both societies were transformed. From a peripheral city-state languishing under a British protectorate, Kuwait became a sophisticated independent modern nation-state, a transformation funded by mounting infusions of oil export revenues and accompanied by a blossoming sense of native Kuwaiti national identity. In contrast,

Palestine was the most developed of the British-mandated states in the Middle East but when the state of Israel was created in 1948, Palestinian society was fragmented, impoverished, and dispersed. The Palestinians who fled Israel began to rebuild their society and national identity in the DIASPORA, especially in the rapidly growing oil-exporting economies such as Kuwait, where their professional abilities and industriousness were needed and appreciated. As Shafeeq Ghabra, president of the American University of Kuwait, sums it up: "In Kuwait, Palestinians provided . . . labor, skills, and know-how and had a decisive impact on the country's development process. In return, they found in Kuwait protection, employment, mobility, and the opportunity to re-knit their social fabric."

Regional Strategies and Politics

A small, vulnerable state after independence in 1961, Kuwait set its sights on winning recognition and respect in the region and the world at large. Through its political and economic activities, Kuwait exerted a moderating influence on both its radical and conservative neighbors and actively worked to mediate regional conflicts. The Kuwaiti government used part of its surplus oil revenues to promote integrated economic development in the Arab world. Using low-interest loans from the Kuwait Fund for Arab Economic Development (KFAED), Kuwait invested in other developing Arab economies and used direct aid from current government revenues to award gifts to the new republican regimes in EGYPT, IRAQ, and Algeria; to the emerging Palestinian nationalist movement; and to the UNITED NATIONS Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees (UNRWA). It also provided reconstruction aid to the "confrontation states" of JORDAN, Egypt, and SYRIA after the 1967 WAR and 1973 War, and financial backing to Iraq for the war with IRAN in the 1980s.

Meanwhile, the Palestinians began to regroup through reconstituted, broadly defined family units, village and town self-help organizations, and associations for charitable purposes and promotion of common interests. By the early 1960s, these associations grew into the building blocks for national political organizations and a new Palestinian national consciousness. YASIR ARAFAT, then an engineer working in Kuwait, was part of an emerging and influential group of young professional Palestinians (including SALAH KHALAF, KHALIL AL-WAZIR, KHALID AL-HASAN, YUSIF AL-MUHAM-MAD NAJJAR, and KAMAL 'UDWAN) who at the end of the 1950s founded FATAH, the first major guerrilla organization. In 1968, Fatah joined the Egyptian-sponsored, ARAB LEAGUE-created PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), and in 1969 assumed the leadership role in the PLO. Fatah, with its political headquarters in Kuwait, remained the PLO's main faction. By 1969, Kuwait had become a key nexus for an international network of popular Palestinian organizations providing essential services to refugee populations across the region and material support for the liberation movement.

From the 1960s to the 1980s, Kuwait was vocal in its commitment to Arab solidarity and the Palestinian cause. It aimed to neutralize the radicalism of its immediate neighbors, whom it feared much more than distant Israel, and to respond to pressures from its own internal Arab nationalist and other opposition movements. Although Kuwait's rulers maintained close relations with moderate Palestinian leaders such as Arafat, they pledged to promote justice for Palestinians in a homeland of their own and to aid them in resettling there. Among Arab countries, Kuwait was the most tolerant of the Palestinian liberation movement and supportive of the reconstruction of its society in exile, but only if it reinforced rather than threatened its monarchy. On one hand, though the Arab countries as a group did not recognize the PLO as the official representative of the Palestinian people until 1974, Kuwait had already allowed popular Palestinian organizations and Fatah to flourish in its territory for over a decade. On the other hand, the government systematically curbed Palestinian militancy—from deporting the organizers of oil workers' strikes in the 1950s to prohibiting the presence of the radical PLO factions until the onset in 1987 of the INTIFADA (uprising in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES). The monarchy forbade Palestinian interference in its internal affairs and the mounting of military activity from its territory. In the 1970s, the Palestinians' role in the civil wars in Jordan and then in LEBANON led the Kuwaiti government to increase its control over their growing militancy.

With regard to international relations, Kuwait's support for the Palestinians was similarly mixed. It spoke on the Palestinians' behalf in international forums—for example, at the United Nations in 1974 and 1988 to argue the case for a state of their own, and tried unsuccessfully to lobby the Jimmy CARTER administration about the issue in the late 1970s. Kuwait offered symbolic military gestures to the Palestinians during the wars of 1967 and 1973; led the oil boycott of the UNITED STATES in 1973; and tried to mediate the conflict between Jordan and the Palestinian guerrillas in 1970, suspending aid to Jordan from 1970 to 1973 after mediation efforts failed. The Kuwaiti government refused more than once to accept the credentials of US diplomats who had previously served in Israel. In contrast, Kuwait did not intervene when the MARONITES and the Syrian army defeated the PLO in the battle of Tel Za'tar in Lebanon in 1976. Again, in 1982, no Arab country, including Kuwait, intervened when the Israeli army overcame fierce Palestinian resistance and drove the guerrillas out of Lebanon. However, when a chastened PLO reemerged as a unified national organization in 1987, the government donated land in Kuwait City for an embassy of the Palestine-to-be and taxed all public employees a day's pay during an approved general strike as a communal donation to the Intifada.

Of Arab donors, Kuwait was the most generous in terms of financial, material, and educational aid to the Palestinians, both inside the Occupied Territories and in the Diaspora. The Kuwaiti government itself gave a total of almost $892 million to the PLO over the 1964–1989 period, amounting to about 3 percent of its total aid to all recipients and not including Kuwait's contributions to other Palestinian organizations or causes. In addition, from the late 1940s through the late 1980s, a private Kuwaiti People's Committee actively raised funds for refugee relief and education projects, including the work of UNRWA and to support the Intifada.

Kuwait considered Jordan a deserving recipient of development loans from the KFAED because it was a "confrontation state," a haven for large numbers of Palestinians from both the 1948 WAR and 1967 War, and the only host country that offered citizenship to the majority of its REFUGEE population. Jordan had inherited a relatively efficient British civil service, also staffed by Palestinians and similar to Kuwait's, that worked well with KFAED. Kuwait's loans to Jordan over the 1962–1975 period amounted to about $50 million for INFRASTRUCTURE and economic projects, such as JORDAN RIFT VALLEY irrigation, electricity, and the phosphate industry. The relationship with Jordan also served Kuwait's moderating political agenda, and KFAED allowed its investment projects there to continue uninterrupted from 1970 to 1973, even as direct aid was suspended.

Population, Labor Force, and Migration

From 1946 to 1990, the population of Kuwait increased by a factor of more than twenty—from about 90,000 to 2,130,000. Although the native Kuwaiti population maintained a high rate of natural increase, augmented by the settling of tribal nomads, growth came disproportionately from expatriates, whose share of the total population passed the 50 percent level around 1960 and rose to a peak of 73.5 percent in 1990. This growth was due to the seemingly bottomless demand for imported labor in the rapidly expanding economy. In 1963, for example, the state had just four Kuwaiti physicians and no qualified Kuwaiti nurses or health inspectors. In the early decades, when there were not enough qualified Kuwaiti workers to meet this demand, Kuwait drew labor from Arab countries where the educational system was already modern—Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan, and Palestine—to fill its second-level positions in the professional civil service and private sector. In 1963, foreigners accounted for almost 100 percent of professionals, 95 percent of teachers (almost half of them female), and 80 percent of oil workers. As a 1965 World Bank report put it, "Without these foreign officials and employees, the business of government simply could not be done" and the economy would grind to a halt.

In the later decades, the demand for imported labor continued to grow as Kuwaiti citizens were given special economic privileges, such as guaranteed employment in the public sector and subsidies for the relatively risk-free establishment of private business. Despite a public policy of Kuwaitization, Kuwaitis constituted just 8 percent of an industrial workforce of 43,000 persons in 1976 and only 6 percent, instead of the desired 25 percent, of employees in joint stock companies. By the late 1970s it was clear to Kuwaiti analysts that economic development would have taken twice as long without foreign labor.

As employers continued to import readily available skilled workers from poorer countries with low-cost surplus labor, the proportion of non-nationals in the workforce stabilized at about 82 percent through the 1980s. In 1988, a typical foreign employee worked 30 percent more hours than a Kuwaiti for less than half the pay. Stratified by job type, the non-nationals formed socially homogeneous, endogamous communities by national origin. Until the mid-1980s, Arabs were better integrated and more privileged in the labor market than were other foreign workers. Palestinians and Jordanians were concentrated in the technical, production, transport, and professional occupations, while 65 percent of teachers were Egyptian or Palestinian. Agricultural work was done by Iranians living in primitive conditions, construction jobs were filled by Korean contract labor living in segregated work camps, and the lower ranks of a burgeoning service sector were filled by South Asians.

Palestinian Migration to Kuwait. Palestinians formed the oldest, largest, and most settled expatriate community in Kuwait. In the peak year, 1990, between 450,000 and 510,000 persons of Palestinian origin and/or Jordanian citizenship were estimated to reside in Kuwait—about one-fourth of the total population. Like other expatriates, single Palestinian males and females had first come to Kuwait to work, but soon came to settle as families. The proportion of females in the foreign population rose from one-fifth in 1957 to over two-fifths in 1975, as non-Kuwaiti females had a higher labor force participation rate than Kuwaiti females and as Palestinian families arrived after each war, in 1948, 1956, 1967, 1970, 1973, 1976, and 1982. By 1990, Palestinians were only 13 percent of the foreign labor force but accounted for more than one-third of the total expatriate population, and more than two-thirds of all expatriate families.

The British had encouraged their Gulf protectorates, especially Kuwait, to offer refuge to Palestinians after the establishment of Israel, thus helping to relieve the pressure to resolve the Israel-Palestinian conflict after the end of the BRITISH MANDATE. The British advised Kuwait to allow Palestinians to immigrate freely for work purposes but not to reside there permanently. They helped Kuwait to fashion legal restrictions on the various émigré populations, including Palestinians, through the use of visas, security checks, “no objection” certificates, and the kafalah system for control of work PERMITS, including the requirement that employers repatriate workers whose contracts were terminated. Such controls would keep the various expatriate groups from banding together in common economic or political cause and, especially in the turbulent 1980s, keep them separate from discontented domestic groups like the Shiia.

In the early decades there were three rounds of Palestinian migration to Kuwait. The first migrants in the 1940s were the relatively young and freshly educated intelligentsia, who took up posts as civil servants, teachers, doctors, engineers, accountants, military officers, businessmen, and academics. The second round began in the early 1950s, as less educated camp-dwellers, mainly displaced peasants with little experience in urban wage labor, responded to the need for unskilled labor in Kuwait. Lacking proper travel documents and work permits, they made the long and perilous journey to Kuwait by way of “the underground railroad” through Syria and Iraq. Most entered Kuwait illegally but were helped by veterans of the earlier round in finding work and eventually getting permission to stay. At the end of the 1950s, the Kuwaiti government ended visa requirements for Arab workers, and another round of Palestinians entered legally. As family members joined them, the relative permanency of the Palestinian community generated a growing demand for locally produced goods and services that served to stabilize and stimulate Kuwait’s domestic economy.

Kuwaitis had long held a special respect for Palestinians, especially in the field of education. As early as 1936, a delegation of Palestinian educators was invited to mount a mission to Kuwait to help set up the first public schools. In 1937 two Palestinian female teachers came to teach at a girls’ school established by a group of progressive merchants, and each year more teachers of both genders arrived. After the Palestinians fled Israel in 1948, the Kuwaiti government saw it as a national duty to appoint Palestinian teachers and administrators to fill the growing number of posts in what became a free and mandatory system of education. As of 1964, Palestinians constituted 50 percent of the total teaching profession in Kuwait, although this proportion gradually decreased to 25 percent in 1977–1978 as Kuwaiti teachers began to graduate from training colleges—a shift that also suited the growing Kuwaiti sense of patriotic pride in its own national heritage.

As compared to Palestinians who became refugees in adjacent countries, those who moved voluntarily to distant Kuwait came in response to economic opportunity. In the early decades, the Kuwaitis treated them with respect as professionals and workers. Although unique in its own social and political heritage, Kuwait had been a backwater in the Arab world, so Palestinians, and to a lesser degree other Arabs, were able to transform Kuwaiti culture and politics. By 1975, Palestinians were found in all sectors of the economy and played a key role in important industries such as oil. The civil service employed 21,000 Palestinians and the remainder were in professional and skilled occupations. Palestinians comprised more than one-third of accountants, physicians, and pharmacists, and more than one-fourth of engineers and nurses. Until Kuwaitization took hold in the 1980s, as new graduates left Kuwait University, Palestinians found mobility in the Kuwaiti economic structure, and Kuwait became the Palestinians' "commercial capital." More than half were in private business, usually with the requisite Kuwaiti partners, and some of these firms grew large and operated on an international scale—for example, Consolidated Contractors Company.

Palestinian Community and Nation Building

The first Palestinians to find employment in Kuwait and other countries in the Gulf region were from an educated and professional middle-class background, not from the traditional Palestinian landed elite or pre-1948 political class. Pride in their educational and professional accomplishments, and the extensive regionwide network they built, helped them blossom into the leadership of a nationalist movement that reflected a critical transformation in Palestinian society and a new political conception of Palestine, to which they yearned to return.

In Kuwait, Palestinian communal life recreated and transformed the imagined traditional society of the homeland. As Ghabra put it, Palestinians "from all parts of Palestine, from all social classes, from different religious backgrounds, and from all major families, villages, and towns" were mixed together in this growing community where "even the dialects, feuds, poetry, and dances survived." Working relationships, communal school experience, friendships, and even marriages crossed class and local lines as Palestinian national identity trumped the more old-fashioned identities based on clans or families. The necessity of pooling resources for emergencies or education or big events like marriages led to the reinvention of extended family funds and of village and town associations drawing on resources locally and from abroad. These organizations created cultural centers, where folklore and Palestinian tradition were reconstructed, and sponsored children's visits to grandparents in the WEST BANK, for example, to instill in them the idea of the homeland. The links grew into networks that broadened the extended family and overlapped with each other, enhancing nationalist consciousness among members living in different countries. In valuing hard work, education, and communal solidarity, including support for the families left behind, and in practicing endogamy, the Palestinians came to resemble Jewish and Armenian communities in the Diaspora.

More than any other Arab country, Kuwait allowed the Palestinian community to pursue nation building through community projects, fundraising, and political organizing. When the Kuwaiti public school system did not have the capacity to absorb the large number of children from Palestinian refugee families after the 1967 War, the PLO was allowed to run its own schools in Kuwaiti public school buildings after hours, with one-third of the cost covered by the government. Palestinians openly selected delegates to the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (the parliament of the PLO) and freely solicited private contributions for the Palestinian Red Crescent and the PALESTINE NATIONAL FUND. The Kuwaiti government even enabled the Palestine National Fund to raise funds routinely through a two-tiered income tax on Palestinians employed in the public sector—5 percent on higher incomes and 3 percent on lower incomes—for a total of $122.5 million over twenty-five years.

