The period from November 1969 to April 1973 witnessed several dramatic developments. The first was a product of the fierce clashes between the Jordanian army and the Palestinian resistance in September 1970 (BLACK SEPTEMBER) and in February, June, and July 1971. The defeat of the Palestinian resistance and its expulsion from Jordan made Lebanon its only place of refuge. Beginning in the second half of 1971, the number of armed resistance members in Lebanon increased significantly. The second major development was an increase in the tempo and ferocity of Israeli attacks on Lebanon in response to Palestinian incursions across the border. Israel's actions took several forms: shelling of southern Lebanese villages, search-and-destroy missions, the invasion and occupation of different border areas with large forces for varying lengths of time, aerial raids on Lebanese civilian targets and Palestinian refugee camps, naval bombardment of coastal refugee camps, and commando assaults into the country's interior. The Israeli attacks on Lebanese territory between November 1969 and April 1973 resulted in considerable destruction in Lebanon and indicated Israel's commitment to the obliteration of the Palestinian resistance.

Conflict between Lebanese government forces and the resistance broke out after three prominent Palestinian leaders were assassinated during an Israeli raid in Beirut on 10 April 1973. Intense fighting between the army and the resistance in different parts of the country erupted on 2 May and continued unabated until 9 May. Like the June 1969 clashes, those of May 1973 seem to have ended under the influence of three factors: (1) the inability of the Lebanese government to resolve the conflict militarily; (2) rising pressures from other Arab countries, especially Syria; and (3) the threat of civil war. The events of May 1973, like those of June 1969, transformed Lebanese-Palestinian relations. The new phase is best described as one of confrontation.

Confrontation Phase: 1973–1982. The end of open violence did not lead to the cessation of hostilities. Both sides were not satisfied. Lebanon's president and the army had failed to contain the resistance and its activities, and they were unable to revoke the Cairo Agreement. Events also seemed to corroborate the worst fears of the resistance—namely, that the Lebanese government would continue to seek its liquidation and would not willingly abide by common agreements. In addition, the resistance thought the government was part of a larger, internationally inspired scheme aimed at its destruction.

The period following May 1973 witnessed a hardening of positions. The resistance became more heavily dependent on its bases in Lebanon, Israeli raids intensified, and Lebanese public outrage increased. Armed militias of the PHALANGE and National Liberal parties became large, massively equipped private armies that added a new source of tension. The widespread distribution of weapons among civilians increased the possibility that accidental clashes would escalate into large-scale engagements. The system of checks and balances found in Lebanon's institutional infrastructure did not exist at the popular level, and mass violence can paralyze state institutions. The result was a Lebanese society unable to stop violence without outside assistance or intervention. This, on a small scale, was the lesson of the civil war of 1958, and Lebanon unfortunately experienced a repetition of this drama on a much larger scale after April 1975.

The civil war was triggered by two incidents in 1975. The first, a purely Lebanese affair, was the assassination in late February of Ma'ruf Sa'd, a popular Muslim leader from Sidon and a former member of parliament. This incident produced a nationwide controversy over the composition and impartiality of the army and led to a national debate over socioeconomic issues, which threatened the stability of Lebanon's political life that had traditionally divided the Lebanese along sectarian lines.

The second incident took place on 13 April 1975, when militiamen, reputedly belonging to the Phalangist party, ambushed a bus in the Beirut district of 'Ayn al-Rumaneh and murdered its twenty-six Palestinian occupants. The incident produced a series of fierce clashes between Phalangists and the resistance and led to a cabinet crisis. A prolonged confrontation between the two sides would naturally assume a sectarian coloring because the Phalangist party was exclusively Christian and portrayed itself as the champion of Christian interests. These two incidents reflected a growing trend within Lebanon: conflicts arising out of the armed presence of the Palestinians were superimposed on socioeconomic and political conflicts between Lebanon's religious sects, which created mutually reinforcing fractures in Lebanese society. Lebanese political movements split between two coalitions: the progressive Lebanese National Movement and the conservative Lebanese Front. Each side, fearing destruction at the hands of the other, forged external alliances to support its political and military programs.

The confrontation phase went through five stages. The first stage lasted from the serious breakdown in public order after Prime Minister Rashid al-Solh resigned on 15 May 1975 to the reformist presidential message of 14 February 1976, commonly referred to as the "Constitutional Document." In this stage the combatants were mainly Lebanese groups. Domestic issues dominated political discourse, clashes were primarily confined to Beirut and its environs, and fighting involved mutual shelling across stationary boundaries. At this stage, the Palestinian resistance was only partially involved, fluctuating between behind-the-scenes backing of nationalist forces and restrained, limited assaults. Its objectives were limited: to guarantee its continued presence in the country; to ensure that its allies, the forces of the Lebanese National Movement, were not defeated; and to prevent the "Arabization" or "internationalization" of the conflict and thus loss of Palestinian control.

The second stage of this phase extended from mid-February to late May 1976, when differences between the two sides assumed a more ideological tone and thus became more difficult to resolve. There was less willingness to compromise and a greater faith in military solutions. Also the Palestinian resistance, which had been a sporadic participant, now became crucially involved. Two significant developments brought about this change. The first was the escalation of fighting by Christian militia groups during the month of January, their increasingly frequent attacks on Palestinian camps, and the entrance of the Lebanese army into the battle against the forces of the National Movement and the resistance. Since this came after the Sinai II Agreement between Israel and Egypt, most Palestinian leaders felt that their fate had become inextricably linked to that of the Lebanese National Movement. Therefore they decided to throw their full weight into fighting.

The second was the intensification of international intervention. Other states, both Arab and non-Arab, became more heavily committed to supplying their proxies with materials to carry on a war that none could pursue independently.

This second stage produced the total disintegration of Lebanese state institutions; the civil service, police, and the army ceased to function. The unsuccessful coup d'état of 11 March 1976 fragmented the army into several warring bands. The reintegration of Lebanon was further hindered by the forced internal migration of Muslim minorities from Christian-dominated sectors and vice versa. These migrations, in turn, contributed to a de facto partition of the country.

The third stage began on 31 May 1976, when regular units of the Syrian army entered Lebanon on the side of the right-wing coalition of Christian parties, reversing decades of support for the Lebanese National Movement and the Palestinians. The Lebanese Front and its military wing, the Lebanese Forces, were losing; Syria stepped in to save them so Israel would have no pretext for invasion. This direct and large-scale Syrian participation in the war radically altered the objectives of both sides. For the National Movement and the resistance, the presence of Syrian troops frustrated their military and political objectives and led to serious divisions in and defections from their ranks. The open conflict between the Syrians and the Palestinians had a devastating effect on the resistance, which had long considered relations with Syria of paramount importance. In contrast, the Syrian intervention was a blessing to the conservative Christian parties, which expanded their objectives and demanded total disarmament of the resistance. They called also for the expulsion of Palestinian fighters, and some even went so far as to announce their intent to relocate most of the Palestinian population to other Arab countries. After their capture of Jisr al-Pasha, Nab'a, and Tal al-Za'tar, all former strongholds of the National Movement and the resistance, the militancy of the Christian parties became more pronounced.

The fourth stage began with the transfer of presidential authority to Elias Sarkis on 23 September 1976 and primarily featured the large-scale involvement of Syria and Israel. Since these two regional powers chose for different reasons not to engage each other directly, their confrontation took place indirectly in Lebanon. Syria attempted to check the inroads Israel made in Lebanon principally by frustrating the ambitions of the Lebanese Front and resuming its support for the Palestinian resistance, while Israel confronted the Syrians by backing the SAAD HADDAD enclave in the southern region and by trying to build an alliance with the militant leadership of the military branch of the Lebanese Front.

Israel developed a three-pronged policy to deal with Lebanon's civil war. In addition to targeting Palestinian refugee camps and military installations, the first prong was to wage continuous attacks on Lebanese civilians and their economic infrastructure to create a rift between the two communities. Israel wanted Lebanese nationals to blame the Palestinians for their losses and turn against them. The policy achieved significant though not total success. The second prong in Israel's policy was to exercise authority over South Lebanon, the area bordering Israel. In July 1976 the defense minister announced Israel's intention to end all non-Lebanese (that is, mostly Palestinian) military presence in the region and establish a pro-Israeli Lebanese militia. The SOUTH LEBANON ARMY under Major Saad Haddad, a dissident Lebanese army officer, was formed by Israel at the end of 1976, and in March 1978 the Israeli army occupied the region.

The third prong was to supply the Lebanese Forces with weaponry, military training, military advisers, intelligence information, funds, and diplomatic support. This stream of aid began several years before the start of the civil war but escalated after March 1976, when official contacts between Israel and some of the civilian and military leaders of the Lebanese Front were established. By May 1977, Israeli military assistance to the Lebanese Front militias reached as high as $150 million. This amount proved only a trickle as the war progressed and intensified and Israel's involvement expanded. In retrospect, the involvement of Israel was a prime contributor to the longevity of the civil war and its high toll in human lives and material destruction.

As the theater for this many-sided battle, Lebanon became increasingly involved in the larger Middle East conflict, from which it was unable to disengage. The willingness of the different Lebanese political parties and groups to seek external assistance was responsible in some measure for the impasse that ensued in this stage of the war.

The fifth and final stage in the confrontation phase began when an Israeli army of some 100,000 soldiers invaded Lebanon on 6 June 1982. The Israeli command's primary objective was the surrender or destruction of the armed Palestinian organizations and their leadership. In addition, it hoped to destroy the aspirations of the Palestinians for an independent homeland, seal the fate of the WEST BANK and GAZA, end Syria's presence in Lebanon and undermine the regime of Hafez al-Asad, secure a military balance of power in the Middle East that would favor Israel for the next thirty years, and establish a sectarian Maronite state in Lebanon allied to Israel and isolated from its regional Arab environment. To achieve these goals it became necessary to occupy Beirut, the center of Lebanon's political, economic, and cultural life and of the Palestinian presence.

The reelection of Israel's LIKUD PARTY under the leadership of MENAHEM BEGIN in 1981 and the appointment of the hawkish ARIEL SHARON as minister of defense produced a new and more radical Israeli approach to Lebanon and the Palestinian issue. Lebanon was viewed as part of an Israeli grand design that encompassed the whole Middle East. In a lecture Sharon gave at the Center for Strategic Studies in the University of Tel Aviv in December 1981, he said the sphere of Israel's strategic and security interests covers all the Arab countries of the Middle East and the Mediterranean and Red Sea areas.

Although the conflict has been considered the fifth Arab-Israeli war, it differed notably from previous engagements (i.e., those of 1948, 1956, 1967, and 1973). First, it was the only time in the history of the Arab-Israeli conflict that Israel invaded a neighboring Arab country, occupied its capital, and proceeded to reconstitute its internal policies to serve Israel's interests. Second, for the first time since World War II a major capital city (Beirut) and several other cities and towns in the same country were subjected to systematic attack by highly advanced weapon systems, without regard to human life or property and in full view of the world. Sixty thousand artillery shells and countless bombs were used to bombard Beirut. By the end of August 1982, the invasion had left 19,000 dead, 31,000 wounded, 100,000 homeless, and some 300,000 displaced; property losses were valued at $12 billion. At the time, UNRWA reported that the level of destruction in the 'Ayn Al-Hilwa refugee camp in Sidon reached 100 percent, and in the al-Rashidiya, al-Bas, and Burj al-Shamali refugee camps in Tyre it was 70, 50, and 35 percent, respectively.

Third, for the first time in the Arab-Israeli conflict irregular forces or people's militias accepted the task of confronting an invading army. (The involvement of the Lebanese army was weak and relatively insignificant.) Despite the vast imbalance between the two sides, the military engagement lasted longer than any previous Arab-Israeli military encounter, and Israel failed to destroy the Palestinian and Lebanese resistance. Less than four months after its invasion, Israel began a series of withdrawals that led to its retreat to its pre-6 June 1982 positions in South Lebanon. Fourth, the invasion exposed the Arab countries' almost total political and military paralysis, individually and collectively. Finally, the bombardment and occupation of Beirut and the massacre of some 3,000 Palestinian civilians at the SABRA AND SHATILA refugee camps exposed the moral bankruptcy of the Israeli government and caused deep fissures within Israeli society itself. Although the massacre was committed by Lebanese collaborators, ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES escorted them to the scene and provided them with cover as they executed their heinous crime. The international outcry that followed and the decision to send a multinational force to protect the refugee camps preempted any scheme to dispel the Palestinian community. It also forced the Israelis to retreat to their self-declared security zone in South Lebanon.

Three lessons relating to Israeli-Lebanese relations and the Palestinian issue can be learned from the invasion. First, there are limits to the use of military power to achieve political ends. The Israeli military, though more powerful than its opponents, found itself in a quagmire from which it was not easy to disengage and its credibility was undermined. The minority alliance Israel built within the country blinded it to two Lebanese realities: (1) to install a sectarian minority in power and isolate the country from its Arab environment, Israel would need to maintain a large force in Lebanon permanently, which was inconceivable; and (2) Israeli leaders underestimated the attachment of the Lebanese to their country and their shared experiences. Instead, the invasion made the vast majority of Lebanese more hostile toward Israel and led to the rise of Shi'ite resistance to the Israeli OCCUPATION. Second, Israel will be hard-pressed to ever again enter into a similar venture in Lebanon. Ben-Gurion's design to restructure Lebanon was in all likelihood buried in the wake of the invasion. The third lesson is that Israel has been blind to the strength of Palestinian national sentiments and the resiliency of Palestinian society. Although the command and fighters of the PLO had to relocate outside Lebanon, the invasion failed to destroy Palestinian nationalism, as the Israeli war plan envisioned. Instead, six years later Palestinian opposition to the Occupation produced the INTIFADA, and Palestinians gained the sympathy and support of the international community.

Subordinate Phase: 1982–Present. Israeli forces began their withdrawal from Beirut on 26 September 1982. Together with its Lebanese allies, Israel lost any influence it had on Lebanese national politics. On 23 February 1984, President Amin Gemayel, followed on 5 March by the Council of Ministers, abrogated the proposed peace agreement of 17 May 1983 that Israel, with the aid of the US government, had attempted to impose on the Lebanese government. The agreement would have taken Lebanon out of its Arab environment and placed it in an Israeli sphere of influence. Meanwhile, Syria assumed a largely uncontested position of dominance over Lebanese affairs. For the Palestinians, the most dangerous fallout from the invasion was the "war of the camps." It began with the splintering in 1983 of Fatah, the Palestinians' largest resistance organization, and the outbreak of infighting for the control of the refugee camps between Syrian-backed rebels known as the PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT and the mainstream factions of the PLO, known as the Command for Palestinian National Action. After the Salvation Front wrested control of the camps in the Tripoli area and the interior from the PLO factions, the battles moved to Beirut and the south. They were spearheaded by the forces of the Shi'ite organization AMAL, an ally of Syria. Elements from the Shi'ite organization HIZBULLAH and the Druze Progressive Socialist Party supported PLO loyalists. It is estimated that 47,000 people were displaced in this conflagration.

On 22 October 1989, the Lebanese parliament adopted the Document of National Understanding, better known as the Ta'if Accord, which became the basis for an enduring peace settlement. The accord established a revised political system, shifting some power away from the office of the president to the Council of Ministers, providing for the disarmament and dissolution of all Lebanese and non-Lebanese militias, and setting up a special relationship with Syria and a framework for eventual Syrian withdrawal. Gradually, the institutions of the state revived and a measure of stability reappeared. The settlement called on the state to “extend its authority over the whole territory of Lebanon.” The armed forces were to be unified, trained, and equipped to confront Israeli aggression. In regard to Israel, the accord entrusted the state with liberating Lebanon from Israeli occupation, ensuring the implementation of UN Resolution 425, which required Israel to fully withdraw from Lebanon, and adhering to boundaries of the 23 March 1949 ARMISTICE AGREEMENT with Israel. In other words, Lebanon undertook not to sign the separate bilateral peace agreement imposed during the 1982 Israeli invasion.

PLO-affiliated organizations accepted the provision of the Ta’if Accord affecting them, and most Palestinian fighters surrendered all of their heavy weaponry to the army and were reassembled within the refugee camps. This marked the onset of a new era in Lebanese-Palestinian relations and the Palestinian experience in Lebanon.

Charting a Course for Lebanon

Lebanon will always feel the effects of the Israeli–Palestinian conflict, given the size of the Palestinian refugee community it hosts and the susceptibility of Lebanese society to foreign interference. Estimates of the total number of Palestinians in the country today vary significantly. The Israeli newspaper Ha’aretz, on 21 July 1995, placed their numbers at 480,643. However, UNRWA reported the number of registered Palestinian refugees in Lebanon in 1999 at 370,144, with another 42,000 refugees unregistered. At present, they form the largest single concentration of Palestinians outside historic Palestine and the HASHEMITE Kingdom of JORDAN.

With the exception of a small enclave in the Shab’a farms, Lebanon has liberated its territory from Israel. On 24 May 2000 the Lebanese resistance, in particular Hizbullah, at great sacrifice, forced an unconditional and hurried Israeli retreat from the 10 percent of Lebanon it had occupied directly or through proxies for almost a quarter of a century. Since then, Lebanese policy has been to resist any attempts at bilateral arrangements with Israel. Public figures and the public at large almost universally accept the dictum pronounced by former president Sarkis: “Contrary to what some Israelis imagine, Lebanon will not be the second Arab country to sign an agreement with Israel. It will be the last.” Nevertheless, Lebanon may well assume in the future a diplomatic role in the pursuit of an Arab-Israeli settlement. It is noteworthy that the Arab summit that issued the ARAB PEACE INITIATIVE, also known as the Beirut Declaration, on 28 March 2002 was held in Beirut, and that Lebanon was a member of the committee that drafted the declaration. The Arab world proposed a complete Israeli withdrawal from all the Arab territories occupied since the war of June 1967, the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, a just solution to the problem of the Palestinian refugees, followed by peace agreements and the normalization of relations with Israel. This remains the only comprehensive peace initiative approved by all Arab states.

Lebanon’s laws and policies regulating the civil and social rights of the Palestinian refugee community were archaic. The administration of Lebanese president Ilyas Hrawi, formed after the Ta’if Accord, was aware of the need for change and judiciously refrained from sending the armed forces into the refugee camps, thereby removing what used to be a major source of friction. It also engaged Palestinian delegations on a number of occasions in discussions over such matters as reconstruction and improvement of living conditions in the camps, the regulation of all armed Palestinian presence in the country, and full civil rights except for citizenship and public service employment for Palestinian residents. Consideration of these issues was suspended when direct Israeli-Palestinian negotiations began with the OSLO ACCORDS, because Lebanese authorities assumed that any final settlement would cover the future status of the Palestinians of Lebanon. Meanwhile, they adopted a wait-and-see attitude. The challenge was and is to grant the refugee community the civil and social rights that would allow them a normal and humane existence until they are able to exercise their right of return.

A new phase in Lebanese-Israeli relations emerged in the aftermath of Israel’s 2000 withdrawal from its enclave in southern Lebanon. It was molded by two major developments. The first relates to the rise in the United States of the administration of GEORGE W. BUSH, which adopted the agenda of the neoconservatives and began to act, especially after 11 September 2001, as the self-appointed custodian of the Middle East. Throughout his two terms in office, the Bush administration was deeply involved in reshaping the region in its own image economically, culturally, politically, and militarily and was seen as pursuing “a nearly predatory intervention” in every country in the region. The second was the rise to national prominence of Hizbullah, which evolved from a small underground organization resisting Israeli occupation of the Shi’ites’ ancestral homeland in southern Lebanon, historically known as Jabal ‘Amel, to a mass-based popular movement with a well-equipped, trained, and disciplined military arm and allied with Syria and Iran, the principal opponents of US and Israeli policies in the region.

In this new phase, Hizbullah assumed the former role that the Palestinian organizations had played in defying Israel and resisting its encroachments. Israel’s attention turned to Lebanon once more, and preparations were made to destroy Hizbullah at the opportune time. The occasion presented itself in 2006 following a cross-border raid carried out by Hizbullah fighters in which three Israeli soldiers were killed and two captured. Immediately thereafter, Israel subjected Lebanon for thirty-four days to one of the most unrelenting and intense aerial bombardments ever mounted on a civilian society. The war Israel waged on Lebanon, most probably with the US administration’s advance knowledge and approval, caused catastrophic destruction: approximately one quarter of the population was displaced; the infrastructure, transportation, and communication systems were severely damaged; and vital points such as airports, ports, water and sewage treatment plants, electrical facilities, wheat silos, and fuel depots were destroyed. The attack did not spare hospitals, schools, commercial enterprises, offices, shops, and food stores. Moreover, there was systematic destruction by air, sea, and land of complete city blocks and scores of villages that culminated in the saturation bombing of southern Lebanese villages in the last days of the war with four million cluster bombs that continue to kill and maim Lebanese villagers.

For several weeks, the US administration, hoping that Israel would be able to achieve its war goals, defended Israel’s actions and prevented the UN Security Council from passing a resolution demanding a cessation of hostilities. When it became obvious that Israel was failing, the United States had no choice but to allow the Security Council to call for an end to the fighting. In time, a multinational force made up primarily of European soldiers was dispatched to South Lebanon under the UN flag to separate the combatants and garrison the area.

The war failed to destroy or disarm Hizbullah, but it led to the erosion of Israel’s deterrent capability and contributed to the further radicalization of the Arab public. Together with resident Palestinians, Hizbullah now forms the nexus between Lebanon and Palestine. Israel wants this nexus exorcised and Hizbullah destroyed, even if Lebanon is seriously impaired in the process, thus Lebanon will likely continue to be an Israeli target in the future. Lebanese hope that the US administration of Barack Obama will show balance, adopt measured policies, and bring about a just and lasting settlement to the core issue in the region, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Such an accomplishment would contribute to real and durable peace in Lebanon.

Bibliography

- Ajjal Center and Swiss Agency for Development and Cooperation. International and Local Non-Governmental Associations Whose Services Include the Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon. Beirut: Statistics and Documentation Office, 2001.
- . Al-Muhajaroun Al-Filistinyoun Fi Lubnan: Dirasa (The Dislocated Palestinians in Lebanon: A Study). Beirut: Friedrich Ebert Stiftung, 2003.
- Ball, George. Error and Betrayal in Lebanon: An Analysis of Israel’s Invasion of Lebanon and the Implications for US-Israeli Relations. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, 1984.
- Baqradouni, Kareem. A-Salam al-Mafqoud—‘Ahd Ilyas Sarkis: 1976–1982 (The Missing Peace—The Era of Ilyas Sarkis: 1976–1982). Beirut, Lebanon: ‘Ibr al-Sharq, n.d.
- Barakat, Halim. Lebanon in Strife: Student Preludes to the Civil War. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1977.
- Barakat, Halim, ed. Toward a Viable Lebanon. Washington, DC: Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, Georgetown University, 1988.
- Eisenberg, Laura. My Enemy’s Enemy—Lebanon in the Early Zionist Imagination 1900–1948. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1994.
- Faris, Hani. “Arab Nationalism and the Palestinian Issue.” In Al-Qadiya Al-Filistiniya Fi Arba’een ‘Ama (The Palestinian Issue in the Last Forty Years). Beirut, Lebanon, and Kuwait: Center for Arab Unity Studies and Kuwaiti Graduates Society, 1989.
- . Beyond the Lebanese Civil War: Issues and Challenges of Reconstruction. Washington, DC: Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, Georgetown University, 1982.
- . “The Failure of Peacemaking in Lebanon, 1975–1989.” In Peace for Lebanon? From War to Reconstruction. Edited by Deirdre Collings. Boulder, CO, and London: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1994.
- . “The Israeli War on Lebanon and Its Consequences.” In Al-Qadiya Al-Filistiniya Wa Al-Sira’

- Al-'Arabi Al-Sahyuni* (The Palestinian Issue and the Arab-Zionist Conflict). Edited by Abdul Aziz Al-Duri. Amman, Jordan: The Association of Arab Universities, 1989.
- . "Lebanon and the Palestinians: Brotherhood or Fratricide." Arab Studies Quarterly. 3:4 (1981).
- . Al-Niza'at Al-Ta'ifiya Fi Tarikh Lubnan Al-Hadeeth (Sectarian Conflict in the Modern History of Lebanon). Beirut, Lebanon: Al-Ahlyiah Publishing Company, 1980.
- . "The Nexus between Palestine, Iraq and Lebanon." Contemporary Arab Affairs. 1:1 (2008).
- . "Political Institutions of the Lebanese Republic." In Third World Affairs 1988. Edited by Ranaa Gauhar. London: Third World Foundation for Social and Economic Studies, 1988.
- Faris, Hani. and Isam Al-Naqib. Al-Mawqif Al-'Arabi Min Al-Ghazu Al-Israeli Lee Lubnan (The Arab Position on the Israeli Invasion of Lebanon). Kuwait: Al-Qabas Publishing Company, 1983.
- Fisk, Robert. Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 1990.
- Giannou, Chris. Besieged: A Doctor's Story of Life and Death in Beirut. Toronto: Key Porter Books, 1990.
- Haddad, Wadi. Lebanon: The Politics of Revolving Doors. New York and Washington, DC: Praeger Publishers and The Center for Strategic and International Studies, Georgetown University, 1985.
- Hudson, Michael. "The Palestinian Factor in the Lebanese Civil War." The Middle East Journal. 32:3 (1978).
- . The Precarious Republic Revisited: Reflections on the Collapse of Pluralist Politics in Lebanon. Washington, DC: Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, Georgetown University, 1977.
- Hughes, Matthew. "Lebanon's Armed Forces and the Arab-Israeli War, 1948–49." Journal of Palestine Studies. 34:2 (2005).
- Jaber, Hala. Hezbollah: Born with a Vengeance. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Jansen, Michael. The Battle of Beirut: Why Israel Invaded Lebanon. Boston, MA: South End Press, 1983.
- Joumblatt, Kamal. I Speak for Lebanon. London: Zed Press, 1982.
- Khalidi, Rashid. Under Siege: P.L.O. Decisionmaking during the 1982 War. New York: Columbia University Press, 1986.
- Khalidi, Walid. Conflict and Violence in Lebanon: Confrontation in the Middle East. Cambridge, MA: Center for International Affairs, Harvard University, 1979.
- Khuri, Bishara. Haqa'iq Lubnaniya (Lebanese Truths), 3 vols. Beirut, Lebanon: Awraq Lubnaniya, 1960 and 1961.
- Lebanese Ministry of National Defense and Institute for Palestine Studies. Al-Qadiya Al-Filistiniya Wa Al-Khatar Al-Sahyuni (The Palestinian Issue and the Zionist Danger). Beirut, Lebanon: Ministry of National Defense and Institute for Palestine Studies, 1973.
- MacBride, Sean. Israel in Lebanon: The Report of the International Commission to Enquire into Reported Violations of International Law by Israel during Its Invasion of Lebanon. London: Ithaca Press, 1983.
- Malek, Charles. Israel, America wa Al-'Arab: Tanbu'at Min Nisf Qarn. Taqreer Fi Al-Wad' Al-Hadir. 5 Aab, 1949 (Israel, America and the Arabs: Half a Century—Old Predictions. A Report on the Present Situation. August 5, 1949). Beirut, Lebanon: Al-Nahar Publishing House, 2002.
- Moubarak, Walid. The Position of a Weak State in an Unstable Region: The Case of Lebanon. Abu Dhabi: The Emirates Center for Strategic Studies and Research, 2003.
- Mundus, Hani. Al-'Amal wa al-'Umal Fi al-Mukhayam Al-Filistini (Labor and Laborers in the Palestinian Camp). Beirut, Lebanon: Palestine Research Center, 1974.
- Norton, Augustus. Amal and the Shi'a: Struggle for the Soul of Lebanon. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1987.
- Randal, Jonathan. Going All the Way: Christian Warriors, Israeli Adventurers, and the War in Lebanon. New York: Random House, 1984.
- Rokach, Livia. Israel's Sacred Terrorism: A Study Based on Moshe Sharett's Personal Diary and Other Documents. Boston, MA: The Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1980.
- Saidi, Nasser. Growth, Destruction and the Challenges of Reconstruction: Macroeconomic Essays on Lebanon. Beirut, Lebanon: The Lebanese Center for Policy Studies, 1999.
- Salah, Salah. Al-Wujud Al-Filistini Fi Lubnan: Mashakil wa Humum . . . Al-Hal? (The Palestinian Presence in Lebanon. Problems and Concerns . . . The Solution?). Beirut: Unpublished n.d.
- Salem, Elie. Modernization without Revolution: Lebanon's Experience. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1973.
- . Prospects for a New Lebanon. Washington, DC: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, 1982.
- . Violence and Diplomacy in Lebanon: The Troubled Years, 1982–1988. London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.
- Salibi, Kamal. Crossroads to Civil War: Lebanon 1958–1976. New York: Caravan Books, 1976.
- . A House of Many Mansions: The History of Lebanon Reconsidered. London: I. B. Tauris, 1988.
- . Lebanon and the Middle Eastern Question. Oxford, UK: Centre for Lebanese Studies, 1988.
- Shehadi, Nadim, and Dana Haffar Mills, eds. Lebanon: A History of Conflict and Consensus. London: Center for Lebanese Studies and I. B. Tauris, 1988.
- Shiff, Ze'ev, and Ya'ari, Ehud. Israel's Lebanon War. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984.
- Simmel, George. Conflict. Glencoe, IL: The Free Press, 1955.
- United Nations Relief and Works Agency. Palestinian Refugee Camps in Lebanon. The Canadian-Palestinian Educational Exchange. 2005. www.cepal.ca/en/library/articles/ref-camps.php.

Yermia, Dov. My War Diary: Lebanon June 5–July 1, 1982. Boston, MA: South End Press, 1984.

Zureik, Elia. Palestinian Refugees and the Peace Process: A Final Status Issues Paper. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1996.

—Hani A. Faris

Lebanon War, 1982

The Israeli invasions of LEBANON had a profound and lasting effect on the Palestinians and their cause. The first invasion took place in 1978 and was short-lived, but it laid the groundwork for the subsequent 1982 invasion. From the early 1970s the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) had been mounting attacks on Israel's northern SETTLEMENTS from the south of Lebanon. Although in military terms and in loss of Jewish lives these were never more than an irritant for Israel, Tel Aviv wanted to end them altogether. Thus, it undertook the 1978 invasion of Lebanon, sending the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) to the Litani River. After a few months Israel withdrew only partially and only after a UN Interim Force in Lebanon was sent to take control of the area. This first invasion, though milder than the one to follow, produced damaging changes that would affect Palestinian (and Lebanese) life thereafter. Israel continued to attack Palestinian positions and Lebanese villages in the period up to 1982. In one such attack in 1981, some 500 to 600 Palestinians and Lebanese were killed: in Beirut, 300 in one night.

The 1982 invasion had unforeseen consequences, both direct and indirect, whose effects remain to this day. Israel had more than one purpose in attacking Lebanon. First, it had long sought an opportunity to transform Lebanon into a client state. Israel envisioned defeating the foes of the Christian MARONITES and installing a Maronite government that would conclude a formal peace treaty with Israel. The PHALANGE, Israel's key ally in Lebanon, was a small but extremist Maronite group that had been trained and armed by Israel for decades. As Christians they believed they were not part of the Arab world, but like the Jews were a minority in the region.

Israel's second and more important purpose in invading Lebanon in 1982 was to destroy the PLO and its power base in that country, where it had firmly established itself in Beirut and the south since its 1970 expulsion from JORDAN (and before). Israel wanted to defeat the PLO militarily, not just to remove it as a cross-border irritant, but Tel Aviv also believed that destroying the PLO's institutional infrastructure—both civilian and military—would allow it to quash all manifestations of Palestinian nationalism, especially in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, where Israel was deeply concerned about the PLO's role in Palestinian nationalism. Israel wanted to annex the WEST BANK and needed a docile and quiescent Palestinian population that would not resist. To bring about such submission, it created the VILLAGES LEAGUES, local quisling leaders, but Israel considered the PLO's destruction a critical aspect of this project. The PLO had scored many diplomatic triumphs since its chairman YASIR ARAFAT's historic address to the UN General Assembly in 1974. The Palestinian cause had gained international legitimacy and had become a crucial part of any peace settlement. For these reasons too, Israel was keen to crush the PLO and put a stop to the whole process before it developed any further.

The 1982 Invasion

In the months before Israel's invasion, Arafat was acutely aware of its imminence and endeavored to avert the attack by halting his fighters' provocations against Israel, so that Israel would not have a pretext for an attack. Indeed, for the full year preceding the invasion, the PLO abided by a truce with Israel that the UNITED STATES had brokered in 1981. With the invasion Israel broke the truce, which it justified as retaliation for an assassination attempt on the Israeli ambassador in London, carried out by a discredited Palestinian faction headed by ABU NIDAL.

The Lebanon offensive, code-named "OPERATION PEACE FOR GALILEE," began in June 1982 with ground troops invading the south of Lebanon and the aerial bombardment of West Beirut, where the PLO had its offices, hospitals, and other social services. In a matter of days, Israeli forces seized a third of Lebanon's territory, reaching Beirut and besieging its western half. On its way Israel destroyed the entire battery of SYRIA's SAM missiles in the Beqa'a Valley and shot down eighty Syrian MIGs. When it bombed the Palestinian refugee camps in the south and scattered the REFUGEES, the IDF advised them to "go to Syria, and don't come back." Lasting nearly four months, the invasion claimed the lives of some 20,000 people, mostly Lebanese citizens and Palestinian refugees who had fled Israel during the 1948 WAR and later conflicts.

All accounts indicate that PLO fighters resisted fiercely in the southern camps of Tyre and Sidon. In Beirut, Israeli forces were unwilling to engage in combat along the narrow streets and were unable to penetrate the Palestinian-held areas in the west of the city. Instead, the Israeli army encircled them, bombarding ceaselessly from land, sea, and air with cluster, phosphorus, and other bombs. The siege of West Beirut, which lasted for two and a half months, resulted in enormous hardship for its population, which was denied food, electricity, and basic services. For the first time world reaction toward Israel became hostile, and its massive human rights abuses were condemned. Arafat negotiated desperately with Israel via US intermediaries, hoping to be allowed to stay in Beirut, but the Israelis refused his overtures and demanded that the PLO depart and leave behind no presence in the camps or elsewhere. Arafat capitulated, deciding that the price Israel was exacting from the city's civilian population was too great. In addition, the new American president, RONALD REAGAN, was very pro-Israeli, and the Arab states had done almost nothing to support the PLO. In August, under the supervision of a multinational force, the Palestinian leadership and 11,500 of its fighters left Lebanon and dispersed to a number of different Arab countries, including Syria, Yemen, Tunisia, Sudan, and Algeria.

The Israeli invasion of Lebanon marked the end of one of the most important phases of the Palestinian struggle to regain their lost homeland. In destroying the Palestinian base and infrastructure in Lebanon, Israel delivered a nearly fatal blow to the Palestinian cause. The results of this war worked to Israel's advantage in the short term, but Palestinian nationalism returned five years later—in the INTIFADA that erupted in the Occupied Territories. In the long run Israel achieved none of its objectives and suffered several unintended consequences, including Lebanon's refusal to sign a peace treaty with Israel, the growth of Palestinian nationalism that eventually produced the First Intifada, and an acceptance of Arafat and the PLO by the international community, especially the Europeans. For the Palestinians the consequences were grave and manifold. The refugee camps were left defenseless, the Palestinian leadership was in disarray and in exile, the peace process and its subsequent history were altered irrevocably, and even the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA was affected.

Sabra and Shatila Massacre

The most immediate effect of the PLO's expulsion was felt in the refugee camps. According to the UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY (UNRWA), Israel's offensive had destroyed them either in whole or in part, and the ones that were partially destroyed lost the services on which they had relied. While the PLO was based in Lebanon, the camps benefited from the organization's range of social and welfare services and, most importantly, the protection of its armed men. But when Arafat and his guerrillas left in August 1982, followed by the multinational force that had overseen the evacuation, the refugees were left defenseless. Aware of this, the PLO had sought and been given assurances by the United States that no Israeli troops would enter West Beirut after their departure. However, Bashir Gemayel, a Maronite pro-Israel leader who along with his Phalangist supporters had a fierce hatred for the Palestinians, became Lebanon's new president soon afterward. When Gemayel was assassinated on 14 September 1982, the Phalangists were determined to avenge his killing and made the refugees their target. Claiming that it had to "keep the peace," Israel invaded West Beirut. On 15 September, under the command of Defense Minister ARIEL SHARON, the IDF permitted Phalangist militias to enter the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps, ostensibly to prevent an escalation of violence. In reality, the plan was to destroy the camps and disperse the refugees to Jordan, in line with Sharon's long-held aim.

As the killing proceeded, Israel assisted the operation by lighting up the camps at night with flares and blocking the exits to fleeing refugees. The Phalangists killed and raped the inhabitants and demolished their homes and belongings. They killed patients in the camp hospital and also babies and pregnant women. After forty-eight hours of destruction, which left bodies scattered all over the camps, the Israeli army used bulldozers to push the corpses into mass graves. In those two days, 3,000 persons lost their lives, including Christians, Lebanese, and even several Jewish spouses of some refugees. Defenseless, the Palestinians in the other camps in Lebanon became easy targets for further assaults by Israeli, Phalangist, and other forces. There is little doubt that the SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE was only one part, though the most tragic, of an emerging pattern of intimidation against Palestinians in Lebanon.

For the Lebanese forces, postwar Lebanon provided a golden opportunity to settle old political scores and to generate through terror an exodus that would rid Lebanon of its Palestinian problem once and for all. Even before the Beirut evacuation the issue had been raised in discussions between Israeli leaders and Gemayel. Israeli prime minister MENAHEM BEGIN had spoken of the need for population "TRANSFER" as early as June 10, and had later issued directives to prevent the reconstruction of devastated refugee camps in Sidon and Tyre. Before the war was over, Lebanese militias had attacked Palestinian camps around Israeli-controlled Sidon, ordering their populations to leave at once.

Similar violence and threats continued through the latter half of 1982 and into the next year. In the south, mass arrests of Palestinians by the IDF were accompanied by a spate of disappearances and murders conducted by local Phalangists and militiamen of SAAD HADDAD, a cashiered Lebanese military official who became Israel's proxy. In Beirut the government of Amin Gemayel, Bashir's brother, ordered the full reassertion of Lebanese law over the Palestinians, which included bulldozing "illegal" structures in the refugee camps and rounding up hundreds of Palestinians without official documentation. Palestinians who were abroad with Lebanese refugee travel documents were refused renewals unless they pledged not to return to Lebanon. In Beirut the Lebanese government announced that only those Palestinians who had sought refuge in 1948 would be allowed to remain.

PLO's Internal Disintegration

As a direct consequence of the Lebanon War, the PLO had been rendered acutely vulnerable both to regional pressures and to its own centrifugal tendencies. At a meeting of the FATAH REVOLUTIONARY COUNCIL in Aden, Yemen, in January 1983, Colonel SA'ID MUSA MURAGHA (Abu Musa), supported by prominent Fatah leftists NIMR SALIH and Samih Abu Kuwayk of the Fatah Central Committee, presented a memorandum strongly critical of the political direction of the movement. Among other issues, the men were most concerned about the continued dispersal of PLO forces and the failure to reconstitute them in the Beqa'a and the north of Lebanon. This suggested that the Fatah leadership was preparing to withdraw all Palestinian forces from Lebanon. Four months later, when Abu Musa began his insurrection against Fatah, it still appeared that Arafat was prepared to accept a total withdrawal from Lebanon. On 9 May 1983 Abu Musa ordered all Fatah units in the Beqa'a Valley to disregard future orders from the Fatah leadership. The Fatah Central Committee at first ignored the disobedience, but as it became apparent that the mutiny was gaining strength, it cut funds and logistical support to rebellious units. The rebels then seized Fatah supply depots in the Beqa'a on 25 May and in Damascus on 28 May. In late June, fighting erupted between Fatah loyalist and Fatah rebel units in the Beqa'a.

A wide spectrum of grievances motivated the actions of the dissidents. Many were fundamentally dissatisfied with the evolution of Fatah and PLO policy since the mid-1970s, with its gradual shift away from the goal of liberating all Palestine through ARMED STRUGGLE and toward the creation of an independent Palestinian state in the Occupied Territories, as well as with the PLO's increasing emphasis on diplomatic means to achieve that goal. There were a variety of specific complaints regarding corruption and incompetence within Fatah itself and dissatisfaction with the removal of Nimr Salih from his positions on the Fatah Central Committee and the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL earlier that year. Most immediately, however, the rebellion was sparked by Arafat's appointment of seventy-nine new military officers, including Colonel Ghazi 'Atallah (Abu Hajim) as commander of Palestinian forces in the Beqa'a and Colonel al-Hajj Isma'il in the north. In June 1982 both men had fled their respective posts in the southern Beqa'a and Sidon at the start of the Israeli invasion. Abu Musa and other professional military men were outraged at the appointment of these deserters, which Arafat made primarily to ensure that officers personally loyal to him dominated the military command structure.

In addition to the military dissidents, there were political divisions in the PLO after the 1982 war. In January 1983 the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP), the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND (PFLP-GC), the PALESTINE POPULAR STRUGGLE FRONT (PPSF), and SA'IQA met in Libya, where they issued a joint statement that condemned the FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE and the REAGAN PLAN, criticized the PLO-Jordanian joint initiative, and called for closer relations with Syria.

These internal challenges to the PLO leadership coincided with deteriorating relations with Damascus and an intensification of Syrian pressure on the PLO. There were numerous points of disagreement—from Arafat's perspective, the most unforgivable was Syria's encouragement of and support for the opposition within Fatah. When Abu Musa's rebellion erupted, Syria and Libya first tacitly, then openly, supported the rebels. When the Fatah leadership condemned this, Arafat himself was unceremoniously deported from his diplomatic center in Damascus to Tunis on 24 June. Pro-Syrian units of Sa'iqa, the PFLP-GC, the PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY (PLA), and even Syrian army units backed Abu Musa's forces.

Palestinian and Arab mediation efforts failed miserably, and in Lebanon, Abu Musa gradually forced loyal Fatah units out of their positions in the Beqa'a Valley northward to the Nahr al-Bared and Beddawi refugee camps near Tripoli, Lebanon. In late September 1983 Arafat himself returned to Tripoli to face his opponents, and in October fighting erupted around the two refugee camps. On 3 November the rebels launched a major offensive against Arafat, capturing Nahr al-Bared on 6 November. After a brief lull in the fighting, a second offensive captured Beddawi on 16 November. Loyalist forces retreated to Tripoli, but the rebel forces bombarded their positions and threatened to storm the city. As a result of these defeats, Arafat agreed to a Saudi-mediated cease-fire agreement with Syria and the rebels on 25 November. Under its terms Arafat would evacuate Tripoli, although the withdrawal did not take place until 20 December. Some 4,000 Arafat loyalists left Tripoli by sea to North Yemen, Algeria, and Tunisia in Greek ships under the UN flag and with a naval escort provided by FRANCE.

With this second Palestinian departure from Lebanon, the PLO had essentially split into three competing factions. The Fatah rebels (known as Fatah-Intifada, or Fatah-Uprising, or Fatah-Provisional Command), together with Sa'iqa, PFLP-GC, PPSF, and other opponents of Fatah, grouped themselves into the so-called NATIONAL ALLIANCE and called for Arafat's removal as PLO leader. However, because their use of violence had provoked a civil war, these groups eventually lost whatever credibility they once had and became increasingly dependent on Damascus. Moreover the bulk of Fatah, especially outside Lebanon, remained loyal to the PLO leader, and Fatah's historic central leadership group remained united. The ARAB LIBERATION FRONT (ALF) supported Arafat too (largely because of Syria's support for the opposition), as did its Iraqi sponsor, SAUDI ARABIA, and other important Arab states.

Meanwhile the PFLP, DFLP, and PALESTINIAN COMMUNIST PARTY found themselves in a difficult position. These groups (particularly the PFLP), which remained headquartered in Damascus, agreed with many of the opposition's organizational and political criticisms. Yet they were fundamentally committed to the independence of Palestinian decisionmaking and to the institutional framework of the PLO. Despite often intense Syrian pressure to do otherwise, the DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE upheld Arafat's leadership of the PLO and strongly condemned the rebels' use of violence, rejecting all attempts at "containment of the PLO or subjecting it to Arab tutelage."

Still, the split in the PLO grew even wider as a result of the diplomatic offensive launched by Arafat after the Tripoli evacuation. On 22 December Arafat met with Egyptian president HOSNI MUBARAK in Cairo, a move designed to reward Egypt's support of Arafat in Tripoli and to create a counterweight to Syrian pressure, but the meeting produced a storm of protest not only by the National Alliance but also by the Democratic Alliance and even some within Fatah. Because of its separate bilateral peace treaty with Israel, EGYPT remained isolated in the Arab world. Seemingly heedless of the severe fractures inside the PLO, in February 1984 Arafat reopened discussions with Jordan on a joint diplomatic approach to the Arab-Israeli conflict, resulting in the HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT. This diplomatic maneuver, too, outraged many sectors of the PLO, because King Husayn's desire to reassert Jordanian hegemony over the West Bank was well-known. A subsequent meeting of the Palestine National Council (the Palestinian parliament-in-exile) was marred by discord over these issues. Moreover, on 25 March 1985 former council speaker Khalid al-Fahum announced from Damascus the formation by the National Alliance, PLF, and PFLP of a PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT (PNSF). In its founding statement the PNSF condemned Arafat's accord with Jordan and called for "action to topple the trend of deviation and relinquishment" within the PLO. Because the presence of the PFLP in the PNSF seemed to legitimize it, the opposition's challenge to Arafat's leadership seemed stronger than ever.

War of the Camps

Meanwhile, regional conflict and the divisions within the Palestinian movement were reflected in Lebanon after Arafat's withdrawal from Tripoli, and such tensions would be fought out primarily in the Palestinian camps. Even before the PLO split, Palestinian refugee camps in Beirut had seen the gradual reestablishment of a Palestinian armed presence. But this process accelerated as competing Palestinian organizations hurried to bolster their presence and win support from the local Palestinian community. By the end of 1984 numerous Lebanese sources reported a substantial resurgence of the Palestinian political and military presence in the capital. In the following year Israel's withdrawal from Sidon (February) and Tyre (March–April) produced a similar reemergence of Palestinian guerrilla groups in local camps there. Indeed, by the spring of 1985, Palestinian militias in the Sidon area were strong enough to repel attacks by the Phalange and South Lebanese Army (SLA) against the Miya wa Miya and 'Ayn al-Hilwa refugee camps.

Such developments were viewed with concern both by Syria and by the Phalange and its forces in Lebanon. Even more strongly opposed was the Syrian-sponsored Shi'ite party/militia, AMAL, whose hostility toward the Palestinians stemmed from the Shi'ite-PLO conflict in the late 1970s and early 1980s and was reinforced by fears that a resurgent Palestinian presence would threaten the powerful political position that Amal had established in post-1982 Lebanon.

The first round of the "CAMPS' WAR" began on 19 May 1985, with an incident between Palestinians in the Sabra camp in Beirut and Amal militiamen. Heavy fighting quickly erupted between the approximately 1,000 armed Palestinians in the Sabra, Shatila, and Burj al-Barajne refugee camps and the more than 3,000 fighters of Amal, the latter supported by over 1,000 soldiers of the (predominately Shi'ite) Sixth Brigade of the Lebanese army and even some units of the (predominately Christian) Eighth Brigade stationed in East Beirut. On 30 May, Sabra fell to its Amal attackers. Amid Arab and MOSCOW political pressures on Syria to restore stability in the region, an emergency meeting of ARAB LEAGUE foreign ministers was scheduled to discuss the issue on 8 June. However, Amal declared a unilateral cease-fire the next day and signed an agreement with representatives of the PNSF in Damascus on 17 June. Under the terms of the Damascus Agreement, Amal and its Syrian sponsor were politically and militarily rebuffed. Amal was forced to retreat, having gained only the promise that the Palestinians would surrender non-existent medium and heavy weapons and allow an ineffectual Lebanese police presence in the camps. The agreement's rhetorical endorsement of the PNSF notwithstanding, Fatah's foothold in Lebanon remained intact.

Yet the tensions that had sparked the Camps' War had not been resolved, and they would soon be manifest elsewhere. Indeed, from 1985 to 1987 the Camps' War claimed more than 2,500 lives. The camps themselves were devastated, and thousands of refugees fled the fighting to seek uncertain refuge in the coastal strip north of Sidon.

PLO in Exile after 1982

With its fighters scattered in various Arab countries, far from their original Palestinian community in Lebanon, and its leadership likewise divided, the PLO faced severe difficulties in adjusting to exile. Arafat, having been expelled from Damascus in 1983, moved his base to Tunis and set about rebuilding his shredded organization. The task he faced was enormous, for the organization that he and his colleagues had built against many obstacles and the revolution that had been its driving force were now devastated. It would be necessary to find a new direction and to forge different alliances. The first of these was forced on the PLO by the Reagan peace plan, which emerged soon after the PLO's eviction from Lebanon. This proposed the creation of a Palestinian "self-government" in the Occupied Territories in association with Jordan. Since the battle of BLACK SEPTEMBER in 1970 between Palestinian guerrillas and the Jordanian army, the PLO's relationship with Jordan had been tense. But Arafat, accepting the new realities, agreed in 1983 to set up a Palestinian-Jordanian committee and to attempt to reconcile the differences between the two sides.

This move displeased Syria, and Arafat tried to mollify its president, Hafez Asad, but without success. By 1985 a new alliance between Jordan and the PLO was forged to oppose the leftist PLO factions, mainly the PFLP, although the alliance was short-lived. Jordan demanded concessions from the Palestinians that were unacceptable to Arafat, who saw them as depriving his movement of its hard-won autonomy and requiring him to reverse many of its gains. The agreement lasted only one year before it was abrogated in 1986 amid charges that the PLO was being uncooperative. The main Fatah offices in Amman were closed by Jordan, and Arafat's second-in-command, KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad), was expelled from Jordan. The Jordanians then went on to strengthen ties with Israel in order to create a "condominium" between them over the West Bank. At the 1987 Arab summit in Amman, Jordan's king snubbed Arafat publicly. This loss of the Jordan base was another severe blow to the PLO, especially because Abu Jihad had been organizing military cells in the camps there. Arafat was thrown back onto his diplomatic skills, reviewing his alliances with the Arab states and juggling his options against the demands they made on his movement.

After 1982 his style of leadership and strategic thinking began to change. The executive organs of the PLO and those of Fatah had previously worked on a model of consensus. With the crisis of 1982, the expulsion of the PLO, and the chaos left behind, the necessary continuity and direction had to be provided by Arafat himself, who was in supreme command of Fatah after the splits in Fatah ended in marginalizing its opponents. With Arafat's increased power, PLO decisionmaking became more centralized and based on coalitions and alliances rather than consensus. Though much reduced, the Fatah civilian support network in Lebanon channeled all decisions through Arafat, who even managed to return some of his men to Lebanon, where they worked to reestablish the movement in the camps. Social and medical services were revived and funds were provided for rebuilding destroyed houses in the camps. After Amal finally ended its conflict with Fatah and agreed to a real peace, Arafat shifted his attention to developing the struggle in the Occupied Territories. The PLO base had been shattered in Lebanon, but would reestablish itself in the West Bank and GAZA.

Effect of War on the Occupied Territories

By 1982 the West Bank and Gaza had been under Israeli OCCUPATION for fifteen years, and agriculture and industry were in decline because LAND, WATER, and other resources had been lost to Israelis. Unemployment was running at 33 percent, and 40 percent of the workforce was employed in Israel. To oust the PLO from the Occupied Territories, Israel had appointed a number of docile local leaders, the "village leagues," to replace the nationalist leaders whom the people had chosen in ELECTIONS. With the decline in the PLO's fortunes, there was a resurgence of nationalism in the territories, which Israel was eager to quash. Destroying Palestinian nationalism was, after all, a raison d'être for the 1982 War. Tel Aviv thus deported elected mayors and harshly suppressed any manifestation of nationalist political activity. Nevertheless, Palestinian nationalism was now firmly centered in the Occupied Territories. In addition, after the failure of the 1985 Jordanian-PLO agreement, King Husayn renounced Jordanian control of the West Bank altogether in 1988, thus providing an important opening for the PLO. These various factors created a sense of self-reliance among Palestinians in the Occupied Territories and an increasing activism, which resulted in the First Intifada (uprising) in 1987. At the same time, the appearance of new homegrown Islamist movements, HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD, was further evidence of a new vibrancy in the Occupied Territories.

Local resistance organizations in the West Bank and Gaza had never been completely independent of the PLO, but they had exercised considerable autonomy. After the eruption of the 1987 Intifada, however, they gradually became more closely integrated with the PLO, which had itself gained strength from the Intifada. After the PLO's expulsion from Lebanon, the leadership decided to intensify its activities in the Occupied Territories, working to build a mass movement in the West Bank and Gaza. PLO offices in Amman ran a variety of social services, which enabled the settlement of 2,000 refugees from Lebanon. The following year, Abu Jihad, who had been officially put in charge of the PLO's Jordan project, moved to Amman. Until his expulsion in 1986, he managed to build a well-organized youth movement in the Occupied Territories, with social and political mobilization committees. A number of ad hoc relief branches were also established to support basic services such as agriculture and HEALTH. Predictably, the youth cadres were dominated by Fatah, and by the start of the First Intifada they had attained a membership of some 40,000.

Largely because of this movement, the territories were able to sustain for several years a campaign of large-scale, NONVIOLENT resistance against the Occupation with strikes, sit-ins, tax revolts, and so forth—numbering over twenty actions a month by 1985. When the Intifada broke out two years later, the youth organizations already set in place by Abu Jihad were able to maintain it for the next five years, effectively enough for Israel to ASSASSINATE Abu Jihad in 1989. But by then, irreversible political changes in the Occupied Territories and the evolution of a strong resistance movement had produced a local leadership. These new leaders—including such figures as HANAN ASHRAWI, FAYSAL AL-HUSAYNI, and HAYDAR 'ABD 'AL-SHAFI, who would become prominent during and following the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE—had their own view of people's needs and priorities. MARWAN AL-BARGHUTHI, a Fatah activist and youth leader in the Intifada, acquired such popularity on the Palestinian streets that he was soon seen as a natural successor to Arafat. Aware of this, the Israelis put him in prison, where he has been ever since.

From their exile in Tunis, Arafat and the PLO did not welcome the takeover of power by a new leadership in the Occupied Territories. But, in fact, these developments were not out of line with Arafat's overall thinking at this stage. The disaster in Lebanon and the PLO's subsequent isolation in exile had convinced him that the Palestinian struggle thenceforth would have to be centered on Palestinian soil. Resistance to Israel from outside the territories was of little further value, and enlisting the aid of the international community to put pressure on the Jewish state would not be sufficient. The Lebanon War had been a catastrophe and had almost destroyed the PLO, but it also marked the end of a phase in the history of the Palestinian struggle and repositioned it inside Palestine. At the same time and despite its setbacks, throughout the 1980s the PLO remained the only real Palestinian interlocutor in the peace process. Even when Israel attempted to render it irrelevant at the Madrid peace conference by insisting on dealing only with West Bank and Gaza representatives, everyone knew that the latter maintained constant contact with the PLO leadership and acted only in coordination with it.

1988 Declaration of Independence

In November 1988 the Palestine National Council declared the "State of Palestine," meant to include Gaza, the West Bank, and East Jerusalem—the pre-1967 territories—and agreed to recognize Israel. The DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE also accepted UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242

AND 338, which called for Israel's withdrawal from the Arab territories occupied since June 1967 in exchange for an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Until then the Palestine National Council had firmly rejected the two UN resolutions, and this momentous event signaled that Palestinian thinking was moving toward a greater recognition of political reality. But it was also a response to regional and international events. A decade of subsidies to the Iraqis during the Iran-Iraq War and falling oil revenues in the 1980s caused the Gulf States to cut back their assistance to the PLO. In the same period the Syria-Iraq feud split Arab ranks, while the bread riots of 1984–1989 in six Arab states further distracted attention from peace politics. Civil wars were raging in Sudan and Somalia, and Iraq was trying to contain Kurdish dissidents in the north. All these factors made the Palestine issue less prominent in the Arab world, at least until the start of the Intifada in December 1987. Meanwhile, the USSR's internal situation was changing, and the United States showed little interest in resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The PLO was consequently forced to reconsider its position.

Arafat thus concluded that in light of the regional power imbalance and the primacy of US support in furthering the peace process, and hence the Palestinian cause, the only alternative was to recognize Israel and renounce "TERRORISM" (though not the armed struggle). A Palestinian state on only a part of the homeland, rather than its total liberation, was not a new idea in Palestinian circles, but its bold adoption by the PLO was a significant move. Arafat set about laying the groundwork for this new thinking by persuading his PLO colleagues to accept it and conducting inter-Arab diplomacy to enlist backing for it. By 1988 Arafat had accrued considerable power. His already strong autocratic tendencies had been reinforced by the siege mentality that afflicted the PLO leadership during its years of exile, further aggravated by the Syrian hostility that undermined it. The organization became dysfunctional, accused from within of being arrogant, intolerant of criticism, and distrustful, and as a result became even more marginal and ineffective. Arafat reasoned that the Declaration of Independence would put the PLO back into the center of events and force the world powers, especially the United States, to deal with it once again.

Although Israel disregarded this declaration, as well as the PLO's recognition of the Jewish state (which Israel claimed to want), this in no way reduces the significance of the change in PLO thinking, almost certainly a result of Israel's own actions in Lebanon. Nor can one doubt that the course the PLO adopted in 1988 led inexorably and for the same reasons to the subsequent 1993 OSLO ACCORDS. Although new factors helped propel the PLO toward this agreement, the organization's fundamental change in direction as a result of the depredations it faced after 1982 was ultimately responsible. Despite the 1988 recognition of Israel and the short-lived UNITED STATES-PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION DIALOGUE that rewarded it, the PLO remained largely ostracized by the Arab world. In 1990, fighting in the refugee camps in Lebanon between Fatah and the dissident Abu Nidal faction led to the Lebanese army's intervention. The fighters were disarmed, and over the next year Fatah's organizational and military base in the camps became more fragmented.

The PLO's support of IRAQ president Saddam Husayn during and after the invasion of KUWAIT and the GULF WAR in 1990 dealt the next, nearly fatal, blow to the organization. Several factors influenced Arafat's decision. Iraq was a major PLO funder and the organization could not afford a loss of revenue; in addition, the Iraqi army could have posed a threat to the 400,000 Palestinians in occupied Kuwait if Arafat had voiced any criticism. Nevertheless, after Iraq's defeat the PLO's support of Iraq produced a drastic withdrawal of funding by the Gulf States. Egypt also withdrew its support, and the entire Kuwaiti Palestinian community of over 400,000 was expelled. The expulsion had serious consequences for the population in the Occupied Territories, which relied on remittances from Palestinian workers in Kuwait and other Gulf states. The PLO's financial hardships had negative effects on the Palestinians in Lebanon and reduced funding for its foreign missions as well.

In consequence, the organization was formally excluded from the 1991 Madrid international peace conference (although, as noted, it still participated behind the scenes with US knowledge). The delegation from the Occupied Territories did well at the talks and seemed to be favored by the US, developments that alarmed Arafat, who saw himself and the PLO under threat once again. At this time he began to consider opening a direct channel to the Israelis, thus bypassing the negotiation process started at Madrid and defying all efforts to marginalize the PLO leadership. At the end of 1992, secret talks were initiated through NORWEGIAN mediators between PLO leaders close to Arafat and Israeli government representatives. Elections in Israel had brought in a new LABOR administration under YITZHAK RABIN, who agreed to participate in the OSLO PROCESS in May 1993. The Oslo Accords, enjoining mutual recognition by Israel and the PLO, were signed in September of that year, and in 1994 the GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT enabled Arafat and the PLO leadership to return to the Palestinian territories. This move finally fulfilled Arafat's aim, elaborated after the defeat of 1982, of relocating the struggle to Palestinian soil.

Effect on the Diaspora

The Palestinian Diaspora communities, which constitute six million people, or 60 percent of the total Palestinian population, consist of a core of four million UNRWA-registered refugees and a number of nonrefugee groups dispersed in various Arab and other countries. So long as the PLO was a Diaspora organization that operated from outside the homeland, and notwithstanding its banishment to Tunis, most Diaspora Palestinians were little affected. Whatever the PLO's shortcomings, they identified with it as an exile organization and a symbolic substitute for the homeland. The First Intifada modified this view somewhat and focused attention of the Palestinians on "the inside"—in the Occupied Territories. But with the Oslo Accords and the incorporation of the leadership inside Palestine, the PLO's pivotal role for the Diaspora suddenly came to an end. The accords were primarily concerned with the situation post-1967, which by definition excluded the Diaspora. The refugee issue was to be discussed but was deferred to the FINAL STATUS TALKS, which have never taken place. To maintain a public continuity, after 1994 Arafat assumed the twin roles of PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY president and PLO chairman, yet in reality the PLO effectively ceased to function from that time. Its offices and departments gradually lost funds and authority, and the political center of gravity shifted irrevocably to the newly established Palestinian National Authority in the territories. When Arafat died in 2004, he took with him the last vestiges of the previous connection of the inside with the outside.

These changes had a devastating effect on the Diaspora Palestinians. The four million refugees living in UN-supported camps ended up without effective representation. Their vulnerability provoked after Oslo a spate of Western and Israeli-inspired plans for their future. By the late 1990s, proposals promoting the refugees' patriation in their host countries, their compensation, or assisted emigration to Western states began to appear. These proposals had one thing in common: they canceled the refugees' right of return to their original homes, now in Israel. The Diaspora Palestinians fiercely resisted this assault on their legal right of return. With the demise of the PLO under Arafat's very weak successors, the Diaspora remains leaderless and in a state of limbo. After 1995 a number of Diaspora initiatives were launched by the United States and Lebanon in an effort to re-create the PLO or some other unifying body for Palestinians outside the Occupied Territories. None has so far been successful, although an international group lobbying for the right of return is still active. Meanwhile the political process in the Occupied Territories became more localized and preoccupied with internal struggles against Occupation, and since the election of a Hamas government in 2006, between Fatah and Hamas. The Diaspora role is confined to financial and logistical support. Inevitable as this is, it must ultimately widen the gulf between the various Palestinian communities, already geographically divided, and aggravate the process of social and political fragmentation that threatens to destroy the Palestinian national cause.

See also INTIFADA: FIRST AND SECOND COMPARED; LEBANON; PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION; PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY

Bibliography

- Aruri, Naseer. "The PLO and the Jordan Option." MERIP Reports. 131 (1985).
- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Chomsky, Noam. "Terror in South Lebanon." Journal of Palestine Studies. 13 (1984).
- Hagopian, Elaine, ed. Amal and the Palestinians: Understanding the Battle of the Camps. Belmont, MA: AAUG Press, 1985.
- Hirst, David. The Gun and the Olive Branch, 2nd ed. London: Faber and Faber, 2003.
- Al-Hout, Bayan Nuwayhed. Sabra and Shatila, September 1982. London: Pluto Press, 2004.
- Sahliyeh, Emile. The PLO after the Lebanon War. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1986.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- . "Struggle Within, Struggle Without: The Transformation of PLO Politics since 1982." International Affairs. 65 (Spring 1989).
- . "The War of the Camps." Journal of Palestine Studies. 16 (Autumn 1986).

Al-Shaikh, Zakaria. "Sabra and Shatila 1982: Resisting the Massacre." Journal of Palestine Studies. 14 (Autumn 1984).

Timerman, Jacobo. The Longest War: Israel in Lebanon. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1982.

—Ghada Karmi

Legislative Council (British Mandate)

In August 1922 the British HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR PALESTINE, Sir HERBERT SAMUEL, proposed the creation of a Legislative Council that would include twenty-three members: eleven British officials and twelve elected members, of whom ten would be Palestinian (eight Muslims and two Christians) and two Jews. The council would be one governing arm of the British-proposed constitution that would include the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine. The powers of the Legislative Council, however, would be circumscribed; for example, it would have no say over Jewish IMMIGRATION and LAND purchases.

Palestinian leaders rejected the proposal, because the Palestinian members would be outnumbered by the combined vote of the Jewish representatives and the British members on the council. Additionally, the high commissioner could veto legislation, and the sensitive subject of immigration would be considered instead by a special advisory commission composed of representatives from the three religious communities—Muslim, Christian, and Jewish—who would propose policies to the high commissioner, who would not be obliged to follow its advice. Therefore all Palestinian political groups except the Zionist-funded National Muslim Societies boycotted the 1923 council elections. Rather than form a clearly unrepresentative legislative council, the high commissioner canceled the elections, and the Legislative Council never came into being.

Bibliography

- Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Mattar, Philip. "Legislative Council." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.

Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.

Taylor Alan R. Prelude to Israel, an Analysis of Zionist Diplomacy, 1897–1947. Escondido, CA: Philosophical Library, 1955.

LEHI

See LOHAMEI HERUT YISRAEL

Leibowitz, Yeshayahu (1903–1994)

Yeshayahu Leibowitz was a leading Israeli moral philosopher, scholar, scientist, and writer. Born in Riga, Latvia, he studied chemistry and philosophy at the University of Berlin and continued with studies of biochemistry and medicine at the University of Basel (Switzerland), where he received an M.D. in 1934. In 1935 Leibowitz immigrated to Palestine and joined the faculty of Hebrew University. Apart from his numerous scientific articles and essays, he published a wide range of books on philosophy, Jewish thought, the teaching of Maimonides, and politics, and he was also editor of several volumes of the Encyclopedia Hebraica, a Hebrew-language encyclopedia. An Orthodox Jew, Leibowitz is known primarily for his religious writings and for his critique of modern Israeli values and national policies.

Leibowitz's publicly expressed views on Judaism and Israel aroused a great deal of debate and antagonism in religious and secular circles. His notion of Judaism focused primarily on the importance of Halakha (Jewish religious law). He held that the obligation to observe the commandments was an end in itself and that religion was thus not a means to a greater personal or social good. Although he initially stressed nationalism's religious importance, when the state of Israel formally excluded Halakic norms at its establishment, Leibowitz argued fiercely for the separation of religion from the state. As a Zionist he insisted that the state was not an ideal with an intrinsic significance but was there to serve its citizens. He believed that ZIONISM "is not an ideology, but a complex of activities undertaken to restore independence to the Jewish nation in its own land."

Leibowitz was uncompromising in his political views. Although he had been active in various political groups, he disapproved of the system of party rule and the plethora of Israeli political parties, including the religious parties, believing that "only God can govern." He labored publicly against government corruption and against the worldwide proliferation of nuclear weapons. Following the 1967 WAR he staunchly objected to retaining any Arab territory, arguing that OCCUPATION morally destroys the conqueror, and he supported CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS who opposed serving in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and in LEBANON. In 1993 he was selected to receive the Israel Prize but declined to accept it when Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN refused to participate in the award ceremony because of Leibowitz's past criticism of him.

Leibowitz coined the term "Judeo-Nazis" to describe the mentality behind the 1994 massacre of twenty-nine Muslim worshipers in the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in HEBRON. He also supported the REFUSENIKS (soldiers who refuse to serve in the Occupied Territories), 200 of whom have been jailed, and Leibowitz is credited with giving the movement its momentum. As a philosopher Leibowitz was one of three prominent members of the Israeli academic community who protested when Israel unilaterally annexed JERUSALEM in 1980. Despite his Orthodoxy he ridiculed the cult of the Wailing Wall as pagan stone-worship. He charged that Jewish treatment of the Palestinians was turning Israel into a police state and warned that the continued occupation of GAZA and the WEST BANK would eventually spell the end of Israel and bring catastrophe to the Jewish people as a whole.

After his retirement from Hebrew University in 1970, Leibowitz continued to teach philosophy and the history of science until his death.

Bibliography

- Friedman, Motti. "Yeshayahu Leibowitz." The Pedagogic Center, the Department for Jewish Zionist Education. Jerusalem: The Jewish Agency for Israel, 2000.
- Leibowitz, Yeshayahu. Body and Mind: The Psycho-Physical Problem. New York: Adama Books, 1990.
- . The Faith of Maimonides. Brooklyn, NY: Lambda Publishers, 1987.
- . "Israel against Itself." Commentary Magazine. November 1994.
- . Judaism, Human Values, and the Jewish State. Translated by Eliezer Goldman. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1991.
- Newton, Adam Zachary. The Fence and the Neighbor: Emmanuel Levinas, Yeshayahu Leibowitz, and Israel among the Nations. New York: SUNY Press, 2000.

Levinger, Rabbi Moshe (1941–)

For nearly forty years Moshe Levinger has been the driving force behind the Jewish SETTLEMENT movement in the WEST BANK. Born in JERUSALEM, he is a graduate of Bnei Akiva, the yeshiva founded by Rabbi Moshe Zvi, and a pupil of RABBI AVRAHAM YITZHAK KOOK. While at the yeshiva Levinger was part of an elite group of young men called Gahelit, which contained many of the future leaders of the GUSH EMUNIM fundamentalist movement. Levinger himself was appointed ultimate leader of Gush Emunim in 1987. In 1964, after it failed to exert influence within the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY, Gahelit gravitated toward Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook, son of Rabbi Kook, who emphasized the importance of Jewish settlement in the LAND of Israel. In April 1968 Levinger led a group of eighty Jews who rented a hotel in the West Bank city of HEBRON to celebrate Passover. After the holiday the group remained and under his leadership declared their intention to stay in the city permanently. By September the Israeli government began construction of KIRYAT ARBA, one of the first Jewish settlements in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, for Levinger and his followers; they also received support and weapons from an organization calling itself the “Whole Land of Israel Movement” that later evolved into the Gush Emunim.

His political and religious ideology is consonant with JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM, which believes that the whole land of Israel (ERETZ YISRAEL, which includes all the Occupied Territories plus the HASHEMITE Kingdom of JORDAN) is Jewish due to the ancient and eternal covenant between God and the Jews. In 1987, together with MENAHEM BEGIN, Levinger was voted by twenty-two leading Israelis in the Hebrew weekly Hadashot as the most influential person of his generation on Israeli society. Boaz Epplebaum, an adviser to Foreign Minister SHIMON PERES, said of Levinger: “Prime Ministers have come and gone but Levinger is still riding high. All of us have adapted ourselves to his dimensions and his scale.”

In 1988 Levinger was driving through a Palestinian village when his car was hit by stones. According to witnesses, he parked his car and walked toward the demonstrators while firing his pistol indiscriminately, killing one man and injuring another. The Israeli army commander who witnessed the shooting said that “after the rabbi fired his weapon, he walked down the road screaming, ‘You’re dogs,’ at Palestinian vendors, kicking over vegetable crates and flower containers.” Levinger was sentenced to prison for the murder, but before entering prison he was honored for his actions in battling the Palestinians and settling the West Bank. The celebration was attended by numerous well-wishers, including Israeli general Yitzhak Mordecai, military commander of the West Bank, and Israel’s president, CHAIM HERZOG. After serving two and a half months of his five-month sentence, Levinger was released from prison—his short sentence and early release reflecting the influence on the secular judicial system of settler rabbis, who teach that the spilling of non-Jewish blood is a lesser offense than the spilling of Jewish blood. In a religious ruling on the attack published in Ha’aretz on 13 May 1989, Rabbi Moshe Zvi Neriya stated that every Jew has the duty “to shoot [Arabs] left and right without thinking and without hesitating.”

In the 1980s Levinger encouraged the Jewish underground (TERROR AGAINST TERROR [TNT]) to attack and kill Arabs, and in an operation in June 1980, settlers used car bombs to badly wound the elected mayors of NABLUS and Ramallah in the West Bank. In July 1983 Levinger’s son-in-law and other members of TNT burst into the courtyard of the Islamic College in Hebron during a noon lunch break, tossed a grenade, and sprayed machine-gun fire, killing three Palestinian students and injuring thirty-three. “Whoever did this,” declared Levinger, “has sanctified God’s name in public.” Although he has been convicted seven times for attacking Palestinians and was implicated in hundreds of violent incidents, Levinger was jailed only once; some of his foot soldiers were charged but few were convicted. The Israeli authorities ignored the SETTLER VIOLENCE and intervened only when the underground settlers’ group TNT tried to blow up the DOME OF THE ROCK in Jerusalem.

Levinger considers his religious ties to the biblical Judea and Samaria (West Bank) stronger than his loyalty to the state of Israel, although in 1993 he unsuccessfully ran for a seat in the Israeli parliament. He opposed Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN’s peace policies and castigated him harshly. In Levinger’s ideology Palestinians are “foreign residents” and “will be allowed to stay in Israel if they follow our laws and don’t demand privileges.” He does not believe, however, that the Palestinians will accept such an arrangement and therefore advocates their TRANSFER to other states.

In 2001 Levinger, who lives in a Jewish settlement in downtown Hebron with his US-born wife and eleven children, told US reporter Ellen Cantarow: "Our idea is very simple. The difference between one part of Eretz Yisrael and the other is an odd idea. The Jewish spirit, throughout all generations, was that there was a place called Eretz Yisrael. Not two parts, Eretz Yisrael, the other Palestinian autonomy."

See also GREATER LAND OF ISRAEL MOVEMENT; GUSH EMUNIM; JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM; SETTLER VIOLENCE

Bibliography

- Andersen, Jenny, and Fiona Gormley. Rabbi Moshe Levinger: Role Profile. University of Texas at Austin College of Liberal Arts. 31 October 1994. www.la.utexas.edu/chenry/mena/roles/aip/f1994/0030.html.
- Cantarow, Ellen. "Gush Emunim: The Twilight of Zionism?" Media Monitors Network. 27 February 2001.
- Dudai, Ron. Free Rein: Vigilante Settlers and Israel's Non-Enforcement of the Law. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2001.
- . Tacit Consent: Israeli Policy on Law Enforcement toward Settlers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- Friedman, Robert I. Zealots for Zion: Inside Israel's West Bank Settlement Movement. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1992.
- Levy, Gideon. "Bitter Harvest." Ha'aretz Friday Magazine (Jerusalem). 19 October 2001.
- . "A Purim Visit to Hebron." Ha'aretz. 17 March 2001.
- Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1988.
- Newman, David, ed. Impact of Gush Emunim: Politics and Settlement in the West Bank. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 1985.
- Ravitzky, Aviezer, and Michael Swirsky. Messianism, Zionism, and Jewish Religious Radicalism. Translated by Jonathan Chipman. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Shahak, Israel, and Norton Mezvinsky. Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- Silberstein, Laurence J., ed. Jewish Fundamentalism in Comparative Perspective: Religion, Ideology, and the Crisis of Modernity. New York: New York University Press, 1993.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- . Fundamentalism, Terrorism, and Democracy: The Case of Gush Emunim Underground. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution, Wilson Center, 1986.

Levy, David (1937–)

An Israeli politician, a leader of Israel's SEPHARDIC and MIZRAHI (Spanish, Arab, or African) Jews, and a holder of numerous high government offices, David Levy is the first Mizrahi to have achieved such accomplishments. Born in Rabat, Morocco, he immigrated to Israel in 1957 and soon thereafter became a leader of the poor, uneducated Moroccan working class of Beit Shean, a city in the northern district of Israel. After serving one term as mayor of Beit Shean, he entered national politics and became a union activist. Running as part of an opposition faction of the LIKUD PARTY, he campaigned for membership in the HISTADRUT (labor federation) executive body, which was then completely dominated by ASHKENAZI (European Jews) who were MAPAI (LABOR PARTY) loyalists. Until 1973, Likud had been an alliance of middle-class, Ashkenazi, and right-wing parties that had never had an active role in governing Israel. Levy distinguished himself in the Likud as the first of many young working-class party members from a Mizrahi background. Levy's rise in the party coincided with and expressed the surging power of the new social rebellion of the Mizrahi.

In 1977 Levy campaigned for MENAHEM BEGIN, whose election overturned Labor's thirty-year dominance of Israeli politics. Levy's presence in the Likud and his campaign for Begin resulted in hundreds of thousands of Mizrahis going to the polls and voting for Begin (and Likud). From 1977 until 1981 Levy was minister of "immigrant absorption" in the first two Begin governments. During this period the major political issues were the campaign to liberate SOVIET JEWS and the controversy over the Beta Israel (Ethiopian tribes). Levy was not active in the Ethiopian issue, and the Soviet Jewish problem continued to drag on with few results. Levy gained a more important role in Begin's government in January 1979 when he became minister of housing and construction, a post he held until 1992. In line with Begin's policies, he provided enormous support to the settler movement and helped create a major construction boom in the WEST BANK, which created new jobs for workers. Additionally, for most of his thirteen years as housing minister Levy was able to make housing for poor and lower-middle-class Israelis inside the Green Line more affordable.

During these years Levy gained a huge following. While Likud leader YITZHAK SHAMIR was often aloof and ineffective at forging coalitions, Levy was able to enter doors closed to the aging prime minister. He helped Likud court the SHAS Party into the Shamir government. Levy also was the symbolic leader of the young Mizrahi Likud activists; in the Likud Central Committee he commanded a huge portion of the members and was considered a likely candidate to succeed Shamir. In 1987, however, Levy encountered a young diplomat named BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, then the Israeli ambassador to the UNITED NATIONS. According to Netanyahu in The Way to Power, during their meeting in a New York hotel Levy attempted to bring Netanyahu into his camp in preparation for the 1988 Knesset elections. Netanyahu turned down Levy's proposal and instead became a nominal ally of Defense Minister Moshe Arens. This created a fierce enmity between the two, one that would lead eventually to the decline of Levy's influence in the Likud.

One issue that hurt Levy's career was his continuous shifts in position regarding the peace process and the Likud's libertarian economic policies. During the Shamir administrations Likud policies on the ECONOMY and the SETTLEMENTS also drove many Mizrahi to vote for other parties, decreasing Levy's mass base. Finally, Levy was unable to stop the public perception that he had changed from the symbol of Mizrahi vibrancy into a corrupt clan chief. As the Mizrahi drifted away from the Likud, Levy's rivals in the Likud tried to minimize his influence. However, in 1990 Shamir faced a major crisis when the Labor and Shas parties brought down his governing coalition because he refused to consider any peace initiatives with the Palestinians. He thus formed a narrow right-wing coalition in which he was forced to give Levy the Foreign Ministry.

Although Levy believed that the new post would boost his chances of gaining the Likud chairmanship, it was a disaster. Levy, who speaks Hebrew, French, and Moroccan Arabic, was at a loss during important discussions with US diplomats, especially Secretary of State JAMES BAKER. His frequent slips of the tongue embarrassed many of his coalition colleagues, and he was lampooned by the Israeli MEDIA and public. Making Levy's situation worse was Shamir's appointment of Netanyahu as his deputy, who shined and was seen as Shamir's right-hand man at the MADRID CONFERENCE of 1991. Subsequently Netanyahu became party chairman.

As the 1992 elections neared, Levy vowed to crush Netanyahu and used all of his influence in the Likud Central Committee to undermine his rival. Nevertheless, Netanyahu won the vote of the political spectrum within Likud and earned the second slot on the Likud list after Shamir, while Levy placed eighth. When both Shamir and the Likud were defeated in the elections, Levy was optimistic because the Likud chairmanship was open and he believed he was the obvious person to assume the position. After new leadership was chosen, not only was Levy defeated but the party also managed to make him the scapegoat for years of Likud corruption, bribes, indulgences, and other malfeasances. The media accepted the party line and Levy was nationally humiliated. Appalled that members of his own party had turned on him, he refused to accept Netanyahu as the new Likud chairman and established his own political party—GESHER (Bridge). Levy believed he could draw a mass defection from Likud parliamentarians, which would lead senior party members in the Central Committee to replace Netanyahu. Not only did party members stay loyal to Netanyahu, but Gesher on its own never reached the potential Levy predicted it would, while Netanyahu's campaign to overthrow Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN helped revitalize the Likud and bring in new members.

By winter 1996 Levy was under the enormous stress of his first election campaign outside of the Likud, while Netanyahu also needed as many voters as possible. After the 4 November 1995 murder of Rabin, Netanyahu tried to moderate his image, portraying himself not as a hard-line demagogue but rather as a thoughtful skeptic who wanted to slow the pace of negotiations with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION. He concluded that Levy's inclusion would bring him closer to that goal. Throughout the spring, Netanyahu and Levy negotiated, and in the end Levy agreed to participate in a Likud-Gesher-TZOMET coalition for the May 1996 elections. Though a massive success for Netanyahu, the ELECTIONS gave Levy very little power within the coalition. He demanded and received the Foreign Ministry, but instead of controlling the ministry he was again overshadowed by Netanyahu, who personally handled every important foreign policy decision during his term.

On 6 January 1998 Levy quit the coalition, and an independent Gesher began to drift closer to the policies of the Labor Party. In 1999 a no-confidence vote in the Knesset forced Netanyahu to call early elections. Levy had not yet redeveloped Gesher's mass appeal and was faced with the dilemma of whether to split with Likud in favor of Labor. He chose to join EHUD BARAK and the Labor Party and merged Gesher into ONE ISRAEL, becoming a partner in the new coalition's leadership. In Barak's government Levy once again was chosen as foreign minister, but Barak, like Netanyahu, dominated foreign policy without consulting Levy. For the third time Levy was a passive partner as foreign minister and he quit the coalition in April 2000.

By November 2000, however, Barak had resigned in order to call new elections, and in the Likud a February vote gave ARIEL SHARON a landslide victory. Sharon formed a coalition without Levy, so that for only the second time since 1977 he was left without a ministry in a new government. However, in early April Sharon's coalition began to disintegrate and Levy was invited to become a part of it. He was named minister without portfolio, a position with almost no influence. When Sharon was forced in November 2002 to call for new elections in January 2003, Levy's position was precarious. He merged Geshet back into the Likud and backed Sharon in his primary campaign against Netanyahu. Still, Sharon's overwhelming victory in January 2003 did not provide Levy the influence he had so long sought, as he was not awarded a ministry in the new government. Although the merger left most of Levy's Geshet supporters intact, his future in the Likud is not expected to be prosperous. The right wing has recruited a far greater number of new members, and the Likud has split into a new party, KADIMA. In recent years Levy has returned to Likud.

Bibliography

- Arian, Asher. The Second Republic: Politics in Israel. London: Chatham House Publishers, 1997.
- Avnery, Uri. "The Lost Honor of David Levy." Gush Shalom. 28 February 2000. <http://gush-shalom.org/archives/article81.html>.
- Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Hrebenar, Ronald J., Robert C. Benedict, and Matthew J. Burbank. Political Parties, Interest Groups, and Political Campaigns. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1999.
- Maor, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Salamon, Hagar. "The Ambivalence over the Levantization of Israel: 'David Levi' Jokes." International Journal of Humor Research. 20:4 (November 2007).
- Shindler, Colin. The Land beyond Promise: Israel, Likud and the Zionist Dream. London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.

Liberal Party (Israel)

Israel's Liberal Party (Miflaga Liberalit), which formed in May 1961, became the second major component in the LIKUD PARTY bloc in 1988 and a stable coalition partner in Likud politics. The Liberal Party's right-wing, nationalist origins lie in the Organization of General Zionists (Zionim Klaliim), established in 1922 in Palestine. In 1961 the party merged with the Progressive Party to become the Liberal Party (Miflaga Liberalit). In 1965 the Liberal Party split, with the conservatives continuing as the Liberal Party, which joined HERUT to form GAHAL (eventually becoming Likud), and the liberal faction forming the Independent Liberal Party (Mifleget Liberalim Atzmaim).

Bibliography

- Moas, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Roberts, Samuel J. Party and Policy in Israel: The Battle between Hawks and Doves. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.

Liberal Party (Palestinian)

The Liberal Party (Hizb al-Ahrar) was a Palestinian nationalist party founded in JAFFA and the GAZA STRIP circa 1930 by Shaykh As'ad Shuqeiri (1860–1946), Hassan Sidqi al-Dajani (?–1938), and others as an alternative to the bitter rivalry between the Jerusalemite AL-HUSAYNI and NASHASHIBI families. Its support tended to come from businessmen and professionals outside of JERUSALEM who had little or no linkage to either of the two families. It participated in the ARAB CONGRESSES, and within the context of Palestinian politics during the BRITISH MANDATE the Liberal Party worked to establish unity among the various factions.

Bibliography

- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Pappé, Ilan. A History of Modern Palestine: One Land, Two Peoples. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Liberty (USS Liberty)

On 8 June 1967, Israeli fighter planes attacked a US Naval signals intelligence ship, the USS Liberty, during the 1967 WAR. In what is considered a major event in the US-Israeli relationship, Israeli planes and torpedo boats repeatedly bombed and strafed the USS Liberty in international waters—some 12.5 nautical miles (23 kilometers) off the coast of the Sinai Peninsula. The attack killed thirty-four US servicemen, wounded at least 173, and severely damaged the ship. Israel apologized and said the attack was an accident, and later paid humanitarian reparations.

New evidence and recent statements by Liberty officials make clear that Tel Aviv knew it was hitting a US ship, although the question of why it did so still remains unanswered. Some speculate that Israel felt that the United States was monitoring Israel's moves on SYRIA. Although Washington accepted Israel's claim that the attack was an error, many outside the government, especially survivors on the ship, believe the attack was deliberate and premeditated. For instance, CIA director Richard Helms wrote that "the board of inquiry (concluded) that the Israelis knew exactly what they were doing in attacking the Liberty." For almost three decades the crewmen of the Liberty have campaigned to have the attack further investigated. Indeed, they claim not only that the attack was intentional, but also that President LYNDON JOHNSON recalled the Sixth Fleet rescue flights to avoid a clash between the United States and Israel.

Bibliography

- BBC Documentary. "Dead in the Water." What Really Happened. www.whatreallyhappened.com/ussliberty.html.
- Berg, Raffi. "Why Did Israel Attack USS Liberty." BBC News. 8 June 2007.
- Ennes, James M., Jr. "The Assault on the USS Liberty Still Covered Up after Twenty-six Years." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. June 1993.
- . Assault on the Liberty. New York: Random House/Raintree Press, 1980.
- . USS Liberty Memorial. n.d. www.gtr5.com.
- Helms, Richard. Over My Shoulder. New York: Random House, 2003.
- Margolis, Eric S. "'The USS Liberty': America's Most Shameful Secret." Toronto Sun. 2 May 2001.
- St. Clair, Jeffrey. "Rockets, Napalm, and Torpedoes and Lies: Israel's Attack on the USS Liberty, Revisited." Counterpunch. 8 June 2007.