It was in Kuwait that the Palestinian popular organizations for women, workers, students, teachers, and HEALTH CARE—each with its own dynamic but affiliated with the PLO—were the longest-lived and best organized. Furthermore, the Kuwaiti counterparts of these organizations provided support at critical junctures both inside and outside Kuwait. As Brand put it, the Palestinians in Kuwait became "one of the most cohesive and active communities in the Diaspora." The political and social functions provided by these organizations in Kuwait, and across the Arab world, were strong enough that they could not be crushed even as the liberation movement confronted major setbacks in Jordan, Lebanon, and the Occupied Territories.

Social Conditions of Palestinians in Kuwait. Migration policy toward the Palestinians and other foreign communities evolved in the context of Kuwaiti nationalist politics and the growing disparity in power and privilege between Kuwaiti citizens and “the other” in their midst. As early as 1959, laws were passed that made naturalization of resident workers rare, effectively only for Palestinians and limited to those who had “rendered exceptional service” or lived in the country for at least ten years. As of 1975, only 374 Palestinians had been granted Kuwaiti citizenship. Their growing cohesion and distinctive identity, as well as discrimination against them as refugees, discouraged the assimilation of Palestinians by their host societies. This communal insularity was most extreme in Kuwait, where a virtual caste system had been under construction since the advent of oil wealth. Like the Kuwaitis themselves, the various expatriate communities were stratified by longevity of residence and the nature of their contributions to building the modern Kuwaiti economy, with Palestinians at the top, followed by Iraqis, Egyptians and other Arabs, and last, non-Arab unskilled labor. There was little social mobility or intermarriage between the Kuwaitis and non-Kuwaitis, or among the expatriate groups, and the economic and social conditions of the expatriates were kept distinctly inferior to those of citizens.

Palestinians were especially sensitive to economic discrimination, because, unlike other expatriates, they had no home country to return to. They had to accept the appointment or promotion to higher positions of less qualified Kuwaiti university graduates with no experience. They could not start private companies without a Kuwaiti majority partner and could not own land or other immovable property. Their salaries were lower than those of their Kuwaiti counterparts and, other than health care, they had less access to social services. They were frequently reminded of their lower status not only by these forms of institutional discrimination but also by the prejudice and hostility that grew up among Kuwaiti colleagues and landlords in the 1980s.

Except for those few with high salaries and professional or business status, Palestinians were crowded into substandard housing for which they paid high rents to Kuwaiti landlords. They had a higher density—2.6 persons per room—and a larger household size—at 6.4 persons per household—than any other foreign community in Kuwait. They were concentrated in their own ghettos of Hawally, Nuqrah, and Farwaniyyah, with limited public services and segregated from the neighborhoods built for low-income citizens (mostly newly settled tribal people) and neighborhoods in which low-priced land and low-interest mortgages were reserved for high-income Kuwaitis.

Palestinians were allowed to attend the free public schools during some periods, but government policy shifted every few years regarding how many Palestinian children could do so. This was a source of great anxiety to Palestinians, given the value they placed on EDUCATION as their sole movable capital. After the influx of families following the 1967 War, Palestinians could still attend high school without restriction, but the government reduced the quota for non-Kuwaiti students in the primary schools from 25 percent to 10 percent. The PLO and teachers’ union organized community schools, for which the women’s union raised funds privately, but these could not accommodate all the children. Although the government let Palestinians use Kuwaiti public schools for a second shift, government policy on Palestinian school attendance was to shift twice again. Seeing rising Palestinian militancy following the wars in Jordan and Lebanon, the Kuwait government closed down the PLO programs after the 1975–1976 school year and reintegrated Palestinian children into the regular public schools. In the early 1980s, the policy changed again to limit the enrollment of foreigners in the public schools to those whose parents had been in Kuwait since 1963. Although the government then agreed to pay half of private school tuition for the excluded children, the affected Palestinian children were mainly from families who had come after 1967 and were among the poorest in the community. Again, the women’s union had to undertake major fund-raising drives to educate these children.

At the tertiary level, Kuwait University maintained a quota of 10 percent for non-Kuwaiti applicants, but there were many more Palestinian students qualified to attend than could be admitted. Families and cooperative associations pooled their resources to send them to universities elsewhere in the Arab world or to Islamic or socialist countries, usually on scholarship, or even to the United States or Europe. However, this entailed the risk that Palestinian students who left to study abroad would not be allowed back into Kuwait if they tried to return as adults without a work permit.

Despite these restrictions, Palestinians were grateful for the haven Kuwait had provided and remained the most docile and law-abiding of expatriate communities in Kuwait. They even offered to prove their loyalty by defending the country when, in the 1980s, the IRAN-IRAQ WAR threatened Kuwait from without and a rebellion from Kuwait's downtrodden and disenfranchised Shi'a minority threatened from within. To many Palestinians, especially those under thirty years of age who had been born in Kuwait, "Palestine" was a distant abstraction that served only to label their identity. They considered Kuwait their home and longed for the right to permanent residence, if not full citizenship, as the troubled 1980s wore on.

Emerging Contradictions

By the mid-1980s, both the economic and the political environment in Kuwait had changed significantly. The massive infrastructure projects that had made the skilled labor of Arabic speakers so crucial in the 1970s were now completed, and the economic crises of 1982–1983 and 1985–1986 caused by falling oil prices led many Kuwaitis to reason that they could no longer afford the more expensive foreign labor and that costly social services should be reserved for citizens alone. When Finance and Planning Minister Abd-el-Latif al-Hamad advocated a plan to make "Kuwait more socially balanced" by charging fees for services to all who could afford them, reducing the disparities between citizens and noncitizens, and loosening naturalization law—a plan not unlike what had been proposed by the World Bank twenty years earlier—the uproar among Kuwaitis forced his resignation.

Instead, the government tightened its political surveillance of the expatriate communities, especially Arabs, and, in November 1982, deported 25,000 persons as illegal aliens. In 1984, stricter rules for work permits in the private sector were imposed by all the Gulf countries in common, requiring renewal every two years, without which expatriate workers could not be reemployed in or move to the private sector without first leaving the country and applying for a new permit from abroad. Those caught without permits were summarily deported. Because Arab workers expected better economic treatment and were politically vocal, employers shifted to importing a higher proportion of labor from South and East Asia. Whereas Arabs had accounted for over 80 percent of the foreign population in 1975, this proportion gradually declined to 61 percent in 1990.

The diverse contributions of Palestinians that had been welcomed warmly in the 1960s were appreciated less in the 1970s, and very little by the mid-1980s, as Kuwaiti nationalism and Kuwaitization came into full bloom. The emerging Kuwaiti educated middle class was anxious to overcome its dependence on foreigners and to take over positions of responsibility. Many Kuwaitis came to view Palestinians as just another segment of the temporary migrant labor force and were less inclined than ever to assimilate them into Kuwaiti society proper. As Al-Moosa put it, "Because of their large numbers and their strategic location in the government, the professions, and business, Palestinians gradually became suspect as Kuwaitis strove to come to terms with and address their continuing position as a minority in their own country."

For their part, Palestinians felt increasingly unappreciated and constrained. The strictures on their economic role were tightened, for example, by the 1985 law that required government contractors to hire Kuwaitis for at least 15 percent of their managerial positions and 30 percent of their lower-level positions. Frustrated and fearful, Palestinians began to send as much of their income as possible abroad, to invest in their children's university education, and to purchase property and set up savings accounts in Jordan, Europe, and North America. In the mid-1980s, Palestinians comprised about 15 percent of the foreign labor force but were transferring out of Kuwait between one-third and one-half of total foreign remittances, inadvertently worsening Kuwait's economic recessions in 1982–1983 and 1986 by reducing demand for domestically produced output.

Several violent events in the mid-1980s frightened Kuwaitis, including Islamist militants bombing seaside resorts and mounting an assassination attempt on the emir, whose regime feared that these domestic threats were tied to the ambitions of the new Islamic republic in Iran. After the PLO's expulsion from Lebanon, the radical Palestinian factions became more active and militant in many Arab countries, blaming the defeat of the PLO on Fatah's domination of the organization. In Kuwait, Fatah assisted the government in monitoring and controlling the militants, but it was difficult to prevent their influence from spreading to Kuwaiti youth, and Fatah stood aside as the government deported several dozen Palestinian militants for political activities threatening to the regime.

Thus long before Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, Kuwaiti policy had clearly turned against importing Arab labor and allowing immigration and permanent residence of foreign families. The proportion of Arabs in the labor force and of females and dependents in the non-national population declined, and the sense of common purpose among Arabs in Kuwait eroded. On the domestic side, Kuwait had yet to find a way to resolve the contradiction between its deep structural need for employable labor and its national ambition to be independent of the migrant workers, especially Palestinians, who provided that labor. On the international side, Kuwait and other Gulf countries began to realign their political orientation away from the Arab region and toward an alliance with the United States. By the end of the Iran-Iraq War in 1988, Kuwait was purchasing large quantities of US-made arms, such as aircraft, tanks, missiles, and bombs.

Crisis of 1990–1991 and Its Aftermath

At the time of the Iraqi invasion in 1990, more than 73 percent of the total population of 2.1 million was non-Kuwaiti, and the vast majority viewed the occupation as a personal and social disaster. Few had sympathy for the occupiers, whose brutality and destruction they witnessed firsthand. Many, Palestinians in particular, joined the anti-Iraq resistance and, at the behest of the Kuwaiti government-in-exile, kept essential services in operation for people living under the occupation. However, whatever goodwill Kuwaiti Palestinians earned in the resistance was soon swamped by the political miscalculations of the PLO and the king of Jordan. From his perch atop the exiled PLO in Tunis, Arafat endorsed the Iraqi occupation, and many Palestinians in the Occupied Territories demonstrated their support in the streets, believing that Iraqi president Saddam Husayn would make good on his promise to become the new SALADIN and liberate them from Israeli domination. At the same time, Jordan, a country as economically dependent on Iraq as it was on Kuwait, professed neutrality regarding the occupation.

Many Kuwaitis felt betrayed and, after liberation in March 1991, the Kuwaiti government let loose severe reprisals in political, financial, and, most importantly, communal relations. It severed both its political relations with and financial backing for the PLO, as did SAUDI ARABIA and other Arab states. Furthermore, by June 1992, Kuwait cut all aid to Jordan and other countries that had failed to join the US-led coalition against Iraq. It redirected its financial resources away from regional aid and investment into domestic reconstruction and armaments, now formally aligning with the United States as its chief trading partner and military guarantor. Kuwait abandoned the decades-old Arab boycott of firms that did business with Israel, due to “considerations of national interest,” and imported from Israel what it deemed essential to its reconstruction program.

In 1991 the restored Kuwait government took its revenge on the expatriate communities. In the name of rooting out collaborators, police, military, and vigilante forces used arbitrary detention, torture, murder, and deportation to punish “suspect” foreigners, after mock military trials in some cases and no trials in most cases. The groups targeted for this collective punishment were mainly noncitizen Arabs who had remained behind when most Kuwaitis fled, notably Palestinians, Iraqis, and the bidun (longtime undocumented residents of Kuwait), despite clear evidence that many had served with honor in the anti-Iraq resistance.

Mass expulsions soon followed. As of September 1991 more than 1,500 workers were deported, often with their wives and children and most often across the border into Iraq, with no food, water, or shelter. The rationale for expulsion was extended to those who had left Kuwait and returned during the occupation, no matter what their legal status, and even to those who committed serious traffic offenses. All residence permits were ordered to expire at the end of October 1991, and those without permits were then deported. In addition, the government terminated the employment contracts, without pay, of all foreign workers and bidun retroactively to 2 August 1990, the start of the occupation. It decreed that the bidun and the 180,000 Palestinians still outside Kuwait, mostly families who had fled the fighting, would not be allowed to return, and directed landlords to confiscate the contents of their homes.

About 300,000 persons carrying Jordanian passports were forced to move from Kuwait to Jordan in 1991, adding about 10 percent to Jordan’s existing population. Almost all were of Palestinian parentage, but most had never been to Jordan or Palestine. Jordan’s economic growth and well-being had been tied to those of Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Iraq for several decades but had suffered along with them during the economic recessions of the 1980s due to depressed oil prices and the disruptions of the Iran-Iraq War. At first, the already stagnant Jordanian economy reeled from the influx of refugees and from the loss of trade with and aid from those countries, and unemployed Kuwaiti Palestinians were forced to spend down the savings they had previously accumulated in Jordan. Kuwait then agreed to allow their remaining bank account balances to be transferred to Jordan and to indemnify most deported Palestinians who had been employed in the civil service. As Palestinians used these resources to invest in Jordan, the economy and employment began to improve.

At the turn of the century, Kuwaiti-Palestinian relations were still in disarray. Angered by the failure of Arafat and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) to apologize for its backing of Iraq in 1990, the Kuwait national assembly voted in 2001 to back the emir's decision not to restore diplomatic contact with the PLO. Despite this, many ordinary Kuwaitis still sympathized with the plight of Palestinians under Israeli OCCUPATION and raised private funds to send in truckloads of supplies during the Israeli incursions into JENIN and other Palestinian cities in the spring of 2002. Only 9,000 Palestinians remained in Kuwait, but some Kuwaitis openly acknowledged the role of Palestinian resisters to Iraqi occupation and conceded that Palestinian labor had been difficult to replace. Ironically, Kuwaitis expressed rising concern about the impact of non-Arabic speakers with different cultural backgrounds on their societal cohesion and their children's identity as Arabs.

If the Israeli-Palestinian conflict were resolved, reconciliation between Kuwait and the Palestinians could be matched by Kuwait's recognition of Israel. As chair of the PLO following Arafat's death and as a candidate for president of the PNA, MAHMUD ABBAS traveled to Kuwait in December 2004 with a large Palestinian delegation, and formally apologized for the PLO's gross error of 1990. The Kuwaiti prime minister, Shaykh Sabah al-Ahmad al-Sabah, welcomed him with a declaration that "no apology was expected" and agreed to a resumption of financial assistance, in the amount of $25 million, for "support of the Middle East peace process." At the same time, Kuwait, like other Gulf countries, had come to view Israel in a less negative light. In 2005, Kuwaiti MEDIA and politicians openly debated the reversal of a long-held policy of not recognizing the Jewish state by rewarding Israel's withdrawal from Gaza with some form of diplomatic acknowledgment.