Libya

See ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS

Lieberman, Avigdor (1958–)

Avigdor Lieberman (born Evet Lieberman) is an Israeli politician and member of the Knesset. After the 2009 Israeli elections, BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, the new prime minister from the LIKUD, tapped Lieberman to serve as minister of foreign affairs and deputy prime minister of Israel. Lieberman was born in Kishinev in the SOVIET UNION and immigrated to Israel in 1978. He is the founder and leader of the ultra-right-wing YISRAEL BEITENU party, whose electoral base is mainly immigrants from the former Soviet Union. He lives in the WEST BANK SETTLEMENT of Nokdim.

Lieberman established Yisrael Beitenu in 1997 to create a platform for Russian immigrants who support a harder line than YISRAEL B'ALIYA (another party composed mainly of SOVIET JEWS) in negotiations with the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). Much of his motivation came from what he considered the excessive concessions made by Netanyahu, in whose first government (1996–1999) Lieberman was director general of the Likud. Lieberman considered the 1997 WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM, which included the division of the West Bank city of HEBRON, to be a complete negation of fundamental Zionist principles, and he resigned from the Likud. Lieberman first entered the Knesset in 1999 and has since served as minister of National Infrastructure, minister of transportation, minister of strategic affairs, deputy prime minister, and foreign affairs minister. Lieberman strongly opposed the 2003 ROAD MAP at the time of its adoption and left EHUD OLMERT's government due to his opposition to the 2007 Annapolis Conference.

Lieberman has been a polarizing figure within Israeli politics. For instance, following a series of TERRORIST attacks on Israelis perpetrated by Palestinian militants during a three-day period in March 2002, Lieberman proposed issuing an ultimatum to the PNA to halt all terror activity or face wide-ranging attacks. He said, "If it were up to me I would notify the Palestinian Authority that tomorrow at ten in the morning we would bomb all their places of business in Ramallah, for example."

In July 2003, reacting to a commitment made by Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON that amnesty could be given to approximately 350 Palestinian PRISONERS, including members of HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD, Lieberman rejected a chance to participate in the related committee and said: "It would be better to drown these prisoners in the Dead Sea if possible, since that's the lowest point in the world," and continued, according to Galei Tzahal of Israel Army Radio, by stating his willingness, as minister of transport, to supply buses to take the prisoners there.

The "Lieberman Plan," proposed in late May 2004, states that the populations and territories of Israeli Jews and Arabs, including Israeli-Arabs, would be "separated." According to the plan, also known as the "Populated-Area Exchange Plan," Israeli Arab towns adjacent to PNA areas would be transferred to Palestinian authority and only those Arab Israelis who migrated from the area to within Israel's new borders and pledged loyalty to Israel would be allowed to remain Israeli citizens. Prime Minister Sharon condemned Lieberman's statements, saying: "We regard Israeli-Arabs as part of the State of Israel." On 4 June 2004, as the disputes over the upcoming Gaza disengagement plan grew more intense, Sharon dismissed Lieberman from the cabinet because of his intense vocal opposition.

In November 2006, Lieberman called for those Arab members of the Knesset who met with Hamas to be tried for treason. In his words, "World War II ended with the Nuremberg trials. The heads of the Nazi regime, along with their collaborators, were executed. I hope this will be the fate of the collaborators in the Knesset." In remarks in the Knesset in March 2008, shortly after a 6 March attack on Jerusalem's MERCAZ HARAV KOOK YESHIVA, Lieberman stated that "yesterday's attack cannot be disconnected from the Arab MKs incitement, which we hear daily in the Knesset." He further stated, directed at those Arab members of the Knesset that Lieberman claimed uttered anti-Israel incitement, that "a new administration will be established and then we will take care of you."

In January 2009, during the Israeli assault on Gaza, Lieberman argued that Israel "must continue to fight Hamas just like the UNITED STATES did with the Japanese in World War II. Then, too, the occupation of the country was unnecessary." This threat has been interpreted by some MEDIA commentators as an allusion to Hiroshima and Nagasaki and as advocacy for a nuclear strike on Gaza. On the eve of the 2009 elections, Ha'aretz reported that in 1979 Lieberman was involved with the KACH party of RABBI MEIR KAHANE shortly after his immigration to Israel.

Lieberman believes that PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL must sign a loyalty oath or lose their right to vote, and he has worked tirelessly to formalize this perspective into law. Similarly, he has pursued as law the prosecution and imprisonment of anyone who celebrates Israel's independence day as Nakba (Catastrophe), as the Palestinians perceive it. As of 2009 both laws have passed the first reading in the Knesset.

Lieberman's contempt is not solely reserved for Israeli-Arabs or Palestinians under OCCUPATION. In 1998, news reports stated that Lieberman suggested the bombing of the Aswan Dam in retaliation for Egyptian support for YASIR ARAFAT. In 2001, reports stated that he told a group of ambassadors from the former Soviet Union that if Egypt and Israel were ever to face off militarily again, Israel could bomb the Aswan Dam.

Since the signing of the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty, which followed Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's historic visit to Israel, multiple Israeli heads of state have visited EGYPT on numerous occasions. However, Sadat's successor, HOSNI MUBARAK, has visited Israel only once and has never participated in talks on Israeli soil. In 2008, while on the Knesset speaker's podium during its memorial for REHAVAM ZE'EV, Lieberman raised the issue and said, "Mubarak never agreed to come here as president. He wants to talk to us? Let him come here. He doesn't want to talk to us? He can go to hell."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and President SHIMON PERES immediately apologized to the Egyptians, and after Netanyahu began his term as prime minister in March 2009, government aides met with Egyptian officials and told them that Lieberman's comments should not be a reason for tension between the two countries. News reports had previously been issued claiming that Egypt would not work with the Netanyahu administration unless Lieberman personally apologized. The Netanyahu administration labeled them "inaccurate and out of all proportion." Mubarak invited Netanyahu to meet with him personally on the issue, without Lieberman. Unofficial channels for discussion are also reportedly being considered.

With regard to the peace process Lieberman has said, "The peace process is based on three false basic assumptions: that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the main cause of instability in the Middle East, that the conflict is territorial and not ideological, and that the establishment of a Palestinian state based on the 1967 BORDERS will end the conflict." In an attempt to distract President Barack Obama from his effort to promote Israeli-Palestinian peace, Lieberman and Prime Minister Netanyahu plan to broaden the PR campaign overseen by the Foreign Ministry regarding IRAN. Part of the new campaign focuses on Tehran's abuse of human rights and sponsorship of TERRORISM and also aims to appeal to those, such as the gay and lesbian communities, less concerned with Iran's nuclear aspirations and more fearful of its human rights abuses and mistreatment of minorities.

Lieberman has been under investigation since 2006 related to alleged corruption. In 2004, Lieberman's twenty-one-year-old daughter, Michal, set up a consulting firm, which received 11 million shekels (approximately $2.8 million) from anonymous overseas sources. Lieberman, according to the police, received more than a 2.1-million-shekels (approximately $540,000) salary from the company for two years of employment. Moreover, according to an investigation by Ha'aretz, he allegedly received additional severance pay—amounting to hundreds of thousands of shekels—in 2006 and 2007, while he was minister of strategic affairs and deputy prime minister. Such financial transactions are illegal according to Israeli law. In August 2009 the Israeli Police “recommended that the state prosecution indict Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman on charges of bribery, fraud, money laundering, witness harassment and obstruction of justice.” However, Attorney General Menachem Mazuz must approve the recommendation before Lieberman is formally charged and, because Lieberman brings fifteen seats to Netanyahu's fragile coalition, the decision to indict or not will be a political one.

Bibliography

- BBC. “Profile: Avigdor Lieberman.” BBC News. 6 February 2009.
- Electronic Intifada. “Lieberman, Avigdor—Israeli Politician and Deputy Prime Minister.” n.d. <http://electronicintifada.net/bytopic/people/658.shtml>.
- Fisk, Robert. “Why Avigdor Lieberman Is the Worst Thing That Could Happen to the Middle East.” The Independent. 18 March 2009.
- Goldberg, Jeffrey. “The Lieberman Disaster.” The Atlantic. 17 March 2009. http://jeffreygoldberg.theatlantic.com/archives/2009/03/the\_lieberman\_disaster.php.
- Gordon, Neve. “Avigdor Lieberman, Israel's Shame.” The Guardian. 25 March 2009.
- Hitchens, Christopher. “Avigdor Lieberman's Chutzpah: The Right to Return Cannot Confer the Right to Expel.” Slate Magazine. 23 February 2009. <http://www.slate.com/id/2211915/>.
- Lis, Jonathan. “Police: Lieberman Charges Should Include Bribery, Breach of Trust.” Ha'aretz. 28 May 2009.
- Lis, Jonathan, Uri Blau, Gidi Weiz, and Jack Houry. “Ha'aretz Probe: Unknown Overseas Sources Paid MK Lieberman NIS 2.5m.” Ha'aretz. 26 January 2009.

- Lynfield, Ben. “The Rise of Avigdor Lieberman.” The Nation. 14 December 2006.
- McCarthy, Rory. “Hardline Populist Lieberman Could Be Surprise Kingmaker in Israeli Election.” The Guardian. 5 February 2009.
- Ravid, Barak. “Lieberman Asks to Meet with Shunned Belarus Leader.” Ha'aretz. 27 May 2009.
- . “Lieberman: ‘Peace Industry’ Nothing but a Waste of Money.” Ha'aretz. 6 May 2009.
- Ravid, Barak, and Jonathan Lis. “Police: Indict Lieberman on Multiple Graft Charges.” Ha'aretz. 2 August 2009.
- Uni, Assaf. “‘Lieberman Sees Us Europeans as a Bunch of Cowards.’” Ha'aretz. 8 May 2009.
- Zarchin, Tomer. “Yisrael Beiteinu to Advance Bill on Loyalty Oath.” Ha'aretz. 28 May 2009.

Likud Party

The Likud (Consolidation) Party is a right-wing political party that supports free market capitalism and neoliberalism as well as annexation and settlement of the entire land of Israel, including the whole of JERUSALEM. Historically it has been the second-largest party in Israel, behind the LABOR PARTY. The Likud's roots are in VLADIMIR (ZE'EV) JABOTINSKY'S Revisionist ZIONISM, which formed the HERUT Party that was the main opposition to the Labor Zionist MAPAI party. The Likud was formed in 1973 when La'am (made up of the Free Center, State List, and the Movement for Greater Israel) and GAHAL (Gush Herut Liberalim) joined together in preparation for elections that year. The Likud worked as a coalition of its factions led by MENAHEM BEGIN'S Herut until 1988, when the factions formally dissolved and Likud became a unitary political party.

Likud has promoted hawkish policies toward the Palestinians, opposing Palestinian nationalism and statehood, and supporting and encouraging the Jewish SETTLEMENT movement in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Under Likud prime minister ARIEL SHARON the separation BARRIER between Israel and the Occupied Territories was constructed. Two years into the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2002, Israel's Likud-led government militarily reoccupied Palestinian towns and refugee camps throughout the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP, although in 2005 Sharon carried out a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. Thereafter Likud split, and Sharon and his supporters formed KADIMA, which has proclaimed that Israel will unilaterally determine its final BORDERS, including annexing the major settlement blocks and the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY. What remained of the Likud after the split opposes any Palestinian state or entity in the West Bank.

Begin, who in 1977 became the first Likud prime minister elected, was a former leader of the militant underground IRGUN and built the settlement program in the Occupied Territories at a feverish pace. He also concluded Israel's first peace treaty with an Arab state, EGYPT. The second Likud prime minister, YITZHAK SHAMIR, was a former commando leader in the underground Lehi and carried on the settlement project with even greater fervor. Benjamin Netanyahu, elected in May 1996, was the only Likud leader who was not a military man and is best known for stalling the OSLO PROCESS. Sharon, the fourth Likud prime minister, was a militarist who as defense minister led the country during the 1982 LEBANON WAR. Most of his life he was an advocate of and activist for Greater Israel, but in his last year in office (2005) he decided to forgo settlement in Gaza for greater control over the West Bank.

The social composition of the Likud has been diverse. The old-guard Likud leadership consisted of ASHKENAZIM (European Jews) with Revisionist backgrounds, while the rank-and-file has been composed mostly of the MIZRAHIM (Spanish, Arab, or African Jews). Many immigrants from the former Soviet Union also found their way to the Likud. The majority of SOVIET JEWS gravitated to the right either in the NATIONAL UNION PARTY or NATAN SHARANSKY'S YISRAEL B'ALIYA, and most followed Sharansky when his party merged with Likud. About 5,000 Israeli Druze (a religious sect that broke from Shi'a Islam circa 1017 CE, unique in its incorporation of Gnostic, neo-Platonic, and other philosophies), are Likud members—a somewhat higher ratio than the Israeli Jewish population—and two Druze hold Likud seats in the Knesset. Although the Druze are generally unsympathetic to Revisionist Zionism or the settler movement, they support the Likud's populist, pro-military, and Israeli nationalist positions.

Ideologically the Likud encompasses a spectrum from center right to far right. At the far right of the nationalism spectrum is Rabbi Moshe Feiglin's Manhigut Yehudit (Jewish Leadership) faction, which controls approximately 5 percent of the Likud central committee. Members of this faction strongly support the settler movement and the concept of Greater Israel, including TRANSFER of the Palestinians to other states as well as construction of the THIRD TEMPLE on the AL-HARAM ASH-

SHARIF. The majority of the Likud right wing—many from the old guard who came up through Herut, BETAR, or other Revisionist organizations—sympathize with the settler movement and Greater Israel, and oppose Palestinian statehood and withdrawal from any part of the Occupied Territories. But they are not completely monolithic—some are willing to consider limited territorial concessions in return for a proven defensive benefit, although nearly all opposed ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL WITHDRAWAL FROM GAZA in 2005. Most oppose Feiglin's proposals for the denaturalization of the Palestinian citizens of Israel and for the immediate redemption of the TEMPLE MOUNT.

Further toward the center are what might be called the pragmatic hawks, who were led by Sharon until he broke with Likud in 2005. This loosely united faction believes, either for strategic or demographic reasons, that Israel should withdraw from some, albeit limited, parts of the Occupied Territories. The extent and timetable of such a withdrawal are a matter of debate within the faction, as is the issue of whether it should be unilateral or coordinated with the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. Most of this faction rejects Palestinian statehood in principle, although its members disagree about the nature and extent of autonomy that Israel should allow the Palestinians and how much of the West Bank and Gaza should be given up.

The last group along the security spectrum is the so-called leftists. The furthest left of these, such as Israeli president Moshe Katsav and Sderot mayor Eli Moyal, could probably fit into the Labor Party's ideological mainstream. Katsav has repeatedly spoken against permanent OCCUPATION and urged a return to the negotiating table. The members of this faction arrived at their beliefs in various ways. Some, like Katsav or Moyal, are Mizrahim who were shut out of Labor or entered politics through local Likud networks. The strength of this faction is difficult to estimate; its representation in the Central Committee is probably no stronger than Manhigut Yehudit's (if that), but many of its members are prominent in public life and have influence within the party.

See also ISRAELI POLITICAL PARTIES AND SETTLEMENTS; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Arian, Asher. The Second Republic: Politics in Israel. London: Chatham House Publishers, 1997.
- Benari, Yehuda. Herut, Gahal, Likud. London: Information Department of the Herut Movement of Great Britain, 1974.

- Bookmiller, Robert J. "Likud's Jordan Policy." Middle East Policy. 5:3 (1997).
- Cohen-Almagor, Raphael. The Boundaries of Liberty and Tolerance: The Struggle against Kahanism. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.
- Fraser, T. G. The Arab-Israeli Conflict. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.
- Jonathan, J. "Preparing for Battle." The Head Heeb. 7 January 2005. <http://headheeb.blogmosis.com/archives/027104.html>.
- Kronish, Ronald, and Neil A. Cooper. "A Guide for the Perplexed: Israeli Elections and Coalition Scenarios 1992." Jerusalem: American Jewish Committee, 1992.
- Lochery, Neill. Israeli Labor Party: In the Shadow of the Likud. London: Ithaca Press, 1997.
- Maor, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Netanyahu, Benjamin. Fighting Terrorism: How Democracies Can Defeat Domestic and International Terrorism. London: Allison and Busby, 1996.
- . A Place among the Nations. New York: Bantam, 1993.
- Peleg, Ilan. Begin's Foreign Policy, Israel's Move to the Right, 1977–1983. Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing Group, 1987.
- Raviv, Dan, and Yossi Melman. Every Spy a Prince. Boston, MA: Houghton Mifflin, 1991.
- Shapiro, Yonathan. The Road to Power: Herut Party in Israel. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.
- Shindler, Colin. Israel, Likud and the Zionist Dream: Power, Politics and Ideology from Begin to Netanyahu. New York: I. B. Tauris, 1995.
- . The Land beyond Promise: Israel, Likud and the Zionist Dream. London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.
- Sofer, Sasson. Begin: An Anatomy of Leadership. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1988.
- Stein, Pam. "Likud Faces Bribery Inquiry." APS Diplomat Recorder. 57:25 (2002).
- . "Sharon Wins Backing of Likud for Labor Pact." APS Diplomat Recorder. 61:23 (2004).

Livni, Tzipora (Tzipi) Malka (1958–)

Tzipora Tzipi Malka Livni is an Israeli politician who, since September 2008, has been leader of the KADIMA Party, the largest party in the Knesset. She was acting prime minister from September 2008 to February 2009. Raised as an ardent revisionist-nationalist (both her parents were prominent former IRGUN members), Livni served as a lieutenant in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES. Thereafter she served in the elite MOSSAD unit, based in Paris, responsible for Operation Wrath of God (also known as Bayonet), which sought out and assassinated leaders of the BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION in Europe. In Israel she has earned a reputation as honest, clean, and consistent in sticking to her principles. Prior to her political career, Livni graduated from the Bar Ilan University Faculty of Law and was a practicing commercial lawyer for ten years.

Livni entered politics in 1996, when she tried to win a spot on LIKUD's list to the Knesset. She was not elected to the Knesset but was appointed director general of the Government Companies Authority in BENJAMIN NETANYAHU's first government (June 1996–July 1999) and oversaw the privatization of a number of companies. In 1999 she won a seat in the Knesset and, after the Likud assumed power in 2001, Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON appointed Livni minister of regional cooperation. This position was followed by appointments as minister of agriculture and rural development, minister of immigrant absorption, and minister of housing and construction. She received the Abirat Ha-Shilton (Quality of Governance) award for 2004. On 1 October 2005, she was appointed minister of justice after several months acting in that position on an interim basis.

Livni was a key supporter of Sharon's plan for ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA and was a leader of the "left-wing" faction of the Likud Party. Her political approach depends on compromise, and this has enabled her to score important successes. For example, Livni was instrumental in getting Netanyahu to support the disengagement process and ensuring ratification of it in the Knesset. Livni was active in promoting the 2007 Annapolis peace talks and the opening of indirect peace negotiations with SYRIA.

However, the Likud Party split over the disengagement plan, and Livni, along with EHUD OLMERT and others, joined the new Kadima Party, founded by Ariel Sharon on 20 November 2005. When Sharon was incapacitated by a stroke, Olmert became acting prime minister, and Tzipi Livni became the number two leader in Kadima and in the Israeli government.

On 4 May 2006 Livni became deputy prime minister and retained the position of foreign minister, while resigning her post as minister of justice. Alone among leading government members, Livni escaped virtually unscathed from the massive wave of public criticism that followed the 2006 war in LEBANON against HIZBULLAH. She had led the quest for a diplomatic solution, through UN Security Council Resolution 1701. Critics of the resolution, which has allowed the rearming of Hizbullah, have blamed Livni.

Livni became the first Israeli cabinet minister to explicitly differentiate Palestinian guerrilla attacks against Israeli military targets from terrorist attacks against civilians. In an interview on the US television news show Nightline in March 2006, Livni stated, "Somebody who is fighting against Israeli soldiers is an enemy and we will fight back, but I believe that this is not under the definition of TERRORISM, if the target is a soldier." On the other hand, Livni, as acting prime minister, presided over the massive air and land invasion of Gaza—OPERATION CAST LEAD—during which hundreds of civilians were killed.

Though Livni has been sharply criticized by the Israeli right for promoting negotiations and compromise, her tenure as foreign minister includes aggressive and repeated denunciations of terror, as well as a clear and repeated emphasis on the legitimacy of Israel and of Zionist ideology, and frank assertion of Jewish national rights. She is the first foreign minister in many years to strongly emphasize these issues.

On 2 May 2007 Livni called for Olmert's resignation in the wake of the publication of the Winograd Commission's interim report concerning Israel's poor performance in the war in Lebanon and new allegations of Olmert's corruption. Olmert did not then resign, but in the Kadima leadership election held on 17 September 2008, Olmert decided not to stand for reelection as party leader and stated he would resign as prime minister following the election. Livni and Shaul Mofaz emerged as the main rivals for the leadership; Livni won the leadership election by a margin of just 431 votes (1 percent). When Olmert resigned as prime minister on 21 September 2008 after Israeli police had recommended on 6 September that criminal charges be brought against him, Livni became acting prime minister.

In February 2009 Israel held elections for the Knesset. Livni, acting prime minister and head of the Kadima Party, campaigned against Netanyahu of the Likud to lead the new government. While election results gave Kadima the most seats in the Knesset (twenty-eight), parties to the right in Israel's political spectrum gained enough seats that a coalition government under Kadima leadership proved unattainable. After Livni's efforts failed, Israeli president SHIMON PERES asked Netanyahu (whose party received one less seat than Kadima in the elections—twenty-seven) to form a government, marking the first time in Israel's history that the party with the most seats was unable to form a government.

See also EHUD OLMERT; OPERATION CAST LEAD

Bibliography

- Benn, Aluf. "How the Netanyahu Brand Beat Livni to the PM's Office." Ha'aretz. 16 April 2009.
- Hartman, Benjamin L. "The Long Arc of Israeli Politics Bends toward Kadima." Ha'aretz. 22 May 2009.
- Hider, James, Charles Bremner, and Fran Yeoman. "The Secret Life of Tzipi Livni: How the Woman Set to Be Israel's New Leader Earned Her Spurs as an Agent Working for a Covert Cell in an Elite Spy Unit." Timesonline (UK). 20 September 2008. http://www.timesonline.co.uk/tol/news/world/middle\_east/article4791158.ece.
- Mahnaïmi, Uzi. "Tzipi Livni: Terrorist-Hunter Secret of Woman Tipped to Lead Israel." Timesonline (UK). 1 June 2008. http://www.timesonline.co.uk/tol/news/world/middle\_east/article4040016.ece.
- Westcott, Kathryn. "Tzipi Livni: Israel's 'Mrs. Clean.'" BBC News. 2 May 2007.

Lobby, Pro-Israel

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS

Lohamei Herut Yisrael

Lohamei Herut Yisrael (LEHI, Fighters for the Freedom of Israel, or Stern Group) was a militant underground organization that operated in Palestine from 1940 to 1948 during the BRITISH MANDATE. At first it was composed chiefly of a group headed by AVRAHAM "YAIR" STERN, which had broken off from the Etzel (IRGUN) group in 1940. The split was caused by disagreement on three main issues: (1) LEHI demanded that the military struggle against the British be continued, irrespective of the war against Nazi GERMANY; (2) it opposed Jewish enlistment in the British army, which VLADIMIR ZE'EV JABOTINSKY (the father of Revisionist ZIONISM) supported; and (3) it was willing to collaborate with anyone, including the Nazis, if they supported the struggle against the British in Palestine. LEHI also demanded unrestricted IMMIGRATION of Jews, as every other Jewish group did at this time. But LEHI rejected the authority of the pre-state Yishuv's elected institutions and the worldwide Zionist movement and sometimes clashed bitterly with the HAGANA, the main underground military organization at the time.

LEHI's goals were maximalist: conquest and liberation of a "Hebrew kingdom from the Euphrates to the Nile," all-out war against the British Empire, and complete withdrawal of Britain from Palestine. In contrast to these broad goals, LEHI's strength was limited; it never had more than a few hundred fighters, and its weapons stores were relatively meager. The disparity between its aspirations and its real power dictated LEHI's method of fighting—bold, extremist actions intended both to obtain funding and weapons and to demonstrate that it was possible to strike successfully at the enemy, Great Britain.

As a result of its actions LEHI initially found itself isolated in the pre-state Yishuv, while British authorities quickly focused their efforts against the group. In 1942 British police shot and killed Stern under disputed circumstances. Several of the group's members were arrested, and the organization went into temporary eclipse. The remaining fighters continued to wage Stern's war, and a new command structure was established—a triumvirate composed of Israel Eldad, Natan Yellin-Mor, and YITZHAK SHAMIR (later prime minister of Israel). TERRORISM continued to be the group's modus operandi, for they believed that a series of painful attacks would force the British to reevaluate the wisdom and price of remaining in Palestine. Ideologically the "new" LEHI was guided by spiritual and philosophical leaders such as Uri Zvi Greenberg and Israel Eldad, while the "old" LEHI was primarily guided by the writings of Abba Achimier, a columnist who embraced national socialism and was a major influence within the Revisionist movement.

The new LEHI adopted a nonsocialist, anti-imperialist platform that viewed the continued British rule of Palestine as a violation of the Mandate's provision and its restrictions on Jewish immigration an intolerable breach of INTERNATIONAL LAW. Unlike the Hagana and IRGUN, which fought against both the British and Palestinians, until 1948, LEHI attacked British targets almost exclusively. LEHI prisoners captured by the British generally refused to present a defense when tried in British courts and instead read statements declaring that the court, because it represented an occupying force, had no jurisdiction over them and was illegal. For the same reason, LEHI prisoners refused to plead for amnesty, even when this would clearly spare them from the death penalty. In one case two LEHI men killed themselves in prison to prevent the British from hanging them.

In 1940 and 1941, LEHI proposed intervening in World War II on the side of Nazi Germany to attain its help in expelling Britain from Mandate Palestine. Late in 1940, LEHI representative Naf-tali Lubenchik was sent to Beirut, LEBANON, where he met the German official Werner Otto von Hentig and delivered a letter from Lehi offering to "actively take part in the war on Germany's side" in return for German support for "the establishment of the historic Jewish state on a national and totalitarian basis, bound by a treaty with the German Reich." Von Hentig forwarded the letter to the German embassy in Ankara, TURKEY, but there is no record of any official response. LEHI tried to establish contact with the Germans again in December 1941, also apparently without success. Ironically, mainstream Labor Zionist efforts were far more productive in this regard, as evidenced in the 1933 HA'AVARA Agreement.

Apart from a small number of high-profile operations, LEHI mostly conducted small-scale attacks on British soldiers, police officers, and, on occasion, Jewish "collaborators." Another operation (in 1947) involved sending letter bombs to British politicians. Others included sabotaging infrastructure, such as bridges, railroads, and oil refineries. LEHI financed its operations from private donations, extortion, and bank robberies. On 6 November 1944 in Cairo, two LEHI members assassinated Lord Moyne, a British government representative it blamed for the 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER immigration policy, which declared Britain's opposition to Palestine becoming a Jewish state. This act rocked the British government and outraged Prime Minister Winston Churchill. Two assassins, Eliyahu Bet-Tzuri and Eliyahu Hakim, were caught, tried by a military tribunal, and hanged on 23 March 1945.

When the JEWISH AGENCY organized the JEWISH RESISTANCE MOVEMENT against the British in November 1945, LEHI joined it along with the Hagana and Etzel. As part of the movement, LEHI carried out several operations, the largest of which was the bombing of the HAIFA railroad workshops in June 1946, in which eleven LEHI members were killed by British soldiers and twenty-two were arrested. The Jewish Resistance Movement broke up following Etzel's bombing of the KING DAVID HOTEL in Jerusalem on 22 July 1946, but LEHI continued with its campaign.

In 1947, LEHI decided to concentrate its activities in JERUSALEM to prevent implementation of the UN Partition Plan (UN RESOLUTION 181) and the internationalization of the city. In April 1948, LEHI, together with the Irgun, massacred more than 100 Palestinians in the village of DEIR YASSIN. By that time LEHI considered the Palestinians as much or more the enemy than the British.

When the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) was established on 31 May 1948, LEHI was disbanded, and its members enlisted in the IDF. Only in Jerusalem did LEHI remain an independent organization, arguing that at the time of Israel's proclamation of independence the city's fate had not yet been determined. On 17 September 1948, LEHI assassinated the UN mediator COUNT FOLKE BERNADOTTE, who had been sent to broker a settlement in the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians. Although arrested, most of the five suspects involved were released immediately and all were granted general amnesty by Israel on 14 February 1949.

In 1980, Israel instituted the LEHI ribbon—red, black, grey, pale blue, and white—which is awarded to those former members of the LEHI underground who wish to carry it.

Bibliography

- Bell, J. Bowyer. Terror out of Zion: The Fight for Israeli Independence, reprint ed. New York: Transaction Publishers, 1996.
- Heller, Joseph. The Stern Gang: Ideology, Politics and Terror, 1940–1949. London: Frank Cass, 1995.
- Marton, Kati. A Death in Jerusalem. New York: Pantheon, 1994.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2000.
- Sherman, A. J. Mandate Days: British Lives in Palestine, 1918–1948. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.
- Zadka, Saul. Blood in Zion: How the Jewish Guerrillas Drove the British out of Palestine. London: Brasseys, 1995.

London Agreement, 1987

See HUSAYN-PERES AGREEMENT

London Conference, 1946–1947

In July 1946, Britain released the MORRISON-GRADY PLAN, which proposed a unitary federal trusteeship in Palestine. Zionists rejected it categorically, while the Palestinians were skeptical and had numerous reservations, such as who would control Jewish IMMIGRATION. To clarify the plan to both sides, Britain decided to hold a second LONDON CONFERENCE, called for September 1946, although neither Jews nor Arabs participated. Palestinians refused to attend unless AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI was allowed to participate, and Zionists so strenuously opposed the concept of a unitary state that they were unwilling even to discuss it. The British tried again in February 1947, proposing an independent Palestinian state with a Jewish minority after a five-year transitional period under British trusteeship. Both the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE and the JEWISH AGENCY rejected the plan.

Three weeks later Britain announced that it would turn the fate of Palestine over to the UNITED NATIONS.

Bibliography

- Caplan, Neil. Futile Diplomacy: Arab-Zionist Negotiations and the End of the Mandate, vol. II. London: Frank Cass, 1986.
- Fischbach, Michael R. "London Conference." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

London/St. James Conference, 1939

The London/St. James Conference of February–March 1939 was organized by the British under the leadership of Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain to create an agreement between Arabs and Zionists over the future of Palestine. The British government announced that it would decide and implement its own policy if the conference did not produce an agreement.

The British government invited representatives of the Palestinians (excluding those allegedly responsible for violence, in particular AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI), Jews, and the Arab states. All the prominent Palestinian political leaders, Christian and Muslim, were represented, including JAMAL AL-HUSAYNI, AWNI 'ABD AL-HADI, MUSA AL-ALAMI, GEORGE ANTONIUS, Husayn AL-KHALIDI, Ya'qoub Farraj, Ya'cob al-Ghusein, Alfred Roch, Fu'ad Saba, and representatives of the NASHASHIBI FAMILY. Leaders from several Arab states were invited, including those from EGYPT, IRAQ, SAUDI ARABIA, and Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950). On the Jewish side, both Zionist and non-Zionist groups within the JEWISH AGENCY attended, organized under the leadership of CHAIM WEIZMANN.

Because the Arabs refused to grant formal recognition to the Jewish Agency, the conference turned into parallel but separate Anglo-Arab and Anglo-Jewish conferences. In addition the Arabs requested that the British government make public the 1914–1915 HUSAYN-McMAHON CORRESPONDENCE, in which Britain promised its support for creating a unified, independent Arab state in all the Arab provinces if the Arabs revolted against the OTTOMAN Turks. Although the British created a committee to “examine” the letters, in which the Arabs were supposed to participate, nothing came of this.

The Arabs were determined to secure the right of the Palestinians to their independence, which they believed had been pledged by the British twenty-five years earlier in the Husayn-McMahon correspondence and for which the Palestinians had risen up in arms. Meanwhile, the Jews were determined to create a Jewish state, based on the BRITISH MANDATE’S incorporation of the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine—a home considered particularly vital at a time of Nazi persecution of Jewry in Europe. Although meetings among all three sides took place toward the end of the London Conference, British proposals for an agreement were first rejected by the Jewish side, and then (after revisions partially met the Jewish objections) by both sides.

The conference ended inconclusively and shortly thereafter the British issued the MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, which declared Britain’s opposition to Palestine becoming a Jewish state.

Bibliography

- Caplan Neil. Futile Diplomacy, Arab-Zionist Negotiations and the End of the Mandate. London: Frank Cass, 1986.
- Cohen, Michael Joseph. Palestine, Retreat from the Mandate: The Making of British Policy, 1936–45. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1978.
- Taylor, Alan R. Prelude to Israel: An Analysis of Zionist Diplomacy 1897–1947. Escondido, CA: Philosophical Library, 1955.

Lydda

Lydda is an ancient city situated on the coastal plain about ten miles southeast of JAFFA. During the 1948 WAR Lydda was the site of an Israeli attack that left scores dead and thousands expelled.

Lydda was first mentioned in 1465 BCE in Pharaoh Thutmose III’s list of Canaanite cities. It was occupied by the SAMARITANS in the fourth century BCE and then came under the administration of Judea during Roman rule. From about the fifth century BCE until the third century CE, Lydda had a Jewish presence. In 200 CE the Romans established the city of Diospolis there, a prominent market center supporting the textile, dyeing, pottery, and cattle industries. The city was also thought to be the site of the martyrdom in 303 and the burial place of St. George, the patron saint of England and of the Crusaders, and was renamed Georgiopolis during the Byzantine and Crusader periods.

The city was captured in 636 by the Muslim general ‘Amir ibn al-’As and served as the headquarters of the province of Filistin (Palestine) until 715, when RAMLA assumed that role. The Crusaders occupied the city in 1099 and built the church of St. George, which now belongs to the GREEK ORTHODOX community and has been restored several times. In 1191, Lydda was reconquered by the Muslim leader SALADIN. Along with the nearby city of Ramla, Lydda retained its importance as a crossroads of the two major routes through Palestine linking EGYPT and SYRIA and connecting the coastal plain with JERUSALEM. Later, under the MAMLUKS, the city was the seat of an administrative district, and in 1273, Sultan Baybars built the Bridge of Lod with its carved lions, which survives today on the northbound road.

Under OTTOMAN rule European interest and influence in Palestine increased, and Lydda’s location between the port of Jaffa and Jerusalem encouraged economic growth and population increase, supported by the citrus industry, the proliferation of olive plantations, and the production of soap. Lydda was connected to Jerusalem and Jaffa by a commercial road in the late 1860s and by the first railway line in 1892. Given Lydda’s fertile agricultural land on the coastal plain and its strategic location, trade was also a key dimension of the city’s economy. In addition to its shops, Lydda was home to a weekly market that drew thousands of people from neighboring villages. The town was also a center for traditional manufacturing.

In 1936, under the BRITISH MANDATE (1917–1948), authorities constructed Palestine’s only international airport just north of Lydda (later renamed Lod by Israel). In the first half of the twentieth century, Lydda’s population growth reflected the town's mounting importance: an urban area of some 7,000 in 1912, it grew to 11,250 in 1931 and 18,250 in 1946.

Like that of Ramla, the fate of Lydda and its inhabitants during the 1948 War mirrored the wider Palestinian experience. Lydda was allocated to the proposed Arab state of Palestine under UN RESOLUTION 181 of 29 November 1947. It was defended from an Israeli attack by Palestinian forces, irregular volunteers from JORDAN, and initially by units of the Jordanian Arab Legion. But John Glubb, the British general commanding the legion, refused to divert legion units from the important position of Latrun to reinforce Palestinian forces in Lydda. In May 1948 the Jewish fighting force PALMAH occupied Lydda and Ramla, and in July 1948 the area was the site of one of the darkest episodes of the war. Scores of civilians were killed in the assault, twenty-eight villages destroyed, and at least 40,000 people were evicted from their homes in and around Lydda and Ramla after an order issued personally by Israel's founder DAVID BEN-GURION and signed by the field commander in the area, the future prime minister YITZHAK RABIN (who would later express some regret about this episode in his memoirs). In Lydda some 19,900 Palestinians were expelled, mainly to camps in LEBANON, while only 1,052 were allowed to stay. Israel changed the name of the city to Lod, and a number of Jewish families moved into the vacated houses.

See also WAR, 1948

Bibliography

Abramsky, Samuel. Ancient Towns in Israel. Jerusalem: World Zionist Organization, 1963.

- Benvenisti, Meron. The Crusaders in the Holy Land. New York: Macmillan, 1974.
- Fischbach, Michael R. "Lydda." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon, 1988.
- Golan, Arnon. "Lydda and Ramla: From Palestinian Arab to Israeli Towns, 1948–1967." Middle Eastern Studies. 39:4 (2003).
- Kurzman, Dan. Soldier of Peace: The Life of Yitzhak Rabin. New York: HarperCollins, 1998.
- Landau, Jacob M. Abdul Hamid's Palestine. London: Andre Deutsch, 1979.
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–1949, reprint ed. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Munayer, Isbir. Lydda during the Mandate and Occupation Periods, 3rd ed. (Arabic). Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 2003.
- Pappé, Ilan. A History of Modern Palestine: One Land, Two Peoples. Cambridge, UK: University of Cambridge Press, 2004.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Rantisi, Audeh G., and Charles Amash. "The Lydda Death March." The Link. 33:3 (2000).
- Yacobi, Haim. "The Architecture of Ethnic Logic: Exploring the Meaning of the Built Environment in the Mixed City of Lod-Israel." Geografiska Annaler 82B: Human Geography. 2002.
- . "From Urban Panopticism to Spatial Protest: Housing Policy, Segregation and Social Exclusion of the Palestinian Community in Lydda-Lod." Middle East Report. 223 (2002).

—Betsy Folkins

---

M

---

Ma'ale Adumim Settlement

Ma'ale Adumim is the largest (population 33,000) and most strategically located Jewish SETTLEMENT in Israel's plan to annex a contiguous territorial area in the WEST BANK to JERUSALEM and incorporate it into the Jewish state. It is geopolitically important because (when all the plans for its expansion are complete) it will form a metropolis extending from Jerusalem in the west to JERICHO in the east, thus severing the West Bank at its center into two disarticulated areas—the north and the south. So important is this colony that, in 1991, the Military Authority for the West Bank in conjunction with the Knesset altered its status from a “settlement” to an “Israeli town,” thus designating it sovereign Israeli territory.

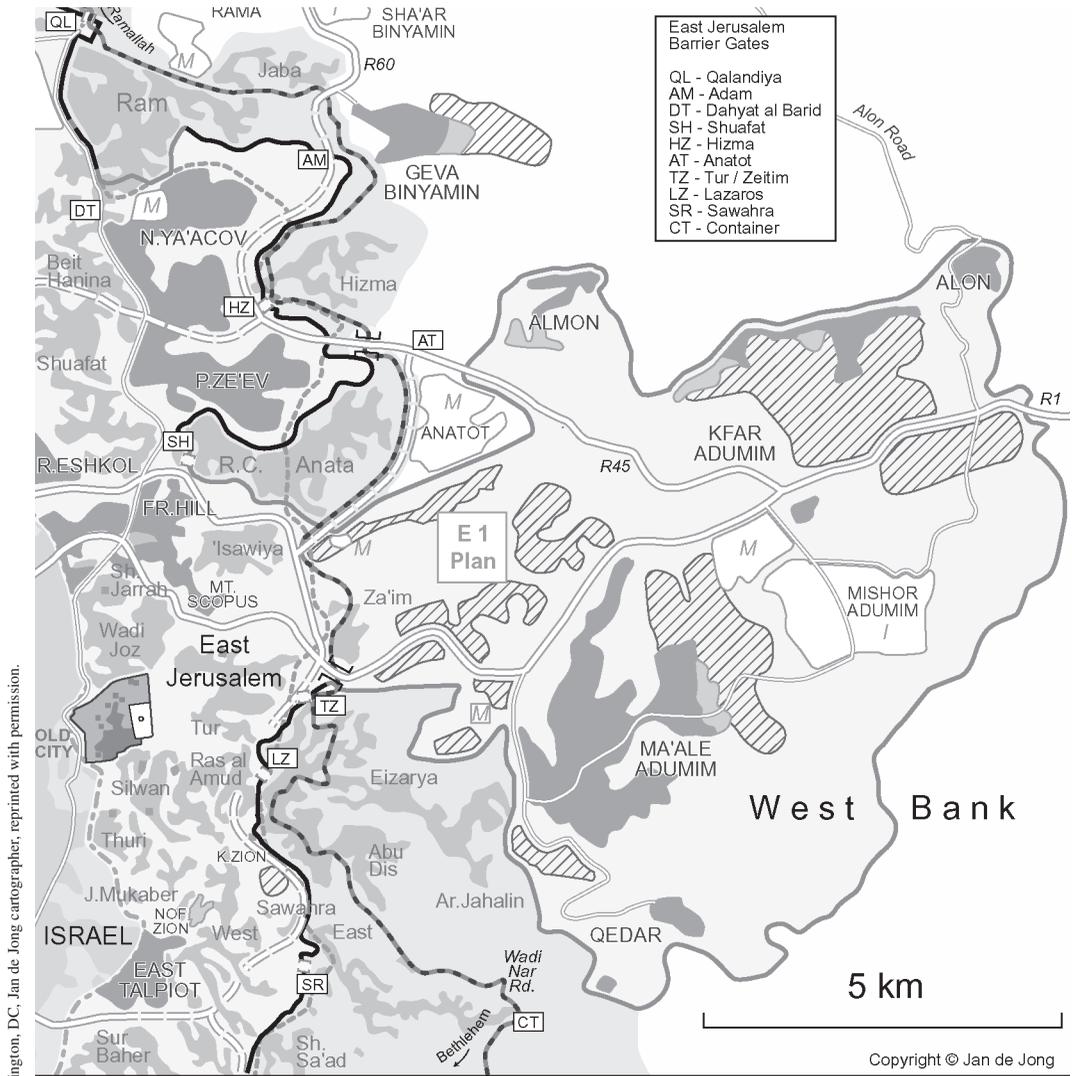

In the 1998 Umbrella Municipality Plan (UMP), designed to expand East Jerusalem by integrating the surrounding Jewish settlements, Israel designated Ma'ale Adumim as “the ‘metropolitan hub’ of Jerusalem.” The blueprint for its growth includes programs to construct 4,478 new housing units to support an increase in its population to 45,000 within a few years and a further increase to 60,000 residents by the year 2010. In addition the UMP specifically forecasts that after the confiscation of more Palestinian LAND and the construction of new suburbs, Ma'ale Adumim will connect GIV'AT ZE'EV (north of Jerusalem), Gush Etzion (south of Jerusalem), and the Jerusalem corridor through a contiguous link of settlements with East Jerusalem. The southern territorial stretch includes areas south of and isolating BETHLEHEM, Beit Jala, and Beit Sahour. The northern area reaches almost to the border of Ramallah, resulting in the surrounding and segregation of dozens of Palestinian villages.

The entire area—some 35,000 dunums (8,600 acres) on which Ma'ale Adumim sits—was confiscated in 1975 from Palestinians who owned the land and had been farming or grazing it for centuries. In a commonly used policy, Israel declared the area STATE LAND before turning it over to the settlers. Subsequent confiscations increased the area of the settlement to 43,500 dunums (10,700 acres) in the early 1990s. The villages that lost the most land in this expropriation were ABU DIS, al-Izariyyeh, al-Issawiyyeh, A TUR, and 'Anata. The agricultural land of the villages and the grazing land confiscated from the BEDOUIN tribes extended from the border of Jerusalem on the west to a'Khan al-Ahmad at the approach to the Dead Sea on the east. For the Bedouin as well as for the villagers, loss of their land meant the loss of their way of life and major transformations in their social life. Today, the area available to these Arab villages with a population of approximately 40,000 is some 4,600 dunums (1,100 acres), while the area of Ma'ale Adumim is 11.5 times greater. (See Map 30.)

Ma'ale Adumim's residents enjoy a high standard of living, modern INFRASTRUCTURE, GREEN AREAS, advanced educational and cultural institutions, and numerous other services, benefits, and institutions designed to attract families to the settlement. Residents receive large tax exemptions and government-subsidized mortgage terms (as do residents of all settlements). The settlement has hotels and other tourist facilities, and an ongoing advertising campaign is designed to attract Christian pilgrims visiting Jerusalem and Bethlehem who seek inexpensive accommodations. The settlement/town is also well endowed with an industrial park that spreads across 7,500 dunums (1,800 acres), in “an area that is among the largest industrial parks in Israel.”

By August 2005, Israel had completed a plan (E1 PLAN) for confiscating and settling an area known as E1 between Jerusalem and Ma'ale Adumim. Colonizing E1 would be the final phase in tying Ma'ale Adumim to Jerusalem. The first stage was approval by the CIVIL ADMINISTRATION'S Planning Council in the West Bank to relocate the headquarters of the Judea and Samaria police district from the East Jerusalem Palestinian neighborhood of RAS AL-AMUD to the E1 area. This had the effect of freeing land for increased Jewish settlement in

© Foundation for Middle East Peace (FMEP), Washington, DC. Jan de Jong cartographer, reprinted with permission.

- |  |  |  |  |  |  |
|--|--|--|--|--|--|
|  | The Separation Barrier Existing or Under Construction Provisionally Approved |  | Palestinian Locality / Access and Use        |  | Checkpoint / Gate  |
|  | Green Line   |  | Israeli Determined Jerusalem Municipal Limit |  | Israeli (Re) Constructed Bypasses / Settler Roads, Projected or Under Construction |
|  | Israeli Settlement Existing / Under Construction / Proposed Expansion        |  | Israeli Facility Military/                   |  | Israeli-Constructed or Proposed Road Tunnels or Bridges                            |
|  | Settlement Area East of the Separation Barrier                               |  | Israeli Facility Industrial                  |  | Israeli Proposed Main Alternative Palestinian North - South Road Link              |

Map 30. The Ma'ale Adumim Settlement Bloc Expanding into Municipal Greater Jerusalem through the E1 Plan and the Road System

Ras al-Amud and sealing the area between Ma'ale Adumim and Jerusalem. This extra building required confiscating more land around Ma'ale Adumim to expand the settlement and to construct ROADS and the BARRIER separating the West Bank from Israel. In January 2009, the new police station was completed, and police and administrators moved in. Residential settlements were soon to follow.

Financial and material assistance for implementing the UMP came from the Housing and Construction Ministries. Former prime minister ARIEL SHARON (2001–2006) announced several times in the spring and summer of 2005 that he intended Ma'ale Adumim to be part of Israel and wanted the territory between Ma'ale Adumim and Jerusalem to be unbroken. In February the Israeli Cabinet approved the inclusion of area E1 within the route of the West Bank Barrier. At the same time, the Planning Council in the West Bank approved the plan to develop the area and build 3,500 housing units in two neighborhoods.

See also E1 PLAN; GIV'AT ZE'EV SETTLEMENT; METRO-POLITAN JERUSALEM PLAN; SETTLEMENTS

Bibliography

- Bazbaz, Marwan. "Settlement in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip." Palestine-Israeli Journal of Politics, Economics, and Culture (Jerusalem: Israeli/Palestinian quarterly). 4:2 (1997). www.radioislam.org/historia/zionism/stlmnt\_essay.html.
- Benn, Aluf. "Israel Begins Building New Police Station East of Jerusalem." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 25 August 2005.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. Settlements in the West Bank. Settlement Database. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, n.d. www.fmep.org.
- Ginbar, Yuval. On the Way to Annexation: Human Rights Violations Resulting from the Establishment and Expansion of Ma'ale Adumim Settlement. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1999.
- Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs (IMFA). "Cabinet Communiqué on Jerusalem and Press Conference with Prime Minister Netanyahu and Jerusalem Mayor Olmert—21 June 1998." IMFA 17 (1998–1999).
- . "Remarks by Ambassador Gold at the Security Council—30 June 1998." IMFA 17 (1998–1999).
- Schwartz, Michal. "The New Jerusalem: Final Cut." Challenge: A Jerusalem Magazine on the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict (Jerusalem monthly). 44 (July–August. 1997). www.hanitzotz.com/challenge/44/Toc.htm.
- United Nations Security Council. "Security Council Calls Israeli Decision on Jerusalem Boundaries

'Serious and Damaging' Development." Press release SC/6546. 13 July 1998. www.un.org/News/Press/docs/1998/19980713.sc6546.html.

Ma'alot, 1974

Ma'alot is a town in northern Israel where on 15 May 1974 three members of the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP), a leftist Palestinian faction, commandeered a schoolhouse and took a group of eleventh grade students hostage. They demanded an exchange of Palestinian PRISONERS in Israeli jails for the freedom of the Jewish children. Instead of negotiating, Israel sent a unit of the elite Golani brigade to storm the building, killing the terrorists and twenty-one children. On their way to the schoolhouse the night before, the DFLP infiltrators had murdered five Israelis, bringing the total number of Israeli victims to twenty-six.

Ma'arat HaMachpelah

See CAVE OF MACHPELAH

MacDonald "Black Letter," 1931

The MacDonald "Black Letter" was a letter from British prime minister Ramsay MacDonald to CHAIM WEIZMANN, president of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, dated 13 February 1931. It was issued after Zionists mounted an intense campaign against the findings of the PASSFIELD WHITE PAPER, issued following an investigation of the 1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES in Palestine. In the paper Lord Passfield, the British colonial secretary, recommended limiting Jewish IMMIGRATION and LAND purchase in Palestine. Although Passfield's recommendations, published in March 1930, largely reflected those of the HOPE-SIMPSON and SHAW COMMISSIONS, they outraged Zionists, and Passfield and his paper came under enormous criticism and pressure. Bowing to the pressure, MacDonald sent Weizmann a public letter and promised what amounted to an abrogation of the Passfield White Paper. The MacDonald Letter, which was issued as an official interpretation of the White Paper, reiterated the BRITISH MANDATE'S obligation to "facilitate Jewish immigration and to encourage close settlement by Jews on the land," and suggested that STATE LANDS be made available to both Jews and Arabs. Zionists regarded the letter as a restoration of the status quo ante, while Arabs, who had been satisfied with the limitations of the Passfield White Paper, called the MacDonald Letter “a black frame for the white paper.” The letter played an important role in the eruption of the 1936–1939 ARAB REVOLT.

Bibliography

Segev, Tom. One Palestine Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.

MacDonald White Paper, 1939

The MacDonald White Paper proposed a unitary government of Arabs and Jews, which significantly altered BRITISH MANDATE policy in Palestine. Issued by Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald, the British White Paper of 17 May 1939 limited Jewish IMMIGRATION to 75,000 for five years, subject to the country’s “economic absorptive capacity,” and after this initial five-year period further immigration would be determined by the Palestinian-Jewish government. The White Paper also restricted LAND acquisition by Jews and repealed the PEEL COMMISSION’S recommendations (for the partition of Palestine with transfer of land and population exchanges) and reflected the failure of the LONDON/ST. JAMES CONFERENCE.

When the White Paper was passed in the House of Commons by a 268-to-179 vote, London had essentially given up on the Mandate and the creation of a Jewish national homeland in Palestine, and with the MacDonald proclamation, the British believed that their obligations to ZIONISTS were now fulfilled. Further, the paper stated that “His Majesty’s Government now declares unequivocally that it is not part of their policy that Palestine should become a Jewish State.” Zionists vehemently rejected the new policy, but so did the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE and Palestinian leader AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, who, after more than twenty years of British support for the Zionist movement, were skeptical that London would suddenly support the Palestinians.

Zionists appealed to the League of Nations Mandate Commission, which declared the White Paper illegal. Nonetheless, the British continued to enforce its provisions, although at this stage in the conflict they had little practical effect; because previous British policies had ensured that the Jewish pre-state Yishuv was institutionally—politically, economically, and militarily—well developed, the new White Paper was unenforceable. Owing to British policies that had encouraged Zionists, in September 1939, the head of the JEWISH AGENCY, DAVID BEN-GURION, declared: “We will fight the white paper as if there is no war [World War II], and fight the war as if there is no white paper.” On 15 May 1948 the government of the new state of Israel issued an injunction officially abolishing the White Paper.

Bibliography

Caplan, Neil. Futile Diplomacy: Early Arab-Zionist Negotiation Attempts 1913–1931, vol. I. London: Frank Cass, 1986.

———. Futile Diplomacy: Arab-Zionist Negotiations and the End of the Mandate, vol. II. London: Frank Cass, 1986.

Cohen, Michael Joseph. Palestine, Retreat from the Mandate: The Making of British Policy, 1936–45. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1978.

Hurewitz, J. C. The Struggle for Palestine. New York: Schocken Books, 1976

MachsomWatch

MachsomWatch (Women for Human Rights) was founded in January 2001 by three Israeli women to monitor the behavior of soldiers at CHECKPOINTS throughout the WEST BANK. It was created in response to repeated reports of human rights abuses against Palestinians crossing army and border police checkpoints. The goals of the group, which is open exclusively to women and includes some 400 activists, are threefold: (1) to be physically present at checkpoints to monitor the behavior of soldiers and police, (2) to ensure that the human and civil rights of Palestinians are protected, and (3) to record and report the group’s observations to the widest possible audience, from the decisionmaking level to that of the general public. (www.machsomwatch.org).

See also COALITION OF WOMEN FOR PEACE

Mada Manifesto

See HIGH FOLLOW-UP COMMITTEE AND THE MADA MANIFESTO

Madrid Conference, 1991

The Madrid Conference, convened on 30 October 1991, was formally cosponsored by the UNITED STATES and MOSCOW, and was promoted as a major initiative in resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict. Participants included Israel, SYRIA, LEBANON, and JORDAN, which presented a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. Following the 1991 GULF WAR, US president GEORGE H. W. BUSH and his secretary of state, JAMES BAKER, wanted to balance US military action in the Gulf region with a demonstration of the United States' commitment to a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli conflict. The conference, which lasted for three days, was hosted by the government of Spain, then separated into bilateral and multilateral tracks.

The bilateral talks between Israel and its neighbors began immediately on 3 November 1991 and were followed by forums in Moscow and Europe in 1992–1993 and over a dozen formal rounds in Washington, DC, from 9 December 1991 to 24 January 1994. The initial discussions had the goal of achieving peace treaties between the Arab states and Israel, while the talks with the Palestinians were based on a two-stage formula in which interim self-government arrangements would be negotiated first, to be followed by permanent status negotiations.

The multilateral negotiations, which opened in Moscow on 28 January 1992, were held in five separate forums and continued until November 1993 in various European capitals. Each set of talks focused on a major issue—WATER, ENVIRONMENT, arms control, REFUGEES, and economic development. Israel, however, refused to take part in the refugee and economic meetings, and Syria and Lebanon declined to participate in the multilateral meetings so long as there was no concrete progress on the bilateral level.

Context of Madrid

The impetus for the Madrid Conference came with the defeat of IRAQ in 1991 and the dissolution of the Soviet Union, when officials in Washington believed an Arab-Israeli political settlement based on US interests was possible. Although Secretary Baker was the architect of the Madrid Conference, much of the groundwork had been laid by Baker's predecessors, and, in a sense, the Madrid framework represented a synthesis of previous US diplomatic initiatives. The pillars of Madrid, such as the two-stage approach, the Palestinian self-rule concept, and transitional arrangements, were derived from the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS negotiated during President JIMMY CARTER's administration in 1978.

The Jordanian dimension of a Palestinian-Israeli settlement was grounded in the 1982 REAGAN PLAN. Other aspects, especially those designed to attract the Palestinians, were largely inherited from the 1988 Shultz Plan, which itself incorporated important features of Camp David and the Reagan Plan.

Two additional characteristics were common to these initiatives. First, they were all occasioned by structural changes in either the regional or the global environment. For example the de-Nasirization of EGYPT and the subsequent collapse of Soviet influence with Cairo in 1972 led to the policies of Anwar Sadat, which created a strategic opening for US diplomatic action, the outcome of which was Camp David. Second, the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon had so weakened the Palestinian national movement that President RONALD REAGAN was able to effectively remove Palestinian national rights from the agenda. Because Reagan had just intensified the Cold War with the Soviet Union and embarked on a global campaign against revolutionary nationalism, he welcomed the opportunity to rearrange the strategic landscape of the Middle East. His plan, however, was thwarted by a junior ally with strategic designs of its own: Israel promptly and categorically rejected the Reagan Plan a few hours after it was announced and thus ensured its failure. Tel Aviv objected to the plan's denial of Israeli sovereignty in the WEST BANK and GAZA in favor of Jordanian control. The plan was thus shelved, but US Secretary of State GEORGE SHULTZ resurrected elements of it six years later, though deferring the issue of sovereignty for FINAL STATUS TALKS, but the 1988 Shultz Plan failed when Prime Minister YITZHAK SHAMIR declined to engage in negotiations. The following year Secretary Baker began to revive it.

A further important common element of the four US plans is that the interests of the people in the region were always overshadowed by the strategic needs of the United States. This created a corresponding disparity between the pursuit of comprehensive peace and the search for regional security. The Arab parties to the conflict rarely shared Washington's belief that particular circumstances were propitious for establishing peaceful relations or its view of the Soviets as a potential threat but rather considered Israel the threat. Despite major flaws in the US proposals, most of the Arab parties chose to negotiate so as not to displease Washington, while Israel continued to reject all initiatives that might undermine its objective of permanent control over the West Bank.

After the Gulf War the Arab states were more divided than at any time since the establishment of the ARAB LEAGUE in 1945. With Arab solidarity against Israel sundered, an important source of pressure for Israeli concessions was weakened. Moreover, the poorer Arab countries were heavily indebted to the West and many of the richer Arab states relied on Western countries for military protection, which translated into a loss of relative Arab leverage. The Gulf War also effectively removed the question of Palestine from the top of the Arab agenda. After the war the Palestinians were isolated, politically weakened, and faced serious economic problems. Not only was the Palestinian leadership, based in TUNIS, ostracized for its pro-Iraq political stance, but it was deprived of solid and unified Arab backing in negotiations; it was isolated from its constituencies in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, the Gulf region, Syria, and Lebanon and faced with economic, ideological, leadership, and governance crises. Moreover, because the internal (Occupied Territories) Palestinian leadership was rapidly growing in importance (a trend markedly evident during the First INTIFADA), the United States and Israel exploited this to render the external leadership in Tunis even less important. The Bush administration thus viewed the PLO and the Palestinians as the weakest link in its quest for a peace settlement and regional stability. All these developments enabled the Bush administration to obtain Arab and Palestinian acquiescence to its framework for negotiations, even though it was tilted heavily against the Arabs and Palestinians.

Several other factors led to the US investing so much political capital in the Madrid Conference. On the one hand, Secretary Baker felt that he had lost an opportunity for peace after he embraced a plan presented by Shamir in 1989, calling it "the only game in town," only to have Shamir repudiate his own proposal within months. Two years later, in 1991, however, Baker had a second window of opportunity resulting from both the collapse of the Soviet Union and the defeat of Iraq. These regional and global changes gave the United States an opportunity to pursue a Middle East settlement unencumbered by conflicting Soviet interests or a powerful Iraq's strong support for the PLO and the Palestinians. Thus the way was open for George Bush and James Baker to define and shape a new world order in the Middle East, in which the United States would be the sole major power and could maximize its own national interests. Given that regional stability was the foundation for all other US objectives in the region, Washington believed it was necessary to settle the Arab-Israeli conflict. Moreover, if the United States was to assume the leadership of the new global system, it needed to demonstrate that it could not only crush detractors but also broker viable peace agreements in situations of prolonged impasse. In a sense then, the Madrid Conference was a litmus test of US leadership in the new global order.

Preliminaries to Madrid

During the Gulf War, Iraq had launched several Scud missiles onto Israeli territory, and these attacks, combined with the Intifada (whose civil disobedience was viewed as a major security threat), consolidated the hard-line forces in Israel. The war thus allowed Israel to impose its diplomatic framework on negotiations in which it participated. Israel insisted on two parallel negotiating tracks at the Madrid Conference for the Palestinian issues and on replacing an international conference called for in UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242 with a regional conference hosted by the United States, and the now powerless Soviet Union, although both these conditions were congruent with US policy, as was ensuring that the UNITED NATIONS had no substantive role.

Secretary Baker engaged in intense shuttle diplomacy to persuade Israel, the Arab states, and Palestinians to attend the Madrid Conference. From March to September 1991 he made eight trips to the Middle East. Israel, under the administration of Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, opposed the conference from the outset, made no concessions (except to attend), and greeted each visit by Baker with the creation of a new SETTLEMENT. The Arab states, however, made numerous concessions (for example, agreeing not to have a separate Palestinian delegation) that were incorporated into a letter of invitation signed by the United States and the Soviet Union on 18 October 1991.

Israel demanded that individuals affiliated with the PLO, residents of JERUSALEM, and Palestinians from the DIASPORA be excluded from the joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation, leaving only non-PLO persons from the West Bank and Gaza whom Israel insisted on vetting. However, several notable Palestinian participants, including SAEB EREKAT, HANAN ASHRAWI, and HAYDAR 'ABD AL-SHAFI, who were part of the joint negotiating team with Jordanians, were in constant communication with the PLO leadership in Tunis.

These Israeli demands were reflected in Baker's preconference diplomacy, which involved unequal treatment of the Palestinians and their fundamental interests. Several actions illustrate this point:

- Baker's acquiescence in Israel's exclusion of any delegates from the PLO, the Diaspora, or Jerusalem seriously undermined the Palestinians' ability to press credibly for their rights. The exclusion of the PLO from the Madrid Conference signaled the intention to ignore discussions of Palestinian national rights, including the right to self-determination in a sovereign state and the right of return for Palestinian refugees. By excluding Palestinian residents of Jerusalem, Israel's claim to Jerusalem was reinforced.
- Discussion of the fundamental issue of Israel's OCCUPATION of Palestinian territories was placed beyond the parameters of debate through the numerous encumbrances built into the conference, including its structure, participants (including the mandatory joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation), the limits on speech, and the frequency of meetings.
- The two-track approach also ensured that solving the Palestine question would not be the central issue in negotiations on the Arab-Israeli conflict. Issues of arms control, water resources, economic development, regional security, and the environment, which made up the agenda of the multilateral talks, sidestepped the basis of the conflict.
- The transitional period represented another substantive issue packaged as procedural. An unrepresentative segment of the 5.5 million Palestinians, carefully chosen to satisfy Israeli requirements and meticulously screened for their willingness to operate within defined constraints, would, after an interim period of limited autonomy, sit across the table from an Israeli team free of any constraints to negotiate the final status of the Occupied Territories.

Not surprisingly the Madrid process stalled after eleven rounds of talks in Washington, Rome, and Moscow, as Israel clung tenaciously to the policy of building settlements, thus precluding any kind of territorial solution. For the Palestinians, all fundamental issues involving BORDERS, refugees, Jerusalem, and the Occupation had to be deferred. Self-government, the sole concern of the Madrid negotiations in the immediate term, was seen by the Palestinians as the necessary step toward independence, while Israel had ruled out independence and considered self-government a mechanism to ratify the Occupation under a new and different label.

See also JAMES BAKER; GEORGE H. W. BUSH

Bibliography

- Ashrawi, Hanan. This Side of Peace: A Personal Account. New York: Touchstone, 1996.
- Davis, M. Jane. "Politics and International Relations in the Middle East: Continuity and Change." Canadian Journal of Political Science/Revue canadienne de science politique. 29:3 (September 1996).
- Journal of Palestine Studies*. "The Madrid Peace Conference: Special Document File." Journal of Palestine Studies. 21:2 (1992).
- Levitt, Matthew. Let Them Eat Figs: An Analysis of the Negotiation Process Leading to the Madrid Peace Conference. Boston: Program on Negotiation at Harvard Law School, 1994.
- Lockman, Zachary. Contending Visions of the Middle East: The History and Politics of Orientalism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Swisher, Clayton E. The Truth about Camp David: The Untold Story about the Collapse of the Middle East Peace Process. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2004.

—Naseer Aruri

Mafdal

See NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY

Magnes, Judah Leon (1877–1948)

Judah Magnes was a rabbi and philosopher who served as chancellor, then president, of the Hebrew University in JERUSALEM. Born in the UNITED STATES, he showed a commitment to ZIONISM early when as chairman of the Jewish Self-Defense Association in 1903, he collected funds and weapons to send to Jews in RUSSIA and then to Zionists in Palestine. In 1906 he founded the AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE, and in 1909 he helped found the Kehilla (the organized Jewish community of New York), which provided a thorough Jewish education, and remained active in it until he left for Palestine in 1922. Magnes was also involved in the early stages of the founding of the AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS but eventually resigned because he believed the organization wasn't sufficiently focused on its primary goal of mobilizing support for Zionist settlement in Palestine.

As the United States edged toward war in 1917, Magnes was an articulate and ardent spokesman for pacifism, a position that cost him the respect of many previous Jewish supporters and later led to his virtual ostracism in the Zionist movement. By 1925 Magnes began to believe that Zionism could lead to a war with the Palestinians, which he opposed, and proposed instead a BINATIONAL state. In Palestine he helped found BRIT SHALOM to foster his position and attempted to persuade the British authorities and the ZIONIST EXECUTIVE to adopt his vision of a state in which Israelis and Palestinians would live together. At the meeting of the JEWISH AGENCY in 1937, Magnes, representing the non-Zionists in attendance, introduced a resolution calling for the establishment of a committee of Zionists and non-Zionists to negotiate with the League of Nations, Great Britain, and the United States to study methods for creating a binational state in Palestine. Magnes, who had many contacts with the local Palestinians, insisted that the Palestinians would cooperate in such a project. However, he was repudiated and chastised allegedly because his relationships with the Palestinians had been unauthorized, and the motion was defeated.

In response to the 1942 BILTMORE PROGRAM, which stated the Zionist leadership's objective of establishing a Jewish state over the whole of Mandatory Palestine, Magnes formed IHUD, a quasi-political party/organization to improve Arab-Jewish understanding. Appearing as the representative of Ihud before the ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY and the UN SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PALESTINE, Magnes argued for a binational state in a united Palestine that would be based on political parity for Jews and Palestinians, with a transitional period of trusteeship for Palestine under the UNITED NATIONS. When the Partition Resolution (UN RESOLUTION 181), which proposed dividing Palestine into Jewish and Arab states, was adopted in November 1947, Magnes was not deterred. The ensuing outbreak of hostilities, the escalation of fighting, and Jewish setbacks in the early months of the 1948 WAR led him to renew his efforts for an immediate truce and postponement of the UN partition decision.

When the United Nations advocated a temporary trusteeship of Palestine in March 1948, Magnes drew the attention of Warren Austin, the US representative at the United Nations, to the Ihud platform and was invited to the United States to help obtain a truce in Palestine. In response, on 26 April 1948 the Senate of the Hebrew University issued a statement disassociating the institution and its faculties from Magnes's political activities. After the establishment of Israel, Magnes advocated the inclusion of Israel in a confederation of Middle Eastern states, but he died later that year and his ideas never received serious attention by Diaspora Zionists or in Israel.

In 1962 the Judah L. Magnes Museum was founded in Berkeley, California. The third largest Jewish museum in North America, it has a permanent collection of more than 12,000 objects of Jewish ceremonial, folk, and fine art, including paintings, sculpture, prints, and drawings by contemporary and traditional artists.

Bibliography

- Bentwich, Norman. For Zion's Sake: A Biography of Judah L. Magnes. New York: The Jewish Publication Society, 1954.
- . Judah L. Magnes: A Biography of the First Chancellor and First President of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. London: East and West Library, 1967.
- Parzen, Herbert, Gertrude Hirschler, and Arthur Goren. "Judah Magnes." In New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel. Edited by Geoffrey Wigoder. London and Toronto: Associated University Presses, 1994.

Maimonides (Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon [Rambam]) (1137–1204)

One of the greatest Torah scholars, Maimonides was a rabbi, physician, and philosopher. Born in Spain, he fled persecution to Morocco and finally settled in EGYPT. In Mishneh Torah, Maimonides composed a code of Jewish law with the widest possible scope and depth. The work gathers all the binding laws from the Talmud and incorporates the positions of the Geonim (post-Talmudic early medieval scholars, mainly from Mesopotamia). Through the Guide for the Perplexed, his most famous work, and the philosophical introductions to sections of his commentaries on the Mishna, Maimonides exerted an important influence on the scholastic philosophers, especially Thomas Aquinas.

Al-Majlisiyyun (Councilists)

See ARAB PARTY

Maki

The Communist Party of Israel, Maki (Miflaga Komunistit Yisraelit), was formed in 1948 within the BORDERS of the new state of Israel from the remnants of the PALESTINIAN COMMUNIST PARTY. Although not Zionist, the party recognized Israel but denied the link between the state and the Jewish DIASPORA and asserted the right of Palestinians to form a state, in accordance with UN RESOLUTION 181. Maki had four seats in the first Knesset and elected three to six seats to each subsequent Knesset until 1965.

The party was part of the world communist movement and supported the SOVIET UNION. After the Prague Trials of 1953 the pro-Soviet Labor Zionist party MAPAM broke with the Soviet Union, and a number of Mapam members who still felt allegiance to the Soviet Union joined Maki. In 1965, Maki split between a largely Jewish group that recognized Israel's right to exist and a largely Israeli Palestinian group that was increasingly ANTI-ZIONIST and adopted the name RAKAH, or the New Communist List. The new Maki dwindled, winning only a single seat in the Knesset in 1965 and 1969, and was unable to attract any significant number of Jewish voters, despite having supported the 1967 WAR as legitimate self-defense by Israel. In 1973, Maki joined the pro-peace party MOKED and won a single seat. In 1977, Maki joined others on the Jewish left to form the SHELLI camp, which lost both its seats in 1981, and in 1984 merged into RATZ.

Meanwhile, Rakah remained a presence in the Knesset and was increasingly seen as an Arab party, though it was led until the late 1980s by Meir Vilner, who was Jewish. In 1977 the party formed an electoral coalition with other anti-Zionists to form HADASH. In 1989, Rakah officially changed its name to Maki and remains the leading force in Hadash, which regularly wins three to six seats in Knesset elections.

See also COMMUNISTS IN ISRAEL

Bibliography

Edmunds, June. The Left and Israel: Party-Policy Change and Internal Democracy. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

Mamluks

The Mamluks originated as a Turkish slave-soldier caste who converted to Islam and served the Muslim caliphs and the Ayyubid sultans from the ninth to thirteenth centuries. Because they were warriors, their status was considerably above that of ordinary slaves, who were not allowed to carry weapons or perform certain tasks. They played a major role in defeating the Crusaders. In Egypt Mamluks were considered to be the "true lords," with social status above freeborn Egyptians. They seized power and ruled Egypt in the Mamluk Dynasty from 1250 to 1517, remaining powerful until 1811. They governed Palestine and other parts of the Middle East and left an important legacy of architecture, art, and culture, especially in JERUSALEM.

Bibliography

Avisar, Miriam, ed. Pottery of the Crusader, Ayyubid, and Mamluk Periods in Israel. Jerusalem: Israel Antiquities Authority, 2005.

Burgoyne, Michael. Mamluk Jerusalem: An Architectural Study. London: Tajir Trust, 1989.

Mols, Luitgard, E. M. Mamluk Metalwork Fittings: In Their Artistic and Architectural Context. Delft, Netherlands: Eburon, 2007.

Waterson, James. The Knights of Islam: The Wars of the Mamluks. Casemate, UK: Greenhill Books, 2007.

Mandate

Following World War I, the League of Nations (precursor to the UNITED NATIONS) established a system of "mandates." In theory, the system had the benevolent intention of preparing the natives of various regions for self-government. In practice, the granting of mandates represented the extension of imperialism or the granting of spoils to the victorious allied governments. The basis of the mandate system was Article 22 of the League's Covenant, which gave broad authority regarding preparation for self-rule to the mandatory powers, mainly Britain (for IRAQ, Transjordan, and Palestine) and FRANCE (for SYRIA and LEBANON).

See also COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mandela Institute for Palestinian Prisoners

The Mandela Institute, an advocacy organization that focuses exclusively on Palestinian political PRISONERS, was established in 1990 in Ramallah in the WEST BANK by Palestinians from the legal and medical professions as well as the clergy. The need for such an institution became apparent during the First INTIFADA (1987–1990), when Israel detained at least 8,500 Palestinian protesters for more than three days. The organization has three major areas of operation. The first, the Legal and Medical Aid Intervention Program, is known as the “Prisons visits project” and is considered the backbone of the Mandela programs. It organizes visits by lawyers and doctors to Israeli detention facilities to determine if they adhere to internationally recognized standards. The second is the Human Rights Training Department, established in 1994 following the onset of the OSLO PROCESS, which offers human rights training for Palestinian law enforcement officials. The third is the Legal Advice Department, which provides legal guidance for families of Palestinian prisoners. (www.mandela-palestine.org).

Mapai

Mapai (Mifleget Po’alei Eretz Yisrael, or Israel Workers’ Party) was the forerunner of the Israeli LABOR PARTY. Its head, DAVID BEN-GURION, was a leading figure of the pre-state Jewish Yishuv and of the state of Israel for its first seventeen years. The influence of Mapai and Ben-Gurion in the realization of the Zionist project cannot be overstated.

The party was founded in 1930 by the merger of the HAPOEL HATZAIR, founded by A. D. Gordon, and the original AHDUT HA’AVODAH (founded in 1919 from the right, more moderate, wing of the Marxist Zionist socialist Russian party PO’ALE ZION led by David Ben-Gurion). In the early 1920s the Labor Zionist movement had founded the HISTADRUT union, which dominated the Hebrew settlement economy and infrastructure, later making Mapai the dominant political faction in Zionist politics. It was also responsible for the founding of HASHOMER and HAGANA, the first two armed Jewish groups who secured the people and property of the new and emerging Jewish communities. By the early 1930s, David Ben-Gurion had taken over the party and had become de facto leader of the Yishuv (the Jewish community in Palestine).

Mapai’s founding convention defined the aims of the new party, the most important of which was the “rebirth of the People of Israel in the Land of Israel as a free working nation.” To achieve this objective the party sought a complete identification with the Histadrut—the economic and political policies of communal KIBBUTZIM and Jewish workers performing all labor in Palestine to reclaim the land/country. Many of Mapai’s organizational and cultural activities were carried out within the framework of the Histadrut. Mapai’s ideology has been described as “constructivist-Zionist-socialism.” Mapai’s leaders believed that the primary purpose of the party was to recruit Jews from the DIASPORA to immigrate to Israel and to develop new Jewish colonies in Palestine. From its inception Mapai was the dominant party in the Yishuv, and after 1948 in Israel it was the dominant faction in the Labor Party.

After Israel achieved independence, Mapai refined its platform and proclaimed a number of objectives, although it had additional goals that were never publicly stated. Its objectives included the following: to bring the greatest possible number of Jews to Israel; to settle undeveloped areas; to develop a pluralist economy with public and private sectors; to strengthen the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES; to prevent the return of the Palestinian REFUGEES from the 1948 WAR; to absorb refugee property for use by Jewish immigrants through state and quasi-state institutions (e.g., the JEWISH AGENCY); to acquire NUCLEAR weapons; to develop a foreign policy focused on forming alliances with the Afro-Asian bloc and with world powers—at the time especially with FRANCE and the UNITED STATES; and to seek reparations from GERMANY.

Mapai remained the largest party in the state of Israel until 1967, when shortly before the 1967 WAR it merged with AHDUT HA’AVODA and RAFI to form the Israeli Labor Party. Every government from the first through 1977 was formed by Mapai/Labor.

Bibliography

- Arian, Asher. The Second Republic: Politics in Israel. London: Chatham, 1998.
- Aronoff, Myron J. Power and Ritual in the Israel Labor Party: A Study in Political Anthropology, rev. ed. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1993.
- Avineri, Shlomo. The Making of Modern Zionism: The Intellectual Origins of the Jewish State. New York: Basic Books, 1981.
- Friling, Tuvia. Arrows in the Dark: David Ben-Gurion, the Yishuv Leadership, and Rescue Attempts during the Holocaust. Translated by Ora Cummings. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2003.
- Hertzberg, Arthur. The Zionist Idea. New York: Atheneum, 1959.

- Inbar, Efraim. War and Peace in Israeli Politics: Labor Party Positions on National Security. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1991.
- Merhav, Peretz. The Israeli Left: History, Problems, Documents. San Diego: A. S. Barnes, 1984.
- Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 2nd ed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1996.
- Shalom, Zakai. David Ben-Gurion, the State of Israel, and the Arab World, 1949–1956. East Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 2003.
- Slutsky, Yehuda. "Mapai." In New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel. Edited by Geoffrey Wigoder. London and Toronto: Associated University Presses, 1994.

Mapam

Mapam (Mifleget ha-Po'alim ha-Me'uhedet, or United Workers' Party) was established as a Marxist-Zionist party in 1948 with the merger of HASHOMER HATZAIR (the Young Guard) and AHDUT HA'AVODA-PO'ALEI ZION (Unity of Labor Workers of Zion). Active in Israeli politics until the 1990s, Mapam was the political party of the left-wing KIBBUTZ movement and, until the mid-1950s, was the second largest political party in Israel after MAPAI.

Mapam's ideology valued ZIONISM over socialism, holding, for example, that the right and duty of Jews to settle in Israel are universal. When Great Britain put quotas on IMMIGRATION, Mapam encouraged Jewish immigration and also sought to establish the conditions for a socialist state—a Jewish socialist state, not a universal socialist country. Although it sought Jewish-Arab reconciliation, it stressed that the roots of the Arab-Israeli conflict lay solely in the failure of the Arab leaders to recognize Israel.

Mapam was initially oriented toward the SOVIET UNION with a pro-Stalinist policy until the 1953 Prague Trials shook the party's faith in the USSR. The show trials, in which mostly Jewish leaders of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia were purged and Mapam's envoy in Prague, Mordechai Oren, was falsely implicated as part of a Zionist conspiracy, led Mapam to move away from its pro-Soviet position and to a more social democratic ideology. As a result, a number of Mapam leaders left the party and joined MAKI. At the same time, Mapam suffered a right-wing split with Ahdut Ha'avoda-Po'alei Zion's departure.

Subsequently Mapam remained in principle committed to socialist Zionism, but internally the party was divided over a number of issues, especially whether to accept Palestinians into the party and whether to support or oppose Israel's policy of massive retaliation in response to Palestinian INFILTRATION. Mapam was unified, however, against Israel's 1956 invasion of EGYPT, and it spearheaded the campaign to end the military administration of Israel's Arab citizens and to secure equal membership rights for Palestinian workers in the HISTADRUT labor federation.

Mapam considered the 1967 WAR a war of self-defense for the survival of Israel. In its aftermath, the party put forth a peace plan that called for returning all the Occupied Territories with minor border adjustments. It supported a two-state solution so long as the Arab state was demilitarized. Mapam also called for a united, Jewish JERUSALEM as the capital of Israel.

In 1969, Mapam joined with its former rival Mapai in an electoral alliance with the Labor Alignment, with Mapam as a junior partner. This alliance caused criticism within Mapam, with some arguing that the party was excessively subservient to Labor's status-quo-oriented policies, particularly on the issue of the future of the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP. In 1984, Mapam left the Alignment in protest over SHIMON PERES'S decision to form a National Unity government with the LIKUD PARTY. In 1992, Mapam joined with RATZ and SHINUI to form the MERETZ electoral coalition, representing the Israeli peace camp. In 1996, Mapam formally merged with Ratz and ceased to exist as a separate party. (In 2004 Meretz changed its name to Yahad.)

Bibliography

- Arian, Asher. The Second Republic: Politics in Israel. New Jersey: Chatham, 1998.
- Arian, Asher, and Michal Shamir. "The Primarily Political Functions of the Left-Right Continuum." Comparative Politics. 15 (1983).
- Avineri, Shlomo. The Making of Modern Zionism: The Intellectual Origins of the Jewish State. New York: Basic Books, 1981.
- Edelheit, Hershel, and Abraham J. Edelheit. History of Zionism: A Handbook and Dictionary. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2000.
- Edmunds, June. The Left and Israel: Party-Policy Change and Internal Democracy. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Hertzberg, Arthur. The Zionist Idea. New York: Atheneum, 1959.
- Laqueur, Walter. A History of Zionism. New York: Schocken, 1972.
- Levin, Dov. "Mi-Pe'uloteihem shel Netzigei Mapam! About the Activities of MAPAM Representatives." Al-ha-Mishmar (Hebrew). 10 May 1953.

- Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 2nd ed. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1996.
- Schenker, Avraham. "Mapam." In New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel. Edited by Geoffrey Wigoder. London and Toronto: Associated University Presses, 1994.
- Shaltel, E. Tamid bi-meri: Mosheh Sneh, biyografyah. Tel Aviv, Israel: Am Oved, 2000.
- Sneh, Moshe. Ketavim (Hebrew), 3 vols. Tel Aviv: Am Oved, 1995.

Maronites

Maronites are members of one of the Lebanese or Syriac Eastern Catholic Churches (though they have always remained in communion with the Bishop of Rome), with a heritage reaching back to Maron the Syriac Monk of the early fifth century. Enshrined by FRANCE in the nineteenth century as the political elite in LEBANON, they retained that status (and that of the predominant economic elite) despite ever-shrinking numbers compared to the other ethnic sects and ethnoreligious groups (e.g., Shi'a, Sunni, Druze, and other Christians). Even now, as a small minority they play a major role in Lebanon's politics and economics. For much of the period since Israel's independence they, or factions within the Maronites, have been allied with Israel. Maronites do not consider themselves "Arab," therefore they and Israel have looked on the Arabs as a common enemy.

Bibliography

- Eisenberg, Laura Zittrain. My Enemy's Enemy: Lebanon in the Early Zionist Imagination, 1900–1948. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1994.
- Moosa, Matti. The Maronites in History. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press, 2005.

Massive Retaliation

See INFILTRATION (PALESTINIAN) AND RETALIATION (ISRAELI)

Matzpen

Matzpen (The Compass), the Israeli Socialist Organization, was founded in 1962 when a small group of Jewish former members of the Israeli Communist Party teamed up with older dissident communists, including some Israeli-Palestinians. The result was Matzpen—an organization that presented, for the first time in Israel's history, a radical critique of ZIONISM and Arab nationalism. It called for the democratization and "de-Zionization" of Israel and its integration into the Arab Middle East. Matzpen produced a monthly journal that reflected these ideas and worked openly with Palestinian groups and individuals. In time the group developed ties with leftist movements throughout the world, especially with Arab activists in Europe and North America.

Most of Matzpen's members were Israeli-born, coming from the deep core of Israeli society; nevertheless their fight against Zionism and against the OCCUPATION of Palestinian territories as well as their contacts with Palestinian and European left-wing activists led to threats, slander, and political and social isolation. Some well-known members included LEA TSEMEL, Moshe Machover, MICHEL WARSCHAWSKI, Akiva Orr, Moshe Mehuver, and Haim Hanegbi. Although Matzpen never had a large membership, it was an unwavering ANTI-ZIONIST force in Israeli society and took consistently progressive positions on critical issues in Israel. At the end of the 1960s and beginning of the 1970s, it was considered a genuine threat to the Israeli political and social consensus. Today, however, many of the issues first raised by Matzpen form the core of progressive politics in Israel.

In the early 1960s, Matzpen declared that the heart of the conflict in the Middle East was the Palestinian problem. Official Israel denied this, asserting that the source of the conflict lay in the burning desire of the Arab world to destroy Israel. Today few, at least outside Israel, would disagree with Matzpen's analysis, evidenced by the fact that at the outset of the OSLO PROCESS most of the Arab world made overtures to Israel. In September 1967, three months after the conquest of the territories, Matzpen published a leaflet that asserted that "occupation brings TERRORISM and counter-terrorism in its wake." On the question of the Palestinian REFUGEES, Matzpen supported UN RESOLUTION 194 and believed that either payment of compensation or allowing the refugees to return was the only way to solve the refugee question. Matzpen also condemned the authorities' repressive measures in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

A group of Matzpen and fellow Palestinian activists founded the ALTERNATIVE INFORMATION CENTER to provide the Palestinian and Israeli communities with information about each other. The main aim of the center, however, was to work for a common strategic vision that would mobilize Palestinians and Israelis to resolve the Palestinian situation.

See also ARAB PEACE INITIATIVE; MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICAN ECONOMIC CONFERENCES

Bibliography

Warschawski, Michel. On the Border. London: Pluto Press, 2005.

McGovern, George Stanley (1922–)

George McGovern served as a Democratic senator from South Dakota from 1963 to 1981. Previously he had served for four years in the US House of Representatives and as director of the Food for Peace program under President JOHN F. KENNEDY. A prominent opponent of the Vietnam War, he became the 1972 Democratic Party nominee for president, losing to incumbent president RICHARD NIXON. McGovern also unsuccessfully sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 1968 and 1984. In 1997, President BILL CLINTON named him the US Permanent Representative to the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization and World Food Program, a position in which he served in Rome for the next four years.

Like most liberal Democrats of his generation, as an elected official McGovern took a strongly pro-Israel stance during most of his career. His strict Methodist upbringing had emphasized the special role of Jews in the promised land, and as a highly decorated bomber pilot in World War II, he had witnessed the horror of the HOLOCAUST and subsequently developed a respect for Israel's democratic institutions. Although McGovern was considered the most liberal major party presidential nominee in US history, the 1972 Democratic Party platform was the strongest up to that time in promoting US support for Israel.

McGovern's perspectives began to change in 1978 when, as the newly appointed chair of the Middle East Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he took his first major trip to that region. Exposed for the first time to the plight of the Palestinians and to related perspectives in the Arab world, he began to shift from his previously uncritical support of Israel.