See also DIASPORA, PALESTINIAN

Bibliography

- Alessa, Shamlan Y. The Manpower Problem in Kuwait. Boston: Kegan Paul, 1981.
- Assiri, Abdul-Reda. Kuwait's Foreign Policy: City-State in World Politics. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- BBC News. Abbas Apology to Kuwait over Iraq. 12 December 2004. http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/middle\_east/4089961.stm.
- . Angry Welcome for Palestinian in Kuwait. 30 May 2001. http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/middle\_east/1361060.stm.
- Brand, Laurie A. Palestinians in the Arab World. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Central Intelligence Agency. The World Factbook. 2005. www.odci.gov/cia/publications/factbook/print/ku.html.
- Feiler, Gil. Economic Relations between Egypt and the Gulf Oil States, 1967–2000. Portland, OR: Sussex Academic Press, 2003.
- Ghabra, Shafeeq N. Palestinians in Kuwait: The Family and the Politics of Survival. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1987.
- Gilmour, David. Dispossessed: The Ordeal of the Palestinians. London: Sphere Books, 1982.
- Human Rights Watch. A Victory Turned Sour: Human Rights in Kuwait since Liberation. New York: Middle East Watch (division of Human Rights Watch), 1991.
- Khouja, M. W., and P. G. Sadler. The Economy of Kuwait: Development and Role in International Finance. London: Macmillan Press, 1979.
- Kuwait Fund for Arab Economic Development. Grants Information for Arab Countries. 2006. www.kuwaitfund.org/el/grantsBasicInfo.asp?division\_code=4&as\_at\_date=1/18/2006.
- Longva, Anh Nga. Walls Built on Sand: Migration, Exclusion, and Society in Kuwait. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1997.
- El Mallakh, Ragaei. Kuwait: Trade and Investment. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1979.
- Metz, Helen Chapin, ed. "Kuwait: Post-Persian Gulf War Foreign Policy." Washington, DC: Federal Research Division, Library of Congress, 1993. <http://www.country-data.com/cgi-bin/query/r-7601.html>.
- Middle East Research Institute. MERI Report: Kuwait. Middle East Research Institute, University of Pennsylvania. London: Croom Helm, 1985.
- Al-Moosa, Abdulrasool, and Keith McLachlan. Immigrant Labour in Kuwait. London: Croom Helm, 1985.
- Rubin, Trudy. "What Do the Palestinians Want (III): The Palestinians in Kuwait." The Christian Science Monitor and the Alicia Patterson Foundation. 1975. www.aliciapatterson.org/APF001974/Rubin/Rubin08/Rubin08.html.
- Russell, Sharon Stanton. "Politics and Ideology in Policy Formulation: The Case of Kuwait." International Migration Review. 23:1 (1989). As reprinted in Anthony M. Messina and Gallya Lahav, eds. The Migration Reader: Exploring Politics and Policies. Boulder CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2006.
- Stephens, Robert. The Arabs' New Frontier. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1976.
- Le Troquer, Yann, and Rozenn Hommery al-Qudat. "From Kuwait to Jordan: The Palestinians' Third Exodus." Journal of Palestine Studies. 28:3 (1999).

USA Today. "Israel's Gaza Pullout Might Ease Relations with Kuwait." 30 October 2005. www.usatoday.com/news/world/2005-10-30-israel-kuwait\_x.htm.

World Bank. The Economic Development of Kuwait. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1965.

Al-Yahya, Mohammed A. Kuwait: Fall and Rebirth. Boston: Kegan Paul, 1993.

Zaydoun. "Kuwait Unplugged." 2004. <http://zaydoun.blogspot.com/2004/08/palestinians-and-invasion.html>.

—Karen Pfeifer

Labor, Palestinian

See ECONOMY: THE EFFECTS OF OCCUPATION ON THE PALESTINIANS

Labor Party

The Labor Party (Ha'Avoda or Mifleget ha-Avoda ha-Yisraelit) was established in 1968, when the MAPAI party joined with AHDUT HA'AVODAH and RAFI to form the "Labor Alignment." Labor is the dominant left-of-center or, more precisely, center party in Israel. Until MENAHEM BEGIN's victory in 1977, every Israeli prime minister came from Labor. Since 1977, Labor leaders YITZHAK RABIN, SHIMON PERES, and EHUD BARAK have served as prime ministers. Other distinguished leaders of the party include DAVID BEN-GURION, MOSHE SHARETT, LEVI ESKOL, GOLDA MEIR, MOSHE DAYAN, and AUBREY EBAN.

The core of the Labor Alignment, Mapai, was established in the early 1930s as the right-wing faction of the Zionist-socialist Russian party PO'ALE ZION and was the dominant political party in the pre-state and early post-state years. During the 1930s, Labor leader (and future prime minister) Ben-Gurion rose to power in Mapai and led it for almost two decades before he retired. Under Ben-Gurion's stewardship Mapai became the leading political party, while the party allowed Ben-Gurion to attain personal power and stature. The Labor movement founded the HISTADRUT (labor federation) that dominated the pre-state Yishuv economy (and Israel's until the 1990s) and INFRASTRUCTURE. It was also responsible for founding the paramilitary HASHOMER and the military HAGANA, the two major armed groups that functioned during the BRITISH MANDATE. After Israel's founding, Mapai engaged in additional institution building—establishing the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES, constructing Jewish SETTLEMENTS, and settling more than 1 million Jewish immigrants. From 1948 until the 1968 merger that produced the Labor Alignment, Mapai led every coalition and owned the premiership. (Recently the small party MEIMAD has joined with the Labor Party.)

Because it originated in the Socialist Workers Party, Mapai initially adhered to the Zionist-socialist ideology promulgated by Nahum Syrkin and Ber Borochov, political theorists and founders of Labor ZIONISM. During Ben-Gurion's leadership, however, Mapai focused mainly on the Zionist agenda, ignoring most of the socialist. Nevertheless, the Labor Party continued the socialist economic orientation until its adoption of neo-liberalism in the 1990s, and it exercised power through the Labor-controlled Histadrut, which owned the majority of economic enterprises. In Israel, however, economic policies depend much more on initiatives by the civil service than on political ideologies and have seldom been core issues in Israeli politics. For example, during the 1990s, Labor and LIKUD's economic policies were almost indistinguishable.

Another significant element of Labor's ideology is security, which has come to mean the dominance of military values throughout civil society, or ISRAELI MILITARISM. In the first two decades of statehood, Labor was more hawkish on security and defense issues than it is today. During Labor's years in office, Israel initiated the 1956 SINAI/SUEZ WAR and the 1967 WAR, and fought the 1973 WAR, in addition to the less well-known wars of INFILTRATION AND RETALIATION: the WAR OF ATTRITION with EGYPT, the international war with Palestinian terrorists, and, after 1967, an almost continuous low-intensity war with LEBANON.

From the earliest days of the Zionist enterprise and during the first thirty years after the establishment of the state, the Labor movement represented the mainstream of Israeli public life. That hold has weakened over the past twenty-five years, and to reverse that trend the party has blurred its identity, looking more and more conservative like the Likud, in its hawkish stance on keeping the settlements, for example. Historically Labor was the party of the ASHKENAZI (Jews of European origin) elite who founded and dominated the country. Its fall from power in 1977 was directly related to the majority MIZRAHI (Middle Eastern and African Jewish) community finding its voice and voting for the opposition, which happened to be the Likud (also overwhelmingly led by Ashkenazi). Today Labor remains predominantly Ashkenazi.

Under the leadership of Peres and Rabin, the Labor Party concluded the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP) in 1993, which set the stage for the subsequent OSLO ACCORDS. However, Labor's subsequent minimalist interpretation of the agreements, as well as its decision to accelerate settlement building in and colonization of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, led to the demise of the accords and ultimately produced the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. Rather than committing itself to Oslo and trying to convince Israelis of the value of peaceful coexistence and equality, the Labor-MERETZ coalition based its strategy solely on security, separation from the Palestinians, and the continuity of Israel's supremacy. The Labor-Meretz leadership links the conflict, both politically and rhetorically, to Palestinian "TERRORISM."

In May 1997 (prior to the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT and the collapse of the OSLO PROCESS and three years before the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada), the Labor Party's platform concerning FINAL STATUS TALKS with the Palestinians contained the following planks, which still apply:

- Oslo Accords. "The negotiations will be based on the Oslo Accords with guarantees for the State of Israel to exist in peace and security within defensible BORDERS, and with precise definitions of the elements for the normalization of relations between Israel and its neighbors."
- JERUSALEM. "United Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, under Israeli sovereignty: The Palestinian residents of the city will enjoy municipal rights in the quarters in which they reside, and special arrangements will be established for the sites sacred to Christianity and Islam."
- Self-determination for the Palestinians. "The Labor Party recognizes the Palestinians' right to self-determination and does not rule out in this connection the establishment of a Palestinian state with limited sovereignty."
- Security. "The Jordan River will be Israel's eastern security border, and there will be no other army stationed to the west of it."

- BORDERS and settlements. "Israel extends its sovereignty over areas that are major Jewish settlement blocs."
- Right of return. "Israel does not recognize the right of return of Palestinians to areas under Israeli sovereignty. Israel will negotiate with the Palestinians on allowing the return to areas under Palestinian control."

In 2001, Labor agreed to participate in a national unity government with the Likud (under ARIEL SHARON), SHAS, Israel-BaAliya, and UNITED TORAH JUDAISM. In 2003, Labor quit the government but in 2005 joined another national unity government with the Likud.

See also ISRAELI POLITICAL PARTIES AND SETTLEMENTS; OSLO PROCESS

Bibliography

- Arian, Asher. Politics in Israel: The Second Generation. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House Publishers, 1985.
- Aronoff, Myron J. "The Decline of the Israeli Labor Party: Causes and Significance." In Israel at the Polls, 1977. Edited by Howard Penniman. Washington, DC: American Enterprise Institute, 1979.
- . Power and Ritual in the Israel Labor Party: A Study in Political Anthropology, rev. ed. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1993.
- Ben Efrat, Roni. "The Israeli Elections: Changing Patterns on the Left." Information Brief 68. Washington, DC: Palestine Center, 16 February 2001.
- Benin, Joel. "Israel: Likud, Labor Hide behind Scandals." Middle East Report Online. Middle East Research and Information Project, 22 January 2003. <http://www.merip.org>.
- Fein, Leonard. Israel: Politics and People. Boston: Little, Brown, 1968.
- Ha'aretz*. "The Sharon Government and the Opposition." Editorial, 27 August 2005.
- Kieval, Gershon R. Party Politics in Israel and the Occupied Territories. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1983.
- Maor, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Medding, Peter Y. Mapai in Israel: Political Organisation and Government in a New Society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1972.
- Peretz, Don, and Sammy Smooha. "Israel's Tenth Knesset Elections: Ethnic Upsurgence and Decline of Ideology." Middle East Journal. 35:4 (1981).
- Roberts, Samuel J. Party and Policy in Israel: The Battle between Hawks and Doves. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Sternhell, Ze'ev. The Founding Myths of Israel. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.

Lake Tiberias

WATER from Lake Tiberias (also known as Lake Kinneret or Sea of Galilee) and the Jordan River that feeds it has been a constant source of conflict among Israel, JORDAN, and SYRIA, as well as a key and continuing issue in the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Israel's 1950s National Water Carrier project (completed in 1964) to irrigate the Negev desert region transports water from the lake to the population centers in southern Israel and provides most of the country's water for agriculture, commerce, and personal consumption. However, Israel's massive use of this resource has deprived Jordan and Syria of desperately needed water for their countries.

See also JOHNSTON PLAN; UNITED NATIONS TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION

Bibliography

- Selby, Jan. Water, Power and Politics in the Middle East: The Other Israel-Palestine Conflict. London: I. B. Tauris, 2004.
- Shuval, Hillel, and Hassan Dweik, eds. Water Resources in the Middle East: Israel-Palestinian Water Issues from Conflict to Cooperation. New York: Springer, 2007.
- Zeitoun, Mark. Power and Water in the Middle East: The Hidden Politics of the Palestinian-Israeli Water Conflict. London: I. B. Tauris, 2008.

Land

Land and WATER are at the heart of the conflict that began more than a century ago between Palestinians and Israelis. Both issues are nationalistic and ideological symbols that also have real material value, which further complicates the underlying dynamics of the conflict. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict over land is unique and differs from normal disputes between nations. Before Israel became a state, Palestine was a geographic area that had passed from one conqueror to another. The indigenous people, whether Christians, Jews, or Muslims, lived together in relative harmony. The conflict began when DIASPORA Jewish-ZIONISTS planned the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine that excluded the Muslim and Christian populations. Acquisition of land and Jewish IMMIGRATION were major tools for achieving the Zionist objective of a Jewish homeland.

In 1516, Palestine became a province of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, and continued so for almost 400 years until its defeat in World War I. When the Ottoman Empire collapsed, the British became the new rulers of Palestine, receiving a mandate over the land—defined to include an area of 27,000 square kilometers (10,400 square miles) in 1922—from the League of Nations. After the British assumed power, there was a mass immigration of Jews to Palestine and a sustained effort on their part to acquire as much land as possible. With the support of the JEWISH AGENCY, the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND, and the BRITISH MANDATE authorities, the Jewish population of Palestine increased from 83,794 in 1922 (11 percent of the total population) to nearly 553,600 in 1944 (33 percent of the total population).

In 1947 the UNITED NATIONS General Assembly proposed in UN RESOLUTION 181 a partition plan that would divide Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state. The plan declared JERUSALEM to be a corpus separatum—a separate body under an international administration. The area of Jerusalem was defined as 186 square kilometers (72 square miles) and included BETHLEHEM, Beit Sahour, and Beit Jala in the south; Shu'fat in the north; beyond ABU DIS to the east; and beyond Ein Karim to the west. Palestinians rejected the partition plan, in part because they believed that Jews were not entitled to the 56 percent allotted by the United Nations when at that time they owned only 7 percent of the land. At the same time, Zionist leaders submitted a map to the United Nations delineating Israel's BORDER, as stipulated in the partition plan. This map is still the only legal and internationally recognized boundary of Israel. However, in 1948, war erupted between Israel and the Arabs, and at its end Israel controlled 78 percent of Mandate Palestine, while more than 750,000 Palestinians had been expelled or fled and had become REFUGEES. Additionally 418 villages were depopulated or demolished. After the war, JORDAN and EGYPT administered the 22 percent of Mandate Palestine that remained outside of Israel's control. Jordan administered the WEST BANK (5,885 square kilometers, or 2,200 square miles), including East Jerusalem, and Egypt administered the GAZA STRIP (362 square kilometers, or 140 square miles).

After the 1967 WAR between Israel and the Arabs, Israel occupied SYRIA's Golan Heights, Egypt's Sinai Peninsula as well as the Gaza Strip, and the West Bank from the Jordan. On 22 November 1967 the United Nations passed Security Council Resolution 242, which called for the withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict and for a just settlement of the refugee problem. In the 1979 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS the Sinai Peninsula was returned to Egypt through a phased withdrawal that continued until 1982, but Israel retains control of the Gaza Strip, the West Bank including East Jerusalem, and the Golan Heights. Following the 1967 War, Israel began almost immediately to implement a series of geopolitical actions in the occupied Palestinian territory designed to reinforce the Jewish presence there, including annexing East Jerusalem, confiscating Palestinian lands, and constructing SETTLEMENTS and bypass ROADS. To expand the borders of Jerusalem, Israel confiscated lands from twenty-eight villages near the Jerusalem, Ramallah, and Bethlehem districts. Accordingly, East Jerusalem borders illegally stretched from 6.5 to 71 square kilometers (2.5 to 27 square miles). To minimize the Palestinian population of the city, the illegal borders of the expanded Jerusalem municipality were drawn to include as much land as possible and as few Palestinians as was feasible. Since then, Jerusalem has undergone intense colonization meant to further dilute the Palestinian population of the city and at the same time separate the city from the rest of the West Bank.

Settlements are both the ends for which the Israeli OCCUPATION exists and the means by which ultimate control is achieved. Most settlements are built in strategically important areas. In the Gaza Strip, for example, they were established predominantly along the coast, securing Israeli control of the seacoast and its waters. Settlements were also constructed near the Egyptian border to secure the border and at two junctions farther north in the Strip, which facilitated Israel's plan to divide Gaza into three isolated areas and tightened Israel's control over the population. In the Jerusalem area of the West Bank the settlements established Jewish DEMOGRAPHIC supremacy, while those along the West Bank's western edges are situated to make a return to the 1967 borders practically impossible. Additionally, the settlements are positioned to control the West Bank's water resources. In the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, where a massive road network has been constructed to serve the settlers, the locations of settlements are determined by both Israel's security needs and its agricultural requirements.

The development of settlements has been planned to establish the formation of blocs; that is, they grow outward and toward each other in ways that separate Palestinian populated areas. Analysis of satellite images by Peace Now as of August 2009 shows that the West Bank (excluding East Jerusalem) had 121 settlements with an official population of 290,000 and jurisdiction over 130,000 acres (526 square kilometers), or 9.3 percent of the West Bank. In addition there were 99 "unauthorized" outposts with an estimated population of 4,000. In East Jerusalem there are 12 major settlements with a population of 194,000 as well as settlement outposts in all Palestinian neighborhoods in the Holy Basin. Prior to August 2005 there had been 16 settlements in Gaza.

Bypass roads in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES are designed to link Jewish settlements with each other and to Israel proper while circumventing Palestinian localities and ensuring that the settlers can avoid contact with the indigenous population. The Israeli military has complete control of these roads, which stretch for more than 734 kilometers (450 miles) inside the West Bank, and forbids Palestinians from using most of them.

Like settlements, military camps are scattered throughout the Occupied Territories but are concentrated in particularly strategic areas. Most are in the Jordan Valley, which Israel considers essential as an eastern security zone, but military camps are also located near Palestinian population centers. In the past many military camps established by the Israeli army were transformed to civilian settlements, although this practice has declined in recent years, because Israel no longer justifies settlement building as a military necessity. In the West Bank, there are military sites of varying size that cover an area of 48.3 square kilometers (18.5 square miles).

The 1987 Palestinian INTIFADA gave voice to the Palestinian struggle against the Israeli Occupation and led to the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE. The guiding principles of the negotiations that followed were land for peace and the implementation of UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338. Madrid in turn led to the OSLO PROCESS. The 13 September 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP) between the PLO and Israel (and the subsequent OSLO ACCORDS) set up an interim period of five years during which the Israeli military would withdraw from Palestinian territory and negotiations would also take place over unresolved issues, including Jerusalem, Palestinian refugees, settlements, borders, and water—all cornerstones of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. It was also agreed that during the interim period neither party would initiate any action that might alter the geographical status and thus jeopardize the outcome of FINAL STATUS TALKS.

A series of subsequent interim agreements were signed to implement the DOP. On 4 May 1994 the Israeli government withdrew from JERICHO and most of Gaza, where the newly formed PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) assumed quasi-governmental responsibilities. On 28 September 1995, Israel redeployed its forces from some additional areas of the West Bank, and the territory was further divided into AREAS A, B, and C, which designated varying levels of control. Area A, which included 70 percent of the Gaza Strip and 3 percent of the West Bank, falls under virtually complete PNA control. Area B included 24 percent of the West Bank and in this area the PNA assumed administrative control over the people; however, Israel continued to have overriding security control, including over the land. Area C encompassed more than 70 percent of the West Bank and in it Israel retained full control over land, security, and people—including the Palestinians living in these areas, natural resources, and so on. In January 1997, Israel and the PLO signed the HEBRON PROTOCOL, which placed 85 percent of the West Bank city (classified as H1) under PNA control, while 15 percent of the city (designated as H2) remained under Israeli control—an area that includes approximately 20,000 Palestinians and 400 Jewish settlers.

After a one-and-a-half-year freeze, the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations recommenced, and the WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM was signed in 1998, in which Area A increased to 10.1 percent and Area B decreased to 18.9 percent. Further redeployments were stalled until September 1999, when a new memorandum was signed at SHARM AL-SHAYKH, in which the distribution of land changed slightly, so that Areas A, B, and C in May 2000 were, respectively, 18.2 percent, 21.8 percent, and 60 percent.

The Oslo Accords were initially well received by Palestinians, but during the process of negotiation the Palestinians found themselves the weak party in a situation of overwhelming power disparities and had to submit to Israel's wishes. Moreover, Israel continued confiscating Palestinian land and expanding Jewish settlements. By 1996 many Palestinians seriously doubted Israel's commitment to a just settlement. At the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT, convened in July 2000 by US president BILL CLINTON, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators for the first time discussed a framework for a final agreement. The Palestinian negotiators were offered 77 percent of the West Bank in noncontiguous segments for their future state, of which 15 percent would be leased to Israel for twenty-five years, while Israel would annex the remaining 23 percent. For several reasons, the Palestinians viewed the offer with considerable skepticism. The proposed Palestinian state would be surrounded by Israeli-controlled territories and would have no international boundaries, effectively eliminating its viability and sovereignty, and the bulk of Jerusalem would remain under Israeli control, with the exception of a few peripheral Palestinian neighborhoods. Worse, it was presented to them as a "take it or leave it" proposal. Beyond land, other final status issues were not dealt with satisfactorily at Camp David either. Palestinian frustration was overwhelming.

Then, on 28 September 2000, ARIEL SHARON made his provocative visit to the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, and the Palestinian territories once more erupted in defiance of Israel's continued Occupation. In December 2000, President Clinton put forward his parameters for a final status agreement and called for resumption of negotiations. In an attempt to rescue the peace process, the late president YASIR ARAFAT launched an initiative to resume negotiations. In January 2001, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators met in Taba in an attempt to reach an agreement. But the Israeli elections were close at hand, and the TABA TALKS were suspended by the Israeli side despite near-agreement by both sides.

Following the onset of the Second or AL-AQSA INTIFADA in September 2000, Israel increased its colonization of the Occupied Territories, destroying Palestinian agriculture, confiscating land, building settlements, and effectively enclosing Palestinians in small BANTUSTIANS of land surrounded by military CHECKPOINTS. In April 2002, Israel reoccupied the West Bank, invaded the PNA-controlled areas, and destroyed and besieged cities and villages in response to the Intifada.

Citing security concerns, the Israeli government began building what they claimed was a security fence in the West Bank in June 2002. On the ground, the Palestinians identified the Israeli construction as the "Separation BARRIER" since it extends Israeli territorial authority over large expanses of Palestinian land in the West Bank. It cuts through the West Bank, running from north to south, encompassing the most fertile Palestinian agricultural lands, isolating Palestinian communities, undermining the territorial contiguity between the Palestinian villages and cities, appropriating natural resources (including groundwater aquifers), and enclosing most of the Israeli settlement blocs on the Israeli side. The Barrier would eventually create internal enclaves on the eastern and western flanks of the West Bank. When complete, the Separation Wall will isolate 576 square kilometers (222 square miles) of Palestinian land in the West Bank (approximately 10 percent of the total area), which runs for 679 kilometers (421 miles) between the Barrier and the Green Line (the 1949 Armistice Line). However, since the time that Israel sanctioned the construction of the Barrier in 2002, several adjustments were made to comply with the settlements' interests. Accordingly, the length of the wall varied, and so did the segregated area isolated behind it, which the Israeli army identified as a "seam zone" area. In April 2007 the length of the Wall came to 770 kilometers (478 miles) across the West Bank and the isolated area behind it came to 733 square kilometers (283 square miles), approximately 13 percent of the West Bank total area.

On 11 September 2008, the Israeli human rights organization B'TSELEM published a report on Israel's blocking of Palestinian access to land around settlements lying east of the Separation Barrier. The report reveals that state authorities and settlers have de facto annexed rings of land amounting to tens of thousands of dunums (4 dunums = 1 acre) to these settlements.

Control of these lands is seized by a variety of means, but two methods stand out: (1) settlers, and sometimes members of Israel's security forces, violently attack and harass Palestinians who venture near settlements; and (2) fences and other physical and electronic devices are placed around the lands, blocking Palestinian access. In many cases, the authorities turn a blind eye to unlicensed closure of lands, systemically avoiding their duty to enforce the law on criminal settlers.

The total amount of lands thus attached to settlements can only be roughly estimated, as most of the takeovers were not documented or officially sanctioned in orders. In recent years, however, Israel has begun to formalize the closing of lands by issuing military orders in the framework of the "Special Security Area" (SSA) plan. As part of this plan, Israel has fenced off twelve settlements east of the Separation Barrier, unofficially annexing 4,558 dunums (1,125 acres), thus increasing the overall area of these settlements by a factor of 2.4. Half of the closed-off lands are privately owned by Palestinians.

The closing of lands around settlements primarily harms Palestinian farmers, who face almost impassable bureaucratic obstacles when attempting to access their lands. As a result, many are forced to stop cultivating their land.

Israeli officials seek to justify the closings by citing the security need for a warning space around the settlements, to help protect settlers. However, B'Tselem's research has demonstrated that the authorities permit settlers to access these purported "warning areas." B'Tselem has documented settlers living on, and tending to, closed-off Palestinian lands. This contradicts the security logic cited by the army and defies the closure orders issued by the military commander.

Along the eastern terrains of the West Bank, Israel also maintains control over what is known as the Eastern Segregation Zone with several checkpoints and roadblocks that deter Palestinian movement to and from the Jordan Valley. The Eastern Zone covers an area exceeding 1,555 square kilometers (600 square miles, 27 percent of the West Bank) across a 200-kilometer (124-mile) stretch including the Jordan Valley and southward along the western shores of the Dead Sea.

Between the Western and Eastern Segregation zones, Israel stands to retain control of at least 40 percent of the West Bank. Fifty-five Palestinian communities, including more than 90,000 people, will be isolated in the western zone, and forty-two Palestinian communities, including more than 43,000 people, will be isolated in the eastern zone.

On 15 August 2005, Israel began its UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA, which included the evacuation of all the settlements in Gaza Strip and four small settlements in the northern West Bank. The withdrawal process from the Gaza Strip was completed on 12 September 2005, to leave 83 percent of the Gaza Strip entirely under Palestinian control except for 17 percent (61 square kilometers or 24 square miles), which is a security buffer zone area along the northern and eastern borders of Gaza that remains under the control of the Israeli army along with its control over the airspace and the waterfront of the Gaza Strip. On 28 June 2007, the Israeli army decided to widen the security buffer zone. Accordingly, 24 percent (87 square kilometers, or 34 square miles) of the total area of Gaza falls under effective control of the Israeli army.

Many Israeli officials, including former prime minister Ariel Sharon, have stated that the objective of the Gaza disengagement was to reinforce Israel's control over the settlements in the West Bank, especially the settlement blocs that Israel wants to retain permanently. Most political analysts believe that the disengagement plan was a diversion strategy to free Israel from the pressures resulting from local, regional, and international initiatives. For example, the QUARTET'S ROAD MAP stipulated that by 2005 a viable Palestinian state will be established next to Israel. Israel's unilateral actions and the absence of an honest broker to the peace process make this vision unrealistic.

See also ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION; LAND LAWS, ISRAEL; OUTPOSTS; SETTLEMENTS; STATE LAND

Bibliography

- Abu Sitta, Salman. Palestinian Right to Return: Sacred, Legal and Possible. London: The Palestinian Return Centre, 1999.
- Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem. Database. 2005. www.arij.org.
- Arab Association for Human Rights. Land and Planning Policy in Israel. n.d. www.arabhra.org/factsheets/factsheet2.htm.
- Bashir, Basema, and Emily Winkelstein. Water for Life: Israeli Assault on Palestinian Water, Sanitation and Hygiene during the Intifada. Ramallah, West Bank: Palestinian Hydrology Group, Water, Sanitation and Hygiene Monitoring Project (WaSH MP), 2004.
- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva, Switzerland: COHRE and Badil, 2005.
- Isaac, Jad. "Towards a Sustainable Peace between Israelis and Palestinians." In In the Name of Security: Sociology of Peace and War in Israel in a Changing Era. Edited by Majid Al-Haj and Uri Ben-Eliezer. Haifa: Haifa University Press, 2003.
- Isaac, Jad, and Mohammad Ghanayem. Environmental Degradation and the Israeli Palestinian Conflict. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem, 1998.
- Isaac, Jad, Khaldoun Rishmawi, and Abeer Safar. "The Impact of Israel's Unilateral Actions on the Palestinian Environment." Palestinian and Israeli Environmental Narratives. Toronto, Canada: York University, 2004.
- Isaac, Jad, and Sophia Saad. A Geopolitical Atlas of Palestine: The West Bank and Gaza. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem, 2004.
- Isaac, Jad, and Maurice Saade. "Strategic Options for Sustainable Resource Management in Palestine." The Palestine Conference on Agricultural Policy and Strategies MOA, Hebron, West Bank, October 1999.
- Isaac, Jad, and Waleed Sabbah. Water Resources and Irrigated Agriculture in the West Bank. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem, 1998.
- Isaac, Jad, and Abeer Safar. "Roots of Water Conflict in the Eastern Mediterranean." International Conference, Water: Values and Rights, Ramallah, Palestine, 2005.
- Isaac, Jad, and Nael Salman. Undermining Peace: Israel's Unilateral Segregation Plans in the Palestinian Territories. 2003. www.arij.org/paley/SegregationWall/index.htm.
- Isaac, Jad, et al. An Atlas of Palestine: The West Bank and Gaza. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem, 2000.
- Isaac, Jad, et al. The Impact of Urbanization on Land Use and Local Communities. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem, 2005.
- Israel Central Bureau of Statistics. Statistical Abstract of Israel 2004. 2004. www.cbs.gov.il.
- Jewish Virtual Library. Zionist Organization Statement on Palestine. n.d. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/History/zoparis.html.
- Maoh, Hanna, and Jad Isaac. "The Status of Transportation in the West Bank." World Transport Policy and Practice. 5:4 (1999).
- Qumsieh, Violet. "The Environmental Impact of Jewish Settlements in the West Bank." Palestine-Israel Journal. 5:1 (1998).
- Roy, Sara. The Gaza Strip: The Political Economy of De-development. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1995.
- Saad, Sophia, and Jad Isaac. "Monitoring Urban Dynamic Change in the Palestinian Territories (1989–2004)." International Workshop, Geomatics for Land and Water Management: Achievements and Challenges in the Euromed Context. Ispra: Italy, 2004.
- Said, Edward, and Christopher Hitchens, eds. Blaming the Victims. London: Verso, 2001.
- Selby, Jan. Water, Power and Politics in the Middle East. New York: I. B. Tauris, 2003.
- Shehadeh, Raja. "Land and Occupation: A Legal Review." Palestine-Israel Journal. 4:2 (1997).
- Soffer, Arnon. "The Relevance of the Johnston Plan to the Reality of 1993 and Beyond." In Israel-Palestine Water. Edited by H. I. Shuval. Amsterdam: Elsevier, 1994.
- Sussman, Gary. "Ariel Sharon and the Jordan Option." Middle East Report. 2005. www.merip.org/mero/interventions/sussman_interv.html.
- Urquhart, Conal. "Israeli Army Orders Confiscation of Palestinian Land in West Bank." The Guardian (UK). 10 October 2007.