Following his 1980 defeat for reelection to a fourth term in the Senate, McGovern became a part-time lecturer at a number of prominent universities and continued to speak on political affairs, particularly food and agricultural policy, as well as on US policy toward the Middle East. Although underscoring his support for Israel's right to exist in peace and security, he became an increasingly outspoken opponent of the Israeli OCCUPATION of the Palestinian territories and of US support for Israeli policies that he considered illegal, unjust, and ultimately detrimental to Israel's long-term security. During his brief campaign for the 1984 presidential nomination, he distinguished himself from most of his rivals in calling for conditioning aid to Israel, if necessary to advance the peace process. From 1991 to 1997 he served as president of the Middle East Policy Council, a nonprofit organization based in Washington, D.C., that is dedicated to improving US-Arab relations and promoting public awareness of Middle East policy issues. In his position he traveled frequently to the Middle East, where he developed cordial working relationships with YASIR ARAFAT and other Palestinian leaders both in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and in exile, as well as with leaders in Israel and the Arab states. McGovern used his connections within the Democratic Party and on Capitol Hill to work for a more even-handed US policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, becoming a prominent US proponent of a sustainable peace between Israel and Palestine.

Bibliography

- Joyce, Fay S. "Interview with Former Dakota Senator George McGovern." New York Times. 29 December 1983.
- . "McGovern Stands Apart, Criticizing Israeli Policy." New York Times. 4 February 1984.
- McGovern, George. "I Am a Longtime Supporter of Israel." Middle East Quarterly. March 1998.
- . "Letter to the Editor: Time Now for a Declaration of Mideast Peace." New York Times. 20 July 1988.
- Watson, Robert P., ed. George McGovern: A Political Life, a Political Legacy. Pierre: South Dakota State Historical Society Press, 2004.
- Zunes, Stephen. "George McGovern—Interview." The Progressive. 57:10 (October 1993).

—Stephen Zunes

Mecca Agreement and the Palestinian Unity Government

On 8 February 2007 the two major Palestinian factions—FATAH and HAMAS—signed a historic conciliation agreement in Mecca, SAUDI ARABIA, under the sponsorship of Saudi king Abdullah Ben Abdul Aziz. The Saudis pledged $1 billion for economic projects, aid, and rebuilding schemes for the GAZA STRIP and WEST BANK if the two Palestinian camps maintained their agreement. On 28 March 2007 the Saudis convened an ARAB LEAGUE Summit in Riyadh to secure ratification by all Arab states of the principles of the Mecca Agreement.

Two major issues provided the impetus for Saudi mediation. One was the long-standing conflict between Hamas and Fatah, which had escalated significantly when the January 2006 ELECTIONS gave Hamas 76 of 132 parliamentary seats in the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (PLC) and thus the right to form the next PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) Cabinet under Fatah president MAHMUD ABBAS. Although international monitors had carefully observed the elections and proclaimed them fair, Fatah refused to accept its loss, and its militias—some armed, financed, and trained by the UNITED STATES—challenged Hamas’s authority at every turn. By the end of 2006 and with increasing intensity in early 2007, the two sides were engaged in a bloody civil war played out primarily in the Gaza Strip. Previous efforts to forge a unity government had failed, and relations worsened between the rivals when Abbas threatened in December to hold new parliamentary elections in the absence of an agreement, making an end to the conflict imperative.

A second reason for conciliation was to attempt to break the financial embargo that Israel, the United States, and the international community imposed on the PNA after Hamas won the 2006 elections. The US Treasury Department had blocked all funds from reaching the PNA, and banks around the globe abided by the US prohibition, because they feared being viewed as dealing with “terrorists” and thus cut off from the US banking system. Some European countries developed systems of indirect aid or humanitarian donations that bypassed the PNA and went to specific Palestinian institutions, but this system was highly fragmented and inefficient. In May 2006 the US House of Representatives voted 361–37 to stop giving aid to nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that provided assistance in the Palestinian territories, thus curtailing European indirect aid and other NGO assistance.

At the same time, in response to the Hamas victory, Israel (based on the 1994 Paris ECONOMIC PROTOCOL) withheld the transfer of Palestinian tax and custom revenues that amounted to some $60 million a month. Foreign bank accounts and financial transactions by the PNA were also frozen, while frequent Israeli blockades of border crossings between EGYPT, JORDAN, and Israel caused Palestinian trade to collapse. For example, although Israel agreed to allow 400 trucks daily to export goods out of Gaza through the KARNI CROSSING, by December 2006 only seventeen trucks per day had been permitted to pass. By March 2006, 60 percent of the population was living on less than $2 a day, and some 34 percent were “food insecure”—that is, they did not have enough food to meet their basic needs. In addition, 165,000 PNA employees had not received their salaries, causing suffering for their families (about 800,000 people). Without international funding, the Hamas-led government was unable to provide basic services to Palestinians. By April 2006 the official unemployment rate was above 40 percent, and by the end of the year the situation had deteriorated precipitously. Ending the international economic blockade was thus a necessity for the survival of the PNA and the Palestinian people.

The goal of the Mecca Agreement then was to end the deadly factional fighting between Fatah and Hamas and to create an appearance of neutrality for the Palestinian government to help end the international economic sanctions on the PNA. The key issues in the agreement included:

- “A ban on the shedding of Palestinian blood including the adoption of all necessary measures to prevent this;
- Reaffirmation of the importance of national unity as a basis for national steadfastness, confronting the OCCUPATION and achieving the legitimate national goals of the Palestinian people;
- Adopting the language of dialogue as the sole basis for solving political disagreements in the Palestinian arena. . . .
- Reaching a final agreement on forming a Palestinian national unity government according to a detailed agreement approved by both sides, and which would be based on taking the appropriate constitutional measures to form this government.
- [Moving] forth in activating and reforming the PLO [PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION]. . . .
- [Reinforcing] the principle of political partnership on the basis of enacted laws in the PNA and on the basis of political pluralism according to an agreement ratified by both parties.”

In this context President Abbas sent a letter to PNA prime minister ISMAIL HANIYEH, commissioning him to form the next Palestinian government within the period stipulated in the Basic Law. Abbas also urged Haniyeh “as premier of the next government to abide by the interests of the Palestinian people; to protect their rights and preserve and develop their achievements; and to work towards achieving their national goals as ratified by the resolutions of the PNC, the Basic Law, the national conciliation document, and the resolutions of Arab summits. Accordingly, I call on you to respect legitimate Arab and international resolutions and agreements signed by the PLO.”

On 15 March, Abbas and Haniyeh announced the formation of a national unity government as well as a detailed political program. On 17 March, the PLC ratified the new Cabinet by a vote of 83 to 3 of the 132-member parliament. (At the time, 41 Palestinian parliamentarians were detained in Israeli prisons, 37 of them Hamas members, and another 4 were not present for the vote.) The new government consisted of twenty-five ministries. In a complicated formula, Hamas controlled the most seats (twelve), then Fatah (six), while the remaining seven went to independents and members of four smaller parties in the parliament. The new ministers were sworn in subsequent to the PNC vote at the office of President Abbas and held their first meeting only days later.

Israel immediately announced that it would not deal with the new Palestinian government or any of its members except Abbas, because the government as a whole did not explicitly meet Tel Aviv’s three criteria for recognition of a Palestinian government: recognizing the right of Israel to exist, forswearing violence, and accepting all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements. The United States also immediately rejected the unity government.

Palestinians from all over the world, especially in Gaza, were optimistic that the Mecca Agreement would end the fighting and lead to a resumption of international aid. Although the agreement led to a cease-fire between the competing factions, by 15 May 2007 the coalition government of Fatah and Hamas began to break down, as massive fighting erupted in the Gaza Strip in a dispute over which faction controlled security apparatuses. In a gunfight between Hamas and Fatah forces in Gaza, ten people were wounded, and Hamas ultimately drove Fatah from Gaza. By June the two parties were operating parallel governments—Hamas in Gaza and Fatah in the West Bank. Hamas’s swift military conquest of the Strip badly fractured the Palestinian territories and left the Palestinians with their worst situation in recent memory.

See also HAMAS; ISMAIL HANIYEH; PRISONER’S DOCUMENT

Bibliography

- Abu Shark, Asad. “Of Paramount Importance.” Bitterlemons.org: Palestinian-Israeli Crossfire. 12 February 2007. <http://www.bitterlemons.org/previous/bl120207ed6.html#pal2>.
- Agha, Hussein, and Robert Malley. “The Road from Mecca.” The New York Review of Books. 54:8A (10 May 2007).
- Almeghari, Rami. “Unity Government Announcement Draws Various Reactions.” International Middle East Media Center. 16 March 2007.
- Alpher, Yossi. “Let’s Watch and Wait.” Bitterlemons.org: Palestinian-Israeli Crossfire. 12 February 2007. <http://www.bitterlemons.org/previous/bl120207ed6.html#isr1>.
- Associated Press. “France Pledges to Back Coalition Palestinian Government Including Hamas.” 23 February 2007. www.iht.com/articles/ap/2007/02/24/europe/EU-GEN-Europe-Abbas.php.
- Bannoura, Saed. “US Congress Okays Transfer of $59 Million to Bolster Abbas’ Security Forces.” International Middle East Media Center, Ramallah. 11 April 2007.
- Bildt, Carl. “Statement by Minister for Foreign Affairs Carl Bildt on the Formation of a Palestinian Unity Government.” Government Offices of Sweden. 17 March 2007. <http://www.sweden.gov.se/sb/d/8558/a/79008>.
- Bundesregierung. “German Government Welcomes Fatah-Hamas Unity Pact.” 9 February 2007. www.bundesregierung.de/nn\_6538/Content/EN/Artikel/2007/02/2007-02-09-hamas-fatah-einheitsregierung\_en.html.
- Deutsche Welle. “EU Says No to Aiding Palestinian Unity Government.” DW-WORLD.DE. 4 April 2007. www.dw-world.de/dw/article/0,2144,2439662,00.html.
- Entous, Adam. “Israel Mulls Suspending Ties over Abbas-Hamas Deal.” Reuters. 12 February 2007.
- Erlanger, Steven. “Hamas and Fatah Agree on Unity Government: But Israel Says It Will Not Deal with New Unity Government.” International Herald Tribune. 15 March 2007.
- . “Hamas-Fatah Gunfight Worsens Factional Strife in Gaza.” New York Times. 12 May 2007.
- Frey, Eric. “Admit That the Boycott of Hamas Has Been a Failure: The Continental Divide.” Der Standard (Vienna). 30 March 2007.
- International Crisis Group. “After Mecca: Engaging Hamas.” Middle East Report. 62 (28 February 2007).
- Kessler, Glenn. “Rice Meets Palestinian Unity Government Official.” Washington Post. 18 April 2007.

- . “United Front on Unity Government: U.S. and Europe Minimize Differences on Palestinian Accord.” Washington Post. 22 February 2007.
- Khatib, Ghassan. “Cautious Optimism.” Bitterlemons.org: Palestinian-Israeli Crossfire. 12 February 2007. www.bitterlemons.org.
- Khouri, Rami. “Keep Your Eye on These Arab Unity Governments.” Arab Media Watch. 17 March 2007.
- Kulick, Amir. “A Palestinian Unity Government: To Recognize or Not to Recognize, Is That the Question?” The Institute for National Security Studies. Policy Brief No. 3 (21 February 2007).
- Laub, Karin. “ Hamas Government to Step Down Soon.” Palestine Chronicle. 14 February 2007. www.palestinechronicle.com/story-021207140539.htm.
- Lyons, Patrick J. “Will Palestinian Unity Government Disunite the West?” The LEDE, Notes on the News from the New York Times. 16 March 2007.
- Marcus, Yoel. “Who Did You Say Needs Recognition?” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 13 February 2007.
- McCarthy, Rory. “EU Refuses to Lift Boycott of Palestinian Government.” The Guardian (UK). 27 April 2007.
- Middle East Quartet. “Middle East Quartet Statement on Agreement to Form Palestinian National Unity Government.” Relief Web. 9 February 2007. <http://www.reliefweb.int/rw/RWB.NSF/db900SID/RMOI-6YCVVX?OpenDocument&rc=3&emid=ACOS-635PFR>.
- MIFTAH. “Excerpts from the Program of the [11th] National Unity Government.” Al-Ayyam (maanews.net, Palestinian daily). Translated by the Jerusalem Media and Communication Centre. 15 March 2007. www.miftah.org/Display.cfm?DocId=12978&CategoryId=32.
- . Text: Agreement in Mecca; End to Palestinian Infighting. 10 February 2007. www.miftah.org.
- al-Mughrabi, Nidal. “Palestinian PM Appeals for End to Western Sanctions.” Reuters. 12 February 2007. www.alertnet.org/thenews/newsdesk/L12713585.htm.
- Nafaa, Hassan. “The Redundancy of Recognition.” Al-Ahram (Cairo weekly). 9 March 2007.
- Nasser, Nicola. “U.S. Diplomacy Aborts Jerusalem Opportunity, Shuns Arab Allies.” Arabic Media Internet Network. 21 February 2007.
- Palestine Media Unit. The Program of the Incoming National Unity Government. Zajel Youth Exchange Program. 18 March 2007. www.zajel.org/article_view.asp?newsID=7994&cat=1.
- Perry, Smadar. “King Abdullah Has No Intention of Compromising.” Bitterlemons.org: Palestinian-Israeli Crossfire. 12 February 2007. www.bitterlemons.org.
- Reuters. “Norway Recognizes Palestinian Unity Government.” Reuters. 17 March 2007.
- Rubinstein, Danny. “The Only Way to Deal with Hamas.” Ha’aretz. 6 February 2007.
- Stratfor. “PNA: Will an Agreement Get the Embargo Lifted?” Stratfor. 8 February 2007. http://www.stratfor.org/products/premium/read\_article.php?id=284118.

Williamson, Hugh. “Russia and US Split over Palestinian Unity Government.” Financial Times. 22 February 2007.

Wilson, Scott. “ Hamas, Fatah Launch Separate Governments: Split Deepens between Gaza, West Bank.” Washington Post. 16 June 2007.

Media, Israeli

A critical overview of the intricate relationship between the Israeli media and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict must start early in the twentieth century, long before the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948, with the Zionist press that was already active in Palestine at the time and its attitude toward what was then called “the Arab problem.” Many institutions of the Israeli press and much of its ideological makeup were already established long before independence.

The Hebrew-language press played a crucial role in the development of ZIONISM in its early years. Many founders of Zionism and leaders of the Jewish community in Palestine were themselves professional journalists and essayists, and they all saw the press as an indispensable tool for political action. Not unlike the media of other national liberation movements (such as the Palestinian media under Israeli OCCUPATION), the Zionist press saw itself as an integral part of the struggle for independence. During the BRITISH MANDATE (1917–1948), authorities attempted by force and by law to prevent the emergence of a free press in Palestine to avoid activist opposition to the Mandate, and British opposition further contributed to a close alliance between the Zionist political and military elite and the intelligentsia of the Hebrew-language media. Much of the acquiescence that characterizes the present relationship between the Israeli media and the establishment emerges from this early alliance.

Moreover, a very clear ideological pattern was apparent in those years, in which the different Hebrew-language papers provided the platform for endless, often fierce ideological debates, but only rarely, if ever, did they deviate from what was considered a legitimate version of Zionism. Most papers belonged to political parties, and even those that did not (e.g., Ha’aretz) were identified with some version of Zionism. This combination of a genuine sense of freedom to print whatever was fit to print and a deep belief that anything that transgressed the confines of Zionist discourse, or later the confines of the dominant Israeli consensus, was not worthy of publication, has determined much of the ideological makeup of the Israeli media up to the present.

Most importantly, the founders of the Zionist papers thought of their own role in the common struggle in terms of the construction of collective and individual identity. Together with other cultural elites, they saw themselves as educators. The Zionist movement set itself the goal of producing a new type of individual—not traditional Jews but Zionist Jews—Israelis who speak Hebrew as their native language, take their destinies into their own hands, participate in a collective effort of historical dimensions, and, most importantly, defend themselves against their enemies. The task of the newspapers, then, was tremendous. They provided their readers with different partisan versions of this new identity, through a new vocabulary, a new set of concepts and goals, a new sense of national belonging, and, most crucially, a new common enemy (the Arabs in general and the Palestinians in particular)—all classic tactics in the construction of new nations and national identities. Profoundly important for the future, the dominant feature of this new identity was the belief in self-defense—a concept that still determines the way the Israeli media covers the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The Zionist press, then, worked to construct and maintain the new imagined community of Israeli Jews, and it eventually produced a certain type of public, which the Israeli media then kept targeting, reinforcing, and developing.

Legal Background

Much of the legal climate within which the Israeli media came to operate after independence was established by the British during the Mandate. Following the Palestinian riots of 1929, a royal commission was sent to Palestine to investigate the events. The commission determined that the Palestinian newspapers played a major role in inciting the riots and consequently recommended regulations that would increase British supervision of the papers and impose constraints on their conduct. Correspondence from the time suggests that Mandate officials consulted with senior Zionist leaders, including Dr. CHAIM WEIZMANN, about these recommendations and received their approval. In 1933 the Press Ordinance was enacted, in which the licensing and publication of newspapers depended on the goodwill of the British authorities. In 1945 the British enacted a new set of ordinances regarding newspaper licensing: the DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS. This time the Mandatory power wanted to constrain both the Palestinian and the Zionist press, for the latter was openly encouraging an underground military campaign against the British. The new regulations decreed that all printed material published in Palestine required prior approval of the censor. The Zionist papers struggled against these constraints and at times risked publishing a report without the British censor's approval. A committee of the Zionist papers' chief editors, which was already established in 1942 as the Reaction Committee, closely coordinated with the Zionist political leadership to combat what they considered constraints imposed on the press by a foreign enemy.

When Israel declared its independence, it adopted the Press Ordinance and the Defense Regulations as the legal basis for the relationship between the press and the state, which the editors accepted. The Reaction Committee, now simply called the Editors' Committee, quickly declared that it had turned from "a war council fighting against a foreign government to an editor's committee which cooperates with the Jewish government and aids its establishment." A few months later, however, when the government attempted to use military censorship to suppress political opposition by temporarily shutting down two Zionist papers, the committee asked to negotiate an agreement with the government and the military. In the agreement, signed in 1949 and updated several times, the government agreed that censorship would apply only to reports dealing with issues of security (and not political views) and the censor would not close a newspaper or apply other sanctions before the matter was taken to an arbitration tribunal of three, which would include a member of the Editors' Committee, a representative of the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) chief of staff, and a member of the public. The editors, in return, gave up their right to defend themselves in court against arbitrary governmental decisions, and agreed to have all security-related reports censored in advance by the IDF. In other words, the editors surrendered their right to seek judicial review in determining the line between security-related and political censorship, in effect allowing the government to suppress information in ways that went beyond the narrow limits of military censorship. Moreover, although the editors obtained immunity from arbitrary closures, in return they gave their tacit support to the closure of other papers, especially the Arab ones, that were not invited to join the Editors' Committee. Thus the agreement maintained the Mandatory regulations (to this day) and created a sharp distinction between the Zionist media and all others. Israel is the only Western democracy in which a military censor screens everything that is printed or aired.

The agreement also established a relationship between the members of the Editors' Committee and the government, whereby the editors routinely received secret or sensitive information in return for their commitment not to publish it. The editors, in other words, agreed to replace the original Mandatory form of explicit censorship with a very radical form of voluntary self-censorship. Today, following the privatization of the media and other institutional changes, the Editors' Committee is no longer active, while the censor's authority was eventually challenged in court and was narrowed considerably. Although explicit military censorship has lessened (at least with respect to the Hebrew-language media; Palestinian papers both in the territories and within the 1967 borders, are still routinely censored and punished on the basis of the Mandatory law), the media has strengthened self-censorship, while contributing to the general belief among Jewish journalists that their work environment is free of government pressure. Self-censorship remains one of the most crucial determinants of the media's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, strongly shaping the conduct of both the military correspondents and the editors.

Privatization

The history of the Israeli press from 1948 to the present is sometimes represented as a gradual passage from a system tightly controlled by the political and military establishments to an independent system of commercial media, whose conduct is determined by considerations of marketing, profit-making, and ratings. Consequently, it is claimed that the Israeli media now covers the news in a way that is relatively free of political pressure.

At a certain descriptive level, this is undoubtedly a reasonable account. The party press system that had developed in the Mandate period was already fading away in the late 1960s and eventually disappeared in the mid-1990s. Today Israel has only three major Hebrew-language papers—Yediot Ahronot, Ma'ariv, and Ha'aretz—all of which are privately owned. Until the mid-1960s the Israeli radio Kol Israel (Voice of Israel) was tightly controlled, but in 1965 it was granted the legal status of an independent public authority and was released from overt supervision by the prime minister's office. The Military Radio, established in 1950, has gradually turned through the years into a genuinely interesting and at times experimental radio station. In the 1990s, moreover, dozens of privately owned local radio stations began broadcasting all over the country, turning Kol Israel into one among many. Israeli television, which started broadcasting on one channel after the 1967 WAR (with a stated major goal of creating a "bridge between Israel and the Arab population" of the newly OCCUPIED TERRITORIES), now competes with two privately owned channels, an almost fully spread system of cable TV, a commercial system of satellite television, and dozens of international channels. News on the Internet provides an additional source of information in this rich and diversified system.

The implications of this change for the coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, however, are a different story altogether. The coverage of the conflict—in sharp contrast to the coverage of other topics—has changed very little over the years. A set of working habits, which emerged during the Mandate period and were consolidated in the first twenty or thirty years of independence, is still applied almost indiscriminately, though often without the ideological zeal that characterized the media earlier. Explicit ideology has been internalized to such an extent that most senior reporters and editors are genuinely convinced that they provide the public with reasonably neutral coverage that simply respects the constraints of journalistic common sense. Because of market constraints on their work—the need to "sell newspapers"—they feel certain that, unlike their predecessors from the party press and the government-owned broadcasting authority, they do not let ideology get in their way and merely produce the coverage that the public wants to buy. However, both the public and the media professionals, as an integral part of that public, are themselves the product of explicit ideological education. Consequently, producing the coverage that the public wants to buy means in effect perpetuating the same basic messages. Moreover, the decline of explicit ideology has given rise to the common notion that coverage of the conflict by small media outlets that are still active at the margins is “ideologically biased” but that the general consensus at the center of the political map, and its reflection in the major media, are nonpolitical. Paradoxically then, in the past when the party press wore its ideological convictions on its sleeve it may have been easier for the public as well as for the journalists themselves to detect the inherent bias in the coverage. In the seemingly ideology-free environment of today, this is much more difficult. And the bias is still there.

This bias is based on the overarching notion that Israel, state and society, does not have an interest of its own in the conflict apart from self-defense and that it is constantly dragged back into it by Arab violence in general and Palestinian violence in particular. The implications of this notion in terms of media coverage are manifold, but here a historical observation is pertinent. Whether or not the Jewish community in Palestine was ever seriously under threat of annihilation (and different historians have different views about this), it seems beyond doubt that the sense of existential anxiety reflected by the Zionist papers of the time (especially following the Arab riots of 1929) was a sincere and genuine reflection of a sentiment shared by the public and its leaders alike. It was not all propaganda. But the fantasy of self-defense, which was born together with Zionism, within the context of ANTI-SEMITIC persecution in Europe, consequently became an obsession that took over the state and the entire society. What became a deeply distorted perception of reality once Israel grew into the regional superpower that it is was developed and consolidated in a very different context.

From the IDF Viewpoint

This is, then, the narrative that emerges out of the obsession with self-defense: “We (the Israelis) are a peace-loving people. All we wish for is a context in which Jews can lead a normal life. However, the world has continually proven that this is only possible in a Jewish nation-state that defends itself and does not entrust its security to other nations. Unfortunately, Israel is still under existential threat. Some of us feel that we should reach some kind of compromise with the Arab world; others feel this will never be possible. Everybody agrees, however, that at the moment peace is not an option. We have to remain strong and patiently await a better future.” This narrative is the single most important factor in the way the Israeli media covers the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

To begin with, then, the Israeli media considers the entire conflict from the viewpoint of those professionally and personally responsible for self-defense—the commanders of the IDF. This view is based on a deep-seated trust, developed through years of close cooperation with and belief in the integrity of the military experts, and accepts that those with access to top-secret intelligence are the ones who know best. Military correspondents and analysts, in the papers and on television, enjoy the same privileges today that they always had to shape the narration and interpretation of events—from the daily activities of the IDF in the territories to the prospects of a peaceful agreement with the Palestinians.

The perspective of the military establishment overwhelmingly dominates all the other possible perspectives that might influence the coverage of the conflict—not only the Palestinian and international perspectives, but also, and crucially, the different perspectives within the Israeli establishment itself and Israel at large. This is true for the political opposition, academia, the foreign office, and even the settlers (during the disengagement from Gaza, for example). Most importantly, at certain times when the military seemed to have a more combative perspective than the government itself, the media went along with the military and provided the public with coverage that eventually pressured the government to adopt the military’s point of view. For example, in the “waiting period” before the 1967 War, moderate prime minister LEVI ESHKOL was forced to nominate MOSHE DAYAN, former chief of staff, as minister of defense and eventually to launch the war.

However, the dominance of the military perspective does not necessarily imply that the media’s attitude toward the conflict has remained static over the years. In fact the media have moved from the denial of the very existence of a Palestinian people to an acceptance of the idea of a Palestinian state. The dominance of the military perspective implies, most importantly, that the media has always based changes of perspective on the attitudes of the military establishment. For example, during the OSLO PROCESS (1993–2000), the optimism expressed by the media directly reflected the attitude of the military establishment then headed by Prime Minister and Defense Minister YITZHAK RABIN, a former IDF chief of staff who described the process as a calculated risk meant to attain security. A few years later, following the failed CAMP DAVID SUMMIT of 2000, Prime Minister EHUD BARAK, another former IDF chief of staff, declared there was “no partner on the other side” for a peaceful solution and rallied the support of the IDF’s intelligence wing to support his conclusion. The media completely accepted this contention. Six years later, even after it became clear this did not reflect the assessments of the professional ranks within the intelligence wing—nor of SHIN BET—it is still quite difficult to find Jewish Israelis who seriously doubt that Barak’s contention was factually right.

Also, even though news coverage is and has been dominated by the military perspective, other perspectives are mentioned. However, they are presented as views or opinions, as opposed to the factual assertions of the military: critics of Israel “claim,” while the IDF “reveals.” Alternative perspectives are thus rarely found in the media’s factual descriptions that make up the news. Ha’aretz, for example (by all accounts the most progressive newspaper in Israel), routinely publishes reports by its correspondent in the Occupied Territories, Amira Hass (who is, incidentally, the only Israeli reporter who actually lives in the territories). But when Hass’s reports contradict those of the paper’s military correspondent, Ha’aretz usually publishes the two stories separately: the IDF’s version appears on the front page as news, whereas Hass’s story is relegated to the back pages and framed there as part of the background. The paper thus sends its readers a double message: it is important to hear what the Palestinians have to say, but as far as the facts are concerned, we trust the IDF. Other Israeli newspapers do not even include the Palestinian perspective.

This is not a deliberate attempt to keep the Palestinian perspective away from Israeli consciousness. A worldview based on self-defense views the Palestinians and anything that sounds like a pro-Palestinian perspective as a threat. As a result only Palestinian actions or declarations that are violent, combative, or threatening get published and are regularly highlighted. Palestinian extremists, such as the leaders of HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD, have a much better chance of getting a headline in an Israeli paper than any of the leaders of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, which becomes a topic for coverage only when it is implicated in TERRORISM (according to the IDF).

The Israeli public regularly reads detailed information about the capture of terrorists, the discovery of weapons and explosives, and the annihilation of various leaders of the Islamic organizations. Because the general Palestinian population, on the other hand, is not perceived as a direct threat, its plight under the OCCUPATION is rarely covered. (Amira Hass’s reports and those of her colleague at Ha’aretz, Gideon Levy, are significant exceptions.) This is not as much an attempt to cover up the reality of the Occupation as it is a reflection of a general perspective. As some polls clearly indicate, Jewish Israelis know very little about the Palestinians, and what they know, or think they know, implies nothing but danger.

The media consistently presents Israel as a passive party to the conflict, one that only attempts to defend itself against Palestinian violence. Consequently violent actions by Palestinians attest to their evil intentions, while Israeli acts of violence, on the other hand, are always provoked by Palestinian violence and are thus justified as acts of self-defense. The IDF may accidentally harm Palestinian civilians in its fight against Palestinian terrorism, but whenever this happens (or more accurately, whenever the IDF admits to such events), the incident is presented as a mistake.

Most importantly, the Occupation itself is rarely acknowledged as one of the causes of the conflict: Palestinian violence is not the result of the Occupation; rather, the Occupation is a result of Palestinian violence. The national consensus is that, at the moment, security considerations dictate continuing the Occupation, and any future withdrawal could only be justified by security-based arguments. Such was the argument that convinced the majority of Jewish Israelis to support ISRAEL’S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in 2005. From this foundational conviction emerges a deep and bitter sense of siege, not just in the physical sense but also, and sometimes primarily, in the mental and symbolic sense: not only does Israel have to defend itself against unjustified violence, the whole world thinks of it as the aggressor. The injury of Palestinian violence is complemented by the insult of blame.

During the Second INTIFADA, the common perception among Israelis was that this was primarily a fight over world opinion, that the war would be won or lost on the screens of global television. The images of the Occupation and the suffering of the Palestinians thus came to be considered by Israelis as the Palestinians' strongest (propaganda) weapon, yet another direct threat to Israel's existence. In fact, this was how the events on the ground were covered by the media. When a child, MUHAMMAD AL-DURA in Gaza, died on the second day of the Intifada, it was perceived chiefly as a Palestinian victory: the child was either killed by the Palestinians themselves or by an IDF mistake, but the Palestinians managed to use his death to blame Israel. The coverage of both this event and the entire Intifada was thus dictated by the urgent need to fend off guilt and to prove that the Palestinians were the guilty party in the conflict. Paradoxically, when the Intifada deteriorated into a full-fledged war of attrition and the IDF reoccupied the WEST BANK, this perspective did not necessarily imply unconditional support for the government. Some of the media sharply criticized the government for letting itself be "dragged" into the war by the Palestinians. A government manipulated by the Palestinians is a passive government, and everything it does—from the construction of the BARRIER to the assault on the JENIN refugee camp—is nothing but a desperate and not very successful attempt to defend Israel against Palestinian terrorism. The other interpretive option, that the reoccupation of the West Bank was a conscious attempt to destroy the Palestinian National Authority and turn the clock back to the pre-Oslo days, was severely marginalized.

To what extent does such media coverage influence how Jewish Israelis think and feel about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict? To what extent does it manufacture consent with the government and its actions? Debates between media critics and media professionals about these complex issues regularly fail to reach a consensus: most media critics maintain that the coverage heavily influences the public, while media professionals insist that they only reflect what the public already thinks and feels. Media critics also complain that the media coordinates its work with the establishment, while media professionals maintain that they work independently. Unfortunately, both sides are right: the coverage is constructed independently but serves the interests of the establishment, and the media influences society, but by reflection—by maintaining, strengthening, and updating the society's self-perception as the main victim in the conflict.

See also ISRAELI MILITARISM; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT; POST-ZIONISM

Bibliography

- Bar-Tal, Daniel. "Societal Beliefs in Times of Intractable Conflict: The Israeli Case." International Journal of Conflict Management. 9 (1998).
- Barzilai, Gad. Wars, Internal Conflicts, and Political Order. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.
- Caspi, Dan, and Yehiel Limor. The In/Outsiders: The Media in Israel. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press, 1999.
- Cohen, Akiba, and Gadi Wolfsfeld. Framing the Intifada: People and Media. Norwood, NJ: Ablex Publishing Corporation, 1993.
- Dor, Daniel. Intifada Hits the Headlines: How the Israeli Press Misreported the Second Palestinian Uprising. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2004.
- . The Suppression of Guilt: The Israeli Media and the Reoccupation of the West Bank. London: Pluto Press, 2005.
- Lahav, Pnina. "Press Law in Israel." In Press Law in Modern Democracies. Edited by Pnina Lahav. New York: Longman Press, 1985.
- Liebes, Tamar. Reporting the Arab-Israeli Conflict: How Hegemony Works. London: Routledge, 1997.
- Peri, Yoram. The Israeli Military and Israel's Palestinian Policy: From Oslo to the Al Aqsa Intifada. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace, 2002.
- Wolfsfeld, Gadi. Media and the Path to Peace. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

—Daniel Dor

Media, Palestinian

Since the beginning of the twentieth century, the Palestinian press has played an important role in the formation of PALESTINIAN IDENTITY and political organizing. At the same time, it has fairly consistently faced pressure from various ruling authorities. Under Ottoman rule (1900–1916) early in the twentieth century, the press helped to constitute a community with a shared body of knowledge and a sense of common grievance. During the last years of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, the press was a forum for developing Arab ideas about ZIONISM, both in Palestine where debates were particularly intense and in Cairo, Damascus, and Beirut, where readers often had a direct interest in events in Palestine. During this formative period in Palestinian nationalism, the press helped to unify local, national, and regional identities.

Of ten newspapers surveyed by historian Rashid Khalidi from 1908 to 1914, nine were clearly ANTI-ZIONIST. Even those that published pro-Zionist articles often led to an entrenchment of Arab and Palestinian nationalisms, because many readers could see for themselves that Zionism threatened their hopes for independence and a state. Although newspapers generally reflected elite perspectives on nationalism and often did not embrace the more radical politics of the peasant fellaheen, Khalidi writes, “by 1914, most editors and writers in the papers examined were fully aware that the seemingly innocuous activities of the Zionist movement were directed at the ultimate establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine, with its necessary concomitant dispossession of the Arab population.” During the BRITISH MANDATE (1917–1948), Palestinian papers continued to both reflect and shape public opinion in opposition to Zionism.

Throughout this period the press periodically struggled with the authorities as well. Although Ottoman officials had recognized freedom of the press in theory, they restricted it through licensing practices and criminal liability for violators of press laws. In the first decade of the British Mandate, the press generally flourished, but in 1929, as political strife intensified, the Mandatory authorities enacted new laws to curb “incitement,” and officials censored papers and occasionally suspended their publication. Under Jordanian rule (1948–1967), officials continued to restrict the press through licensing laws, prior censorship, and closures of papers.

Nationalist Movement and Israeli Occupation

After 1967 the Palestinian media developed alongside the Palestinian nationalist movement and was an important part of its strategy. As the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) tried to constitute itself as a state in the making, it instituted broadcasts of the Voice of Palestine radio from a number of Arab countries. In the 1970s the PLO began implementing intensive media projects in the Occupied Territories. An important factor for the Palestinian media inside Israel’s borders and in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES was that the geography of Palestine allowed its residents to receive many different radio and television broadcasts from Israel, LEBANON, SYRIA, IRAQ, JORDAN, EGYPT, and even IRAN. At the same time, the local print media provided concrete information about local events and supported communication with PLO leaders outside the Occupied Territories.

Nevertheless, the Israeli OCCUPATION of the Palestinian territories, like previous occupations, produced serious government censorship of the local press. From 1948 through 1966, the PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL were under a military occupation, and to restrict the Palestinian (and at times Israeli) press, Israel employed British Mandate laws, in particular the 1945 DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS and the Press Ordinance of 1933. These laws entailed strict rules regarding licensing of the press and allowed the censor, a military official, to forbid the publishing of anything that “in his opinion, would be, or be likely to be or become, prejudicial to the defense of [the state] or to the public safety or to public order.” At the same time, in the early years of the state, the Israeli press worked out agreements with the military that included a certain degree of self-censorship that, in turn, precluded direct military censorship in many circumstances. In contrast, these laws seriously restricted the Palestinian media from presenting opposition views or even more mundane content, such as obituaries.

After Israel’s Occupation and annexation of East JERUSALEM in 1967, Palestinian newspapers located there gained some of the rights accorded to Israeli newspapers. However, each night managing editors of Palestinian newspapers in Jerusalem had to send their proof sheets to the Israeli censor, who would mark each item as either approved, rejected, or approved with alterations. A clear hierarchy of restrictions determined whether papers could publish critical material. Least likely to be censored was the non-Arabic (Hebrew, Russian, French, English) press inside Israel; then the Arabic-language Israeli Communist Party paper, which could not be distributed in the Occupied Territories; the English-language Palestinian weeklies, also not distributed in the Occupied Territories; other Palestinian and Israeli papers not allowed in the Occupied Territories; and, finally (with the most restrictions), the Palestinian press in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP.

Meanwhile, freedom of the press in the non-annexed parts of the West Bank and Gaza was further restricted. Israeli restrictions on the Palestinian press were based not only on the Emergency Regulations of 1945 but also on military orders issued after 1967, which gave military commanders “any power of government legislation, appointive or administrative.” Military regulations prohibited the publication or distribution of newspapers or anything with political significance without a license or PERMIT. Journalists could be placed under ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION without legal charges, prevented from traveling outside a particular town, given other travel restrictions (e.g., individual editors or journalists were not allowed to go to Jerusalem), or even deported.

Press restrictions were based on the government position that Palestinians did not have the same rights to a free press as Israelis. When university professor SAEB EREKAT was convicted of incitement for writing “Palestinians must learn how to endure and reject and resist [all forms of occupation] until we regain our freedom” in a university newsletter published in English and circulated abroad in April 1987, the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT’s decision stated that “[in an] area under military control due to Occupation from war, within which there does not exist either a democratic regime or a democratic procedure of rule, no political institutions nor general elections, there obviously cannot be a derivation of the right of freedom of expression.”

Although Israeli censorship could have been more far-reaching, permitting some free speech arguably benefited Israel on several levels. First, because newspapers in Israeli-annexed East Jerusalem fell under the same legal framework as Israeli media, treating these papers totally differently would have called into question Israeli democracy. Second, allowing some Palestinian media to exist gave Israel the opportunity to gather information and to set the limits of published discourse.

Palestinian Press during the Oslo Period

After the OSLO ACCORDS were signed in 1993, the Palestinian press in the West Bank and Gaza underwent major transformations. The DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES stated that the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) had “the right to build and operate separate and independent communication systems and INFRASTRUCTURES including telecommunications networks, a television network and a radio network.” The PNA established the Voice of Palestine radio station and Palestine TV in July and November 1994, respectively. However, the PNA soon began to exercise its own forms of control. In 1995 the new Palestinian Press Law replaced Israeli military regulations and presented strong statements about the importance of freedom of expression, yet the law was dangerously vague and allowed for serious limitations on free speech. For example, the law “strictly prohibits” the publication of “articles that may cause harm to national unity or incite acts of crime or plant seeds of hatred, dissension, and disunion, or stir up trouble and sectarianism among the members of society.”

In restricting the press the PNA was constantly balancing internal and external pressures. After the pro-Jordanian paper Al-Nahar criticized the Oslo Accords, on 28 July 1994 the new Palestinian Ministry of Information ordered its closure. The other major daily paper, Al-Quds, was more cautious and did not report on the closure. To avoid PNA criticism the major daily newspapers sometimes appointed people close to the PNA to high management positions. The PNA also severely restricted the Islamist media, because it represented the PNA’s main political competition and was also a target of Israeli and Western criticism. Journalists who criticized or opposed the PNA were often arrested, and their publications or stations could be closed for a limited period or permanently. Thus the three major daily newspapers at that time, Al-Ayyam, Al-Quds, and Al-Hayat Al-Jadida, all promoted the FATAH-controlled PNA as the dominant national force. Perhaps because of fear of PNA reprisals that led to self-censorship or because of loyalty to Palestinian nationalism, these newspapers overlooked internal issues, including social movements, human rights issues, and regime corruption and malfeasance.

In the 1990s, technological as well as political developments changed the mediascape, as a great proliferation of nonofficial media provided diverse perspectives and strengthened both local and regional interests. First, Arab satellite television provided high-quality news with an unprecedented level of criticism of Arab governments. Starting in 1996, Al Jazeera satellite television broadcast from the Gulf state of Qatar; it presented well-produced news that was free of state control or censorship than any previous Arab national media. Because Al Jazeera focused much of its coverage on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and had reporters on the ground in Israel and the Occupied Territories, it became an important news source for increasing numbers of Palestinian families with access to satellite television.

Second, there was a proliferation of local television and radio stations, especially in the West Bank. Although many were started as small businesses rather than political projects and their production values were not consistently high, they voiced alternative political views on important issues, especially US policy in the region and internal Palestinian issues. Some stations tried to promote positive social change. For example, Al-Quds educational TV broadcast a joint Israeli-Palestinian version of Sesame Street, and the channel also broadcast live coverage of a PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL session that addressed corruption in the PNA, which the PNA's Palestine Broadcast Company tried to jam and for which a journalist was later imprisoned for a week. Independent media also faced restrictions from Israeli officials, who sometimes took down transmitters they considered to be illegally located outside of PNA territory.

Third, Islamist publications began to circulate more widely and more freely. In its early years the militant Islamist and Palestinian organization HAMAS had spread its message primarily through clandestine leaflets and preaching in the mosques. However, the establishment of the PNA allowed Hamas to use mass media, even though the Islamist media faced some repression by the PNA. Although Hamas's media sometimes addressed religious issues, their main focus was political, and they included secular discourses about human rights and political pluralism. One important Hamas weekly based in Gaza, Al-Risalah, confronted the PNA on diverse issues—at times asserting that the peace process had stagnated badly, that ARMED STRUGGLE was a legitimate way to resist the Occupation, and that the PNA needed to improve its handling of internal issues, such as teachers' salaries and human rights concerns.

Second Intifada

During the Second INTIFADA (starting in 2000) the level of Israeli violence against Palestinian journalists drastically escalated. Israel intensified its system of CHECKPOINTS and other forms of CLOSURE to severely restrict all Palestinian movement within the West Bank and Gaza, and almost no one from the West Bank or Gaza could enter Jerusalem or Israel. Some Palestinian journalists carried official Israeli press credentials that let them work around such restrictions, but early in 2002, Israel refused to renew these press passes, arguing that Palestinian journalists presented a security threat to Israel. Even after legal challenges from international news organizations, few journalists could get their passes back.

Israel targeted both official and independent Palestinian media. In 2000 it bombed the radio transmitter for the Voice of Palestine, accusing the station of inciting the violence that killed two Israeli reservists in Ramallah in the West Bank. In the winter of 2001–2002, Israel confiscated equipment and then blew up the building that housed administrative and broadcast facilities for the Voice of Palestine and Palestine TV. In 2002, Israeli soldiers also removed the hard drives of some private stations' computers, occupied their offices, and destroyed their equipment. Israeli authorities contended that these incidents were either attacks on locations containing Palestinian snipers or unfortunate acts of vandalism by individual soldiers, but Palestinian journalist Daoud Kuttab suggested, "Israel targeted every symbol of Palestinian independence. The media is a part of that."

Moreover, Israeli forces killed seven journalists between 2001 and 2004: one British, one Italian, and five Palestinian. After the Israeli military invaded Palestinian cities in 2002, the Committee to Protect Journalists, a human rights and free press group based in New York City, named the West Bank as one of the most dangerous places to be a journalist for three years running.

Even in this critical situation, the PNA continued to repress the local media, particularly during the first years of the Intifada. Arrests, detentions, and abuse of local journalists critical of the PNA continued, and journalists complained of barriers to publishing material critical of the PNA. Meanwhile, the PNA attempted to maintain its influence by closing Hamas and ISLAMIC JIHAD media after a series of bombings inside Israel in 2001, apparently in response to US and Israeli pressure to control extremists. Also, in 2001 the PNA temporarily closed a local television station in BETHLEHEM after it aired a militant group's statement of responsibility that implicated the PNA in the group's attack during a truce with Israel. By 2003 and 2004 the PNA had lost a great deal of institutional power, and journalists reported receiving fewer critical phone calls from officials.

During the Intifada, local media played an important role in creating and disseminating vital information, even though many faced severe economic and physical problems with the collapse of the Palestinian ECONOMY and Israel's destruction of media infrastructure. Some, such as NABLUS's Radio Tariq al-Mahabbeh, changed from music and educational programming to live coverage of demonstrations and call-in programs, especially during CURFEWS, when radio provided an important social and logistical support for information such as when curfews might be lifted, for how long, what shops would be open, etc. Such local media covered Israeli attacks so thoroughly that people used it to track the safety of relatives and friends. Local media relied on networks of friends and listeners to report what they could see of Israeli army movements and expanded these networks to help provide international media with reports and experienced journalists as the demand for coverage grew. Thus, when Israel destroyed the official PNA media, local stations were able to continue broadcasting and, along with Al Jazeera, broadcast local emergency and safety information while areas were under siege or curfew.

Since the 2006 ELECTIONS, which led to the division of the Occupied Territories into a Fatah-controlled West Bank and Hamas-controlled Gaza, press freedoms have declined significantly, affecting both Arab satellite media and Palestinian media institutions. Fatah officials have repeatedly ordered the closure of Al-Jazeera, while Al-Arabiya has been threatened, following accusations that it favored Fatah. Hamas gunmen have stormed Fatah-controlled media outlets, and Fatah forces have attacked pro-Hamas media, each seizing equipment.

Bibliography

- Abdelhadi, Amr. "Surviving Siege, Closure, and Curfew: The Story of a Radio Station in Nablus." Journal of Palestine Studies. 34:1 (2004).
- Ayalon, Ami. Reading Palestine: Printing and Literacy, 1900–1948. Austin: University of Texas, 2004.
- Batrawi, Walid. Private Television in Palestine, Mass Communications. MA thesis Leicester, UK: Leicester University, 2001.
- Campagna, Joel. "Picking Up the Pieces." New York: Committee to Protect Journalists, 2002. www.cpj.org/Briefings/Brief\_index.html.
- Committee to Protect Journalists. Attacks on the Press. Annual serial. New York: Committee to Protect Journalists, various years.
- . Journalism under Occupation: Israel's Regulation of the Palestinian Press. Article 19. New York: Committee to Protect Journalists, 1988.
- Jamal, Amal. Media, Politics and Democracy in Palestine. Sussex, UK: Academic Press, 2005.
- Khalidi, Rashid. Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.

—Amahl Bishara

Media, US

Unlike either the Israeli or Palestinian media, the US media does not have to concern itself with developing nationalism, shaping a national identity, or creating a "common enemy" to mold national unity. There is however, an elite consensus on major political issues that defines the limits of "respectable discourse"—limits that if transgressed by an individual or an institution result in sanctions such as ostracism, loss of access, loss of position, boycotts, smear campaigns, withdrawal of advertising, and more. The media both shares the elite consensus and is constrained by its norms and parameters. Ostensibly the US media is free, professional, objective, and unbiased, yet, especially on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the prevailing consensus ensures that it is none of these.

Mainstream media coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the UNITED STATES is characterized by an absence of context and historical background as well as structural distortions that reinforce false perceptions of the conflict, all of which produce a highly Israel-centric perspective. Media coverage of the conflict passes through several filters—US political and corporate elites, Israeli public relations and watchdog organizations, the private owners of media organizations, publishers, and senior editors—before it reaches the public. These filters ensure that the realities on the ground are distorted through the omission of crucial information, the manner in which a story is framed, the choice of words, and one-sided perspectives. British journalist Robert Fisk commented on a related dimension of media and power and reached a similar conclusion: "Journalists in America like being very close to power. They [cozy] up to people in the administration, the politicians. There is a very unhealthy osmotic, incestuous relationship between journalists and power. . . . I think also there is no doubt that the pro-Israeli lobby in America has a very powerful voice. They are able to attack editors and reporters in print and by going to the editors and saying, 'Look, this is ANTI-SEMITIC.' It's a great phrase used over and over again—any critic of Israel is accused of being anti-Semitic. It's disgraceful, a slanderous, disgusting lie directed at innocent people, and it has to be stood up to. But in America, I fear that because journalists don't want to get into controversies . . . they don't want to be accused of being anti-Semitic, they fall into the habit of writing in such a way that they don't offend anybody. So, for example, you find that ‘OCCUPIED TERRITORIES’ is referred to as ‘disputed territories,’ ‘settlements’ are referred to as ‘neighborhoods,’ and slowly but surely, the language is drained of its meaning, and the crisis that actually occurs is de-contextualized; for example, if you can’t call the occupied territories ‘occupied,’ how can you explain why Palestinians would wish to resist an OCCUPATION?”

For example, on 3 September 2001 a news network did not want its journalists to refer to the Israeli settlement Gilo as a “settlement,” so in the network’s news clips the journalist reporting from Gilo used the officially approved word “neighborhood,” which removed any perception of colonization, settlement, or illegality from the report’s context. In another example, when President BILL CLINTON designated the Occupied Territories “disputed territories,” he radically altered the dynamics of the conflict, and the media followed his lead, referring afterward to the “disputed territories.” For these reasons, among others, the US public is often not aware of the reality of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Even the Israeli Occupation of the WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, and (since 2005 indirectly) GAZA STRIP remains hidden in the news media. For reasons ranging from intimidation to a lack of thorough investigation, US journalists have adopted practices that serve Israel’s interests and ensure public support for them. Statistical studies, specific incidents, and a variety of wide-ranging and revealing accounts demonstrate the US media’s attitude toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Every time a SUICIDE BOMBING strikes Israel, mass coverage of the tragedy begins instantly, while the mainstream US media mostly overlooks the TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS and deaths by air strikes of Palestinians, which occur far more frequently. Analyses of US media have revealed that the media reports Israeli deaths significantly more than Palestinian deaths, even though far greater numbers of Palestinians have been killed. In another example, a CNN.com headline about a 25 August 2005 incident read “Israel: Five Militants Shot in Raid.” The article, which relied on Israeli sources, claimed the armed militants, who exchanged fire with the Israeli army, were suspected of being involved with a suicide bombing. However, the Israeli newspaper Ha’aretz (Israel’s paper of record) covered the same event and quoted Palestinian sources that said three of the five young men were between the ages of fourteen and seventeen and had no known links to militant organizations; in addition, Palestinian reporters cited witnesses claiming that all five Palestinians were unarmed, including the two militants killed. A later investigation by Ha’aretz and the Israeli human rights group B’TSELEM confirmed that three of the five Palestinians killed in the assault were under the age of eighteen and did not have any links to known terrorist organizations, while the other two were low-ranking militants who were not armed at the time. CNN never altered its original story.

Influence from the US Government, Corporations, and the Israel Lobby

One of the explanations for the US media’s adoption of Israeli frames of reference in reporting on the conflict is related to Israel’s relationship with Washington. Since the 1967 WAR the US government has had a major interest in supporting Israel, considering it a STRATEGIC ASSET to US power in the Middle East and beyond. Moreover, since 9/11 that alliance has become stronger because of the fight against a perceived global Islamic threat. US governing elites consider Israel such a useful surrogate that Washington willingly supports whatever policies Israel inflicts on the Palestinians. Moreover, because the United States has no vital national interest in the Palestinians, their issues are usually ignored in Washington. This attitude of the governing elite is transferred to other elite sectors, including the media, and so emerges an elite consensus that sets the boundaries of permissible discussion.

In addition to sharing government perspectives, the media is under direct corporate control—in fact, the media itself is part of the corporate world—which decides what is fit to print or air based on the ever-present parameters of respectable discourse and backed by threats of boycotts, advertising withdrawals, and so on. In this regard it is notable that US mainstream media outlets have failed to report on the connection among US aid, US weapons trade, and the course of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. (That is, the United States sells weapons and arms to Israel; Israel in turn uses them against the Palestinians and sells weapons and arms to third world countries, both illegal by its contracts with the United States, and thus gains revenue and friends in the context of UN voting.) Because the corporate, media, and government sectors are integrated into a locus of power and share the same interests, objectives, and very often the same people (through the revolving door and interlocking directorates), it becomes more obvious why the media would not report outside the elite consensus. In this mutually reinforcing network, the media follows the consensus of the government and the corporate world and in turn influences public opinion to support government policies, in this case the promotion of Israel and the devaluation of the Palestinians.

In addition to the media's inherent constraints, AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS use many strategies to ensure favorable news coverage for the political interests and ideology they represent. A number of partisan, well-financed groups are known for organizing telephone and letter-writing campaigns, personal visits, advertising boycotts, and other negative tactics against media outlets if they feel a story presents Israel unfavorably. Such groups can exert considerable pressure, alleging that a story—or coverage in general—is “anti-Israel” or even “anti-Semitic.” The threat of such action makes the media very cautious. Boycotts have been organized by pro-Israel groups against National Public Radio, the Los Angeles Times, and other media outlets.

Israel has always made enormous efforts at influencing American public opinion, and the media is the key to its success. Today the Israeli government employs such high-powered public relations firms as Howard J. Rubenstein Associates; Morris, Carrick & Guma; and many others to promote its version of events. There are as well numerous think tanks actively disseminating information beneficial to Israel, such as the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI), the Middle East Forum, and the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. And there are myriad organizations who operate collectively and loosely under the rubric of the “Israeli lobby,” for example the AMERICAN-ISRAEL PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE (AIPAC), CAMERA, HONESTREPORTING.COM, and others that have an enormous influence on the media.

In addition many media owners, publishers, and executives demonstrate strong affection for Israel, sit on the boards of pro-Israel and media organizations, and consistently donate to Israeli causes. In fact, researchers have identified many individuals with potential bias in key positions in the media. For example, Mortimer Zuckerman, at various times the owner of U.S. News & World Report, The Atlantic, and the New York Daily

News, is passionately pro-Israel and is known for imposing his views on news content. Media magnate Walter Annenberg, who endowed two journalism schools, was a generous benefactor of Israel. Newspaper publisher Conrad Black, who at one time controlled 60 percent of the newspapers in Canada and hundreds in the United States, England, Australia, and Israel, is passionately pro-Israel. Haim Saban, the founder of Fox Family Network, is increasingly buying media outlets in Europe and elsewhere and has stated that “I’m a one-issue guy and my issue is Israel.”

Similarly, many leading journalists and talk show hosts identify closely with Israel. There are, as Edward Herman notes, a preponderance of media figures who are openly biased in favor of Israel, including Mortimer Zuckerman, Ted Koppel, Wolf Blitzer, George Will, Dan Abrams (general manager of MSNBC), Katie Couric, Barbara Epstein (cofounder and coeditor of the New York Review of Books), Jeff Greenfield, Dennis Ross, Thomas Friedman, Seymour Hersh, Geraldo Rivera, Daniel Schorr, Arthur Sulzberger, Larry King, Mike Wallace, Barbara Walters, and many others. New Yorker staff writer and Middle East commentator Jeffrey Goldberg is an American who immigrated to Israel, took Israeli citizenship, and served in the Israeli military. A Time magazine bureau chief, he became an Israeli citizen while he was stationed in Israel, where he was assigned to provide objective reporting. This can be contrasted with very few commentators sympathetic to the Palestinian viewpoint.

Another factor producing Israel-centric coverage is that most US correspondents tend to live in Israel, rather than the Occupied Territories. For example Martin Fletcher, one of ABC's major journalists in the region, is a Jewish resident of Israel, and his wife and children hold Israeli citizenship. Another resident of Israel is National Public Radio's (NPR's) longtime Israel correspondent Linda Gradstein, who has reported from Israel since 1990 and has lived in Israel even longer. In 1986–1988 she attended Machon Pardes, a religious institute in Israel known for building strong ties to Israel among its students, and her husband is a former IDF soldier.

The lack of journalists with firsthand life experience reporting from the Palestinian territories may account for some of the massive imbalance in news coverage. Few mainstream US journalists have ever lived for any substantial amount of time with the Palestinians in Gaza or the West Bank. Of note here is Israeli journalist Amira Hass, who writes for Ha'aretz, Israel's "newspaper of record," and has lived for decades in the West Bank and Gaza—and her articles reflect that immersion.

While the media outlets call for transparency and openness in government, they are rarely open and transparent themselves. It is difficult to identify journalistic conflicts of interest and bias when the decisionmakers in these institutions are hidden from the public. For example, the Associated Press has great power as a disseminator of foreign news, yet it does not reveal who is on its international desk, who determines what will be disseminated and where, or how its bureau structure operates. Moreover, its employees are prohibited from speaking to the public. Because the Associated Press is a cooperative owned by the multitude of organizations carrying its feeds, theoretically it is subject to oversight by these contracting organizations, yet there is no indication of such oversight.

Media Studies

In 2001 several media watchdog organizations undertook statistical studies of daily news coverage of deaths during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the second Palestinian uprising. In every case these analyses revealed that the media reported Israeli deaths in significantly greater numbers than Palestinian deaths, even though far more Palestinians were killed. In addition, it was found that this distortion was even more pronounced in reporting on children's and civilian deaths, with Israeli deaths covered at rates seven to thirty times greater than Palestinian deaths.

It is unclear what role statistical patterns play in the distortion. For example, do Israeli deaths occur in spurts, while Palestinians die more frequently but in smaller numbers, making the instances less newsworthy? Analysis of the data on deaths, however, does not seem to indicate that this is a major factor. In some cases small numbers of deaths on the Israeli side resulted in headlines, while large numbers on the Palestinian side did not.

National and Regional Mainstream Media

ABC, CBS, and NBC. In the first year of the Second Intifada (2000), over three times more Palestinians were killed than Israelis and almost five times more Palestinian children (see Fig. 2). Yet, a study of television reporting in 2000 revealed that two of the three major network prime-time television news programs reported on more Israeli deaths than Palestinian deaths, and all three programs reported Israeli deaths at rates considerably higher than Palestinian deaths (see Fig. 3).

Figure 2 Number of Deaths during the First Year of the Intifada (29 Sept. 2000–28 Sept. 2001)

In the study, conducted by the nonprofit organization If Americans Knew, researchers tabulated all ongoing reports of deaths for both populations and then compared the number of reports with the actual number of people killed. Because follow-up news reports mentioning earlier deaths were also counted, theoretically media reporting could exceed 100 percent of a population's deaths. Surprisingly, this was found to occur quite often in reporting on Israeli deaths, although never in reporting on Palestinian deaths.

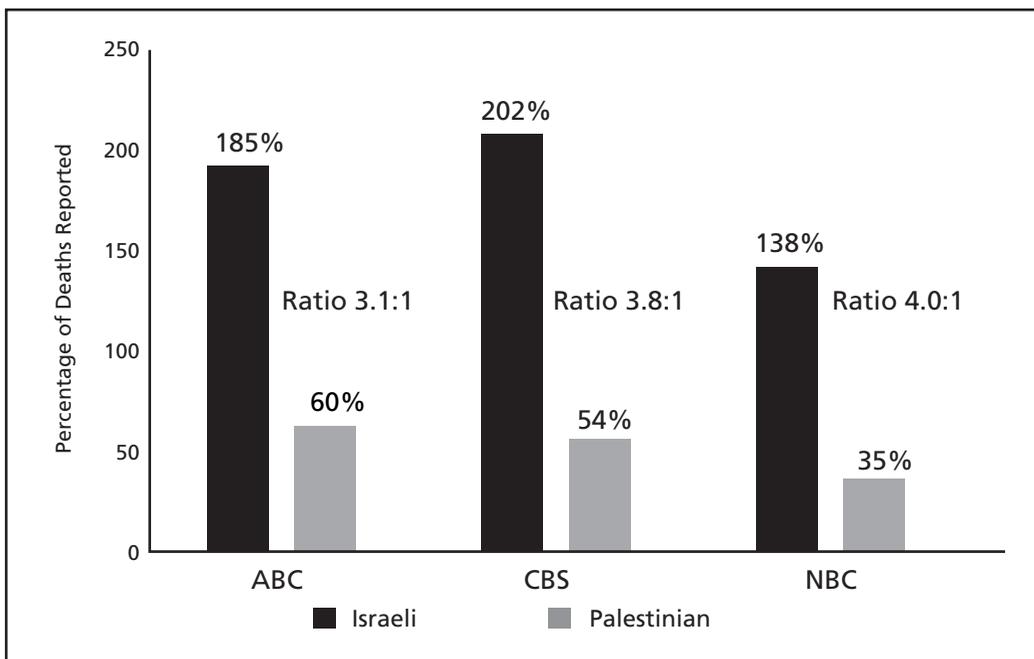

In the year ending September 2001, 28 Israeli children and 131 Palestinian children were killed, yet the networks carried more reports on Israeli children's deaths than on Palestinian children's deaths. ABC broadcast fifty-six reports on Israeli children's deaths (through repetition) and nineteen on Palestinian children's deaths; CBS reported on 37 Israeli children's deaths and 27 Palestinian children's deaths; and NBC reported on 45 Israeli children's deaths and 17 Palestinian children's deaths. In other words, the study found that the networks had covered Israeli children's deaths at rates 6.4 to 13.8 times greater than Palestinian children's deaths.

Figure 4, which examines the number of deaths reported for each population's children compared with the number that actually occurred, demonstrates the media's skewed daily reporting on deaths among Israelis and Palestinians.

A 2004 follow-up study of the networks' coverage revealed similar patterns (see Fig. 5). The US media consistently portrayed 2004 as a period of "reduced violence," although it was so only for Israelis; Palestinian deaths increased by 50 percent. For children, the disparity was even greater. While Israeli children's deaths decreased considerably, the killing of Palestinian children increased: 8 Israeli children and 179 Palestinian children were killed during 2004. With all deaths considered, Palestinian rates were 3.8 to 4.4 times greater than Israeli death rates, but in the case of children's deaths, rates were 9.0 to 12.8 times greater.

New York Times. Often referred to as the US "newspaper of record," the Times provided daily coverage of deaths among Israelis and Palestinians and also revealed significant distortions, with Israeli deaths reported at rates up to seven times greater than Palestinian deaths. In the first year of the 2000 Intifada, headlines and lead paragraphs in the Times covered Israeli deaths at a rate 2.8 times greater than Palestinian deaths, and Israeli children's deaths at a rate 6.8 times greater. Once again Palestinian deaths were often omitted, while Israeli deaths were frequently repeated. Figure 6 summarizes some of these data.

Figure 3 Percentage of Deaths Reported by ABC, CBS, and NBC Evening News, First Year of Intifada (29 Sept. 2000–28 Sept. 2001)

Figure 4 Children's Deaths Reported: Repititions and Omissions on ABC, CBS, and NBC Evening News, First Year of Intifada (29 Sept. 2000–28 Sept. 2001)

Figure 5 Percentage of Deaths Reported ABC, CBS, and NBC Evening News, 2004

Figure 6 Deaths Reported in Headline or First Paragraph during the First Year of the Intifada, New York Times Foreign Desk (29 Sept. 2000—28 Sept. 2001)

In 2004 this disparity became even greater, with the Times covering Israeli deaths at a rate 3.6 times greater and covering Israeli children's deaths at a rate 7.3 times greater—even though in 2004, Palestinian children were being killed at a rate 22 times greater than Israeli children. It is relevant to examine the media's daily reporting chronologically. When this is done, the curve for reported deaths among both populations generally follows the Israeli death rate, even though Palestinian deaths were considerably higher from the very beginning of the uprising.

National Public Radio. Considered by many a more serious and reliable news source than the commercial networks, NPR is generally considered a liberal or progressive outlet, and pro-Israel groups have repeatedly claimed that NPR's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is "pro-Palestinian." Yet Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting conducted a six-month study of NPR's coverage of deaths among both populations that showed a similar pro-Israel distortion. The study, which examined NPR's coverage during the first six months of 2001, found that there was an 81 percent likelihood that an Israeli death would be reported on NPR, but only a 34 percent likelihood that a Palestinian death would be. In the case of children's deaths, the distortion was still greater. NPR reported on Israeli children's deaths at a rate 4.5 times greater than Palestinian children's deaths. (The study, unlike the If Americans Knew studies, did not include follow-up reports for either population.)

Researcher Seth Ackerman's study of NPR, titled "The Illusion of Balance," found that, although NPR reported on approximately equal numbers of Israeli and Palestinian deaths, it didn't tell its listeners that the network was reporting on almost all the deaths among the Israelis, while reporting on only a small fraction of the deaths among the Palestinians.

The study also found that NPR had an odd pattern of reporting on military versus civilian deaths. Although Israeli civilians were more likely to have their deaths reported on NPR (84 percent were covered) than members of the Israeli security forces (69 percent), Palestinian security personnel were far more likely to have their deaths reported (72 percent) than civilians (22 percent).

CNN. A three-month study by Palestine Media Watch of CNN's evening news coverage of deaths among both populations also found that Israeli deaths were covered at consistently higher rates than Palestinian deaths. This study, like that of NPR, counted only initial reports of deaths and did not include follow-up reports in its analysis. It was found that CNN had reported on 74 percent of Israeli deaths and 18 percent of Palestinian deaths. This disparity, once again, grew wider for coverage of children's deaths; CNN reported on 83 percent of Israeli versus 22 percent of Palestinian children's deaths.

The study found that CNN, like NPR, particularly underreported Palestinian civilian deaths. Although Palestinian civilians accounted for 40 percent of the total deaths during the time period monitored, only 7 percent of CNN's coverage of deaths caused by the conflict focused on Palestinian civilians.

Regional News Media. The pattern of magnifying Israeli and minimizing Palestinian deaths was repeatedly found among local newspapers as well. In fact the disparities between the two populations were often greater. For example, If Americans Knew conducted a six-month study of San Francisco Chronicle headline and lead paragraph coverage of children's deaths, which revealed that the Chronicle had reported prominently on Israeli children's deaths at a rate 30 times greater than Palestinian children's deaths.

Similarly, a six-month study of the San Jose Mercury News showed that its front-page headlines had reported Israeli deaths at a rate almost 20 times greater than Palestinian deaths. A study of Portland's Oregonian newspaper headline coverage of the conflict revealed that the paper had reported on Israeli children's deaths at a rate 44 times greater than Palestinian children's deaths.

Associated Press. The Associated Press (AP), the oldest and largest wire service in the world, serves 1,700 US daily, weekly, non-English, and college newspapers and 5,000 radio and television outlets. It provides twenty-four-hour news feeds daily and is the chief source of news on Israel and Palestine for many Americans.

Analyses have shown that its coverage also emphasized Israeli deaths. A six-month study conducted at Stanford University in 2003 found that AP headlines had reported Israeli deaths at twice the rate they reported Palestinian deaths. A one-year study by If Americans Only Knew of AP headline and lead paragraph coverage in 2004 had similar findings. AP had reported Israeli deaths at a rate twice that of Palestinians and had covered Israeli minors' deaths at a rate 7.5 times greater than for similar Palestinian deaths.

One cause of this distortion may be AP's system of reporting from Israel. AP has two offices in Israel (in West Jerusalem and in Tel Aviv) and two offices in the Palestinian territories (in Ramallah in the West Bank and Gaza City). Although the bureaus in Israel are staffed largely by Jewish and Israeli journalists, those in the West Bank and in Gaza are staffed largely by Palestinian journalists. Although such a system appears well balanced, the Israeli bureau is the "control bureau" to which all reports are sent, where its staff then chooses which reports to send out on the news wire, edits these news stories, and sometimes writes the stories themselves, occasionally attaching a Palestinian journalist's name and a Palestinian dateline to the story.

Some reports from the Palestinian journalists never reach the public, although it is difficult to know how often this occurs, but several examples show how this works. On 17 October 2004, Israeli armored vehicles invaded the Balata Palestinian refugee camp on the outskirts of NABLUS. Although there was no physical resistance from the Palestinians, US and British eyewitnesses reported that an Israeli soldier stuck his rifle out a porthole in his vehicle, aimed at a boy nearby, and pulled the trigger. A steel bullet coated with rubber ripped into the boy's abdomen and penetrated his bladder while an AP cameraman recorded the incident. However, the recording was never broadcast and was later erased. AP's Corporate Communications Office would not comment on the reasons for not showing the recording, saying it was "an internal matter."

Although hundreds, possibly thousands, of Palestinian youngsters have been shot by Israeli soldiers, many of them killed, only once has a recording of such an incident aired prominently on US television—and this was recorded by a French news organization. But American pro-Israel groups produced such an outcry about this incident that the Israeli military later staged a reenactment of it that purported to absolve its soldiers of culpability. While European journalists were appropriately skeptical of this investigation, which was directed by a former ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) sniper, a number of US media figures appeared receptive. A few weeks after AP erased the recording of the soldier shooting a boy, another Palestinian boy was shot and killed in the same region. In this case the twelve-year-old boy was throwing stones at an Israeli patrol 300 meters (325 yards) away when a soldier shot him in the throat. Although the story was phoned in to Jerusalem by the Ramallah bureau chief, the Jerusalem bureau didn't forward the news story, although it did include one sentence on it in a news report about Israel. Such single-sentence reports of Palestinian deaths in stories on other topics are characteristic of AP news. A twenty-eight-paragraph news report on the dismantling of a Palestinian security unit, published on 27 November 2004, is typical. Paragraph twenty-seven states: “Also Saturday, a four-year-old girl was in serious condition after being shot in the mouth by Israeli soldiers as she stood in front of her home, witnesses and medical officials said.”

Alternative/Progressive Media and Professional Journals

Even the alternative and progressive press, often known for investigative reporting of topics ignored by the conventional media, follows the mainstream media in omissions of Palestinians in coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Project Censored, a Progressive media watchdog organization, is a case in point. Founded in 1976 to highlight and give awards to investigative reports ignored by the mainstream press, Project Censored compiled an annual top ten list—eventually a top twenty-five list—of the most important investigative reports that were minimally covered in the mainstream media. Yet for its first twenty years Project Censored ignored powerful exposés of Israeli treatment of Palestinians that were produced by publications such as The Link and The Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. In these first two decades Project Censored reported on only one story connected to Israel—its support of oppression in Central America. The first story about Israel’s treatment of Palestinians that made the Project Censored list was in 2004. After a story about US tax money going to Colombia was highlighted in the previous volume—the number three top story that year—Project Censored decided to cover US tax money to Israel as well. Although this is a vastly larger amount that has been dispensed far longer, the story was ranked at number twenty-four. Because news reports on Project Censored’s annual list only name the top ten stories, this low rating meant that this story was basically unmentioned. However, the inclusion of this story seemed to indicate that Project Censored’s omission of Palestine was ending. Its volume in 2005 included a chapter on Palestine and in 2006 a report on Palestinian child prisoners (number twenty-three), and it has increasingly included the Palestinian situation in its activities and events.

Similarly, several progressive and left-wing journalists known for exposing the powerful have consistently ignored Palestinian oppression. Some, in fact, are openly anti-Arab. An example is star investigative journalist Greg Palast, author of The Best Democracy Money Can Buy. Palast has called Al Jazeera “Terror News Network” and Palestinians “self-described child-killers,” betraying a level of ethnic bias usually not associated with progressive writers.

Pacifica Radio, particularly its premier station in Berkeley, has long been known for its alternative journalism. Yet it has censored programs on Israel-Palestine, dating back to at least 1969. In his essay “Censored,” which was originally published in The Link, longtime journalist Colin Edwards described a number of instances when KPFA managers such as Elsa Knight Thompson and Larry Lee, who identified themselves as Zionists, worked to prevent the broadcast of negative information about Israel. For example, he describes one exchange with Program Director Thompson: “in trying to explain the difficult position that my work had put the station in with some of its wealthiest supporters, she said they were threatening not only to withhold their annual contributions and cut the station out of their wills but also to organize a boycott of the station by all its subscribers.” This situation, however, began to change with the Second Intifada (2000). KPFA’s popular program Flashpoints, with Dennis Bernstein, covered Israeli-Palestinian issues consistently, and other programs that discussed such issues were also added.

Professional media journals such as the Columbia Journalism Review and the American Journalism Review have approached the Israeli-Palestinian conflict cautiously and appear to apply a different standard to this topic. For example, in May 2005, CJR ran an article that described how the New York Times failed to cover the Nazi HOLOCAUST against Jews during World War II, while refusing to run an article on—or even mention—studies detailing current failure of the New York Times to cover the ongoing killing of Palestinian children.

Reporting by Omission

The immense omission of stories about Palestinians indicates a far larger and deeper pattern, which has been detailed thoroughly by a number of media analysts, including Palestine Media Watch director Ahmed Bouzid, Middle East commentator Jeffrey Blankfort, Electronic Intifada founder Ali Abunimah, and Dutch journalist Joris Luyendijk, whose book Almost Human provides an analysis of media coverage of the conflict. British researchers

Greg Philo and Mike Berry of the Glasgow University Media Group illustrated quantitatively that historical and geographical context is consistently omitted from news stories about Palestinians. Their surveys found that most people did not know the history of this conflict, and, as they indicated in their book Bad News from Israel, it is not unusual to find people who believe that Palestinians are occupying Israel.

Three major elements elucidated by Marda Dunsky, a professor of global studies, are missing from reporting on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict: (1) the details of Palestinian daily life under Occupation for the last thirty-five years—for example, CHECKPOINT violence and humiliation, CLOSURES, DEPORTATIONS, ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, the PERMIT system, CURFEWS, and much more; (2) any explicit acknowledgment that a body of INTERNATIONAL LAW and consensus is relevant to competing Israeli and Palestinian rights and claims; and (3) any acknowledgment that the two parties to the conflict are not equal and that there is an enormous disparity or asymmetry of power between them—the Occupier and the Occupied.

Sonia Nettnin elaborates with regard to international law: “PR-media strategies explain why the news continues to emphasize the violence directed against Israelis. However, the media reports do not include international law in their coverage, with regard to human rights, the rights of Palestinian REFUGEES, and the obligations of occupying forces. The Geneva Conventions and several UN Security Council Resolutions are solid sources for reference. If news reports included the historical fact that Israeli settlements in the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem exist on illegally confiscated Palestinian LAND [and that settlement in occupied territory by the occupier is illegal], that fact alone might cause Americans to raise questions. . . . Moreover, people might even begin to reassess the root causes of the conflict. When news consumers have thorough, accurate information, the conflict between Israeli soldiers and Palestinians can reflect different meanings or interpretations, absent from the current patterns of news coverage.”

It is also a significant fact that the US media does not cover the Israeli peace movement. When 2,000 Israeli and Palestinian women from the organization WOMEN IN BLACK marched in the streets of Jerusalem, the US media did not cover it. Whenever a major peace group such as GUSH

SHALOM has a demonstration with tens of thousands participating, it is not found in US news coverage. And Palestinian nonviolent resistance is either not covered or misrepresented as violence.

Indeed, entire areas of information are largely omitted from news reporting. In particular, the Israeli press and Israeli and international human rights organizations frequently describe Israeli torture of Palestinian PRISONERS, but such stories are rarely found in the US media. In January 2004 the US media reported prominently on a prisoner swap in which an Israeli businessman imprisoned in LEBANON was traded for three Lebanese resistance leaders and a few hundred Palestinians (who had been scheduled for release within a few months anyway). Although earlier news stories had reported that the Israeli had been tortured in Lebanon, upon his release the man stated that he had been treated well by his captors. On the other hand, one Lebanese leader, released two days before, testified for ten hours in an Israeli court describing gruesome sexual abuse by Israeli prison guards, and his claims were validated by a member of the International Red Cross. Nothing was mentioned in the US media, although accounts of Israel’s use of torture had been reported in the foreign and Hebrew press for years.

In particular the Washington Post’s failure to cover the prisoner abuse was striking, given its extensive coverage of the prisoner swap. When a Post foreign editor was asked why the paper had not reported this incident, the editor replied that they were looking into it further and would probably cover it in the future. Although allegations of the torture of an Israeli—proven false—had been printed, reports of torture by Israelis needed to meet a higher standard of proof. To date this projected coverage has still not come.

In June 2002 the Foreign Service Journal published an exposé describing Israel’s torture of US citizens. Yet virtually no US news outlet covered this thoroughly documented report. Moreover, even the Foreign Service Journal did not include this story on its website. Luyendijk observes: “Global reporting on the Middle East is thus in the hands of a very small number of (mostly American) editors who rely on a handful of international news agencies and set the tone for the entire Western media. It goes without saying that their selection of what’s news and what’s not is not objective or even representative.”

Finally, two international human rights organizations released findings that 374 Palestinian teenagers imprisoned by Israel were being mistreated. A short AP story on the report was published in the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz and sent out on the Worldstream wire to Britain, Europe, Africa, India, and Asia, but not to US newspapers.

Israeli obstruction of the activities of journalists has similarly been largely ignored in US news coverage. In 2002 the Committee to Protect Journalists named the West Bank as the most dangerous place to be a journalist, stating, "Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON's government has used extraordinary force to keep journalists from covering its recent military incursion." Yet even when the journalists attacked were Americans, the media barely covered the stories. Journalist Robert Fisk described how CNN's Cairo bureau chief Ben Wedeman was shot in a gun battle in Gaza. Having visited the spot where Wedeman was hit in the back, Fisk realized that the bullet must have been fired by Israeli soldiers, yet the CNN report only said that "most of the bullets" fired came from the Israelis. In response to a question about the coverage, a company spokesman in London said CNN did not want to suggest who was to blame "at this time." The US AP news agency later reported that Wedeman had been "caught up in crossfire."

Bibliography

A large number of in-depth examinations of US reporting on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict have been produced by media analysts Ahmed Bouzid, founder of Palestine Media Watch (www.pmwatch.org/pmw/reports), and Ali Abunimah (www.abunimah.org and <http://electronicintifada.net/new.shtml>).

Ackerman, Seth. "The Illusion of Balance: NPR's Coverage of Mideast Deaths Doesn't Match Reality." Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting. November–December 2001. www.fair.org/index.php?page=1086.

Americans United for Palestinian Human Rights (in conjunction with Palestine Media Watch and If Americans Knew). "Accuracy in Israel/Palestine Reporting—The Oregonian." May–October 2004. www.auphr.org/docs/Oregonian\_Report\_04072005.pdf.

Bird, Jerri. "Arab-Americans in Israel: What 'Special Relationship'?" Foreign Service Journal. June 2002.

Blankfort, Jeffrey. "Stunning Jewish Success Dominates American Media." Rense.com. 6 December 2004. www.rense.com/general60/stun.htm.

Bleyleben, Alex. "[Robert] Fisk Decries U.S. Media Bias in the Mideast." The Stanford Daily (California). 22 November 2002.

B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Statistics: Deaths. 2005. www.btselem.org/english.

CNN. "Israel, Hezbollah Swap Prisoners." CNN.com. 29 January 2004. www.cnn.com/2004/WORLD/meast/01/29/prisoner.exchange.

Deutsche Presse-Agentur. "Lebanese Group Calls on ICRC to Prevent Israeli Torture in Jails." 13 March 2000.

Dunsky, Marda. "Missing: The Bias Implicit in the Absent—News Reporting of the Israel-Arab Conflicts." Arab Studies Quarterly. 23:3 (Summer 2001).

———. Pens and Swords: How the American Mainstream Media Report the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. New York: Columbia University Press, 2007.

———. Reporting the Israeli/Palestinian Conflict. London: World Association for Christian Communication, 2003.

Dunsky, Marda, et al. "The Other Side of the Story: Reporting on the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict." Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine. 24 January 2002.

Edwards, Colin D. "Censored." The Link. 26:3 (July–August 1993).

Findley, Paul. They Dare to Speak Out: People and Institutions Confront Israel's Lobby, 2nd ed. Chicago: Lawrence Hill Books, 1989.

Fisk, Robert. "The Biased Reporting That Makes Killing Palestinians Acceptable." The Independent (London). 14 November 2000.

Friedman, Robert I. New York Review of Books. 37:1 (1 February 1990).

———. Zealots for Zion. New York: Random House, 1992.

Friel, Howard, and Richard Falk. Israel-Palestine on Record: How the New York Times Misreports Conflict in the Middle East. London: Verso, 2007.

Goldberg, J. J. "CBS-Viacom Merger Redefines Jewish Role in Media." Jewish Bulletin of Northern California. 19 September 1999. www.theunjustmedia.com/merger%20redefines%20jewish%20role%20in%20media.htm.

Guardian. "Facility 1391: Israel's Secret Prison." 14 November 2003. www.guardian.co.uk/israel/Story/0,2763,1084796,00.html.

Gutman, Matthew, and Tovah Lazaroff. "Dirani to Testify on Rape Charges." Jerusalem Post. 27 January 2004.

Hadar, Leon T. "Vital Signs: The Media, Whose Bias?" Chronicles. June 2004.

Halsell, Grace. "What Christians Don't Know about Israel." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. May–June 1998.

Hassan, Adeel. "The Other War: A Debate: Questions of Balance in the Middle East." Columbia Journalism Review. 42:1 (May 2003).

Herman, Edward. "U.S. Policy and the Palestinians: Perceptions and Realities." For the Record. The Jerusalem Fund. 12 November 2001.

Herman, Edward S., and Noam Chomsky. Manufacturing Consent: The Political Economy of the Mass Media, reprint ed. New York: Pantheon, 2002.

Hopkins, Tom, Diana Buttu, and Ilan Pappé. One State, All Semites: The Necessary Steps to Reconciliation and Peace between Israelis and Palestinians. London: Pluto Press, 2006.

If Americans Knew. "Media Report Card: Accuracy in Israel/Palestine Reporting." San Francisco Chronicle,

- September 29, 2000–March 31, 2001.” 2001. www.ifamericansknew.org/download/chron\_report.pdf.
- . “Media Report Card: Accuracy in Israel/Palestine Reporting, San Jose Mercury News, April–September 2002.” 2003. www.ifamericansknew.org/download/merc1\_report.pdf.
- . “Media Report Card: Accuracy in Israel/Palestine Reporting, San Jose Mercury News, October 2002–March 2003.” 2003. www.ifamericansknew.org/download/merc2\_report.pdf.
- . “Off the Charts: Accuracy in Reporting of Israel/Palestine: ABC World News Tonight, CBS Evening News, NBC Nightly News; Study Periods: September 29, 2000–September 28, 2001; January 1, 2004–December 31, 2004.” 2005. www.ifamericansknew.org/download/networks.pdf.
- . “Off the Charts: Accuracy in Reporting of Israel/Palestine: The New York Times, Study Periods: September 29, 2000–September 28, 2001; January 1, 2004–December 31, 2004.” 2005. www.ifamericansknew.org/download/nyt.pdf.
- Al Jazeera. “Hizb Allah Leader Says Israel Tortured Him.” 27 January 2004. <http://english.aljazeera.net/NR/exeres/EC01FA53-F114-44AF-89F9-75903CB8008F.htm>.
- Kamalipour, Yahya R., ed. The U.S. Media and the Middle East: Image and Perception. New York: Praeger, 1997.
- Kanazi, Remi. “US Media Bias.” Znet. 23 March 2006.
- . “US Media Bias: Covering Israel/Palestine.” Poetic Injustice. April 2006.
- Kincheloe, Joe L., and Shirley R. Steinberg, eds. The Miseducation of the West: How Schools and the Media Distort Our Understanding of the Islamic World. New York: Praeger, 2004.
- Lilienthal, Alfred M. What Price Israel? Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1953.
- Luyendijk, Joris. Almost Human (Het zijn net mensen). Amsterdam: Podium Singel (The Susijn Agency), 2006.
- MacDonald, K. B. The Culture of Critique: An Evolutionary Analysis of Jewish Involvement in Twentieth-Century Intellectual and Political Movements, 2nd ed. Bloomington, IN: First Books Library, 2002.
- Matusow, Barbara. “Caught in the Crossfire: Perhaps No Topic Elicits So Much Bitter Criticism as Coverage of the Middle East.” American Journalism Review. 26:3 (2004).
- McChesney, Robert W. “Edward Herman: The Political Economy of the Mass Media.” Monthly Review. January 1989.
- McManus, John. “The Newsworthiness of Death.” Grade the News. 18 December 2003. <http://www.gradethenews.org/pages/middleeast.htm>.
- Muwakkil, Salim. “Biased Coverage of Israel Prolongs Conflict.” Chicago Tribune. 23 April 2001.
- Nassar, David, and Ahmed Bouzid. “Coverage of the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict, CNN–Newsnight with Aaron Brown. November 1, 2002–January 31, 2003.” Palestine Media Watch. 19 February 2003. www.pmwatch.org/pmw/reports/newsnight/021903.html.
- Neff, Donald. “Epiphany at Beit Jala.” The Link. 28:5 (November–December 1995).
- Nettlin, Sonia. “U.S. Media Coverage of Israel-Palestine Conflict.” Scoop: Independent News. 14 February 2005.
- Palestine Media Watch. “In Washington Post, Palestinians Attack, Israel Retaliates.” n.d. www.pmwatch.org/pmw/cast/retaliationwp.asp.
- Philo, Greg, and Mike Berry. Bad News from Israel. London: Pluto Press, 2004.
- Reporters Without Borders. Israel/Palestine: The Black Book. London: Pluto Press, 2003.
- Ross, Susan Dente. “Framing the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict in Thirteen Months of New York Times Editorials Surrounding the Attack of September 11, 2001.” Conflict and Communication. 2:2 (2003).
- Said, Edward W. Covering Islam: How the Media and the Experts Determine How We See the Rest of the World, rev. ed. New York: Vintage, 1997.
- Solomon, Norman. The Habits of Highly Deceptive Media: Decoding Spin and Lies in Mainstream News. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press, 2006.
- . “Media Spin Remains in Sync with Israeli Occupation.” FAIR’s Media Beat. 14 October 2000.
- . “Media Spins Israeli Occupation.” AlterNet. 4 April 2002.
- Terry, Janice. U.S. Foreign Policy in the Middle East: The Role of Lobbies and Special Interest Groups. London: Pluto Press, 2005.
- Thussu, Daya Kishan, and Des Freedman, eds. War and the Media: Reporting Conflict 24/7. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 2003.
- Washington Post*. “Israel Surrenders a Bargaining Chip.” 6 April 2000.
- Weir, Alison. “Ethan Bronner’s Conflict with Impartiality.” Counterpunch. 5–7 February 2010.

—Alison Weir

Meimad

The Meimad (Dimensions—Movement of the Religious Center) Party was established in 1988 as a religious ZIONIST alternative to the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY (NRP). Meimad supporters were discouraged by the NRP’s increasingly right-wing positions on the peace process and security issues. Meimad maintains that peace between Israelis and Arabs is possible and that Israel can negotiate land for peace because of the Hebrew concept of pikuach nefesh, which states that saving a soul is more important than LAND. In 1999 Meimad joined EHUD BARAK’S ONE ISRAEL PARTY.

Meimad first elected a representative to the Knesset in 1999—Rabbi Yehuda Gilad, a Torah scholar who accepts the view that the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES are part of a divinely ordained Greater Israel. But he also is committed to the concept that two peoples cannot exclusively control one land and therefore there must be territorial compromise, and he believes that the need for peace must supersede theological assertions. In practical terms this means, according to Meimad, that Israel and the Palestinians must compromise to some degree and that Israel must give up about 90 percent of the Occupied Territories, only maintaining control over SETTLEMENTS that could be continguously integrated into the Jewish state. It also calls for explicit Palestinian recognition of Israel. (<http://english.meimad.org.il>).