—Jad Isaac

Landau, Moshe (1912–)

Moshe Landau is a well-known Israeli jurist. He was the fifth president of the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT. In 1960 he was the chairman of the special tribunal that presided over the trial of the high-ranking Nazi Adolf Eichmann. In 1973–1974, as a member of the Agranat Commission, Landau investigated the intelligence failures relating to the 1973 War, and in 1987 he served as chairman of the government commission that bears his name, the LANDAU COMMISSION, which reviewed and rewrote the rules for SHIN BET (the Israeli internal security service) interrogations—rules that legalized the use of torture under certain conditions.

Born in Danzig, GERMANY, Landau studied law in London in the early 1930s. A few years after he immigrated to Palestine in 1940, he was appointed as a magistrate in BRITISH MANDATE Palestine. In 1948 he became a district judge in HAIFA and in 1953 was appointed an Israeli Supreme Court justice. From 1976 to 1980 he served as deputy president of the Supreme Court and from 1980 to 1982 as Supreme Court president. In 1965, as chairman of the Central Election Commission, Landau disqualified the Palestinian AL-ARD party slate from running for the Knesset, arguing that a Palestinian party undermined the state's integrity. In 1969 he was the first judge to nullify a piece of Knesset legislation. A year later he objected to the court's interference in the "Who is a Jew?" matter (the effort by the Orthodox rabbinate to declare conversions to Judaism performed by Reform and Conservative rabbis illegitimate), and in the 1980 ELON MOREH SETTLEMENT ruling he prohibited the expropriation of Palestinian LAND for the purpose of building Jewish SETTLEMENTS. In many cases that involved Jewish petitioners, Landau defended freedom of expression and the public's right to know, but in 1979 he upheld the state censorship of a pro-Palestinian film.

Throughout his forty-two years as judge and in the first eighteen years that passed since he retired, Landau kept silent about his political views. In 2000, however, he gave his first interview ever to a journalist for Ha'aretz (the preeminent Israeli daily) because of his "fear for the state's survival" and his belief that "the existence of the Jewish state is in danger." Landau said: "The biggest danger that I see is Islam. We have fine, naive people who see Muslim officials as some kind of partners in dialogue. . . . But if we do not agree to that [a Jewish canton in an Islamic state], they will not tolerate us. They will work against us using violent means of terror. . . . But I say that it's actually some of those [Jews] who believe in a 'peace of the brave' who are the real cowards. . . . I'm opposed to concessions on the TEMPLE MOUNT and in JERUSALEM'S OLD CITY. . . . To me ZIONISM is the longing for Zion. And what is Zion if not the Temple Mount, the Mount of Olives, the Old City? I'm not a religious man. I'm secular. But I cannot deny the importance of the Temple Mount that stands at the center of the Jewish faith."

Bibliography

- Abramov, Sheneur Zalman. Perpetual Dilemma: Jewish Religion in the Jewish State. Associated University Press, 1976.
- Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil, new ed. New York: Penguin Classics, 1994.
- B'Tselem. Torture and Ill-Treatment as Perceived by Israel's High Court of Justice. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. http://www.btselem.org/english/torture/HCIJ\_Ruling.asp.
- Cohen-Almagor, Raphael. "Disqualification of Lists in Israel (1948–1984): Retrospect and Appraisal." Law and Philosophy. 13:1 (February 1994).
- Encyclopedia of Nations. "Israel: The 'Who Is a Jew?' Controversy." Encyclopedia of the Nations. December 1988. <http://www.country-data.com/cgi-bin/query/r-6729.html>.
- Evans, Malcolm D., and Rod Morgan. Preventing Torture: A Study of the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1999.
- Jeffay, John. "Who Is a Jew? Let the Civil Court Decide." Ha'aretz. 1 January 2009.
- Shavit, Ari. "Judgment Day—Israel Facing Apocalypse." Ha'aretz. 6 October 2000.

Landau Commission, 1987

In 1987, after a series of scandals involving the torture of Palestinian suspects in detention, the Landau Commission of Inquiry, headed by ISRAELI SUPREME COURT justice MOSHE LANDAU, was convened to investigate the interrogation methods of SHIN BET, Israel's internal security service. The Landau Commission's November 1987 report approved the use of "moderate physical pressure" in interrogations, but that approval was based on the restriction that such "pressure" should have "clear boundaries," which were detailed in an annex to the report that remains secret. However, according to the Israeli human rights group B'TSELEM, the guidelines include permission for severe shaking, shackling detainees in painful positions for prolonged periods, sleep and sensory deprivation, exposure to temperature extremes, and psychological pressures. The Landau Commission also set up a ministerial review committee to evaluate the guidelines periodically and called for the state comptroller to assume responsibility for investigating complaints of abuse.

The Convention Against Torture that Israel ratified in 1991 defines the practice as the "infliction of pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, for the purpose of obtaining information or confession by a person acting in an official capacity." Numerous Israeli and international human rights organizations maintain that "moderate physical pressure," as recommended by the Landau Commission, constitutes torture as defined in the Convention and other international legal covenants. Torture is further considered a "grave breach" of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which, according to INTERNATIONAL LAW, applies to Israel's military OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP (until 2005).

An audit of Shin Bet practices by the state comptroller covering the 1988–1992 period found extensive "deviations" from the Landau recommendations and Shin Bet regulations. The comptroller concluded that these violations were committed by "veteran interrogators" on a serious and systematic basis. According to B'Tselem, between 1992 and 1999, the abuse of prisoners became more severe and widespread. On 6 September 1999, in a case entitled "Supreme Court Judgment Concerning the Legality of the GSS [Shin Bet] Interrogation Methods," the Israeli Supreme Court determined that these methods were illegal and thus overturned the Landau Commission's decisions.

See also ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Bibliography

Amnesty International. Allegations of Ill-Treatment and Torture in the Israeli Occupied Territories: The Case of Adnan Mansour Ghanem. (AI Index: MDE 15/25/86). London: Amnesty International, 1986.

B'Tselem. 1987–1997: A Decade of Human Rights Violations. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1998.

———. The Death of Mustafa Barakat in the Interrogation Wing of the Tulkarm Prison. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1992.

- . Detention and Interrogation of Salem and Hanan "Ali," Husband and Wife, Residents of Bani Na'im Village. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1995.
- . The Interrogation of Palestinians during the Intifada: Follow-up to March 1991 B'Tselem Report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1992.
- . Interrogation of Palestinians during the Intifada: Ill-Treatment, "Moderate Physical Pressure" or Torture? Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1991.
- . Legislation Allowing the Use of Physical Force and Mental Coercion in Interrogations by the General Security Service. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2000.
- . Legitimizing Torture: The Israeli High Court of Justice Rulings in the Bilbeisi, Hamdan and Mubarak Cases. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1997.
- . The "New Procedure" in GSS Interrogation: The Case of 'Abd A-Nasser 'Ubeid. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1993.
- . Oslo, Before and After: The Status of Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1999.
- . Routine Torture: Interrogation Methods of the General Security Service Comprehensive Report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1998.
- . Torture during Interrogations: Testimony of Palestinian Detainees, Testimony of Interrogators. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1994.
- . Torture of Palestinian Minors at the Gush Etzion Police Station. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- . Violence against Minors in Police Detention. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1990.
- B'Tselem and Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group. Human Rights in the Occupied Territories since the Oslo Accords. Joint report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, and Jerusalem/Ramallah: The Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group, 1996.
- Al-Haq. Torture and Intimidation in the West Bank: The Case of al-Fara'a Prison. Ramallah, West Bank: Law in the Service of Man, 1985.
- Human Rights Watch. Torture and Ill-Treatment: Israel's Interrogation of Palestinians from the Occupied Territories. New York: Human Rights Watch/Middle East, 1994.
- Johnson, Alexandra U. "Israeli Torture of Palestinian Political Prisoners in Jerusalem and the West Bank: Three State Department Reports." Palestine Human Rights Bulletin 17. Jerusalem and Chicago: Palestinian Human Rights Committee, 1979.
- Langer, Felicia. "Israeli Attorney Felicia Langer Lodges Official Complaint Concerning Conditions and Treatment in Dhahariye Lock-Up." DataBase Center. Jerusalem/Chicago: Palestinian Human Rights Committee, 1988.
- Leicht, Lotte, and Hanny Megally. Letter to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. New York and Brussels: Human Rights Watch/Middle East and North Africa Division, 2003.
- United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights. Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. Adopted and opened for signature, ratification, and accession by General Assembly Resolution 39/46 of 10 December 1984. Entry into force 26 June 1987, in accordance with Article 27(1). Geneva, Switzerland. www.unhcr.ch/html/menu3/b/h\_cat39.htm.

Land Day

Land Day (Yom al-Ard in Arabic) is an annual commemoration held on 30 March when Palestinians remember the Israeli confiscation of the LAND of three Arab villages, an ensuing peaceful strike, and the deaths of six protesters in 1976.

On 20 February 1976 the Israeli government, then headed by Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN, expropriated 30,000 dunums (7,400 acres) of land from the Dir Hana, Sakhnin, and Arabee villages in the Galilee in northern Israel. The land seizures were part of a larger Israeli government plan to Judaize the Galilee and the Negev regions. The KOENIG MEMORANDUM, a 1976 government-commissioned study about ways to encourage the emigration of PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL, largely provided the rationale for the confiscations. In October 1975 the official monthly publication of the Israel Agriculture Ministry included the following statement: "The main problem of the Galilee is the minority position of the Jewish population with respect to the majority non-Jewish population. . . . [T]here is a need to change the present situation in the demographic field." The new plan expropriated more than 20,000 dunums (4,900 acres) in the Galilee from Palestinian Arabs and more than a million and a half dunums (370,000 acres) in the Negev from Palestinian-Arab BEDOUIN.

The Arab National Committee for the Defense of the Lands (ANCDL) and RAKAH (the Communist Party in Israel) decided to call a general strike in NAZARETH and the surrounding area on 30 March 1976 to protest the government's plan. Ha'aretz, Israel's preeminent newspaper, reported on 21 March that "police reinforcements will be sent to Nazareth in order to respond to any action that will take place in the city." The Workers Council of HAIFA—the local council of the HISTADRUT (Zionist trade union federation) in the city—decided that if the Arab building workers struck, the Histadrut would not back them against their employers. On 19 March 1976 the ANCDL, together with the National Committee of the Arab Local Municipal Councils, appealed to the Israeli press and the Zionist left to prevent the army from entering the Arab villages. "We believe that the real interest of the state of Israel with all its citizens, Jews and Arabs, is totally opposed to the current policy of the government of expropriating and evicting Palestinian citizens from their lands. The land that still remains in Arabs' ownership is not enough to meet the basic needs for survival."

On 27 March 1976, Rabin met Police Minister Shlomo Hillel, together with representatives of the SHIN BET (the Israeli internal security service), and decided that the army, the police, and the border guard would suppress the strike by any and all means. On the evening before the strike, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) and the police moved into the Galilee with tanks and heavy artillery. They first entered the village of Arabee, where they burned properties, attacked protesters with tear gas, and wounded and arrested many people. The IDF then moved on to the town of Sakhnin and the village of Dir Hana.

On the morning of the strike in Nazareth, the IDF beat people on the streets and went to the house of the mayor, Tawfik Ziad, where they beat his mother, his wife, and his nine-year-old daughter and threatened to kill him. In solidarity with Palestinians in Israel, residents of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES decided to strike. In JERUSALEM the police beat leftist Jewish students demonstrating in front of the prime minister's residence, and in Tel Aviv the Communist Party held a small protest rally against the invasion of Arab villages.

The Communist Party was the main force in organizing the strike. Six Palestinian Arabs, citizens of Israel, were killed by the IDF, 96 were injured, and around 300 arrested.

Bibliography

- Ghanem, As'ad. The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel, 1948–2000: A Political Study. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.
- Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel, 1948–1966, 2nd ed. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1976.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Rouhana, Nadim. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities and Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Yiftachel, Oren. Ethnocracy: Land and Identity Politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.

Land Laws, Israel

Israel is the only democratic, advanced-economy country where the state or quasi-state agencies own the vast majority of the land area. An estimated 93 percent of the country's total landmass (excluding the territories occupied after the 1967 WAR) is owned by the state or by ISRAEL'S NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS—a situation enshrined in the BASIC LAW: "Israel Lands," passed on 25 July 1960.

Beginning in 1947, Israel passed a series of land laws that had the objective of "legalizing" or legitimizing Israel's usurpation of Palestinian land, homes, groves, orchards, livestock, bank accounts, jewelry, and other property. These laws also facilitated the transfer of this massive amount of property to Jewish IMMIGRANTS for Jewish-only use in perpetuity.

The 1960 Basic Law: "Israel Lands" codified and elevated all the previous land laws into one concise legal decree. According to the law, "the basis of the law is the special relationship between the People of Israel and the Land of Israel and its redemption." The law ensures that STATE LANDS remain Jewish national property in perpetuity. As defined in the Basic Law, "Israel lands" are owned by the following three bodies: the state of Israel, the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF), and the DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY. Furthermore, Article 1 of the Israel Lands Law stipulates that "the ownership of Israel lands . . . shall not be transferred either by sale or in any other manner."

The Land Laws grew out of a dispute between Israel's government and the JNF, one of the Jewish national institutions, which purchases land in Palestine to remain in perpetuity the property of the Jewish people. During and after the 1948 WAR the Israeli government intended to acquire title to all of the JNF land in the name of the state. The JNF, however, maintained that such land should belong to the Jewish people, not to the state, because the latter, given different political and demographic conditions, could not adequately guarantee lasting Jewish ownership.

Until 1960 the JNF managed its own landholdings, and the quarrel between Israel and the JNF over ownership of the "Land of Israel" was only settled in the Israel Land Laws through a significant compromise. In the settlement the JNF agreed to place its landholdings, without transferring title, under the supervision of the ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION and its governing body, the Israel Lands Council. The JNF, which owns about 13 percent of the total of Israel lands, appoints half (less one) of the members of the council, while the government appoints the other half (plus one). The JNF was allowed, however, to increase its pre-BRITISH MANDATE holdings by purchasing a certain amount of land seized by the state in the 1948 War as part of the compromise.

The state of Israel agreed in the settlement to incorporate into the land laws the JNF condition that the Israel Lands Administration would hold the land in perpetuity for use only by the Jewish people. The law stipulates that land in Israel can only be leased or sold to Jews, whether to those living in Israel or residing abroad. This means that Israel's non-Jewish Palestinian citizens are prohibited from buying or leasing land in Israel.

Bibliography

- Abu Sitta, Dr. Salman. "The Status of Palestinian Land in Israel." Palestine Remembered. 7 August 2001. www.palestineremembered.com/Acre/Right-Of-Return/Story441.html.
- Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva, Switzerland: COHRE and Badil, 2005.
- Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel, updated ed. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1977.
- Knesset. "Abandoned Areas Ordinance." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 1. Ordinance 5708. 1948.
- . "Absentees' Property (Amendment) Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 10. Ordinances 5716. 1956.
- . "Absentees' Property, Amendment No. 3. Release and Use of Endowment Property Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 19. 1965.
- . "Absentees' Property (Compensation) (Amendment) Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew. 1976.
- . "Absentees' Property Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew. vol. 4. Ordinance 5710. 1950.
- . "Amendment to the Emergency Land Requisition (Regulations) Law of 1949." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 6. Ordinance 5712. 1952.
- . "Amendment to the Emergency Land Requisition (Regulations) Law of 1949." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 9. Ordinance 5715. 1956.
- . "British Mandate Defense Emergency Regulations." The Palestine Gazette. 1442: 2. 27 (September 1945).

- . "Development Authority (Transfer of Property) Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 4. Ordinance 5710. 1950.
- . "Emergency Regulations Concerning Absentee Property." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 1. Ordinance 5708. 1948.
- . "Emergency Regulations (Security Zones)." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 3. Ordinance 5079. 1949.
- . "Emergency Regulations: Cultivation of Waste—Uncultivated—Lands." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 2. Ordinance 5709. 1949.
- . "Emergency Requisition Regulations Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 4. Ordinance 5710. 1949.
- . "Israel Land Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 23. 1969.
- . "Land (Acquisition for Public Purposes) Ordinance." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 34. 1943.
- . "Land Acquisition (Validation of Acts and Compensation) Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 7. Ordinance 5713. 1953.
- . "Legal and Administrative Matters Regulation Law: Consolidated Version." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 27. 1973.
- . "The Negev Land Acquisition (Peace Treaty with Egypt) Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 34. 1990.
- . "State Property Law." Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, vol. 5. 1951.
- Kretzmer, David. The Legal Status of the Arabs in Israel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Lehn, Walter. "The Jewish National Fund." Journal of Palestine Studies. 3:4 (1974).
- Orni, Efraim. Land in Israel: History, Policy, Administration, Development. Jerusalem: Jewish National Fund, 1981.
- Sohar, Ezra. Israel's Dilemma. New York: Shapolsky Publishers, 1989.

"Land Without People for a People Without Land"

"A land without people for a people without land" was the principal Zionist slogan in the early 1900s. It sought to convey the idea that Palestine was a land empty of people that the Zionists would settle and develop. An enormously effective propaganda tool, the slogan became embedded in the collective psyche of both Jews and non-Jews. ISRAEL ZANGWILL is often credited with creating the slogan, but various sources name other individuals as its author. What is important, however, is that the slogan was effective in galvanizing support for ZIONISM despite its historical fallaciousness.

Langer, Felicia (1930–)

Felicia Langer is an Israeli lawyer and human rights activist who has defended Palestinians throughout her career. Born in Poland, she fled her native country for the SOVIET UNION at the start of World War II but returned to Poland after the war and married a HOLOCAUST survivor. Although not a ZIONIST, she and her husband immigrated to Israel in 1950 because Langer wanted to be near her mother, who had settled there. Langer and her husband soon joined the Israeli Communist Party. In the early 1960s Langer became a lawyer, and after the 1967 OCCUPATION of the Palestinian territories she resigned her job in a Tel Aviv law firm and established a private practice in JERUSALEM to assist Palestinian political PRISONERS. Thereafter she dedicated her life to defending individual Palestinians and supporting the Palestinian cause.

Although she only infrequently won cases in her twenty-three-year career, she counts her successful defense in 1979 of NABLUS mayor BASSAM SHAKA'A as the high point. Shaka'a had been a PLO supporter and outspoken critic of the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS and was subsequently accused of inciting TERRORISM with his public statements and issued an expulsion order. Shortly after this expulsion order was overturned in the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT with Langer's assistance, an Israeli terrorist group planted a bomb in his car, leaving him a double amputee.

For her work Langer suffered hardship and ostracism from her fellow Israelis and lived under the permanent threat of violence. During the First INTIFADA Langer wrote that the ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM broke down completely, with hundreds of Palestinian prisoners herded into daily sentencing sessions that lacked even minimal decorum. Langer said: "I was supposed to represent clients I had never met before so I could not prepare myself to defend them. It came to the point where I was no longer physically able to walk into a courtroom and address the judge as 'your honor,' I felt I just couldn't say the words anymore. As a gesture of protest I closed my Jerusalem law office and left the country."

In 1990 she left Israel in self-imposed exile, settling in Tübingen, GERMANY, where she lectures at the university. Also in 1990 she was honored with the Right Livelihood Award (known as the Alternative Nobel Peace Prize) “for the exemplary courage of her struggle for the basic rights of the Palestinian people.” In 1991 Langer was awarded the Bruno Kreisky Award for Outstanding Achievements in the Area of Human Rights. In 2005 Langer was awarded the Erich Mühsam Prize for her continuing struggle for the human rights of Palestinian people. In July 2009, German president Horst Kohler awarded her the Federal Cross of Merit. For many years Langer was vice president of the Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights. A prolific writer, she is the author of a number of books documenting Israeli human rights violations, including With My Own Eyes (1975), These Are My Brothers (1979), An Age of Stone (1987), Fury and Hope (1993) (autobiographical), Appearance and Truth in Palestine (1999); Miecius Report: Youth between the Ghetto and Theresienstadt (1999), Quo Vadis Israel? The New Intifada of the Palestinians (2001).

Langer’s major books in German include Zorn und Hoffnung (Fury and Hope); Brücke der Träume (Bridge of Dreams); Wo Hass keine Grenzen Kennt (Where Hatred Is Boundless); Lasst uns wie Menschen leben (Let Us Live as Human Beings); Miecius später Bericht (Miecius’s Late Story); Brandherd Nahost (Troublespot Mideast); and Die Frau, die niemals schweigt (The Woman, Who Is Never Silent).

Langer has also undertaken numerous speaking tours in Europe and the UNITED STATES.

Lausanne Conference, 1949

The Lausanne Conference, the first peace conference on Palestine and Israel, was convened on 27 April 1949 in Switzerland under the auspices of the UN PALESTINE CONCILIATION COMMISSION (PCC). The PCC had been created the previous year to “achieve a final settlement of all questions outstanding” between Arabs and Jews in Palestine. The future of the Palestinians was decided at Lausanne.

In attendance were the UNITED STATES, FRANCE, TURKEY, EGYPT, SYRIA, LEBANON, JORDAN, and Israel. The Palestinians did not have their own independent delegate, although a Palestinian adviser, AHMAD SHUQAYRI, was attached to the Syrian delegation. The most immediate problem faced by the PCC was the situation of the Palestinian REFUGEES from the 1948 WAR. The organizers believed that unless their long-term plight was alleviated, they would be an unrelenting source of instability as well as a humanitarian disgrace. There was, however, no discussion at the conference of the political rights of the Palestinians, nor of the state that UN RESOLUTION 181 had mandated for them. Everyone involved appeared to accept Jordan’s occupation and Egypt’s administration of the areas. Israel was unwilling to make any concessions on the refugees and preferred the ARMISTICE AGREEMENTS to peace treaties that would require territorial concessions and the repatriation of some number of refugees. Although the Arab states were adamant about the refugee issue, several Arab leaders were prepared to compromise. For example, Syria’s ruler Husni Zaim proposed that he and Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION meet personally to discuss a possible peace treaty, although Ben-Gurion rejected the offer. However, Israel for the first time accepted the principle of repatriation and the internationalization of JERUSALEM, but “did so as a mere exercise in public relations aimed at strengthening Israel’s international image” and winning admission to the UNITED NATIONS. Walter Eytan, head of the Israeli delegation, stated, “My main purpose was to begin to undermine the protocol of 12 May which we had signed only under the duress of our struggle for admission to the UN. Refusal to sign would . . . have immediately been reported to the Secretary-General and the various governments.” Israel was admitted to the UN, but once a member, it failed to implement the refugee repatriation and internationalization of Jerusalem under which it was approved.

The US State Department delineated its policy for Lausanne on 19 January in top-secret instructions from Acting Secretary of State Robert A. Lovett to US delegate Mark F. Ethridge just before he departed for Switzerland. The United States believed the boundaries of the new state of Israel should be those defined by the 1947 UN Resolution 181 and that “Israel is not entitled” to retain its conquests from the 1948 War beyond those BORDERS, Lovett said. He added that, “if Israel desires additions to its territory Israel should make territorial concessions elsewhere.” Israeli defense minister MOSHE DAYAN and Ben-Gurion claimed that the Jewish state could not survive within those borders (now known as the pre-1967 lines).

Lovett told Ethridge that the status of Jerusalem should remain as called for in UN Resolution 181, receiving “special and separate treatment from the rest of Palestine and should be placed under effective United Nations control.” The US position on the Palestinian refugees, according to Lovett, followed UN RESOLUTION 194—that of repatriation or compensation. And Lovett indicated that the United States “favors incorporation of a greater part of Arab Palestine into Transjordan [Jordan after 1950]. The remainder might be divided among other Arab states as seems desirable.”

As early as 28 March 1949, Ethridge reported to the State Department that “failure of the Jews to [settle the refugee problem] has prejudiced the whole cause of peaceful settlement in this part of the world.” On 11 April he wrote a personal letter to President HARRY TRUMAN: “The Jews . . . still feel too strongly that their security lies in military might instead of in good relations with their neighbors. The Arabs have made what the Commission [PCC] considers very great concessions; the Jews have made none so far.”

At the end of May Truman sent a message to Israel stating that the United States was “seriously disturbed by the attitude of Israel with respect to a territorial settlement in Palestine and to the question of Palestinian refugees. The US government is gravely concerned lest Israel now endanger the possibility of arriving at a solution of the Palestine problem in such a way as to contribute to the establishment of sound and friendly relations between Israel and its neighbors. . . . The government of Israel should entertain no doubt whatever that the US government relies upon it to take responsible and positive action concerning Palestine refugees and that, far from supporting excessive Israeli claims to further territory within Palestine, the US government believes that it is necessary for Israel to offer territorial compensation for territory which it expects to acquire beyond the boundaries of the UN partition plan.” If Israel continued to ignore the advice of the United Nations and the United States, the president wrote, “the US government will regretfully be forced to the conclusion that a revision of its attitude toward Israel has become unavoidable.”

Despite this firm warning, US diplomats in the region reported that Israel continued to display a “voracious territorial appetite,” “expansionist ambitions,” and “take it or leave it attitude,” with threats of force if it did not get what it wanted. By July the American consul in Jerusalem reported that “the favorable opportunity for settlement” generated at the 26 February Israel-Egypt armistice agreement “has now passed” because of Israel’s “harsh terms.”

When the Lausanne peace talks ended in failure with no agreement on 15 September 1949, Ethridge placed the blame on Israel: “If there is to be any assessment of blame for stalemate at Lausanne, Israel must accept primary responsibility. Her attitude toward the refugees is morally reprehensible and politically short-sighted. Her position as conqueror demanding more does not make for peace. It makes for more trouble. There was never a time in the life of the commission when a generous and far-sighted attitude on the part of the Jews would not have unlocked peace.” It should be noted that, in spite of Truman’s stern letter to Israel, the US president undertook no actions with serious repercussions or any measures that Israel could interpret as sanctions.

See also ARMISTICE AGREEMENTS; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Bailey, Sydney D. Four Arab-Israeli Wars and the Peace Process. London: Macmillan, 1990.
- Caplan, Neil. “A Tale of Two Cities: The Rhodes and Lausanne Conferences, 1949.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 21:3 (1992).
- . A Tale of Two Cities: The Rhodes and Lausanne Conferences. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1994.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon, 1987.
- Forsythe, David P. United Nations Peacemaking: The Conciliation Commission for Palestine. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1972.
- Medzini, Meron. Israel’s Foreign Relations: Selected Documents, 1947–1974, vol. 1. Jerusalem: Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1976.
- Neff, Donald. “1949 Lausanne Conference Seals Fate of Palestine.” Washington Report of the Middle East. April 1996.
- Pappé, Ilan. The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951. London: I. B. Tauris, 1992.
- Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time. Tel Aviv: Steimatzy’s Agency, 1976.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- US Department of State. Foreign Relations of the United States 1949, vol. 6, The Near East, South Asia, and Africa. Washington, DC: US Government Printing Office, 1977.

Lavon Affair

The Lavon Affair was a scandal resulting from a failed Israeli covert operation in EGYPT known as Operation Susannah, in which Israeli military intelligence planted bombs in Egyptian-, US-, and British-owned targets in Egypt in the summer of 1954. Apparently it was hoped that Britain, and especially the UNITED STATES, would believe that the Egyptian government was responsible, and their relations with Egypt would become strained. In particular Israel wanted to halt Western support for Egyptian control of the Suez Canal. The Lavon Affair was named after the Israeli defense minister Pinhas Lavon, who was forced to resign after the incident became known to Israel's governing elite. Israel admitted responsibility only in 2005, when Israeli president Moshe Katsav honored the nine surviving Egyptian Jewish agents who were involved, presenting each with a certificate of appreciation for their efforts on behalf of the state.

Operation Susannah

According to Israeli historian Shabtai Teveth, who wrote one of the more detailed accounts of the Lavon Affair, the assignment was "to undermine Western confidence in the existing [Egyptian] regime by generating public insecurity and actions to bring about arrests, demonstrations, and acts of revenge, while totally concealing the Israeli factor. The team was accordingly urged to avoid detection."

Israeli operatives in Egypt had been recruited several years before, when an Israeli intelligence officer arrived in Cairo, working undercover as a British citizen of Gibraltar. He recruited several Egyptian Jews who had previously been active in illegal emigration activities and trained them for covert operations.