Bibliography

- Harkabi, Yehoshafat. Israel's Fateful Decisions. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.
- Johnson, Pat. "Rabbi Brings a Ray of Hope: MK Seeks Unity of the Left, Right, Religious and Secular." Jewish Independent. 18 October 2002.
- Reiser, Stewart. The Politics of Leverage: The National Religious Party of Israel and Its Influence on Foreign Policy. Boston: Harvard University Press, 1984.
- Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.
- Schwartz, Seymour. "Analysis of the Upcoming Elections in Israel." Beth Emet, 1999. www.bethemet.org/archives/member/analysis.php#top.

Meir, Golda (1898–1978)

Golda Meir (born Mabovitch) was a senior official in the HISTADRUT labor federation, the JEWISH AGENCY, and the MAPAI labor party, and the prime minister of Israel from 1969 to 1974. Known as the "Iron Lady" of Israeli politics, Meir was born in Kiev, Ukraine, and in 1906 her family immigrated to the UNITED STATES, where they settled in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. In high school she joined the Zionist group PO'ALE ZION and immigrated to Palestine in 1921 with her husband, Morris Myerson, and settled in KIBBUTZ Merhavva.

In 1924 Meir moved to Tel Aviv and became an official of the Histadrut, as well as serving in a managerial post with the union's construction corporation, Solel Boneh. From 1932 to 1934 she worked as an emissary in the United States, serving as secretary of the HeHalutz Zionist Women's Organization. Subsequently she became secretary of the Histadrut's Action Committee and later of its policy section.

When the pre-state BRITISH MANDATE authorities imprisoned most of the Jewish community's senior leadership in 1946, she replaced MOSHE SHARETT as head of the Jewish Agency's Political Department, the chief Jewish liaison with the British. Elected to the Executive of the Jewish Agency, she was active in fund-raising in the United States to help cover the costs of the 1948 WAR and became one of Israel's most effective spokespersons. In 1948 DAVID BEN-GURION appointed Meir a member of the provisional Israeli government. A few days before Israel's DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Ben-Gurion sent her to persuade Emir Abdullah of Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950) not to attack Israel. The emir sought to take only the area allotted to the Palestinians in UN RESOLUTION 181 and annex it to Transjordan.

In June 1948 Meir was appointed Israel's ambassador to the SOVIET UNION. Elected to the Knesset as a Mapai member in 1949, she served as minister of labor and national insurance until 1956, when she became foreign minister, a post she held until January 1966. As foreign minister Meir was the architect of Israel's attempt to create bridges to the emerging independent countries of Africa via an assistance program based on practical Israeli experience in nation building. She also endeavored to improve relations with the United States and successfully created bilateral relations with several Latin American countries.

From 1966 to 1968 Meir served as secretary general of Mapai and then as the first secretary general of the newly formed LABOR PARTY. When Prime Minister LEVI ESHKOL died suddenly in early 1969, the seventy-one-year-old Meir assumed the post of premier at a time when Israel was brimming with confidence after defeating three Arab states in the 1967 WAR and capturing vast amounts of territory. She also inherited Eshkol's second National Unity government, although it broke up over a disagreement about a cease-fire with EGYPT in the WAR OF ATTRITION (1967–1970). Meir opposed a cease-fire and aggressively pursued the war. She continued in office with a coalition of the Alignment (Labor and MAPAM), the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY, and the Independent Liberals.

The major event of her administration was the 1973 War, which broke out on 6 October 1973 when Egypt and SYRIA coordinated attacks in the Sinai and Golan Heights to retake territories seized by Israel in 1967. After the fighting, the Agranat Inquiry Commission found that the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES and the government had erred seriously in their assessment of Arab intentions. Although Meir and the Labor Party won the 31 December 1973 elections, Meir resigned in 1974 in favor of YITZHAK RABIN. She died four years later.

Meir made a number of statements that reveal her attitude toward the Palestinian issue:

- “There were no such thing as Palestinians. When was there an independent Palestinian people with a Palestinian state? It was either southern Syria before the First World War, and then it was a Palestine including Jordan. It was not as though there was a Palestinian people in Palestine considering itself as a Palestinian people and we came and threw them out and took their country away from them. They did not exist.” (The Sunday Times [New York], 15 June 1969)
- “How can we return the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES? There is nobody to return them to.” (Various news reports, 8 March 1969)
- “Any one who speaks in favor of bringing the Arab REFUGEES back must also say how he expects to take the responsibility for it, if he is interested in the state of Israel. It is better that things are stated clearly and plainly: we shall not let this happen.” (Washington Post, 16 June 1969)
- “This country exists as the fulfillment of a promise made by God Himself. It would be ridiculous to ask it to account for its legitimacy.” (Le Monde, 15 October 1971)

Bibliography

- Eban, Abba. The Political Legacy of Golda Meir. Milwaukee: University of Wisconsin Press, 1995.
- Gibson, William. Golda: How to Turn a Phoenix into Ashes. New York: Atheneum, 1978.
- Meir, Golda. My Life. New York: G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 1974.
- On Golda Meir*. www.monabaker.com/quotes.htm.
- Syrkin, Marie. Golda Meir: Israel’s Leader. New York: G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 1969.
- Syrkin, Marie, ed. Golda Meir Speaks Out. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1973.

Mercaz HaRav Kook Yeshiva

Mercaz HaRav (The Rav Center), also known as Yeshivat Mercaz HaRav, is a Hardal yeshiva (for strictly Orthodox Jews who support the ideology of religious Zionism). Located in JERUSALEM, it is considered the flagship of national-religious yeshivas (Talmudic/rabbinic colleges) and has trained the settler movement’s leading rabbis as well as many yeshiva heads, city rabbis, and teachers in religious colleges and high schools. The school was central in shaping the evolution of religious ZIONISM. It is not a Hesder yeshiva; its students do not do regular military service, although some students do a much-shortened stint in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) when they are well into their twenties. The yeshiva was founded in 1924 by Rabbi AVRAHAM YITZHAK KOOK.

Today Mercaz HaRav Yeshiva is the focal point of a young generation drawn to the nationalist-religious vision of HaRav Kook. This movement encompasses thousands of pupils and students in high school yeshivot and yeshivot hesder (a yeshiva program that combines advanced Talmudic studies with military service in the IDF), pupils and students in the ulpanoth (intensive Judaic studies for girls) and michlaloith (girls’ Torah high schools and colleges), and members from all walks of the Hityashvuth (SETTLEMENT) movement.

The yeshiva has never been an “ivory tower” of religious or academic isolationism. The students and graduates of the Yeshiva have established a vast network of seminars in Judaism as well as institutions for Ba’alei Teshuva (Jews who have returned to the fold of Orthodox Judaism, translated idiomatically as “one who has done repentance”), whose programs are open to the general public throughout the country, throughout the year. Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook’s son, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook (1891–1982), took up the position of Rosh Yeshiva (the title given to the dean of a Talmudic academy) several years after the death of his father. When Zvi Yehuda died, Rabbi Avraham Shapira took the position and led the institution until his death in 2007. His son, Rabbi Yaakov Shapira, was his successor. Today, the Yeshiva has about 500 students, including 200 students in the Yeshiva’s kollel (postgraduate division).

Notable alumni include a number of Knesset members, community leaders, and settler rabbis.

Bibliography

- Agus, Jacob B. Banner of Jerusalem: The Life, Times, and Thought of Abraham Isaac Kook, the Late Chief Rabbi of Palestine. New York: Bloch Publishing, 1946.
- Goldberg, Jeffrey. “Among the Settlers: Will They Destroy Israel?” The New Yorker. 31 May 2004.
- Kook, Chief Rabbi Abraham Isaac. Lights of Return. New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1978.

Lewis, Justin Harley. 1979. Vision of Redemption: The Educational Philosophy of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook in Historical Perspective. London: Four Quarters Press, 1979.

Meretz Party

The Meretz (Vitality) Party was a left-leaning, secular Zionist party created by SHULAMIT ALONI, Yossi Sarid, and others in 1992 from three existing political parties—left-wing MAPAM, center-socialist RATZ, and centrist SHINUI—and led by Sarid. Although its positions on Palestinians were often ambiguous, in general Meretz favored a Palestinian state but was committed to a unified JERUSALEM under Israeli sovereignty. In 1992 Meretz won twelve seats in the Knesset and joined the LABOR PARTY coalition of YITZHAK RABIN, together with the MIZRAHI Orthodox SHAS Party—a decision that contributed greatly to its eventual disintegration. Previously, in the 1996 ELECTIONS, Meretz garnered nine seats; in 1999, ten; and in 2003 it received only six seats and ceased to exist, joining SHAHAR to form YACHAD.

Meretz's decline can be traced to when, at its peak during the Rabin years, politically it should have been focused on the peace process—the number of Israeli settlers in the Occupied Territories grew by 49 percent, from 101,000 to 150,000 in this period. Instead Meretz immersed itself in a secular crusade against Shas's religiosity (demanding control of the education portfolio among other issues). Additionally, when the Rabin government DEPORTED 415 Palestinians in December 1992, Meretz cabinet member Aloni voted for this collective punishment.

Bibliography

- Behar, Moshe. "The Peace Process and Israeli Domestic Politics in the 1990s." Brecht Forum. n.d. www.brechtforum.org/highlights/the%20peace%20process%20and%20israeli%20domestic%20politics%20in%20the%201990s.htm.
- Edmunds, June. The Left and Israel: Party-Policy Change and Internal Democracy. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Rosenthal, Donna. The Israelis: Ordinary People in an Extraordinary Land. New York: The Free Press, 2003.
- Yoffe, Emily. "Is There Any Relation between Marty Peretz and the Meretz Party?" No Relation. 10 (2 January 2001).

Meretz-Yahad Party

See YACHAD

Meshal, Khalid (1956–)

Khalid Meshal, the top HAMAS political official, was the target of a failed Israeli ASSASSINATION attempt on 25 September 1997 on the streets of Amman, JORDAN. Born into a middle-class Palestinian family in the village of Slowan near Ramallah in the WEST BANK, after the Israeli OCCUPATION in 1967, Meshal moved with his family to KUWAIT, where his father was the imam of a local mosque. In his teens he joined the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD and led the Islamic Palestinian student movement in Kuwait University, where he graduated with a B.A. in physics. Unlike present-day Kuwait, in the 1970s the country seethed with Arab nationalism and pro-Palestine sentiments and activities. Until he left Kuwait for Jordan after the first GULF WAR in 1991, Meshal worked as a physics teacher. In Amman he joined the politburo of Hamas, an organization he had helped found when he was thirty-one, and was elected its head in 1996.

The assassination attempt on Meshal occurred in September 1997 when BENJAMIN NETANYAHU was Israeli prime minister. Although an Israeli commission of inquiry found that Netanyahu had no involvement with the operation, it is likely that the prime minister was deeply involved and made all the major decisions. Two days before the assassination attempt, Israel received a message from Hamas offering a ten-year cease-fire in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and an end to Jewish SETTLEMENTS. Netanyahu claims he only got this important message after the botched assassination.

Meshal's increased popularity following the 1997 attempt on his life proved embarrassing for the Jordanian authorities, who were increasingly friendly with Israel, and he was forced to leave Amman, along with other Hamas leaders. After Meshal left Jordan he relocated in Qatar, where he resumed his activities until he finally moved to SYRIA, and Damascus has been his base of operations most of the time since then.

Following Israel's assassination of SHEIKH AHMAD YASIN and his successor Dr. ABD AL-AZIZ RANTISI in 2004, Meshal became the top leader in Hamas. Initially a hard-line rejectionist, in recent years he has moderated his position considerably.

On 17 March 2005, at a conference in Cairo attended by thirteen Palestinian factions as well as by the deputy Syrian foreign minister, the Cairo Declaration was issued, which integrated Hamas into the Palestinian political system and marked the movement's clear ascent. Since then the Egyptian media has adopted a particular interest in Meshal, who was the first Hamas leader given the opportunity to appear on both state-run and private Egyptian television channels—with all the incumbent associations of status and official approval.

On 13 February 2006, Meshal declared that Hamas would end the ARMED STRUGGLE against Israel if Israel withdrew to its pre-1967 borders and recognized Palestinian rights such as the right of return. He reaffirmed this stance in a 5 March 2008 interview with Al-Jazeera, citing Hamas's signing of the 2005 Cairo Declaration and the National Reconciliation Document, and denied any rejectionist stance. Meshal met with former US president JIMMY CARTER on 21 April 2008 and reached an agreement that Hamas would respect the creation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip areas seized by Israel in the 1967 WAR, provided that such a state is ratified by the Palestinian people in a referendum. Hamas later announced it would offer Israel a ten-year hudna (truce) if it returned to its 1967 borders and recognized the "right of return" of all Palestinian refugees. Israel did not respond to the offer.

See also HAMAS; MOSSAD

Bibliography

- BBC News. "Netanyahu Cleared of Failed Assassination." Dispatches. 16 February 1998.
- Canadian Encyclopedia. "Canadian Passport Abuse." n.d. www.canadianencyclopedia.ca/index.cfm?PgNm=TCE&PARAMS=M1ARTM0011418.
- Gellman, Barlon. "Botched Assassination by Israel Gives New Life to Hamas." Washington Post. 6 October 1997.
- Hider, James. "Jimmy Carter Meets Hamas Chief Khaled Meshal in Syria." The Times. (London). 19 April 2008.
- Howeidy, Amira. "Khaled Meshal: Warrior at Rest." Al-Ahram (Cairo weekly). 7–13 April 2005.
- Kaplan, Eban. "Profile of Khaled Meshal (aka Khalid Meshaal, Khaleed Mash'al)." Council on Foreign Relations. 13 July 2006.
- Lucas, Scott. "Hamas' Khalid Meshal on Relations with Israel and the US." Enduring America. 26 March 2009. <http://enduringamerica.com/2009/03/26/hamas-khalid-meshaal-on-relations-with-israel-us/>.
- Margolis, Eric. "Mission Implausible: State-sponsored Assassination Is a Tricky, Unpredictable Business." Mid-East Realities. 21 October 1997. www.middleeast.org/archives/mer10-19-97.htm.
- Meshal, Khalid. "Interview." Al-Jazeera (English). 5 March 2008.

———. "Interview." Nezavisimaya Gazeta (Moscow). 13 February 2006. Provided by Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly. Doc. 10882. 10 April 2006. <http://74.125.113.132/search?q=cache:PHm5I9DEskIJ:assembly.coe.int/Main.asp%3Flink%3D/ Documents/WorkingDocs/Doc06/EDOC10882.htm+13+February+2006,+Meshal+declared+that+Hamas+&cd=7&hl=en&ct=clnk&gl=ca>.

———. "Meshaal Delivers Speech on Obama's Position on Peace Process." Damascus. Reprinted in English on Conflicts Forum. 25 June 2009. <http://conflictsforum.org/2009/meshaal-delivers-speech-on-obamas-position-on-peace-process/>.

Ostrovsky, Victor. "Bungled Amman Assassination Plot Exposes Rift within Israeli Government over Peace Negotiations." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. December 1997.

Usher, Graham. "The Calm before the Storm?" Al-Ahram. 24–30 March 2005.

Metropolitan Jerusalem Plan, 1995

In 1995 an Israeli interministerial committee finalized a new large-scale development plan for some 40 percent of the WEST BANK and an equal percentage of its Palestinian residents. The Metropolitan Jerusalem Plan significantly enlarged the scale of previous Israeli planning efforts for the JERUSALEM region (see Map 31).

The plan was promulgated by the government of YITZHAK RABIN after the signing of the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), which established a framework for ending the OCCUPATION of the West Bank and GAZA, including Jerusalem. The Metropolitan Jerusalem Plan, however, supports little territorial compromise with Palestinians and even less negotiation between Israel and the Palestinians concerning its implementation. This plan appears to compromise any prospects for Palestinian socioeconomic progress in the core area of Jerusalem, because it essentially severs the West Bank in half from JERICHO to Jerusalem with SETTLEMENTS, ROADS, and INFRASTRUCTURE—all of which precludes a territorially contiguous Palestinian state.

The Metropolitan Jerusalem Plan represents a logical extension of earlier plans, which used East Jerusalem as a fulcrum to tie together far-flung settlements and extend Israeli sovereignty over ever greater areas of the West Bank. The outer circle of metropolitan Jerusalem includes a group of large, widely dispersed, yet strategically positioned settlements located across the territory of the West Bank. Bypass roads connect the settlements to Israel proper through the settlement of Tsur Hadassah and on to the town of Bet Shemesh (which is within the Green Line between Israel and the West Bank). As of 2006, Tel Aviv had not determined definitively which settlements would be included in the Metropolitan Plan, but the following seem certain to be part of the arrangement: Kiryat Sefer (northwest of Jerusalem along the Green Line and near the centrally located settlement of Modi'in with 34,500 residents), Beit El (north of Jerusalem on the northern outskirts of Ramallah, with 3,570), MA'ALE ADUMIM (due east of Jerusalem, close to the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY extending almost to Jericho, 33,000), Efrata (southwest of Ma'ale Adumim, 8,606), Betar Illit (west of Efrata, 29,000), and the entire Etzion Bloc (with some 40,000 settlers). The future of the Palestinian towns of BETHLEHEM, Beit Sahur, and Beit Jala, now ringed by the settlements of HAR HOMA, Gilo, Betar Illit, the Etzion Bloc, and Efrata, is highly precarious.

Map 31. Expanded Metropolitan Jerusalem, 2006

In conceiving and implementing this master plan Israel has several goals, including to place as much West Bank territory as possible under Israeli sovereignty, to connect the settlements of metropolitan Jerusalem with each other through bypass roads and numerous smaller settlements, and to link them to East Jerusalem and to Israel proper. As a result Israeli citizens will populate sovereign Israeli settlements throughout the West Bank, all interconnected through infrastructure and military installations and subject only to the authority of the Israeli government. It will fragment Palestinian territory into isolated, disarticulated BANTUSTANS, which, in reality, is not all that different from the status quo.

See also GREATER JERUSALEM; JERUSALEM

Bibliography

- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- de Jong, Jan. Greater Jerusalem: Israel's "Greater Jerusalem" Engulfs the West Bank's Core. Special Report. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, 1997.
- Ginbar, Yuval. On the Way to Annexation: Human Rights Violations Resulting from the Establishment and Expansion of Ma'ale Adumim Settlement. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1999.

- Halper, Jeff. "The Three Jerusalems and Their Role on the Occupation." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 15 (2002). www.fromoccupiedpalestine.org/node/456.
- Hamzeh-Muhaisen, Muna. "Preempting Jerusalem." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 3 (1999).
- Jerusalem Watch. Metropolitan and Greater Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Watch (a joint effort between the Palestinian Non-governmental Organization Network) and the Norwegian Association of NGOs for Palestine [Fellesutvalget for Palestina], and Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment—LAW, 2000.
- Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs. "Palestinian and Israeli Neighborhoods in 'Metropolitan' Jerusalem, 2000." Map. Ramallah, West Bank: PASSIA, 2000.

Middle East and North African Economic Conferences

During the OSLO PROCESS (1993–2000) and the improvement in Israeli-Arab state relations after the signing of the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (1993) between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, US president BILL CLINTON believed that the environment favored regional economic integration and helped convene the Middle East and North Africa (MENA) Economic Summit. Indeed, such economic cooperation had been the animating vision behind Israeli prime minister SHIMON PERES's efforts to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The MENA project was undertaken to a considerable extent in response to Israel's interest in attaining formal peace treaties with the Arab states and, more importantly, expanding its markets across the Arab world, which was considered a means to ensure regional stability.

The first MENA Economic Summit, held in Casablanca from 30 October to 1 November 1994, was cochaired by the UNITED STATES and RUSSIAN FEDERATION presidents with representatives from sixty-four countries, including Israel, for which it was both a major diplomatic and an economic breakthrough. The declaration signed by all sixty-four countries in Casablanca underscored the importance of solid economic growth and measurable improvement of the lives and security of peoples in the region and stressed the need to reinforce the achievements made in the OSLO ACCORDS. Participants emphasized the importance of increased cooperation between governments and business communities and started measures to lift the ARAB LEAGUE embargo against Israel. The participants also decided to create a Middle East and North Africa Development Bank and a Regional Chamber of Commerce.

The second MENA Summit, again chaired by the US and Russian presidents and supported and endorsed by the EUROPEAN UNION, Canada, and Japan, took place in Amman, JORDAN, from 29 to 31 October 1995 and occurred in the same positive atmosphere as the first. To supplement the institutions proposed in Casablanca it was decided to set up a permanent regional economic organization—a secretariat.

The third MENA SUMMIT took place in Cairo from 12 to 15 November 1996, chaired again by the US and Russian presidents. Because Israeli prime minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU had essentially frozen the Oslo Process, it was downgraded from a “summit” to a “conference,” and Israel was no longer the focal point of the event. The declaration adopted at the end of the conference underlined the principle that regional economic cooperation could take place only if there was a just peace for the Palestinians. Despite the concern by the Arab states about the freezing of the peace process, the United States announced that the Middle East and North Africa Development Bank would become operational by the end of 1997.

The fourth MENA SUMMIT took place in Doha (Qatar) from 16 to 18 November 1997. Despite extensive US pressure, many Arab countries did not attend. Arab participants included Djibouti, Jordan, KUWAIT, Mauritania, Oman, Qatar, Tunisia, and Yemen. However, the conference was boycotted by Algeria, Bahrain, EGYPT, LEBANON, Morocco, the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, SAUDI ARABIA, SYRIA, and the United Arab Emirates, all of whom had linked their participation in MENA to progress in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. (IRAQ, Libya, Somalia, and Sudan had not been invited.) No progress was made on implementing the Development Bank or on promoting direct economic and trade cooperation between Israel and the Arab states.

Since November 1997 no MENA summits have taken place, and the fate of the secretariat, the Development Bank, and the entire initiative remains unclear. From an economic point of view the conferences successfully encouraged some joint ventures and projects, but their political objectives have been unrealized.

Bibliography

- Bodansky, Yossef. “Peres and the New Middle East.” Houston, TX: Freeman Center for Strategic Studies, 1995. www.freeman.org/m\_online/dec95/dec95d.htm.
- Curtiss, Richard H. “A Win for Egypt, Saudis and UAE, Qatar Breaks Even, U.S. and Israel Lose.” Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. January–February 1998.
- European Institute for Research on Mediterranean and Euro-Arab Cooperation. “MENA Summits and Conferences.” Brussels, 2003.
- MacKinnon, Colin. “The Party’s Over for Israeli Economic Integration into the Middle East.” Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. January–February 1998.
- Peres, Shimon, with Arye Naor. The New Middle East. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.
- Pipes, Daniel. “The Vision of Shimon Peres.” Middle East Forum Wire. 23 May 1994.
- Yadgar, Yaacov. “A Myth of Peace: ‘The Vision of the New Middle East’ and Its Transformations in the Israeli Political and Public Spheres.” Journal of Peace Research. 43:3 (2006).

Middle East Forum

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

Middle East Media Research Institute

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

Militarism, Israel

See ISRAELI MILITARISM

Militarism and Armed Struggle, Palestinian

See ARMED STRUGGLE

Military Courts

See ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Milkart Protocols, 1973

The Milkart Protocols, an agreement negotiated between LEBANON and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) banning the presence of Palestinian guerrillas in certain areas and prohibiting their use of medium and heavy weaponry in Lebanon, were signed on 17 May 1973. The Protocols were negotiated after the PLO had moved its base from JORDAN to Lebanon following BLACK SEPTEMBER (Jordan's war with Palestinian guerrillas, in which some 2,500 Palestinians were killed). PLO strikes on Israel across the Lebanese border had provoked massive Israeli reprisals against towns and villages in southern Lebanon, enraging the Lebanese. After MOSSAD agents penetrated Beirut and assassinated three senior PLO leaders, resulting in two weeks of intense fighting between the PLO and the Lebanese army and three broken cease-fires, diplomatic intervention was necessitated.

The Protocols were essentially based on the 1969 CAIRO AGREEMENT, in which the PLO agreed to maintain internal discipline among the Palestinians in Lebanon in exchange for the right to govern the REFUGEE camps. The Protocols precisely spelled out the boundaries for guerrilla forays, and enjoined the guerrillas to self-restraint. They included the following stipulations:

- Self-defense would be entrusted to a local militia drawn from residents, equipped with individual light arms only.
- A Lebanese Internal Security Forces post would be established near each refugee camp.
- In the border area with Israel the guerrillas were prohibited from deploying in the western sector, near villages, or in close proximity to the Israeli frontier.
- Military operations against Israel were to be frozen by virtue of earlier decisions of the Arab Defense Council, and Lebanon would not be used to launch external operations.
- Military training would occur only at agreed-upon locations outside the camps, and all non-Arab guerrillas were to leave Lebanon.

In addition the PLO reaffirmed that its official headquarters was in Damascus, SYRIA, and agreed not to establish a radio station or to "entangle" Lebanon in its informational activities.

In accordance with their agreement, and following additional meetings at the Kuwaiti and Egyptian embassies later that month, the PLO and Lebanese army established a Higher Coordinating Committee to oversee implementation of the Milkart Protocols. After fighting that had left more than a hundred dead and twice as many wounded, a semblance of calm returned to Beirut. The tensions that had sparked the abortive confrontation, however, remained rife and erupted again later. Moreover, in the end the Milkart Protocols may have made the situation worse by prompting certain Lebanese factions, particularly among the CHRISTIAN sects, to create their own militias, eventually leading to the Lebanese Civil War (1975–1990).

See also LEBANON

Bibliography

- Abu-Khalil, Asad. "Internal Contradictions in the PFLP: Decision Making and Policy Orientation." Middle East Journal. 41:3 (1987).
- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Cobban, Helena. The Making of Modern Lebanon. London: Hutchinson, 1985.
- Faris, Hani. "Lebanon and the Palestinians: Brotherhood or Fratricide." Arab Studies Quarterly. 3:4 (1981).
- Hudson, Michael C. "Developments and Setbacks in the Palestinian Resistance Movement, 1967–1971." Journal of Palestine Studies. 1:3 (1972).
- . "Fedayeen Are Forcing Lebanon's Hand." Middle East. 10:1 (1970).
- Khalidi, Walid. Conflict and Violence in Lebanon. Cambridge, MA: Harvard Center for International Affairs, 1979.
- Owen, Roger, ed. Essays on the Crisis in Lebanon. London: Ithaca Press, 1976.
- Petran, Tabitha. The Struggle over Lebanon. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1987.

Miller, Aaron David (1950–)

Aaron David Miller worked at the US Department of State for two decades as an adviser to six secretaries of state, in which capacity he helped formulate UNITED STATES policy on the Middle East and the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli peace process. During the Clinton administration he served as the senior adviser for Arab-Israeli negotiations throughout the OSLO PROCESS and was one of the most influential decisionmakers in Washington.

Miller received his Ph.D. in US diplomatic and Middle East history from the University of Michigan in 1977. During 1982 and 1983 he was a fellow of the Council on Foreign Relations and a resident scholar at the Georgetown Center for Strategic and International Studies. In 1984 he served a temporary tour at the US Embassy in Amman, JORDAN. In 1998 Miller was appointed by President BILL CLINTON to serve on the US HOLOCAUST Memorial Council. He has written three books on the Middle East and has lectured widely at universities and Middle East symposia across the country. In January 2003 Miller became president of Seeds of Peace, a program focused on bringing Arab and Israeli teenagers together.

Washington's role in the failed Oslo Process and in particular at CAMP DAVID has been much criticized. Miller, together with MARTIN INDYK and DENNIS ROSS, made and implemented US policy, but to this point Miller is the only former player critical of US diplomacy in that period. In May 2005, in an op-ed article in the Washington Post, Miller wrote: "For far too long, many American officials involved in Arab-Israeli peacemaking, myself included, have acted as Israel's attorney, catering and coordinating with the Israelis at the expense of successful peace negotiations. . . .

"In fact, the Arabs may well understand something we have forgotten. When we have used our diplomacy wisely and functioned as advocates and lawyers for both sides, we have succeeded. . . . Unfortunately, too often we lose sight of the need to be advocates for both Arabs and Israelis. The most recent example of this was the Clinton administration's effort in 1999–2000 to broker final deals between Israel, SYRIA and the Palestinians.

"With the best of motives and intentions, we listened to and followed Israel's lead without critically examining what that would mean for our own interests, for those on the Arab side and for the overall success of the negotiations. The 'no surprises' policy, under which we had to run everything by Israel first, stripped our policy of the independence and flexibility required for serious peacemaking. If we couldn't put proposals on the table without checking with the Israelis first and refused to push back when they said no, how effective could our mediation be? Far too often, particularly when it came to Israeli-Palestinian diplomacy, our departure point was not what was needed to reach an agreement acceptable to both sides but what would pass with only one—Israel. . . .

"We should have resisted [Israeli prime minister EHUD] BARAK's pressure to go for a make-or-break summit and then blame the Palestinians when it failed. What we ended up doing was advocating Israel's positions before, during and after the summit. . . . And one lesson is that there should be no inherent contradiction between our special relationship with Israel and our capacity to be an effective broker in Arab-Israeli negotiations. We can still be Israel's close friend and work with Israelis and Palestinians to ensure that the needs of both sides are met."

Bibliography

- Christison, Kathleen "Anatomy of a Frame-Up: Camp David Redux." Counterpunch. 15 August 2005.
- Malley, Robert, and Aaron David Miller. "For Israel and Hamas, a Case for Accommodation." Washington Post. 15 May 2006.
- Miller, Aaron David. The Arab States and the Palestine Question: Between Ideology and Self-Interest. New York: Praeger, 1986.
- . "Israel's Lawyer." Washington Post. 23 May 2005.
- . The PLO: The Politics of Survival. New York: Praeger, 1983.
- . Search for Security: Saudi Arabian Oil and American Foreign Policy, 1939–1948. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980.
- Swisher, Clayton E. The Truth about Camp David: The Untold Story about the Collapse of the Middle East Peace Process. New York: Thunder's Mouth/Nation Books, 2004.

Mitchell, George John (1933–)

Former US senator George Mitchell was named by President Barack Obama in 2009 as special envoy for Arab-Israeli affairs. In 2000, he headed a fact-finding commission that investigated the causes of the recent outbreak of Israeli-Palestinian violence and made recommendations to lessen tensions and resume the peace process. Previously, Mitchell had been a prominent Maine attorney, Democratic Party activist, and US district judge before being appointed to the US Senate in 1980 following President JIMMY CARTER's selection of Maine senator Edmund Muskie to be his secretary of state, which left the Maine seat empty. Mitchell was subsequently elected to two full terms, quickly rising in the ranks to serve as majority leader from 1989 to 1995. He was raised in a blue-collar family in Waterville, Maine, and his mother was a textile worker who had emigrated from LEBANON as a young woman.

Although he was one of the most prominent Arab Americans in politics, Mitchell rarely openly embraced his Arab heritage. As a senator he accepted large amounts of campaign contributions from right-wing political action committees that supported Israeli policies and was a strong proponent of unconditional military and economic aid to the rightist Israeli government of YITZHAK SHAMIR. Mitchell criticized Secretary of State

JAMES BAKER for characterizing the Jewish SETTLEMENTS ringing eastern JERUSALEM on lands seized by Israeli forces in the 1967 WAR as part of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Mitchell effectively argued that the UNITED STATES should recognize Israel's unilateral annexation of a part of the WEST BANK, in contravention of INTERNATIONAL LAW and a series of UN Security Council resolutions.

Following his retirement from the Senate in 1995, Mitchell led the commission that oversaw the Northern Ireland peace process and played an important role as a mediator in negotiations between Catholic and Protestant leaders that produced the Good Friday Accords of 1998. In an analysis with potential relevance to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Mitchell argued that the peace process succeeded in Northern Ireland because of the recognition that all interested parties had to be at the table and could not be excluded because they engaged in TERRORISM; that while insisting upon an end to the violence, it was not necessary to demand full disarmament; and that, while insisting upon peaceful means, one cannot ask a people to give up on their dreams.

Mitchell subsequently served on a number of corporate boards and bipartisan commissions, and in academic positions.

In the fall of 2000 the UN General Assembly created a commission charged with investigating the causes of and possible solutions to the outbreak of Israeli-Palestinian violence in what came to be known as the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. As a means of countering the UN commission, which was expected to stress Israel's obligations under international humanitarian law, President BILL CLINTON appointed a US-led team to put forward its own report. After a US-convened security conference in SHARM AL-SHAYKH (EGYPT), Clinton announced the formation of a fact-finding committee to be led by Mitchell. Other members of the commission included former US senator Warren Rudman, also a strong supporter of Israel's earlier right-wing governments, as well as a former president of TURKEY, Suleyman Demirel, a strong ally of Israel. The three outnumbered the more moderate commission members—NORWAY foreign minister Thorbjorn Jagland and EUROPEAN UNION representative Javier Solana.

The United States determined that the Sharm al-Shaykh Fact-Finding Committee, better known as the Mitchell Commission, would operate primarily out of Washington and that its investigations in Israel and the Occupied Territories would be strictly limited. The commission's report, released at the end of April 2001, held neither the Israelis nor the Palestinians solely responsible for the breakdown of the peace process or for the ongoing violence. Instead the report called for a cease-fire, in particular for the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) to "make clear through concrete action to Palestinians and Israelis alike that terrorism is reprehensible and unacceptable and that the PNA will make a 100 percent effort to prevent terrorist operations and to punish perpetrators." It urged Israel to "ensure that the [ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES] adopt and enforce policies and procedures encouraging non-lethal responses to unarmed demonstrators with a view to minimizing casualties and friction between the two communities."

The report noted that the violence was not solely a result of then-opposition leader ARIEL SHARON's provocative visit to an Islamic holy site in occupied East JERUSALEM the previous autumn, nor was it part of a Palestinian plan to launch a violent struggle. The uprising, it stated, was rooted in Palestinian frustration over the failure of the peace process to return Palestinian LAND seized for settlements and was fueled by unnecessarily violent responses by both sides early in the fighting. Yet when the report failed to call for an international force to separate the sides, it underscored the commission's unwillingness to support decisive steps necessary to curb further bloodshed. Although the Mitchell Commission Report did not call for Israel to withdraw from its illegal settlements, as required under UN Security Council Resolutions 446, 452, 465, and 471, it did call for a "freeze on all settlement activity including the 'natural growth' of existing settlements," emphasizing that "a cessation of Palestinian-Israeli violence will be particularly hard to sustain unless the Government of Israel freezes all settlement activity."

To minimize civilian casualties on both sides, the report called on the PNA to prevent gunmen from firing at Israeli military and civilian areas from Palestinian populated areas. It also called on Israel to lift its CLOSURES of Palestinian population centers, transfer all the tax revenues it owed to the PNA, and permit Palestinians formerly employed in Israel to return to their work. The Mitchell Commission Report also emphasized that Israeli security forces and settlers needed to "refrain from the destruction of homes and ROADS, as well as trees and other agricultural property in Palestinian areas,” and that the PNA should “renew cooperation with Israeli security agencies to ensure, to the maximum extent possible, that Palestinian workers employed within Israel are fully vetted and free of connections to organizations and individuals engaged in terrorism.”

Although formally accepting the Mitchell Commission Report, the succeeding administration of GEORGE W. BUSH, as well as Congress, stressed the need for a cease-fire from the Palestinian side, effectively ignoring the report’s insistence on a settlement freeze and other Israeli responsibilities.

On 22 January 2009, President Obama announced Mitchell’s selection as special envoy for Arab-Israeli affairs at a public forum at the State Department. Choosing the relatively moderate former Senate majority leader over more hawkish candidates for the post gave hope among some analysts that Mitchell’s appointment could signal that the incoming administration would pursue a more evenhanded approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Bibliography

- Benvenisti, Meron. “A Committee of Moral Disgust.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 14 December 2000.
- Pierce, Charles P. “Does George Mitchell Have the Juice?” The Boston Globe. 8 October 2006.
- Sharm El-Sheikh Fact-Finding Committee. Sharm El-Sheikh Fact-Finding Committee Report: Submitted to the Honorable George W. Bush. United States Department of State, 30 April 2001. www.state.gov/p/nea/rls/rpt/3060.htm.

—Stephen Zunes

Mixed Armistice Commissions

The 1949 ARMISTICE AGREEMENTS, a set of truces between Israel and its neighbors (EGYPT, JORDAN, LEBANON, and SYRIA), ended the 1948 WAR and established the armistice lines with demilitarized zones (DMZs) between Israel and each Arab state. The Mixed Armistice Commissions (under the responsibility of the UN TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION) were established to monitor each state’s respect for the border, investigate complaints by the parties, and make regular reports to the UN Security Council.

After the signing of the armistices, the commissions condemned, at one time or another, all of the parties, except Jordan, for breaches of the truce. Egypt was sanctioned for keeping large military forces in the demilitarized ‘Uja al-Hafeer area. Syria was faulted for launching artillery attacks against Israeli forces and Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the demilitarized zone adjacent to the Golan Heights. However, the Mixed Armistice Commissions condemned Israel for its actions more frequently than any Arab state, as did the UNITED NATIONS, where complaints against Israel often ended up.

The Commissions complained that Israel had reinforced the demilitarized Mount Scopus enclave in JERUSALEM with armed soldiers disguised as policemen; sent military forces into Jordanian territory several times to retaliate for INFILTRATIONS by Palestinians, with considerable loss of life and destruction of property; frequently shelled areas in Egypt—especially the GAZA STRIP—typically with significant material and human loss; and diverted WATER from Syrian and Jordanian sources.

In an interview that created a stir in Israel after its belated publication, Defense Minister MOSHE DAYAN explained the nature of the provocations: “I know how at least 80 percent of all of the incidents there [in the DMZs] started. In my opinion, more than 80 percent, but let’s speak about 80 percent. It would go like this: we would send a tractor to plow in the demilitarized area and we would know ahead of time that the Syrians would start shooting. If they did not start shooting, we would inform the tractor to progress farther, until the Syrians, in the end, would get nervous and would shoot. And then we would use guns, and later, even the air force, and that is how it went. We thought that we could change the lines of the cease-fire accords by military actions that were less than a war. That is, to seize some territory and hold it until the enemy despairs and gives it to us.”

Bibliography

- Blechman, Barry M. “The Impact of Israel’s Reprisals on Behavior of the Bordering Arab Nations Directed at Israel.” The Journal of Conflict Resolution. 16:2 (1972).
- Bull, General Odd. War and Peace in the Middle East. London: Leo Cooper, 1973.
- Burns, Lieutenant-General E. L. M. Between Arab and Israeli. London: George G. Harrap and Co., 1962.
- Hutchison, E. H. Violent Truce: A Military Observer Looks at the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1951–1955. New York: Devin-Adair Company, 1956.

- Morris, Benny. Israel's Border Wars, 1949–1956. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Neff, Donald. "Israel-Syria: Conflict at the Jordan River, 1949–1967." Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:4 (1994).
- Rogan, Eugene, and Avi Shlaim, eds. The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Rokach, Livia. Israel's Sacred Terrorism, 3rd ed. Belmont, MA: AAUG Press Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1986.
- Van Horn, General Carl. Soldiering for Peace. New York: David McKay, 1967.

Mizrachi

Mizrachi (Merkaz Ruchani or Religious Center) are religious or Orthodox Jews who support ZIONISM. Mizrachi is also the name of the religious Zionist organization founded in 1902 in Vilna, Lithuania, at a world conference of Religious Zionists. It operates a youth movement, Bnei Akiva, that was founded in 1929.

Mizrachi believe that the Torah should be at the center of Zionism and see Jewish nationalism as a means to achieve religious objectives. The Mizrachi party was the first official Religious Zionist party. RABBI AVRAHAM YITZHAK KOOK was the driving figure in the Religious Zionist Movement. Mizrachi had a separate trade union wing, founded in 1921, called HaPoel HaMizrachi, which represented religious Jews in the HISTADRUT labor federation and tried to attract religious LABOR Zionists.

In 1956, Mizrachi, HaPoel HaMizrachi, and other Religious Zionists formed the NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY (Mafdal) to advance the rights of religious Jews in Israel. The origins of post-1967 JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM, GREATER LAND OF ISRAEL MOVEMENT, and the GUSH EMUNIM reside in Mizrachi.

Bibliography

- Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

Mizrahi

Mizrahi Jews, sometimes referred to as Oriental Jews or Arab Jews, comprise both a distinct ethnic and socioeconomic sector in Israel. Ethnically, Mizrahim are Jews of Middle Eastern origin whose ancestors never left the Middle East and North Africa. Until the mass Russian immigration of the 1990s, Mizrahi Jews comprised as much as 70 percent of the population of Israel. Now, they are about half.

Mizrahim are distinct from ASHKENAZI Jews, whose roots lie in Europe and North America, and from SEPHARDIM, who originated in Sepharad (Spain and Portugal) and who were expelled from the Iberian Peninsula in 1492 or left during the Spanish Inquisition. After the expulsion many Sephardim fled to Middle Eastern and North African countries, where they merged with the Mizrahim and are indistinguishable today.

Because most Mizrahi Jews emigrated from their countries of birth just before or shortly after the creation of the state of Israel in 1948, they played virtually no role in the Zionist movement, in the development of the pre-state Yishuv, or in the multitude of military and political organizations that created the state. When the Mizrahim arrived, the Ashkenazi dominated all public and private institutions, including absorption centers where new migrants went for housing and employment. The Mizrahim did not speak modern Hebrew and had no personal connections to facilitate finding a desirable location within the country, a good house, or a well-paying job. As a result they came as second-class citizens, were treated as second-class citizens, and largely remain so to this day.

When the Mizrahim first arrived in Israel, they were moved into rudimentary and hastily erected tent cities and later to "development towns," which had a primitive infrastructure but were in the process of being developed, on Israel's farthest borders. Discrimination followed them at every turn—substandard housing, inferior educational opportunities, exclusion from professional employment in any sector, and high blue-collar unemployment. Today Mizrahim constitute a distinct majority in Israel's urban slums and among its poor in general.

Despite their origins the Mizrahim have a reputation for hard-line anti-Arab politics that stems from a variety of factors. Many Mizrahim feel pressured to deny their own Arabic heritage to show their loyalty to a state founded and defined by Ashkenazi Jews, who view Arabs as inferior. Because their culture and appearance forced them into the seam between the two nations, the Mizrahim had to prove their Jewishness and Israeli identity by adopting Ashkenazi nationalist views and symbols. AZMI BISHARA, an Arab-Israeli and Knesset member, described the situation thus: "The Ashkenazi has a clear stance as to the relationship with Palestinians: You are there, we are here. . . . but the Mizrahi resembles the Palestinian in looks, customs, dialect . . . it forces him to distinguish himself from the Arab . . . if the criterion for equality is nationalism, then they must prove their nationalism.”

Self-identity is another key issue in understanding Mizrahi anti-Palestinian attitudes. Self-hatred, derived from the attitudes of the Ashkenazim, became hate for the Arabs, who reflect the same culture (and physical attributes) that the Mizrahim are trying to disavow. Several studies have demonstrated a direct correlation between the cultural oppression of Mizrahi youth at school and their lack of tolerance for Palestinians.

The Ashkenazi elite also contributed to Mizrahim hostility toward the Palestinians by “divide and rule” policies. On the one hand, settling the Mizrahi in the development towns—in the front line of confrontation between Israel and the Arabs—taught them to hate and distrust the Palestinian REFUGEES who sought to return to their homes and LANDS lost in the 1948 WAR. At the same time, their location made them the most physically vulnerable of Israel’s citizens. When Palestinian INFILTRATION into Israel was an issue in the early 1950s, the state expected the Mizrahim to prevent the infiltrators’ passage, even with their bodies.

After the 1967 WAR the government’s massive colonization of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES has led many Mizrahim to move there, not for ideological reasons, but because there they can receive the services and benefits unavailable within Israel. This gives them a vested interest in continued Israeli OCCUPATION of the territories, as well as hostility to the Palestinians who want a state there. For many low-income Mizrahi Israelis with relatives in the SETTLEMENTS, support for the Israeli right wing and the Occupation becomes one of the few ways to ensure that their families’ basic needs are met.

The Mizrahim suffered from decades of discrimination and mistreatment by LABOR PARTY governments, and after the 1977 rise of the LIKUD they have become strongly inclined to align with rightist, even extreme, right-wing parties. These encourage them to despise Arabs even more and teach them that the whole land of Israel belongs by right exclusively to Jews. Moreover, many Mizrahim believe that peace efforts led by Labor and liberal movements are for Ashkenazi elites who care more about Palestinians than about poor and unemployed Israelis.

See also ASHKENAZI; SEPHARDI

Bibliography

- Abarjel, Reuven, and Smadar Lavie. “Another Act in the Mizrahi-Palestinian Tragedy.” Electronic Intifada. 24 July 2006. <http://www.electronicintifada.net/v2/article5174.html>.
- Austrian, Guy Izhak. “Mizrahim and Immigrants Face Poverty and Marginalization as Demographic Cannon Fodder.” World War 4 Report. 5 May 2004. <http://www.w4report.com/static/jews.html>.
- Bennis, Phyllis. “Interview of Phyllis Bennis by Max Elbaum: For Jews Only: Racism inside Israel.” Color-Lines. 15 December 2000. www.fromoccupiedpalestine.org/node/584.
- Goldscheider, Calvin. “Creating a New Society: Immigration, Nation-building, and Ethnicity in Israel.” Harvard International Review. 20:2 (1998).
- Gruen, George E. The Other Refugees: Jews of the Arab World. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs, 1988.
- Hirschberg, Peter. “A Divided Nation: Israeli Arabs May Have the Vote, but They Still Feel Like Second Class Citizens.” New Statesman. 12 July 2004.
- Khazzoom, Loolwa. “Mizrahi: Paradox of Israel’s Oppressed Jews.” Jewish Multicultural Project, Berkeley, CA. n.d. <http://www.jmcponline.org>.
- Kim, Hannah. “Welfare State over the Green Line.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 25 May 2004.
- Komash, Sharon. “The Mizrahi-Palestinian Connection, Part II.” University for Peace and Conflict Monitor. 16 September 2005.
- Lefkowitz, Daniel. Words and Stones: The Politics of Language and Identity in Israel. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Lewin-Epstein, Noah, and Moshe Semyonov, eds. Stratification in Israel: Class, Ethnicity, and Gender. Raritan, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2004.
- Piterberg, Gabriel. “Domestic Orientalism: The Representation of ‘Oriental’ Jews in Zionist/Israeli Historiography.” British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies. 23:2 (1996).
- Rabeeya, David. “The Double Exodus and the Economic Plight of Sephardic Jews.” Sephardic Heritage Update. 145 (23 February 2005).
- Rosenblatt, Gary. “Despite Progress, Cultural Rift Still Exists in Israel.” The New York Jewish Week. 26 February 1999.
- Schattner, Marius. “Past Wounds, Future Fears: Challenge from Israel’s Sephardi Right.” Le Monde diplomatique. April 1999.
- Shalom-Chetrit, Sami. “Culture Identity and Borders.” Interview by Samia Dodin. Levantine Cultural Center. n.d.
- . “Mizrahi Politics in Israel: Between Integration and Alternative.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:4 (2000).
- . “Peace, Justice and the Mizrahi Accounting.” Alternative Information Center: News from Within. 14:2 (2003). <http://www.alternativenews.org>.

- . The Political History of the Mizrahim (Jews from the Muslim World) in Israel, from 1948 to 2003. Tel Aviv: Am Oved, 2004.
- Shalom-Chetrit, Sami, and Tikva Honig-Parnass. "Why Are Shas and the Mizrahim Supporters of the Right?" Between the Lines. Jerusalem. February 2003.
- Sheleg, Yair. "It Wasn't the DDT; It Was the Humiliation." Ha'arets. 14 October 2002.
- Shenhav, Yehouda. The Arab-Jews: Nationalism, Religion, and Ethnicity. Tel Aviv: Am Oved, 2003.
- . "Jews from Arab Countries and the Palestinian Right for Return: An Ethnic Community in Realms of National Memory." British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies, 29:1 (2002).
- . "The Truth about Jewish Assets in Iraq." The Scribe: Journal of Babylonian Jewry. 70 (1998).
- . "What Is There between the Mizrahi Issue and Palestinian Nationalism?" School for Peace Annual Review 1999–2001. Israel: The School for Peace (Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam), 2001.
- Shohat, Ella Habiba. "The Invention of the Mizrahim." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:1 (1999).
- . "Mizrahim in Israel: Zionism from the Standpoint of Its Jewish Victims." Social Text. Fall 1988.
- . "Rupture and Return: A Mizrahi Perspective on the Zionist Discourse." MIT Electronic Journal of Middle East Studies. 1 May 2001.
- Stasiulis, Daiva K., and Nira Yuval-Davis, eds. Unsettling Settler Societies: Articulations of Gender, Race, Ethnicity and Class. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 1995.
- Yiftachel, Oren. Ethnocracy: Land and Identity Politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.
- Zohar, Zion. Sephardic and Mizrahi Jewry: From the Golden Age of Spain to Modern Times. Toronto: York University Press, 2005.

Moked

Moked (Focus) Party, a leftist group, was established in 1972 as a parliamentary group in the Eighth Knesset. Composed of the Israel COMMUNIST Party and the Blue-Red Movement, it advocated a full withdrawal from the Palestinian territories conquered in 1967, the establishment of a Palestinian state, a reduction in Israel's dependence on the UNITED STATES, and a focus on internal economic and social issues. In the course of the Eighth Knesset, Moked changed its name to "Moked—for Peace and Socialist Change." In the Ninth Knesset the Israel Communist Party joined HADASH, and Moked joined the left camp of SHELLI.

Bibliography

- Edmunds, June. The Left and Israel: Party-Policy Change and Internal Democracy. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

Moledet Party

The Moledet (Homeland) Party is a right-wing Israeli political party that supports the TRANSFER of Palestinians as an integral part of a comprehensive peace plan between Jews and Arabs living in Israel. Moledet was established by REHAVAM ZE'EV, a retired Israeli general. After Ze'evi was murdered on 17 October 2001 in JERUSALEM by the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, the party was chaired by Knesset member BENYAMIN "BENNY" ELON.

Since its inception Moledet has been actively involved in Jewish SETTLEMENT and OUTPOST construction and in creating a high standard of living for the settlers. Because it believes that JORDAN should be the Palestinian homeland, Moledet opposes any Palestinian state in what it considers Eretz Yisrael. Moledet is also active in strengthening the Jewish presence in East Jerusalem.

Limor Lavnat, the Israeli education minister, ordered schools nationwide to observe the anniversary of Ze'evi's death—a decision that was considered by many to legitimize Moledet's principles. (www.moledet.org.il/english).

See also HERUT PARTY/NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY; TEKUMA

Bibliography

- Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Hass, Amira. "Threats of Enforced Mass Expulsion." Le Monde diplomatique. 19 February 2003.
- Maor, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2000.

Moreshet Avot

Moreshet Avot (Heritage of the Fathers) is an ultra-orthodox, far right political party that opposes any compromise with the Palestinians. Its leader, Rabbi Joseph Ba-Gad, served in the Knesset from 1992 to 1996. Ba-Gad is described as a colorful and flamboyant figure. The day before the January 2003 elections, he withdrew his party from the campaign. The party has been characterized by a continuing pattern of election-list discrepancies and platform shifts.

Bibliography

- Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

Morrison-Grady Plan, 1946

The Morrison-Grady Plan was the result of a second Anglo-American effort to find a solution to the Palestine problem. (The first was the ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY, 1945–1946.) Issued in early July 1946, the formal plan called for a unitary federal trusteeship in Palestine, a concept developed by Herbert Morrison, deputy prime minister of Britain, and Ambassador Henry Grady of the UNITED STATES.

The Morrison-Grady Plan proposed a Jewish province consisting of some 17 percent of the country and a Palestinian province containing some 40 percent, while JERUSALEM and the southern Negev (Naqab) desert would remain under British control. Additionally, Britain would maintain power over the entire trusteeship, even though each province would exercise self-rule. The plan also called for the immediate admission of 100,000 Jewish refugees but declared that further IMMIGRATION would be subject to the country's economic absorptive capacity.

Both Arab and Zionist leaders flatly rejected the plan. Zionists wanted a sovereign state with far more territory and unlimited immigration in perpetuity, while the Arabs objected to the arrival of 100,000 Jews and also wanted an independent state, not continued British control. On 22 July 1946, shortly after the Morrison-Grady Plan was issued, the militant Zionist group IRGUN bombed the KING DAVID HOTEL in Jerusalem, which was the British political and military headquarters in Palestine, killing ninety-one British, Jewish, and Arab employees. Nothing further came of the plan, and Great Britain turned the "Palestine problem" over to the UNITED NATIONS.

Bibliography

- Cohen, Michael. Palestine and the Great Powers, 1945–1948. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1982.
- Klieman, Aaron S., ed. U.S. Reactions to British Mandate. New York: Garland Publishers, 1991.
- Lewis, William, and Robert W. Stookey, eds. The End of the Palestine Mandate. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1986.
- Pappé, Ilan. Britain and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1948–51. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.
- Shepherd, Naomi. Ploughing Sand: British Rule in Palestine, 1917–1948. Piscataway, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2000.

Moscow

In relations with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and Israel, Moscow (the Soviet Union/Russia) has shifted back and forth between favoring one and the other Middle Eastern player, depending on its larger diplomatic interests in the Middle East and in the world as a whole. Initially it recognized and supported Israel from 1947 to 1949, but during most of the post–World War II Soviet period until the emergence of Soviet premier Mikhail Gorbachev in 1985, Moscow tended to back the Arabs (including the PLO by the late 1960s) in its conflict with Israel. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, however, Moscow's ties with Israel were generally far stronger than with the Palestinians, although by 2009, Russian-Israeli relations had cooled.

The Soviet Period

During the initial rise to power in Russia in 1917, the communist leadership under Lenin was strongly ANTI-ZIONIST, because it believed the Zionist movement's call for a Jewish state in Palestine diverted the attention of Jewish workers from world revolution. Because Britain, a major enemy of the Soviet Union during most of the interwar period, was fostering the growth of the Zionist community in Palestine (through the BALFOUR DECLARATION and the BRITISH MANDATE over Palestine), Moscow's antipathy to ZIONISM was reinforced. It was therefore surprising when the Soviet Union not only supported the UN partition of Palestine (UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 181) into a Jewish and an Arab state in 1947, but also gave Israel both diplomatic support and military aid (via Czechoslovakia) when the Arab states invaded Israel on 15 May 1948, an action Moscow severely condemned. Soviet support for Israel at that time was based on Moscow's perception that Israel was fighting against a pro-British bloc of Arab states that would, along with Britain, be weakened if Israel won.

In the latter part of the Stalin era (1950–1952), however, Soviet-Israeli relations deteriorated, in part because of increased ANTI-SEMITISM in the Soviet Union and in part because Israel backed the US (rather than Soviet) position during the Korean War. Although Moscow severed diplomatic relations with Israel in 1952, its relations with the Arab world or with the Palestinians did not improve until after Stalin's death in 1953. Although Stalin's successor, Georgi Malenkov, restored relations with Israel in 1953 as part of the post-Stalin "thaw" in Soviet foreign policy, there was a distinct tilt toward the Arabs, if not yet to the Palestinians, when Nikita Khrushchev rose to power in 1955. Moscow strongly condemned Israel, along with Britain and FRANCE, for the tripartite invasion of EGYPT in 1956. Following the 1964 ouster of Khrushchev, there was a pronounced tilt toward the Arab side of the Arab-Israeli conflict by Khrushchev's successor, Leonid Brezhnev, culminating in the complete severance of diplomatic relations with Israel during the 1967 WAR, although the Arab world criticized Moscow for not giving aid to the Arabs during that conflict.

Following the 1967 War and the sharp rise in the PLO's importance in the Arab world, Moscow paid increasing attention to that organization, while the new PLO head, YASIR ARAFAT, visited Moscow as part of an Egyptian delegation in 1968. The real change in Moscow's relations with the PLO came after the 1973 War for two reasons. First, in 1974 the Arabs themselves recognized the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, which gave the Palestinian organization increased legitimacy. Second, Egypt, Moscow's primary ally in the Arab world and the recipient of lavish Soviet economic and military aid and considerable diplomatic support, had begun to defect to the side of the UNITED STATES in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Therefore, in addition to cultivating SYRIA and IRAQ, the Soviet Union strengthened its ties with the PLO, allowing it to open an office in Moscow in the summer of 1974. Following the successful Israeli-Egyptian negotiations at CAMP DAVID in September 1978, Brezhnev explicitly supported the right of the Palestinians to create their own state.

However, there were problems in the Soviet-Palestinian relationship during the Brezhnev era (1964–1982). While the Soviets criticized the TERRORIST actions of the PLO, the Palestinians were deeply disappointed that Moscow did not provide more help in 1976 during the PLO's war against Syria in LEBANON or during Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon. The PLO and the Arab world also criticized Moscow for allowing tens of thousands of SOVIET JEWS to immigrate to Israel. Still, on balance the Brezhnev era can be seen as a positive one for Soviet-Palestinian relations, but this cannot be said about the next major Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, who came to power in 1985 and remained in office until the 1991 collapse of the Soviet Union.

Gorbachev radically changed Soviet policy toward both the Arab-Israeli conflict and the United States. Gorbachev planned to revitalize the moribund Soviet economy, and he realized, particularly after the Chernobyl nuclear disaster in 1986 and the sharp drop in oil prices in the same year, that an end to the Cold War was necessary for the Soviet economy to develop. This required, among other things, pulling Russian troops out of Afghanistan, sharply cutting the size of Soviet military forces in Eastern Europe, and changing Soviet behavior in the third world. One change was the reestablishment of diplomatic relations with Israel, first at the consular level in 1987–1988, followed by full diplomatic relations in 1991. Gorbachev also permitted hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews to emigrate to Israel in 1988–1991, which not only helped Israel in its DEMOGRAPHIC competition with the Palestinians but also greatly augmented Israel's scientific and military power, because many emigrating Soviet Jews had worked in the USSR military-industrial complex. Perhaps equally important was Gorbachev's admonition to both Syrian leader Hafez al-Assad and Arafat that their conflicts with Israel had to be settled politically and not by war—a signal to both Arab leaders that the time had come to negotiate with Israel and a not-so-subtle indication that they could not expect Soviet aid in a war against Israel.

Post-Soviet Russian Policy

The first four years after the collapse of the Soviet Union were a honeymoon period in the Russian-Israeli relationship. Cultural relations and trade boomed, Russian Jews continued to immigrate freely to Israel, and Moscow and Israel even cooperated on jointly producing military equipment for sale to third world countries. Moscow also warmly endorsed the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES between Israel and the PLO, which set the goal of establishing Palestinian self-government, and the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT between Israel and the PLO on self-rule in the WEST BANK, but Russia was so involved in its own economic problems that it effectively ceded leadership in Israeli-Arab and especially Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking to the United States. Under Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev, Moscow took an “even-handed” position on Israeli-Arab clashes. By 1996, however, the situation changed as Russia developed a more independent foreign policy under its new foreign minister, Yevgeny Primakov, and became more critical of Israel and more supportive of the Palestinians. For example, during the fighting in southern Lebanon in the spring of 1996, Primakov and Israeli prime minister SHIMON PERES openly clashed over Soviet support for the PLO. In addition, the Russian decision to build a nuclear reactor for IRAN further cooled relations with Israel, and Moscow was also critical of the policies of PERES's successor, BENJAMIN NETAN-YAHU, who expanded Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the WEST BANK.

However, by 1998, Russia's economic crisis effectively limited its freedom of action in the world, including in the Middle East. This situation continued until Yeltsin resigned as Russia's president and was succeeded in January 2000 by Vladimir Putin, who had two major goals for Russia. The first was to rebuild the country economically so it could again be a great power, and the second was to prevent the United States from dominating the world unilaterally. The latter goal, which Moscow pursued more vigorously after a brief period of cooperation with the United States after 9/11, involved a more active role for Russia in the Arab world and in the Arab-Israeli conflict. In 2002, Russia became part of the diplomatic QUARTET (with the United States, the United Nations, and the EUROPEAN UNION [EU]) seeking to bring about an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement.

Russia's new position involved a clear tilt to the Arab side of the Arab-Israeli conflict, which became more evident after Israel reoccupied West Bank cities following a series of Palestinian terrorist attacks in 2002. A secondary goal of Russia's pro-Arab sympathy was to weaken Arab support for the rebellion in Russia's Chechen Republic. Although favoring the Arabs, Putin still sought to maintain ties with Israel, periodically uttering soothing remarks about how much he valued the bilateral Russian-Israeli relationship and the role of Russian émigrés in Israel. Nonetheless, on issues of substance, such as the Russian construction of a nuclear reactor for Israel's arch-enemy Iran, Israel's construction of its BARRIER, and Arafat's role in achieving an Israeli-Palestinian settlement, Russia and Israel had opposing positions.

However, Putin had a valid point about the continuing strength of the bilateral Israeli-Russian relationship. Trade rose above $1 billion a year; cultural relations continued to develop; the two countries cooperated on military sales, including an AWACs airborne command plane to India; and 50,000 Russian tourists visited Israel in 2004.

Nonetheless, these areas of bilateral cooperation were increasingly overshadowed by diplomatic conflicts. Although Russia conditionally supported Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON's plan for ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA, it did so only as a step toward a full peace agreement. The increased coolness first became evident following Sharon's visit to Moscow in September 2003. Although Putin promised to incorporate Israeli concerns into a UN Security Council resolution codifying the Quartet's Middle East "ROAD MAP," Moscow introduced the resolution without including Israel's reservations. By 2002, Israel had refused to talk to PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) chairman Arafat, blaming him for the numerous terrorist attacks against Israel since the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in September 2000, a position supported by Israel's chief ally, the United States. In contrast Putin asserted that Arafat was still relevant to the political process. On Israel's Barrier, Russia voted with the majority of EU states on 22 October 2003 (and again on 20 July 2004) to support a (nonbinding) UN General Assembly resolution condemning Israel for building its security fence and called on Israel to comply with the majority decision of the International Court of Justice and tear it down.

By September 2004, however, a series of terrorist attacks that culminated in the seizure of a Russian school in Beslan, Chechnya, may have prompted Russian foreign minister Sergei Lavrov to accept an Israeli offer to cooperate in the area of counterterrorism. Still, any Israeli hopes that the security cooperation agreement would lead Russia to adopt a more pro-Israeli stand in the conflict with the Palestinians quickly faded. On 5 October 2004, just one month after the Israeli-Russian agreement, Moscow supported a UN Security Council resolution (vetoed by the United States) to condemn Israel for its military incursion into Gaza, which was designed to eliminate HAMAS fighters before the vote in the Israeli Knesset on Sharon's disengagement plan.

Initially, it appeared as if the death of Arafat in November 2004 would lead to an improvement in Russian-Israeli relations, because both Israel and Russia saw Arafat's successor, MAHMUD ABBAS, as a serious partner for peace. But, perhaps as a reaction to the Beslan school disaster and to anti-Russian developments in Ukraine, Putin sought to reassert Moscow's role as a major world power. Thus Russia finally completed an agreement to provide Iran with nuclear fuel and then protected Iran in the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) from EU and US criticism, despite Tehran's repeated violations of IAEA regulations and its call to "wipe Israel off the face of the earth." Putin also agreed to provide surface-to-air missiles to Syria, another major enemy of Israel. Given these acts, Russian-Israeli relations remained cool despite Putin's April 2005 visit to Israel. Meanwhile Russian-Palestinian relations were friendly but limited. Although Putin offered arms to Abbas during his April 2005 visit to the PNA, Moscow could do little to help the Palestinians achieve statehood. The United States remained the dominant factor in the diplomatic Quartet working to create a TWO-STATE SOLUTION to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and as Moscow's relations with Israel cooled, it could not seriously challenge US leadership in the peace process.

Moscow's policy continued in this direction for the rest of the decade. As part of his anti-US policy, Putin recognized Hamas following the Islamist organization's victory in the January 2006 PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL ELECTIONS—in the face of US attempts to isolate Hamas until it recognized Israel, renounced terrorism, and accepted previous Palestinian agreements with Israel. Putin justified this policy by asserting that engagement with Hamas would get the organization to make peace with Israel, although by the fall of 2009, he had not been successful. In addition, Moscow was caught off guard when Hamas seized power in Gaza in June 2007, and as the gap between Hamas and Fatah widened, Moscow sought, also without success, to bridge the divisions between the two Palestinian organizations.

In the case of Russian-Israeli relations, Moscow's bifurcated policy continued. On the one hand, it continued to provide military aid to Israel's enemies, Syria and Iran, while protecting Iran from serious UN Security Council sanctions because of its nuclear enrichment program. On the other hand, bilateral relations between Russia and Israel continued to improve. Trade rose to an annual rate of $3 billion, cultural relations continued to flourish as Russia established a cultural center in Tel Aviv, and Israel even agreed to sell Russia unmanned drones after Russia's poor performance in the Russia-Georgia war of August 2008.

In sum, Russia has been following a rather schizophrenic policy toward the Arab-Israeli conflict. It cultivates good bilateral ties with Israel, while also supporting Israel's enemies:

Hamas, Syria, and Iran. How long it will be able to continue such a policy remains to be seen.

Bibliography

- Freedman, Robert O. Moscow and the Middle East: Soviet Policy since the Invasion of Afghanistan. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- . Russia, Iran and the Nuclear Question: The Putin Record. Carlisle, PA: Strategic Studies Institute of the US Army War College, 2006.
- . "The Russian Invasion of Georgia: Its Impact on Israel and the Middle East." Caucasian Review of International Affairs. 2:4 (Autumn 2008).
- . Russian Policy toward the Middle East since the Collapse of the Soviet Union: The Yeltsin Legacy and the Challenge for Putin. Donald Treadbold Paper. Seattle: University of Washington Henry Jackson School of International Affairs, 2001.
- . Soviet Policy toward the Middle East since 1970. New York: Praeger, 1982.
- Golan, Galia. The Soviet Union and the Palestinian Liberation Organization: An Uneasy Alliance. New York: Praeger, 1980.
- Ro'i, Yaacov. From Encroachment to Involvement: A Documentary Study of Soviet Policy in the Middle East: 1945–1973. New York: John Wiley, 1974.

—Robert O. Freedman

Moshav

The moshav is a type of Israeli settlement, in particular a type of cooperative agricultural community of individual farms, built on land belonging to the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND or to the state. The moshavim are similar to kibbutzim with an emphasis on community labor, but contrary to the collective kibbutzim, farms in a moshav tend to be individually owned but of fixed and equal size. Workers produce crops and goods on their properties through individual and/or pooled labor and resources, and use the profit and foodstuffs to provide for themselves. Support of the community is done through a special tax that is equal for all households of the community, thus creating a system in which good farmers are better off than bad ones, unlike in the communal kibbutzim, where (at least theoretically) all members enjoy the same living standard. Many moshavim still exist today.

Bibliography

- Kressel, Gideon, Susan Lees, and Moshe Schwartz. Rural Cooperatives in Socialist Utopia: Thirty Years of Moshav Development in Israel. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1995.

Moskowitz, Irving (1927–)

Irving Moskowitz, a US doctor and bingo tycoon, is one of the largest individual donors to Israel, and his money has been donated explicitly for securing East JERUSALEM for Jews. Moskowitz sees himself as part of a divine mission to protect Israel's survival, which he believes depends on Jewish control of Jerusalem. "After 2,000 years of sacrifice for the dream of returning to Jerusalem, we cannot allow it to be taken away," he told the Los Angeles Times.

Moskowitz is a Florida physician who runs a bingo empire in Los Angeles County and has made an additional fortune in real estate speculation. With his vast earnings, he underwrites the Jewish settler groups that are transforming the Palestinian neighborhoods of RAS AL-AMOUD, SILWAN, Herod's Gate, SHAYK JARRAH, and others into Jewish communities. Using both his own money and funds from his US tax-exempt Irving I. Moskowitz Foundation, Moskowitz has supported the settler groups as well as a variety of projects and foundations, including American Friends of ATERET COHANIM (an ultranationalist Orthodox religious group that opened a militant yeshiva in the heart of the Muslim Quarter of the OLD CITY in Jerusalem), Old City Charities (a group that supports Jewish settlers in the Muslim Quarter of the Old City), and the Hebron Fund (which supports settlers in the Old City of HEBRON).

Moskowitz has also supported the JERUSALEM RECLAMATION PROJECT and the One Israel Fund, both New York foundations that have funded the purchase of some fifty Palestinian homes near Ateret Cohanim's yeshiva. Located close to the AL-AQSA MOSQUE, the third holiest site in Islam, the yeshiva states that its mission is to prepare for the replacement of the mosque by a reconstructed Jewish THIRD TEMPLE atop the biblical TEMPLE MOUNT (al-HARAM ASH-SHARIF). The head of the Jerusalem Reclamation Project, Joseph Frager, said this about Jerusalem: "There is nothing to talk about. It belongs to the Jews. Period. End of story."

To Judaize Jerusalem, Moskowitz has funded another yeshiva on Mount Scopus and purchased an estimated $20 million in LAND and property in Arab East Jerusalem, along with a large house on the Mount of Olives and St. John's Hospice next to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher. The Hebrew press has reported that Moskowitz has given various Jerusalem settler groups between $70 million and $80 million out of his personal funds.

In November 2005, Ha'aretz, Israel's newspaper of record, revealed that Moskowitz was behind a plan to build ninety housing units with a synagogue, a nine-dunum (2.5 acres) private garden, and kindergarten in an expanded Shimon Hatzadik area within the Palestinian neighborhood of Shayk Jarrah and around the Shepherd's Hotel, bought by Moskowitz in 1985. He is also responsible for constructing a new Jewish neighborhood in the Old City, and he has bought land around the Palestinian neighborhood of ABU DIS for another Jewish neighborhood known as Kidmat Tziyon. Reportedly Moskowitz also bought two hotels near the Jaffa Gate from the GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH. Moskowitz also financially supported and lobbied for the controversial restoration and opening in September 1996 of the HASMONEAN TUNNEL, which runs under the Muslim holy site of al-Haram ash-Sharif. So provocative was this event that demonstrations erupted throughout the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES in response, and some seventy Palestinians and fifteen Israeli soldiers were killed.

About 1,600 Jewish settlers live in East Jerusalem, and all of them support a Jewish Jerusalem, not a city shared with the Palestinians. They are hostile to the peace process, and some have Messianic aspirations regarding the Temple Mount. There have been almost constant conflicts between the settlers and the local Palestinian population—because the settlers take over Palestinian homes and because they establish their colonies in the heart of Arab neighborhoods. One of the most contentious sites is Moskowitz's Ma'aleh HaZeitim (Olive Heights), consisting of 132 residential units, a synagogue, Mikveh (ritual bath), and attractive public spaces within the Palestinian neighborhood of Ras al-Amud in East Jerusalem. Ma'aleh HaZeitim was intended to obstruct the BEILIN-ABU MAZEN ACCORD of 1995, which would allow Palestinians to travel from Abu Dis and Azzariyeh to al-Haram ash-Sharif and all the way to the JERICHO road without passing through Jewish communities. Such a corridor would have given Palestinians direct access to Muslim and Christian holy sites in the Old City of Jerusalem without crossing sovereign Israeli territory. But Ma'aleh HaZeitim connects the settlements of Ir David (City of David, in the Palestinian neighborhood of Silwan) with Har HaZeitim (Mount of Olives) and Har HaTzofim (Mount Scopus), thus providing a continuously expanding, contiguous Jewish presence between the Old City and Abu Dis/Azzariyeh. Moskowitz is a personal friend of former Jerusalem mayor and former prime minister EHUD OLMERT and was close to former prime minister ARIEL SHARON; consequently Ma'aleh HaZeitim won extraordinary construction rights from both the Housing Ministry and the city.

In July 2004 the government ruled that the ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW applied in East Jerusalem; however, in 2005 the Israeli attorney general handed down a decision that effectively annulled the ruling. The state had already informed Palestinians who sought access to their land in Jerusalem that they were considered absentees and therefore the land no longer belonged to them. Moreover, Moskowitz's son-in-law, Arieh King, the head of the MOLEDET PARTY branch at the Hebrew University and Moskowitz's right-hand man in Jerusalem, dismissed the attorney general's decision because high-ranking officials in the LIKUD opposed it, believing that it would not be taken seriously. "After all, the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY will not abide by what Mazuz [the Attorney General] says," King stated. "He does what the minister says. With all respect, this is a ministerial decision. They can decide whatever they want. I know from the treasury and from [NATAN] SHARANSKY's ministry that from their point of view, nothing has changed and he [Mazuz] doesn't decide for them. I understood from them, from their people, that to apply the law [of absentee property] and to enforce the law in East Jerusalem is legal and therefore there is no reason not to implement it."

In 2004 Moskowitz cooperated with Ateret Cohanim to build several dozen apartment units for Jews in Kidmat Tziyon in Abu Dis. Under Israel's previous LABOR government, there had been considerable progress in talks with the Palestinians to turn Abu Dis into the future Palestinian capital. A Jewish presence there will clearly thwart that option.

Moskowitz does not limit himself to settlement building but is also deeply involved in Israeli politics. He helped Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU financially, stating: "Yes, not much, and in the framework of the law, from my private funds." In 1995 he launched a movement called The Third Way, headed by Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, who negotiated for Moskowitz the opening of the Hasmonean Tunnel. The Third Way subsequently became a political party that joined the Likud's ruling coalition in 1996–1999. Its platform supports the Jewish people's right to the land of Israel, Israel's right to retain territories captured in a defensive war, Israel as the national home of the Jewish people and as a democratic Jewish state committed to the protection of human rights, Israeli Jewish settlement as the basis for Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem, the permanence of these settlements, Israel's right to defend its existence, and Israeli sovereignty over Jerusalem. In 1996 Moskowitz gave $100,000 to the Likud Party's campaign, which (given Israel's electoral laws) probably came from his private funds.

Danny Seidemann, a Jerusalem lawyer who has opposed the settlers in court, contends that "the settlement movement in East Jerusalem would not have anything approaching its current achievement without the active assistance of Moskowitz. Even though his activities are limited geographically and in terms of members, they are qualitatively of a highly inflammatory potential."

See also KLUGMAN REPORT; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Broder, Jonathan. "Armchair Warriors for Zion?" Salon.com. 1997. www.salon.com/news/1997/10/16news.html.
- Cassidy, Mervyn. "Israeli Politics and the Diaspora: The Influence of Diaspora Money on Israeli Elections." ARIGA: PeaceWatch. 18 January 1999. <http://64.233.161.104/search?q=cache:iZm6YKoVRUIJ:www.ariga.com/peacewatch/jdiaspora.htm+Cassidy,+Mervyn.+1999.+%E2%80%9CIIsraeli+Politics+and+the+Diaspora%22&hl=en>.
- Chaitkin, Anton. "A Bigger Scandal: Illegal U.S. Funding of Sharon's Likud." Executive Intelligence Review. 24 January 2003.
- Cook, Christopher D. "The Bingo Connection." Mother Jones. September–October 2000.
- Eldar, Akiva. "Moskowitz in Jerusalem." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 18 March 2003.
- Lis, Jonathan, and Meron Rappoport. "Plan to Build Ninety Apartments in the Sheikh Jarrah Neighborhood." Ha'aretz. 3 November 2005.
- Marosi, Richard. "Bingo King Aids Israeli Right Wing." Los Angeles Times. 9 May 1996.
- McGreal, Chris. "Sharon Tests Bush, Blair and the Road Map by Letting Families Occupy Contested District." The Guardian. 7 April 2003.
- Patterson, Margot. "Blocking Mideast Peace Bingo Tycoon Subsidizes Extremism in Israel." National Catholic Reporter. 18 October 2002. http://natcath.org/NCR\_Online/archives/101802/101802g.htm.
- Rappoport, Meron. "This Land Is Your Land, This Land Is My Land." Ha'aretz. 2 March 2005.

- Rubinstein, Danny. "The Battle for the Capital." Ha'aretz. 2 April 2005.
- Schwartz, Michal. "Ras al-Amud: Noha al-Gul Fighting Alone." Challenge: A Jerusalem Magazine on the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. 46 (November–December 1997).
- Serrill, Michael S. "The Power of Money: American Millionaire Irving Who?? Sets off Seismic Jolts in Israel." Time. 29 September 1997.
- Sheva, Arutz. "Blocking Mideast Peace Mt. of Olives Jewish Neighborhood Thriving." Arutz Israel Broadcasting Network. 21 May. 2003. www.stopmoskowiz.org/article0051.shtml.
- Shragai, Nadav. "Jews Move into New East Jerusalem Neighborhood." Ha'aretz. 4 April 2003.
- The Third Way. "Platform for Elections to the 14th Knesset." The Third Way: Elections In Israel. 1996. www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/MFAArchive/1990\_1999/1998/7/The%20Third%20Way%20Platform%20Peace%20and%20Security.

Mossad

The Mossad (Ha-Mossad le-Modi'in ule-Tafkidim Meyuhadim, Institute for Intelligence and Special Tasks) is an Israeli intelligence agency responsible for intelligence collection and covert action, including paramilitary activities such as assassinations and counterterrorism. One of the world's most well-known intelligence agencies, it is often compared to the US CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY and Britain's MI6 and is known for its efficiency and ruthlessness. However, it has also been involved in several humiliating debacles, and the Mossad's liberal use of kidnappings and assassinations has led some outside of Israel to consider its actions thuggish, although in Israel it is highly respected. The Mossad's mandate is to carry out operations outside of Israel, mainly focusing on the Arab states and Arab organizations throughout the world, but in recent years it has also been active in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

Formed in December 1949 as the Central Institute for Coordination by Prime Minister DAVID BEN-GURION, it was reorganized in March 1951 and made a part of the Prime Minister's Office that reported directly to the prime minister. The Mossad is headquartered in Tel Aviv and has eight departments with a staff estimated at approximately 1,200. In its operations, the Mossad has had a variety of objectives. For example, in the early 1950s the Mossad recruited agents to bomb US buildings in Cairo, Egypt, hoping to disrupt relations between the UNITED STATES and JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR'S EGYPT (the LAVON AFFAIR). In 1984 the Mossad detonated bombs outside the US embassy in Riyadh, SAUDI ARABIA's capital city, and claimed credit in the name of an unknown radical Saudi resistance group, in an effort, similar to that in Egypt, to weaken US-Saudi relations by attempting to show the United States that the Saudi regime was fragile and about to fall. Other objectives include a variety of operations to enhance Israel's security.

Some of the Mossad's better-known operations—successful and unsuccessful—have included the following:

- Locating and kidnapping Nazi leader Adolf Eichmann
- Planning and negotiating the IMMIGRATION of Ethiopian Jews to Israel, which was being blocked by the Ethiopian government
- Assassinating individuals Israel considered responsible for the massacre at the 1972 MUNICH OLYMPICS
- Killing a Moroccan waiter in Lillehammer, Norway, whom the Mossad apparently mistook for 'ALI HASAN SALAMAH, a PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) intelligence chief suspected of masterminding the killing of eleven Israeli athletes in Munich (in January 1996, Israel paid undisclosed damages to the man's family but refused to admit responsibility for the killing)
- Kidnapping MORDECHAI VANUNU in Italy after he passed detailed secret information concerning Israel's NUCLEAR PROGRAM to the London Times
- Providing highly sensitive information about IRAQ's Osiraq nuclear reactor, which Israel then destroyed in an air strike in 1981
- Providing intelligence for Israeli military operations in far-flung places, for instance, for Operation ENTEBBE
- Assassinating PLO-FATAH leader ABU JIHAD in Tunis in 1988
- Assassinating Gerald Bull, a ballistic missile scientist who was reportedly under contract to the Iraqi military to design and build a "super gun"
- Stealing passports from individuals in other countries for use in other covert operations
- Assassinating the head of the Palestinian militant group ISLAMIC JIHAD, Fathi al-Shikai, in Malta in October 1995

One of the Mossad's notable operations was its 1997 attempt to assassinate KHALID MESHAL, a Palestinian HAMAS leader, on the streets of Amman, JORDAN. On 19 September members of the Israeli hit squad arrived in Amman; two from New York were registered as Canadian tourists and four others came from Europe, three with Canadian passports and the fourth on a French passport. The four from Europe posed as businessmen and had forged Egyptian passports to be left behind in the event of an accident—to point a finger away from Israel. The two assassins, who used the aliases Shawn Kendall and Barry Beads and pretended to be tourists, accosted Meshal on 25 September as he entered his office in Amman, and placed a pressure-gas injector against his neck that released a toxin that immediately penetrated the skin. As the assassins fled, one of Meshal's two bodyguards, Mohammad Abu Saif, sprinted after them and, with the help of a Jordanian security guard, caught the two triggermen and delivered them to the police. By then Meshal was in the hospital in critical condition.

When the other members of the Mossad hit team realized what had happened, they took refuge in the Israeli Embassy in Amman. At the same time, Jordanian police officers became suspicious when the two assassins in custody refused assistance from the Canadian Embassy. After several hours of intense interrogation, the two men broke down and admitted their real identity. Soon the Israeli government began negotiations with Jordan in an attempt to control the damage to their interests. King Husayn warned that if Meshal died, Jordan would try the assassins and have them publicly hanged for murder, an act that Israel could avoid by providing the antidote for the toxin. But the Israelis refused even to name the toxin, while insisting on the release of their agents. Husayn then asked US president BILL CLINTON to intervene, and the president pressured Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu to name the poison. When the Jordanians applied the antidote, Meshal's life was saved.

As quid pro quo the Jordanian government allowed the Mossad backup team to leave for Israel. By then, news of the assassination attempt had reached the media, and events moved rapidly. The king was ready to break off diplomatic relations with Israel in retaliation for Netanyahu's failure to follow former prime minister YITZHAK RABIN's promise that the Mossad would not operate on Jordanian soil. To forestall that rupture, Netanyahu and some cabinet members traveled to Amman for secret negotiations with the king's brother, Crown Prince Hassan. Netanyahu suggested that if he released the spiritual leader of Hamas, SHEIKH AHMAD YASIN, the king would be seen as the man who negotiated his release. That offer started the negotiations, and Netanyahu at first believed that he had secured the release of his two jailed agents. The Jordanians, however, insisted on getting more.

Meanwhile, the news that the Mossad hit squad had used Canadian passports irritated the Canadian government. After it was revealed that Canadian passports had been used in Mossad operations in Cyprus in the mid-1980s and one in Lillehammer in the 1970s, the Israeli government promised Canada not to use them again. This time Canada recalled its ambassador to Israel "for consultation" and contemplated other measures. After Yasin was released and returned to GAZA, and Israel released twenty Hamas members accused of TERRORISM and promised fifty more releases, the Jordanians returned the Mossad assassins, and the story, which the Israeli media called "the Jordanian affair," came to an end.

After the Meshal fiasco, Israel was reluctant to carry out assassinations on the home territory of allied and neighboring states. Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON, however, reversed the policy in 2003 to take a more aggressive approach against terrorism, a policy change revealed by former Mossad agents in interviews with United Press International (UPI) and later confirmed by US intelligence officials. (Officially Israel has refused to confirm or deny the new policy.) One Mossad official told UPI the policy shift was prompted by "a huge budget" increase for the agency as part of "a tougher stance in fighting global jihad (or holy war)." Another said the policy raised the potential for killings in countries with close ties to Israel, including the United States, Britain, and Australia.

Since the First INTIFADA (1987–1993) the Mossad has been active in the Occupied Territories, operating as part of a network of Israeli army intelligence, air force intelligence, and SHIN BET (the internal security service). These agencies cooperate, provide each other information, and sometimes carry out joint operations. At the time Israeli leaders wanted to weaken Palestinian nationalism—specifically the PLO—and the Mossad helped to create Hamas, believing the Islamic organization would be a religious counter to political nationalism. During the Second, or AL-AQSA, INTIFADA (starting in 2000), TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS against Palestinians became routine, many carried out by a small group of Mossad operatives who masquerade as Palestinians to infiltrate neighborhoods and fulfill their missions. The Mossad (as well as Shin Bet) has proved adept at finding COLLABORATORS by using deception, bribery, threatened family shame/dishonor, and other questionable tactics.

Bibliography

- BBC News. "Netanyahu Cleared of Failed Assassination." Dispatches. 16 February 1998.
- Canadian Encyclopedia. "Canadian Passport Abuse." n.d. www.canadianencyclopedia.ca/index.cfm?PgNm=TCE&PARAMS=M1ARTM0011418.
- Fisk, Robert. "Death by Remote Control as Hit Squads Return." Independent (UK). 13 April 2001. www.commondreams.org/views01/0413-05.htm.
- Jawad, Saleh Abdul. "The Asymmetrical Battle." bitterlemons.org. 7 January 2004. <http://www.bitterlemons.org/previous/bl050104ed1.html#is2>.
- Jonas, George. Vengeance: The True Story of an Israeli Counter-Terrorist Team. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984.
- Margolis, Eric. "Mission Implausible: State-sponsored Assassination Is a Tricky, Unpredictable Business." Mid-East Realities. 21 October 1997. www.middleeast.org/archives/mer10-19-97.htm.
- News.com.au. "Oz Concern about Mossad Death Squads." 19 January 2003. www.rense.com/Datapages/moss.htm.
- Ostrovsky, Victor. "Bungled Amman Assassination Plot Exposes Rift within Israeli Government over Peace Negotiations." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. December 1997.
- . The Other Side of Deception: A Rogue Agent Exposes the Mossad's Secret Agenda. New York: HarperCollins, 1994.
- Ostrovsky, Victor, and Claire Hoy. By Way of Deception: The Making and Unmaking of a Mossad Officer. Port Gordonsville, VA: St. Martin's Press, 1990.
- Raviv, Dan, and Yossi Melman. Every Spy a Prince: The Complete History of Israel's Intelligence Community. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1990.
- Stewart, Steven. The Spymasters of Israel. New York: Ballantine Books, 1982.

Movement for the Preparation of the Temple

See THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Movement of Arab Nationalists

The Movement of Arab Nationalists (Harakat Al-Qawmiyyin Al-'Arab, MAN) emerged in the late 1940s and early 1950s on the campus of the American University of Beirut (LEBANON) in reaction to the creation of Israel and the loss of Palestine. The movement is associated with GEORGE HABASH, who was a medical student in Beirut at the time, and his comrade, the Syrian revolutionary Hani al-Hindi. Habash, Hindi, and a group of young Arab nationalists were influenced by the philosophy of Qustantin Zurayq, a prominent Syrian intellectual and educator who attempted to infuse Arab political thought with the secular, modern ideas of European rationalism. MAN's ideology, which owed much to Zurayq's thinking, was revolutionary and pan-Arabist. It was committed to socialism and secularism, and it emphasized the formation of a nationally conscious intellectual elite that would be the vanguard of a revolution of Arab consciousness, which would lead to Arab unity and social progress. Its Arab nationalist approach produced an uncompromising hostility to Western imperialism in general and to Israel in particular.