Egyptian authorities arrested one of the spies when his bomb ignited accidentally, and incriminating evidence was found in his apartment, including the names of accomplices to the operation. As a result several suspects were arrested, including Egyptian Jews and undercover Israelis.

One member of the group managed to escape, another died in prison, and a third committed suicide. The trial of the others began on 11 December 1954 and lasted until 27 January 1955; two of the accused were condemned to execution by hanging, two were acquitted, and the rest received lengthy prison terms.

Political Aftermath

In meetings with Prime Minister MOSHE SHARETT, Secretary of Defense Pinhas Lavon denied any knowledge of the operation. When the chief of intelligence contradicted Lavon, Sharett commissioned a board of inquiry consisting of the ISRAELI

SUPREME COURT and the first chief of staff of the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES. They were unable to find conclusive evidence that Lavon had authorized the operation. Lavon tried to place the blame on SHIMON PERES, the secretary general of the Defense Ministry, accusing him of insubordination and criminal negligence. Sharett resolved the dilemma by siding with Peres, who along with MOSHE DAYAN testified against Lavon, after which Lavon resigned. Former prime minister David Ben-Gurion succeeded Lavon as minister of defense. A short time later Sharett, who did not know about the operation in advance and had strongly denied Israel's involvement, resigned as prime minister and was replaced by Ben-Gurion.

In 1956 an inquiry found that the perjury indeed had been committed, and that Lavon had not authorized the operation. Sharett and Levi Eshkol tried to issue a statement that would placate both Lavon and his opponents. Ben-Gurion refused to accept the compromise and viewed it as a divisive play within the MAPAI party. After another investigative committee sided with the Cohen inquiry, Ben-Gurion resigned from his post as defense minister. This led to the expulsion of Lavon from the HISTADRUT labor union and an early call for new elections that changed the political structure in Israel.

In April 1960 another inquiry found that Lavon had no knowledge of the affair. It should be noted that the specifics of Operation Susannah were not public at the time of the political upheaval.

Legacy

Operation Susannah and the Lavon Affair were disastrous for Israel in several ways. The most important was that Israel lost significant standing and credibility with the United Kingdom and the United States and created a rift that would take years to repair—exactly the opposite of its intentions.

Bibliography

- Black, Ian, and Benny Morris. Israel's Secret Wars: A History of Israel's Intelligence Services. New York: Grove Press, 1992.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.
- Teveth, Shabtai. Ben-Gurion's Spy: The Story of the Political Scandal That Shaped Modern Israel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.
- Teveth, Shabtai, and David Zinder Teveth. Moshe Dayan: The Soldier, the Man, the Legend. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1973.

Law of Return, 1950

Israel's DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE of 14 May 1948 embodied the right of return: "The State of Israel will be open for Jewish IMMIGRATION and for the ingathering of the exiles." On 5 July 1950, this right was codified into a BASIC LAW, which was amended, in 1970, to grant the right to immigrate to Israel to non-Jews who are either children or grandchildren of a Jew, the spouse of a Jew, or the spouse of a child or grandchild of a Jew. The amendment was intended to accept Jewish families, mainly from the former SOVIET UNION, where mixed marriages were abundant and where individuals and family members not considered Jews under the traditional definition nevertheless wanted to immigrate to Israel.

The Law of Return has been the subject of much controversy, because it is an exclusive Jewish right and excludes Palestinian REFUGEES who wish to return home to their native land. In theory, the Israeli law does not categorically exclude non-Jews from immigrating to Israel. Any person who wishes to settle in Israel may do so, at least hypothetically. In practice, Israel has prevented Palestinians from returning to their homeland. Non-Jews who are permitted to return must meet the requirements set forth in the Law of Entry to Israel (1952) and the Law of Citizenship (1952), regarding naturalization.

See also DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, ISRAEL; REFUGEES AND THE RIGHT OF RETURN

Bibliography

Knesset. Law of Return. 5710-1950. Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. 5 July 1950. www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/MFAArchive/1950\_1959/Law%20of%20Return%205710-1950.

League of Arab States (Arab League)

As ZIONISM gained a foothold in the postcolonial Middle East, the newly sovereign Arab states founded the League of Arab States in 1945 to protect and further their territorial, economic, and political well-being. The earliest members included EGYPT, IRAQ, LEBANON, SAUDI ARABIA, SYRIA, Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950), and Yemen. Later membership included Algeria (1962), Bahrain (1971), Comoros (1993), Djibouti (1977), KUWAIT (1961), Libya (1953), Mauritania (1973), Morocco (1958), Oman (1971), Qatar (1971), Somalia (1974), Southern Yemen (1967), Sudan (1956), Tunisia (1958), and the United Arab Emirates (1971).

Although sometimes criticized for its "apparent political irrelevance and futility," the role of the Arab League has been significant though not always visible in Middle East politics, especially in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Since its founding the League has faced daunting obstacles in the ideological schisms among its members and in protecting the welfare of the stateless Palestinians. However, despite considerable flaws in fulfilling its purpose of "strengthening of the relations between the member-states, the coordination of their policies in order to achieve cooperation between them and to safeguard their independence and sovereignty," the League has played a notable role in communicating Arab interests vis-à-vis Israel, despite the power disparity between the two sides.

Perhaps the Arab League's most effective undertaking has been its economic boycott of Israel. Adopted after the 1948 War, the boycott is an effort to isolate Israel economically in support of the Palestinians. It was conceived to prevent Arab states, and to discourage non-Arab ones, from providing support to Israel and adding to Israel's economic and military strength.

The boycott specifically focuses on three areas: products and services that originate in Israel (referred to as the primary boycott and still enforced in a few Arab states), companies in non-Arab countries that do business with Israel (the secondary boycott), and companies that do business with firms that shipped or flew to Israeli ports (the tertiary boycott). At one point the boycott was observed by the entire Arab League, but today only Lebanon and Syria adhere to it stringently.

Although it cannot be estimated to what extent the boycott has hurt Israel's economy, it is likely less than the Arabs intended. Moreover, the Arab countries have suffered economically from the boycott as well. In its report on the cost of conflict in the Middle East, Strategic Foresight Group estimates that Arab states have lost the opportunity to export $10 billion worth of goods to Israel between 2000 and 2010.

Because of the boycott, certain products and brands that were ubiquitous elsewhere in the world, such as Pepsi, McDonald's, and most Japanese cars, were not to be found in Israel until the boycott began waning in the late 1980s. A similar situation existed in the Arab world, which boycotted the products of companies that were selling in Israel, as is the case with Coca-Cola.

Despite the boycott, Israeli goods often do make it to Arab markets in boycott countries.

Typically, the Israeli goods are sent to a second country and then reshipped to the Arab state. Cyprus is the most significant transshipment point. In 2001, Cyprus imported $164 million in Israeli goods, but only exported $27.5 million to Israel. It is probable that the bulk of that enormous Israeli trade surplus ended up in the Arab world.

Although the Arab League repeatedly affirmed that Palestine is a part of the Arab motherland, its concerted efforts to foil British and Zionist colonization ultimately failed. In 1948, under the auspices of the Arab League, seven states sought (but failed) to stop what they perceived as the consolidation of a settler-colony that endangered not only their security but also the heart of their collective identity in Palestine.

After Israel's defeat of Arab forces and the subsequent Nakba (Catastrophe), in which over 750,000 Palestinians fled or were forced from their cities and villages, the League became a symbol of the disappointing results of pan-Arabism in a region of states with competing interests. Often this ideology served a rhetorical purpose but produced little concrete action. Meaningful cooperation among Arab states became increasingly illusory, as the League endured numerous setbacks in political and economic development. In almost all respects the League of Arab States lagged behind similar regional organizations throughout the world. Nevertheless, in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict the Arab League did serve a constructive function under the leadership of Egypt's JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR. But the relationship between the League and the Palestinians was never simple, especially regarding Palestinian aspirations for statehood. To further the perception that Egypt championed the Palestinian cause, in 1964, under the auspices of the League, Nasir engineered the creation of an entity for the liberation of Palestine—the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO)—and was reluctantly joined by Jordan's King Husayn. By forming and recognizing the PLO as an independent representative agent, the Arab League facilitated the eventual international recognition of the Palestinians as a people with their own leadership. Under the PLO the Palestinians gained a place among the Arab nations, even though they did not become full members of the League until 1988.

After their crushing defeat by Israel in the 1967 WAR, the Arab states did not have much to offer the Palestinians, aside from inclusion in the League. League members found themselves in a precarious position when Egypt, the strongest Arab state and a key founder of the League, commenced peace talks with Israel that culminated in the 1979 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS and the 1979 peace treaty. As a result, the League expelled Egypt, although the country regained membership in 1987.

During the uncertain post-9/11 climate the peace processes of the 1990s eventually produced the ARAB PEACE INITIATIVE OF 2002. In it the Arab League insisted on “full Israeli withdrawal from all the Arab territories occupied since June 1967; implementation of [UN] SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338”; and “Israel's acceptance of an independent Palestinian state with East JERUSALEM as its capital, in return for the establishment of normal relations in the context of a comprehensive peace with Israel.” But except for ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in 2005, the status quo remains, and Arab peace offers continue to be rejected.

See also ARAB PEACE INITIATIVE, 2002 AND 2007; ARAB STATE PEACE OVERTURES, 1949–PRESENT; ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC

Bibliography

- Arab Peace Initiative. 28 March 2002. Embassy of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. www.jordanembassyus.org/arab\_initiative.htm#ai.
- Kerr, Malcolm. “The League of Arab States: A Study in the Dynamics of Regional Organization.” Political Science Quarterly. 82:1 (1967).
- Khalil, Muhammad. The Arab States and the Arab League: A Documentary Record. Beirut: Khayats, 1962.
- League of Arab States Charter. 22 March 1945. Yale University. www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/mideast/arableag.htm.
- MacDonald, Robert W. The League of Arab States: A Study in the Dynamics of Regional Organization. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1965.
- Zurayk, Constantine. The Meaning of the Disaster. Beirut: Khayat's College Book Cooperative, 1956.

—Khalil M. Marrarr

League of Nations

See COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Lebanon

The early twentieth century witnessed the simultaneous growth of two political projects in the East Mediterranean–Arab region. The first, championed by the Christian Maronite Church, aimed at establishing a state of Lebanon under MARONITE domination. This goal was promoted by a group of Maronite elite, both clerical and lay, that introduced and spread new political doctrines based on Lebanese nationalism; the “special nature” of Lebanon; the philosophy of confessionalism (the system of a multisectarian society in which religious sects act as political subjects, and political structures, institutions, and practices reflect the weight of religious groups in society); and the idea of Lebanese territorial autonomy. This Maronite elite carried out its project under the protection of and in alliance with FRANCE. The political doctrines of the project developed in the preceding century as a consequence of several factors, including the Maronite Church’s replacement of a feudal class and its assumption of community leadership, the socioeconomic disturbances of the time, civil strife between Druze and Maronites, and the Mutasarrifiyya system (1861–1914).

The second political project, promoted by the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, aimed at establishing a dominant Jewish presence in Palestine. The BASEL PROGRAM of August 1897 inspired ZIONISM’s efforts to colonize Palestine. After many failed attempts to find an international benefactor, the Zionist movement finally secured the support of Great Britain, which was expressed in the BALFOUR DECLARATION of 2 November 1917. Eventually both the Maronite and the Zionist projects succeeded. A Maronite-dominated State of Greater Lebanon was proclaimed on 1 September 1920 as a French dependency, followed by a Lebanese Republic on 23 March 1926. During the BRITISH MANDATE a major portion of Palestine was gradually transformed into the Jewish state of Israel, formally declared on 15 May 1948.

Early Encounters with Zionism

The new Lebanon was a historical novelty. France occupied the country during World War I, and subsequently a mandate from the League of Nations legitimized its rule over Mount Lebanon and SYRIA. French authorities, however, were soon frustrated by the hostility of Syria’s population and its pan-Arab nationalism, which produced insistent calls for Arab unity and independence. Because France did not intend to accommodate the Arab nationalists, it decided to appease the Maronite minority, in the belief that the Maronites would be loyal allies and support French interests in the region. Thus Paris first revived and enlarged the recently abolished Mutasarrifiyya (“Little Lebanon”) enclave. On 2 August 1920, France incorporated into Mount Lebanon all the administrative regions of the Beqa’a Valley that had formerly been part of the Vilayat of Damascus. On 31 August 1921, France further enlarged the new entity; it integrated into it major parts of the former Vilayats of Beirut, Tripoli and Sidon, and the hinterland of the latter two.

What the new entity gained in territory, however, it lost in social harmony and stability, because two permanent elements were introduced into its political life. The first element was the sharp increase in the number of Muslims. Unlike Mount Lebanon, which had a dominant Christian (primarily Maronite) population, the republic of Lebanon had at best only a slight Christian majority. This demographic change upset the former balance of power and expectations. Although the French authorities gave the Maronite elite political power in the new entity, the arrangement was tenuous and in time would certainly prove nonviable. Therefore, France and the Maronite elite sought to advance the prospects for Lebanon by securing the acquiescence of its Muslim and other Christian populations to their novel status by promoting the confessional traditions of nineteenth-century Mount Lebanon. Because confessionalism divided society into multiple competing groups, it allowed French officials to pursue an almost unchallenged policy of divide and rule. Paris calculated that the new system would weaken Arab nationalist solidarity and lessen the possibility of a common front hostile to foreign rule. It also assured the French that their most favored client, the Maronites, had a privileged position in the state. In the late 1930s and 1940s the confessional system was somewhat altered to co-opt the Muslim elite by offering them a more favorable share of political power.

The second element of the new system created in Lebanon was an immense and almost unbridgeable ideological chasm. Because each party’s interests were defined by ideology, sectarian disagreements were inflamed and made more intransigent and intense. The ideological split, which has plagued the national life of Lebanon for the past century, is that of pan-Arab nationalism versus Lebanese nationalism. Advocates of the former ideology emphasize the country’s Arab identity, wish to integrate the country with the Arab world’s politics and social life, and want to reduce its dependence on and alliance with foreign powers. Proponents of Lebanese nationalism prefer to emphasize the country's supposedly non-Arab distinctiveness and safeguard its Western orientation and alliances. These two differing political orientations not only affected domestic politics but, even more, affected the attitude of Lebanese political actors toward external issues and to relations with outsiders—not coincidentally, Israel and Palestine.

During the British occupation of Palestine and the French occupation of Lebanon, a limited, interrupted, and not particularly fruitful relationship developed between the Zionist movement and some Lebanese elements, primarily Maronite. The Zionist leadership in Palestine realized early on that their plans for the colonization of Palestine were adamantly opposed by the overwhelming majority of the Palestinian Arabs (Christian as well as Muslim) and by the people of the surrounding countries. Zionist leaders believed that alliances with other ethnic and religious minorities in the region were their best course to gain acceptance and support, and they viewed the Maronites of Lebanon as among the most likely candidates for an alliance. The JEWISH AGENCY and its political department in Palestine developed, promoted, and defended this minority alliance theory.