In the early 1950s the movement was loosely organized around the leadership of Habash and Hindi. After attaining his medical degree Habash, together with medical graduate WADI' HADDAD, became active in the Palestinian REFUGEE camps in JORDAN. The two set up clinics that provided free care, but they also recruited refugees to join MAN, a practice later used by various Palestinian organizations after the Arab defeat in the 1967 WAR. In the late 1950s, MAN closely aligned itself with the regime of Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR, an alliance it did not break even after Egypt's defeat in 1967. MAN was one of the first true pan-Arab organizations, disregarding the boundaries between individual Arab states and including Arabs throughout the region participating in its political activities, which sometimes included conspiracies in various Arab countries. In 1967, Habash transformed MAN into the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, which reflected most of its ideals and principles.

Bibliography

- AbuKhalil, As'ad. "George Habash and the Movement of Arab Nationalists: Neither Unity nor Liberation." Journal of Palestine Studies. 28:4 (1999).
- al-Azmeh, Aziz. Constantine Zuryak: An Arab for the Twentieth Century Author. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 2003.
- Choueiri, Youssef M. Arab Nationalism: A History: Nation and State in the Arab World. Chichester, UK: Blackwell Publishing, 2001.

Kassab, Elizabeth Suzanne. "An Arab Neo-Kantian Philosophy of Culture: Constantine Zurayk on Culture, Reason and Ethics." Philosophy East and West. 49:4 (1999).

Al-Kubaisi, Basil. The Arab Nationalists Movement 1951–1971: From Pressure Group to Socialist Party. N.p., 1971.

—As'ad AbuKhalil

Movement of Democratic Women for Israel

The Movement of Democratic Women for Israel (TANDI) is an alliance of two organizations: Women's Awakening, founded in 1948 as an Arab women's organization in Israel, and the Progressive Democratic Organization of Jewish Women. Both had the same goals and mission and believed that their alliance would increase their chances of success. As a result TANDI was created in the early 1970s, and the following goals were ratified and signed by some 5,000 women in 1973: a just peace in the region and the world with coexistence between Palestinians and Israelis; equal rights for women in all areas of life—society, politics, and the workplace; and protection of children's rights, assuring them a peaceful and secure future. TANDI supports an independent Palestinian state alongside the state of Israel as a way to resolve the conflict in the region and achieve a just peace. It is concerned about the national rights of Arabs in Israel and works for their complete equality. (www.hri.ca/organizations/viewOrg.asp?ID=4086).

Moyne, Lord (Walter Edward Guinness) (1880–1944)

First Lord Moyne (Walter Edward Guinness, 1st Baron Moyne), was a British politician and minister residing in the Middle East, who was assassinated in Cairo in 1944 by members of the Jewish underground Stern Gang/LEHI. Although the Stern Gang had targeted BRITISH MANDATE personnel since its inception in 1940, Lord Moyne, an ally and close personal friend of Prime Minister Winston Churchill, was the first high-profile British official murdered by the group. He may have been targeted because he was known to be an ANTI-ZIONIST in British politics, was stationed in Cairo (a short distance from Palestine), and was one of the highest-ranking British colonial officials in the region.

The assassination on 6 November 1944 did not change British policy, but it significantly cooled Churchill's approval of ZIONISM. In the end the action hurt LEHI very little. The Conservatives fell from power in Britain that year, and in Palestine, resistance increased against the British, with LEHI joining MENAHEM BEGIN's Etzel/IRGUN and the HAGANA of DAVID BEN-GURION in the JEWISH RESISTANCE MOVEMENT. The actual assassins, Eliyahu Hakim and Eliyahu Bet Zuri, were caught and hanged by the British in 1945.

Bibliography

Bell, J. Bowyer. Terror out of Zion: Irgun Zvai Leumi, LEHI, and the Palestine Underground, 1929–1949. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1977.

Benjamin, Leo [pseud.]. Martyrs in Cairo: The trial of the Assassins of Lord Moyne, 2nd rev. ed. New York: Exposition Press, 1953.

Zadka, Saul. Blood in Zion: How the Jewish Guerrillas Drove the British out of Palestine. London: Brassey's, 1995.

Al-Mu'arada

See NATIONAL DEFENSE PARTY

Al-Mubadara

See PALESTINIAN NATIONAL INITIATIVE

Mubarak, Muhammad Hosni Said (1928–)

Muhammad Hosni Said Mubarak, commonly known as Hosni Mubarak, was a career military leader in the Egyptian air force before he became the president of EGYPT on 14 October 1981, following the assassination of Anwar Sadat. He trained at the Egyptian Military Academy and at the Soviet Pilot Training School in Frunze (currently Bishkek) in Soviet Kyrgyzstan. In 1981 he became party chairman of the National Democratic Party.

In 1989 Mubarak brought Egypt back into the ARAB LEAGUE, ending ten years of exclusion following Sadat's peace treaty with Israel, and relocated the League's headquarters to its original setting in Cairo. Domestically, he has pursued severe policies against militant Islamists and the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD and has resisted grassroots efforts to democratize Egypt. Internationally, Mubarak has pursued close relations with the UNITED STATES and Israel throughout his presidency. Before the 1991 GULF WAR, Mubarak supported the UNITED NATIONS sanctions against IRAQ after its occupation of KUWAIT; Egypt participated in the war with 38,500 troops and was part of the postwar efforts to stabilize the Gulf region.

Since 1979 the United States has provided Egypt with $1.3 billion a year in military aid, and an average of $815 million a year in economic assistance. All told, Egypt has received over $50 billion in US aid since 1975. Additionally, each year USAID gives $200 million to the Egyptian government in cash handouts, conditional upon economic reforms in problem areas such as deregulation, privatization, and free trade.

In 1993 Mubarak's government advised the Palestinians during talks in Norway, which led to the OSLO ACCORDS of the same year. Thereafter and through the present, Mubarak has been deeply involved in attempts to bring about peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

See also EGYPT

Bibliography

- Azimi, Negar. "GWOT: Egypt." The Nation. 13 December 2007.
- Cox, Vicki. Hosni Mubarak. New York: Chelsea House Publications, 2002.
- Darraj, Susan Muaddi, and Arthur Meier Schlesinger. Hosni Mubarak. New York: Chelsea House Publications, 2007.
- Jerusalem Post Staff. "Mubarak: PA Conflict Cannot Stop Talks." The Jerusalem Post. 26 June 2007.
- Levinson, Charles. "$50 Billion Later, Taking Stock of US Aid to Egypt: Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak Meets with President Bush Sunday in Crawford, Texas." The Christian Science Monitor. 12 April 2004.
- Nawar, Abdelaziz S. Proceedings from the PWPA Colloquium on the Sadat Peace Initiative: A Scholarly Appraisal Ten Years Later. New York: Professors World Peace Academy, 1989.

Munich Olympics, 1972

During the Munich Olympics of 1972 a faction of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) called the BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION (BSO) took hostage nine Israeli Jewish athletes, who were later killed in a firefight, as were five of the kidnappers and one German policeman.

On the morning of 5 September 1972, with six days left in the Summer Olympic Games, five Palestinians wearing track sweat suits climbed the six-foot-six-inch fence surrounding the Olympic Village in Munich, GERMANY. These five were met by three more men who are presumed to have obtained credentials to enter the village. The Palestinians knocked on the door of Israeli wrestling coach Moshe Weinberg, who immediately realized something was wrong and shouted a warning to his comrades. He and weightlifter Joseph Romano attempted to block the door while other Israelis escaped, but Weinberg and Romano were killed by the terrorists. After the Palestinians captured nine Israelis to hold as hostages, they demanded that Israel release over 200 Palestinian prisoners and that they be given safe passage out of Germany.

After hours of tense and ultimately unsuccessful negotiations with German police, the Palestinians agreed to be taken by helicopter to the NATO air base at Fürstenfeldbruck, where an airplane would fly them and their hostages to Cairo, EGYPT. But when the helicopters carrying the hostages and kidnappers landed, German police attempted to ambush the Palestinians and a bloody firefight ensued. One helicopter was blown up by a terrorist grenade, and the remaining hostages in the second helicopter were shot to death. All nine Israeli hostages and one German policeman were killed. Five of the kidnappers were killed and three were captured. There remains debate over whether some hostages were accidentally killed by shots from the German police.

A little over a month later, on 29 October, a German Lufthansa jet was hijacked by Palestinians, who demanded that the Munich killers be released. The Germans agreed, and the three terrorists were released.

Within days of the massacre Israeli prime minister GOLDA MEIR and the Israeli Defense Committee made a secret decision authorizing the Israeli intelligence agency MOSSAD to kill Black September and POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP) operatives, although there is little or no evidence that the PFLP was involved in the Munich massacre. Indeed, Israeli analyst URI AVNERY states that "the Palestinians who were killed in revenge for Munich, had nothing to do with the affair. The Mossad was looking for easy targets and chose PLO diplomats posted to European capitals and who were quite unprotected." In revenge missions that became known as Operation Wrath of God (Mitzvah Elohim), the Mossad established a special hit team, aided by the agency's stations in Europe, to locate and eliminate targeted operatives. According to Israeli historian Benny Morris, the Mossad compiled its target list using information from former PLO personnel and friendly European intelligence services, placing at the top Wael 'Aadel Zwaiter, a suspected member of Black September and the official PLO representative in Italy, who was shot and killed on 16 October by Mossad forces. However, ABU IYAD, the PLO's deputy chief and chief of intelligence who was a prime mover in Black September, later wrote that Zwaiter was not connected to Black September and had "fiercely opposed . . . all forms of TERRORISM." Zwaiter's death was followed by letter bombs sent to PLO representatives in Algeria and Libya, to Palestinians in Bonn and Copenhagen, and to a Red Cross representative in Stockholm, although none were fatal. On 8 December 1972 the PLO's representative in Paris, Mohammad Ham-shiri, was killed by a radio-detonated bomb under his desk. Over the next three months four PLO, PFLP, and PFLP-General Command operatives were killed in Cyprus, Greece, and Paris.

On 9 April 1973, Israel launched Operation Springtime of Youth, a joint Mossad-Israel Defense Forces operation in Beirut, Lebanon. The targets were YUSIF AL-MUHAMMAD NAJJAR (Abu Yusif), head of Fatah's intelligence arm; KAMAL 'UDWAN, head of the PLO's Western Sector, which oversaw PLO action inside Israel; and KAMAL NASIR, the PLO spokesman—none of whom can be linked to Munich. Two detachments of commandos blew up the PFLP's headquarters in Beirut and a Fatah explosives plant. On 28 June 1973 the Algerian-born alleged director of operations for Black September in Europe, Mohammad Boudia, was killed by a car bomb in Paris. In Norway on 21 July 1973, in the so-called Lillehammer affair, a team of Mossad agents killed Ahmed Bouchikhi, a Moroccan man unrelated to the Munich attack, after an informant mistakenly identified Bouchikhi as 'ALI HASAN SALAMAH, a Black September operative. On 22 January 1979 the Mossad found and killed Salamah in Beirut using a remote-controlled car bomb.

British author Simon Reeve writes that the Israeli revenge operations continued for more than twenty years. He details the assassination in Paris in 1992 of the PLO's head of intelligence and says that an Israeli general stated there was a link back to Munich. Reeve also writes that while Israeli officials have stated that Operation Wrath of God was intended to extract vengeance for the families of the athletes killed in Munich, "few [Israeli] relatives wanted such a violent reckoning with the Palestinians." Reeve writes that the families were instead desperate to know the truth of the events surrounding the Munich massacre, and he proceeds to outline what he sees as a lengthy cover-up by German authorities.

The mastermind of the massacre remains at large. In his autobiography (written in 1999), Mohammed Oudeh (Abu Daoud) admitted his role. He claims that the commandos never intended to harm the athletes and blamed their deaths on the German police and Meir's stubborn refusal to negotiate the prisoners' release.

Bibliography

- Abu Daoud. Memoirs of a Palestinian Terrorist. New York: Arcade Publishing, 2002.
- Avnery, Uri. "Shall We Not Revenge?" Jerusalem: Gush Shalom, 4 February 2006.
- Bard, Mitchell. "The Munich Massacre." Jewish Virtual Library, 1972. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/Terrorism/munich.html.
- Calahan, Alexander B. Countering Terrorism: The Israeli Response to the 1972 Munich Olympic Massacre and the Development of Independent Covert Action Teams. Thesis, Marine Corps Command and Staff College, 1995.
- Cooley, John. K. Green March Black September: The Story of the Palestinian Arabs. London: Frank Cass, 1973.
- Jonas, George. Vengeance: The True Story of an Israeli Counter-Terrorist Team. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984.
- Khalaf, Salah (Abu Iyad). With Eric Rouleau. My Home, My Land: A Narrative of the Palestinian Struggle. New York: Times Books, 1981.
- Morris, Benny. Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881–2001. New York: Vintage, 2001.
- Reeve, Simon. One Day in September: The Full Story of the 1972 Munich Olympics Massacre and the Israeli Revenge Operation "Wrath of God." New York: Arcade Publishing, 2001.

Municipal Jerusalem

See GREATER JERUSALEM

Municipal Services in Jerusalem

See JERUSALEM

Muragha, Sa'id Musa (Abu Musa) (1927–)

Abu Musa was the military chief of the FATAH dissidents in LEBANON in 1983. Born in JERUSALEM, he was trained at the British military academy Sandhurst and served in the Jordanian army, in which he fought the ZIONISTS in 1948. By 1970, he had turned against JORDAN, fighting with the Palestinians in the 1970 BLACK SEPTEMBER conflict that pitted the Palestinian fida'iyyun against the Jordanian army. His military ability was again evident in the civil war in Lebanon (1975–1990), where he fought with the Palestinians, and especially during the 1982 Israeli siege of West Beirut, when he orchestrated the city's defense. At the war's end, YASIR ARAFAT rewarded his courage by appointing him deputy chief of military operations and head of the Yarmuk brigade. Shortly thereafter he catalyzed the mutiny within Fatah.

His leadership of the dissidents came as a surprise to most, for he was thought to be apolitical and had previously demonstrated exemplary loyalty to the Fatah leadership. He was, however, deeply critical of the leadership's stance after the LEBANON WAR, especially when PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION chairman Yasir Arafat appointed his loyalists, known for their corruption and cowardice, over more capable officers. Musa began open criticism in May 1983, which led to a fracture of Fatah's forces and to open fighting in October 1983 in what is known as the FATAH UPRISING or Palestinian civil war.

See also LEBANON WAR, 1982

Bibliography

- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Rouleau, Eric. "The Future of the PLO." Foreign Affairs. Fall 1983.
- Sahliyah, Emile. The PLO after the Lebanon War. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1986.
- Sayigh, Rosemary. Too Many Enemies: The Palestinian Experience in Lebanon. London: Zed Press, 1994.

Muslim Brotherhood

The Muslim Brotherhood (The Society of the Muslim Brothers, al-Jama'at al-ikhwan al-muslimin, al-Ikhwan) is an Islamist organization that encourages the building of character in Muslim individuals. The first Muslim Brotherhood was founded in EGYPT in 1928, and since then, Muslim Brotherhoods have been established in all Middle Eastern countries as well as in other countries. The first Muslim Brotherhood in Palestine was formed in JERUSALEM in 1946, with groups springing up the same year in JAFFA, LYDDA, HAIFA, NABLUS, and Tulkarm. The Egyptian Brothers fought alongside the Arab armies during the 1948 WAR with Israel and demonstrated a degree of courage and valor lacking in most of the Arab forces. For this reason many Palestinian Muslims joined the movement after the war.

Founded by Hassan al-Banna, the Egyptian Brotherhood quickly became a large charitable and educational organization as well as a major political opposition group, campaigning against political and social injustice and against British imperial rule, as well as articulating a conception of Islam that attempted to restore the broken links between tradition and modernity. By the end of the 1940s the Egyptian Brothers were believed to have had as many as a million members. The Muslim Brothers believe in grassroots work rather than following Islamic edicts, and in teaching people about Islam, with the hope that an Islamic state would arise, rather than imposing such a state. With a few exceptions, the Brotherhood's leaders and members have demonstrated a commitment to a nonviolent, reformist approach to Islamism. (For this reason, militant Islamic groups such as ISLAMIC JIHAD, HAMAS, and others, although their roots may be in the Brotherhood, represent distinct offshoots.)

Despite the Muslim Brothers' stated commitment to nonviolence, they are illegal in almost every Arab country as opposition parties. In Egypt the movement has been tolerated to varying degrees since 1954, but is still periodically subjected to mass arrests that include torture. Nevertheless, the Brotherhood remains Egypt's most popular opposition group and continues to call for a more open and democratic political system. In the early 1980s the Brotherhood was brutally repressed in SYRIA by the Hafez al-Assad regime.

The main objectives of the Brotherhood include building the Muslim individual (emphasizing the development of a strong body, good manners, cultured thought, economic productivity, strong faith, correct worship, efficient use of time, aid to others, organization, and self-struggling character) and also the Muslim family, society, state, and Khalifa (caliph).

See also HAMAS; ISLAMIC JIHAD MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Abu-Amr, Ziad. Islamic Fundamentalism in the West Bank and Gaza: Muslim Brotherhood and Islamic Jihad. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994.
- Ibrahim, Saad Eddin. Egypt, Islam and Democracy: Critical Essays. Cairo, Egypt: American University in Cairo Press, 2002.
- Mitchell, Richard P. The Society of the Muslim Brothers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Walsh, John. "Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood: Understanding Centrist Islam." Harvard International Review. 24:4 (2003).

Muslim-Christian Associations

Muslim-Christian Associations (MCAs) were active in Palestine during the BRITISH MANDATE years as nationalist organizations opposed to ZIONISM. Their activities emphasized a growing Palestinian nationalism that transcended their members' religious ties. The first society was formed in JAFFA in 1918, followed shortly by one in JERUSALEM—both fueled by the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine.

The years 1917–1920 saw the emergence of Muslim-Christian Associations in all the leading towns of Palestine, with the purpose of placing pressure first on the Paris Peace Conference and then on the British government to abrogate the Balfour Declaration. Like the Arab nationalists, the members of the MCAs initially demanded a united SYRIA, but after Britain imposed the Mandate, they supported Palestinian nationalism rather than pan-Arabism.

At the Third Palestinian Congress, in December 1920, the MCA became the main organizational framework for the Palestinian Arab national movement. From the start, the MCA intended to establish itself as a body representing the Palestinian Arab population and as an organization taking a public stand on the country's future. The appointment of two Christian vice presidents—Ya'qub Farraj (a GREEK ORTHODOX from Jerusalem) and Tawfiq Abdallah (of ACRE)—alongside the Muslim president of the ARAB EXECUTIVE Council (MUSA KAZIM AL-HUSAYNI) demonstrates the leading role Arab Christians played during the years of the Mandate.

Like Muslim Arabs, Christian Arabs were involved in many aspects of the national struggle, including active resistance, forming parties and political organizations, assuming the responsibilities of leadership, producing manuscripts, contributing to education and national guidance, and financing the national movement. A long-established Christian organization, the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), and a Greek Orthodox youth group (both of which admitted Muslims) were also important political instruments for mobilizing the public behind the Palestinian nationalist leadership.

Bibliography

- Kassissieh, Issah. "Tracing the Path of Living Stones: Local Christianity and the National Cause." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 19 (2003).
- Lesch, Ann Mosely. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian-Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.

Musrara

The JERUSALEM neighborhood of Musrara, on the boundary between the eastern and western sectors of the city (between the Damascus Gate and Hanevi'im Street) is one of several areas of Israeli-Palestinian conflict over the fate of the city. Musrara was originally developed by Palestinian Arabs in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Wealthy Arabs built the earliest homes there during this era. Later in the twentieth century, Jews built homes there too, and Musrara became a mixed (Jewish/Arab) community. As a consequence of the 1948 WAR the Palestinian residents fled or were expelled, and Musrara was divided as Jerusalem was divided into Jordanian East Jerusalem and Israeli West Jerusalem.

Beginning in the 1950s, Israel settled immigrant MIZRAHI/Oriental Jews from North Africa in west Musrara, but due to its peripheral status at the border with the then-Jordanian side of Jerusalem, Israel ignored the neighborhood in terms of housing, education, employment opportunities, and so on. Insofar as the authorities paid any attention to Musrara, it was related to issues of security. At the beginning of the 1967 WAR, west Musrara housed 650 Mizrahi immigrant families, most of whom were economically impoverished. When East Jerusalem was conquered and annexed after that war, Palestinian/Jordanian east Musrara was reunited with the Jewish/Israeli sector of Musrara.

In the 1970s the disenfranchised Jewish youth of Musrara established the Israeli “Black Panther Movement,” fashioned after the African-American group in the UNITED STATES with the same name. The young leaders demanded from the establishment equal services and opportunities for the Jews of Sephardi/Oriental background. The social and economic divide between Eastern European ASHKENAZI Jews and those of Spanish-Arab descent still lingers within Israel, but the Black Panthers helped to bring those issues to the fore. Musrara became a “Project Renewal” neighborhood for the Los Angeles Jewish Federation and along with support from the government, money was invested to build better schools, playgrounds, and community areas for the Jewish residents.

By 1990, Jewish Musrara had undergone a process of renewal. Artists, young families, and Israelis wanting to return to the city began renovating the old houses and building new modern apartments. Five minutes’ walking distance to the OLD CITY and the center of downtown Jerusalem, Musrara is close to family-owned markets, coffee shops, and restaurants, and prides itself on being a charming historic neighborhood.

During the same period, the Palestinian sector of Musrara grew increasingly impoverished, marginalized, and isolated, while “renovating the old houses” involved their takeover by organized settler organizations whose goal is the Judaization of all Jerusalem. Moreover, Palestinians in Musrara had become the object of personal attacks.

In 1999 the Zionist settler group Mishbi Tzion occupied a Palestinian house in the Palestinian Musrara neighborhood, endeavoring to create continuity between Musrara and other Jewish neighborhoods in the vicinity. The ISRAELI SUPREME COURT ruled against the Palestinian family living there who claimed ownership, opining that they did not have rights to the property. The court ordered that the house be expropriated from the Palestinians. After the ruling, Israeli police prepared for another takeover by a Jewish family of another Palestinian-owned property in Arab Musrara. The settlers are backed by the organization NATIONAL UNION–YISRAEL BEITENU, run by member of the Knesset BEN YAMIN ELON.

In 2002, Ha’aretz reported that over the past few months, the HOMOT SHALEM ASSOCIATION, backed by Knesset member Elon, had secured Jewish rights to approximately one-third of Palestinian Musrara. In addition to the residences noted above, a number of vacant lots alongside the purchased structures had been bought, and the association has plans to build on them in the future. It also reported that Elon plans to hold a ceremony at the site to mark its population by Jews.

Elon told Ha’aretz that the association’s activities were just another small step toward “returning Zion to Jerusalem.” He added that soon a second area in the neighborhood would also be populated by Jews. He refused to elaborate, but Ha’aretz discovered that Elon and his supported organization had managed to secure ownership rights to ten compounds and courtyards out of the thirty in the Palestinian Musrara neighborhood, which cover some 18 dunums (4.5 acres). Some of the properties are now privately owned by Jews, while others are being held by the custodian-general.

Palestinians currently reside in almost all the apartments, but the association says it intends to conduct talks with the tenants and convince them to vacate their homes by consent. However, settler harassment against Palestinian residents of Musrara, in an attempt to drive them out, is well documented and includes verbal and physical abuse as well as the use of explosives on multiple occasions, which for the most part has been ignored by the municipal and police authorities.

See also HOLY BASIN; JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; SETTLER VIOLENCE; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Americans for Peace Now. Middle East Peace Report. 4:11 (7 October 2002).
- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. Monthly Report on the Israeli Colonization Activities in the West Bank. 13 (1999). <http://www.arij.org/paleye/monthley/99-8/index.htm>.
- Bishara, Amahl. “House and Homeland: Examining Sentiments about and Claims to Jerusalem and Its Houses.” Social Text. 21:2 (Summer 2003).
- Dumper, Michael. The Politics of Jerusalem since 1967. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- . The Politics of Sacred Space: The Old City of Jerusalem in the Middle East Conflict. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2002.
- Hoffman, Adina. House of Windows: Portraits from a Jerusalem Neighborhood. New York: Broadway Books, 2002.
- Kana’an, Ruba. “Review of Adina Hoffman House of Windows: Portraits from a Jerusalem Neighborhood.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 129 (Fall 2003).

- Mattar, Ibrahim. "Musrara Quarter: From Palestinian to Israeli: Jerusalem 1948–1982." Journal of Palestine Studies. 12:4 (1983).
- Monterescu, Daniel, and Dan Rabinowitz, eds. Mixed Towns, Trapped Communities: Historical Narratives, Spatial Dynamics, Gender Relations and Cultural Encounters in Palestinian-Israeli Towns. Farnham, Surrey, UK: Ashgate, 2007.
- Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group. "Bombing Attacks against Palestinian Residents in West Jerusalem." The Palestinian Human Rights Monitor. 20 August 1999.
- Shragai, Nadav. "More Jews Moving into Arab Musrara." Ha'aretz. 4 October 2002.
- . "Prime Minister Ariel Sharon Encouraged Move into Arab Musrara Neighborhood." Ha'aretz. 14 April 2002.
- Shuman, Ellis. "Four Jewish Settlers Suspected of Planting Bomb on Arab School." Israelinsider. 12 May 2002.
- Tamari, Salim. "Jerusalem 1948: The Phantom City." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 3 (1999).
- University of Cambridge Department of Architecture. "Architecture and Urban Order in Divided Jerusalem Damascus Gate." Conflict in Cities and the Contested State. n.d. <http://www.arct.cam.ac.uk/conflictincities/research/CinC2/sitesdamascus2.html>.

Mutasarrifiyya (Little Lebanon)

The Mutasarrifiyya was an autonomous area of Mount Lebanon from 1861 through the end of World War I (1918) that was established by the FRENCH with OTTOMAN approval for the benefit of the Christian MARONITE and Druze communities. Governed by an executive administrative council, it was a weak entity and required constant military protection. It was not able to sustain itself economically, which led, in turn, to political instability.

To minimize tensions between Sunni and Shi'a sects, the frontiers of the Mutasarrifiyya excluded Sunni cities such as Beirut and Tripoli, which rejected the idea of local autonomy under the control of the European powers, especially because the region was under Maronite dominance. The Mutasarrifiyya lasted until the establishment of Greater Lebanon in the French Mandate of 1920.

Bibliography

- Makdissi, Ussama. The Culture of Sectarianism: Community, History, and Violence in Nineteenth-Century Ottoman Lebanon. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

Muwatin

Muwatin (Citizen, the Palestinian Institute for the Study of Democracy) was established in January 1992 in Ramallah, WEST BANK, to promote the study and development of democracy in Palestine and the region. Founded by a group of scholars and academics, its aim is to foster the process of democratic transformation in Palestinian society in particular and in Arab society in general. Muwatin's objectives include initiating a wide-ranging critical debate on democratic issues and options and providing a public forum for debate on the need for the democratic transformation of Palestinian political and civil life; building a strong research community in Palestine that will produce original studies, including policy-oriented research, to influence policy formulation; and rebuilding the links between Palestinian and Arab intellectuals. (www.muwatin.org).

---

N

---

Al-Nabi Musa Demonstrations, 1920

The April 1920 al-Nabi Musa demonstrations in JERUSALEM were one of several Palestinian protests that year against Zionist IMMIGRATION and colonization. In the Muslim religious festival of al-Nabi Musa (Prophet Moses), worshipers traditionally walked in a procession from Jerusalem to Moses' burial site near JERICHO, but this time it degenerated into violence between Muslims and Jews. On 8 March, Faysal bin Husayn had been proclaimed king of SYRIA (and Palestine), and during the al-Nabi Musa holiday, Muslim leader AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI added to the local conflict by raising a portrait of Faysal and shouting "Here is our king." The crowd replied with "Allah save the king" and ran through the Jewish quarter of Jerusalem, leaving five Jews and four Palestinians dead.

In response the British punished several Palestinian leaders, most notably removing the mayor of Jerusalem, MUSA KAZIM AL-HUSAYNI, whom they had appointed in March 1918. According to the British, a speech by Musa Kazim, in which he supported the government of Faysal in Damascus, was treason. Al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni was reprimanded, too, but he was able to persuade the British of his loyalty to them and was subsequently appointed by the British to several high positions.

Britain then established the PALIN COMMISSION to investigate the origins of the al-Nabi Musa violence. The commission concluded that the conflict grew out of Palestinian nationalist frustration and the Palestinians' belief that the British would not keep what the Arabs saw as promises made in World War I (the HUSAYN-MCMAHON CORRESPON-DENCE) for an independent and united Arab world. Additionally, the Palin Commission noted the Palestinians' fear of Zionist objectives in Palestine and criticized the "arrogance" of the Zionist leaders.

Other Palestinian demonstrations in 1920 included a February protest at the first official public reading in Palestine of the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine; March demonstrations supporting the proclamation of independence by the second ARAB CONGRESS meeting in Damascus; and a November protest on the third anniversary of the Balfour Declaration. In May 1921, worker demonstrations took place in JAFFA and neighboring areas.

Bibliography

- Caplan, Neil. Palestine Jewry and the Arab Question, 1917–1925. London: Frank Cass, 1978.
- Gorny, Yosef. Zionism and the Arabs 1882–1948: A Study in Ideology. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.

Nablus

Nablus is a major WEST BANK city 63 kilometers (39 miles) north of JERUSALEM with a population of over 134,000 in 2008. According to the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT between the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION and Israel, it is controlled by the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. The ancient part of the city, which dates back some 4,000 years, is located in the eastern sector of the modern city, in a site known as Tal Balatah. Nablus, the location of Joseph's Tomb and Jacob's Well, is a site of religious significance to the three major Abrahamic faiths—Jews refer to it as the biblical Shechem—and it is also a site of intense political and military struggle in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Within the city limits are three major refugee camps, which were built for the Palestinian REFUGEES from the 1948 WAR—Ein Beit el Ma, Balata, and Askar Al Quadim, plus the smaller Askar Al Jadid—with a total population of more than 34,000 inhabitants.

The Nablus area has been an important target of the settlement movement, and in 2009 there were fourteen Jewish SETTLEMENTS there, including Itamar, Yizhar, ELON MOREH, Har Bracha, and twenty-six OUTPOSTS. SETTLER VIOLENCE here is second only to that in the HEBRON area. The settlements are connected to each other by a series of bypass ROADS, used almost exclusively by the settlers, which stretch around the city.

History

Between the Middle Bronze Age and the late Hellenic period, Nablus was a prosperous commercial center because of its position along vital trade routes through the region. It produced grapes, olives, wheat, livestock, and pottery. Archaeological evidence indicates that the city was razed and reconstructed up to twenty-two times. The present city of Nablus was founded in 72 CE by the Romans. In the fifth and sixth centuries CE the emperor Zeno built a church—Maria Theotokos—on the summit of one of Nablus's mountains. The city was called Neapolis (Naples) by the Byzantines. In 636 the Arabs conquered the city and renamed it Nablus, and in 1099 the Crusaders conquered it and built several churches. After the Muslim leader SALADIN retook the city in 1187, Nablus became a mixed town of Muslims, Christians, and Jews, and it also became the center of the SAMARITAN community, as it is today. During OTTOMAN rule Nablus was the first capital of one of four districts in the Syria-Palestine province.

The historic Old City is filled with important cultural and religious sites from these various eras. In addition to the sacred places mentioned above, there is an Ayyubid mausoleum, Ottoman-era structures including two major marketplaces, Turkish bath houses, olive-oil soap factories, and over two thousand historic houses and palaces. Visible Roman ruins lie outside the Old City, and a Roman-era aqueduct system runs under the city, part of which had recently been preserved by the Nablus municipality and is open to visitors. There are also several monuments within the Old City dating back to the Byzantine era and the Crusader period. There are eighteen Islamic monuments and eleven mosques in the Old City alone, nine of which were established in the fifteenth century. Nablus contains a Greek Orthodox church dedicated to Saint Justin the Martyr, built in 1898, and an ancient Samaritan synagogue, which is still in use.

From the sixteenth century, cotton was the primary commodity in Nablus's trade with Europe, mainly with FRANCE. When the cotton trade began to decline in the mid-nineteenth century, other products, including olive oil and soap, overtook cotton as primary commodities. Powerful merchant families controlled the rural-urban network through capital investment, moneylending contracts, and a reconfiguration of the traditional patron-client relationship between peasants and the old ruling families. Soap-making prospered into the twentieth century, despite the growing prominence of the industry in coastal cities, the imposition of tariffs by EGYPT, and stiff competition from a new Jewish-owned soap and oil factory in HAIFA.

In 1927 an earthquake damaged many of the city's buildings, which were subsequently rebuilt. After World War I, Palestine became a BRITISH MANDATE, and Nablus was an active center of resistance against the British. After the 1948 War the city came under Jordanian occupation and was later captured by Israel in the 1967 WAR.

Nablus, traditionally a politicized city, was a center of opposition to the oppressive policies of the Ottoman government after the 1908 Young Turk revolution, was in the forefront of the early twentieth-century pan-Arab movement, took a leadership role in the general strike and ARAB REVOLT during the 1930s, and was a center of anti-British resistance during the Mandate. This tradition has continued through both the First and especially the Second (al-Aqsa) Intifadas.

Nablus and the al-Aqsa Intifada

Nablus experienced intense violence between the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) and Palestinian militant groups during the Second Intifada. It is home to units of the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES (a FATAH splinter group), the IZZ-AL-DIN AL-QASAM BRIGADE (HAMAS's military wing), the Abu Ali Mustapha Brigades (a small faction from the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE), and ISLAMIC JIHAD. Israel believes that some SUICIDE BOMBERS have come from here and repeatedly cites security concerns as the main factor behind its continuous punishment of Nablus. Indeed, in the years 2000–2008, Nablus was one of the most relentlessly targeted areas, experiencing the highest number of casualties, the most severe physical damage, and the most intense RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT in the West Bank. According to Gideon Levy writing in Ha'aretz in 2008, "a thousand residents of Nablus were killed in the Second Intifada."

In 2006 the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA)

produced a summary of aspects of the Intifada as they affected Nablus from 2000 to 2005:

- At least eight large-scale Israeli military incursions
- 522 fatalities (militants and civilians)
- 3,108 injured (mostly civilians)
- 894 houses and buildings destroyed (including “punitive” home demolitions)
- 8,161 houses and buildings severely damaged
- 149 cultural and religious sites destroyed (mostly in the historic Old City)
- 2,000 cultural and religious sites severely damaged (mostly in the historic Old City)
- CURFEW for a total of 240 days—the longest curfew (April to November 2002) lasted 151 days, lifted only every few days for a total of 65 hours
- 53 closure obstacles (earth mounds, concrete blocks, CHECKPOINTS, road gates, and trenches), isolating Nablus from the outside world
- Numerous CLOSURES restricting all movement into and out of the city
- The BARRIER, making access to Israeli markets for Nablus goods more difficult
- Seven permanent checkpoints that required PERMITS to pass

The ratio of Israeli power to Palestinian power in 2000–2005 (throughout the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES) was at least 100:1 in Israel’s favor, in terms of raw conventional military strength, without taking into account Israel’s nonconventional military capabilities.

OCHA concluded: “The extensive duration and sweeping nature of the restrictions caused extensive, profound harm and affected fundamental aspects of the fabric of life in [Nablus]: many of the residents lost their jobs and the ability to support their families; pupils and students were not able to complete their studies and exams; residents of nearby villages were unable to receive regular medical care or other basic services; many persons found themselves separated from their families living outside the besieged area, and so forth and so on.”

On 25 February 2007 the IDF once again launched a major offensive in Nablus named Operation Hot Winter. According to the IDF the operation was intended “to undermine the terrorist infrastructure” in Nablus, which they dubbed the “Palestinian terror capital.” Senior Central Command sources said the operation could last “indefinitely.” In addition to the usual arrests, home demolitions, and so forth, during this operation the IDF raided municipal buildings, charities, and health clinics hunting “wanted” men.

Five months later, beginning on 7 July 2007 and lasting nine days, the IDF initiated a new campaign in Nablus, raiding several popular organizations and imposing long-term closures on alleged Hamas-affiliated organizations. Among the institutions locked down were the Municipality Council, the city shopping mall, schools, six charities, orphanages, health centers, media organizations, and six mosques. In all of these locations the premises were ransacked and computers, documents, and money were confiscated. Beyond the material assaults, the IDF imposed an arbitrary closure for two or three years on individual organizations, marking the beginning of a harsh campaign against charities and other organizations. Most owners of the destroyed places issued press releases refuting the Israeli accusations of their being Hamas-affiliated, even pointing out that many had been founded years prior to the creation of the Hamas movement.

The city’s mall, a modern five-story complex composed of some 50 privately owned shops and offices, was closed by Israel, which asserted that the shops and companies located there funded the Hamas movement and “encouraged TERRORISM.” The IDF posted closure notices on the windows of shops, stating, “anyone found in this center will be considered as working on behalf of Hamas and puts himself and his properties in danger.” This arbitrary order was slated to come into effect on 15 August, giving no more than a month to the storeowners to remove their businesses and find other locations. Significantly, the IDF further stated that “ownership of the Mall would be transferred to the Israeli authorities as of 18 August.” By besieging the mall, issuing arbitrary laws, and transferring ownership to Israel, Israel was also attempting to weaken Palestinian control of the city.

On 23 September 2007, IDF forces initiated another operation targeting the “terror infrastructure” in the Ein Beit el Ma refugee camp in Nablus. Israeli troops remained inside Nablus for three months, during which there were more than 70 days of full 24-hour curfews.

By the end of 2008, according to the World Bank, the Nablus economy was suffering from a precarious lack of investment, largely because of Israeli restrictions on movement and despite increased international aid. Palestinian per capita gross domestic product in 2007 was 40 percent lower than its peak in 1999, the report said. Investment “dropped to precariously low levels,” with public investment having virtually ceased over the previous two years and private investment remaining stagnant after dropping 15 percent between 2005 and 2006.

The World Bank also noted the deleterious effect on agriculture writing that “the increasing number of walls, ROADBLOCKS, and checkpoints has made it increasingly difficult for farmers to access their lands and markets.” The restrictions have raised the cost of transporting goods and importing agricultural supplies, while “produce destined for external markets frequently spoils as it is detained at checkpoints.” Meanwhile, industrial development is hampered by limited access to LAND and WATER, as well as the difficulty in obtaining permits to build. The World Bank also pointed out the ENVIRONMENTAL impact of the restrictions on access, including creeping desertification caused by overgrazing in the limited area accessible to Palestinian herders. It added that the “lack of suitable site access for solid waste disposal causes the use of ‘wildcat’ disposal sites close [to] or inside the cities and villages, a practice that carries serious environmental and health dangers.”

The years 2007–2008 saw an upsurge in settler violence in Nablus and the villages surrounding it. OCHA reported that within the first 10 months of 2008, it recorded 290 settler-related incidents targeting Palestinians and their property in the West Bank (up from 182 attacks in 2007 for all 12 months), 21 percent of which were in the Nablus area, including the burning of some 3,000 olive trees. The Nablus correspondent for the Palestinian News Network reported that, “using stones and bullets, the settlers hit residents as they were picking olives in their fields. Instead of stopping them, the occupying forces helped the settlers assault citizens and farmers.”

The settlers for the most part hold either an ultranationalist or religious FUNDAMENTALIST ideology, both of which lead them to believe that the entire West Bank, which they call Judea and Samaria, is part of ERETZ YISRAEL (the whole land of Israel), which belongs to Jews according to God’s covenant.

The following story, reported by Isabel Kershner in the New York Times, offers a fitting conclusion to an entry on Nablus. In the middle of one night she observed waves of “ardent Jewish settlers, religious women from central Israel, black-clad followers of Hasidic courts and groups of teenage boys and girls, almost a thousand of them in all, . . . crammed into a dozen buses and escorted by the Israeli military. The Jewish pilgrims slid quietly along deserted streets throughout the early hours . . . while the residents of Nablus slept. . . . The destination was the holy place known as Joseph’s Tomb . . . in the heart of a residential district.”

Kershner reported that “the first group arrived around midnight. Rushing through the darkness into the tomb, they crowded around the rough mound of the grave and started reciting Psalms by the glow of their cell phones, not waiting for the portable generator to power up a crude fluorescent light. They were praying to be infused with some of the righteousness of Joseph, as well as to be able to return [to Nablus].”

“To them,” she wrote, “this is not Nablus, one of the largest Palestinian cities . . . but the site of the ancient biblical city of Shechem. The tomb, they believe, sits on the parcel of ground that Jacob bought for a hundred pieces of silver, according to Joshua 24:32, an inheritance of the children of Joseph, meaning that its ownership is not in doubt. Here, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is boiled down to its very essence of competing territorial, national and religious claims. The renewed focus on what the Jewish devotees call the pull or power of Joseph appears to reflect a wider trend: a move by the settler movement at large away from tired security arguments and a return to its fundamental raison d’être—the religious conviction that this land is the Jews’ historical birthright and is not up for grabs.

“The local settlers say they are now working on establishing a routine. Since the beginning of the year . . . the newly elected mayor of the Samaria Council, which represents settlers in the northern West Bank, has made the resumption of regular visits a priority, coordinating with the army to organize entries at least once a month. ‘Our hold on Joseph’s Tomb strengthens our hold on the whole country,’ said an employee of the council and a former administrator of the yeshiva at the tomb. Now their goal is to make the visits weekly, then to re-establish the kind of permanent presence that existed before 2000 so that the pilgrims will no longer have to come . . . ‘like thieves in the night.’”

This illustration of the religious dimension of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, supported by the Israeli military, demonstrates how difficult the conflict will be to resolve.

Bibliography

- Abu Wardeh, Amin. "Army Aids Settlers in Attack on Farmers Harvesting Olives." The Palestinian News Network. Nablus. 11 October 2008.
- . "Olive Harvest Further Disrupted by Cell Phones." The Palestinian News Network. Nablus. 12 October 2008.
- . "290 Settler-related Attacks on Palestinians by November." The Palestinian News Network. Nablus. 19 December 2008.
- . "Settlers Burn 3,000 Olive Trees in Southern Nablus." The Palestinian News Network. Nablus. 18 October 2008.
- AFP News. "Israel Outraged after Settler Rampage in West Bank." 14 September 2008. afp.google.com/article/ALeqM5hw7qU7gKRTqiu8778qtvDiyCW9w.
- Amnesty International. "Israel and the Occupied Territories." Amnesty International Report, 2006. 23 May 2006.
- . "Israel and the Occupied Territories: Road to Nowhere." (MDE 15/093/2006). London: Amnesty International. 1 December 2006.
- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. "Tightening the Siege on Nablus City and 15 Other Palestinian Villages Surrounding It." Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. 1 June 2008.
- Azoula, Yuval. "Five IDF Soldiers Wounded, One Seriously, in Nablus Raid." Ha'aretz. 28 June 2007.
- BBC. "Israelis Put Nablus under Curfew." London. British Broadcasting Corporation. 25 February 2007.
- Benvenisti, Meron. The Crusaders in the Holy Land. New York: Macmillan, 1974.
- B'Tselem. Imposition of Siege: Siege on the Nablus Area. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Siege.asp.
- Daraghmeh, Ali. "Israeli Troops Raid West Bank City." Associated Press. 25 February 2007.
- Doumani, Beshara. Rediscovering Palestine: Merchants and Peasants in Jabal Nablus 1700–1900. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.
- Frisch, Hillel. "Motivation or Capabilities? Israeli Counterterrorism against Palestinian Suicide Bombings and Violence." Mideast Security and Policy Studies. 70 (December 2006).
- Gold, Shabtai, and AP. "Israel Attacks Nablus: 'Operation Hot Winter.'" Electronic Intifada. 25 February 2007.
- Graham-Brown, Sarah. Palestinians and Their Society 1880–1946: A Photographic Essay. London: Quartet Books, 1981.
- . "The Political Economy of Jabal Nablus, 1920–1948." In Studies in the Economic and Social History of Palestine in the 19th and 20th Centuries. Edited by Roger Owen. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1982.
- Ha'aretz Staff. "IDF Lifts Blockades from All W. Bank Cities, Except Nablus." Ha'aretz. 2 January 2004.
- Hass, Amira. "Arms in a Sea of Troubles." Ha'aretz. 23 July 2004.
- . "The Other Nablus I Know." Ha'aretz. 25 December 2002.
- Hilmy, Pauline. "Settler Attacks Impede International Humanitarian Assistance in the West Bank." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. March 2009.
- Human Rights Watch. "Israel/Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT)." World Report 2007. New York: Human Rights Watch, 11 January 2007.
- Integrated Regional Information Networks. Israel—OPT: For Farmers, Much of Their Land Remains out of Reach. Geneva: Integrated Regional Information Networks, 30 November 2006.
- Internal Displacement Monitoring Centre. Occupied Palestinian Territories: West Bank Wall Main Cause of New Displacement Amid Worsening Humanitarian Situation. Geneva: Internal Displacement Monitoring Centre, 21 June 2006.
- Issacharoff, Avi. "IDF Troops Uncover Third Explosives Factory in Nablus Raid." Ha'aretz. 26 February 2007.
- Jerusalem Post Staff. "IDF Arrests Terrorist Suspected of Making Explosive Belts in Nablus." Jerusalem Post. 17 November 2008.
- Katz, Yaakov. "Analysis: 'Hot Winter's' Lost Deterrence." Jerusalem Post. 17 April 2008.
- . "'Hot Winter' Continues in Nablus." Jerusalem Post. 25 February 2007.
- Kershner, Isabel. "Pilgrimage to Roots of Faith and Strife." New York Times. 24 October 2008.
- Levy, Gideon. "Twilight Zone/'Worse Than Apartheid.'" Ha'aretz. 10 July 2008.
- al-Nimr, Ihsan. Tarikh Jabal Nablus wal-Balqa/The History of the Nablus Region, 4 vols. Nablus: Jam'iyyat 'Ummal al-Matabi' al-Ta'awuniyya, 1976.
- O'Sullivan, Arie. "IDF Keeps up the Pressure." Jerusalem Post. 24 August 2003.
- Palestine Monitor. "The Israeli Siege on Nablus: The Mall Must Fall?" Palestine Monitor. 17 July 2008.
- Palestinian Centre for Human Rights. "The Bloodiest and Most Disastrous Week Since the Beginning of the Intifada." Weekly Report on Israeli Human Rights Violations in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. 4–10 April 2002.
- . "Evacuation of Settlers Hinders Palestinians' Access to Medical Aid." 22 August 2005.
- . "Four Palestinian Civilians, Including 2 Children, Killed in a Series of War Crimes Committed by Israeli Occupying Forces in Nablus." Gaza City: Palestinian Center for Human Rights (PHRC). Ref: 03/2004. 4 January 2004.
- . "Four Palestinians, Including a University Lecturer and His Son, Killed by Israeli Troops in Nablus." Ref: 105/2004. 6 July 2004.

- . "IOF Raid Houses, Medical Services under Siege." 22 August 2005.
- . "Israeli Forces Kill 4 Palestinians in Nablus." Ref: 67/2004. 3 May 2004.
- . "Palestinian Center for Human Rights Condemns IOF Measures against Nablus Charities." Ref: 59/2008. 8 July 2008.
- . "Protection of Civilians: Settler Violence in Nablus." 25–31 March 2009.
- . "Serious Escalation of Israeli War Crimes in Nablus and Balata Refugee Camp: 5 Palestinians Killed, 3 in an Extra-judicial Assassination." Ref: 22/2006. 23 February 2006.
- . "Six Palestinians Extra-judicially Executed in Nablus." Ref: 97/2004. 27 June 2004.
- . Weekly Report on Israeli Human Rights Violations in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Gaza City: The Palestinian Centre for Human Rights, 4–10 April 2002.
- Palestinian Medical Relief Society. "Nablus in Agony." Ramallah, West Bank: Palestinian Medical Relief Society, 6 January 2004.
- Teeple, Jim. "Israel Cracks Down on Hamas in the West Bank." Jerusalem: Voice of America, 9 July 2008.
- Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees. "Urgent Appeal from Nablus." Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees (UPMRC). 22 June 2002.
- UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. Costs of Conflict: Nablus after Five Years of Conflict. 31 December 2005.
- . Increasing Need, Decreasing Access: Tightening Control on Economic Movement in the West Bank. 22 January 2008.
- . Israeli Soldiers Use Two Palestinian Minors as Human Shields. 8 March 2007.
- . Nablus Situation Report. Various dates.
- . "Occupied Palestinian Territory." The Humanitarian Monitor. 34 (February 2009).
- . The Old City of Nablus. 26 December 2003.
- . Protection of Civilians: Summary Data Tables. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, January 2007.
- . Situation Report: Occupied Palestinian Territories, 16 February–13 March 2003. 14 March 2003.
- . Special Focus: West Bank Humanitarian Goods Access. September 2007.
- . Territorial Fragmentation of the West Bank. May 2006.
- . West Bank Closure Count and Analysis: Occupied Palestinian Territory. September 2006.
- World Bank. Donors Pledge $3 Billion for West Bank and Gaza. Washington, DC: The World Bank Group, 2007. <http://go.worldbank.org/HNT0A52D80>.
- . Israeli Barriers Stall Palestinian Economy. 27 April 2008.
- . West Bank and Gaza Update. 30 April 2006.
- . World Bank Strategy for a Prosperous and Viable Palestinian State. Washington, DC: The World Bank Group, 2008. <http://go.worldbank.org/4W3JW9X6G0>.

—Betsy Folkins

Nahal

Nahal (Noar Halutzi Lohem, Fighting Pioneer Youth) is a unique Jewish military cadre that requires its members to perform both military service in a combat unit and civilian service in a newly founded KIBBUTZ, MOSHAV, or other SETTLEMENT. The goal of Nahal, established by DAVID BEN-GURION during the 1948 WAR out of the underground PALMAH, is to support both the military and colonization. Its function was to maintain Gar'inim—groups of youths united for founding new settlements or joining existing ones—with the objective of providing its soldiers with extensive military capability as well as the basic tools for life on a new settlement.

Since its establishment Nahal has helped found at least 108 new settlements and has assisted in the development of many more. Nahal settlements, established to secure Israel's BORDERS, play an important role in stopping Palestinian INFILTRATION. In the LEBANON WAR (1982), Nahal troops had a key role, fighting in all sectors of Lebanon, while Nahal paratroopers entered West Beirut. Inside Israel, Nahal soldiers performed more security-related duties than any other unit at the time.

In the early 1990s a special forces Nahal battalion was created to conduct operations in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. In the AL-AQSA INTIFADA (2000) these troops were counterterrorist forces, raiding homes and hideouts and carrying out the most offensive operations of the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES.

Bibliography

- Gal, Reuven. A Portrait of the Israeli Soldier. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1986.
- Jewish Virtual Library. "The Nahal." n.d. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Society\_&\_Culture/nahal.html.
- Laqueur, Walter, and Barry Rubin, eds. The Israel-Arab Reader: Documentary History of the Middle East Conflict, 6th rev. and updated ed. New York: Penguin, 2001.
- Sadeh, Eligar. Militarization and State Power in the Arab-Israeli Conflict: Case Study of Israel, 1948–1982. Austin, TX: Dissertation.com, 1997.

Najjada

The Najjada (Helpers) was a nonpartisan Palestinian youth movement formed by Muhammad Nimr al-Hawari in October 1945. It was similar to, although less political than, the FUTUWWA movement backed by the AL-HUSAYNI FAMILY OF JERUSALEM. Both the Najjada and the Futuwwa organizations were modeled on Rover Scouting (similar to US Boy Scouts) and were strongly nationalist and ANTI-ZIONIST. Although they are frequently portrayed as paramilitary formations, there is little evidence to substantiate such assertions or to estimate their strength. When hostilities broke out in 1947 and the Palestinians improvised local militias for defending their towns and villages, groups such as Najjada and Futuwwa may have joined these “national guards,” but their role seems to have been limited.

Bibliography

- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- UN Special Committee on Palestine. Supplement to Survey of Palestine, Notes Compiled for the Information of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine. Jerusalem: Palestine Government Printer, 1946.
- . A Survey of Palestine, Prepared in December 1945 and January 1946 for the Information of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, Vol. 2. Jerusalem: Palestine Government Printer, 1946.

Najjar, Yusif al-Muhammad (1929–1973)

Yusif al-Muhammad Najjar (Abu Yusif) was a founder and leader of the Palestinian FATAH party who became involved in the BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION and led numerous terrorist operations against Israel.

Najjar and his family were dispossessed from Yibna (al-Majdal) in the 1948 WAR and settled in the Rafah refugee camp in the GAZA STRIP, where he grew up. As a youth he joined the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD but soon became active in Palestinian politics. While a student activist in Gaza, Abu Yusif was a leader in the General Union of Palestinian Students. In early 1954 he was arrested by EGYPT for participating in demonstrations calling for a Palestinian army. In March 1955 the Egyptians arrested and imprisoned him for two years for protesting Egypt’s plan to resettle Palestinian REFUGEES in the northern Sinai.

After leaving prison Najjar moved to KUWAIT, where he taught school for a while, and then was active in setting up organizations similar to Fatah in SAUDI ARABIA and Qatar. In addition to being a founding member of Fatah, he was a member of the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE from its creation until his death. In 1971 he led Fatah’s new security apparatus and was the first military commander of Fatah. Najjar also coordinated the operations of AL-‘ASIFA, a Palestinian military organization founded by YASIR ARAFAT in 1958. In July 1968 he was named to the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE and served as its chairman, coordinating Palestinian affairs in LEBANON and brokering relations with Lebanese governments after the CAIRO AGREEMENT (1969).

Abu Yusif was an operational head of the terrorist group Black September Organization from 1970 to 1972. On 10 April 1973 he was assassinated in Beirut, together with his wife, Kamal Adwan, and KAMAL NASIR, by an Israeli commando unit with the help of Lebanese collaborators.

Bibliography

- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Al-Nashashibi, Fahri (1899–1941)

Fahri al-Nashashibi was a Palestinian politician who worked for the British during the 1920s and was deeply involved in the competition between two of Jerusalem’s main families, the NASHASHIBIS and the AL-HUSAYNIS. Although he initially joined in the 1936 ARAB REVOLT, by 1937 he supported Great Britain’s partition plan, and during World War II Nashashibi helped recruit Palestinians into the British army. A member of the Palestinian Arab National Party and the NATIONAL DEFENSE PARTY, he was hated by supporters of the al-Husaynis and accused of collaborating with ZIONISTS. In 1941 al-Nashashibi was assassinated in Baghdad.

Al-Nashashibi, Ragib (1883–1951)

Ragib al-Nashashibi, a Palestinian politician, was the first governor of the WEST BANK. He began working as an engineer for the OTTOMAN government in the JERUSALEM District, later represented the district in the Ottoman parliament, and served in the Ottoman military during World War I. In 1929 the British authorities appointed al-Nashashibi mayor of Jerusalem after they dismissed MUSA KAZIM AL-HUSAYNI, and he remained in that post until 1934, when he lost the election. Throughout the BRITISH MANDATE (1917–1948), as a senior Palestinian politician al-Nashashibi represented the al-Mu'aridun (NATIONAL DEFENSE PARTY) faction and was perpetually in political competition with the Councilists (Palestine ARAB PARTY, Husayni faction). He was a founder of the Literary Society and the Palestinian Arab National Party. In 1934 he formed the NATIONAL DEFENSE PARTY and as its leader served on the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE from 1936 to 1937. In 1937 he fled to EGYPT to avoid the growing conflict with the Husaynis.

Al-Nashashibi was committed to negotiations with Zionists and believed that the Palestinians should achieve the best possible settlement with the British through flexible negotiations. Thus he attended the LONDON CONFERENCE and accepted the recommendation of the 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, in which the British proposed one unitary government of Arabs and Jews in Palestine. Al-Nashashibi was also a longtime ally of Emir Abdullah of Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950) and supported Abdullah's ambitions for control in Palestine. After its annexation by Jordan in 1950, he served as the first governor of the West Bank and also as Jordanian minister of agriculture and transportation, and from 1951 he was given authority over the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, the Muslim religious site in Jerusalem.

Bibliography

Fischback, Michael R. "Raghib al-Nashashibi." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.

Nashashibi Family

The history of the Nashashibi family in JERUSALEM began in 1469 CE when Nasir al-Din Mohammad al-Nashashibi, a former general in the MAMLUK army and treasurer in the Mamluk palace in Alexandria, was appointed "Guardian of the Two Holy Mosques"—the AL-AQSA MOSQUE in Jerusalem and the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in HEBRON—by the Mamluk sultan Qatbay. He retired after serving nineteen years as guardian and remained in Jerusalem, where his descendants have lived ever since.

During the Mamluk (1250–1517) and OTTOMAN (1299–1923) periods, the Nashashibis were landlords and merchants who amassed a considerable fortune and significant influence in Jerusalem and throughout Palestine. During the Ottoman period Rashid al-Nashashibi was a member of parliament in Istanbul, TURKEY, and represented Jerusalem. During the BRITISH MANDATE the Nashashibis held important public and administrative posts. After the establishment of Israel, Ragib al-Nashashibi was the mayor of Jerusalem for several years, and in 1951 King Abdullah of JORDAN appointed him Guardian of the Two Holy Mosques and Custodian of Holy Places. The family was the force that controlled the anti-British, anti-Zionist AL-MU'ARADA PARTY (National Defense Party).

While Jordan occupied the WEST BANK from 1948 through 1967, the Nashashibis held many important posts in Jordan's government and business community, and two members of the family served on the PLO's PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL: Nabila Ibrahim, the first female physician in the family, and Mohammad Zuhdi, minister of finance in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. Today some members of the family live in Jordan as businessmen and professionals, while others work in the Gulf States; a few family members have jobs in Europe and the UNITED STATES as researchers, engineers, physicians, and businessmen. The majority, however, still reside in Jerusalem, where they own properties in the old and new parts of the city.

Al-Nasir, Jamal 'Abd (1918–1970) and Nasirism

Jamal 'Abd al-Nasir was the leader of EGYPT from 1954 until his death in 1970. Considered one of the most important modern Arab politicians, he is especially well-known for his Arab nationalist and anti-imperialist philosophy. The pan-Arabist ideology named after him, Nasirism, won a large Arab following in the 1950s and 1960s and was particularly attractive to several strands of Palestinian nationalism. Nasir's Egypt and Israel fought two major wars (1956 and 1967) and several smaller conflicts (Gaza Raid, WAR OF ATTRITION, etc.).

After World War II Nasir was an instructor at the Military Academy in Cairo, where, during the next several years, he organized a group of other reform-minded officers called the Free Officers and recruited new members for the organization. On 23 July 1952 the Free Officers seized control of the government, and Nasir became prime minister in February 1954. Although he was soon forced to resign, he became president and head of state in October 1954. Nasir, who governed for fifteen years, is remembered for his September 1955 arms deal with Czechoslovakia (negotiated after the UNITED STATES turned down his request for arms in the aftermath of Israel's Gaza Raid) and for his organization of and leadership in the NON-ALIGNED MOVEMENT of third world nations that attempted to form their own coalition instead of aligning with the United States or the SOVIET UNION. The independence of the Egyptian leader caused the United States and other Western countries, in July 1956, to retract their financial support for construction of the Aswan High Dam—a crucial component of Nasir's plans for Egyptian development. On 26 July, in a plan to raise money for the dam and to remind the West that Egypt would not be humiliated, Nasir announced the nationalization of the Suez Canal. This move produced outrage in the West, especially in the United States, and a major, coordinated military assault by Israel, Britain, and FRANCE (the Suez War), but for the Arab masses Nasir became a hero for not capitulating to Western hegemony and imperialism.

Soon Nasir became the most popular leader throughout the Arab world, and his ideology of non-alignment, Arab unity and independence, Arab socialism, and anti-imperialism, as well as the liberation of Palestine, became known as Nasirism. The Suez War enabled Nasir to merge the issues of Arab unity and the Palestine question into one, presenting the liberation of Palestine as the principal goal of this movement. He took the lead in establishing the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in 1964 and sought to mobilize the Arab world's resources to battle Israel and the countries that supported it. Nasir's pan-Arabism reached the WEST BANK, where Palestinians became among its most fervent exponents, drawn to its emphasis on national liberation that put the Palestinian situation in a broader historical context.

In the early 1960s there were signs that the claims of Nasirism went beyond its power. At the end of the 1967 WAR, Israel had gained control of the Sinai Peninsula, the Gaza Strip, the WEST BANK, eastern JERUSALEM, and the Golan Heights. The war demonstrated the limitations of Egyptian and Arab power, and Nasir announced his resignation, but widespread protests in Egypt and other Arab countries convinced him to remain. Because both of his own stature and Egypt's respected position, he was the indispensable broker between the Palestinians and their adversaries. In 1969, Egyptian intervention produced an agreement between the Lebanese government and the PLO, which set the limits for the organization to operate in southern LEBANON. In 1970 Nasir mediated between the JORDANIAN army and Palestinian guerrilla groups that were threatening to take over the country and made peace between them.

Immediately after this negotiation 'Abd al-Nasir died suddenly, and in the words of one Arab intellectual, "the extraordinary scenes at his funeral, with millions weeping in the streets, certainly meant something; at least for the moment, it was difficult to imagine Egypt or the Arab world without him. His death was the end of an era of hope for an Arab world united and made new."

The legacy of 'Abd al-Nasir is complex. He freed Egypt from European domination and reformed its economy through major agrarian reform projects and greater government involvement in other sectors of the economy. Yet his socialist economic policies were less than successful, largely because of elite-driven capital flight as well as economic stagnation. He sought to lead the Arab world in the Non-Aligned Movement and against Israel and Western imperialism. But though he gained the love of the Arab masses, he failed to unify the Arab leaders. In one instance he negotiated a union between Syria and Egypt, then so humiliated Syrian leaders that they withdrew from the union. He founded the PLO allegedly to give Palestinians independence in Arab and other politics, but his real objective was to control the Palestinian movement. Nasir's miscalculations that dragged Egypt into the 1967 WAR were a disaster for the country.

Bibliography

- Abdel-Malek, Anouar. Egypt: Military Society: The Army Regime, the Left, and Social Change under Nasser. New York: Random House, 1968.
- Aburish, Said K. Nasser: The Last Arab. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2004.
- Bar-Siman-Tov, Ya'acov. The Israeli-Egyptian War of Attrition, 1969–1970: A Case-Study of Limited Local War. New York: Columbia University Press, 1980.
- Heikal, Mohammad Hassanein. The Cairo Documents: The Inside Story of Nasser and His Relationship with World Leaders, Rebels, and Statesmen. New York: Doubleday, 1973.
- Hourani, Albert. History of the Arab Peoples. New York: Warner Books, 1992.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. The Palestinian People: A History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- . Palestinians: The Making of a People, reprint ed. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Nutting, Anthony. Nasser. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1972.

Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.

Stephens, Robert Henry. Nasser: A Political Biography. New York: Allen Lane, 1971.

Talhami, Ghada Hashem. Palestine and Egyptian Nationalist Identity. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1992.

Nasir, Kamal Butros (1925–1973)

Kamal Nasir was a Christian Palestinian poet and PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) leader. Born in GAZA, he was educated at the American University of Beirut and worked as a teacher while studying law in JERUSALEM. After 1948 Nasir worked as a journalist, publishing the al-Ba'ath newspaper from Ramallah, and establishing al-Jil al-Jadid, a literary periodical. In the 1956 Jordanian elections he was elected to the parliament from the Ramallah district on the BA'ATH slate, although JORDAN expelled Nasir from parliament during a period of martial law. In 1967, Israel expelled him from the WEST BANK for participation in the NATIONAL GUIDANCE COMMITTEE and other resistance activities. In 1969 in Beirut he became editor of the PLO newspaper Filastin al-Thawra and a member of the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE. He was assassinated in an Israeli raid led by EHUD BARAK in Beirut in April 1973.

In 1961 Nasir published a collection of poetry, Jirah Tughanni, and other collections were published posthumously. Some of his better-known poems deal with the British betrayal of their promises to the Arabs, for example, "British Injustice," "The Jewish Flood," and "Palestine the Proud." In his poem "Cry of the Tents" ("Sarkhat al-Khiyam"), he wrote about the sadness of the Palestinian REFUGEES, who wish, at the end of Ramadan, that people could keep fasting so the refugees would not be alone in their hunger.

See also PALESTINIAN POETRY

Bibliography

Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat: Between Gun and Olive Branch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.

Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Nasirism

See JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR

Nassar, Najib (1865–1947)

Najib Nassar founded and edited al-Karmil, the first Palestinian ANTI-ZIONIST weekly newspaper in Arabic, which appeared in HAIFA in 1909. Al-Karmil repeatedly warned against LAND sales to Jews and called attention to Zionist colonial activities in Palestine. Near the end of 1910 Nassar created an association in Haifa to prevent the implementation of the Zionist program and to persuade the OTTOMAN government to prohibit land sales to Jews. In 1911 he published the first book in Arabic on ZIONISM, Zionism: Its History, Objective and Importance, in which he described Zionism as a racist movement that planned to displace the Palestinians in the Holy Land.

In 1912 Nassar called for a Palestinian congress as a way to counter the Eleventh WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS and to resist the Zionist invasion of Palestine. At the congress, held in August 1913, Palestinian leaders called upon the Ottomans to stop selling land through an open auction and instead to sell to the mostly Palestinian farmers who cultivated it, allowing them to finance the cost of the land through easy payments. Nassar's personal politics favored the Ottoman decentralization program for Palestine, which gave more independence and autonomy to the provinces, and throughout his life he maintained loyalty both to the Ottomans and to Palestinian patriotism.

Bibliography

Khalidi, Rashid. Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.

Lockman, Zachary. Comrades and Enemies: Arab and Jewish Workers in Palestine, 1906–1948. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

Seikaly, May. Haifa: Transformation of an Arab Society 1918–1939. London: I. B. Tauris, 2002.

Nasser, Gamal Abdel

See JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR

National Alliance, 1983

The National Alliance, along with ABU MUSA'S FATAH UPRISING and the DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE, was one of three groups that split from the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) after the 1982 LEBANON WAR. The alliance was composed of SA'İQA, the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND, and the PALESTINE POPULAR STRUGGLE FRONT.

Initially the National Alliance's (and Fatah Uprising's) criticisms of Arafat and PLO policy generated significant support among many segments of the Palestinian movement and population. But the popular backing quickly evaporated when the National Alliance aligned itself with SYRIA, resorted to force, and provoked a civil war in LEBANON. The split began to heal in July 1984 when FATAH and the Democratic Alliance reached an accord known as the ADEN-ALGIERS ACCORD and joined together within the PLO. However, the split widened again in March 1985 when former PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC) speaker Khalid al-Fahum announced from Damascus the formation of the PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT with factions from the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT and the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP). Nevertheless, by 1987 the PLO was reunited with the return to the fold of the PFLP and the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE at the eighteenth meeting of the PNC, and the National Alliance disintegrated.

Bibliography

- Bavly, Dan, and Elihu Salpeter. Fire in Beirut: Israel's War in Lebanon with the PLO. New York: Stein and Day, 1984.
- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Jansen, Michael. The Battle of Beirut. Boston, MA: South End Press, 1983.
- Khalidi, Rashid. "The Palestinians in Lebanon." Middle East Journal. 38 (Spring 1984).
- . Under Siege: PLO Decisionmaking during the 1982 War. New York: Columbia University Press, 1986.
- Khalidi, Walid. Conflict and Violence in Lebanon: Confrontation in the Middle East. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1979.
- Lamb, Franklin P., ed. Israel's War in Lebanon. Boston, MA: South End Press, 1984.
- Owen, Roger, ed. Essays on the Crisis in Lebanon. London: Ithaca Press, 1976.
- Petran, Tabitha. The Struggle over Lebanon. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1987.
- Rabinovich, Itamar. The War for Lebanon, 1970–1983. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1984.
- Randal, Jonathan C. Going All the Way. New York: Viking Press, 1983.
- Schiff, Ze'ev, and Ehud Ya'ari. Israel's Lebanon War. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984.

National Bloc Party

The National Bloc Party was formed in NABLUS in July 1935 by Abdul al-Latif Saleh, a lawyer and former official of the OTTOMAN Senate. Its declared objectives were to work for the independence of Palestine and the preservation of its Arab character, to unify all the political efforts of the Palestinian Arabs, and to disseminate information for this purpose. The influence of this party was small and very local.

Bibliography

- Lesch, Ann Mosely. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.

National Defense Party

The National Defense Party was founded in 1934 by RAGIB AL-NASHASHIBI, a Palestinian politician who, after 1948, was the first governor of the WEST BANK, and was linked to Transjordan (Jordan after 1950). The party's members came mainly from the Nashashibis and their allied clans, known as the Mu'aridun. More disposed to a compromise with Zionists than the AL-HUSAYNIS and their ARAB PARTY, the party's objective was an independent Palestine with Arab supremacy. It acknowledged no international obligations that could prejudice Arab independence or permit the introduction of foreign influence. There were at the time a number of smaller parties—AL-ISTIQLAL (headed by Awni Abdul Hadi and Ahmad al Balqi); the REFORM PARTY (formed by the AL-KHALIDI clan and other intellectuals); and the NATIONAL BLOC PARTY (formed by Abdul al-Latif Salah), among others, which generally were established by public activists on a family and local basis. In addition there was the NATIONAL LIBERATION LEAGUE, an organization founded by the Communist Party.

Bibliography

- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1973.
- . The Palestinian Arab National Movement, From Riots to Rebellion, 1929–1939. London: Frank Cass, 1978.

National Democratic Alliance

See BALAD PARTY

National Guidance Committee

Established in 1978 in East JERUSALEM, the National Guidance Committee (NGC) was one of the first major expressions of post-1967 indigenous Palestinian nationalism. It was founded by a group of WEST BANK leaders to coordinate popular opposition to the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS and their limited autonomy plan for Palestinians. Though initially formed to oppose Camp David, later the NGC actively opposed the VILLAGE LEAGUES and openly supported the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO).

The NGC eschewed the traditional family/clan, pro-Jordanian politics that had characterized West Bank politics since the OCCUPATION. Its twenty-three members were on the whole highly educated and urbane, but uncompromising in their support of full Palestinian statehood. As the NGC steadily gained stature in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, it became influential enough to challenge the PLO on West Bank affairs, although it always did so in ways that did not undermine the PLO's legitimacy.

The Guidance Committee worked through a network of local organizations, associations, and other bodies, allowing it to quickly convey ideas and resolutions to the entire West Bank populace. It effectively called for street demonstrations, mayoral resignations, and other acts of civil disobedience in response to Israel's harsh measures against the Palestinians. Israel permitted four NGC public rallies between 1 October and 7 November 1979 but outlawed any further rallies.

On 2 May 1980, Israel summarily expelled from the West Bank two prominent members of the Guidance Committee: Mayors Muhammad Milhim of Halhoul and Fahd Kawasme of HEBRON. One month later, on 3 June, NABLUS mayor BASSAM SHAKA'A and Ramallah mayor Karim Khalaf, both members of the NGC, were maimed for life in separate, almost simultaneous car bombs planted by Israeli settlers; they came to be known as the "martyr mayors." Two years later, in May 1982, Israel outlawed the committee altogether.

See also PALESTINE NATIONAL FRONT

Bibliography

Dakkak, Ibrahim. "Back to Square One: A Study of the Re-emergence of the Palestinian Identity in the West Bank, 1967-1980." In Palestinians over the Green Line: Studies on the Relations between Palestinians on Both Sides of the 1949 Armistice Line since 1967. Edited by Alexander Scholch. London: Ithaca Press, 1983.

Hiltermann, Joost R. Behind the Intifada: Labor and Women's Movements in the Occupied Territories. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991.

Litani, Yehuda. "After the National Guidance Committee." Journal of Palestine Studies. 14:3 (1985).

Ma'oz, Moshe. Palestinian Leadership on the West Bank: The Changing Role of the Arab Mayors under Jordan and Israel. London: Frank Cass, 1984.

Matthews, Weldon C. "The Rise and Demise of the Left in West Bank Politics: The Case of the Palestine National Front." Arab Studies Quarterly. 20 (Fall 1998).

Migdal, Joel, ed. Palestinian Society and Politics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980.

Sahliyyeh, Emile. In Search of Leadership: West Bank Politics since 1967. Washington, DC: Brookings Institute, 1988.

Saleh, Abdul Jawad. "The Palestinian Non-Violent Resistance Movement." Alternative Palestinian Agenda, 2002. www.ap-agenda.org/11-02/asaleh.htm.

Taraki, Lisa. "Mass Organizations in the West Bank." In Occupation: Israel over Palestine. Edited by Naseer Aruri. Belmont, MA: AAUG Press, 1989.

National Institutions

See ISRAELI NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

National Insurance Institute

Israel's National Insurance Institute (NII, Ha'Mosad Le'Bitu'akh Leumi) administers the Israeli social security system, including HEALTH CARE, unemployment insurance, and child care, among others. Although it provides generous benefits to Jewish citizens, the NII's policies toward Palestinian-Arab citizens, Palestinian residents of JERUSALEM, and Palestinian guest workers are more restrictive. B'TSELEM, the Israeli human rights group, states that the NII policy for Palestinian residents of Jerusalem "has become an instrument of government policy to reduce the Arab population of the city."

Current regulations of the NII law provide national insurance benefits only to residents of Israel living in Israel and to citizens of Israel living in either Israel or the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. This policy excludes Palestinians in Jerusalem, Palestinian workers in Israel, and all Palestinians in the WEST BANK and GAZA. Palestinian Jerusalemites, who have the status of "permanent residents" of Israel, lose their rights if they move outside Israel's Jerusalem BORDERS and cannot regain benefits until two years after they move back. A new Israeli policy is likely to cause major problems for the new generation of Jerusalemites now applying for IDENTITY CARDS and access to the NII because the policy now declares that permanent residency can only be passed on from their parents if the applicants meet certain “conditions of residency” and of “CENTER OF LIFE.”

The Ministry of Interior, which issues identity and National Insurance cards, legitimizes residency and grants social benefits through a sophisticated information-sharing system across government agencies that verifies the addresses of and other required information on residents. When Palestinian residents claim benefits, the NII sends investigators to ensure that the claimants are bona fide Jerusalem residents (not just identity card holders), but no such investigations are made for Jewish residents. Completing the residency check can take years and delay the receipt of benefits and, in the case of childbirth, the receipt of a birth certificate and identity card number, all of which jeopardizes continued residency in the city. For this reason many Jerusalem identity card holders (estimated to be as many as 30,000 households) who have been forced to live outside the Israeli-drawn borders of the city (often because housing is unaffordable or unavailable) continue to pay into the NII system (often through automatic deduction by their Jerusalem-based employer), but they do not claim benefits from the NII because the claim would launch an Israeli address check. Households that live outside of Jerusalem but have family-owned property in the city often give the Jerusalem address as their primary home, hoping to qualify for the benefits they have paid for.

For example, a physician who holds a Jerusalem identity card and earns 6,000 Israeli new shekels (NIS) ($1,500) monthly has NIS 900 ($230) deducted for National Insurance by the Jerusalem hospital where he works. Although he is entitled to benefits, he cannot claim the monthly child allowances for his two children, which would amount to NIS 312 ($80), because he moved to Ramallah and fears that an investigation will result in the withdrawal of his identity card.

The amount of money lost in unclaimed benefits is substantial for Palestinians in the following categories:

- If the resident made regular payments to the NII and then moved outside of the city borders, no benefits can be claimed. This especially affects the elderly on pensions who move in with family members and thus forfeit their pensions.

Many residents do not report their change of address and continue to collect benefits until the NII finds out and terminates the benefits.

- Palestinians pay the same National Insurance rate as citizens but cannot collect all the benefits available to Jewish citizens, in particular severance payments. Being ineligible for the draft, they cannot receive compensation for military reserve duty, although this benefit has been “hidden” recently as a separate fund. And the maternity allowance is given only to dues-paying mothers who work, which excludes most Palestinian women.
- If Jerusalem residents have always lived in the West Bank and work in Jerusalem, the full rate of National Insurance is still deducted automatically from their salaries by their employers, even though they cannot claim benefits.
- Some Jerusalem residents pay voluntarily into the NII, although they live in the West Bank, to preserve their Jerusalem identity cards, although it is not proven to have any effect.

Before 1995, Israeli health insurance was voluntary for households and the only valued service they accepted and received from Israeli institutions, but choice was eliminated in 1995 when health insurance became a mandatory part of the NII package. Effectively this meant that Jerusalem identity card holders, wherever they lived, could not benefit from private Israeli health insurance plans without paying into the National Insurance fund. Because this could require considerable retroactive payments for past years, many households living outside the Jerusalem borders had their insurance lapse; others moved back to Jerusalem.

Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza who work in Israel are paid through the employment service of the Ministry of Labor, which disburses wages and benefits collected from employers. The ministry deducts a 1 percent union fee plus the guest workers’ contributions to the NII. Despite these deductions, Palestinian workers do not have access to unemployment insurance, general disability payments, low-income supplements, child allotments, or maternity leave.

PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL are discriminated against by both the National Insurance Institute and the state budget, which includes stark disparities in resource allocation. According to B’Tselem, with respect to Palestinian citizens, “Despite Israeli citizenship, the situation of Palestinian Arab citizens is precarious. The Israeli Government does not provide its Arab citizens, who constitute approximately 20 percent of the population, with the same quality of education, housing, employment, and social services as it does Jews. In addition, government spending is proportionally far lower in predominantly Arab areas than in Jewish areas.”

Bibliography

- Achdout, Leah. Annual Survey 2002–2003. National Insurance Institute Jerusalem, 2004. www.ittijah.org/newsletter/womeneconomy.pdf.
- Algazy, Joseph. “Children Are Subject to the Law but Not Protected by It.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 10 June 2002.
- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Chester, David. “A Light to the Nations? Social Justice in Israel.” Social Problems in the Promised Land. 19 October 2002.
- Cook, Jonathan. “Bedouin in the Negev Face New ‘Transfer.’” Middle East Report/MERIP. 10 May 2003.
- Drori, Israel. The Seam Line: Arab Workers and Jewish Managers in the Israeli Textile Industry. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. Israel’s Uncertain Victory in Jerusalem. Special Report. Washington, DC: FMEP, 1999.
- Internal Displacement Monitoring Centre. “Palestinian Arab Citizens of Israel: Identity and Location.” Global Internal Displacement Project. 2005. www.idproject.org or http://www.internal-displacement.org/8025708F004CE90B/\(httpCountries\)/4977AFF6A725FFAF802570A7004CC952?OpenDocument/4977AFF6A725FFAF802570A7004CC952?OpenDocument).
- International Crisis Group. Identity Crisis: Israel and Its Arab Citizens. Middle East Report No. 25. Amman, Jordan, and Brussels, Belgium: International Crisis Group, 2004.
- Kryshall, Nathan. “The De-Arabization of West Jerusalem.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 27:2 (1998).
- Minnis, Amina, and Nadia Hijab. Citizens Apart: A Portrait of the Palestinians in Israel. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1991.
- Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment, Jerusalem Unit. Human Rights Violations in Arab Jerusalem: An Overview of Abuse. Jerusalem: LAW, 1999.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Rouhana, Kate B. The Reality of Jerusalem’s Palestinians Today. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Media and Communication Center, 2001.
- Rouhana, Nadim N. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities in Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Rwaidy, Ahmad. The Israeli Restrictions on Arab Presence and Promotion of Jewish Presence in Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Center for Women, 1997.
- Semyonov, Moshe, and Noah Lewin-Epstein. Hewers of Wood and Drawers of Water: Non-citizen Arabs in the Israeli Labor Market. Cornell International Industrial and Labor Relations Report. Ithaca, NY: ILR Press, 1987.
- Siegmán, Henry. “How Palestinian Property Was Seized.” International Herald Tribune. 27 January 2005.
- Stein, Yael. The Quiet Deportation: Revocation of Residency and Denial of Social Rights of East Jerusalem Palestinians. Jerusalem: B’Tselem and HaMoked, 1998.
- Tsemel, Lea, et. al. The Trap Is Closing on Palestinian Jerusalemites: Israel’s Demographic Policies in East Jerusalem from the 1967 Annexation to the Eve of the Final Status Negotiations (1996). Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 1996.
- US Department of State. Country Reports on Human Rights Practices: Israel. 2001. www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2001/nea/8262.htm.
- . Israel and the Occupied Territories: Human Rights Practices, 1994, 1995. http://dosfan.lib.uic.edu/erc/democracy/1994\_hrp\_report/94hrp\_report\_nea/IsraelOccupiedTerr.html.
- Usher, Graham. “Returning to the Source: The Politics of Housing in East Jerusalem.” Jerusalem Quarterly File. (Winter 1998).
- Vitullo, Anita. “Israel’s Social Policy in Arab Jerusalem.” Jerusalem Quarterly File. 2 (1998).
- World Council of Churches Executive Committee. “Background Paper on the Status of Jerusalem.” Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 26–29 September 2000.

National Liberation League

The National Liberation League (NLL) was one of the first Palestinian communist organizations. It was formed in a split with the ARAB-PALESTINE COMMUNIST PARTY, which was created in the 1920s by Jewish and Arab communists. As the Yishuv developed and the imminence of an independent Jewish state in Palestine became a reality, tensions between Palestinian and Jewish members of the party grew until 1943, when it splintered and the Palestinians formed the National Liberation League. The NLL was the only Arab Palestinian party that urged the acceptance of the Partition Resolution (UN RESOLUTION 181), which called for the creation of both Palestinian and Jewish states in Palestine.

After 1948, communists from the WEST BANK formed the Jordanian Communist Party (JCP), which created the PALESTINE NATIONAL FRONT in 1973. Those in GAZA formed the Communist Party of Gaza. In 1982 the JCP split from the Palestine National Front. West Bank and Gaza communists united to become the Palestinian Communist Party, which changed its name in 1991 to the PALESTINIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY while the JCP remained in Jordan.

The Palestine Communist Party was not admitted to the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION until 1987, it never had a military wing, and it did not engage in armed resistance, focusing instead on political and diplomatic struggle. During the First INTIFADA the party was part of the Unified National Command, the umbrella organization that subsumed all Palestinian political factions except HAMAS, and it supported the MADRID CONFERENCE and the OSLO ACCORDS. Its main base of support has been in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, having little following among the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA.

Bibliography

Budeiri, Musa. The Palestine Communist Party, 1919–1948: Arab and Jew in the Struggle for Internationalism. London: Ithaca, 1979.

National Religious Party

The National Religious Party (NRP, Mafdal Datit Le'umit), often referred to as Mafdal, is an Israeli political party representing the ASHKENAZI religious Zionist movement. It is an Orthodox faction within the Zionist movement that combines a belief in the importance of a Jewish state in the land of Israel with a religious way of life. It is contrasted with secular ZIONISM on the one hand and non-Zionist HAREDI Orthodox movements on the other. The founder and main ideologist of religious Zionism was RABBI AVRAHAM YITZHAK KOOK (1865–1935), who urged young religious Jews to settle in Israel and called upon the secular Zionists to pay more attention to Judaism.

NRP was founded in 1956 by Yosef Burg and Haim Moshe Shapira out of the merger of HAPOEL HAMIZRAHI (The Workers Religious Center) and Ha-Mizrahi (The Religious Center). Throughout NRP's existence it has attempted to preserve the relevance of Judaism on issues such as Israeli personal status laws, education, culture, and municipal issues, such as prohibitions on the selling of non-Kosher food and on transportation and public activities on the Sabbath. NRP has a youth movement, Bnei Akiva.

Until 1992, NRP was a coalition partner in all the governments of Israel and was often the pivotal party in coalition disputes. It was considered a centrist party until the 1967 WAR, which spawned messianic trends among Israel's religious Jews, and it subsequently moved to the political right. Today the NRP is a strictly right-wing party, fiercely opposed to the OSLO ACCORDS and to US president GEORGE W. BUSH'S ROAD MAP for ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which it considers "Oslo in disguise." The NRP's views on the conflict can be summarized as follows:

- The only state between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea should be the state of Israel. No independent national Arab entity (i.e., Palestine) will exist within these borders.
- No part of Israel will be given over to a foreign government or authority.
- Palestinian Arabs can be given self-governing autonomy in certain geographic areas if they are subject to Israel's authority in matters of security and foreign affairs. However, no SETTLEMENTS should be dismantled, and settlement expansion should be continued.

NRP reacted to the AL-AQSA INTIFADA by demanding a harsh military response to "root out terror infrastructure" in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, the dissolution of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, and the deportation of PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION leaders back to TUNIS.

Bibliography

Knesset (State of Israel). "National Religious Party (Mafdal) Platform." Elections for the 16th Knesset. 2003. www.knesset.gov.il/elections16/eng/lists/plat\_13-e.htm.

Reiser, Stewart. The Politics of Leverage: The National Religious Party of Israel and Its Influence on Foreign Policy. Boston, MA: Harvard University Press, 1984.

Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

National Union Party

The National Union Party (Ha'ihud Ha'Leumi or Ichud Leumi) is an extreme right-wing Israeli political party formed in 1999 by REHAVAM ZE'EV (founder of the MOLEDET or Homeland Party in 1988) in a merger with two other small parties: (1) HERUT (the National Movement, founded in 1998 by BENJAMIN BEGIN, Michael Kleiner, and David Re'em) and (2) TEKUMA (Rebirth or Resurrection, founded in 1998 by Hanan Porat and Zvi Hendel, today led by Hendel). After Ze'evi was assassinated in 2001, AVIGDOR LIEBERMAN brought the party he led, YISRAEL BEITENU (Israel Our Home), into the coalition and became head of the National Union Party (and Rabbi BENYAMIN ELON became head of Moledet). In 2003, Herut left the National Union, and in 2005, Yisrael Beitenu left. However, the National Union was then bolstered by the addition of Ahi (the Renewed Religious Nationalist Party, formed by dissidents from the National Religious Party [NRP]), led by Effi Eitam, who were opposed to the Gaza withdrawal. The 2005 departure of Yisrael Beitenu was a blow to the National Union, but at the same time the National Religious Party decided to form a joint list with National Union called National Union-NRP. In 2008, in anticipation of the 2009 election, the National Union and NRP formally unified into a single party, called the Jewish Home. The Jewish Home was to be a single party, rather than a list of separate parties, and reflected a religious Zionist orientation. It was headed by Daniel HersHKovitz.