In fact a close examination of the record, including Israeli archives, indicates that the policy of minority alliances essentially failed in the case of Lebanon for several reasons. First, on the Lebanese side, relations between the two minority movements remained limited to a few members of the Maronite elite. Zionism's Lebanese interlocutors consisted of a subset of the Maronite elite, who were a minority of the Maronites. In turn the Maronites were a minority in Lebanon. Given the limited number of their contacts in Lebanon, the Zionist objective of winning over the Lebanese populace, or even the Maronite community, to their cause or gaining meaningful support from them was doomed from the outset. Second, the Maronite figures willing to deal with Zionists did so from narrow sectarian or private material interests rather than sympathy with or support for Zionism. When the Maronites' relations with Lebanese Muslims improved or when financial inducements were withheld, support for Zionism evaporated. Third, those Maronites willing to engage with Zionists were aware of their society's intense, widespread opposition to Zionism and feared the public outcry that would ensue if their activities became known. Therefore they insisted that their contacts and discussions with Zionist circles remain secret at all times. Despite the efforts and resources expended, Zionists failed to elicit any practical support from their Maronite contacts. Finally, Lebanese leaders were aware that plans for a future Jewish state invariably called for the agricultural LAND and WATER resources of South Lebanon to be annexed to Palestine. Any desires to collaborate with Zionists were, of necessity, tempered by the fear of Zionist encroachment on Lebanese territory. Collusion with Zionists came to be seen as high treason and a betrayal of the cause of Lebanon, condemning in the process the minority alliance theory.

In the late 1930s and early 1940s, attitudes of both Sunni Muslims and Maronite Christians changed, and a greater measure of mutual acceptance and cooperation developed. When Sunnis began receiving a fair share of government and economic spoils, demands for union with neighboring Arab states became less important than the apportionment of political offices and the distribution of wealth among the sects. Similarly, Maronite leaders adopted a more pragmatic outlook on the West (especially France), a more moderate view of Lebanese-Arab relations, and closer identification with and more support for Arab efforts in the conflict with Zionism. The changes in attitude between Lebanon's two major sects made Lebanese political life less doctrinaire. In the process they allowed the various groups to collaborate to end French rule and establish institutional arrangements for power sharing in an independent Lebanon. The new republic soon joined the LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES, and when the 1948 WAR erupted between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Lebanon was firmly in the Arab camp and the Zionist project in Lebanon totally collapsed.

Independent Lebanon: Relations with Israel and the Palestinians

After 1948 the official policy of successive Lebanese governments toward Israel and the Palestinian issue has traditionally been determined by two interrelated considerations: (1) Israeli threats to Lebanon's national security, territory, and natural resources; and (2) the presence of a large Palestinian REFUGEE community in the country. To counter the former, Lebanon joined the various collective security arrangements set up by the Arab countries, and its foreign policy emphasized to fail. Officially, Lebanese governments have, without exception, adhered to this position and rejected Israeli calls for settling Palestinian refugees in their host countries.

The foremost threat Israel poses to Lebanon can be seen as a threat to its fundamental principle, religious coexistence. Lebanon, the most religiously pluralistic society in the whole Middle East, has been the most sensitive to the dangers inherent in the existence of a Jewish/Zionist state in Palestine. Because it called for the establishment of an exclusively Jewish state, Zionism challenged the principle of religious coexistence, which is essential for maintaining stability and social harmony in the multireligious Lebanese society. One of the earliest and most penetrating analyses of the dangers Israel poses to Lebanon and the Arab world was made by the eminent Lebanese diplomat and philosopher Charles Malek, minister plenipotentiary to the United States and permanent delegate to the UNITED NATIONS. In a 15 August 1949 confidential report to the Foreign Ministry, entitled "On the Present Situation," Malek argued that the Palestinian Nakba (Catastrophe), or the loss of Palestine to the Arabs, mirrored an ongoing Arab Nakba, and that unless fundamental reforms were undertaken, Israel would dominate the Arab world within half a century. He further pointed out that Lebanon, an integral part of the Arab world, had to take a leading role in this reform movement because its raison d'être is respect for freedom of the mind, spirit, and expression. Similarly Bishara Al-Khuri, a Christian Maronite and the first president of the independent Lebanese republic, was the first Arab head of state to publicly denounce Zionism as "an exploitative idea for political control that has no connection whatsoever with religion." He expressed his government's fear of Zionist intrusions into South Lebanon and warned that Israel was about to incite interreligious conflict and promote the establishment of religious "mini-states" in surrounding countries. Such schemes, he wrote, would have disastrous effects on the Christians of Lebanon and the conditions of peace in the region.

The fears of these two prominent public figures that Israel would meddle in Lebanon's domestic affairs and foment civil strife proved prophetic. The Personal Diary of MOSHE SHARETT, Israel's first foreign minister, released in 1979, outlines a 1954 plan by DAVID BEN-GURION, Israel's first prime minister, to dismember Lebanon, establish a restricted and dependent Christian state in the image of Israel, and annex the territory south of the Litani River to Israel. This task was a principal objective, if not "the central duty," of Israel's foreign policy, he emphasized. Viewing Lebanon as the weakest link in the Arab chain, Ben-Gurion planned to break the chain by setting Lebanese Muslims and Christians against each other. Agents provocateurs and financial means—"no amount of dollars should be spared"—would be used to accomplish this design. Former Israeli defense minister MOSHE DAYAN, a supporter of the scheme, envisioned hiring a puppet Maronite Lebanese officer who would invite the Israeli army to invade the country under the pretext of saving the Lebanese Christians. Sharett's protests that the majority of Lebanese Maronites were satisfied with the power-sharing arrangements in the country and were loath to collaborate with Israel were not heeded, but Lebanon was spared what could have been a tragic fate when Israeli plans were suspended to prepare for a war with EGYPT. Elements of the Ben-Gurion plan, however, with its traditional underlying Zionist conception of Israeli interests and objectives in Lebanon, were put in effect during two major episodes of Israeli involvement in Lebanon: the civil war (1975–1990) and the Israeli invasion (1982), including the occupation of the southern parts of the country (1978–2000).

The Palestinians

The history of Lebanon's relationship with the Palestinian community and Israel's role in this relationship can be viewed in four successive and distinct phases: submission, standoff, confrontation, and subordination.

Submission Phase: 1948–1969. The founding of the state of Israel in Palestine in 1948 created additional concerns for Lebanon other than the threat of Israeli territorial expansion and meddling in Lebanon's internal affairs. Large numbers of Palestinians sought refuge in Lebanon in 1947–1948; the number was estimated by the UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY (UNRWA) at 127,600. Lebanon was a natural choice for many refugees because of their ancient social and commercial relations with its inhabitants. Others came because Lebanon was the closest country to their homes and villages. In time their numbers increased as other Palestinians sought refuge in Lebanon in 1967 and in 1970–1971.

The 1948 refugees included some professionals, entrepreneurs, capitalists, and skilled laborers who relocated to urban centers and made significant contributions to Lebanon's impressive economic development in the 1950s and 1960s. However, most refugees were peasants, many of whom were first assembled in deserted French and British army barracks and were later reassembled near the main coastal cities and a few locations in the interior in refugee camps. Originally there were sixteen camps: seven in Beirut (Tal al-Za'tar, Dikwane, and Jisr al-Pasha; Dhubayeh in East Beirut and its environs; and Burj al-Barajneh, Shatila, and Mar Ilyas in West Beirut); two in Sidon and its environs ('Ayn al-Hilwa and Al-Miya wa Miya); three in Tyre (Al-Bass, Al-Burj al-Shamali, and al-Rashidiya); one in the southern city of Nabatiya; two in Tripoli (Nahr al-Barid and Badawi); and one in Ba'albek (al-Jaleel). Today twelve camps remain, with four totally destroyed in the civil war (only Dhubayeh remains in the environs of East Beirut) or by Israeli shelling (Nabatiya). About half of the Palestinians in Lebanon reside in the coastal cities, while the rest are distributed among the various refugee camps.

In this phase (roughly the first two decades after their arrival in Lebanon), Palestinians were subject to constant surveillance and harsh police methods. In addition their attempts at organization, either political or social, were severely repressed. The lack of any legitimate organizational avenues for communal self-expression and identification led the politically conscious youth among the Palestinians to join the pan-Arab political parties, primarily the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS and the Arab Resurrection Socialist Party/BA'ATH. Because these parties were not officially recognized, their Palestinian members learned to organize and function underground. Their activities took the form of mass demonstrations and public rallies on significant national occasions. During this time the Lebanese secret service, the Deuxième Bureau, remained in control of the Palestinian camps.

Official Lebanese policy toward the Palestinians was motivated by security considerations as well as by internal issues. The pro-Western government believed the politicization of the camps and their revolutionary potential threatened its security, and its policies toward the Palestinians frequently used arbitrary and harsh measures, including arrests. Official state policy also imposed many restrictions on Palestinians, which were motivated by a desire to maintain the sectarian balance and by intercommunal suspicions. Palestinians were treated as foreigners and not allowed to work without PERMITS, which were difficult to obtain and valid only for a specific job at a specified place. Permits also had to be renewed yearly, and a worker who left his job had to have his permit reissued. Not surprisingly, only 2,362 Palestinians had work permits in 1969. Because of these difficulties, the majority of working Palestinians violated the law. Furthermore, they had to accept low wages and did not qualify for any work benefits. Palestinian freedom of movement was severely restricted. According to UNRWA and government regulations, families moving from one camp to another lost their UNRWA rations and other services, including the right to an EDUCATION. The regulations also gave the government the authority to transfer any Palestinian from one camp to another "for reasons of security."

The use of repressive policies continued until 1958 and the election of General Fu'ad Shihab to the presidency. Arab nationalist sentiment was at a high point in the country. The 1958 civil war had forced the government to make minor concessions and undertake some reforms. There was also a shift in attitude toward the Palestinians. Some practices were liberalized and the policy of outright collective discrimination was replaced by more selective measures. Political activism, however, was still not tolerated. Significantly, the first FATAH victim to be killed outside Palestine died in Lebanon at the hands of the Lebanese secret service.

In the mid-1960s a new consciousness began to emerge among the Palestinians. Arab heads of state, during their first summit conference in 1964, called for the establishment of an organization that would represent Palestinian interests. That decision produced the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), which, once established, encouraged the formation of independent Palestinian labor unions and professional associations. In the same period, many of the fidai'iyun, or commando organizations, were also founded, and a score of Palestinian organizations were formed, including the Movement for the National Liberation of Palestine (Fatah) in the late 1950s and HEROES OF THE RETURN in November 1966. Meanwhile, both the Movement of Arab Nationalists and the Arab Resurrection Socialist Party formed a special wing for their Palestinian members within their party structures.

After the 1967 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Palestinian activism took a definite shape. Israel's defeat of the Arab armies and the consequent loss of faith in existing regimes and leadership created a vacuum filled by popular Palestinian activism. The Palestinian resistance movement became the rallying point for the Arab masses, the symbol of their defiance of the status quo, and an expression of their rejection of defeat. With its dominant Palestinian element, JORDAN became their major base of operation, while Lebanon was a supporting front. Between June 1967 and April 1969 the resistance worked on two fronts to establish itself in Lebanon. First, it had to infiltrate and organize the refugee camps in spite of the government's tight security arrangements. The living conditions in the camps and the long-standing subjugation of their inhabitants made them receptive to the emerging movement. Second, the resistance had to establish a military presence in South Lebanon to secure itself against both Israeli attacks and the opposition of the Lebanese army. There were serious clashes between the army and units of the resistance, which were either attempting to infiltrate Israel or were returning from missions inside Israeli territory. Frequent Israeli raids into Lebanon worsened the relationship between the army and the resistance. The Lebanese army, which was ill-equipped, could not face the far superior numbers and weapons of the Israelis and feared that under the pretext of retaliatory action for Palestinian attacks, Israel might invade and occupy South Lebanon. Army discontent reached new heights.

After a Palestinian attack on an El Al Israeli airliner in Athens, Israel raided the Beirut International Airport on 27 December 1968 and destroyed thirteen Lebanese civilian airliners on the ground; the Lebanese government felt helpless in the face of Israeli threats and decided to confront the resistance. In 1969 there were several serious clashes between the army and the resistance, but the Lebanese army was unable to achieve any decisive victories. In August and September the refugee camps revolted against the Lebanese government and expelled the security forces stationed there. The resistance then assumed control of the camps. These clashes polarized Lebanese public opinion and led to the longest government crisis in Lebanese history. For almost eight months the country remained without a cabinet. Facing increasing domestic and Arab pressure, the Lebanese government accepted Egyptian mediation. The day after Lebanese and Palestinian delegations met in Cairo, on 2 November 1969, the secret Cairo Agreement was reached, which listed the principles that would govern relations between the two sides. One month later a new Lebanese cabinet was formed.

Standoff Phase: 1969–1973. The Cairo Agreement consists of two parts. The first part defines the relationship between the Lebanese authorities and the Palestinian community in Lebanon (and its resistance organizations). It outlines four principles: (1) the right of work, residence, and freedom of movement for Palestinians in Lebanon; (2) the founding of local Palestinian committees in refugee camps, which would cooperate with local authorities to safeguard the interests of the inhabitants; (3) an armed Palestinian military police in the camps to ensure discipline and to regulate the carrying of arms; and (4) the right of Palestinians in Lebanon to join the ARMED STRUGGLE of the Palestinian revolution.

The second part of the agreement covers the various military aspects of the relationship between the two sides. Three of the fifteen clauses are of special significance. In the first, Lebanon agreed to facilitate the passage of Palestinian commandos through its territory and to allow them to establish observation posts on the border with Israel. The seventh clause called for resistance representatives to be stationed in Lebanese army headquarters to deal with any emergencies that arose in the camps. Finally, in the fourteenth clause the two delegations affirmed that the Palestinian armed struggle was as much in the interest of Lebanon as it was integral to the Palestinian revolution and the Arabs as a whole.

The Cairo Agreement began a new phase in Lebanese-Palestinian relations, although the Lebanese political leadership accepted the changing realities only after a long period of political and social crisis made them recognize the amount of support for the Palestinians among the Lebanese people. But the complete dominance of the Lebanese authorities over the Palestinian community in Lebanon was over. Because the Palestinians had been radicalized and had acquired military strength, they were better equipped to resist government attempts to suppress them. Undoubtedly, the proliferation within Lebanese society of sentiments and organizations opposed to the status quo and the natural solidarity of many Lebanese with the Palestinian cause were the necessary conditions for this transition. Although the agreement produced a relatively peaceful relationship for the next three years, it was not final. In retrospect, it gave the government the time it needed to make its second attempt to confront the resistance.