As the elections approached, member of the Knesset Aryeh Eldad left to form his own list, Hatikva, while Knesset members Effi Eitam and Yitzhak Levy (formerly Ahi) reestablished Ahi, which later merged into the LIKUD. When Jewish Home announced its candidate list for the elections, five of the top six slots went to ex-NRP members, with only member of the Knesset Uri Ariel, formerly of Tekuma, in the top six.

The remaining ex-Moledet members broke off, reestablished their party, and allied with Eldad's Hatikva, reviving the "National Union" name. Benny Elon declared that he would not seek reelection, and US immigrant Uri Bank took his place on the Jewish Home list. The split within Jewish Home grew, and polls indicated Hatikva could win three seats. Eretz Yisrael Shelanu then joined the National Union, with member Michael Ben-Ari given fourth spot on the alliance's list. While these issues were being negotiated, Uri Ariel also left Jewish Home and rejoined the National Union list, leaving Jewish Home as little more than a renamed NRP.

In the 2009 elections the National Union was an alliance of four parties: Moledet, Hatikva, Eretz Yisrael Shelanu, and Tekuma, winning three Knesset seats and joining the coalition government of BENJAMIN NETANYAHU.

The National Union has a sister organization, the American Friends of Israel's National Union, that raises money for it and disseminates its ideas throughout the UNITED STATES.

The National Union and the various parties associated with it at one time or another share an ideological perspective reflected in the National Union's platform. The mergers and departures are an indication of individual power struggles rather than differences of principle on major issues. Thus a presentation of National Union's platform provides insight into the thinking of all the parties discussed in the foregoing. The National Union rejects all current Oslo-based peace efforts, which it sees as dangerous to Israel and rejects the notion of a Palestinian state; instead it advocates cantons of self-rule for the Arabs in the WEST BANK whose leadership would be local and not imported. It believes that population TRANSFER (of Palestinians from the West Bank and East Jerusalem) is a "precondition for peace negotiations with any Arab country." As the capital of the Jewish people, the Land of Israel, and the state of Israel, Jerusalem "must not be divided again, its status changed, or serve as the capital of any other country." The party also hopes, though this is not explicit in its platform, that one day the East Bank (present-day JORDAN) will be incorporated into Israel, because it considers the East Bank part of the biblical Eretz Yisrael. Its platform further states that the funds transferred to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY by the Israeli government "will henceforth be used for reparations for the damage Israel has suffered during the period of terror [AL-AQSA INTIFADA]." The party's platform supports the SETTLEMENT of all the "Land of Israel," condemns ISRAELI'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA, and advocates the use of more military power in the war on terror and harsher measures against Palestinian TERRORISM. Seeking to limit the participation of Israeli-Palestinians in the political process, the platform declares: "The State of Israel is the state of the Jewish people. A party will not be allowed to stand for election to the Knesset if its platform does not affirm that the State of Israel is the state of the Jewish people. The Israeli government must clearly mandate that every citizen of Israel will swear loyalty to the flag of Israel, to its national anthem, the Tikvah and to the laws of the state. Citizenship will be revoked from those implicated in terror acts and those who identify with terrorist organizations. Any movement which takes upon itself a purpose detrimental to the Jewish state and its principles, such as the Islamic Movement, will be outlawed." The National Union also wants to create the means to initiate population transfer of all non-Jewish Israeli citizens.

Bibliography

- American Friends of National Union Party. n.d. www.thenationalunion.com/AFINU/AFINU.html.
- Maor, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Roberts, Samuel J. Party and Policy in Israel: The Battle between Hawks and Doves. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Shavit, Ari. "Dear God, This Is Effi." Ha'aretz. 23 March 2002.

National Unity Government (Palestinian, 2007)

See MECCA AGREEMENT AND THE PALESTINIAN UNITY GOVERNMENT

National Water Carrier

See JOHN F DULLES; DWIGHT EISENHOWER; JOHNSTON PLAN; UNITED NATIONS TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION

Natshe Document, 2004

The 2004 Natshe Document was produced by Rafiq Natshe (Abu Shakar), a former speaker of the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) ambassador in SAUDI ARABIA for many years, and a highly respected figure in the Palestinian community. The document, which accused PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT of deception, fraud, and treason, exposed extensive corruption by Arafat and his supporters. In an unusual charge, Natshe accused Arafat of practicing "TERRORISM." According to the document, Arafat personally directed the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, telling them what to attack and when. "With one hand," Natshe charged, "he funds the al-Aqsa Brigades and with the other he sells them out."

The head of the Natshe family, the leading clan of HEBRON, Natshe exposed corruption at the highest levels in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). One among many cases was the Egyptian Cement affair, in which a construction firm owned by PNA prime minister AHMAD QUREI' supplied Israel cement from Egypt for constructing new settlements. According to Natshe, Arafat consistently obstructed all efforts to scrutinize PNA finances and audit its accounts, which were under his exclusive control. Natshe accused Arafat and the FATAH party leadership of pocketing huge financial contributions from Saudi Arabia that were intended to benefit the Palestinian people.

Despite Natshe's influence, he had difficulty finding a publisher for the forty-page document. According to Natshe, Arafat's followers frightened journalists and TV stations around the Arab world to prevent them from fully exposing the extensive corruption in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP. Finally BILAL AL-HASAN, who lives in Paris and is the brother of HANI AL-HASAN, one of Arafat's closest advisers, managed to place the Natshe document in the most popular Fatah Internet chat rooms.

Natshe's aggravation peaked in 2002, when he decided that the widespread corruption meant he could no longer support Arafat or the PNA. Adding to his frustrations, Arafat's gunmen attempted to assassinate Nabil Amer, another PNC legislator and a fellow Hebronite from the largest Hebron clan. Like Natshe, Amer had been an outspoken critic of Arafat and his followers. Amer survived the attack but was severely wounded, and Natshe and Amer prepared to retaliate. On 27 July 2004 the Coordinating Committee of Hebron's Palestinian Organizations put Arafat on notice that he would suffer repercussions from harming a Hebronite. In local terms, the Palestinians of Hebron had declared a blood feud against Arafat.

Bibliography

- Free Muslims Coalition. "Prominent Hebronite Publishes Unprecedented Indictment of Arafat." 30 July 2004. www.freemuslims.org.

Natzerat Illit and Nazareth

Natzerat Illit (Jewish Upper Nazareth) was built in the 1950s after DAVID BEN-GURION, outraged by the presence of so many Arabs in the Galilee, appointed the director general of the Ministry of Defense, SHIMON PERES, to “Judaize” the Galilee using emergency regulations that allowed the army to confiscate LAND from Palestinians. Natzerat Illit opened in 1957, and senior army officers were billeted there. Upper Nazareth was built entirely on land confiscated from PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL in Nazareth and the surrounding villages of Ein Mahel and Reineh. Natzerat Illit has a population of some 50,000 (up from the original 300 settlers) in an area of 40,000 dunums (9,884 acres), compared to Nazareth, the largest Palestinian city in Israel, with a population of some 70,000 living in area of 15,000 dunums (3,706 acres) that is not allowed to expand by a single square meter. Upper Nazareth is a strategically placed “development town” literally overlooking and surrounding Palestinian Nazareth. By its physical presence and through municipal underfunding, Natzerat Illit has prevented Nazareth from expanding to accommodate the natural growth of its population.

Until recently, few Palestinians were able to move to Natzerat Illit as a means of coping with Nazareth’s housing shortage because Israeli housing authorities and banks did their utmost over the years to limit the Palestinian inflow to Natzerat Illit, chiefly by selective approval of government-backed mortgages and highly selective rental of publicly owned properties. According to Israeli historian Ilan Pappé, officially, no Palestinians live in the “Jewish” city of Natzerat Illit. In fact, in 2009, according to the Arab Association for Human Rights, of the 50,000 inhabitants of the city, 20 percent (10,000) are Palestinians. Most of them bought houses from RUSSIAN FEDERATION immigrants who wanted to move to Tel Aviv. Most had to pay exorbitant prices, some as much as $1 million for a house, three times the market value. There are no Palestinian schools or kindergartens, so the roads between Nazareth and Upper Nazareth are overcrowded in rush hour.

The “nonexistent” 20 percent are represented on the city council by two Palestinian councilors, who are in an unlikely coalition with the ultra-right-wing party of AVIGDOR LIEBERMAN. Because the Christian mayor, Ramiz Jaraisy, needed their support in order to defeat the LABOR PARTY, they demanded, and received, a promise that an Arab school would be built in Natzerat Illit. The mayor is nonetheless committed to the “Judaization” of his city, and Lieberman has declared that stopping the IMMIGRATION of Arabs into Natzerat “is a national priority.”

There is systematic discrimination by the government between Nazareth and Natzerat Illit. While Natzerat Illit’s economy is healthy, since 2000, Nazareth has experienced an economic recession that includes crises in textiles and construction that have dealt crushing blows to the Arab villages around Nazareth and, in turn, to the city. Nazareth faces high unemployment, an outdated and insufficiently funded educational system, and a growing number of families living beneath the poverty line. Aggravating these problems, Nazareth suffers from inadequate INFRASTRUCTURE and a weak medical care system, among many other inequities. The annual budget of the chief scientist in the Ministry of Industry and Trade is NIS 1.8 billion ($477 million). The Arab sector gets none of that. In Nazareth, the cost of a square meter of commercial space is the same as in the heart of Tel Aviv. There are no master plans for zoning and housing and no industrial area, inhibiting development, job creation, and the ability to raise sums from municipal taxes. On the other hand, Jewish Natzerat Illit has large industrial areas and thriving factories and businesses. One additional dimension of the discrimination became evident during the July 2006 war between Israel and HIZBULLAH when missiles fell on northern Israel. Nazaret Illit had bomb shelters and warning sirens for its citizens while Nazareth’s citizens had neither. On 19 July a rocket fired by Hizbullah killed three people in Nazareth, including two children, all Muslim.

Given the number of Palestinians who have moved into Natzerat Illit, the government has undertaken a renewed campaign to entice Jews to move there. The present attempt is motivated by the failure of the previous policies to make the Galilee in general, and Nazareth in particular, Jewish. People and economies move in mysterious ways: well-off Palestinians began buying houses in the citadel that was built to evict them. Pappé relates that Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU regards this as a grave threat to Israel’s national security. Local politicians are even more blunt. “If we lose the Jewish majority in the Galilee, this is the end of the Jewish state,” Motti Dotan, a member of the Labor Party, said recently. “I would like to imagine a Galilee without Arabs: no thefts, no crimes . . . we will have normal life.” The racist mood in Israel absolves the government from any inhibitions that may have restricted its actions in the past.

Now ecologists, industrialists, and academics have been drafted to find ways to increase the Jewish population. The JEWISH NATIONAL FUND is behind the initiative, along with the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel. The aim of diminishing the Palestinian presence in the Galilee is also fully endorsed by the prestigious union of Israeli wine producers, which has adopted a plan prepared by leading academics from the Israel Institute of Technology. Published in 2003, the plan calls for the Jewish “takeover” of the Galilee. “It is either them or us,” it begins. “The land problems in the Galilee proved that any territory not taken by Zionist elements is going to be coveted by non-Zionists.”

The gist of what they propose is to seize strategically important land by force and hold on to it until Jews settle on it. The director general of AMPA, an electrical manufacturer, recently said that his company now not only makes refrigerators but is also actively supporting the “Judaization of the Galilee” by building new communities in the area for AMPA’s veterans. “We are not ashamed to say that our plans have a Zionist element.”

The Palestinian village of Ayn Mahil, east of Nazareth and adjacent to Natzerat Illit, is now accessible only by one road, one that goes through a Jewish religious neighborhood in Natzerat Illit. As a result, on the Day of Atonement the people of Ayn Mahil cannot leave or enter their village. They will soon be encircled by a new town called Shacharit (which means “dawn” in Hebrew but which is also the name of the first Jewish prayer of the day). Ten thousand ultra-Orthodox Jews will be settled there, and the hope is that they will rectify the “unfavorable” demographic balance, as well as cut Ayn Mahil off from the greater Nazareth area. The village’s ancient olive groves have been uprooted in preparation for the building work. A new road network will ensure that other villages are separated from each other and from Nazareth.

Bibliography

- Algazy, Joseph. “The Nazareth Mosque Debacle: Growing Force of Israel’s Islamists.” Le Monde diplomatique. March 2000.
- Christiansen, Drew. “Nazareth Journal.” America: The National Catholic Weekly. 182:4 (12 February 2000).
- Cook, Jonathan. “The Human Shields of Nazareth.” AntiWar.com, 19 July 2006. www.antiwar.com.
- Emmett, Chad F. Beyond the Basilica: Christians and Muslims in Nazareth. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Pappé, Ilan. “In Upper Nazareth.” London Review of Books. 10 September 2009.
- Rabinowitz, Dan. Overlooking Nazareth: The Ethnography of Exclusion in Galilee. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Strasler, Nehemia. “Nazareth versus Upper Nazareth.” Ha’aretz. 30 June 2002.
- Urbina, Ian, and Hanna Nasser. “Church Siege Narrowed a Religious Divide.” Los Angeles Times. 12 May 2002.
- Usher, Graham. “Unholy Wars.” Al-Ahram Weekly (Cairo). 451 (14–20 October 1999).
- Wenner, Aaron, Torie Partridge, and Mark Weiss. “Nazareth Brothers Aged 9 and 3 Buried.” Jerusalem Post. 18 July 2006.

Nazareth

Nazareth, one of the most important biblical Christian cities, was the only Arab town left intact after the 1948 WAR and today is the largest Palestinian town in Israel. Most Nazarenes today are Israeli Arabs, about 35 to 40 percent of whom are Christians and the remainder Muslims. Nazareth is situated in the ridges of the Nazareth Mountains about nineteen miles (thirty-one kilometers) from the Sea of Galilee and about five miles (nine kilometers) west from Mount Tabor in Galilee. In 2005 it had a population of about 65,000.

The BASILICA OF THE ANNUNCIATION and numerous other Christian shrines are located in Nazareth. Although the city is not mentioned in the Hebrew Bible, Josephus, or the Talmud, some scholars argue that it became an exclusively Jewish town after the Bar Kokhba revolt in the second century and remained so until the fourth century, when the emperor Constantine had a church built over the Cave of the Annunciation. Other scholars find any early Jewish connection to Nazareth highly doubtful.

In the seventh century CE the Byzantine emperor Heraclius conquered Nazareth and expelled the small Jewish community then living there. In 638 CE, Muslim armies conquered the area, but Christian communities continued to thrive under tolerant Muslim rule. In 722, Yazid II, an Ummayyad caliph who ruled from 720 to 724, ordered the destruction of images in churches because of the Islamic prohibition on depicting human forms. The Crusaders entered Nazareth in 1102, found it in ruins, and rebuilt the Church of the Annunciation and other churches. In 1187 the city was taken by the Muslim leader SALADIN, and the Christian population fled or was destroyed. In 1201 a treaty between the Roman Catholic Church and al-'Adil, Saladin's brother, allowed Christian pilgrimages to the holy sites to resume. In 1263 the MAMLUK armies under Baybars destroyed the city and drove out all the Christians.

Once Palestine came under OTTOMAN rule in 1517, Nazareth was part of the province of Acre. In 1620 the Franciscans returned to the holy sites under a benevolent local Muslim ruler, and Christians began to move back and purchase property, but their status continued to be subject to the whims of local despots. In the late eighteenth century they experienced ill treatment from the forces of Ahmad Pasha (al-Jazzar), who was governor of the Acre district and known as "the Butcher" for his indiscriminate brutality. Nevertheless he successfully defended Akka against Napoleon (who spent a night in Nazareth).

In the nineteenth century, Nazareth participated in the Nahda (awakening or renaissance) movement, a cultural and intellectual flourishing in the Arab world. The city was especially known for its schools, and many people, including prominent writers from the Levant, came to Nazareth for education. Among the schools the Russian seminary became particularly famous, and many European missions in Nazareth had their own schools and taught in their respective languages. During the nineteenth century, Nazareth also became the main commercial center in the Galilee region, taking advantage of caravans passing through to the coast. A thriving weekly market offered livestock, fabrics, and agricultural products, and Nazareth was a center for the production of agricultural implements. With a growing population that approached 7,000 by the end of the nineteenth century, Nazareth continued to function as a regional commercial center, before being overtaken by the growing coastal cities of HAIFA and JAFFA in the twentieth century.

Under the BRITISH MANDATE (1917–1948) Nazareth was an important administrative center as well as a place where opposition to ZIONISM flourished, and after World War I there were growing protests against the influx of Zionist settlers. Nazareth sent a delegation to the First Palestine Congress in 1919 and established a branch of the MUSLIM-CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION in 1922. Less active than other towns during the ARAB REVOLT (1936–1939), Nazareth was chosen as the site for protests against the inclusion of the Galilee in the Jewish state proposed by the British PEEL COMMISSION. The protests led to the assassination of Lewis Andrews, the British acting district commissioner of the Galilee.

In 1948 the Arabs of Nazareth had expected that the city, then overflowing with REFUGEES from Haifa, TIBERIAS, and the surrounding villages, would be placed under international protection with the status of a holy city. (Nazareth was part of the proposed Arab state under UN RESOLUTION 181, the partition plan.) Instead the city became a target of the largest Zionist offensive in northern Palestine, Operation Dekel, carried out during the first and second truces in the 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors. Poorly defended, Nazareth surrendered after only light fighting to Israeli forces on 16 July 1948, and the ARAB LIBERATION ARMY forces under the command of FAWZI AL-QAWUQJI retreated to the mountains in the north. According to some sources, Nazareth was spared the brutal treatment of other areas in the Galilee because of its Christian population and the international status of its religious institutions.

Expulsion and occupation throughout the Galilee were the goal of Israel's political and military leaders, and the military command was prepared to carry out this order in Nazareth. However, the military commander, who was one of the signers of the truce, defied the order, and was removed from command. Thereafter, a senior general was prepared to move ahead with the evacuation, but DAVID BEN-GURION, aware of the threat of international condemnation if the city's Christian population was harmed, retracted the order. Thus, unlike with other Palestinian cities and towns, there was no mass evacuation of Nazareth, although many "undesirables" were expelled, and the city, with its thousands of REFUGEES who had fled from nearby villages, was under the strict military control of the Israeli state until 1965.

After the war and the Nakba (the Palestinian exodus from Israel), Nazareth became a hub for what remained of the Arab intelligentsia and was the base for the AL-ARD movement, an Arab nationalist political movement that emerged in the 1950s. Arab nationalism was a strong current in the city, and the intellectual elite included both GREEK ORTHODOX Christians and Muslims—for example, EMILE HABIBI, TAWFIQ ZAYYAD, and many others. The Communist Party in Nazareth gave voice to the grievances of Nazareth and of Palestinians in general, a trend that culminated when Zayyad was elected mayor of Nazareth in 1973, a position he retained until his death in 1994. For Nazarenes and for many others, Zayyad became the symbol of Palestinian sumud (steadfastness) inside Israel.

See also NAZARETH: BASILICA OF THE ANNUNCIATION; NATZERAT ILLIT AND NAZARETH

Bibliography

- Benvenisti, Meron. The Crusaders in the Holy Land. New York: Macmillan, 1972.
- Emmett, Chad F. Beyond the Basilica: Christians and Muslims in Nazareth. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Hollis, Christopher, and Ronald Brownrigg. Holy Places: Jewish, Christian and Muslim Monuments in the Holy Land. New York: Praeger, 1969.
- Nazzal, Nafez. The Palestinian Exodus from Galilee 1948. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1978.
- Pappé, Ilan. The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine. Oxford, UK: Oneworld Publications, 2006.
- Rabinowitz, Dan. Overlooking Nazareth: The Ethnography of Exclusion in Galilee. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.

—Betsy Folkins

Nazareth: Basilica of the Annunciation

NAZARETH contains one of Christianity's holiest sites, the Basilica of the Annunciation, where CHRISTIANS believe the Angel Gabriel informed Mary that she would carry the son of God. In the years leading up to the 2000 millennium celebration, Israel catalyzed a conflict between Christians and Muslims when the Tourism Ministry decided to earmark extra funds for Nazareth so it could construct a plaza on land in front of the basilica to cater to the millions of tourists and pilgrims expected for Christmas 2000. Israel's Muslim community protested that the area for the proposed plaza was an undisputed parcel of land that since before 1948 belonged to the waqf (an Islamic religious trust) and has been recognized since the Middle Ages as the location of the tomb of Shihab al-Din (a nephew of twelfth-century Muslim leader SALADIN). But after Israel declared its plan to extend the plaza in front of the basilica, the Muslims claimed that the entire area, including the plaza, was part of the same waqf property and set up a tent at the site, demanding that a mosque be built on it.

The actions taken by Israel seriously damaged relations between Muslims and Christians, divided the people of Nazareth in their struggle against the institutionalized discrimination between NAZARETH and NATZERAT ILLIT, and aggravated relations with church leaders and mosque imams throughout the Holy Land. When the Christians and Muslims were unable to resolve the dispute, Israel appointed two official bodies to rule on the matter. The first was a ministerial committee set up under the BENJAMIN NETANYAHU government, but when the LABOR government of EHUD BARAK took office in July 1999, Shlomo Ben-Ami became the minister of public security and sought a compromise between the waqf and the municipality. The second ruling institution was the Nazareth District Court, which claims ownership of the 1,860 square meters (20,000 square feet) of land earmarked for the plaza.

On 1 October 1999, Ben-Ami presented a compromise that affirmed the municipality's right to authorize the building of a plaza, on the condition that 700 square meters (7,500 square feet) would be set aside for the construction of a small mosque. By way of compensation, the waqf would be given 10 dunums (2.5 acres) of land elsewhere in Nazareth that could be used for "cultural and educational facilities." Although the Muslims welcomed the decision, the main Christian churches in Israel and Palestine were furious. In a rare show of Christian unity, and within hours of the announcement of the Ben-Ami decision, the Greek Orthodox, Latin, and Armenian churches made public a letter they had sent privately to Barak on 11 September. Together with the VATICAN's representative in the Holy Land, the patriarchs warned that they would close down all the Christian holy sites in Jerusalem during the Christmas period if the Muslims' tent was not removed from the area of the basilica.

In 1999 the Nazareth District Court then ruled that, aside from the 135 square meters (1,400 square feet) that holds the tomb of Shihab al-Din, the plot next to the Basilica of the Annunciation is STATE LAND over which the waqf has no claim. The ruling was met with quiet satisfaction by the churches but with fury by the Muslims. On 8 October over a thousand Muslims turned out for noon prayers at the “tent mosque” adjacent to the church. During a peaceful rally they heard speeches from imams and members of the Knesset belonging to the Muslim-backed UNITED ARAB LIST denouncing the district court ruling, warning the pope to “stay out of Nazareth’s internal affairs,” and generally applauding the Ben-Ami compromise. The rally passed peacefully.

At the time relations between the Israeli government and the Muslims were tense because some Nazarene Islamists were involved in a series of car bombings in HAIFA and TIBERIAS aimed at Israelis. The offenders were a minority on the fringes of Arab and Muslim society and were known in Nazareth as longtime troublemakers. But on Easter 1999 Islamic militants attacked Christians leaving Holy Saturday services in Nazareth. Three days of inter-religious group violence followed, with vandalism, looting, and beatings by both sides. Through it all the Israeli police simply stood aside. Only when church leaders threatened to close all the churches in the country in protest did police intervene to curb the violence.

A third compromise emerged later that spring. Although Netanyahu was out of office, the inter-ministerial committee appointed by his government decided that the Muslims could erect a shrine, though not a mosque, on one quarter (500 square meters or about 5,300 square feet) of the disputed plot. The remainder of the ground would be used for a public square, as proposed by the Nazareth 2000 Committee. Nazarene Christians accepted the compromise, but the Muslims did not. Then, in October 1999 an Israeli district court upheld the Nazareth municipal court, ruled that the disputed land did not belong to the waqf and also declared that it was state land.

Subsequently the government of Ehud Barak announced another compromise. It would permit the construction of a mosque (not just a shrine) on a larger site, but the site would take only 450 square meters (4,800 square feet) from the proposed square and 250 square meters (2,700 square feet) purchased from neighboring private property—plus the Israeli government would pay for the mosque’s construction. The Muslims ended their protest and accepted the Barak compromise. On 23 November they laid the cornerstone for the mosque on what was to have been the plaza in front of the basilica.

The most apparent reason for each government’s differing decisions was the desire of each for electoral support. Both the Labor and LIKUD parties consistently campaign in Arab cities such as Nazareth (where, in 2000, Muslims were 70 percent of the population) and just as consistently make promises to the Palestinian people in exchange for votes—promises that are seldom kept. In May 1999, just before ELECTIONS for prime minister, the ministerial campaigns of both major parties sought the votes of the Muslims in Nazareth. Likud and the Netanyahu government had offered the Muslims several compromise solutions, and the Commission of Inquiry that Netanyahu established would have allowed them to build a mosque. Ehud Barak and the Labor party negotiated far-reaching demands between with the United Arab List, supported by most Muslims, which would allow the Muslims of Israel to be recognized as a separate community and also, by implication, for a solution of the Shihab a-Din controversy to the Muslims’ liking.

The issue of the Nazareth mosque afforded Israel for the first time an opportunity to divide the historically united population of Israel’s largest Palestinian city. Patriarch of Jerusalem Michael Sabah termed the government ruling an “Israeli policy of divide and rule” aimed at splitting Arab Muslims from Christians, and many Muslims seemed to understand this point. The protesters’ demands for a mosque were opposed, for example, by the PNA president YASIR ARAFAT and the Islamic Supreme Council in JERUSALEM. Moreover, on the eve of the mosque cornerstone laying, the government of SAUDI ARABIA offered to pay for the construction of a substitute mosque elsewhere in Nazareth.

Nevertheless, the Israeli government stood by its decision and construction of the mosque proceeded. On 25 March 2000, however, Pope John Paul II said mass at the Basilica of the Annunciation, and, under stiff pressure from the Vatican and a united front of Christian factions in the Holy Land, the Israeli government, on 4 March 2002, reversed earlier decisions and declared that the mosque would not go forward. The government based its decision on the recommendation of a special ministerial committee led by Minister of Construction and Housing NATAN SHARANSKY, who suggested to the Nazareth waqf alternative locations for construction of the proposed mosque. The government offered the waqf seven possible locations, all available for immediate building, and promised to restore Shahib al-Din’s grave without altering the status of the site. In addition, the government called for implementation of the Nazareth municipality's original plan to turn the disputed square alongside the church into an open plaza for tourists.

In July 2003 the six-year conflict came to an ephemeral end when Israel dispatched bulldozers and jackhammers to tear down the foundation of the mosque, leaving the Muslim population seething with anger and the likelihood of inter-communal violence tangible. A public square was constructed at the site, although the official opening has been delayed for fear of reigniting tensions. The temporary walls surrounding the square were torn down by protesters in 2006 after a fanatic Jew, Haim Habibi, carried out an attack on the Basilica of the Annunciation while worshippers were gathered in prayer for the coming Easter holidays.

Bibliography

- Algazy, Joseph. "The Nazareth Mosque Debacle: Growing Force of Israel's Islamists." Le Monde diplomatique. March 2000.
- Cook, Jonathan. Blood and Religion: The Unmasking of the Jewish and Democratic State. London: Pluto Press, 2006.
- . "Israeli Extremists' Attack on Nazareth's Most Famous Christian Church Goes Virtually Unreported." The Electronic Intifada. 8 March 2006. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.
- Dunn, Ross. "Mosque Ban Tears Apart Holy Land." Scotland on Sunday. 13 January 2002.
- Emmett, Chad F. Beyond the Basilica: Christians and Muslims in Nazareth. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.
- Israeli, Raphael. "The Anti-Millennium: The Islamization of Nazareth." Jerusalem Letter No. 428. Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. 16 April 2000.
- Khoury, Jack. "Israeli Arab Leaders Blame Government for Nazareth Church Attack." Ha'aretz. 6 March 2006.
- Myre, Greg. "In a Christian-Muslim Dispute, Israel Blocks a New Mosque." New York Times. 2 July 2003.
- Prime Ministers Office (Israel). Cabinet Communiqué. At the Weekly Cabinet Meeting Today. 3 March 2002. www.pmo.gov.il/PMOEng/Archive/cabmeet/2002/03/Spokesman4977.htm.
- Rabinowitz, Dan. Overlooking Nazareth: The Ethnography of Exclusion in Galilee. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Rekness, Eli. "The Arabs of Israel after Oslo: Localization of the National Struggle." Israel Studies. 7:3 (2002).
- Schemmann, Serge. "In Shift, Israel Bars Building of a Mosque Near a Church." New York Times. 4 March 2002.

Shaham, Ron. "Christian and Jewish 'waqf' in Palestine during the Late Ottoman Period." Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies (University of London). 54:3 (1991).

Shuman, Ellis. "Nazareth Mosque Will Not Be Built Next to the Basilica of the Annunciation." Israel-insider. 4 March 2002.

Urbina, Ian, and Hanna Nasser. "Church Siege Narrowed a Religious Divide." Los Angeles Times. 12 May 2002.

Usher, Graham. "Seeking Sanctuary: The 'Church' vs. 'Mosque' Dispute in Nazareth." Middle East Report. 214 (Spring 2000).

———. "Unholy Wars." Al-Ahram Weekly (Cairo). 451 (14–20 October 1999).

US State Department. Country Reports on Human Rights Practices: Israel and the Occupied Territories, 2000. Washington, DC: US State Department, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor, 2001.

NELED (Women for Coexistence)

NELED was founded in 1989 in Israel to bring together Palestinian and Jewish citizens of Israel. In this spirit the group initiates solidarity visits to and activities within the Palestinian territories. It networks with institutions in the Palestinian city of Tulkarm, such as the orphanage and the Institute for Children with Mental Disability. On holidays NELED collects donations and brings the children gifts. (<http://coalitionofwomen.org/home/english/organizations/neled>).

Neoconservatives, US

Neoconservative ideology is characterized by an emphasis on militarism, on the need to continuously expand and increase US military strength, and to utilize military means in offensive as well as defensive situations. Under the GEORGE W. BUSH administration, neoconservatives (or neocons) dominated US foreign policy making, and nowhere was their influence more pronounced than in the Middle East generally and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in particular.

Neocons tend to believe that the UNITED STATES should overthrow regimes deemed hostile to its interests and that preemption is the best assurance of security. They advocate the spread of democracy (even in cases where elections produce anti-US regimes), by war if necessary. However, the neoconservative concern with installing democracy by force is limited to a few states and nonstate actors in the Middle East and Islamic countries, particularly potential opponents of Israel. Neocons admire Israel's militarism and bold military actions—for example, preemptive strikes and TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS. They respect the Israeli government's willingness to use military means without regard for constraints and consider Israel to be the most important strategic ally of the US and a democratic country threatened by various forms of TERRORISM: ISLAMIC FUNDAMENTALISM, Palestinian nationalism, and IRAN's nuclear. From this worldview, any threat to Israel is also a direct threat to the United States, because both are democratic, free, peace-loving, and civilized countries as well as allies. Neoconservative identification with the state of Israel increased after the 11 September 2001 terrorist attacks, which for the neoconservatives highlighted the parallels between the United States and Israel as democratic states under the threat of Islamic terrorism. Additionally, neocons have an emotional attachment to Israel not often evident in international relations. A significant proportion of neoconservatives are Jewish, but the group's non-Jewish adherents are just as devoted to Israel.

Neoconservatives perceive the world as dichotomous: countries are either allies or enemies, while nations are considered either good or evil. Neocons speak in stark terms, labeling enemies as like "Hitler" or "Stalin," "Nazis," or "communists." In this context Israel is good and the Palestinians are essentially terrorists, whom Israel must suppress. The neocons believe the Palestinians in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES should have limited local autonomy but only after Israel has ensured that they can pose no military threat. They believe that Israel alone has the right to decide the fate of the Occupied Territories and consider Israel's sovereignty legitimate over all of JERUSALEM, including Palestinian East Jerusalem.

During the first eight years of the twenty-first century, the neoconservatives held many positions of power in the US government and dominated many think tanks and opinion-making and policy-planning forums. Notable neoconservatives include the former vice president Dick Cheney, defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, chief Middle East adviser at the White House's National Security Council Elliot Abrams, special assistant to the president Peter W. Rodman, assistant secretary of defense Zal-may Khalilzad, special assistant to the president John R. Bolton (later Bush's ambassador to the United Nations), deputy defense secretary Paul Wolfowitz, and many unelected experts that make foreign policy.

Bibliography

- Blumenthal, Sidney. The Rise of the Counter-Establishment: From Conservative Ideology to Political Power. New York: Harper and Row, 1986.
- Daalder, Ivo H., and James M. Lindsay. America Unbound: The Bush Revolution in Foreign Policy. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2003.
- Dorrien, Gary. The Neoconservative Mind: Politics, Culture, and the War of Ideology. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1994.
- Eisendrath, Craig R., and Melvin A. Goodman. Bush League Diplomacy: How the Neoconservatives Are Putting the World at Risk. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2004.
- Friedman, Murray. The Neoconservative Revolution: Jewish Intellectuals and the Shaping of Public Policy. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Frum, David, and Richard Perle. An End to Evil: How to Win the War on Terror. New York: Random House, 2003.
- Fukuyama, Francis. America at the Crossroads: Democracy, Power, and the Neoconservative Legacy. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2006.
- Gerson, Mark. The Neoconservative Vision: From the Cold War to the Culture Wars. Lanham, MD, and London: Madison Books, 1997.
- Halper, Stefan, and Jonathan Clarke. America Alone: The Neo-Conservatives and the Global Order. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Kagan, Donald, and Fredrick W. Kagan. While America Sleeps: Self-Delusion, Military Weakness, and the Threat to Peace Today. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Kaplan, Lawrence F., and William Kristol. The War over Iraq: Saddam's Tyranny and America's Mission. New York: Encounter Books, 2003.
- Kepel, Gilles. The War for Muslim Minds: Islam and the West. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2004.
- Sharansky, Natan. The Case for Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror. New York: PublicAffairs, 2004.
- Smith, Grant F. Deadly Dogma: How Neoconservatives Broke the Law to Deceive America. Washington, DC: Institute for Research, 2006.
- Steinfels, Peter. The Neoconservatives: The Men Who Are Changing America's Politics. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1979.
- Zakaria, Fareed. The Future of Freedom: Illiberal Democracy at Home and Abroad. New York: W. W. Norton, 2003.

Netanyahu, Benjamin (1949–)

Benjamin Netanyahu, an Israeli politician and diplomat who was prime minister from 1996 to 1999 and began a new term in 2009, is the first prime minister born after the creation of the state. A member of the conservative LIKUD PARTY, the self-assured Netanyahu, called “BiBi” in Israel, is known for his intelligent use of the ISRAELI MEDIA and public relations acumen.

He is the grandson of a Lithuanian rabbi who immigrated to Palestine in 1920 and the son of Benzion Netanyahu, a theorist of Revisionist ZIONISM and secretary to ZE’EV JABOTINSKY, the founder of Revisionist Zionism. Netanyahu grew up in Cheltenham, Pennsylvania, where his father was a history professor and where he graduated from high school. From 1967 to 1972 he was an officer in an elite Israeli commando unit and later studied at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, receiving bachelor’s and master’s degrees in science. After studying architecture and business administration, he worked for the Boston Consulting Group until 1978, when he returned to Israel.

He immediately became active in politics, served as Israel’s UN representative from 1984 to 1988, and was first elected to the Knesset in 1988. Netanyahu served as deputy foreign minister from 1988 to 1991 and deputy prime minister from 1991 to 1992; he was also part of the Israeli delegation to the MADRID CONFERENCE in 1991. Netanyahu is regarded as a hawk and is politically close to YITZHAK SHAMIR, in whose cabinet he served. In March 1993 he became leader of the Likud and was largely responsible for engineering its return to political power after its 1992 electoral defeat. After Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN was assassinated in 1995 by a right-wing religious Zionist, Netanyahu was criticized for previously cultivating extremist Jewish sentiment against Rabin.

In May 1996 Netanyahu was narrowly elected prime minister on a platform that focused almost exclusively on a tough stance on TERRORISM. His tenure as prime minister was marked by difficult talks with the Palestinians in the OSLO PROCESS, which occurred mostly because of US pressure. In the end he made some tactical concessions to placate Washington and to give the appearance of respecting the commitments made by previous governments. However, Netanyahu remained committed to the Greater Israel ideology (that the entire land of Israel belongs exclusively to the Jewish people) and publicly declared that JERUSALEM is one unified city under permanent Israeli sovereignty. He refused to negotiate the status of Jerusalem—even though such negotiations were stipulated in the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (between the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION [PLO] and Israel). While prime minister, Netanyahu made several highly provocative gestures that greatly disillusioned the Palestinians—for example, constructing the HAR HOMA SETTLEMENT to complete the ring of Jewish colonies around East Jerusalem and opening the HASMONEAN TUNNEL under the Muslim religious site AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF. He rejects the creation of a Palestinian state, which he sees as a “Trojan horse” designed to annihilate Israel. Netanyahu is committed to permanent Israeli control of the biblical Judea and Samaria (the WEST BANK), which he describes as a “protective wall” against Israel’s Arab neighbors, and is determined to construct many more Israeli settlements in this area. He opposes the OSLO ACCORDS, which “proves to the PLO that terrorism really pays,” and said that “the continuation of the application of the Oslo Agreements girds Israel with terrorist bases.” He will at most tolerate a limited form of local Palestinian autonomy over some civil matters, as defined in the INTERIM AGREEMENT (between Israel and the PLO) on the West Bank and GAZA STRIP.

Corruption scandals in Netanyahu’s cabinet and strong reactions to his personality contributed to his May 1999 loss to ONE ISRAEL (LABOR PARTY) leader EHUD BARAK. However, after ARIEL SHARON was elected prime minister, Netanyahu served as foreign minister from 2002 to 2003 and as finance minister from 2003 to 2005.

On 9 August 2005 Netanyahu resigned from ARIEL SHARON’s government in protest over ISRAEL’S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA. When Sharon created the KADIMA PARTY, Netanyahu decided to remain with the Likud, running for prime minister in the 2006 elections. The Likud, however, came in a distant third. After leaving Sharon’s government, Netanyahu established himself as Israel’s strongest advocate for the missile defense plans of the GEORGE W. BUSH administration. Netanyahu’s political career has been financed by the most conservative wing of the pro-Israeli lobby in the UNITED STATES.

In March 2009, Benjamin Netanyahu was again elected prime minister of Israel and put together the most far right coalition ever to have governed the state. Unexpectedly, Labor joined the coalition at the last hour. The following parties comprise Netanyahu's governing coalition:

- Likud, 27 seats: Rejects the establishment of a Palestinian state; insists on completing the separation BARRIER and maintaining Israeli control over most of the Occupied West Bank, including East JERUSALEM, the main settlement blocs, the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, and the Judean Desert—relegating Palestinians to a series of disconnected Bantustans.
- YISRAEL BEITENU, 15 seats: Headed by the controversial AVIGDOR LIEBERMAN, who has advocated the forced expulsion of Israel's Palestinian citizens, the party is primarily driven by a desire to cleanse Israel of as many non-Jews as possible. Main supporters come from recent immigrant populations from the former SOVIET UNION.
- Labor, 13 seats: Its platform closely resembles that of Kadima with regard to the peace process. The platform mentions the need for a return to the ROAD MAP for peace, yet supports unilateral action that would allow Israel to retain control of the Palestinian land on which its major settlement blocs sit.
- SHAS, 11 seats: The Knesset's largest religious-Zionist party, guided by the controversial Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, whose inflammatory remarks about Arabs have outraged liberal sectors of Israel; opposes any negotiations over the status of East Jerusalem, usually takes a hard line on the Palestinian issue.
- UNITED TORAH JUDAISM, 5 seats: A religious-Zionist bloc, it supports the application of Jewish religious law to all spheres of Israeli society. Its policies and ideology are heavily influenced by a council of religious scholars. It has consistently expressed its unwillingness to support any moves by the Israeli government to negotiate with the Palestinian Authority over the status of Jerusalem, insisting that East Jerusalem remain under Israeli control.
- The Jewish Home, 3 seats: A religious-Zionist party that emerged from the split of the NATIONAL UNION–NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY, it rejects the return of any of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, opposes the creation of a Palestinian state, and promotes active Jewish settlement of all the Occupied Territories.

Bibliography

Arian, Alan. The Second Republic: Politics in Israel. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1997.

Broder, Jonathan. "Netanyahu and American Jews." World Policy Journal. 15:1 (1998).

Garfinkle, Adam. Politics and Society in Modern Israel: Myths and Realities, 2nd ed. Armonk, NY: Sharpe, 1997.

Netanyahu, Benjamin. A Durable Peace: Israel and Its Place among the Nations. New York: Warner Books, 2000.

———. Fighting Terrorism: How Democracies Can Defeat Domestic and International Terrorists. New York: Noonday Press, 1997.

———. Terrorism: How the West Can Win. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1985.

Netanyahu, Benjamin, ed. International Terrorism: Challenge and Response. Jerusalem: The Jonathan Institute, 1980.

Podhoretz, Norman. "The Tragic Predicament of Benjamin Netanyahu." Commentary. 102:5 (1996).

Neturei Karta

Neturei Karta (Guardians of the City in Aramaic) is a group of HAREDI (ultra-Orthodox) Jews who not only reject all forms of ZIONISM but also actively oppose the state of Israel and advocate the Palestinian cause. Numbering some 5,000, they are mainly concentrated in the JERUSALEM neighborhoods of Batei Ungarin and Meah Shearim, with smaller groups in London, New York City, and upstate New York. Most members of Neturei Karta are descended from Hungarian Jews who settled in Jerusalem's Old City in the early nineteenth century. Adherents of Neturei Karta stress that the classical rabbinic literature states that Jews were first sent into exile from the Land of Israel for their sins, that they must wait for God (through the Messiah) to end Jewish exile, and that all human attempts to do so are sinful. Neturei Karta thus views Zionism as a presumptuous affront against God.

From the beginning of the Zionist movement, Neturei Karta was theologically and ideologically allied with AGUDAT YISRAEL in their vocal opposition to and resentment of the predominantly secular new Jewish immigrants to Palestine. After 1948 and the establishment of Israel, however, Agudat Yisrael changed its position and has been a participant in most governments since that time, leaving Neturei Karta isolated from its Orthodox allies; as a result its opposition to Israel and Zionism became more intense. Neturei Karta does have allies, mainly among the large and affluent Hasidic group Satmar, as well as other Hasidic groups, some in Israel and others in the DIASPORA.

With their help Neturei Karta in Israel was able to avoid paying taxes to a state it did not recognize and, conversely, avoid obtaining any benefits from Israel by reorganizing the halakha distribution of funds that had characterized earlier generations. Thus it became a self-contained community within Israel with few formal ties to the surrounding political infrastructure.

After the 1967 WAR some elements in Neturei Karta became so opposed to Israel and Zionism that they became involved in Palestinian politics. For example, Rabbi Moshe Hirsch, Neturei Karta's self-proclaimed "foreign minister," served in PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION chairman YASIR ARAFAT's cabinet and saw a striking similarity between the views of Neturei Karta and those of the FATAH party: both seek to distinguish Judaism from Zionism and both favor a secular and nonsectarian government in Palestine. Hirsch has also sought REFUGEE status at the UNITED NATIONS for Neturei Karta, arguing that there is no difference between a people that was "pushed out of its land and one like ourselves whose land is being wrenched from under it by the Zionists." When Arafat was imprisoned in his Ramallah office during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, and especially after he fell ill, Moshe Hirsch brought him food and water. The Neturei Karta has been consistently active in support of the Palestinian cause, although the group is rarely mentioned or discussed in the US MEDIA.

Bibliography

- Beit-Hallahmi, Benjamin. Original Sins: Reflections on the History of Zionism and Israel. Northampton, MA: Interlink Publishing Group, 1998.
- Domb, Jeremiah Israel Isaac. The Transformation: The Case of the Neturei Karta. Brooklyn, NY: Hachomo, 1989.

Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam

Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam (Oasis of Peace) was founded by the Dominican monk Bruno Hussar (1911–1996) to create a place where the people of Israel would live together despite national and religious differences, and a place to conduct educational work for peace. In the early 1970s, Jews and Palestinian Arabs who were Israeli citizens jointly established a village and began to engage in educational work for peace, equality, and understanding between the two peoples. Neve Shalom is situated equidistant from Jerusalem and Tel Aviv–Jaffa on land originally leased from the adjacent Latrun Monastery. By 2004 some fifty families had come to live in the village, with an equal number of Jews and Arabs. Eventually the village will include about 140 homes. Neve Shalom includes bilingual, binational schooling; The School for Peace; and Doumia-Sakinah (the Pluralistic Spiritual Centre in memory of Bruno Hussar). (www.nswas.com).

New Historians

History is not written in stone, nor does it remain unchanged by time. Among the changes that inevitably force a reexamination of historical interpretations are new scholarly techniques, the availability of new data, the growth and development of an open intellectual environment, the end of intellectual isolation, and a collective crisis of confidence that requires revisiting the past. Such a reexamination can be traumatic, particularly when it confronts established national myths sometimes used to legitimize the existence and essential nature of a state. The battle of the new historians and scholars with the guardians of a nation's official history can generate accusations of national betrayal and counteraccusations of moral stupor.

In the mid-1980s such a struggle developed in the Israeli academic establishment, and the ensuing debate arose largely from the perpetual national emergency under which citizens of Israel live and the concomitant questions this situation provoked among scholars, especially those who were not part of the generation involved in the establishment of the state. The research efforts of the young academics gave rise to more than revisionist historiography; they demythologized national legends as well as the foundational elements of an ideological history. The debate also involves serious questions about the previously uncontested connection between the new state of Israel and the entire sweep of Jewish history. The research of the new scholars produced a new history that rivaled the official state ideology and its idealized version of events surrounding the birth of modern Israel. What resulted was a potential paradigm shift away from ethnohistory and the national Zionist ideology toward a more pluralistic and humane narrative.

The term "new history" was coined by Benny Morris, whose 1988 article in the American journal Tikkun attempted to distinguish the new scholarship from “revisionism” as it applied to the 1948 WAR. Morris described revisionism as an assault on a well-defined, credible, and documented body of historical writing. But in his opinion Israel’s established history did not qualify as the product of formal historical scholarship, because it was simply the construction of state officials, public figures, and civilian and military bureaucratic analysts. The Israeli academe, aware of the phenomenon of “postmodernism,” applied the term “POST-ZIONISM” to the new writers, because they generally approached Israeli history and politics with a critical analysis of ZIONISM. Recent critical writing is produced not only by historians but also by sociologists, literary figures, journalists, and political activists. Some are non-Zionists, although others remain decidedly Zionist, but most saw a need to move away from politicized history and from the glorification of war and military heroes that had shaped the nation’s history since 1948.

National Historiography

Though he was not alone, Ben Zion Dinur is credited with the development of a national history based on the collective historical memory of the Jewish people—the Zionist meganarrative. He arrived in Palestine in 1921 after receiving his higher education at universities in Switzerland, GERMANY, and the RUSSIAN FEDERATION. A historian by profession, Dinur became minister of culture and education during Israel’s formative years and was also a member of the first Israeli Knesset in 1949. He taught Jewish history at Hebrew University and was an important leader of MAPAI (the Israel Workers’ Party) from the 1930s onward. Dinur was responsible for founding the Yad Vashem Holocaust Martyrs’ and Heroes’ Remembrance Authority, authored the State Education Law of 1953, and served as president of the World Congress of Jewish Studies.

Dinur contributed significantly to the development of the official national narrative by his shaping of the writing of Jewish Israeli history to create a sense of common identity, a shared past, and a common future—the eternal “oneness” of the whole Jewish people from the earliest times through the present. To him history was intended to teach, empower, and create an emotional identification with the state. Israeli scholar Idith Zertal writes that Dinur “knew all about the role that knowledge of the past played in shaping the present, and to no less a degree about the shaping of the past for needs of the present—and, thus, about the historian’s role in creating and imparting a national narrative.” In Dinur’s view the HOLOCAUST eliminated any choice of assimilation for Jews and justified the Zionist premise that a Jewish state was an absolute necessity. Indeed, he made the crucial, exclusive link between Holocaust memory (a collective memory of death and trauma created, produced, processed, and coded for use in Israel’s public space) and the state of Israel, and between the Holocaust and Jerusalem. Dinur and others sharing his views found a way to use the horror of mass annihilation to rationalize Zionism and to support Israeli statehood. His ideas continue to dominate official Israeli textbooks.

Traditional Israeli-Jewish history as developed by Dinur and others promotes a Zionist meganarrative with unique slogans, signs, cues, linguistic typifications, and biblical symbolism to mold the Israeli-Jewish identity. The fundamental aspects of traditional Israeli-Jewish history, as developed by Dinur and others, include the idea that all Jews from all time and all space are one, that their oneness reflects their biblical “choseness,” and that they possess a universal existence outside history, which is their essence and their eternal victimhood. From these tenets, Zionists coined specific terms with biblical connotations to reinforce the oneness narrative—ALIYA (ascent), to describe the Zionist IMMIGRATION project; ERETZ YISRAEL, to imply the historical continuity of the Jewish presence in Palestine; and redemption from exile, to emphasize the reunion of the Jewish people and the Land of Israel, as well as to provide the rationale for expropriating Palestinian LAND and the dispossession of the Palestinian people. Even the Holocaust—with its six million Jewish lives lost—was used to support the meganarrative of Zionism. By not acknowledging the millions of others who also died at the hands of the Nazis, the term reinforced the eternal victimhood of Jews, while its combination with other symbols—“Holocaust and rebirth” and “destruction and redemption”—provided support for the new ideology. “Negation of exile,” the definition of Jewish identity in relation to Zionism and Israel and not the wider JEWISH DIASPORA, provides a further example.

These precepts were institutionalized in Israel’s universities because standard sociological paradigms were not applied to actual historical experience. For instance, the universities instituted academic programs such as Jewish and Eretz Yisrael studies as special cases beyond the norms of modern sociology and historiography, cultivated in total isolation from the rest of the world, and in a manner consonant with nationalist disciplines that do not submit to international academic standards. Such programs deeply inculcated the tenets of the Zionist meganarrative, and, along with such leading Hebrew-language journals as Cathedra and Ha-Tziyonut, as well as Studies in Zionism, consider history a tool for public and civic education and for rationalizing continued political struggle against the Palestinian enemy.

DAVID BEN-GURION, head of the pre-state Jewish Yishuv and first prime minister of Israel, was committed to the institutionalization of a Judeo-centric idealized state history, which led to the 1953 Law of Education. The law had its roots in the 1903 Association of Hebrew Teachers, the 1913 establishment of Hebrew as the medium of instruction, and the 1918 decision by Zionist leaders to monitor the educational system of the Yishuv. The objective of each act, especially the 1953 law, was the creation of Zionist education that would help develop the new national Jew. Other movements, such as the more secular HASKALAH, received scant recognition. Official history and official education both served the state and its Zionist ideology.

Emergence of the New History

Post-Zionist scholarship was led by the historians Morris, Ilan Pappé, and Avi Shalim, who rewrote the history of the 1948 WAR and revised the official Israeli narrative on such topics as the Palestinian REFUGEES, JORDAN'S relations with Israel, and Britain's unofficial support for Zionist objectives. Important early sociologists included Baruch Kimmerling, Gershon Shafir, and Michael Shalev. Ella Shohat and Tom Segev made significant contributions, as did Simha Flapan, whose groundbreaking work questioned all of Israel's myths and national history.

According to Pappé, new history and post-Zionist scholarship emerged from the convergence of several factors. One of these was the 1973 WAR, which gave rise to a severe crisis of self-confidence because of the initial defeats suffered by the Israeli military early in the war. This, in turn, produced an inward reexamination of the country's past. An additional cause, also related to the war, was the failure of the Israeli LABOR government to deal effectively with this unexpected challenge, which, in turn, dampened the ideological zeal of some sectors of the population. Later, the 1982 LEBANON WAR, with its lack of clear objectives and the mass peace movement that it produced, also contributed. Finally, the outbreak of the First INTIFADA produced a new awareness of the Palestinians and opened a period in which questions about the origin of the Palestinian "problem" could be explored. The Intifada also created an opportunity for Israeli-Palestinian intellectual exchanges that gave the Israelis a version of events that differed from the insular perspective of their own national history and led some to question the utopian and heroic aspects of the Israeli national narrative. Additionally, Israel began to experience multicultural and multiethnic pressures from within by those not included in the traditional European-ASHKENAZI history. More importantly, in the late 1970s, national archival material was declassified at the end of a thirty-year period, not only in Israel but also in Britain and the UNITED STATES. Young Israeli scholars, most born after 1948, began to study this new material, and their initial work was published mainly in Britain, where an intellectually open climate proved responsive to their endeavors.

It is notable that the challenge to traditional national history developed within academic institutions that were outside the reach of citadels of Zionist hegemony such as Hebrew University in Jerusalem. For instance, the newly established sociology department at Haifa University during the early 1970s produced the first works that undermined the foundations of Zionist historiography by applying theories of domination to the historical experience of the Yishuv. The works of Baruch Kimmerling and Yonathan Shapiro later built on the findings of these earlier sociologists. During the early 1980s, Uriel Tal at Tel Aviv University criticized the concept of Jewish history from within the history department. Although he is not counted among the new historians per se, he is credited with interjecting a healthy note of skepticism into the hegemonic and exclusivist field.

The fundamental understandings that emerged from the corpus of the new historians involve deessentializing the Jewish experience, equalizing the value of the Diaspora with that of Israel, and humanizing and validating Palestinian experience and narrative. With regard to the Diaspora, the scholarship of the new historians revealed the distortion in the dominant Ashkenazi depiction of Israel as Western and white and its concomitant negation of the culture and history of the MIZRAHIM, SEPHARDIM, Ethiopian, Chinese, and other Jewish communities—a paradigm traditionally reinforced by the twin fields of Jewish and Eretz Yisrael studies. The new historians have also been rigorous in deconstructing the many myths surrounding the Yishuv, Mapai, the Euro-centrism of the Ashkenazim, and, in particular, Ben-Gurion. Tom Segev's work has been particularly important in this regard. For example, whereas traditional scholarship insisted on applying the term "colonization" to the process of Jewish SETTLEMENT in Palestine, the new scholars insisted on the term "colonialism." While the old school saw "colonization" as a progressive feat that led to the creation of a better world for all concerned, the new scholars regarded the Zionist settling of Palestine as a violent victory of the strong over the weak.

The new historians' impact on the traditional Zionist scholarly establishment has been far-reaching. Individuals such as Uri Ram demanded not only that the Jewish-Arab struggle be acknowledged as central to understanding the nation's history but also that the impact of Zionism on Palestine and the Palestinians be understood. Ram argued for an explanation of the injustice heaped upon Palestinians as a result of Zionist domination of Palestine as well as for situating Israel's recent history in the context of Middle Eastern events. Similarly, Kimmerling felt that the Arab-Israeli conflict must be understood as the main issue that shaped Israel's recent history. For him, the traditional paradigm that posited Israel as an integral aspect of "exceptional" Jewish history required replacement with a view of Israel as an "immigrant-settler" society within history. This, he believed, would lead to a deeper understanding not only of the indigenous Palestinian Arabs but also of non-European Jewish immigrants.

The new historians view the Palestine problem as standing on its own and stress that it must be separated from the Holocaust and victimhood as the overarching explanation for ISRAELI MILITARISM and wars. Many of the new historians have questioned the obligatory visit to the Holocaust Memorial, whenever foreign dignitaries visit Israel, as so much propaganda to justify the continuous effort to link that atrocity with the creation of the state. Through their research, the new scholars have undermined the logic of the juxtaposition of such concepts as Holocaust and rebirth, and destruction and redemption, which, they argue, serves to ascribe divine intervention and exceptionalism to events surrounding the creation of Israel. Rather than the traditional view that portrays the Zionist victory in 1948 as preordained, Pappé and others stress the strength of Israeli troops. The new scholars also question the policies of the Yishuv (and later Israel) toward Holocaust survivors. The use of the Holocaust to emphasize Israel's position as a perpetual victim in a region dominated by its enemies is viewed as a deliberate reinforcement of Israeli nationalism. For example, Israel's leaders have always identified Palestinian leaders such as YASIR ARAFAT with Nazism.

The new historians and scholars illuminate the actual role of the Labor movement during and after the formative years of the state as the agency that led to the creation of a Zionist state under the leadership of an exclusively Ashkenazi elite. Their work has been largely directed at revealing the reality of the Labor Party's victims, who were mainly but not exclusively Palestinians.

Individuals and Contributions from the New Historians

The new historians and scholars have devoted intense documentary study to the flight of the Palestinian refugees before and during the 1948 War. Even though official historical texts gave no space or credence to the national narratives of the Palestinians, some Israeli voices preceding the new historians expressed grave doubts concerning the official version of this event—that the Palestinians fled not because of anything the Zionists did but because the Arab leaders called on them to leave. Leftist Israelis have long echoed assertions by Arab historians (e.g., Walid Khalidi, who documented the destruction of 418 Palestinian villages within the 1949 armistice lines and the expulsion of the Arab population in 1948). Scholars such as Uri Davis revealed the idea of population TRANSFER within the Zionist elite as early as the 1917 BALFOUR DECLARATION and during the BRITISH MANDATE. In the 1980s URI AV-NERY'S Israel without Zionism: A Plan for Peace in the Middle East, though flawed in some respects, nevertheless detailed Israel's forced expulsions of the Palestinians, massacres, destruction of villages, and so on. Avnery may be considered a transitional figure, straddling both the Zionist phase of Israel's history and its years of skepticism and disillusionment.

Simha Flapan, who in 1987 published a major contribution, The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities, benefited from the declassification of documents in the Israeli State Archives and the publication of Ben-Gurion's war diaries. Unlike Benny Morris, who released his findings about the Palestine refugee problem around the same time, Flapan did not limit himself to this issue. Instead, he undertook a broader investigation of some of Israel's founding myths, including Arab responsibility for starting the 1948 War, the Arab military threat to the new state, and, most importantly, Arab resistance to Israeli peace overtures. Although Flapan did not belong to the new historians generationally (he was born in 1911), his contribution to the debate was no less remarkable because he lived and grew up during the formative years of the Israeli state. He also stands out for his utilization of Arab scholarship, such as works by Khalidi, who described attacks by the HAGANA and IRGUN, the main Zionist paramilitary forces, as the reason behind the flight of HAIFA's Arabs in April 1948. Flapan produced a history of massacres, destruction of the Palestinian ECONOMY, and mass looting by Israeli fighting units, all of which he described as a "scorched earth policy" against the Palestinians. He made two pivotal revelations relating to 1948—PLAN DALET and the work of Aryeh Yitzhaki, the historian of the Hagana (the Jewish underground military organization), who affirmed after the 1948 DEIR YASSIN massacre of more than 100 men, women, and children by Zionist militias that other Zionist military and paramilitary groups had committed many other massacres.

Flapan wrote that, although the Hagana did not participate in such massacres, it did engage in massive destruction of property designed to force the civilian Palestinian population to leave. He also cited the diaries of YOSEF WEITZ, the director of the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND's Colonization Department, who wrote that Israel destroyed many Palestinian villages in preparation for Jewish settlement and discussed the forced expulsion of more than 60,000 Palestinians from LYDDA and RAMLA in July 1948, citing the determined policy of the Yishuv to empty the land of its Palestinian inhabitants. Morris's 1987 groundbreaking history,

The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem 1947–1949, shed further light on Plan Dalet (Tochnit Dalet), revealing that the plan was a strategic and ideological rationalization for Israeli army commanders to expel Palestinians in 1948. Regarding Lydda and Ramla, the Hagana and its elite unit the PALMAH, commanded by YIGAL ALLON, were engaged in the military activities, and the commander of this operation was YITZHAK RABIN, the future prime minister, who wrote the order authorizing the expulsion of Lydda's Arabs irrespective of age. Similar orders were given to the Yiftah and the Kiryati Brigades to expel the population of nearby Ramla. Other accounts based on Rabin's memoirs corroborate this information. Morris described Ben-Gurion's famous hand gesture indicating "expel them" when asked twice by Allon what to do with the civilian population of the two towns.

In Israel's Border Wars, 1949–1956 (1993) and 1948 and After: Israel and the Palestinians (1994), Morris provided additional details about massacres committed by Israeli troops. One, Operation Hiram, succeeded in driving out a large number of the Arab inhabitants from the Galilee villages. He also uncovered a series of atrocities committed in the course of these expulsions, such as rapes and murders intended to intimidate the civilian population into fleeing their land, and identified the three main military groups that carried out the operation: the Golani, the Seventh, and Carmeli Brigades. In 1948 and After, Morris documented that the remaining Arab population of the town of al-Majdal, numbering 2,700 (from an original population of 10,000 and now renamed Ashkelon), was pushed across the GAZA STRIP border in 1950. Morris's analysis also attributed the refugee flight to the normal state of confusion in a war, the failure of Arab governments and military leaders to reverse this development, and the Palestinian elite who fled in advance of the arrival of the Jewish troops.

Pappé made the Nakba, the 1948 Palestinian exodus, the central issue of his research and delved more deeply and broadly into the founding of Israel than any other new historian. Relying on newly declassified official documents in his research for the 1994 book The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951, he was able to reveal that Israel was not on the verge of annihilation in 1948, as many Zionists maintained, and that the Arab side was fragmented and incapable of extending meaningful military support to the Palestinian fighting units. He concluded that official Arab armies that joined the war following Israel's declaration of statehood were woefully lacking in their operational abilities. Pappé strongly emphasized the tacit understanding and secret cooperation between the Israelis and the HASHEMITE Kingdom of Jordan as the main argument illustrating Israeli might versus combined Arab state weakness. The nature and extent of Zionist-Jordanian relations were evidenced both in Pappé's 1988 Britain and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1948–1951 and in Avi Shlaim's 1988 seminal work Collusion across the Jordan. Another text demonstrating this point is Uri Bar-Joseph's 1984 The Best of Enemies: Israel and Transjordan in the War of 1948. Pappé went further than other historians in challenging the Zionist narrative that Israel was threatened on all sides, but all the chroniclers of this new historiography argue that by neutralizing the strongest Arab army, the Jordanian Arab Legion, Israel had no basis for asserting its weakness.

Although crucially important, historical works alone were insufficient by themselves to transform the Zionist-national paradigm, but, combined with the contributions of the "new sociologists" such as Baruch Kimmerling, they are gradually undermining state ideology. Kimmerling elucidated the experience of the Yishuv as another variation on the international system of colonization. In his 1993 Zionism and Territory: The Socio-Territorial Dimensions of Zionist Politics, he demonstrated that Israeli historiography employed certain strategies to promote the triumph of Zionism over other Jewish experiences and over its territorial enemies—Palestinians and the Arabs. Kimmerling pointed to the use of specific terms with religious connotation such as aliya and Eretz Yisrael that implied a historical continuity of the Jewish presence in Palestine that defied historical reality.

Countering the New Historians

The new historians and scholars did not escape rebuttals from the traditional historians and Zionist guardians of the state's official historiography. A blistering attack was mounted in 1994 by the Israeli author Aharon Megged in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz. He protested the new scholarship's delegitimizing of Israel and Zionism and complained about the attempt to create a new collective memory of the 1948 War. He accused the new scholars of ignoring the sacrifices of those who fought in that war, particularly the Palmah generation, of which Megged was a member. The Palmah, who enjoyed a stellar reputation for living by a high moral code known as the "purity of arms" even in the midst of fierce combat, was shown by the new historians to have committed wartime atrocities against the civilian Palestinian population. Megged's strong critique can be viewed in part as a reaction of deep anger at this assault on one of the cherished myths of Israel's wartime conduct. Another attack on the new historians was mounted by Efraim Karsh in his 2000 book Fabricating Israeli History: The "New Historians." Karsh criticized the major themes of the new scholarship, particularly the significance of Israel's relations with Jordan during and before the war years. He averred that Shlaim's revelation of the existence of secret contacts between Israel and the Hashemite Dynasty and his assertion that British foreign secretary Ernest Bevin concurred with that alliance were nothing new. Karsh also accused Morris of simplifying the story of the refugees' flight, insisting that it was a "complex" phenomenon, and he absolves the Yishuv of any blame in encouraging the expulsion of the Palestinians in 1948, insisting that this aspect of war should be seen in the context of the British PEEL COMMISSION (1937), which explored the possibility of population exchanges. But Karsh's case against the new historians rests mostly on the acceptance of Ben-Gurion's words rather than his actions. Other attacks have been mounted by traditional historians and members of the Labor movement, such as Shabatai Teveth, Anita Shapira, Shlomo Aharonson, Itamar Rabinovich, and Yoav Gelber. Popular writers such as Hanoah Bar-Tov and David Bar-Ilan also joined in the attack.

In 2004 Morris, one of the leading new historians, revised much of his previous historical analysis. He wrote an article asserting that Israel had no choice but to engage in policies of expulsion and removal of the Arab civilian population in 1948 because it was engaged in a deadly struggle for survival. Had the Arab population remained in areas designated for the new Israeli state, he claimed, there would have been no Israel at all. Adopting a philosophical tone, he claimed that the movement of history does not hinge on the degree of suffering caused by superior forces. In his view, if the Palestinians had remained within Israel, they would have become a fifth column within the Jewish state, and he argued that Arab aggression left Israel with no choice but to retaliate in full force. Morris also implied that Israel's activities were hardly unprecedented in world history.

Morris's revised stand was symptomatic of the retrenchment of the Israeli old guard following attempts to suppress the release of additional damning evidence related to the 1948 War. One such attempt, which made headlines in Israel, was the decision of Haifa University to reject an academic thesis that exposed details of the massacre in the Arab village of Tantura during the 1948 War. The student who authored this, Teddy Katz, was also denied the opportunity to attain a higher academic degree.

See also JORDAN; PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948; POST-ZIONISM; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Arad, Guile Ne'eman, ed. History and Memory. 7:1 (1995).
- Avnery, Uri. Israel without Zionism. New York: Collier Books, 1968.
- Bar-Joseph, Uri. The Best of Enemies: Israel and Transjordan in the War of 1948. London: Frank Cass, 1984.
- Bar Zohar, Michael. Ben Gurion, 2 vols. Tel Aviv: 'Am 'Oved, 1997.
- Beit-Zvi, S. B. Post-Ugandan Zionism on Trial: A Study of the Factors That Caused the Mistakes Made by the Zionist Movement during the Holocaust. Translated from Hebrew by Ralph Mandel. Tel-Aviv: S. B. Beit-Zvi, 1991.
- Carr, E. H. What Is History? New York: Penguin, 1984.
- Childers, Erskine. "The Other Exodus." The Spectator. 12 May 1961.
- Davis, Uri, and Norton Mezvinsky, eds. Documents from Israel 1967–1973. London: Ithaca Press, 1975.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon Books, 1987.
- . Zionism and the Palestinians 1917–1947. London: Croom Helm, 1979.
- Gelber, Yoav. "The Negotiations between the Jewish Agency and Transjordan, 1946–1948." Studies in Zionism. 6:1 (1985).
- Glubb, Sir John Bagot. A Soldier with the Arabs. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1957.
- Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1976.
- Karsh, Efraim. Fabricating Israeli History: The "New Historians". 2nd ed. London: Routledge, 2000.
- Khalidi, Walid, ed. All That Remains: The Palestinian Villages Occupied and Depopulated by Israel in 1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.
- . From Haven to Conquest. Beirut, Lebanon: The Institute for Palestine Studies, 1971.
- . "Plan Dalet: Master Plan for the Conquest of Palestine." Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:1 (1988).
- Kimmerling, Baruch. "Between Celebration of Independence and Commemoration of Al-Nakbah: The Controversy over the Roots of the Israeli State." Middle East Studies Association Bulletin. 32:1 (1998).
- . Zionism and Territory: The Socio-Territorial Dimensions of Zionist Politics. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. Palestinians: The Making of a People. New York: The Free Press, 1993.
- Masalha, Nur. Expulsion of the Palestinians: The Concept of "Transfer" in Zionist Political Thought 1882–1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.
- . The Politics of Denial: Israel and the Palestinian Refugee Problem. London: Pluto Press, 2003.
- Morris, Benny. 1948 and After: Israel and the Palestinians. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1994.
- . The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem 1947–1949. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- . "In 1948, Israel Did What It Had to Do to Survive." World Jewish Digest. May 2004.
- . Israel's Border Wars, 1949–1956. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1993.
- Nazzari, Nafez. The Palestinian Exodus from Galilee 1948. Beirut, Lebanon: The Institute for Palestine Studies, 1978.
- Pappé, Ilan. Britain and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1948–51. London: Macmillan, 1988.
- . The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951. London: I. B. Tauris, 1994.
- . "Moshe Sharett, David Ben Gurion and the 'Palestinian Option' 1948–1956." Studies in Zionism. 7:1 (1986).
- . "The Tantura Case in Israel: The Katz Research and Trial." Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:3 (Spring 2001).
- Rabinovich, Itamar. The Road Not Taken: Early Arab-Israeli Negotiations. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Segev, Tom. 1949: The First Israelis. New York: The Free Press, 1986.
- . One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2000.
- . The Seventh Million: The Israelis and the Holocaust. New York: Hill and Wang, 1993.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- . "The Debate about 1948." International Journal of Middle East Studies. 27:3 (August 1995).
- Teveth, Shabtai. Ben Gurion and the Palestine Arabs. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- . "The Palestine Arab Refugee Problem and Its Origins." Middle Eastern Studies. 26:2 (April 1990).

Zertal, Idith. Israel's Holocaust and the Politics of Nationhood. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

—Ghada Hashem Talhami

New Israel Fund

The New Israel Fund is a philanthropic partnership of Israelis, North Americans, and Europeans. Since it was founded in 1979, the fund has granted over $130 million to more than 700 organizations in Israel dedicated to safeguarding civil and human rights, bridging social and economic gaps, and fostering tolerance and religious pluralism. The fund's goal is to enable institutions to stand on their own and to invest in new organizations. The New Israel Fund is today the leading financial backer of social change in Israel. (www.nif.org).

New Profile

New Profile is a group of Israeli feminist women and men opposed to ISRAELI MILITARISM, in particular the militarization of Israeli society. It opposes the use of the military to enforce Israeli sovereignty beyond the Green Line, which separates Israel from the WEST BANK, and the use of the army, police, and security forces in "the ongoing oppression and discrimination of the Palestinians including demolishing their homes, denying them building and development rights, using violence to disperse their demonstrations and worse." The group regards Israeli conscription law as discriminatory and nondemocratic, and works to change it. Today, it argues, Israel is capable of a determined peace politics. New Profile maintains that the state of war in Israel is sustained by decisions made by its politicians (not by external forces), to which the citizen is passively subject.

In September 2008, Israeli authorities began a campaign to criminalize New Profile with the attorney general's announcement of an investigation of the movement. The campaign accelerated, and on 26 April 2009, shortly after BENJAMIN NETANYAHU was reelected prime minister, Israeli police "raided" the homes of seven activists in different parts of Israel and summoned them for interrogation. The police demanded that they turn over the computers located in their homes, seizing the computers of partners and children of the detainees. The police were particularly interested in the website of New Profile, which has links to other sites on the Internet concerned with conscientious objection and civil disobedience. At the conclusion of the interrogations the activists were released on bail under "limiting conditions," and all were told that during the next thirty days they were forbidden to contact other members of the movement. The computers of family members were returned after the activists were released.

A statement released by New Profile declared: "These recent acts confirm what we have been contending for many years: the militarism of society in Israel harms the sacred principles of democracy, freedom of expression and freedom of political association. One who believed that until now criminal files were conjured up 'only' for Arab citizens of Israel saw this morning that none of us can be certain that s/he can freely express an opinion concerning the failures of society and rule in Israel. . . . The attempted criminalization of New Profile amounts to no less than a state war on youth." More and more young Jewish Israelis are unable or unwilling to accept military service, and they have found their own way to avoid it. Israel's campaign against its youth is being fought within the broader context of increasing repression of political dissent. Activists were detained by the hundreds for protesting Israel's recent attack against Gaza, most of them PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL, and some of them remain in detention. Nonviolent protesters are regularly targeted by lethal fire. Eighteen Palestinians have been killed while protesting the separation BARRIER.

Ha'aretz reported that officials initiated the New Profile investigation "because of increasing concern at the defense establishment of a growing trend of draft evasion. In July 2007 Defense Minister EHUD BARAK and Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi declared publicly that they would fight the trend." Incitement to draft evasion is a criminal offense in Israel punishable by five years' imprisonment. www.newprofile.org/english/.

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; ISRAELI MILITARISM

Bibliography

- Goren, Yuval, Amos Harel, and Tomer Zarchin. "Police Arrest Seven Suspected of Inciting IDF Draft-dodging." Ha'aretz. 27 April 2009.
- Mazuz, Menachem. "It Is Not Counselling Conscientious Objectors That Is Criminal, but Rather Not Recognizing the Right to Conscientious Objection."

Jerusalem: War Resisters' International, 28 April 2009.

Palestine Monitor. "Our Peaceful Towns Should No Longer Be the Graveyard of Our Youth." Palestine Monitor. 17 April 2009.

Reider, Dimi. "Israel's Budding Autocracy." The Guardian. 30 April 2009.

New Zionist Organization

The New Zionist Organization (NZO) was an independent, worldwide body established in 1935 in Warsaw when the UNION OF ZIONIST-REVISIONISTS seceded from the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION (WZO) and took a far more radical line. NZO reflected VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY's program that called for the creation of a Jewish state made up of both sides of the Jordan River, the IMMIGRATION of all Jews to Palestine who wanted to come irrespective of British quotas, the liquidation of the DIASPORA, and opposition to the partition of Palestine in 1937 and in 1947. In 1946 the NZO was dismantled as an independent organization and rejoined the WZO because the latter promulgated the BILTMORE PROGRAM, which sought to establish a Jewish state over the whole of Palestine.

See also VLADIMIR (ZE'EV) YEVGENIEVITCH JABOTINSKY

Nili

Nili (Netzah Yisrael Lo Yeshaker) was a secret Jewish and pro-British espionage organization that operated in Turkish-controlled Palestine, primarily during the period 1917–1919. Under Ottoman rule young men who lived in the moshavot (collective farms) around the settlement of Zikhron Ya'akov formed an organization in Palestine called the Gideonites. During World War I this organization served as the basis for Nili, which engaged in active espionage for Great Britain under the leadership of the agronomist AARON AARONSOHN and his sister SARA AARONSOHN.

Bibliography

Engie, Anita. The Nili Spies. London: Hogarth Press, 1959.

Nixon, Richard Milhous (1913–1994)

Richard Nixon was the thirty-seventh president of the UNITED STATES, serving from 1969 to 1974. He was the only US president to resign from office, a resignation that came in the face of imminent impeachment related to the Watergate scandal and other offenses. He received a law degree from Duke University and during World War II served as a reserve officer in the navy. In 1946 Nixon was elected to the House of Representatives after accusing his opponent of collaborating with communist-controlled labor unions. He made a name for himself serving on the House Un-American Activities Committee, which sought to uncover communists in US society, and led the fight to destroy Alger Hiss. In 1950 Nixon was elected to the Senate after again accusing his opponent of being a communist, or a "fellow traveler." From 1953 to 1961 Nixon was vice president under DWIGHT EISENHOWER. His preoccupation with communism followed him to the White House and affected his decisionmaking on every foreign issue, including the Middle East.

Nixon came to the presidency well informed about most Middle East issues, free of debts to pro-Israel domestic constituencies, and not overly partisan toward Israel. He was prepared to be evenhanded in the Arab-Israeli conflict, but by the time he departed office, Nixon had become extremely pro-Israel. After the 1967 WAR, Nixon visited Israel and commented that Israelis had an attitude of "overconfidence" and "total intransigence," which Nixon thought could lead to hatred among their Arab neighbors and possibly another war. Before assuming the presidency, his only reference to the Palestinians was as "guerrillas," and Palestine was not on his agenda. Shortly before taking office Nixon sent a special envoy, William Scranton, to the Middle East to assess the situation, and Scranton reported back that the United States needed to be more neutral to secure its national interests in the region. Nixon publicly supported Scranton's recommendations.

Soon after becoming president, Nixon dispatched his secretary of state, WILLIAM ROGERS, to the Middle East to find a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, but differences of opinion between Nixon and Rogers, on the one hand, and National Security Council Advisor HENRY KISSINGER, on the other, ultimately caused Rogers's efforts to fail. The first major disagreement involved whether to engage the Arab states and promote negotiations between Israel and the Arabs or to do nothing. (Israel preferred the latter since the status quo allowed it time to confiscate LAND and build SETTLEMENTS.) Rogers wanted to engage and attempted numerous initiatives—each undermined by Kissinger. Although Nixon initially agreed with Rogers, he quickly distanced himself from his secretary of state, and, by November 1971, all of Rogers's efforts to transform the status quo had been sabotaged by Kissinger and Nixon.

The second issue involved the role of the Middle East in the Cold War. Although Nixon generally saw regional conflicts in the context of a global struggle against communism, for a time his view of the Arab-Israeli conflict seemed to be an exception to this global perspective. Nixon's early inclination was to hold Israel accountable for the ongoing Arab-Israeli conflict rather than viewing communism as responsible. But very soon the president, prompted by Kissinger, came to view the Middle East as part of the Cold War and saw Moscow as the cause of all the region's ills—a perspective that, among other things, precluded any multilateral peace efforts and prevented Nixon from developing an understanding of the Palestine question. Rogers, on the other hand, clearly perceived the indigenous nature of the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli conflict and consistently attempted to mediate on those terms.

The 1970 BLACK SEPTEMBER crisis in JORDAN, which pitted the Jordanian army against the Palestinian guerrillas, solidified Nixon's Cold War thinking; he portrayed what was clearly a local conflict as part of a global confrontation in which the United States, with Israel's help, thwarted the Soviet Union and its Syrian proxy. The most important outcome of this affair, however, was Nixon's determination that Israel, although it had taken no action other than mobilization, would henceforth be a STRATEGIC ASSET to US interests regionally and globally; thereafter, economic and military aid to Israel escalated rapidly. According to Donald Neff, an author and journalist who is an expert on Israel and the Palestinians, in fiscal year 1970 all aid to Israel totaled $93.6 million, but the following year it rose to $634.6 million, and by 1974 reached $2.6 billion.

By the summer of 1973 Nixon was deeply involved in the Watergate affair, and most day-to-day foreign policy affairs were handled by Kissinger. In April 1973, SAUDI ARABIA's oil minister, Shaykh Ahmed Zaki Yamani, came to Washington to warn Kissinger that a failure to settle the Arab-Israeli conflict could lead the Arabs to use the oil weapon. Kissinger dismissed the minister out of hand. When EGYPT and SYRIA attacked Israel in the 1973 War, Nixon was completely preoccupied and Kissinger managed the weapons resupply, the shuttle diplomacy, and the reaction to the oil boycott. Nixon's one intervention came toward the end of the conflict when he drafted a set of instructions for Kissinger to follow when he went to Moscow to meet with the Soviets. Nixon wrote: "The Israelis and the Arabs will never be able to approach this subject by themselves in a rational manner. That is why Nixon and Brezhnev, looking at the problem more dispassionately, must step in, determine the proper course of action to a just settlement, and then bring the necessary pressure on our respective friends for a settlement which will at last bring peace to this troubled area." Kissinger informed Nixon that he could not and would not transmit this message, and Nixon's impotence was such that Kissinger prevailed.

Bibliography

- Hersh, Seymour M. The Price of Power: Kissinger and the Nixon White House. New York: Summit Books, 1983.
- Kutler, Stanley I. Wars of Watergate: The Last Crisis of Richard Nixon, reprint ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 1992.
- Neff, Donald. "Nixon's Middle East Policy: From Balance to Bias." In U.S. Policy on Palestine from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Normal, IL: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1995.
- . Warriors against Israel: How Israel Won the War to Become America's Friend. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Nixon, Richard M. RN: The Memoirs of Richard Nixon. New York: Filmways, 1978.
- Quandt, William B. Decade of Decisions: American Policy toward the Arab-Israeli Conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977.
- Summers, Anthony, and Robbyn Swan. Arrogance of Power: The Secret World of Richard Nixon. New York: Penguin, 2000.

Noga

Noga, both a magazine and an organization, was started in 1980 when a group of Jewish women from a variety of professional backgrounds created Israel's first feminist magazine. Its mandate is to be "by women, about women, for women." As a magazine Noga is known for its consistently high standards, and as an organization it is part of the women's peace movement. It has taken a strong stand on the link between feminism, anti-militarism, and a just settlement with the Palestinians. (<http://coalitionofwomen.org/home/english/organizations/noga>).

See also COALITION OF WOMEN FOR PEACE

Non-Aligned Movement

The Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) is an international organization of states considering themselves not formally aligned with or against any major power bloc, namely the UNITED STATES or the SOVIET UNION. The movement was formed and initiated by three leaders: India's first prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru; former president of EGYPT JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR; and Yugoslav president Josip Broz Tito. It was founded in April 1955 at the Bandung Conference, a conference of Asian and African states hosted by Indonesian president Kusno Sukarno. The attending nations declared their desire to avoid involvement in the Cold War and adopted a "declaration on promotion of world peace and cooperation." Six years after Bandung, an initiative by Yugoslav president Tito led to the first official Non-Aligned Movement Summit, which was held in September 1961 in Belgrade.

The purpose of the organization, as stated in the "Havana Declaration of 1979," is to ensure "the national independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and security of non-aligned countries" in their "struggle against imperialism, colonialism, neo-colonialism, racism and all forms of foreign aggression, occupation, domination, interference or hegemony as well as against great power and bloc politics." It represents nearly two-thirds of UN members and comprises 55 percent of the world population, particularly countries considered to be developing, or part of the third world. In 2007 it had 118 members, although changes in global politics after the fall of the Soviet Union have led to a reduction in its influence.

Nonviolence in Israel/Palestine

Though violent confrontation has characterized much of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, nonviolent struggle has also had a long history. Recent years have seen ongoing nonviolent demonstrations against such Israeli actions as seizures of Palestinian LAND, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and the construction route of the BARRIER separation wall. Historically, nonviolent action played a major role in the Arab general strike of 1936 (the precursor to the ARAB REVOLT), which lasted for six months. Although the large demonstrations (up to 400,000 during the LEBANON WAR) held by the Israeli group Shalom Achshav (PEACE NOW) have been perhaps the most MEDIA-visible nonviolent action in Israel/Palestine, Israelis and Palestinians have conducted nonviolent activities—strikes, marches, boycotts, petitions, and so forth—for decades before Peace Now emerged in the late 1970s. Other nonviolent resistance activities in recent years have included the regular monitoring of WEST BANK Israeli CHECKPOINTS by the Israeli women's group MACHSOMWATCH, the weekly vigil by WOMEN IN BLACK, and the countless manifestations of sumud (steadfastness) by Palestinian farmers and shepherds, such as those in the villages of Yanoun and Tuwani, who maintain their lives despite the constant threat (and occurrence) of SETTLER VIOLENCE.

One prominent strand of Israeli nonviolent resistance is found in the refusal movement. Starting in 1970 and subsequently in 1987 and 2001, groups of high school seniors (called SHMINISTIM) signed and delivered letters to the prime minister declaring their refusal to serve in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES (West Bank and GAZA STRIP). Hundreds of Israelis are currently signed on to the Shministim letter, and at any one time a handful face or serve jail sentences as a consequence. Reserve officers in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES have also sent a series of letters to the government expressing their concern about military actions in the West Bank and Gaza. The 1973 Officer's Letter to MENAHEM BEGIN, signed by 350 reserve officers, asked that Israeli troops be withdrawn to pre-1967 WAR borders. In 1982, YESH G'VUL (There Is a Limit) was formed from a group of reserve soldiers who refused to serve in LEBANON and articulated the right of a soldier to disobey orders that violate the individual's conscience. In January 2002, COURAGE TO REFUSE was formed after the drafting of the COMBATANTS' LETTER, stating that its members refused to fight beyond the 1967 borders. In 2003 a group of pilots and members of an elite commando unit also wrote letters voicing concern that the OCCUPATION was immoral, violating Palestinian civilians' rights and corrupting the moral fabric of Israel.

In the Palestinian context nonviolence is often explicitly referred to as "nonviolent resistance" or "nonviolent struggle" to emphasize its active (as opposed to passive) nature and to highlight that nonviolence is an important alternative to ARMED STRUGGLE against the Israeli Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. The First INTIFADA, which began in December 1987, was almost entirely nonviolent. Organizing committees orchestrated daily strikes, led boycotts of Israeli goods, and encouraged the planting of “victory gardens” to promote self-sufficiency. In June 1988, Israel arrested and deported one of the leaders of the Palestinian nonviolent movement, Mubarak Awad, head of the Palestinian Center for the Study of Nonviolence, because his nonviolent activism threatened the Occupation. During this period, the village of Bay Sahur carried out a TAX REVOLT, for which it was heavily punished by Israeli Occupation authorities.

A number of Palestinian NGOs use nonviolence training, radio programming, community mediation, and youth work to promote nonviolence and traditional means of conflict resolution (sulh); among them are the Wi'am PALESTINIAN CONFLICT RESOLUTION CENTER, Holy Land Trust, Palestinian Center for Rapprochement, Middle East Nonviolence and Democracy, and Palestinian Center for Democracy and Conflict Resolution. Several Palestinian villages have engaged in nonviolent activism through weekly marches and publicity campaigns against land annexation and by appealing to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT and the International Court of Justice regarding the route of Israel's Barrier. Some villages have trained virtually the entire village population in nonviolent methods. In April 2005, Panorama Center and Holy Land Trust organized a conference that drew 120 Palestinians from all districts in the West Bank to discuss nonviolent strategies for resistance and to develop mechanisms for communicating and sharing accumulated experience. The conference built on a two-year process of regional nonviolence strategy meetings and training sessions. In December 2005 an International Nonviolence Conference was held in BETHLEHEM, and in February 2006 another was held in Bil'in, with a special focus on the joint Israeli-Palestinian nonviolent struggle against the Barrier.

Joint Israeli-Palestinian nonviolent efforts include the numerous dialogues that occurred (largely abroad) when contact with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION was forbidden by the Israeli government. However, direct partnerships have also occurred in Israel and the Occupied Territories. For example, in the 1980s, Israelis created the Committee for Solidarity with BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY (in the West Bank), the Committee against Settlements in HEBRON, and the Committee for Confronting the IRON FIST. The ALTERNATIVE INFORMATION CENTER was founded in 1984 as a joint organization for raising awareness about current events in the West Bank and Gaza by circulating updates, writing reports, and holding events. Although it has been attacked at various periods by the government, it continues today with offices in Jerusalem and Beit Sahur in the West Bank near Bethlehem. TA'AYUSH (Partnership in Life), founded after the outbreak of the AL-AQSA (Second) INTIFADA in 2000, is composed of both Palestinian (Arab) and Jewish Israelis working together to fight racism, injustice, and the walls dividing Palestinian and Israeli society. Originally focused on actions inside Israel, Ta'ayush increasingly formed partnerships with Palestinian groups in the West Bank after the Israeli re-invasion in March–April 2002. Groups like Ta'ayush, in partnership with other Israeli groups such as the COALITION OF WOMEN FOR PEACE, GUSH SHALOM, the ISRAELI COMMITTEE AGAINST HOUSE DEMOLITIONS (ICAHD), and RABBIS FOR HUMAN RIGHTS, mount campaigns during each olive harvest to help pick the trees of those Palestinians who cannot access their lands for a variety of reasons. Some Israelis have regularly participated in the weekly nonviolent demonstrations against the separation Barrier to express solidarity with Palestinians, in the hope of reducing the Israeli military's use of live ammunition against Palestinian demonstrators; other Israelis have accompanied Palestinians to their fields for planting, plowing, or grazing their sheep in areas prone to settler violence. Members of ICAHD and Rabbis for Human Rights have been particularly involved in protesting the Israeli policy of administrative house demolitions and have even chained themselves to houses in front of bulldozers.

In addition, nongovernment groups overseas have brought hundreds of volunteers into the Occupied Territories to engage in nonviolent intervention against Israeli repression and other violence; these groups include the INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY MOVEMENT, CHRISTIAN PEACEMAKER TEAMS, the Ecumenical Accompaniment Program in Palestine and Israel, and Operation Dove. Such international efforts to support nonviolence and to accompany nonviolent Palestinian activists have deterred worse violence and have raised awareness of the nature of the Occupation among North Americans and Europeans, though it has also led to the deaths of several international volunteers at the hands of Israeli Occupation forces.

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT; TAX REVOLT

Bibliography

- Ackerman, Peter, and Jack Duvall. A Force More Powerful: A Century of Nonviolent Conflict. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2001.
- Alternative Tourism Group. Palestine and Palestinians: Guidebook. Bayt Sahour, West Bank: Alternative Tourism Group, 2005.
- American Friends Service Committee. Nonviolent Resistance and the Olive Harvest. Philadelphia, PA: AFSC, n.d. www.afsc.org/israel-palestine/learn/nonviolence-and-the-olive-harvest.htm.
- Applied Research Institute in Jerusalem and the Land Research Center. "Palestinian and Israeli Demonstrations and Civil Disobedience to Stop the New Settlement." Monitoring Israeli Colonizing Activities in the Palestinian West Bank and Gaza. December 2004. www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies.
- Awad, Mubarak. "Non-Violent Resistance: A Strategy for the Occupied Territories." Journal of Palestine Studies. 13:4 (Summer 1984).
- . Nonviolent Resistance in the Middle East. Philadelphia, PA: New Society Publishers, 1985.
- Bacher, John. "Palestinian Pacifism." Peace Magazine. October–December 2002. www.peacemagazine.org/archive/v18n4p16.htm.
- Crow, Ralph E., Philip Grant, and Saad E. Ibrahim, eds. Arab Nonviolent Political Struggle in the Middle East. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner, 1990.
- Dajani, Souad R. Eyes without Country: Searching for a Palestinian Strategy of Liberation. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1995.
- Ellis, Marc H. Toward a Jewish Theology of Liberation: The Challenge of the Twenty-first Century. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2004.
- Gvirtz, Amos, ed. Nonviolent Possibilities for the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict. Papers from the Jerusalem Conference: 7–8 September 1993. Jerusalem: Palestinians and Israelis for Nonviolence, 1998.
- Hurwitz, Deena, ed. Walking the Red Line: Israelis in Search of Justice in Palestine. Gabriola Island, BC: New Society Publishers, 1992.
- International Women's Peace Service. "West Bank Towns Unite to Save Olive Groves." March 2004. www.iwps.info/en/articles/article.php?id=495.
- Islam-on-Line. "Protesting Settlers' Violence, Israeli Intellectuals Pick Olives with Palestinians." Islam Online & News Agencies. October 2002. www.islam-online.net/english/news/2002-10/31/article73.shtml.
- Kennedy, R. Scott. "The Golani Druze: A Case of Non-Violent Resistance." Journal of Palestine Studies. 13:2 (Winter 1984): 48–64.
- Kidron, Peretz, ed. Refusenik: Israel's Soldiers of Conscience. London: Zed Books, 2004.
- King, Mary. A Quiet Revolution: The First Palestinian Intifada and Nonviolent Resistance. New York: Nation Books, 2007.
- Nagler, Michael N. Is There No Other Way? The Search for a Nonviolent Future. Makawao, HI: Inner Ocean Publishing, 2003.
- Palestinian News Network. "Farmer's Letter Writing Campaign for Permission." October 2004.
- . "Farmers Near Nablus Engage in Nonviolent Resistance by Refusing Israeli Schedule." October 2004.
- . "Palestinian Nonviolent Resistance to Israelis in the Olive Harvest." October 2004.
- Prior, Michael, ed. Speaking the Truth: Zionism, Israel and the Occupation. Northampton, MA: Olive Branch Press, 2005.
- Rigby, Andrews. Living the Intifada. London: Zed Books, 1991.
- Saleh, Abdul Jawad. "The Palestinian Non-Violent Resistance Movement." Alternative Palestinian Agenda. Madison: University of Wisconsin, 2002. www.ap-agenda.org/11-02/asaleh.htm.
- Sandercock, Josi, et al., eds. Peace under Fire: Israel/Palestine and the International Solidarity Movement. New York: Verso Books, 2004.
- Sharp, Gene. "The Intifada and Nonviolent Struggle." Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:1 (1989).
- Sharp, Gene, and Afif Safieh. "Interview: Gene Sharp: Nonviolent Struggle." Journal of Palestine Studies. 17:1 (1987).
- Stephan, Maria. Civilian Jihad: Nonviolent Struggle, Democratization, and Governance in the Middle East. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2010.
- Ta'ayush. "Khirbet Jbarrah Harvest." October 2003. www.taayush.org.
- Zunes, Stephen, Lester R. Kurtz, and Sarah B. Asher, eds. Nonviolent Social Movements: A Geographical Perspective. Chichester, UK: Blackwell Publishing, 1999.

—Maia Carter Hallward and Stephen Zunes

Nordau, Max Simon (1849–1923)

Max Nordau (born Simon Maximilian Südfeld) was a Zionist leader, physician, author, and social critic. Together with THEODOR HERZL he was a cofounder of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION and president and vice president of several ZIONIST CONGRESSES.

Born in Hungary of SEPHARDI origin, Nordau was the son of an Orthodox rabbi and poet. Although given a solid grounding in Jewish tradition, he drifted away from the Jewish community and worked as a journalist for small newspapers in Budapest before moving to Berlin in 1873 and changing his name. He soon moved to Paris to work as a correspondent for Die Neue Freie Presse, and he spent most of his life in Paris. In 1880 he began to study medicine and later opened a practice, although it was in the literary field that he was to make a name for himself. Married to a Protestant Christian woman and, despite his Hungarian background, strongly attracted to GERMANY's culture, Nordau was an example of a fully assimilated and acculturated European Jew.

Nordau was considered a controversial writer for his attacks on contemporary European art and social and political behavior. As a social critic he wrote a number of books, including The Conventional Lies of Our Civilization (1883), Degeneration (1892), and Paradoxes (1896). Although not his most popular or successful work while alive, the book most often remembered and cited today is Degeneration. Conventional Lies was an attack on irrationality, egotism, and nihilism, which he perceived as the evils of his time. By 1898 his works had been translated into some eighteen languages.

Nordau's conversion to ZIONISM, like Herzl's, was based on FRANCE's DREYFUS Affair (1894), after which the increase of ANTI-SEMITISM in Europe sensitized him to his duties toward the Jewish people. When Herzl met with him, it took little persuasion to convince Nordau that a Jewish state was a worthy idea. The two soon became partners in the Zionist movement, playing a central role in defining the BASEL PROGRAM (1897), which stated the objectives of the movement. At the First Zionist Congress, Nordau gave the opening speech on the condition of the Jewish people, which subsequently became a tradition at later World Zionist Congresses. At the Sixth Zionist Congress, Nordau defended Herzl's Uganda plan, in which the Jewish state would be created in Uganda, arguing that it offered a temporary solution to the Jewish people's sufferings, and coined the term nachtsyl (night shelter) to describe it. Following Herzl's death Nordau was offered the position of president of the World Zionist Organization but declined, preferring instead to serve as adviser; he opposed the growing trend toward practical Zionism, remaining faithful to Herzl's political program.

Eventually Nordau distanced himself from the Zionist movement, although not from the idea. He last attended a Zionist Congress in 1911, and, although a resident in Spain during World War I, he tried to maintain contact with the movement. At the end of the war, CHAIM WEIZMANN attempted to bring him back into the organization, but Nordau rejected the overtures, believing that the movement was a shadow of what Herzl had intended it to be. In 1920 he suggested a plan to evacuate half a million Jews from Europe to Palestine, but no one took the idea seriously at that time. By then he had returned to Paris, where he died after a long illness.

Bibliography

- Baldwin, P. M. Liberalism, Nationalism, and Degeneration: The Case of Max Nordau. Atlanta: Emory University Press, 1980.
- Ben-Horin, Meir. The Legacy of Max Nordau. New York: B'nai B'rith Adult Jewish Education, 1963.
- Nordau, Anna Dons. Max Nordau: A Biography. New York: Nordau Committee, 1943.
- Nordau, Max Simon. Max Nordau to His People: A Summons and a Challenge. Published for Nordau Zionist Society. Jerusalem: Scopus Publishers, 1941.
- Penslar, D. J. "From 'Conventional Lies' to Conventional Myths: Max Nordau's Approach to Zionism." History of European Ideas. 22:3 (1996).

Norway

See JOHAN JUERGEN HOLST; TERJE ROED-LARSEN; SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES

Nuclear Program, Israel

It has been widely believed that Israel possesses the largest and most sophisticated arsenal outside of the five declared nuclear powers, although Israel had never officially admitted possessing nuclear weapons. In a press conference in JORDAN in 1998, former prime minister SHIMON PERES hinted at possession when he said: "Israel built a nuclear option, not in order to have a Hiroshima but an Oslo." In December 2006, Prime Minister EHUD OLMERT also hinted at Israel's nuclear capability. Speaking to a GERMAN television network he said, "Can you say that this is the same level, when they [IRAN] are aspiring to have nuclear weapons, as America, FRANCE, Israel and RUSSIA?" Indeed, there is abundant information that the capability exists. The center of Israel's weapons program is the Negev Nuclear Research Center, usually identified simply as "Dimona" from the name of the nearby desert town. All production and fabrication of special nuclear materials (plutonium, lithium-6 deuteride, and enriched and unenriched uranium) occur at Dimona, although the design and assembly of nuclear weapons take place elsewhere.

Israel has been involved with nuclear technology from the founding of the country in 1948. Many talented scientists immigrated to Palestine from Europe during the 1930s and 1940s, particularly the German scientist Ernst David Bergmann, who was later the director of the Israeli Atomic Energy Commission and the founder of Israel's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. By 1949 the Weizmann Institute of Science was actively supporting nuclear research, with Bergmann heading its chemistry division. In 1949 Francis Perrin, a French nuclear physicist and atomic energy commissioner who was Bergmann's personal friend, visited the Weizmann Institute, after which Israeli scientists were invited to the newly established French nuclear research facility at Saclay, and a joint research effort was subsequently established.

The development of nuclear science and technology in France and Israel remained closely linked from the early 1950s through the early 1960s; for example, Israeli scientists were involved in the construction of the G-1 plutonium production reactor and UP1 reprocessing plant at Marcoule, France. The two countries had close relations in other areas as well. France was Israel's principal conventional arms supplier, and as instability spread in France's colonies in North Africa, Israel provided valuable intelligence obtained from MIZRAHI Jews in those countries. In October 1956, Israel and France collaborated (along with Britain) in planning and staging the Suez-Sinai war against EGYPT.

Six weeks before the war, Israel approached France for assistance in building a nuclear reactor. Shimon Peres, a key aide to Prime Minister DAVID BEN-GURION and director general of the Ministry of Defense, and Bergmann met with members of France's Atomic Energy Commission (CEA), and an initial understanding to provide a reactor was apparently reached during September. On 7 November 1956 a secret meeting between French and Israeli officials produced the understanding that France would assist Israel in developing nuclear capability. Several months of negotiation produced an agreement on the form French assistance would take—an 18-megawatt (MW, thermal) reactor of the EL-3 type along with plutonium separation technology. The reactor was later officially upgraded to 24 MW, but the actual specifications issued to engineers provided for core cooling ducts sufficient for up to three times this power level, along with a plutonium extraction plant of similar capacity.

Hundreds of French engineers and technicians secretly built the reactor at Dimona underground. In early 1958, ground was broken for the EL-102 reactor (as it was known in France). In 1959 the necessary twenty tons of heavy water were supplied by Great Britain (although it was originally believed to have come from NORWAY). In 1960, France, then under the leadership of Charles de Gaulle, reconsidered the deal and decided to suspend the project, although negotiations kept the issue open. An agreement reached before the year's end allowed the reactor to proceed if Israel promised not to make weapons or to announce the project to the world.

Israel used a variety of subterfuges to explain away the activity at Dimona, calling it a "manganese plant" among other things. Before the end of 1958, US intelligence became aware of the project from pictures taken from U-2 spy planes and identified the site as a probable reactor complex. On 2 December 1960 the US State Department issued a determination that Israel had a secret nuclear installation, and on 16 December this became public knowledge when it appeared in the New York Times. On 21 December Ben-Gurion responded to the disclosure by saying that Israel was building a 24 MW reactor "for peaceful purposes." In public the United States accepted Israel's claims at face value but privately exerted pressure, especially during the KENNEDY administration. Although Israel did allow a cursory inspection by physicists Eugene Wigner and I. I. Rabi, Ben-Gurion consistently refused to allow international inspections. The final resolution was a commitment from Israel to use the facility for peaceful purposes and an agreement to admit a US inspection team once a year. During these inspections, which began in 1962 and continued until 1969, Israel showed the US engineers the aboveground area of the buildings, but not, however, the many underground levels. The aboveground areas had simulated control rooms, and while the inspectors were present Israel kept access to the underground areas bricked up.

In 1962 the Dimona reactor went critical, and there is little doubt then that sometime in the late 1960s, Israel became the sixth nation in the world to manufacture nuclear weapons. It is believed that the first extraction of plutonium occurred in 1965 and that enough plutonium was on hand for one weapon during the 1967 WAR, although whether a prototype weapon actually existed is unknown. US journalist Seymour Hersh relates that Israeli defense minister MOSHE DAYAN approved starting weapons production in early 1968, when the plutonium separation plant presumably went into full operation. After this, Israel produced three to five bombs a year. In 1971, Israel began purchasing krytrons—ultra-high-speed electronic switching tubes.

Beginning in 1967, considerable nuclear cooperation developed between Israel and South Africa, which continued through the late 1970s and 1980s. During this period South Africa was Israel's primary supplier of uranium from Dimona. The 22 September 1979 nuclear explosion in the south Indian Ocean is widely believed to have been a joint South African–Israeli test.

Hersh also relates extensive (and highly successful) efforts by Israel to obtain targeting data from US intelligence. Tel Aviv obtained much satellite imaging data of the Soviet Union through the American spy Jonathan Pollard, which appears to indicate that Israel intended to use its nuclear arsenal as a deterrent, political lever, or retaliatory capability against the Soviet Union itself.

See also JOHN F. KENNEDY; MORDECHAI VANUNU

Bibliography

- Arutz Sheva. "Olmert Acknowledges Israel's Nuclear Arsenal." 11 December 2006. www.israelnationalnews.com/news.php?id=117225.
- Cohen, Avner. Israel and the Bomb. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- Farr, Warner D. "The Third Temple's Holy of Holies: Israel's Nuclear Weapons." The Counterproliferation Papers. Future Warfare Series No. 2. Maxwell Air Force Base, AL: US Air Force Counterproliferation Center, Air War College, Air University, 1999.
- Federation of American Scientists. "Israel: Nuclear Weapons." n.d. www.fas.org/nuke/guide/israel/nuke.
- Gilling, Tom, and John McKnight. Trial and Error: Mordechai Vanunu and Israel's Nuclear Bomb. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
- Hersh, Seymour M. The Samson Option: Israel's Nuclear Arsenal and American Foreign Policy. New York: Random House, 1991.
- Leigh, David. "How the UK Gave Israel the Bomb." The Guardian (London). 4 August 2005.
- The Risk Report*. "Israel: Plutonium Production." The Risk Report. 2:4 (1996).
- . "Israel: Uranium Processing and Enrichment." The Risk Report. 2:4 (1996).
- Shalom, Zaki. Israel's Nuclear Option: Behind the Scenes Diplomacy between Dimona and Washington. Brighton, UK, and Portland, OR: Sussex Academic Press and Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, 2005.

Nuseibeh, Sari Anwar (1949–)

Sari Nuseibeh is a prominent academic, president of al-Quds University in JERUSALEM, political analyst, diplomat, and a member of the prominent Nuseibeh family. Born in Jerusalem, he graduated from Oxford University with degrees in politics, philosophy, and economics in 1971 and from Harvard University in 1978 with a Ph.D. in Islamic philosophy. From 1978 to 1990 he was a professor of philosophy at BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY (in the WEST BANK) and also taught classes in Islamic philosophy to Jewish students at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

In June 1987 Nuseibeh made what was then a highly controversial suggestion: that the Palestinians should recognize Israel and that Israel should annex the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, reunify the country, and give full citizenship to the Palestinians in a single BINATIONAL state. A month later Nuseibeh was approached privately by the LIKUD PARTY's Moshe Amirav with a proposal to open a dialogue between the Likud and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in the West Bank. Nuseibeh and FAYSAL AL-HUSAYNI thus became the first prominent Palestinians to meet with the Israeli right wing. On 21 September 1987 Nuseibeh was badly beaten on leaving Birzeit University, presumably by elements of the Palestinian FATAH party angered by his talking with the Likud. (Husayni was jailed by Israel for attending the meeting, and Amirav was expelled from the Likud.)

During the First INTIFADA (1987–1993), Nuseibeh helped to author the "inside" Palestinians' declaration of independence and to establish some of the political and technical committees necessary for that struggle. He claimed that his objective was to strengthen Fatah in the Occupied Territories, but many were skeptical of his commitment to the PLO, and, as such, he was widely accused of wanting personal power.

In May 1989, Israel named Nuseibeh an undicted co-conspirator in the trial of four Palestinian activists facing an Israeli military court. Israel alleged he was a member of the Unified National Leadership of the Uprising and that he was instrumental in channeling funds from the PLO in exile to the Occupied Territories. Nuseibeh denied the accusation and no charges were brought. The following month, Israel closed his Holy Land Press Service, which was providing news of the Intifada to foreign correspondents and diplomats, alleging that it funneled money to the Intifada—a charge Nuseibeh denied. At the same time, Nuseibeh's English-language weekly was banned.

After Scud missiles were fired at Tel Aviv during the GULF WAR, Nuseibeh was arrested and placed under ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION on 29 January 1991, effectively accused of being an IRAQ agent. British and US officials challenged his arrest, and Amnesty International adopted Nuseibeh as a prisoner of conscience. He was released without charge after ninety days in an Israeli prison.

Unable to participate in the Palestinian delegation to the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE, because Israel prohibited Palestinian residents of Jerusalem from taking part, Nuseibeh worked behind the scenes with the joint Palestinian-Jordanian delegation. In 1991 he also coauthored No Trumpets, No Drums with US scholar Mark Heller, which called for a TWO-STATE SOLUTION to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. About the same time, he founded the Palestinian Consultancy Group (Maqdes) in Ramallah in the West Bank, which he still directs.

In 2001 YASIR ARAFAT appointed Nuseibeh the PNA representative in Jerusalem after the death of Faysal Husayni. However, an article he published on 24 September 2001, recommending that Palestinians give up the right of return, appeared in numerous Israeli and Palestinian newspapers and generated enormous anger among Palestinians. In January 2002 Nuseibeh criticized the militarization of the Intifada and called for the renunciation of SUICIDE BOMBINGS and the establishment of Palestine as a demilitarized state. Israel again arrested him briefly, on 17 December 2001, for planning a reception for foreign diplomats at the Imperial Hotel in Jerusalem. Top Likud officials justified the arrest on the grounds that the reception threatened Israel's sovereignty over Jerusalem. On 10 July 2002, Israel closed and sealed Nuseibeh's offices at al-Quds University, where he had been president since 1995, on the grounds that they represented PLO activity in Jerusalem.

Reflecting the Palestinian public's outrage at Nuseibeh, on 19 December 2002 Arafat relieved him of the PLO portfolio for Jerusalem. In June 2003 Nuseibeh and former Israeli SHIN BET chief AMI AYALON colaunched The People's Voice, a civil initiative to mobilize grassroots support for a two-state solution.

See also NUSEIBEH-AYALON AGREEMENT

Bibliography

Nuseibeh, Sari, with Anthony David. Once upon a Country: A Palestinian Life—Autobiographical Reflections. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2007.

Nuseibeh-Ayalon Agreement, 2002

The Nuseibeh-Ayalon Agreement is a peace plan signed on 27 July 2002 by Palestinian SARI NUSEIBEH and Israeli AMI AYALON. The six-point plan, also known as the People's Voice petition, set out what the authors considered the essential components of a final peace agreement between Palestinians and Israelis. Nuseibeh is the president of al-Quds University and was formerly the PNA official responsible for JERUSALEM affairs. Ayalon was an admiral in the Israeli navy and director of the SHIN BET, the Israeli internal security service. Neither man considered himself a professional politician, but both acted as concerned private citizens. After drafting the document, Nuseibeh and Ayalon sought to build grassroots support for their plan. As of September 2005, Mifkad.org reported that 254,280 Israelis and 161,000 Palestinians had signed the petition.

The plan is short, with only six paragraph-long points introduced by a brief preamble, and begins by stating that "the Palestinian people and the Jewish people each recognize the other's historic rights with respect to the same land." It is based on a TWO-STATE SOLUTION formula where "both sides will declare that Palestine is the only state of the Palestinian people and Israel is the only state of the Jewish people." The permanent BORDERS would be based on the Green Line established by UN RESOLUTIONS 242, 338, and 181. Any border modifications "will be based on an equal territorial exchange (1:1) in accordance with the vital needs of both sides including security, territorial contiguity and DEMOGRAPHIC considerations." The plan also calls for a physical link between the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP and for the removal of all settlers from the territory of the Palestinian state. Jerusalem would become an open city and the capital of both states. In the plan, "Arab neighborhoods in Jerusalem will come under Palestinian sovereignty, Jewish neighborhoods under Israeli sovereignty." Regarding the HOLY SITES, the state of Palestine would guard the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF "for the benefit of Muslims," while Israel would be the guardian of the WESTERN WALL “for the benefit of the Jewish people. The status quo on Christian holy sites will be maintained.” The agreement recognizes the right of return of REFUGEES but with the important caveat that “Palestinian refugees will return only to the state of Palestine; Jews will return only to the state of Israel.” In addition, returnees would receive compensation from an internationally supported fund. The Palestinian state would be demilitarized, with its security and independence guaranteed by the international community. Finally, with the “full implementation of these principles all claims on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will end.”

In 2003 Nuseibeh and Ayalon traveled to Europe and the UNITED STATES to promote their agreement and argued that their proposal was different from and superior to the October 2003 GENEVA ACCORD. Although both plans are private two-state initiatives that have many similarities, they differ on several points, especially on the issue of refugees. The Nuseibeh-Ayalon Agreement rules out a return of Palestinian refugees to Israel, while the Geneva Accord vaguely allows for the possibility. However, the Geneva Accord avoids the term “right of return,” which is present in the Nuseibeh-Ayalon Agreement. Moreover, although the Geneva Accord is a virtual peace plan with the proposed text of a full final-status agreement, the People’s Voice petition only sets out basic principles of agreement.

In putting forth the agreement, the authors sought to “restore hope” after the AL-AQSA INTIFADA deepened violence between Palestinians and Israelis in spring 2002. They also intended to restart the official peace process by building support for the principles of peace from the ground up. Although Ayalon and Nuseibeh jointly promoted the plan together overseas, in Israel and Palestine each ran separate campaigns to attract signatures for the petition. Ayalon’s organization is Hamifkad Haleumi (National Register), while Nuseibeh’s is al-Hamla al-Sha’abiyya lil-Salam wa-al-Dimoqratiyya (HASHD, or the People’s Campaign for Peace and Democracy). Moreover, the two campaigns raised their funds separately.

The initiative has been criticized within both the Israeli and Palestinian publics. Israeli critics dismissed the petition as rewarding the Palestinians’ violence during the Intifada and questioned whether Nuseibeh could speak for the majority of Palestinians. Many Palestinian critics concurred on the latter point, arguing that Nuseibeh had breached the national consensus on the right of return of Palestinian refugees as expressed in UN RESOLUTION 194. Other Palestinian critics noted that the plan would allow Israel to keep expropriated land in Arab East Jerusalem.

The People’s Voice petition garnered support from US deputy defense secretary Paul Wolfowitz, who believed it backed the GEORGE W. BUSH administration’s Middle East ROAD MAP. Ayalon responded that, although the Road Map provided the path, the Nuseibeh-Ayalon Agreement was the objective. Some Israeli peace activists supported the agreement by stressing the shared objectives and complementary methods of the Geneva Accord and the Nuseibeh-Ayalon Agreement.

Bibliography

Peace Now. Peace Initiatives: “The Statement of Principles by Ami Ayalon and Sari Nuseibeh.” Reprint of the text of the agreement. <http://www.peacenow.org.il/site/en/peace.asp?pi=170&fld=193&docid=600&pos=0>.

—Russell E. Lucas

Nuseibeh Family

The Nuseibehs are one of the oldest families of JERUSALEM, traditionally a large landowning Arab clan, although their influence in Jerusalem public affairs had declined by the twentieth century. In 638 CE an agreement between the Muslim caliph Omar and the GREEK ORTHODOX patriarch put the keys to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in the hands of the Nuseibeh family for safekeeping. After the CRUSADERS arrived in 1099 CE, the family fled to NABLUS, but when the Muslim leader SALADIN reconquered Jerusalem in the thirteenth century, the family returned to Jerusalem. Saladin gave the church keys to two families—the Nuseibehs and the Joudehs. (Christian sects, often squabbling over stewardship of churches in the Holy Land, generally trusted Muslims with the keys—a custom that continues today.)

Two prominent twentieth-century members of the Nuseibeh family are Anwar and Hazem Nuseibeh. Anwar (1913–1986), a lawyer, politician, and supporter of the AL-HUSAYNI political faction, became secretary of the Jerusalem

National Committee in 1934. In 1946 he was appointed to the reconstituted ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE and was secretary-general in the ALL PALESTINE GOVERNMENT. After 1949 Anwar served in several ministerial and diplomatic positions for the Jordanian government. He is the father of Sari. Hazem (1922–) was a politician who, after receiving degrees from the American University in Beirut and Princeton University, served in numerous positions in the Jordanian government.

---

Occupation

In June 1967, during a war that lasted six days, Israel conquered the Egyptian territory of the Sinai Peninsula; the GAZA STRIP, which had been under Egyptian administration since the end of the 1948 WAR; the part of the WEST BANK east of the ARMISTICE line of 1949 (the Green Line), which JORDAN had annexed and administered since 1949; and a portion of the Syrian Heights above and north of the Sea of Galilee. A few weeks after the end of the 1967 WAR, Israel undertook its first endeavors to build Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Israel's Occupation of the Egyptian territory lasted fifteen years, until 1982, when, following a peace treaty with EGYPT signed in March 1979, Israel completed its withdrawal to the 1967 BORDER by evacuating and destroying all the settlements built in the Sinai Peninsula. Israel's rule in the rest of the Occupied Territories continues and today is the longest existing modern military occupation in the world. Two significant facts distinguish this Occupation from occupation of Palestinian territories by Jewish forces during the 1948 war: most of the territories occupied in 1967 have never been annexed and Israeli rule there is recognized by the entire international community as an occupation; only a small fraction of the Palestinian population living in these territories was forced to leave and become REFUGEES.

Occupied Palestinian Territories

When Israel conquered the West Bank and Gaza Strip in 1967, 1,256,000 Palestinians lived in these areas, some 235,000 of whom fled or were expelled to Jordan immediately after the war, only 45,000 of whom were allowed to return. Forty-two years later, the majority of the 3.5 million Palestinians living in the Occupied Territories were born under Occupation. During these years, without annexing the West Bank or Gaza or ever denying legally or officially the temporary status of the Occupation (except for the JERUSALEM area), Israel has radically transformed the occupied regions, their landscape, INFRASTRUCTURE, and DEMOGRAPHY in a way that seems to many irreversible. The ambiguous, indeterminate status of the West Bank and Gaza has become one of the main characteristics of Israel's form of governance and has allowed much of its colonization and oppressive practices, which were embedded from the beginning in an ambiguous legal system.

Palestinians living in the West Bank and Gaza have no political rights and are constantly exposed to violent threats and the direct use of force from the Israeli military. Although in rare cases compensation for confiscated property has been offered and even received, most often property is confiscated or destroyed without compensation. Soldiers' injuries to and killings of Palestinian noncombatants or of armed people who were not engaged in combat with Israeli armed forces are investigated by the army itself, but very few cases have led to legal charges, and of these only a handful have ended in indictment and even fewer in punishment. The situation is worse when it comes to SETTLER VIOLENCE against Palestinian civilians, which is rarely investigated. In other words, those who injure or kill Palestinians in the Occupied Territories are usually immune. And yet the use of force by the military, the police, and the special services (SHIN BET) against Palestinian bodies and property almost always enjoys the appearance of legality, at least in Israeli eyes.

The Legal Case. Even before the war was over, Israel declared martial law, according to a set of orders planned in advance to ensure the army's preparedness for occupying the Palestinian territories. The military commander was authorized to enact primary legislation, and other commanders were authorized to enact secondary legislation; some of these prerogatives were transferred in 1981 to the head of the CIVIL ADMINISTRATION. The system of military regulations and decrees subordinated the Jordanian legal system, which was in place at the time of Israel's Occupation and which remains in force as long as it does not contradict Israeli military legislation. Both systems, however, may be suspended or annulled at any moment by special EMERGENCY DEFENSE REGULATIONS issued by military commanders, according to BRITISH MANDATE law embedded in both Israeli and Jordanian law. Emergency decrees have been used for executing DEPORTATIONS, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, detention without trial (ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION), and seizure of LAND for so-called military purposes or as STATE LAND. The intensity and frequency of the use of these measures have varied during the four decades of Occupation, but the power to use them has never been questioned, and it is one of the main characteristics of the Israeli ruling apparatus.

No Israeli government has ever ratified the Geneva Convention or recognized the Palestinian territories as occupied in the legal sense of the term, but government jurists and the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT have always insisted that the relevant articles in the Geneva Convention and the Hague regulations are and should be respected in practice. Israeli actions that clearly contradict articles from these documents of INTERNATIONAL LAW (e.g., deportations, the establishment of civilian Jewish settlements) were legitimized through the Israeli courts' interpretations. Since 1968, the Supreme Court has agreed to consider Palestinian appeals that challenge the legality of decisions and actions taken by the military or civil administration, and the number of appeals grew steadily despite the official opposition of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), which well understood the collaborative effect of this procedure. Most appeals were rejected (almost 99 percent), usually for the all-pervasive security reasons and "military necessity," which soon included the establishment of civilian settlements. The few exceptions in which governmental malpractice was admitted hardly forced the government to change its practice and have never affected its policies. However, both sides have gained something out of this legal practice. On the one hand, Palestinian access to the court has contributed to the legitimacy of the Occupation among Israelis (and some internationals), and, on the other hand, it has given Palestinians occasions to speak out and force Israel to listen to their complaints, in whatever limited form the legal discourse could allow.

In the first two decades of the Occupation, Israeli military force and emergency decrees were used mainly to suppress resistance—both military and political. Palestinian political leaders and activists were detained or deported without trial; labor unions and other civic associations were banned, and armed people and those suspected of relations with armed groups were detained without trial or arrested and sentenced in military courts. At the same time, the ruling apparatuses—both military and civilian—administered the daily lives of the governed population and took some minimal care of its basic needs. Israel allowed movement of people and goods to and from Jordan and Egypt, fostered the integration of Palestinian workers into the Israeli labor market, and exported its own products to the Palestinian market. The Palestinian ECONOMY soon became integrated into and dependent upon the Israeli economy. The introduction of cheap Palestinian labor (which was not protected by Israel's social laws) had a triple effect: it forced thousands of Palestinians to abandon agricultural work in cultivated land, restructured the socioeconomic stratification of Israeli society, and contributed to rapid growth of Israel's economy (but also delayed industrialization in areas such as construction work). The hierarchical, exploitative labor market created the main place, which lasted well into the 1990s, for encounters between Israelis and Palestinians.

The Use of Settlements. After the 1967 War, many Zionist Jews across the Israeli political map considered the West Bank and Gaza as part of the historical "Land of Israel" (Greater Israel) and demanded to resume Jewish colonization there. Although some objected to the idea, the main argument between Zionist doves and hawks was about the location of the new settlements. A few new Jewish settlements were built immediately after the war, primarily in areas where Jews lived before 1948 (HEBRON and Gush Etzion), as well as in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, where colonization was conceived as part of a military strategy against neighboring Arab states. Clashes between young Jewish religious-nationalist settlers and the LABOR government then in power ended again and again in compromises that allowed for the construction of temporary housing. The Labor governments that ruled till 1977 were unable to make a clear and firm decision on the territories in general and on the issue of settlements in particular, but many of their members supported the settlers and helped them in various ways, both material and political. However, in the first decade after the war, the colonizing effort was still hesitant, scattered, and negligible—except for Jerusalem and its surroundings, where intensive construction of new Jewish settlements started immediately after the war.

Using administrative decrees, Israel almost tripled the municipal area of Jerusalem, where borders were changed several times to include more Jewish colonies. Israeli law was applied to the region by a special fiat enacted in 1968 (reaffirmed in 1981 by another special act to prevent the option of any withdrawal of Israel from Jerusalem). Palestinians living in the Jerusalem region who wanted Israeli citizenship had to ask for it, although few did, and most who asked were denied. In the 1990s, Palestinian inhabitants of GREATER JERUSALEM who left for periods of more than seven years (and often even less) lost their PERMITS to return to their homes. The “quiet transfer,” as this administrative deportation or prohibition on FAMILY REUNIFICATION was called by the human rights group B’TSELEM, forced thousands of Palestinians out of the Jerusalem area and often out of Palestine. The Jerusalem area as a whole was gradually cut off from the rest of the West Bank by a series of ROADBLOCKS, CHECKPOINTS, and a permit system that separates Jerusalemites from other West Bank Palestinians. This has affected access to and functioning of many Palestinian institutions located in Jerusalem, including hospitals, schools, institutes of research and higher learning, and various organs of CIVIL SOCIETY IN THE WEST BANK AND GAZA.

The colonial project gained new impetus when the right-wing LIKUD PARTY came to power in 1977. Dozens of new settlements were built across the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Land was first seized and confiscated for security reasons, but after a 1979 Supreme Court challenge to the seizure of private land near NABLUS, Israel changed its tactics. Relying on an OTTOMAN law embedded in the Jordanian system, uncultivated land was declared “State Land” and was allocated for the construction of new Jewish colonies. By 1983, Israel had seized about 25 percent of the entire Occupied Territories and declared it state land, making way for further colonization.

The result of this continual process is that today Palestinians can use freely (i.e., build on and cultivate) less than 40 percent of the land in the West Bank. But the seizure of land was not always accompanied by actual colonization. After 1977, the pace, direction, and form of the settlement project were mainly determined by the strength of international—mainly US—pressure and the weight given to such pressure by the acting government. In the late 1980s, colonization entered a new phase with the construction of large settlement towns close to but east of the Green Line, together with a system of new ROADS leading to and connecting these towns and the granting of generous subsidies to those willing to move eastward into the new settlements. New segments of the Israeli population hitherto uninterested in the colonial project were attracted to the new settlements for material reasons. As Israel’s state-centralized economy underwent the first stages in the process of privatization, the result was a restructuring of the Israeli welfare system along geographic lines: those who moved to the Occupied Territories enjoyed—and are still enjoying today—reduced taxes plus governmental subsidies in housing, EDUCATION, transportation, and culture, while the universal welfare system on the west side of the Green Line (Israel proper), which was structured according to socioeconomic criteria, has been gradually dismantled.

After ISRAEL’S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in August 2005, there were 125 Jewish settlements, both legal and illegal, in the Occupied Territories, in which 450,000 Jews live (some 200,000 of these in the Jerusalem area). These settlements are connected to each other through a network of wide roads and linked to Israeli territory through a series of highways. As Israelis, all settlers are subject to Israeli law, regardless of the territorial status of their places of residency. But, somewhat like the Palestinian inhabitants of the Occupied Territories, they are both inside and outside the law. On the one hand, as far as their relations to Palestinians and their property are concerned, their subjection to the law is mostly theoretical, and when offenses are committed, the law is hardly ever enforced. On the other hand, when settlers challenged the Sharon government’s decision to evacuate the settlements in the Gaza Strip and northern Samaria in the West Bank (as part of Israel’s unilateral disengagement plan in 2005), the Israeli Supreme Court rejected their appeal and reasserted the temporary status of the settlements and the precarious status of the settlers as bearers of property rights in the Occupied Territories.

Most Palestinians resisted the Israeli Occupation from its beginning, using both political and armed means. The first signs of resistance were met with very harsh measures of repression by the Israeli forces, and both the resistance and its suppression were often ignored by the Israeli public or silenced by the Israeli authorities. As a result, until the First INTIFADA, the resistance appeared, to Israeli eyes at least, as scattered, relatively isolated, and easy to repress. Many political leaders were deported or forced to COLLABORATE with the Israeli regime. With the Intifada, which erupted in December 1987, resistance became popular and widespread, and a new local leadership vigorously asserted itself. The emergence of new cadres of activists committed to the national struggle among the occupied population pushed the PLO leadership, then in exile in TUNIS, not only to intensify its struggle against Israel (which had been halted after the expulsion of that leadership from LEBANON in 1982) but also to take a more realist position—give up the dream of reconquering the whole of Palestine and recognize the existence of Israel in the 1948 borders. The Intifada yielded wide international interest and put the Occupation on the agenda of many international players. Numerous activists from international human rights organizations, journalists, and diplomats were drawn to the region. Many Israelis, too, became aware of the moral, political, and economic costs of the Occupation to Israeli society, and opposition to the government's policies mounted, although its political fruits came about only after the Labor Party returned to power in 1993.

Oslo Accords. In the new political environment created by the 1991 GULF WAR, a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinian people (represented by the PLO) that would include the end of the Occupation seemed a feasible political goal. Secret talks between the two parties held after YITZHAK RABIN was elected as prime minister in 1992 yielded the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP), the first of the OSLO ACCORDS. The Accords promised a gradual progress toward ending the Occupation without defining the terms of the final agreement, the status of the Palestinian entity, or the BORDERS between it and Israel. The Accords divided the Occupied Territories into three zones of control. Israeli control over the Palestinian cities was transferred to a PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) established and controlled by the PLO, whose leadership returned to Palestine after decades of exile. The Accords allowed the construction, with the help of Western states, of Palestinian state apparatuses, including a nonhierarchical structure of several distinct armed bodies, all of which were under the command of President YASIR ARAFAT. This security apparatus was committed, in principle at least, to collaborate with Israeli forces in suppressing Palestinian armed resistance. Negotiations toward a final implementation of later phases of the Accords and the final solution that should have followed them were conducted while Israel was still holding direct control over 60 percent of the area (Area C) and about 20 percent of the Palestinian population. The OSLO PROCESS soon came under sharp attack by opponents on both sides.

The mechanisms of cooperation and negotiation established in the Oslo Accords functioned only for a short while. The March 1994 massacre of dozens of Palestinians at prayer by a Jewish settler in the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in Hebron and the oppressive measures Israel took against Palestinians in the aftermath to prevent retaliation, together with the growing opposition to the political process by the Palestinian religious parties HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD, yielded a wave of TERRORIST attacks against Israelis—the SUICIDE BOMBINGS. Most Israelis ignored their government's responsibility for this new wave of terror and supported its violent response. The new repressive measures taken to “uproot terrorism and abolish its infrastructure” resulted in the gradual dismantling of the various mechanisms of political negotiation and administrative cooperation set in place in the various Oslo agreements. Colonization, which was supposed to come to a halt with the Oslo Accords, took two new forms, both of which have been legally dubious and often violent: the enlargement of existing settlements to accommodate the settlers' “natural growth” and the construction of so-called illegal OUTPOSTS and their de facto legitimization and development. More and more settlements are now served by a system of bypass roads that allow rapid movement of settlers and soldiers and are more or less closed to Palestinians, who are not allowed to cross them or come too close to their margins. Palestinians are also not allowed to enter the settlements (whose municipal areas extend far beyond the built-up environment) without a special permit. Colonization has thus squeezed the Palestinians into smaller and increasingly fragmented space, damaged (often irreversibly) the Palestinian landscape and ENVIRONMENT, expropriated private property and WATER resources, and systematically separated the lives of Palestinians and Israeli colonizers, while efforts to reconstruct Palestinian infrastructure have been postponed indefinitely or undermined completely.

During the Oslo years (1994–2000), this process was still partial and its costs to the Palestinian side were justified or tolerated because of the promise and prospect of a political agreement through which most or all of the settlements would be evacuated and Palestinians would regain their land and independence, as described in UN RESOLUTION 242. Growing Palestinian frustration intensified by the collapse of the Oslo Process, and ignited by ARIEL SHARON's provocative visit to AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF in late September 2000, yielded scattered Palestinian attacks across the Occupied Territories that were met by excessive use of force by the Israeli authorities. This was the beginning of the Second or AL-AQSA INTIFADA, which has lasted more than nine years and was—on both sides—much more deadly than the first one, and much more devastating for the Palestinian economy and society. During that period the colonizing process became more blatant, consistent, orchestrated, and intensified. Israel reconquered parts of the areas under Palestinian control, and the already fragmented Palestinian space has been turned into a cluster of isolated territorial cells in which Palestinians are separated not only from Israelis but also from each other. Since 2000, and especially in response to the terrorist attacks of the Second Intifada, separation has become increasingly popular among Israelis, both as a strategy of control and as an ideological principle and a discursive trope. Two major strategic policies were shaped and executed in this context: the construction of the separation wall, or BARRIER, between Israel and the Occupied Territories, which runs east of the Green Line across Palestinian villages and fields, as well as Israel's unilateral "disengagement" from Gaza (August 2005), in which Israel evacuated its settlements and army bases from the Strip while keeping it as a closed area and maintaining full control over all crossings leading into and out of that area.

The EHUD OLMERT government, which was elected in March 2006, adopted disengagement as its declared policy and envisioned evacuation of more remote settlements, completing the Barrier and turning it into a border, and consolidating and annexing the major settlement blocs while still containing and controlling the entire Palestinian population in the Gaza Strip as well as in the West Bank. None of these goals were achieved. Instead, the Olmert government conducted a failed war against the Hizbullah in Lebanon (in response to an ambush in which three soldiers were killed) and launched a brutal attack against the Palestinian population in the Gaza Strip, the worst of its kind so far within the Occupied Territories. The attack on Gaza in January 2009 (OPERATION CAST LEAD), which left 1,400 Palestinian dead and more than 15,000 houses damaged or ruined, was conducted in response to firing of homemade rockets on Israeli towns and villages. Israel reacted as if Gaza were an independent enemy state and not—since the Hamas government was elected in June 2006—a besieged territory or, better, a huge prison, which no one can enter or leave without Israeli permission, and in which the population is supported by humanitarian aid but purposefully kept as close as possible to the "threshold of humanitarian catastrophe."

The imprisonment of Gaza and the fragmentation of the West Bank are both driven by the same logic of separation. The rationale of this kind of separation is not colonial and it often works against the settlements, whose existence and location only constrain, enable, and accelerate the spatial fragmentations; the rationale is rather security, which has become the main concern for Israelis since the 1990s. The common Israeli wisdom is that, because Palestinians are not partners for peace, Israeli security will be gained by spatial separation alone, and this by itself suffices to justify the devastating effects separation has had on Palestinian lives. Thus, the legal separation that has been in place since the beginning of the Occupation is now accompanied by a system of geographical separation. At present, separation has become a strategy of containment and control whose modality has changed and expanded in response to perceived threats, including remote control (from the air and the sea in Gaza), armed intervention and direct control through military raids aimed at targeted individuals, and the strict control of movement between and within Palestinian enclaves. As a result of this change, the colonizing project that was first developed into and structured as an apartheid-like system of governance has become entrapped within it.

New Kind of Governance. However, the Israeli regime of Occupation cannot be simply equated with the Apartheid regime of South Africa. Since 2000, it has become increasingly clear that Israeli rule in the Occupied Territories has become a form of governance or type of power in its own right with a history, an evolving and changing structure, and a logic of its own. The outlines of this unique governance appeared even before the Declaration of Principles, notably during the 1991 Gulf War, when the first total, long-term CLOSURE of the Occupied Territories was imposed, lasting almost six weeks. Types of closure have been differentiated according to their duration, the size of the area they cover, and their relative permeability. Spatial isolation and a strict regime prohibiting Palestinian movement have become the hallmarks of this new form of governance. Both have become more nuanced, more sophisticated, and more devastating for the Palestinian population. This sophisticated spatial regime has been closely associated with two other dimensions of Israeli governance: a regime of “temporariness”—an elaborate network of suspensions (indirect violence in which bodies are affected by the real or imagined presence of forces that may but do not actually exercise violence) that extends from the very minute details of local control, oppression, and resistance to the most general stakes of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict; and a peculiar economy of violence—a flexible equilibrium between “spectacular,” or direct, violence, and “suspended,” or indirect, violence. Thus one may describe the Israeli Occupation as a form of power structured along three axes: space, time, and force.

Space. Israel has established in the territories a very detailed and sophisticated regime for controlling Palestinians’ movement that relies on a thoroughly fragmented space, a strict but ever-changing system of classification of the Palestinian inhabitants, and a whole bureaucracy of permits granted and denied according to changing criteria. Permits, which are needed to pass checkpoints, go abroad, or spend time in Israel, are granted for purposes of work, study, medical care, family visits, and other humanitarian reasons. The territories have been demarcated and controlled as a cluster of cells; the movement of Palestinians and their goods into and out of each cell is strictly controlled. Cells may be as large as the Jordan Valley or as small as a single village or a single house, sometimes even one story or one room. Movement is controlled between Palestinian cells, between Palestinian and Jewish cells (settlements and army barracks), and between the cellular space of the territories and the relatively open space west of the Green Line. Palestinians have no access to many of the Israeli cells, including the settlements and a wide strip of land along the Jordan Valley, and many of the cells can only be accessed with special permits. The disengagement in Gaza has not changed this basic cellular pattern. The four main cells of the Gaza Strip were first merged into one and soon after were divided into two again: an uninhabitable area, from which Palestinians fire rockets into Israel and which Israel shells quite indiscriminately from the ground; and an inhabitable area, which Israel bombs selectively from the air, targeting specific individuals with “smart” missiles that all too often hit innocent bystanders and suspects alike.

The construction of the 450-mile-long Barrier has not changed the cellular regime, but it has clearly affected the size of the cells, the location of the gates, and the frequency of their dislocation as well as their status (closed, selectively open, or mostly open). With the construction of permanent terminals in place of some of the quasi-temporary and provisory checkpoints, in which the bureaucracy of permits has been rationalized, the cellular system now has a façade of a border on its western side. This cellular regime has turned uncertainty into a structural component of everyday life and made extremely costly any attempt to maintain relations of any kind—familial, social, economic, academic, bureaucratic, or political—between different cells.

According to numerous reports by humanitarian experts, this cellular confinement is the single most important reason for the collapse and continuing deterioration of the Palestinian economy and for bringing the territories to the verge of humanitarian catastrophe. Israeli military experts say that it is also the single most effective deterrent of terrorist activity. Although both statements may be true, Israel has created conditions for a chronic disaster in the Occupied Territories, which has been avoided only through aid from humanitarian organizations, Western governments, and UN agencies, who all collaborate with Israel in an effort not to cross the dangerous threshold; they all share with Israel the burden of feeding the population, which “the Occupation” has deprived of its basic means of production and exchange. A “disaster to come” sets the horizon of the humanitarian enterprise; in the meantime, it is precisely this enterprise that stands between present impoverishment and a full-fledged disaster.

Time. The suspension of humanitarian catastrophe reflects the deep-rooted reluctance, which structures Israeli governance in the Occupied Territories, to accept a final solution. Israel has always abstained from attempts to impose its own solution to the conflict through the use of force alone—in the form of another round of total war, massive deportation (TRANSFER), or full annexation (except for the Jerusalem region, where nationalist temptations proved too strong to resist). Calls for a full withdrawal to the 1967 borders, whether through agreement or unilaterally, have also been consistently rejected. Until 1993, negotiations with the recognized representatives of the Palestinian people, the PLO, were also rejected or postponed until certain conditions would be met by the organization. When negotiations began, they yielded an intermediate agreement—the Oslo Accords—whose structure consisted of a series of postponements of final status negotiations. Then and for a long time, the suspension of negotiations toward establishing the proper conditions for starting negotiations on the final agreement became a routine response by Israel to Palestinian terrorist attacks and gave Palestinian militants the power to dictate the pace and fate of the political negotiation. This seeming reluctance to make truly irreversible decisions is apparently in line with the common understanding of the Occupation, in which temporariness is one of the main strategies of the ruling power. What is effectively temporary is not the Occupation as a general framework of power relations—in fact, after more than four decades nothing seems more permanent than this framework—but everything that belongs to it: laws and regulations, rules and commands, political agreements and local arrangements, the presence of soldiers, the locations of their garrisons and the meaning of their orders, even the outlines of settlements and access to roads and routes one uses daily, the map itself, and above all what is permitted and what is forbidden, including the validity of written permits, sometimes even the permit to stay in one's own house.

Temporariness is created by the suspension of rules and permits' validity, and by the occupier's authority to suspend everything, which constantly hovers over the entire sphere of activity. An elaborate network of suspensions exists from the very minute details of local control to the most general stakes of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. During the Second Intifada and at least two years after its repression, the uncertainty that pervaded everyday life ruined the Palestinian life-world. Expectations, planning, and long-term projects were constantly and repeatedly jeopardized. Birthday parties and school calendars, meetings in offices and private dates, let alone timetables for production and exchange of any kind, were all suspended in their turn as a result of the temporary nature of every mechanism of social coordination. One never knew for how long even the most familiar rule would last—how long a closure would be in effect, for example. Life has been rearranged not only in smaller and inflexible spatial units, but also in smaller and very flexible temporal sequences, in a way that forced the shrinking of the entire world of everyday practice.

Since the end of 2006, Israel has slightly released its grip over the West Bank and allowed some of the Palestinian enclaves to enjoy relative calm. In this climate, the coordinated Israeli-American effort to isolate the elected Hamas government that has ruled the Gaza Strip since June 2006 brought massive European and American support to the PNA and made possible economic and cultural prosperity, especially in Ramallah and its surroundings. In the summer of 2009, in Ramallah, suspension means the suspension of any effort—using words or blood, diplomacy or violence—to end the Occupation.

Suspension is not simply a symmetrical structure of double exclusions that cancel each other out (neither annexation nor withdrawal, neither catastrophe nor development), but rather a power, an asymmetrical strategy. The space between annexation and transfer, wholesale disaster and a political agreement, is not a neutral one. This is the space in which the Israeli colonizing project has taken place, and this is the interregnum that has made possible its more or less continuous advance. From the first settlements onward, temporariness has been both a means and an almost inevitable stage in their construction. It has also reflected the internal political debate in Israel—the split between hawkish and dovish parties. The Israeli government itself has structured this debate, giving it its impetus and ideological function, transforming the landscape and its demographic constitution without making any clear and irreversible political decision. It is for these reasons that Israel started, in 2005, replacing its colonial expansionism with separatist strategies and discourse.

Force. The retreat of the rule of law and the complete blurring of distinctions between law and command, or between a constituted rule and an ad hoc order, are the links that hold together the outer and inner aspects of the system of suspensions. This blurring of distinctions is also a way of detaching the legal apparatus from the actual military apparatus of domination and control. On the one hand, executions by air and ground raids (the so-called TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS), house demolitions, detentions, and many other forms of exerting brute force on bodies, property, and land are conducted with only a semblance of a legal process; on the other hand, legal decisions are ignored or implemented in a very slow and distorted way. In fact, acting without three main apparatuses of state power—law, discipline, and ideology—the Israeli rule in the Occupied Territories can rely on the use of force alone.

Israel uses two kinds of force. “Suspended violence” is the force deployed across the Palestinian space whose presence is visible or merely hinted at by walls, gates, roadblocks, and road signs—it acts without touching; it directs and enforces without tearing bodies apart. It is clear to anyone involved that this violence may explode at any moment and become “spectacular violence,” appearing anywhere, at any moment, on the ground, from the air, and in Gaza from the sea as well. Usually soldiers at the checkpoints do not shoot. Missiles are fired from unseen helicopters, and tanks storm one neighborhood but kill people in another where they have not yet been noticed. Gradually, the deployment and use of military forces have been deterritorialized and disconnected from the specific places where resistance occurs; violence may erupt anywhere at any time. From the military point of view, Palestinians are a mass of moving bodies channeled through a system of checkpoints alongside a series of individual suspects who must be traced and located, followed, and stopped by arrest or “targeted elimination.”

This logic of action requires better coordination and integration between the forces exercising suspended violence and those exercising spectacular violence, reducing the presence of the former to signs and traces, and increasing the rapidity and precision with which the latter acts. Indeed, since the 2002 large-scale military operation in the West Bank and Gaza (e.g., OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD), Israel has significantly improved this interplay between spectacular and suspended violence, and the swift transition from the absence of the acting forces to their immediate presence, while simultaneously minimizing their operational costs. Because this strategy contradicts the logic of territorial expansionism, for which presence is of utmost importance, it has become necessary to reduce the areas of friction between Jewish settlers and Palestinian inhabitants. In the Gaza Strip this has led to the evacuation and destruction of all Jewish settlements, and similar acts may take place in the West Bank as well. So far, however, in the absence of further evacuation in the West Bank, the mechanisms of separation of movement (on the roads and at the checkpoints) have been radically enforced.

In these circumstances, the occupied is constantly exposed to violence, always at risk of being physically stroked, always forsaken and abandoned. Palestinians are neither citizen nor even subjects of the Israeli sovereign but “noncitizens” whose political existence is reduced to the status of an object of power, its target. At the same time, the occupied is also an object of power, that which stands in opposition to it, an obstacle in its way. From power’s point of view, the occupied is an addressee of symbolic action only because he is conceived, first and foremost, as an address for a possible violent action. His very presence, let alone his attempt to speak back to power, is conceived as a form of resistance. He is not punished because he transgresses the law; he is usually oppressed, detained, sent back, expelled, injured, or shot dead because he is present where he is not supposed to be, arriving at the wrong time at the wrong place.

Occupied Syrian Territory

On the eve of the 1967 War, about 130,000 Syrian citizens lived in the Syrian Heights (called Golan Heights by Israel). During and immediately after the war, they were expelled and their villages were systematically destroyed, often without prior notification. Only five villages in the northern part of the region, four of which are inhabited mainly by Syrian Druze, remained intact. Soon thereafter, Israel annexed the territory and applied its own law in the region by a special decree enacted in 1981, forcing Israeli citizenship on the inhabitants of the Druze villages. By 2005, Israel had constructed thirty-two settlements in the region, housing about 18,000 colonists. During the October 1973 WAR, led by Egypt and SYRIA in an attempt to retake the territories seized by Israel in 1967, Syria reoccupied some parts of its territory. However, it was soon forced to withdraw and yielded even more territory to Israel, which later, according to the armistice of 1974, was handed back to Syria together with the capital of the region of Quneitra, occupied in 1967. Since then, development of Israeli settlements has continued uninterrupted. The possibility of giving back the Syrian Occupied Territories in the context of a peace treaty with Syria is raised from time to time; negotiations toward this end last took place during the EHUD BARAK government (1999–2001). The occasional political speculation and diplomatic effort aside, Israel has continued its administration of the Syrian Occupied Territories as an integral part of Israel, and the Syrian Heights are a favorite vacation and resort area among Israeli tourists.

See also BANTUSTANS; ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM; SETTLEMENTS; SETTLER VIOLENCE; MEIR SHAMGAR

Bibliography

- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Ben-Naftali, Orna, Aeyal Gross, and Keren Michaeli. "Illegal Occupation: Framing the Occupied Palestinian Territory." Journal of International Law. 23:3 (2005).
- Benvenisti, Meron. Conflicts and Contradictions. New York: Villard Books, 1986.
- . Reports: Demographic, Economic, Legal, Social and Political Developments in the West Bank. Jerusalem: The West Bank Data Base Project—A Survey of Israeli Policies, 1982–1987.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Forbidden Roads: The Discriminatory West Bank Road Regime. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Land Grab: Israel's Settlement Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2004.
- . Under the Guise of Security: Routing the Separation Barrier to Enable the Expansion of Israeli Settlements in the West Bank. Joint Report with Bimkom—Planners for Planning Rights. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2005.
- Bucaille, Laetitia. Growing Up Palestinian: Israeli Occupation and the Intifada Generation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Carey, Roane, and Tom Segev, eds. The Other Israel: Voices of Refusal and Dissent. New York: New Press, 2002.
- Derek, Gregory. The Colonial Present. Chichester, UK: Blackwell, 2004.
- Farsakh, Leila. "Independence, Cantons, or Bantustans: Whither the Palestinian State?" Middle East Journal. 59:2 (2005).
- Gazit, Shlomo. Trapped Fools: Thirty Years of Israeli Policy in the Territories. London: Frank Cass, 2003.
- Gordon, Neve. Israel's Occupation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2008.
- Hajjar, Lisa. Courting Conflict: The Israeli Military Court System in the West Bank and Gaza. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Halabi, Rafik. The West Bank Story, rev. ed. San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1985.
- Hamami, Rema. "On the Importance of Thugs: The Moral Economy of a Checkpoint." Jerusalem Quarterly. 22 and 23 (2005).
- Hass, Amira. Drinking the Sea at Gaza: Days and Nights in a Land under Siege. New York: Metropolitan Books/Henry Holt, 1996.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. Politicide: Ariel Sharon's War against the Palestinians. New York: Verso, 2003.
- Kretzmer, David. The Occupation of Justice: The Supreme Court of Israel and the Occupied Territories. Binghamton: State University of New York Press, 2002.
- Mansour, A. S. "Monetary Dualism: The Case of the West Bank under Occupation." Journal of Palestine Studies (Spring 1982).
- Ophir, Adi, Michal Givoni, and Sari Hanafi, eds. The Power of Inclusive Exclusion: Anatomy of Israeli Rule in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. New York: Zone Books, 2009.
- Pearlman, Wendy. Occupied Voices: Stories of Everyday Life from the Second Intifada. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press/Nation Books, 2003.
- Physicians for Human Rights—Israel. At Israel's Will: The Permit Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: Physicians for Human Rights—Israel, September 2003.
- Playfair, Emma, ed. International Law and Administration of Occupied Territories: Two Decades of Israeli Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Portugali, J. Implicate Relations: Society and Space in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. Dordrecht, Netherlands: Kluwer Academic Publishers, 1993.
- Raheb, Mitri. Bethlehem Besieged: Stories of Hope in Times of Trouble. Augsburg: Fortress Publishers, 2004.
- Rosenfeld, Maya. Confronting the Occupation: Word, Education and Political Activism of Palestinian Families in a Refugee Camp. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2004.
- Roy, Sara. "De-development Re-visited: Palestinian Economy and Society since Oslo." Journal of Palestinian Studies. 28:3 (1999).
- . The Gaza Strip: The Political Economy of De-development. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestinian Studies, 1995.
- Segal, Rafi, and Eyal Weizman, eds. A Civilian Occupation: The Politics of Israeli Architecture. London: Verso, 2003.
- Shamir, Ronen. "Landmark Cases and the Reproduction of Legitimacy." Law and Society Review. 24:3 (1990).
- Shehadeh, Raja. Occupier's Law: Israel and the West Bank. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1985.
- . When the Birds Stopped Singing: Life in Ramallah under Siege. London: Steerforth Publications, 2003.

Sorkin, Michael, ed. Against the Wall. New York: New Press, 2005.

Yiftachel, Oren. "'Ethnocracy': The Politics of Judaizing Israel/Palestine." Constellations. 6 (1999).

———. "Territory as the Kernel of the Nation: Space, Time and Nationalism in Israel/Palestine." Geopolitics. 7:2 (2002).

—Adi Ophir and Ariella Azoulay

Occupied Territories

In 1967, Israel conquered the WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, and the GAZA STRIP, among other Arab territories, in an armed conflict. The laws of war apply equally to all armed conflicts. Israel's OCCUPATION of these Palestinian territories falls under the INTERNATIONAL LAW of belligerent occupation, as distinguished from nonbelligerent occupation that follows an armistice. Israel may not claim these territories as its own because conquest is prohibited by international law, a principle that was considered so important that it was enshrined in Article 2(4) of the UNITED NATIONS Charter. Israel therefore has no sovereign rights over the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, nor are they "disputed" territories, as has been the coinage since President BILL CLINTON introduced the term. Moreover, with the exception of Israel, the entire international community considers these areas occupied and therefore subject to the laws of occupation.

The laws of occupation provide rules regulating the relationship between an occupying power and the population of the occupied territory (including REFUGEES and stateless persons), comprising a vast array of norms. Because of evolving circumstances it is necessary to examine the status of each of the three Palestinian areas under the laws of occupation as of 2009.

East Jerusalem

Despite Israel's annexation of East Jerusalem and its assertion that unified Jerusalem constitutes its eternal capital, East Jerusalem is occupied territory. Therefore, it is subject, as is the rest of the West Bank, to the provisions of international humanitarian law that relate to occupied territory, which include the prohibition on unilateral annexation, the transfer of its citizens, and the alteration of the territory.

Palestinians in Jerusalem hold the status of "permanent residents" of the state of Israel, which differs substantially from citizenship. The primary right granted to permanent residents is that of being able to live and work in Israel without the necessity of special PERMITS. Permanent residents are also entitled to social benefits provided by the NATIONAL INSURANCE INSTITUTE and to HEALTH CARE insurance. They have the right to vote in local elections, but not in elections for the Knesset. Unlike citizenship, permanent residency is only passed on to the right-holder's children whereby the holder meets certain conditions set by the government. A permanent resident with a nonresident spouse must submit, on behalf of the spouse, a request for FAMILY REUNIFICATION. Such requests are more often than not denied. If a Palestinian Jerusalemite leaves the city for any period of time, he or she is not automatically guaranteed the right to return. Only citizens are granted the right to return to Israel at any time.

West Bank

Palestinians who reside in the occupied West Bank have the status of "resident alien," with no possibility of citizenship and no political rights, although they too have lived there for generations. The status of resident alien does not even convey the right to live in the Occupied Territories, and Palestinians there are subject to DEPORTATION, TRANSFER, and other harsh measures (HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, etc.) that are not applied to Jewish settlers living there. The West Bank settlements, like those in Jerusalem, violate explicit provisions of international humanitarian law; moreover the existence of the settlements leads to the violation of the rights of the Palestinians as enshrined in international human rights law.

Gaza Strip

Some analysts consider the occupation of the Gaza Strip as having ended when Israel withdrew its troops and settlers from the territory in 2005. This, however, is incorrect. Under international law, the test for determining if an occupation exists is effective control by a hostile army, not formal declarations or organizational implementation. Israel continues to maintain absolute jurisdiction over all Gaza's BORDERS (with the partial exception of the RAFAH CROSSING), its entire coastline and seawaters, and its airspace. Additionally, Israel retains control over Gaza's telecommunications, WATER resources, and electricity and sewage networks. Gaza continues to use Israeli currency, and Tel Aviv sustains complete authority over the Population Registry, by which it continues to determine who is a “Palestinian resident” and who is a “foreigner.” These comprise effective control and therefore occupation.

See also FAMILY REUNIFICATION; GAZA STRIP; INTERNATIONAL LAW; ISRAEL’S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA; JERUSALEM; OCCUPATION; SETTLEMENTS; STATE LAND; WEST BANK

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Israel/Occupied Territories: Road to Nowhere. London: Amnesty International, December 2006. <http://web.amnesty.org/library/index/ENGMDE150932006>.
- Bevis, Linda. The Applicability of Human Rights Law to Occupied Territories: The Case of the Occupied Palestinian Territories. West Bank: Al-Haq, 1994.
- Bowen, Stephen, ed. Human Rights, Self-Determination and Political Change in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. New York: Springer, 1997.
- B’Tselem. East Jerusalem. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, n.d. http://www.btselem.org/English/Jerusalem/Legal\_Status.asp.
- . The Gaza Strip: Israel’s Obligations under International Law. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, n.d. http://www.btselem.org/English/Gaza\_Strip/Israels\_Obligations.asp.
- . Land Expropriation and Settlement. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, n.d. <http://www.btselem.org/English/settlements/>.
- . Legal Status of East Jerusalem and Its Residents. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, n.d. http://www.btselem.org/English/Jerusalem/Legal\_Status.asp.
- Centre for International Human Rights Enforcement. International Human Rights Enforcement: The Case of the Occupied Palestinian Territories in the Transitional Period. Ramallah: Centre for International Human Rights Enforcement, 1996.
- Harvard University. The Legal Status of Israeli Settlements under International Humanitarian Law. Geneva: ReliefWeb, 2004. <http://www.reliefweb.int/rw/rwb.nsf/db900sid/EVIU-69HJYR?OpenDocument>
- Human Rights Watch. Israel: “Disengagement Will Not End Gaza Occupation”: Israeli Government Still Holds Responsibility for Welfare of Civilians. New York: Human Rights Watch, October 2004. <http://hrw.org/english/docs/2004/10/29/isrlpa9577.htm>.
- . Israel/Occupied Palestinian Territories. New York: Human Rights Watch, January 2006. <http://hrw.org/wr2k6/pdf/israelopt.pdf>.
- . Razing Rafah: Mass Home Demolitions in the Gaza Strip. New York: Human Rights Watch, October 2004. <http://hrw.org/reports/2004/rafah1004/rafah1004text.pdf>.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Land Grab: Israel’s Settlement Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, May 2002. Program on Humanitarian Policy and Conflict Research, Harvard University. Private Security Companies in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (OPT): An International Humanitarian Law Perspective. Cambridge, MA: Program on Humanitarian Policy and Conflict Research, Harvard University, 2008.

October War, 1973

On 6 October 1973, SYRIA and EGYPT launched a surprise attack on their territories that Israel had occupied in the 1967 WAR—the Golan Heights and the Sinai Peninsula. Their objective, besides regaining their lost land, was to force Israel to negotiate and to draw the UNITED STATES into a negotiating process. The war lasted until 26 October, when an initial Arab advantage was reversed and Israeli troops neared Cairo and Damascus. A massive US airlift of armaments, a near-nuclear confrontation between the United States and the SOVIET UNION, and an oil embargo of the United States were aspects of this crisis.

Bibliography

- Herzog, Chaim. The War of Atonement: October 1973, The Fateful Implications of the Arab-Israeli Conflict. New York: Little, Brown, 1975.
- Monroe, Elizabeth, and Anthony Farrar-Hockley. Arab-Israel War, October 1973: Background and Events. London: International Institute for Strategic Studies, 1975.
- Shazly, Saad. The Crossing of Suez: The October War, 1973. Beirut, Lebanon: Third World Centre for Research and Publishing, 1980.

Old City

The Old City of Jerusalem, the epicenter of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, is an 879-dunum (217-acre) area within the modern city of JERUSALEM. Until the 1860s this small area constituted the entire city of Jerusalem. The Old City is home to several sites of key religious importance: the TEMPLE MOUNT and the WESTERN WALL for Jews, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the Via Dolorosa for Christians, and the DOME OF THE ROCK and AL-AQSA MOSQUE on the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF for Muslims.

Historically many nations occupied this city, beginning with Jebusites, followed by King David and the Israelites, the Babylonians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Byzantines, the Muslims, the Crusaders, the Ottomans, the Jordanians, and the Israelis.

The current walls of the Old City were built in 1538 by the Muslim sultan of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, Suleiman the Magnificent. The walls stretch for approximately 4.5 kilometers (2.8 miles) and rise to a height of 5–15 meters (16–49 feet), with a thickness of 3 meters (10 feet). Altogether, the Old City walls contain forty-three surveillance towers and eleven gates, seven of which are presently open. Suleiman also built the gates, which have been known by a variety of names over historical periods and by different community groups. The English names for the seven open gates are New Gate, Damascus Gate, Herod's Gate, Lion's Gate, Dung Gate, Zion Gate, and Jaffa Gate.

Traditionally, the Old City has been roughly divided into four quarters: the Muslim Quarter (the largest section), the Christian Quarter (the second largest), the Jewish Quarter (the third largest), and the Armenian Quarter (the smallest), although these ethnoreligious designations were introduced only in the nineteenth century, and until then most quarters had mixed populations. The quarters form a rectangular grid, and the dividing lines are the street that runs from Damascus Gate to the Zion Gate—which divides the city into east and west—and the street leading from the Jaffa Gate to Lion's Gate—which bifurcates the city north and south. Entering through the Jaffa Gate and traveling to David Street places the Christian Quarter on the left. On the right, continuing down David Street, is the Armenian Quarter. To the left of Jews Street is the Muslim Quarter and, to the right, is the Jewish Quarter.

Some 32,500 people live in the four quarters of the Old City. Approximately 69 percent are Muslim, 12 percent Jewish, and 17 percent Christian of various denominations. Population density in the Old City is practically the highest in Israel, with 36 people per dunum (145 people per acre). But if only the residential area is counted, and public spaces—religious spaces, schools, markets, shops, and other open areas—are discounted, density rises to some 70 people per dunum (283 persons per acre). The Muslim Quarter is overwhelmingly impoverished; many in the Christian Quarter are also in poverty and with serious problems of drugs and crime. The Armenian Quarter is mainly middle-class, and the Jewish Quarter is prosperous. The average population of households and the average size of housing units vary among the quarters. The average Muslim household has 5.3 people, and the average size of an apartment is 40 square meters (430 square feet); the average Jewish household has 4 people living in an average of 75 square meters (807 square feet); the average Christian household has 3.7 people living in 42 square meters (452 square feet); and in the Armenian Quarter an average of 3.5 people live in 54 square meters (581 square feet).

Even today the distribution of the ethnic groups does not exactly match the quarters. The number of Muslims in the Christian Quarter has doubled since 1967, reaching some 1,000. The number of Jews in the Jewish Quarter grew only by 22 people between 1983 and 1995, reaching 2,900. But the number of Jews—Jewish settlers—living in the Muslim, Christian, and Armenian Quarters grew by 400 during the same period, reaching 500 in the Muslim Quarter, 300 in the Christian Quarter, and approximately 100 in the Armenian Quarter. Altogether, by 2005 some 3,800 Jews lived in the Old City (in all quarters). Christians and Muslims are prohibited from living in the Jewish Quarter.

The number of holy places in the Old City has proliferated enormously: in 1949 a list of 30 holy sites was given to the UN. Fifty years later, in 2000, a team of three—a Jewish Israeli, an Armenian Christian, and a Muslim Palestinian—prepared a list with more than 326 holy sites. These sanctified places are squeezed amid the population and are typically sites of conflict.

In 1948 the Jewish population of about 2,000 was besieged, forced to leave en masse, and the Jewish Quarter was sacked, with the ancient synagogues being destroyed. During the Jordanian occupation (1948–1967), the Old City was largely ignored and thus deteriorated significantly, but following the 1967 WAR, Israel invested millions of dollars in reconstruction and renovation of the Jewish Quarter (though not the other three). By 2004 the renovation and reconstruction of this section resulted in some population growth, and many educational, commercial, and religious institutions moved there.

The Armenian Quarter is distinct from the Christian Quarter, even though the Armenian people are Christian. Despite the small size and population of this quarter, the Armenians and their Patriarchate remain staunchly independent and form a vigorous presence in the Old City. After the 1967 War, the Israeli government provided compensation to the Armenians for use in repairing any churches or holy sites damaged in the fighting, regardless of who caused the damage, although it did not do so in the Muslim or Christian quarter.

Map 32. The Old City of Jerusalem

Today some 500 Armenians live in the Old City (another 2,500 live in Jerusalem outside the Old City). Some are temporary residents studying at the seminary or working as church functionaries. The Patriarchate owns the land in this quarter as well as valuable property in West Jerusalem and elsewhere.

In 1980, Jordan proposed that the Old City be inscribed on the UNESCO World Heritage Site List, and it was added to the list in 1981.

See also CHRISTIANITY; HOLY BASIN; JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM

Bibliography

Lapidot, Ruth, Amnon Ramon, Yisrael Kimche, Ora Ahimeir, Rotem Giladi, Yiftah Zilberman, Maya Hoshen, Avraham Friedman, and Reuven Merhav, eds. The Old City of Jerusalem. (Hebrew). Jerusalem: The Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, 2002.

Shragai, Nadav. "The Bubbling Volcano of Teeming Old Jerusalem." Ha'aretz. n.d. <http://news.haaretz.co.il/hasen/pages/ShArt.jhtml?itemNo=161407&contrastID=2&subContrassID=5&sbSubContrassID=0&listSrc=Y&itemNo=161407>.

Old Guard

The "old guard," sometimes referred to as the "Oslo elite," refers to the senior echelons of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) who were in exile with PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT and returned with him to the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES in 1994. They dominated virtually all the senior political, bureaucratic, and security positions within the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), causing resentment and tension on the part of the indigenous WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP leadership. The old guard included Arafat, MAHMUD ABBAS, AHMAD QUREI', HANI AL-HASAN, and others of that generation. They tended to be both autocratic and corrupt.

A much younger generation of Palestinian leaders argues that the old guard failed to deliver an end to OCCUPATION, something it promised when the OSLO PROCESS was initiated in 1993, and that it also failed to provide good and clean government and strong institutions for the Palestinian people. As a result, there has come to be a split in the Palestinian movement, more specifically within the FATAH party, that has grown into a chasm since the beginning of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000. The YOUNG GUARD is determined to find a new way to end the Occupation, and to some extent they view ARMED STRUGGLE as the most effective means. Their model is derived from HIZBULLAH in South LEBANON. They want to force Israel to unilaterally withdraw from the West Bank and cease its domination and brutalization of Gaza, and they are determined to displace the old guard of the national movement and take over.

Bibliography

- Abu Toameh, Khaled. "The Continuing Struggle of Palestinian Journalists for Freedom of the Press in the Palestinian Authority." Jerusalem Issue Brief. 5:14 (2006).
- Shikaki, Khalil. "Old Guard, Young Guard: The Palestinian Authority and the Peace Process at Cross Roads." Arabic Media Internet Network. November 2001. <http://www.amin.org>.
- Usher, Graham. Dispatches from Palestine: The Rise and Fall of the Oslo Peace Process. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- . Palestine in Crisis. London: Pluto Press, 1995.

Olive Tree Uprooting

The uprooting of Palestinian trees and orchards, an aspect of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, has been an Israeli practice throughout the OCCUPATION. Israel uproots trees and agricultural products for a variety of reasons, including to clear LAND for Jewish SETTLEMENTS, military encampments and firing ranges, settler ROADS and INFRASTRUCTURE; punitive purposes; and, more recently, the Separation BARRIER. While the uprooting of citrus, stone fruit, date, banana, grape, and other fruit trees, plus vegetables and grains, is economically and socially distressing, the destruction of centuries-old olive trees is particularly devastating and has had deleterious effects on Palestinian society—from agriculture to identity. In Palestine, the Olea europaea is prized for its historical presence, its beauty, and its symbolism. The traditional landscape of Palestine dating beyond memory is inscribed in the psyches of Palestinians with olive trees, and their loss is nearly comparable to the loss of human life. In addition to their cultural and psychological significance, olive trees are a traditional mainstay of the Palestinian ECONOMY, with many families dependent on olives for their livelihood. Numerous products are extracted from the olive tree, including olives, olive oil, olive wood, and olive-based soap. Olive oil is the second major export item in Palestine, and olive production contributes about 38.2 percent to the productive income of all fruit trees. Forty-five percent of Palestinian agricultural land (228,560 acres/914,235 dunums) is planted with olive trees.

Table 5 Number of Trees Uprooted in the West Bank, 1993–2006 (olive trees comprise approximately 25 percent of the total number)

Year	Uprooted Trees
1993	500
1994	4,521
1995	2,500
1996	1,050
1997	25,435
1998	30,210
1999	17,033
2000 <sup>a</sup>	18,274
2001 <sup>a</sup>	123,915
2002 <sup>a</sup>	45,548
2003 <sup>a</sup>	249,378
2004 <sup>a</sup>	83,956
2005 <sup>a</sup>	60,759
Jan.–March 2006 <sup>a</sup>	6,388

<sup>a</sup>Years of the Second Intifada.

There are an estimated 9 million olive trees in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, which have the potential to produce around 43,000 metric tons of oil. Picking the olives, which are harvested from the middle of October to the beginning of November, is a highly labor-intensive process requiring thousands of workers and almost a month of daily work. Consequently, more than half of the Palestinian population participates in the olive harvest, with extended families and their children spending weeks in the fields. After the harvest is completed, the farmers send the fresh olives to the press, which must be done quickly or the quality of oil is reduced. Once the oil is pressed and packaged, farmers need access to markets to sell their goods.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict, however, has radically altered the tradition. Palestinian farmers working in their fields have been faced with SETTLER VIOLENCE, including crop theft, tree uprooting, orchard burning, harassment, and physical, sometimes fatal, attacks. The ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) rarely intervene to protect the farmers and often impose arbitrary prohibitions keeping Palestinians from going to their land. On 22 October 2002, for example, the Israeli press reported that the army prohibited Palestinian farmers from harvesting their olive crops in the WEST BANK, claiming that it could not protect the olive pickers from attacks by Israeli settlers. In the 2004 peak olive-harvest season, many farmers were prevented from accessing their olive groves by settler violence and the IDF. Israeli RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, such as CURFEWS, CLOSURES, ROADBLOCKS, CHECKPOINTS, and the Barrier, hinder Palestinian access to fields, processing, and markets, impeding farmers from completing the olive cycle.

The 703-kilometer (436-mile) Barrier presents a major obstacle to farmers in harvesting their olives. It is estimated that 85,000 dunums (21,000 acres) of olive trees, approximately 1 million trees, are or will be inaccessible or have access restricted behind the Barrier once the route is completed. Moreover, the Barrier has accelerated the olive trees' destruction, as land is cleared for it. The International Court of Justice opined in 2004 that Israel is obligated to make reparation for any damage caused to Palestinian farmers and where possible to "return the land, orchards, olive groves and other immovable property seized from any natural or legal person for purposes of construction of the wall." Israel has not accepted the judgment.

Since the beginning of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA (2000), tree uprootings have occurred more frequently and have targeted whole villages. Groves of centuries-old olive trees have been bulldozed and destroyed across the West Bank. The settlers and the IDF have also set trees ablaze. On 23 October 2002, the Washington Post reported that settlers set fire to hundreds of olive trees and additionally sawed to the ground about 100 other trees in Mazras Sharqiya in the West Bank. Olive groves along most of the bypass road networks have been declared security zones, preventing farmers from tending their crops. In many areas, groves within 200 meters (219 yards) of the roads have been bulldozed, allegedly to prevent them from being used as cover by Palestinian militants. Israel has also set up blockades of commercial movement between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and Israel and vice versa, which impede the processing and marketing of the olives. Since the Palestinian "SAFE PASSAGE," AIRPORT, and SEAPORT mandated in the OSLO ACCORDS did not materialize, restrictions on movement of Palestinian persons and goods are extreme, and the exportation of olive oil is often impossible.

See also OUTPOSTS; SETTLER VIOLENCE

Bibliography

- Alwazir, Atyaf. Uprooting Olive Trees in Palestine. Case No. 110. Washington, DC: Inventory of Conflict and Environment, 2002.
- Anderson, John Ward. "Palestinians See New Threat to Livelihoods: Jewish Settlers Accused of Attacking Olive Crop." Washington Post. 23 October 2002.
- Applied Research Institute in Jerusalem and the Land Research Center. An Assessment of the Israeli Practices on the Palestinian Agricultural Sector. Monitoring Israeli Colonization Activities in the Occupied Territories. 1 February 2002. www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=181.
- . Israeli Aggression against Palestinian Agriculture. Monitoring Israeli Colonization Activities in the Occupied Territories. 31 October 2000. www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=110.
- . Olive Harvest Season in Palestine: Less Land to Harvest, Less Olives to Pluck. Monitoring Israeli Colonization Activities in the Occupied Territories. 18 September 2006. www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=903.
- . They Cut Trees, Don't They? An Assessment of the Israeli Practices on the Palestinian Agricultural Sector. Monitoring Israeli Colonization Activities in the Occupied Territories. 9 April 2001. www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=145.
- Asmar, Marwan. "Scrapbook: Thrashing the Olive Tree in Madaba." The Star (Beirut). 16 September 2002. www.american.edu/TED/ice/olive-tree.htm.

B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). End the Uprooting of Trees. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 7 February 2001.

———. House Demolitions and the Destruction of Agricultural Land in the Gaza Strip. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, February 2002.

———. Protect the Olive Harvest, Enforce the Law on Violent Settlers. Press release. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 6 October 2002.

Dudai, Rona. Tacit Consent: Israeli Policy on Law Enforcement toward Settlers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.

Electronic Intifada. The Olive Harvest in the West Bank and Gaza. Report. Data from United Nations Development Programme, World Food Programme, and UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. 4 November 2006. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.

Harel, Amos, and Aron Regular. "Settlers Attack the Olive Pickers." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 20 October 2002.

Hass, Amira. "It's the Pits." Ha'aretz. 25 October 2002.

International Middle East Media Center. Settlers Uproot Olive Trees in Hebron. Ramala, Palestine: IMEMC, 4 December 2006.

Jaradat, Ahmad. Olive Harvest in the Occupied Territories, Autumn 2005. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 17 December 2005.

Kalman, Matthew. "Barrier Clogs West Bank Olive Harvest." San Francisco Chronicle. 13 November 2006.

Keyser, Jason. "Olive Harvest a Mideast Conflict." Washington Post. 22 October 2002.

Lein, Yehezkel. Behind the Barrier: Human Rights Violations as a Result of Israel's Separation Barrier. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2003.

———. The Performance of Law Enforcement Authorities in Responding to Settler Attacks on Olive Harvesters. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.

Levy, Gideon. "A Tree Grows in Palestine." Ha'aretz. 1 January 1999.

Lynfield, Ben. "Another Casualty of War: Trees." Christian Science Monitor. 12 August 2000.

MacAskill, Ewen. "Family Olive Groves Fall to Israeli Attacks." The Guardian. 14 April 2001. www.guardian.co.uk/israel/Story/0,2763,473147,00.html.

McGreal, Chris. "Israeli Retaliation Targets Olive Harvest and Waterholes." The Guardian (London). 23 October 2002.

Palestine Media Center. Agricultural Losses in Nablus. Ramala, Palestine: Palestine Media Center, 20 June 2001.

Palestinian NGO Network. "Israeli Army Issues Prohibition on Palestinians Harvesting Olives." Palestine Monitor. 22 October 2002.

Philps, Alan. "Palestinian Olive Trees Sold to Rich Israelis." The Telegraph (UK). 28 November 2002.

Rapoport, Mero, and Oren Meiri. "Uprooted." Yedioth Ahronot. 22 November 2002.

Rashid, Miryam. "Effects of Israel's Wall on Palestinian Farmers and the Olive Harvest." Philadelphia, PA:

American Friends Service Committee, n.d. www.afsc.org/israel-palestine/Wall-and-Olive-Harvest.html.

Schiff, Ze'ev. "The Army Must Stop the Olive Thieves." Ha'aretz. 30 October 2002.

UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. Unprotected: Israeli Settler Violence against Palestinian Civilians and Their Property. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, 2008.

Waked, Ali. "Olive Trees Uprooted in Palestinian Village." Ynet News. 25 November 2005.

Weiss, Efrat. "Officer: Tree-Cutting Borders on Terror." Ynet News. 13 January 2005. www.ynetnews.com/articles/0,7340,L-3199606,00.html.

Olmert, Ehud (1945–)

Ehud Olmert is a professional politician, lawyer, former mayor of JERUSALEM, and elected prime minister of Israel from 2006 to 2008. He was born in Binyamina to parents who immigrated to Palestine in the early 1930s, where his father, Mordechai, was one of the founders of BETAR and the IRGUN, both militant Zionist groups. Both parents were members of the HERUT Party, and Ehud joined Betar in his youth. He holds degrees in psychology, philosophy, and law from the Hebrew University and had a successful law practice in Jerusalem before entering the Knesset in 1973.

Starting at the age of twenty-eight, Olmert was reelected from the LIKUD PARTY seven consecutive times through 1998, served on various committees, and held several ministerial portfolios. In November 1993, he was elected mayor of Jerusalem and served for two terms through 2003, at which time Olmert was reelected to the Sixteenth Knesset. On 7 August 2005, he was appointed acting finance minister of Israel, replacing BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, who had resigned in protest against the planned Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. Although Olmert had originally opposed withdrawing from any land captured by Israel in the 1967 WAR and had voted against the 1977 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS and the OSLO ACCORDS, he was a strong supporter of ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA because it gave Israel the opportunity to solidify its control over Jerusalem and the WEST BANK. Following ARIEL SHARON'S decision to leave the Likud Party in November 2005, Olmert joined Sharon and several other former Likud ministers to form a new party, KADIMA.

After Sharon's stroke on 5 January 2006, Olmert was appointed acting prime minister to keep the government effectively running in Sharon's absence, and he remained in the position until the Israeli elections, which took place on 28 March 2006. Following election to the Seventeenth Knesset as head of the Kadima Party, Olmert became prime minister of the thirty-first government of Israel. In the 2009 elections he surrendered the prime ministership to Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu.

Legacy as Mayor of Jerusalem

Olmert has always had hard-line views regarding the Palestinians, perspectives that were especially evident while he was mayor of Jerusalem. As mayor, Olmert left an important legacy in a series of infrastructure and building projects that were designed to ensure that East Jerusalem could not be easily detached from Israel and serve as a capital for a future Palestinian state. The projects included the expansion of SETTLEMENTS in and around Jerusalem and the building of ROADS, bypasses, and tunnels to tie everything to Israel.

Ehud Olmert's term as mayor saw the industrialization of Jerusalem and the development of its light rail system. But it was also characterized by sharpening divisions between Jews and Arabs in the city, both socially and physically, as well as by a marked increase in the politicization of the city. Olmert was very involved in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's moves to increasingly "Judaize" all of Jerusalem. He was instrumental, for instance, in pushing forward such projects as the opening of the HASMONEAN TUNNEL in 1996, which sparked days of intense rioting. He was also a strong supporter of the construction of HAR HOMA, a settlement in East Jerusalem that continues to be a major disruption for Jerusalem's Palestinians and a serious obstacle to a peace agreement.

Despite the fact that 33 percent of the population of Jerusalem during Olmert's term was Palestinian, Olmert and his religious-nationalist followers were strong believers in what they called "a united, undivided Jerusalem under eternal Israeli sovereignty." When Washington protested a plan to build 13,000 new homes in Jerusalem and its West Bank settlement suburbs, Olmert had a quick, uncompromising response: "I never thought they [Americans] were the ones to decide the fate of Jerusalem. The city's future," he added, "won't be determined by the [US] State Department, but by what is done here. I don't lose equilibrium when I hear there is an American position on Jerusalem. It only proves we have to do more." Olmert used social policies and institutions to discriminate against Jerusalem Palestinians and demolition orders of Palestinian homes as means to "Judaize" the city. Nearly 300 Palestinian houses were demolished in Jerusalem between 1987 and 2000.

Olmert believed, as did his predecessor Teddy Kollek, in the value of determining Jerusalem's future through the creation of settlements—"facts on the ground"—to preempt Palestinian demands to make Jerusalem the capital of their presumptive state. He described the LABOR government's Oslo agreement with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION as a "dark cloud over the city." Olmert, together with all of his coalition partners on the municipal council, opposed the OSLO PROCESS.

Olmert based his seven-year term on the premise that he would "administer Jerusalem according to the understanding that we are speaking of a city under Israeli rule and sovereignty," and he acknowledged that the focus of his efforts was to continue the campaign of large-scale housing development that had already created an Israeli majority in East Jerusalem.

Olmert's Prime Ministership

Within a few months of assuming office as prime minister in 2006, Olmert undertook several major initiatives. In early April he unveiled his "CONVERGENCE PLAN," on 28 June he launched a six-month major military campaign in Gaza; on 12 July he went to war with HIZBULLAH in LEBANON; and by September he was so politically weakened that his ability to remain in office was widely called into question.

Convergence Plan. Olmert's Convergence Plan—which would unilaterally annex most of the West Bank without reference to, or negotiations with, the Palestinians—was his major policy objective. In an interview he gave to the Wall Street Journal on 12 April 2006, Olmert stated that his "goal . . . is to establish permanent, internationally recognized BORDERS that will ensure Israel retains its Jewish majority for decades to come." He planned to do this "without Palestinian input." The prime minister said that he planned to pull out of some areas of the West Bank, evacuate some 70,000 settlers (possibly with the offer to relocate them "to the large settlement blocs Israel plans to retain"), and annex "large chunks of disputed Palestinian Territory," which would negate the possibility of a Palestinian state. Some 450,000 Israeli settlers live in the West Bank (including 200,000 in GREATER JERUSALEM), and evacuating 70,000 would still leave 380,000, plus those who are relocated. Olmert ruled out sharing political control of Jerusalem and its holy sites with the Palestinians, although Palestinians claim the eastern sector of the city as their future capital and say that this fact must be reflected in any peace treaty. “Dividing Jerusalem will not bring peace, only more fighting,” said Olmert, who placed the cost of his plan at $10 billion.

Olmert’s Convergence Plan was intended to establish final borders between Israel and JORDAN, already partially visible in the form of the BARRIER wall that separates Israel from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. He stated that the development of the E1 PLAN, a development plan that would connect distant West Bank settlements directly to East Jerusalem, would go ahead, despite the declared disapproval of the US State Department. This would link the strategic settlement of MA’ALE ADUMIM to Metropolitan Greater Jerusalem, severing the West Bank horizontally. The Convergence Plan represents basic long-term calculations: Israel intends to withdrawal unilaterally from minor areas in order to keep geopolitically strategic ones, especially Jerusalem and major West Bank settlement blocs. The intention is to undermine any feasibility of a potential Palestinian state while simultaneously controlling DEMOGRAPHICS for a decisive Jewish majority.

War in Gaza. On 28 June 2006 Olmert launched an invasion of the Gaza Strip—OPERATION SUMMER RAINS—in retaliation for the HAMAS kidnapping of an Israeli soldier and the killing of two others. The action continued unabated, and on 1 November Olmert renamed it “Autumn Clouds.” By mid-November, the operation had killed 342 and wounded 1,186 Palestinians—overwhelmingly civilians—while life in the Gaza Strip spiraled further into the abyss. On 11 November, just before Olmert was scheduled to arrive in Washington, the UNITED STATES exercised its veto in the UN Security Council, killing a resolution that condemned Israel’s excessive use of force in Gaza. The kidnapped soldier remained with the Hamas militants.

War in Lebanon. On 12 July 2006, in retaliation for the capture by Hizbullah of two soldiers, Olmert launched an all-out war in Lebanon against the Shi’a Islamist group. The United States fully backed Israel in this military offensive, including a major weapons resupply, and successfully delayed a UN cease-fire call until 11 August, when the Security Council passed Resolution 1701, to give Israel more time to achieve its objectives. Although Israel formally agreed to the resolution on 14 August, it continued to carry out operations until 8 September. The civilians killed in this war included 1,187 to 3,600 Lebanese (depending on the source) and 44 Israelis; military casualties included 119 Israelis and 46 Lebanese. As a consequence of the fighting, 900,000 Lebanese and 300,000 Israelis were displaced, and Lebanon was laid in ruins. Meanwhile, Israel failed to rescue the two abducted soldiers. Both the military and political elites in Israel were openly criticized over the conduct of this war, and the political leadership, especially Olmert, was greatly weakened. Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz had followed, rather than led, the military, which had made the decisions during the war. In an attempt to control the political damage, Olmert established a commission of inquiry into the war known as the Winograd Commission, after its chairman, Justice Elyahu Winograd. An interim report was presented to Prime Minister Olmert and Defense Minister EHUD BARAK in April 2007. A final report was published on 30 January 2008. The report concluded that the conduct of Olmert and Barak was “reasonable.”

In the aftermath of the wars, the political trends in Israel were mixed. On the one hand, the Convergence Plan was shelved, at least temporarily, but, on the other, the settlement movement in the West Bank, which only a few months earlier appeared to be a divided, waning political force, experienced a revival. Olmert stepped up construction in the large settlement blocs, including areas that the GEORGE W. BUSH administration had warned Israel against developing, and the West Bank settlement population grew rapidly. The settlers’ change of fortune was a direct result of the conflicts in Gaza and Lebanon (both areas Israel had occupied and abandoned only recently—Lebanon in 2000 and Gaza in 2005). Some Israelis drew lessons from the war that helped vindicate the settlers, whose large financial claim on the national treasury and strident opposition to an independent state for the Palestinians in Gaza and the West Bank had angered many outside the Greater Israel and JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST circles. Effie Eitam of the NATIONAL UNION PARTY said, “The settlements are Israel’s anchor in these places. . . . Israel is about to review its entire defense doctrine and most Israelis understand it is time to rethink the whole paradigm of giving up land for things less certain.”

In mid-September 2006, Peretz ordered the military to raze forty-seven illegal buildings in some West Bank settlement OUTPOSTS, which PEACE NOW said contained thousands of illegal structures. The order, which by the end of 2009 had yet to be carried out, also called for the demolition of thirty-nine buildings that Israel claimed the Palestinians constructed illegally, and this part of the order was implemented. At the same time, Olmert advertised for bids to construct 854 new housing units in West Bank settlements, although such construction is prohibited by the US-backed ROAD MAP, which Olmert says he supports. In addition to the new housing, Olmert went ahead with the development of the E1 Plan, and a large Israeli police headquarters was completed.

Ehud Olmert resigned as prime minister on 21 September 2008 after Israeli police had recommended that criminal charges be brought against him for fraud, corruption, breach of public trust, money laundering, and fraudulent receipt of goods. Olmert's trial commenced on 25 September 2009.

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Israel/Lebanon: Deliberate Destruction or "Collateral Damage"? Israeli Attacks on Civilian Infrastructure. MDE 18/007/2006. London: Amnesty International, 23 August 2006.
- Associated Press. "Israel Fears War Crimes Prosecution after Lebanon War." International Herald Tribune. 4 September 2006.
- BBC. "Ehud Olmert: Corruption Allegations." BBC Online. 17 July 2008.
- . "Olmert Corruption Probe Widened." BBC Online. 11 July 2008.
- Benn, Aluf. "'No Comment' from PMO Officials on Olmert-Saudi Meeting Reports." Ha'aretz. 25 March 2007.
- Benn, Aluf, and Yoav Stern. "Saudi Prince May Have Held Secret Meeting with PM Envoy." Ha'aretz. 25 September 2006.
- Boot, Max. "The Second Lebanon War." Weekly Standard. 4 September 2006.
- Brilliant, Joshua. "Analysis: Israeli Forces Invade Gaza." United Press International. 2 November 2006.
- B'Tselem. Almost Half the Fatalities in Gaza in July Were Civilians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, August 2006.
- Cole, Juan. "The New Middle East Cold War: Saudi/Israel/Lebanon versus Iran/Syria/Iraq/Hizbullah." Informed Consent. 13 December 2006.
- Dinnick, Wilf. "Who Is Ehud Olmert?" ABC News. 10 January 2006.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. "Jerusalem's New Mayor Adopts Begin-Shamir Settlement Policies." Report on Israeli Settlement in the Occupied Territories. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, March 1994.
- Gambill, Gary C. "Implications of the Israel-Hezbollah War." Mideast Monitor. 1:3 (2006).
- Godfrey-Goldstein, Angela. "Ehud Olmert's 'Convergence Plan.'" Electronic Intifada. 29 May 2006. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.
- Gutkin, Steven. "Crisis Allows Israel to Pursue Strategic Goals. Analysis: Kidnappings Give Israel Excuse to Neutralize Hamas, Hezbollah." Associated Press. 13 July 2006.
- Ha'aretz. "The Main Findings of the Winograd Partial Report on the Second Lebanon War." Ha'aretz. 1 April 2007.
- Halper, Jeff. "16 Thoughts on Israel's Gaza-Lebanon War." Tikkun. 27 July 2006.
- Harel, Amos, and Avi Issacharoff. "Israel Helps Provide Legend for Palestinian Struggle." Ha'aretz. 5 November 2006.
- Hassassian, Manuel. "The Failure of Israeli Unilateralism." Electronic Intifada. 22 July 2006. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.
- Hersh, Seymour M. "The Redirection." New Yorker. 5 March 2007.
- Isseroff, Ami. "The Apostasy of Ehud Olmert." Peace-watch. 5:17 (2003).
- Jewish Voices for Peace. "In-Depth: After Lebanon." 2006. www.jewishvoicesforpeace.org/publish/article\_728.shtml#top.
- Leggett, Karby. "Interview: Ehud Olmert." Wall Street Journal. 12 April 2006.
- Lein, Yehezkel, and Alon Cohen-Lifshitz. Under the Guise of Security: Routing the Separation Barrier to Enable the Expansion of Israeli Settlements in the West Bank. Jerusalem: Bimkom—Planners for Planning Rights and B'Tselem, 2005.
- Nasr, Vali. "After Lebanon, There's Iran." Christian Science Monitor. 9 August 2006.
- Olmert, Ehud. "Interview with Ehud Olmert." Middle East Forum. 4:4 (1997). www.meforum.org/article/376.
- Pappé, Ilan. "Genocide in Gaza." Electronic Intifada. 2 September 2006. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.
- Sockol, Samuel. "Olmert Steps Down as Premier of Israel." Washington Post. 22 September 2008.
- Sofer, Roni. "Winograd Report Submitted to Olmert, Barak." ynetnews.com. 1 January 2008. <http://www.ynetnews.com>.
- Stahl, Julie. "Fear of Iran Pushing Saudi Arabia toward Israel, Experts Say." CNSNews.com. 28 September 2006.
- Tisdall, Simon. "The Gaza Tinderbox." The Guardian (London). 10 November 2006.
- Urquhart, Conal, and Mark Tran. "Henchman Turned Statesman: End of a Political Career Dogged by Corruption Scandals." The Guardian (London). 30 July 2008.

Wilson, Scott. "War Turns the Tide for Israeli Settlers." Washington Post Foreign Service. 25 September 2006. Winograd Commission Final Report. Essential Documents. Council on Foreign Relations (30 January 2008).

Yaroni, Moshe. "Ehud Olmert: The Failure of Style over Substance." www.jewcy.com. 15 August 2008.

Zarchin, Tomer. "Olmert Withdraws Petition to Postpone Hearings in Graft Cases." Ha'aretz. 27 May 2009.

One Israel Party

Just before the 1999 ELECTIONS, EHUD BARAK became the leader of the LABOR PARTY and its candidate for prime minister, whereupon he created a joint slate of the Labor Party, DAVID LEVY'S GESHER, and the religious Zionist MEIMAD, calling it the One Israel Party. Barak was motivated by the desire to make the Labor Party appear more centrist and to reduce its secularist and elitist reputation among MIZRAHI voters. One Israel focused on social and economic issues and took an ambiguous position regarding the Palestinians. Barak's reputation as a "nonpolitician" helped him to overcome and replace LIKUD's charismatic candidate BENJAMIN NETANYAHU and win the prime ministership. However, Barak's participation in the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT with YASIR ARAFAT in the summer of 2000 led to Geshar pulling out of the alliance on 4 August, bringing an end to One Israel. Labor and Meimad continued as a joint faction, Labor-Meimad.

After the party's collapse, Barak was investigated following allegations that One Israel had broken the party funding law by allowing money from abroad to be directed into campaign funds through nonprofit groups in order to get around spending limits. State comptroller Eliezer Goldberg had already fined the party 13 million shekels ($3.4 million) for breaking fund-raising laws. It later became known as the "Barak Organization Affair."

Bibliography

Arian, Asher. Politics in Israel: The Second Republic, 2nd rev. ed. Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press, 2001.

Elazar, Daniel. Israel at the Polls 1999: Israel: The First Hundred Years. London: Routledge, 2001.

Honig, Sarah, and Herb Keinon. "Barak Faces Credibility Gap over Finances." Jerusalem Post. 4 February 2000.

Susser, Leslie. "State of Corruption." Jerusalem Post. 26 May 2008.

One Nation Party

In March 1999 former HISTADRUT (labor federation) chairman and Knesset member Amir Peretz (together with Rafik Haj Yahia and Adisu Massala) split from the LABOR PARTY and established One Nation (Am Echad) to fight for Israel's working class. One Nation won two seats in the 1999 elections; in 2002 it won three seats; in 2004 One Nation merged back into Labor (and Peretz became defense minister in EHUD OLMERT's Likud government). Later it joined Kadima.

Bibliography

Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.

Open Spaces

See GREEN AREAS

Operation Big Pines, 1982

Although Israel's invasion of LEBANON in 1982 was publicly named "Peace for Galilee," the operational plan for the campaign was called "Big Pines." The objectives of the LEBANON WAR, as detailed in Big Pines, included destroying the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION'S (PLO) military capability and driving it out of Lebanon. The war was part of a campaign in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES to weaken Palestinian nationalism and transform the Palestinians into a depoliticized quiescent population that would accept the limited local autonomy of the 1979 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS, allowing Israel to continue expanding SETTLEMENTS and INFRASTRUCTURE for a permanent presence. Big Pines also envisioned a confrontation with SYRIA in Beirut and in the Beqa'a Valley with the objective of eliminating Syrian influence in Lebanon and installing the MARONITE PHALANGE party in power as a friendly government with whom Israel could conclude a formal peace treaty.

After Defense Minister ARIEL SHARON, Chief of Staff Rafael Eitan, and Major General Amir Drori visited Beirut, met with the Phalange, and made their plans, the operation commenced on 5 June 1982 with a bombing campaign that lasted sixty-seven days, followed by a three-pronged ground assault. It is estimated that around 17,825 Palestinians and Lebanese, mostly civilians, were killed during the war. Hospitals were hit, the Palestinian refugee camps were leveled, and West Beirut was all but destroyed in a massive bombardment. Approximately 376 Israeli soldiers were killed.

Syria's influence in Lebanon, however, was not eliminated, although in the first week of the war the Israeli air force destroyed all nineteen Syrian SAM missile sites in the Beqa'a, brought down sixty-one MIGs (ninety before the war ended), and destroyed five helicopters. Much, although not all, of the PLO was forced to leave Lebanon, but shortly thereafter the Palestinian organization enjoyed some of its most successful international diplomacy. In the Occupied Territories, Palestinian nationalism was not erased but was heightened, and in only a few years Israel had to face the First INTIFADA. The Phalange did not cooperate with Israel in the war's aftermath, as Tel Aviv had expected; there was no peace treaty; Israel's handpicked presidential candidate was assassinated; and Israel had to face a new enemy in Lebanon—HIZBULLAH, which fought for eighteen years to end Israel's occupation of their country.

See also LEBANON WAR

Bibliography

- Ball, George W. Error and Betrayal in Lebanon: An Analysis of Israel's Invasion of Lebanon and the Implications for US-Israeli Relations. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, 1984.
- Fisk, Robert. Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon, 4th ed. New York: Nation Books, 2002.
- Jalbert, Paul. "'News Speak' about the Lebanon War." Journal of Palestine Studies. 14:1 (1984).
- Jansen, Michael. The Battle of Beirut: Why Israel Invaded Lebanon. London: Zed Press, 1982.
- Randal, Jonathan C. Going All the Way: Christian Warlords, Israeli Adventurers and the War in Lebanon. New York: Viking Press, 1983.
- Rogov, M. "Pathological Evaluation of Trauma in Fatal Casualties of the Lebanon War, 1982." Israeli Journal of Medical Science. 20:4 (1984).
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Schiff, Ze'ev, and Ehud Ya'ari. Israel's Lebanon War. Clearwater, FL: Touchstone, 2002.

Operation Cast Lead, 2008–2009

Operation Cast Lead was an Israeli assault on Gaza that began on 27 December 2008 and lasted until a unilateral Israeli withdrawal on 18 January 2009. It came after eighteen months of total SIEGE on the GAZA STRIP, which severely limited food, medicine, fuel, and other goods from entering Gaza as well as not allowing Palestinians to leave, creating a near-humanitarian catastrophe. The stated purpose of the offensive was to end the firing of QASSAM ROCKETS from the Gaza Strip into Israel. Throughout the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, which began on 29 September 2000, HAMAS had fired thousands of these homemade rockets into Israel, killing twenty-three Israelis.

Background to the Assault on Gaza

With the beginning of the al-Aqsa Intifada, Israel blockaded Gaza and closed the Gaza international airport and seaport. The economic effects were immense, on the order of some US$5.3 billion, and were worsened after the Israeli creation of a so-called buffer zone in September 2001 that sealed all entry and exit points in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES for "security" reasons. After 9 October 2001, movement of people and goods across the Green Line and between Gaza and Israel was halted, and a complete internal CLOSURE was effected on 14 November 2001.

For seven years the Gaza Strip was subjected to continuous blockades, including an eighteen-month total blockade, severely restricting electricity and fuel supplies, as well as the movement of people and goods in and out of the region, including crucial humanitarian aid. From 2000 through 2006, as a consequence of the Gaza conflict and Israel's ensuing military operations in the Strip, it is estimated that there was a loss of $43 million in Gazan agricultural productivity due to the destruction of land, trees, vegetables, and greenhouses. The ongoing blockade had a devastating impact on an area where some 85 percent of the population is dependent on food aid from outside Gaza. It also significantly increased the levels of poverty and unemployment in Gaza, the consequences of which affect children more than adults because of their vulnerability to malnutrition and disease.

During that period, Israel carried out a series of military campaigns in Gaza, including OPERATION RAINBOW, 14–26 May 2004; Operation Days of Penitence, 28 September–15 October 2004; OPERATION SUMMER RAINS, 25 June–26 November 2006; and Operation Autumn Clouds, 1–8 November 2006, among others named and unnamed.

On 1 September 2005, Israel withdrew its settlements and military installations from Gaza as part of ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA policy. In January 2006, Hamas won, by a large majority, seats in the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, a victory that FATAH (and Israel and the UNITED STATES) was unwilling to accept. Infused with US weapons, aid, and military trainers, Fatah fought to keep control of Gaza. In June 2007, Israel (with US support) carried out an abortive and desperate attempt to overthrow Hamas by arming and backing a Fatah putsch. The purpose was to install in power PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) president MAHMUD ABBAS. Hamas resisted, often with violent brutality, and expelled Abbas and the Fatah leadership from Gaza to the WEST BANK.

After the failure of the June 2007 coup, Israel further tightened the blockade on Gaza, while Egypt and Israel sealed their border crossings with Gaza on the grounds that Fatah had fled and was no longer providing security. Like Israel, the United States officially reaffirmed its categorization of Hamas as a terrorist group and refused to have any dealings with it. Cairo, fearing a spillover of Hamas-style militancy into EGYPT, was somewhat more willing to act as a mediator.

On 19 September 2007, Israel accorded a new status to Gaza when its Security Cabinet declared it a “hostile territory”—a characterization that was shortly afterward approved by the United States. Although the legal implications that Israel intended to attach to this status remain unclear, one political purpose of this declaration was immediately made known, manifest in further reductions of fuel and electricity to Gaza.

Israel began planning for the military assault of Operation Cast Lead in March 2008, according to Ha'aretz, Israel's preeminent newspaper. On 4 November, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) deliberately broke a six-month truce with Hamas, which had gone into effect on 17 June 2008 and had been honored by Hamas, when it carried out an attack in the Gaza Strip that killed six Hamas members. Israeli officials claimed that it had uncovered a plot in Gaza to attack Israel, but skeptics claim that the real reason was to provoke Hamas to respond so it could “justify” its planned offensive. The day after the raid, Israel severely tightened its siege of the Gaza territory. Imports were reduced to 16 trucks a day, down from 123 daily the previous month (and 475 in May 2007). Hamas responded to the 4 November provocation in the manner Israel expected: it fired more Qassam rockets and Grad missiles into Israel. Although Hamas offered to extend the truce if Israel would lift the blockade, Israel refused, and Operation Cast Lead was unleashed.

The Operation

The Israeli operation began with an intense bombardment of the Gaza Strip, targeting Hamas bases, police training camps, police headquarters, and offices. Civilian INFRASTRUCTURE, including mosques, houses, medical facilities, and schools, was also attacked. The aerial assault was supplemented by a ground invasion that began on 3 January 2009, but the air force remained in action throughout. Over the three-week period of the operation, it was estimated that a million and a half tons of explosives were dropped on the Gaza Strip. Gaza is 25 miles by 5 miles in area and home to 1.5 million people, making it the most densely crowded area in the world and obscuring the distinction between civilians and militants.

In the twenty-two days of Operation Cast Lead, the Palestinian death toll as determined by B'Tselem was 1,387, of whom 773 were civilian noncombatants, including 320 minors and 109 women, plus sixteen medics and four journalists. The Palestinian Center for Human Rights reported that some 5,300 Palestinians were injured (many seriously), of whom 1,606 were children. The B'Tselem figures were widely corroborated by international human rights organizations, but the IDF disputed them, claiming a total of 1,166 Palestinian fatalities, of whom 709 were combatants and 295 were noncombatants. The IDF did not publish figures on injuries. B'Tselem reported that Palestinians killed nine Israelis during the operation: three civilians, one member of the security forces inside Israel by a Qassam rocket, and five members of the IDF in Gaza. Another four soldiers were killed by friendly fire.

Palestinians in Gaza had the following weapons: (1) small arms and light weapons, including assorted handguns, antitank weapons, hand grenades, grenade launchers, long rifles, and Dragunov sniper rifles; (2) missiles and mortars, including the homemade Qassam missile with a range of 9.9 to 25 miles and the Al-Banaa antitank missile with a range of 500 meters; and (3) improvised explosive devices (IEDs), some of which were used as antipersonnel bombs and others which were planted on the sides of roads or underground.

Palestinian tactics included booby-trapping houses and buildings and constructing an extensive system of tunnels in preparation for combat. A Hamas fighter reported that the group had prepared a tunnel network in Gaza City that would allow Hamas to engage the IDF in urban warfare. Some houses were booby-trapped with mannequins, explosives, and adjacent tunnels used for ambush. Militants attempted to blend in with the civilian population and sometimes stored weapons in mosques.

Israel, on the other side, had undertaken long-term planning and detailed intelligence-gathering, largely relying on COLLABORATORS. Although Israel had been planning for the war for six months, operational security and a well-planned deception campaign took Hamas by surprise when the operation finally got under way.

Operation Cast Lead began with devastating air strikes. The Israel Air Force (IAF) hammered targets in the Gaza Strip with jets and helicopters. Prime targets were the Rafah tunnels under the Egyptian border, through which Hamas smuggled from Egypt food, medicine, all the basic things that were unavailable due to the siege, as well as small arms. The IAF used sophisticated weapons, including earth-penetrating bombs, to destroy the tunnels between Gaza and Egypt. Among those weapons was a new laser-guided, hard-target-penetrating bomb reportedly capable of penetrating 2 meters (6.5 feet) of reinforced concrete. High-precision weapons were also deployed throughout the battle to destroy bunkers and weapon depots.

Following a week of bombing, the ground campaign opened with three infantry brigade task forces simultaneously entering the Gaza Strip from several directions. The infantry brigades approached their objectives from unexpected directions, avoiding previously used routes in which Hamas had created booby-trapped bunkers and tunnels. An armored brigade, fielding the latest Merkava Mk4 main battle tank, raced unopposed to block access from Rafah and Khan Yunis to Gaza City, cutting supply lines to Hamas from the south.

Cast Lead was the first IDF operation in which unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs, or drones), helicopters, and fighter jets were allocated to ground forces directly without IAF central command authorizing sorties. Air-support controller teams operated alongside brigade commanders at the front, passing along whatever surveillance data from UAVs and other assets they needed.

Each brigade combat team was assigned a UAV squadron for close support, with ground-control operators at forward headquarters calling in air strikes from standby attack helicopters and identifying targets to fighter aircraft cruising over the combat zone. A high degree of situational awareness was achieved by maintaining at least a dozen UAVs in flight over Gaza at all times. These aircraft detected Hamas ambushes and rocket launch sites and directed aircraft, tanks, and artillery to the targets. The use of sophisticated electronic intelligence-gathering that pinpointed explosive caches and booby-traps provided troops with real-time intelligence. Intelligence sources say that during the operation, F-15 and F-16 aircraft could identify and fire air-to-ground missiles within thirty seconds of data transmission to take out fleeing targets. There was much more cooperation between ground and air forces than the IDF has employed in the past.

The Israeli navy also attacked Hamas coastal targets and boats. Vessels were equipped with electro-optically guided missiles with a range of five miles that were employed on gunboats and were able to make precision hits from the boats, even in rolling seas.

Other newly employed technology was utilized by the combat engineering unit. Soldiers facing booby-trapped houses and ambushes set by Hamas in order to kidnap Israeli personnel were aided by miniature robots and wall-breaching munitions that allowed entry from holes blown through walls instead of doorways. Additional successful tactics included night maneuvers with sophisticated night-vision equipment and the wide use of canine units. The dogs were very effective in uncovering hidden militants and explosives, although the casualty rate among the dogs was quite high.

Another innovation was the use of electronic warfare. The IDF was able to jam all radio, television, and cell phone communications as well as call thousands of Palestinian homes to warn of an impending incursion. There was an important psychological impact to these electronic tactics as well.

Apart from conventional bombs and high explosives, many scientists believe that Israel used unconventional weapons in Operation Cast Lead, including the following:

- White phosphorus shells, which burn in contact with oxygen and cause deep burns when they touch human skin, sometimes reaching to the bone. The weapon is not illegal itself and can be used to provide a smokescreen on the battlefield or as an incendiary weapon against a military target. However, its use is regulated by customary INTERNATIONAL LAW, and it must be employed in a way that distinguishes between combatants and civilians, and never used to target civilians.

- Dense inert material explosives (DIMEs), which expel a blade of charged tungsten dust that burns and destroys everything within a 4-meter radius (12–13 feet). The heavy metal tungsten used in the weapon acts as microshrapnel. It is lethal at close range (about 13 feet) but loses momentum quickly due to air resistance, coming to a halt within approximately forty times the diameter of the charge. This increases the probability of killing people within a few meters of the explosion while reducing the probability of causing death and injuries or damage farther away. Evidence of their use in Gaza is in the number of people who had limbs severed, as with a blade, but did not bleed.
- Flechettes, metal darts that are 4 centimeters (1.6 inches) long and are sharply pointed at the front, with four fins at the rear. Between 5,000 and 8,000 are packed into 120mm shells, which are generally fired from tanks. The shells explode in the air and scatter the flechettes in a conical pattern over an area about 300 meters (984 feet) wide and 100 meters (328 feet) long. They are designed to penetrate dense vegetation and should never be used in built-up civilian areas.
- Cluster bombs, which are air-dropped or ground-launched munitions that eject smaller submunitions: a cluster of bomblets. During attacks the weapons are prone to indiscriminate effects, especially in populated areas. Unexploded bomblets can kill or maim civilians long after the fighting has ended. Children often pick them up thinking they are shiny toys; adults tend not to see them but step on them. Unexploded submunitions are very costly to locate and remove.

Israel dropped cluster bombs along the Rafah border to make it difficult to rebuild the tunnels it had destroyed by bombing. Destroying the underground tunnels between Gaza and Egypt was one of Israel's primary objectives in the campaign, and well over half of the tunnels were destroyed. The tunnels came to be important as a means of countering Israel's blockade and have been the main transit method for food, medicine, fuel, and weapons into Gaza.

Consequences of Operation Cast Lead

Subsequent to the operation, Amnesty International (AI) sent a fact-finding delegation to Gaza and issued a major report in March 2009. The AI team described how rescue workers were unable to remove the dead during the hostilities. While the fighting was in progress the IDF prevented any access to the areas where the army was dug in. "In the Zaitoun neighborhood of Gaza City, rescue workers were pulling out the bodies of members of the Sammuni family from the rubble of their home. They had been killed in Israeli strikes two weeks earlier and Israeli soldiers had subsequently bulldozed the house on top of them." AI continued: "The Israeli army did not allow rescue workers to reach the area, despite repeated requests, and the bodies were in a state of decomposition. The smell was unbearable." The team learned that more than 100 decaying bodies had been pulled out from under rubble in various parts of Gaza.

AI also reported that 14,000 homes, 219 factories, and 240 schools had been destroyed. Another 17,000 homes were badly damaged, as were many schools and factories. "We found more and more destroyed and damaged homes, mosques, schools and government buildings, some completely flattened, by bombs dropped by F-16 fighter jets, others rendered uninhabitable by the artillery and missile strikes. . . . There were also whole neighborhoods reduced to rubble in areas where the Israeli ground forces were present."

Israel's military said buildings were only destroyed because of military "operational needs." The IDF stated that it had operated in accordance with international law during the conflict.

However, the use of mines to destroy homes, which AI found extensive evidence of, contradicts this claim. Another organization, Israel's BREAKING THE SILENCE, corroborated AI's claims, stating that its findings from the Gaza war suggested that many demolitions had been carried out when there was no immediate threat. "Israeli troops had to leave their vehicles to plant the mines, indicating that they faced no danger and that there was no military or operational justification." Yehuda Shaul from Breaking the Silence stated, "From the testimonies that we've gathered, lots of demolitions—buildings demolished either by bulldozers or explosives—were done after an area was under Israeli control.”

The AI team found evidence that Israeli soldiers had taken over dozens of homes and used them as military positions. “The soldiers had not only smashed holes in the outer walls to fire from, but also vandalized the furniture and everything else in the houses. The destruction was, in our view, and according to our findings, wanton destruction—it could not be justified on military grounds.” In the houses AI reported seeing “discarded Israeli army supplies, including sleeping bags, medical kits, empty boxes of munitions and spent cartridges, incontrovertible evidence of the soldiers’ occupation of the houses.” In every one of the homes the team visited, “rooms had been ransacked, with furniture overturned and/or smashed. Clothing, documents and other personal items belonging to the families who lived there had been strewn over the floor and soiled, and in one case urinated on.”

The AI team also described how power lines had been torn down and water mains ripped up. “Gaza’s infrastructure is now in dire condition. Prolonged blackouts are the norm, tens of thousands of people have no access to clean WATER, and sewage is now flowing in the open from the broken conduits.”

Among the more extraordinary events of this war were the published testimonies of a group of squad leaders who had fought in Gaza, told to their chief, Danny Zamir, and published in Ha’aretz and Ma’ariv. The soldiers were enrolled in the Yitzhak Rabin Oranim Academic College, a military preparatory school in the northern town of Tivon. Zamir is the academy’s director, and he invited combat soldiers and officers who graduated from the program for a lengthy discussion of their experiences in Gaza. They spoke openly, but most preferred not to use their real names.

In the months following Operation Cast Lead, international human rights groups accused Israel of excessive force, wanton killing, and war crimes. The Israeli military and Minister of Defense EHUD BARAK repeatedly responded that the IDF followed the highest ethical standards, was the most moral army in the world, and took great care to avoid civilian casualties. The soldiers’ testimonies, however, suggest something quite different. One soldier gave an account of a sniper killing a woman and her two children who walked too close to a designated no-go area by mistake, and another told of a sharpshooter who killed an elderly woman who came within 100 meters (320 feet) of a commandeered house. Others described commandeering Palestinian homes, throwing all of the contents out the windows, and leaving the premises with graffiti and in disarray.

Israeli defense minister Ehud Barak responded to the soldiers’ statements by repeating Israel’s description of its forces as the “most moral” in the world; the military said its military advocate-general had ordered an investigation into the alleged incidents; and the highest echelons of the military and government undertook a widespread public relations campaign, including in the United States, to discredit Danny Zamir and the soldiers who spoke out. The official inquiry was opened on 19 March and closed on 30 March, concluding that the soldiers’ testimonies were based on hearsay and therefore inadmissible.

Ha’aretz correspondent Amos Harel, writing in late March, revealed additional evidence in support of the soldiers’ assertions. “Until the soldiers’ testimonies were published, the IDF Spokesman’s Office had been highly successful in promoting its version of events. The international media may not have bought it, but the army managed to sell the Israeli public an almost impossible package: We were victorious in Gaza, we suffered minimal casualties, and we also came out of there smelling like roses.” But, Harel continued, “There is a discrepancy between the official military response, of denial and horrified disapproval, the testimonies of the Rabin pre-military preparatory course graduates, and the response to those reports by key senior officers, unwilling to be identified.”

On 15 July 2009 the organization Breaking the Silence announced the release of a booklet that includes fifty-four testimonials by soldiers (none of the same men from Yitzhak Rabin Oranim Academic College who testified earlier) who participated in the Gaza operation. The testimonies expose significant gaps between the official positions of the Israeli military and events on the ground. According to Breaking the Silence, “The testimonies prove that the immoral way the war was carried out was due to the systems in place and not the individual soldier. What was proven is that through the IDF the exception becomes the norm, and this requires a deep and reflective discussion. This is an urgent call to Israel’s society and leadership to take a sober look at the foolishness of our policies.”

Conclusion

The weapons and tactics Israel used in its twenty-two-day offensive in Gaza devastated an essentially defenseless civilian population. The one-sidedness of the encounter was so stark, as illustrated by the vast disparities in the quality and quantity of weapons used and the relative casualties on both sides—1,387 Palestinian fatalities, nine Israeli deaths—that this can hardly even be considered a war.

The Israelis and their allies talk of “retaliation” and “the right of Israel to defend itself.” Critics described the attacks as a “massacre” or relied on the language of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Richard Falk, United Nations special rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Palestinian territories, argued that the Gaza attack dramatized a shift away from states fighting states to state struggles against armed resistance movements, and with it a related shift from the language of “war” to that of “criminality.” “In one important respect,” he posited, perceptions and discourse have been skewed by the focus on whether Israel’s use of force was “disproportionate.” Falk stated: “This way of describing Israeli recourse to force ignores the foundational issue: were the attacks in any legal sense ‘defensive’ in character in the first place? An inquiry into the surrounding circumstances shows an absence of any kind of defensive necessity: a temporary cease-fire between Israel and Hamas that had been in effect since 19 July 2008 had succeeded in reducing cross-border violence virtually to zero; Hamas consistently offered to extend the cease-fire, even to a longer period of ten years; the breakdown of the cease-fire is not primarily the result of Hamas rocket fire, but came about mainly as a result of an Israeli air attack on 4 November that killed six Hamas fighters in Gaza. . . . In other words, there were no grounds for claiming the right of self-defense as Israel was not the object of a Hamas attack, and diplomatic alternatives to force existed and seemed credible, and their good-faith reliance was legally obligatory. On this basis the focus of legal debate should not be upon whether Israeli force was disproportionate. Of course it was. The focus should be on whether the Israeli attacks were a prohibited, non-defensive use of force under the UN charter, amounting to an act of aggression, and as such constituting a crime against peace.”

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; FIELD OF THORNS PLAN; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION JOUR-NEY OF COLORS; OPERATION RAINBOW; OPERATIONS SUMMER RAINS AND AUTUMN CLOUDS

Bibliography

- Abu Sittah, Ghassan, and Swee Ang. “The Wounds of Gaza.” Lancet Global Health Network (London). 2 February 2009. <http://www.thelancetglobalhealthnetwork.com>.
- Amnesty International. Amnesty International Team Gains Access to Gaza. London: Amnesty International, 19 January 2009.
- . Attacks on Ambulance Workers in Gaza. London: Amnesty International, 28 January 2009.
- . Israeli Army Used Flechettes against Gaza Civilians. London: Amnesty International, 27 January 2009.
- . Israeli Soldiers Leave Gaza Homes in Devastated Condition. London: Amnesty International, 29 January 2009.
- Associated Press. “Israelis Invade Gaza Refugee Camp.” Associated Press. 12 March 2002.
- Ben-Shalom, Uzi, Zeev Lehrer, and Eyal Ben-Ari. “A Field Study on Combat Units in the Al-Aqsa Intifada.” Armed Forces and Society. 32:1 (2005).
- Booman, Steven D. “Israel Uses a Horrific ‘New Weapon’ in Gaza?” Alternet. 22 January 2009.
- Breaking the Silence. Soldiers Testimonies from Operation Cast Lead, Gaza 2009. Jerusalem: Breaking the Silence, 2009. http://www.shovrimshatika.org/oferet/news\_item\_e.asp?id=1.
- Bronner, Ethan. “Israel Disputes Soldiers’ Accounts of Gaza Abuses.” New York Times. 28 March 2009.
- B’Tselem. The Gaza Strip: One Big Prison. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, May 2007.
- . Impeding Medical Treatment and Firing at Ambulances by IDF Soldiers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, March 2002.
- . “Press Release: 9 September 2009. B’Tselem Publishes Complete Fatality Figures from Operation Cast Lead.” Jerusalem: B’Tselem. 2009. http://www.btselem.org/English/Press\_Releases/20090909.asp.
- Chossudovsky, Michel. “The Invasion of Gaza: ‘Operation Cast Lead,’ Part of a Broader Israeli Military-Intelligence Agenda.” Global Research. 4 January 2009.
- Committee to Protect Journalists. Attacks on the Press 2007: Israel and the Occupied Palestinian Territory. New York: CPJ, 5 February 2008.
- Cooke, Shamus. “The Massacre in Palestine and the Threat of a Wider War.” Global Research. December 2008.
- Defense for Children International/Palestine Section. CRC Anniversary Attests to Child Rights Deterioration in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Geneva: DCI/PS, 20 November 2008.
- Dudai, Ron. No Way Out: Medical Implications of Israel’s Siege Policy. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, June 2001.
- Dugard, John. Human Rights Situation in Palestine and Other Occupied Arab Territories: Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories Occupied since 1967.

- A/HRC/7/17. New York: UN General Assembly, 21 January 2008.
- Falk, Richard. "Israel's War Crimes." Le Monde diplomatique (English edition). March 2009.
- Harel, Amos. "Cast Lead Exposé: What Did the IDF Think Would Happen in Gaza?" Ha'aretz. 28 March 2009.
- Hass, Amira. "Rights Group: IDF Violated Medical Ethics in Gaza Op." Ha'aretz. 23 March 2009.
- . "Time to Believe Gaza War Crime Allegations." Ha'aretz. 24 March 2009.
- Human Rights Watch. Rain of Fire: Israel's Unlawful Use of White Phosphorus in Gaza. New York: Human Rights Watch, 25 March 2009.
- International Crisis Group. "Gaza's Unfinished Business." Middle East Report. 85 (23 April 2009). <http://www.crisisgroup.org/home/index.cfm?id=6071>.
- Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. <http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA>.
- Jaeger, David A., Esteban F. Klor, Sami H. Miaari, and M. Daniele Paserman. "The Struggle for Palestinian Hearts and Minds: Violence and Public Opinion in the Second Intifada." Social Science Research Network. IZA Working Paper No. 3439 (November 2008).
- Katz, Yaakov. "IAF Uses New US-Supplied Smart Bomb." Jerusalem Post. 29 December 2008.
- Kershner, Isabel. "Israel Ends Inquiry into Abuse in Gaza." Ha'aretz. 30 March 2009.
- Lein, Yehezkel, and Darryl Li. Act of Vengeance: Israel's Bombing of the Gaza Power Plant and Its Effects. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, September 2006.
- Lendman, Stephen. "Remember Gaza: One of History's Terror Bombing Victims." Countercurrents.org. 14 January 2009. www.countercurrents.org.
- Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. Field Update on Gaza from the Humanitarian Coordinator. Geneva: United Nations, OCHA, 2–9 March 2009.
- . Field Update on Gaza from the Humanitarian Coordinator. Geneva: United Nations, OCHA, 10–16 March 2009.
- . Field Update on Gaza from the Humanitarian Coordinator. Geneva: United Nations, OCHA, 24–26 January 2009.
- . Thousands of Gazans Remain Homeless. Geneva: United Nations, OCHA, 21 February 2009.
- Palestinian Center for Human Rights. PCHR Contests the IDF. Ref: 44/2009 (26 March 2009).
- . Weekly Report: On Israeli Human Rights Violations in the Occupied Territories, March 07–13. Gaza: PCHR, 14 March 2002.
- Palestinian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. <http://www.mofa-gov.ps/arabic/index.php>.
- Popular Committee Against Siege. Report on the Drastic Consequences of Gaza Siege. Gaza Strip: PCAS, October 2008.
- Ravid, Barak. "Operation 'Cast Lead': Israeli Air Force Strike Followed Months of Planning." Ha'aretz. 27 December 2008.
- Reporters Without Borders. Palestinian Journalist Covering Gaza Incursion Shot in Back by Israeli Troops. Paris: RWB, 15 February 2009.
- Save the Children Alliance. A Month on from Gaza Cease-fire up to 100,000 People Remain Homeless. London: Save the Children Alliance, 16 February 2009.
- Stein, Yael. Harm to Medical Personnel: The Delay, Abuse and Humiliation of Medical Personnel by the Israeli Security Forces. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, December 2003.
- . Human Shield: Use of Palestinian Civilians as Human Shields in Violation of High Court of Justice Order. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, November 2002.
- White, Ben. "Israel Wanted a Humanitarian Crisis: Targeting Civilians Was a Deliberate Part of This Bid to Humiliate Hamas and the Palestinians, and Pulverise Gaza into Chaos." The Guardian. 20 January 2009.
- World Health Organization. In the Gaza Strip. Geneva: WHO, 4 February 2009.

Operation Defensive Shield, 2002

Operation Defensive Shield was Israel's second major military offensive (following OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS) against the Palestinians in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES in the context of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. Starting on 29 March 2002, Defensive Shield was the largest military operation in the WEST BANK since the 1967 WAR and had as its objective Israel's reoccupation of the West Bank. The operation supposedly was retaliation for a 27 March 2002 HAMAS SUICIDE BOMBING that killed thirty people at the Park Hotel in Netanya, Israel. Within twenty-four hours of that incident, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) called up 20,000 reserve soldiers.

The stated goals of the operation, according to Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON, were to "enter cities and villages which have become havens for TERRORISTS; to catch and arrest terrorists and primarily, their dispatchers and those who finance and support them; to confiscate weapons intended to be used against Israeli citizens; to expose and destroy terrorist facilities and explosives, laboratories, weapons production factories and secret installations. The orders are clear: target and paralyze anyone who takes up weapons and tries to oppose our troops, resists them or endangers them."

The offensive began with an attack on PLO president YASIR ARAFAT's headquarters in Ramallah. The IDF then entered BETHLEHEM, Tulkarm, and Qalqilya on 1 April, followed by JENIN and NABLUS on the nights of 3 and 4 April, and declared these areas CLOSED MILITARY ZONES, thus barring access to or from the outside world. In most areas, the IDF cut WATER and electricity and imposed strict CURFEWS on residents within the towns. Tanks, armored personnel carriers, and soldiers were positioned in the Jenin refugee camp and Nablus's old city, where the IDF carried out operations. Missiles from Apache helicopters bombed houses.

Amnesty International reported that "after the first day those killed or wounded in Jenin and Nablus were left without burial or medical treatment." It also reported that tanks traveling through narrow streets sliced off the outer walls of houses and that the IDF demolished, by explosives or army bulldozers, a large residential area of the Jenin camp.

Israeli analyst URI AVNERY further described some of the destruction the IDF inflicted on Palestinian institutions. In the Ministry of Education, Ministry of Health, and other Palestinian government offices, the archives and computers were destroyed.

In "the Ministry of Education . . . the safe [was] blown open, the papers strewn around, the drawers emptied, the telephones crushed. Some of it was just plain vandalism. But the money in the safe was stolen, the furniture upturned, the papers dispersed. All the hard disks were taken from the computers, all the important files taken away. Only empty shells remained. All the important contents of the [education] ministry were taken: the lists of pupils, examination results, lists of teachers, the whole logistics of the Palestinian school system," he said. Similarly, "The Ministry of Health suffered the same fate. The hard disks that contained all the information, state of diseases, medical tests, lists of doctors and nurses, the logistics of the hospitals was taken. A similar fate happened to virtually all the Palestinian government offices. Gone is the information pertaining to LAND registration and housing, taxes and government expenditure, car tests and drivers' licenses, everything necessary for administering a modern society."

Furthermore, "this was true for the CIVIL SOCIETY as well and even more so for the security system. The headquarters of the security services were destroyed, files burned, computers crushed, the information concerning armed underground organizations and all other details pertaining to the war against terrorism were obliterated."

For the three weeks of operations, strict curfews were placed on the Palestinian cities, while a SIEGE on Palestinians holed up in the Bethlehem

CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY left Bethlehem residents under curfew for five weeks. Operation Defensive Shield officially ended on 10 May 2002, and, shortly afterward, OPERATION DETERMINED PATH was launched.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; FIELD OF THORNS; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS; OPERATION RAINBOW; OPERATIONS SUMMER RAINS AND AUTUMN CLOUDS

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Israel and the Occupied Territories: Shielded from Scrutiny: IDF Violations in Jenin and Nablus. MDE 15/143/2002. London: Amnesty International, 4 November 2002.
- . No Security without Human Rights. Special Report. London: Amnesty International, 3 June 2002.
- Avnery, Uri. "The Real Aim of Sharon's 'Operation Defensive Shield.'" Redress Information and Analysis. 27 April 2002. <http://www.redress.btinternet.co.uk>.
- Ben-Shalom, Uzi, Zeev Lehrner, and Eyal Ben-Ari. "A Field Study on Combat Units in the Al-Aqsa Intifada." Armed Forces and Society. 32:1 (2005).
- Carey, Roane, ed. The New Intifada: Resisting Israel's Apartheid. New York: Verso, 2001.
- Collins, John. Occupied by Memory: The Intifada Generation and the Palestinian State of Emergency. New York: New York University Press, 2004.
- Falk, Richard. "International Law and the al-Aqsa Intifada." Middle East Report. 217 (Winter 2000).
- Gresh, Alain, and Dominique Vidal. The New A-Z of the Middle East. London: I. B. Tauris, 2004.
- Hamzeh, Muna, and Todd May. Operation Defensive Shield: Witnesses to Israeli War Crimes. London: Pluto Press, 2003.
- Nusseibeh, Sari, and Edy Kaufman. "The Al-Aqsa Intifada: Reflections on a Turning Point." Palestine-Israel Journal. 7:3 (2000).
- Pearlman, Wendy. Occupied Voices: Stories of Everyday Life from the Second Intifada. New York: Nation Books, 2003.
- Peri, Yoram. Israeli Military and Israel's Palestinian Policy: From Oslo to the Al Aqsa Intifada. Darby, PA: Diane Publishing Co., 2003.
- United Nations. Illegal Israeli Actions in Occupied East Jerusalem and the Rest of the Occupied Palestinian Territory. Report of the Secretary-General prepared pursuant to General Assembly Resolution ES-10/10. Tenth Emergency Special Session. Agenda Item 5. New York: Office of the Secretariat, 2002.

Operation Determined Path, 2002

Operation Determined Path constituted the third major Israeli military offensive during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, following OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS and OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD. On 22 June 2002, Israel threatened to launch a “crushing offensive” and impose an indefinite reoccupation of Palestinian areas that it had left in 1995 under the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT unless SUICIDE BOMBINGS and shootings against Israelis stopped. Officially, it was an attempt to stamp out TERRORISM, but the nature and extent of IDF actions, especially its imposition of suffering on civilians, suggest that other motivations were at work. The Israeli army reentered Palestinian cities throughout the WEST BANK and reinstated the CURFEWS on all the cities (except JERICHO) and on many towns, villages, and refugee camps.

The first city to be reoccupied was Ramallah, when some eighty Israeli tanks swept into the city in a predawn raid, encircling the headquarters of Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT, which had been wrecked in Operation Defensive Shield, and barricaded him behind a front gate blocked with rubble. Almost 2 million Palestinians were affected by the curfew, which remained for the several-month duration of the operation and became its defining aspect. An F-16 strike on 23 July assassinated HAMAS leader Salah Shehadeh and killed fifteen additional Palestinian civilians in the Gaza City neighborhood of al-Daraj, an indication that Israel intended to prolong its military presence and tighten its curfews inside towns—measures that Israel said were necessary to prevent Hamas from following through on its loudly broadcast pledges of revenge for the killings in Gaza City.

The military’s operations during Determined Path were similar to those implemented during Operation Defensive Shield. On 23 July, Amnesty International issued an interim report on the situation in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Among its findings were that most Palestinian towns and many villages in the West Bank were under curfew for up to twenty-four hours a day for a month, forcing Palestinians to live under virtual house arrest. In NABLUS the twenty-four-hour curfew was lifted once a week for up to six hours. In Tulkarm, the curfew imposed on 20 June was reportedly lifted only eight times, for up to four hours a day. “Even where the curfew has been officially eased it confines inhabitants of towns under curfew to their homes from sunset to sunrise.” In addition, Amnesty International found that more than 3 million Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip were living under CLOSURES. “Nearly every road to a town or village is cut by barriers manned by soldiers or closed by blocks of concrete, piles of earth, and trenches. A journey of 40 kilometers (25 miles) can take several hours. Palestinians are barred from many primary roads, and special passes, often unobtainable, are needed for Palestinians to travel from one area to the other.” These RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT for the Palestinian population in the Occupied Territories “affected the ability of Palestinians to access work, EDUCATION, and HEALTH CARE, as well as their ability to conduct business, travel, and maintain family contacts. The impact on the Palestinian ECONOMY has been severe. The reoccupation took place at the same time as the final school exams, leaving teachers, students and supervisors unable to reach schools.” Amnesty International also reported that Israeli soldiers sometimes shot at anyone in the street during curfew and shot people even when curfews were lifted. In Jenin three children were killed by fire from Israeli tanks during a temporary lifting of curfew. Also in Jenin, on 11 July 2002, Israeli soldiers on a tank shot two Palestinian journalists wearing jackets clearly marked “Press”; one journalist died from his wounds.

Additionally, more than 600 Palestinians were held under ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, mostly in tents in military detention centers. Several hundred other Palestinians, many of them arbitrarily detained over the previous three months, were also held in pretrial detention in centers in Israel and the Occupied Territories. During this time, the IDF continued to destroy or damage Palestinian homes and property “without absolute military necessity,” Amnesty stated. Operation Determined Path ended at the end of September with 165 Palestinians killed and no Israeli deaths.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; FIELD OF THORNS; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS; OPERATION RAINBOW; OPERATIONS SUMMER RAINS AND AUTUMN CLOUDS

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Israel/Occupied Territories: End Collective Punishment of Palestinians in Occupied Territories. MDE 15/121/2002. London: Amnesty International, 22 July 2002.
- Ben-Israel, Isaac. “The Crisis in the Oslo Process through the Prism of Israeli Deterrence.” Strategic Assessment. 5:2 (2002).
- Carey, Roane, ed. The New Intifada: Resisting Israel’s Apartheid. New York: Verso, 2001.
- Hanieh, Adam. “West Bank Curfews: Politics by Other Means.” MERIP. 24 July 2002.

Operation Grapes of Wrath, 1996

In August 1996, in an attempt to end the shelling of northern Israel by HIZBULLAH from southern LEBANON, Israel undertook a sixteen-day military blitz against Lebanon, conducting more than 1,100 bombing raids and extensive shelling. Israel's bombing of a UN installation at Qana resulted in the deaths of 118 Lebanese civilians who had sought shelter in the facility. The offensive displaced some 500,000 Lebanese civilians in their own country; 170 Lebanese were killed, not counting the Qana deaths; 350 civilians were wounded; and 62 Israeli citizens were injured in Israel during the operation.

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. "Israel/Lebanon: Unlawful Killings during Operation 'Grapes of Wrath.'" MDE 15/042/1996. London: Amnesty International. 23 July 1996.
- Shlaim, Avi. "Massacres in Qana: Israel's Error, Then and Now." New York Times/International Herald Tribune. 4 August 2006.

Operation Journey of Colors, 2002

Journey of Colors was the first major offensive operation that Israel undertook after the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. The operation began on 18 February and lasted until 15 March 2002, and it was followed by OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD and OPERATION DETERMINED PATH. Journey of Colors' stated strategic objective was to force the Palestinians to accept an unconditional cease-fire or cause the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) to implode as a result of overwhelming military-political pressures that would leave it in shambles. The operation's tactical objective was to totally incapacitate the various Palestinian militant organizations' ability for sustained action by eliminating their leaderships (via TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS), disarming them, destroying their facilities, and arresting their cadres en masse. Israeli military commentators stated that the offensive was the "largest-scale Israeli military campaign since the 1982 invasion of Lebanon."

The operation involved Israel's reoccupation of most WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP cities that Israel had left under the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT, as well as refugee camps and some towns. The occupied cities included NABLUS, JENIN, Qalqilya, Tulkarm, BETHLEHEM, Beit Jala, Ramallah/el-Bireh, and Rafah City in Gaza. The occupied refugee camps included Balata in the Nablus area;

Am'ari in the Ramallah area; Dheishe and A'aydah (Aida) in the Bethlehem area; Far'a and Jenin in the Jenin area; Nur al-Shams and Tulkarm in the Tulkarm district; and Jabalya, al Burejj, Khan Yunis, Rafah, and Dayr al Balah in Gaza. All of the cities and refugee camps are in Area A, which was supposedly under PNA autonomous control, according to the Interim Agreement signed on 26 September 1995 between the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION and Israel.

In each locale the massive ground invasions involved hundreds of troops and 160 to 180 tanks and armed personnel carriers that roamed the streets, shelling and shooting at schools, stores and shops, hospitals, UN installations, and PNA security facilities, as well as any person who appeared. The troops and tanks were accompanied by air cover provided by helicopter gunships and F-16 fighter planes that bombed, strafed, and sent missiles for targeted assassinations. Once a locale was under Israeli control, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) placed the entire population under CURFEW, cut electricity, and in many places cut WATER mains and telephone lines. Every male in the cities or camps between the ages of fourteen and forty-five was told to "surrender," so soldiers could check their papers against a "wanted" list. Thousands of men were detained at gunpoint, blindfolded, handcuffed, and held from twelve hours to six days, depending on the locale. By 12 March, more than 2,500 men had been arrested, although relatively few were charged—by 14 March, the number was approximately 250.

Once all the men in a particular area were under detention, the IDF conducted house-to-house searches, causing damage in the process. Carnage was also caused by aerial bombing of houses from tank movements and shelling, as well as shelling from other types of weapons. In the refugee camps of the northern West Bank, damage was extensive. In Jenin, with a population of 14,000 living in 2,500 buildings, 550 residences were seriously damaged (rendering them unsafe for habitation), 3 were completely demolished, and 6 were partially demolished, while nine schools and two medical clinics were severely damaged. In other places, hospitals and other medical facilities, INFRASTRUCTURE, stores, and colleges and universities sustained severe damage, but in no other area was the destruction of homes as extensive as in the Rafah refugee camp in the Gaza Strip, with a population of 89,000. As of the end of December 2001, fifteen months into the Intifada, Israel had completely demolished 368 houses and partially demolished (making them unsuitable for living) 520 houses. Some 900 families, or 6,200 persons, were made REFUGEES for a second time. On 10 January 2002, Israeli tanks and bulldozers razed 73 additional houses in Rafah, making some 800 persons homeless.

Medical facilities and personnel were also direct targets of Operation Journey of Colors. B'TSELEM, the Israeli human rights organization, published a report in March covering the period 28 February through 13 March 2002, documenting the IDF's assault on medical personnel and facilities: "IDF gunfire killed five Palestinian medical personnel who were on duty, wounded several members of ambulance medical teams and damaged ambulances. . . . IDF soldiers have fired at ambulances and prevented medical treatment to the sick and wounded, even leaving some of them in the field where they bled to death. Also the hospitals have been unable to function because of the damage to the electricity, water and telephone infrastructure and the blocking of access to some of them. As a result the hospitals are unable to receive the wounded and sick, or obtain food and medicines."

Bethlehem and the nearby Dheishe refugee camp were hit especially hard during this operation, and in one instance tanks shelled the CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY. The church compound also houses a hospital and an orphanage, which had to be evacuated under a barrage of bullets and artillery fire. Bethlehem University suffered severe damage when, on the night of 8–9 March, the IDF fired four TOW antitank missiles at buildings on the campus.

By the end of the second week of Journey of Colors, Israel had killed 170 Palestinians and wounded more than 1,000, and 36 Israelis were killed. Among the dead were 12 children and teenagers, 3 members of medical teams, 1 foreign journalist, and 11 members of the PNA security forces. Ha'aretz, Israel's newspaper of record, editorialized about the operation: "The IDF caused deliberate suffering and humiliation to the broader Palestinian population. . . . The government of Israel, through the IDF, sought to use humiliation as a means of pressure or punishment."

In spite of the death and destruction, it did not appear that Israel achieved its main objectives in this operation. Tactically, while it discovered some arms caches and a few weapons factories, the Palestinian militias did not appear to be incapacitated, and attacks on Israel were stronger and more deadly than before the operation.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; FIELD OF THORNS; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION RAINBOW; OPERATIONS SUMMER RAINS AND AUTUMN CLOUDS

Bibliography

- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. Devastation of Bethlehem District: An Act of Israeli Vandalism. Jerusalem: ARIJ, March 2002.
- . The Refugees of Rafah . . . the Refugee Trip Is Repeated. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem, January 2002.
- Associated Press. "Israelis Invade Gaza Refugee Camp." 12 March 2002.
- BADIL Resource Center. Israel's War on the Refugee Camps and the Palestinian People. Bethlehem: BADIL, 7 March 2002.
- Bethlehem University. "Intensified Attacks on Bethlehem University." Press release. Bethlehem: Bethlehem University, 10 March 2002.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Impeding Medical Treatment and Firing at Ambulances by IDF Soldiers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, March 2002.
- Goldenberg, Suzanne. "A Long, Hot Wait Fuels Palestinian Anger." The Guardian (London). 12 March 2002.
- . "Mass Arrests Create New Foes for Israel." The Guardian (London). 16 March 2002.
- Gush Shalom. Tulkarm Today. Jerusalem: Gush Shalom, 9 March 2002.
- Al-Haq (Law in the Service of Man). Al-Haq Calls for an End to Arbitrary Arrest and for Humane Treatment of the Detainees. Ramallah, West Bank: Al-Haq, 14 March 2002.
- Hass, Amira. "UNRWA: Israeli Raids Have Damaged 1,620 Refugee Homes." Ha'aretz. 11 March 2002.
- . "Where Have All the Young Men Gone?" Ha'aretz. 4 March 2002.
- "IDF Tank Fire Hits Bethlehem Church, Damages Virgin Mary." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 14 March 2002.
- LAW (The Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment). Another Extra-Judicial Killing in Ramallah. Jerusalem: LAW, 6 March 2002.
- . Extra-Judicial Execution in Jenin. Jerusalem: LAW, 7 March 2002.
- Levy, Gideon. "Bulldozing Rafah: A Crime against the Innocent." Ha'aretz. 17 January 2002.
- . "In the Name of Us All." Ha'aretz. 17 March 2002.
- . "Unconditional Surrender." Ha'aretz. 13 March 2002.

Palestine Media Center. Bloody Friday Forever Engraved in Collective Palestinian Memory. Ramallah, West Bank: PMC, 9 March 2002.

Palestinian Center for Human Rights. Weekly Report: On Israeli Human Rights Violations in the Occupied Territories, March 07–13. Gaza City: PCHR, 14 March 2002.

Rabbani, Mouin. "The Only Truth about Jenin Is the Israeli Cover-Up." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. May 2002.

———. Sharon's Journey of Colors. Press Information Note 85. Washington, DC: MERIP (Middle East Report and Information Project), 15 March 2002.

Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees and Physicians for Human Rights. Joint Appeal. Ramallah, West Bank: UPMRC, and Israel: PHRI, 12 March 2002.

Operation Litani, 1978

Initiated on 14 March 1978, Operation Litani was Israel's first invasion of LEBANON to suppress PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) operations there. ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF), numbering 25,000, combed the whole of southern Lebanon, occupying the entire area south of the Litani River except Tyre. The offensive's stated goals were to push Palestinian militant groups, particularly the PLO, away from the border with Israel and to bolster Israel's ally—at the time the SOUTH LEBANON ARMY (SLA). The IDF first captured a belt of land approximately ten kilometers (six miles) deep but later expanded it north to the Litani River. The Lebanese government estimated that 285,000 refugees were created as a result of the operation and that approximately 2,000 Lebanese and Palestinians were killed, almost all civilians. Several Israeli soldiers were court-martialed after a number of Lebanese peasants were strangled and prisoners were executed. Twenty Israelis were killed in the operation, and fifty Shi'a Muslims were massacred in Khiyam by Christian militiamen allied with Israel. The PLO retreated north of the Litani River but continued to fire and infiltrate across the border with Israel.

In response to the invasion, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 425 and Resolution 426 calling for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanon and creating the UN Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) to enforce this mandate and restore peace and sovereignty. On 23 March 1978, UNIFIL forces arrived in Lebanon, setting up headquarters in Naqoura. Israeli forces withdrew in the spring of 1979, turning over positions inside Lebanon along the border to the South Lebanon

Army under the leadership of Major SAAD HAD-DAD. With Israeli aid, the SLA continually harassed UNIFIL. On 19 April 1978 the SLA shelled UNIFIL headquarters, killing eight UN peacekeepers. Palestinian cross-border infiltrations did not cease.

In 1982, Israel returned to Lebanon in a major war and for eighteen years thereafter remained in occupation of South Lebanon. Not until 2000 did it withdraw its forces, but in 2006 it invaded again to destroy a new enemy, HIZBULLAH.

See also ISRAELI MILITARISM; LEBANON

Bibliography

Fisk, Robert. Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon, 4th ed. New York: Nation Books, 2002.

Randal, Jonathan C. Going All the Way: Christian Warriors, Israeli Adventurers and the War in Lebanon. New York: Viking Press, 1983.

Rokach, Livia. Israel's Sacred Terrorism: A Study Based on Moshe Sharett's Personal Diary, and Other Documents. Belmont, MA: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1980.

Schiff, Ze'ev, and Ehud Ya'ari. Israel's Lebanon War. Clearwater, FL: Touchstone, 2002.

Operation Peace for Galilee

See OPERATION BIG PINES

Operation Rainbow, 2004

On 14 May 2004, the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) initiated a military operation in the Rafah refugee camp in the southern GAZA STRIP. Israel's stated purpose was to prevent the smuggling of arms and matériel by Palestinians through tunnels, allegedly dug under houses, to or from EGYPT. The operation began shortly after Palestinian militants killed eight soldiers in Gaza, raising the suspicion that the motive was at least partly retaliation for their deaths. Israeli officials described the incursion as the largest military operation since OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD in the spring of 2002.

During the twelve-day offensive, the IDF killed fifty-eight Palestinians, including forty-one either "wanted" by Israel or deemed militants and at least eight minors. Seven Israeli soldiers were killed in the operation, which found three tunnels. Early in the operation, in its search for the tunnels, the army demolished 116 houses along the PHILADELPHI ROUTE that separates the Gaza Strip and Egypt and 183 houses in Rafah, severely damaging dozens more, plus causing extensive damage to the INFRASTRUCTURE, including electricity, WATER, and sewage systems. With explosive charges and the use of armored bulldozers, the IDF also damaged the surface of many kilometers of ROADS in Rafah, allegedly to expose and detonate explosives planted under the roads and clear the way for armored fighting vehicles and troops. The consequence for Palestinians was that no vehicles were able to drive along the roads, and, in some locations, passage on foot was also difficult.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; FIELD OF THORNS; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS; OPERATIONS SUMMER RAINS AND AUTUMN CLOUDS

Bibliography

- B'Tselem. 13–24 May 2004: Scorched Earth in Rafah: 58 Palestinians Killed and 183 Houses and Apartments Demolished. 2004. www.btselem.org/english/Special/20040525\_Rafah.asp.
- Dugard, John. Report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights: The Situation of Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories Occupied by Israel since 1967. E/CN.4/2004/6/Add.1, 27 February 2004.
- Fidh (International Organization for Human Rights). Israel and OPT: War Crimes at Rafah: Violations of International Humanitarian Law and Human Rights during Operation "Rainbow, 13–25 May 2004." Paris: Fidh, Observatory for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, 12 October 2004. www.fidh.org.
- Human Rights Watch. Razing Rafah: Mass Home Demolitions in the Gaza Strip. 2004. www.hrw.org/reports/2004/rafah1004/10.htm.
- Shnayderman, Ronen. Through No Fault of Their Own: Punitive House Demolitions during the al-Aqsa Intifada. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2004.

Operations Summer Rains and Autumn Clouds, 2006

Operation Summer Rains and Operation Autumn Clouds were Israeli offensives in the GAZA STRIP in 2006. They occurred in the context of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA and ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA (completed 12 September 2005). In addition, HAMAS'S victory in the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL elections in January 2006 led Israel to impose a blockade on the Gaza Strip, resulting in an increase in the number of QASSAM ROCKETS that Hamas fired into Israel and increasing Israeli TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS against Hamas officials.

The first operation, Summer Rains, was triggered by a 25 June 2006 Hamas raid near the Kerem Shalom border crossing of the Gaza Strip that resulted in the death of two Israeli soldiers and the capture of Gilad Shalit, an ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) corporal. The Israeli operation began on 28 June and lasted until 26 November 2006, when a cease-fire was signed and Israel withdrew its troops. Israel's stated objective for the operation was to free Corporal Shalit (who remains in captivity as of the end of 2009), avenge the death of the two soldiers, and stop the firing of rockets from Gaza into Israeli territory.

At the outset of the war, on 28 June 2006, Israel bombed the Gaza power plant and three bridges in the Strip. The destruction of the 140-megawatt generator, the only one in the Gaza Strip, threatened to create a humanitarian disaster because the plant supplies electricity to two-thirds of Gaza's 1.5 million residents and operates the pumps that provide WATER.

The day following the bombardment of the power plant, 29 June 2006, Israel arrested 100 Hamas members, including sixty-four government officials. Among them were PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) cabinet ministers and members of the Palestinian Legislative Council. Eight Hamas government members (five of whom lived in Ramallah) and up to twenty Legislative Council representatives were detained in the operation. At least a third of the Hamas cabinet were detained and held by Israel.

The IDF stated that the arrested Hamas ministers "are not bargaining chips for the return of the soldier [Cpl. Shalit captured by Hamas]—it was simply an operation against a TERRORIST organization." Israeli minister of national infrastructure Benjamin Ben-Eliezer hinted that ISMAIL HANIYEH, the Hamas prime minister of the PNA, was not immune from being arrested or attacked. The Israeli army and government officials said the arrested Hamas officials would be questioned and indicted. "Their arrests were not arbitrary," SHIN BET director Yuval Diskin stated. "Those arrested will be put to trial, and they will be able to defend themselves in accordance with a legal system which is internationally recognized." Israeli deputy prime minister SHIMON PERES repeated the statement and added that those arrested would be prosecuted for the criminal offenses of failing to prevent acts of terror and membership in a terrorist organization (which carry a maximum sentence of twenty years) and tried by military judges before an open military tribunal.

The five-month conflict resulted in the deaths of 402 Palestinians, including approximately 277 militants of various factions, mostly Hamas, six Palestinian policemen, and two presidential guards, plus 117 civilians. Additionally, some 1,500 Palestinians were injured. Five Israeli soldiers were killed, including the two in the initial Hamas cross-border attack, and one in a friendly fire incident. Six Israeli civilians were killed, and some thirty-eight wounded. Israel imposed a total blockade on the Gaza Strip for the duration of the operation and continued it thereafter.

Operation Autumn Clouds began on 1 November 2006, before the cease-fire was signed, and lasted until 8 November. It was a short but intense campaign, mainly in and around Beit Hanoun, the stated purpose of which was to “cleanse” Gaza of “terrorists” and capture central caches of weaponry, in particular destroying the Qassam rocket infrastructure, including production, transporting, and firing cells.

During the eight-day offensive, 57 Palestinians and one IDF soldier were killed. Among the Palestinian dead were eighteen members of a single family, the extended al-Athamna clan, mostly women, children, and old men. Some 260 other Palestinians were wounded. Israeli prime minister EHUD OLMERT said a “technical failure” was to blame for the strike on the al-Athamna family. The IDF interrogated thousands and incarcerated hundreds. On 8 November 2006 the IDF announced the end of Operation Autumn Clouds, but fighting continued until the 26 November truce.

Commenting on Autumn Clouds, the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz wrote, “The IDF wreaked havoc and terror in Beit Hanun and left behind hundreds of wounded, as well as destroyed houses, uprooted orchards and a water system that was brought to a standstill. Yet, the declared aim of the operation was not achieved and the firing of Qassam rockets into Israel continued. . . . No military operation which is of reasonable proportions can bring the Qassam fire to a complete halt. Instead, operations of this kind merely increase hatred and thirst for revenge among the entire Palestinian population, which is the true victim of such operations.”

The failure of both operations, despite five months of intensive combat, resides in the fact that Israel’s objectives were not so much to stop the Qassam rockets, though it would have certainly wished to do so, but Tel Aviv’s larger goal was to break the will of the Palestinians to resist the OCCUPATION and to make life so miserable for the them in Gaza that they would turn against and oust the Hamas government, replacing them with the compliant leadership of FATAH’s MAHMUD ABBAS (president of the PNA).

After the two Israeli operations, Fatah attempted to control Hamas in Gaza, leading to continuous factional fighting until in mid-June 2007, Hamas defeated Fatah and drove it from Gaza—despite the fact that Fatah was receiving aid, arms, and training from the UNITED STATES. Israel’s response to the Hamas coup was to tighten the blockade to a stranglehold—virtually no persons or goods of any kind were allowed to enter or leave Gaza, resulting in a severe humanitarian crisis. The total siege lasted eighteen months.

On 19 September 2007, Israel declared Gaza an “enemy entity.” On 11 December 2007, on the eve of a new round of peace talks, Israeli troops in some thirty tanks and armored vehicles mounted an incursion in southern Gaza, near the Sufa crossing and close to the town of Khan Yunis, killing at least six Palestinian militants. The IDF destroyed a petrol station and a second building where militants had gathered. Approximately sixty Palestinians were detained. Two Israeli soldiers were lightly injured.

The Israeli military said the operation was a routine tactic against militants, but Palestinian officials accused Israel of trying to disrupt the upcoming peace talks. Israeli and Palestinian negotiators were due to meet the following day at the KING DAVID HOTEL in JERUSALEM to start a new process of talks in the wake of the Annapolis Middle East Conference on 27 November 2007, at the United States Naval Academy in Maryland. The US-sponsored conference marked the first time a TWO-STATE SOLUTION was articulated as the mutually agreed-upon outline for addressing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Palestinian officials had already complained about an Israeli decision the previous week to issue tenders for more than 300 houses in the East Jerusalem settlement of HAR HOMA, and its declaration that Tel Aviv does not regard the ROAD MAP as applying to Jerusalem. US secretary of state CONDOLEEZZA RICE said of the Israeli announcement on Har Homa: “This is a time that we should be building confidence and this is not something that builds confidence.” The December incursion sealed the fate of further peace talks.

In January 2008, Hamas militants, frustrated over the tightened Israeli closure of Gaza, blew holes in the RAFAH CROSSING on the border with EGYPT, allowing hundreds of thousands of Palestinians to stream into Egypt unchecked for ten days and stock up on food and other goods made scarce by the blockade.

On 17 February 2008 the IDF captured approximately eighty Gazans and took them to Israel for questioning following a ground incursion in the Gaza Strip that killed four Palestinians, including three militants. One Israeli soldier was severely injured. Palestinian HEALTH CARE officials claimed an additional twenty Palestinian civilians were wounded in the attack.

New hostilities began on 27 February 2008 when Palestinian militants fired more than forty Qassam rockets into southern Israel and the Israeli army fired three missiles at the Palestinian Interior Ministry in Gaza, destroying the building. On 28 February 2008, Israeli forces killed eleven Palestinians in a series of air strikes. At least ten civilians were killed, including four boys playing football on a waste ground. Militants launched a Qassam rocket in retaliation that injured one Israeli civilian.

On 29 February 2008, Israel launched a new offensive in Gaza named “Operation Hot Winter” that lasted until 3 March 2008. At least 112 Palestinians, including sixty civilians, and three Israeli soldiers were killed. Some 250 Palestinians, including fifty-four militants and 196 civilians, and twenty-five Israeli soldiers were injured. Israeli air strikes and Palestinian rocket attacks on Israeli towns escalated. The humanitarian situation reached disaster proportions.

The Palestinian president, Mahmud Abbas, accused Israel of “international terrorism,” saying this most recent assault on Gaza constitutes “more than a HOLOCAUST.” On 3 March Abbas suspended all contact with Israel as the Israeli government sent warplanes to hit more targets and vowed to continue its offensive. The EUROPEAN UNION condemned what it called “disproportionate use of force” by the Israeli military. The EU also demanded an immediate end to Palestinian militant rocket attacks on Israel and urged Israel to halt activities that endanger civilians, saying they were “in violation of INTERNATIONAL LAW.” UNITED NATIONS secretary-general Ban Ki-moon issued a condemnation of what he termed Israel’s “excessive and disproportionate” response, and called on Israel “to cease such attacks,” while denouncing the ongoing rocket attacks on Sderot and Ashkelon. The UN Human Rights Council expressed “shock at the bombardment of civilian homes in Gaza.” The IDF operation exacerbated the precarious humanitarian situation emanating from the near-total blockade on Gaza. There was a lack of electricity, fuel, and spare parts, leading to an inability to upgrade networks. Food, medicine, water, and cash money were in short supply.

In April 2008, through the offices of former US president JIMMY CARTER, Hamas delivered a letter from captured Israeli soldier Corporal Shalit to his family, signaling a reaffirmation of Palestinian interest in reaching a cease-fire. It was suggested by Gaza activists that Israel could release women and child PRISONERS it is holding as a reciprocal goodwill gesture. Israel declined. Also in April, Hamas leaders gave interviews and made statements articulating their goals: a peace process with Israel based on Israeli withdrawal to the BORDERS of 1967, a dismantling of all the WEST BANK SETTLEMENTS, removal of all soldiers from Gaza and the West Bank, repudiation of Israel’s “illegal annexation of Jerusalem,” release of all Palestinian prisoners, and an end to Israel’s blockade of “our international borders, our coastline and our airspace permanently.” While Hamas has never said explicitly that it will recognize Israel’s “right to exist,” statements by Hamas leaders Mahmoud Zahar and KHALID MESHAL signaled that it was ready to accept the fact that Israel does exist. Political analysts have pointed out that Zahar and Meshal’s statements generally match the final-status arrangement that most observers see as reasonable and inevitable. Israel did not respond to the Hamas overtures, but the Israeli daily Ha’aretz, in an editorial, called for negotiating with Hamas leaders, saying “the only way to ensure the safety of the people living near the Gaza border is through a political effort to reach a cease-fire agreement.”

On 28 April 2008, Israel again began ground and air operations in Gaza. In less than a week the IDF’s offensive killed more than 100 Palestinians including twenty-three militants and seventy-seven civilians. Palestinians fired 150 rockets at Israel during the week, which killed three Israelis, including two soldiers and a civilian. On 19 June 2008, Israel and Hamas agreed to an Egyptian-brokered six-month truce to last until 19 December.

For most of the cease-fire relative quiet prevailed and life returned to near normal for the Israeli residents of Sderot and environs, though not for Gazans who remained under blockade. Israel, however, broke the cease-fire with Hamas on 4 November 2008, entering Gaza, killing six people, and capturing six others. Israeli officials claimed that the offensive was in response to specific intelligence, so they had not technically broken the cease-fire. Nevertheless, this Israeli breach sparked a new round of dangerous, if controlled, violence.

On 14 November Hamas retaliated by firing a barrage of rockets into southern Israel, resulting in eighteen mild injuries. On 19 December 2008, subsequent to further clashes, Hamas called off the six-month truce altogether.

Shortly after the 4 November 2008 incursion, Israel tightened the blockade and hermetically sealed all the crossings into the Gaza Strip, which meant even less access to fuel, major blackouts, and no access to humanitarian aid, including food and medicine. On 12 November fourteen journalists were barred from entering Gaza via the ERETZ CROSSING CHECKPOINT. Israel banned the United Nations from bringing food into Gaza and from importing educational materials for blind students.

On 27 December 2008, Israel unleashed the twenty-two-day massive military OPERATION CAST LEAD, during which 1,387 Palestinians and nine Israelis were killed.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; FIELD OF THORNS; FINAL-STATUS TALKS; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS; OPERATION RAINBOW

Bibliography

Abunimah, Ali. "Palestine amidst a Region in Flux: Signs of Accommodation and Fears of War." Palestine Center Information Brief No. 163. 17 June 2008.

Almehgari, Rami. "UNRWA to Stop Providing Services to Gaza as Border Crossings Remain Closed." International Middle East Media Center. 26 December 2008.

Associated Press. "Israel to Allow Limited Amount of Fuel and Aid into Gaza on Thursday." Ha'aretz. 12 November 2008.

———. UNRWA Chief: Blockade on Gaza Is Fueling Support for Extremists." Ha'aretz. 8 November 2007.

BBC. "Interview: Stephen Sackur Talks to Isaac Herzog Following a Recent Israeli-Palestinian Ceasefire in Gaza." 4 December 2006.

Beaumont, Peter. "Israeli Blockade 'Forces Palestinians to Search Rubbish Dumps for Food': UN Fears Irreversible Damage Is Being Done in Gaza as New Statistics Reveal the Level of Deprivation." The Observer (UK). 21 December 2008.

Blau, Uri. "GOC Southern Command: IDF Will Send Gaza Back Decades." Ha'aretz. 28 December 2008.

Boudreaux, Richard, and Rushdi abu Alouf. "Israeli Blockade Leaves Much of Gaza City in the Dark." Palestinian-Israeli Journal of Politics, Economics and Culture. 13 November 2008.

Brannon, Josh. "Kassams Hit Ashkelon after IDF Leaves Beit Hanun. Operation Autumn Clouds Ends with 59 Gunmen Killed." The Jerusalem Post. 8 November 2006.

Dreyfus, Philip. "Violence Escalates in Gaza, Israel Might Launch Invasion." eNews2.0. 1 March 2008.

Economist, The. "Egypt and Gaza: Can Nothing Be Done?" Editorial. 18 December 2008.

Electronic Intifada. "UNRWA Emergency Appeal 2007. Gaza City (Gaza Strip)." 18 December 2006. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.

Gazzar, Brenda. "UNRWA: Escalation Is a 'Recipe for Disaster' in Gaza." Jerusalem Post. 23 December 2008.

Greenberg, Hanan, and Ali Waked. "Operation Completed: IDF Leaves Beit Hanoun." YNetnews.com. 7 November 2006.

Guardian. "Israel Seizes Palestinian Areas in Gaza Strip." The Guardian (London). 17 April 2001.

Ha'aretz. "Ban Ki-moon, UN Warns of Humanitarian Crisis as Israel Seals Gaza Crossings." Ha'aretz. 19 January 2008.

———. "A Cease-Fire in Gaza." Ha'aretz. 9 November 2006.

———. "Expecting IDF Offensive in Gaza, Egypt Boosts Border Security." 26 December 2008.

———. "Gazans Breach Egyptian Border: Israel Bombs 40 Smuggling Tunnels." Ha'aretz. 28 December 2008.

———. "Restraint beside Nothing." Editorial. Ha'aretz. 12 December 2008.

———. "School Year off to a Shaky Start in Gaza, as Teachers Protest Hamas Control." Ha'aretz. 24 August 2008.

———. "UN: Israel Has Given Us Enough Fuel for 20 More Days of Gaza Aid." Ha'aretz. 5 May 2008.

Harel, Amos. "At Least 29 Gaza Civilians, Including 5 Children, among Dead." Ha'aretz. 2 March 2008.

———. "IAF Strike on Gaza Is Israel's Version of 'Shock and Awe.'" Ha'aretz. 27 December 2008.

Harel, Amos, and Yuval Azoulay. "Gaza Power Plant Shuts Down Due to Fuel Blockade." Ha'aretz. 20 January 2008.

Harel, Amos, and Avi Issacharoff. "Analysis: When It Comes to Gaza, Israel Must Choose between Bad and Worse Options." Ha'aretz. 12 December 2008.

Harel, Amos, Avi Issacharoff, Yuval Azoulay, and Mijal Grinberg. "10 Palestinians Killed, 4 Troops Hurt in Ongoing Gaza Offensive." Ha'aretz. 18 April 2008.

- Hass, Amira. "Is Israel Deliberately Strengthening Hamas?" Ha'aretz. 17 November 2008.
- . "'Little Baghdad' in Gaza—Bombs, Fear and Rage." Ha'aretz. 28 December 2008.
- Hedges, Chris. "Israel's 'Crime against Humanity.'" Tikkun. 17 December 2008. http://www.truthdig.com/report/item/20081215\_israels\_crime\_against\_humanity/.
- Hobbs, Jeremy. "Aid Agencies Warn of Humanitarian Catastrophe If Gaza Is Attacked." Joint Media Release, Oxfam, Diakonia, CARE International, Medico International. 27 December 2008.
- Human Rights Watch. "Hamas Must Cease Use of Qassam Rockets against Israeli Civilians." 8 June 2005.
- Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "Behind the Headlines: Arrest of Hamas Leaders." 29 June 2006.
- Issacharoff, Avi, Amos Harel, Mijal Grinberg, and Yuval Azoulay. "2 IDF Soldiers, 61 Palestinians Die in Gaza Clashes." Ha'aretz. 2 March 2008.
- Jerusalem Post. "UNRWA Suspends Gaza Food Distribution." The Jerusalem Post. 18 December 2008.
- Kongsgaard, Haavard Wahl. "Hamas Military Strength Security Review. April 2008. www.security-review.net.
- Levy, Daniel. "A Short Path, from Gaza to Somalia." Ha'aretz. 19 December 2008.
- Ma'an News Agency. "Israeli air Strikes Continue on Gaza; 228 Palestinians Dead, 700 Injured." Ma'an News Agency. 27 December 2008. <http://www.maannews.net/en/index.php?opr=ShowDetails&ID=34246>.
- McCarthy, Rory. "Six Dead as Israeli Tanks Enter Gaza." The Guardian (London). 11 December 2007.
- al-Mughrabi, Nidal. "Israel Opens Gaza Crossings." The Independent (UK). 26 December 2008.
- Ravid, Barak. "Palestinians: At Least 155 Dead, over 200 Hurt in IAF Gaza Strikes." Ha'aretz. 27 December 2008.
- Reuters. "U.N. Agency Says Suspends Gaza Food Distribution." International Herald Tribune. 18 December 2008.
- . "UN Asks Israel to Probe Raid Which Killed Gaza Teacher Last Week." Ha'aretz. 11 May 2008.
- . "UNRWA Chief: Gaza on Brink of Humanitarian Catastrophe." Ha'aretz. 21 November 2008.
- Rose, David. "The Gaza Bombshell." Vanity Fair. April 2008. <http://www.vanityfair.com/politics/features/2008/04/gaza200804>.
- Roy, Sara. "The Best Way to Weaken the Rejectionists of Hamas Is to Restore the Palestinians' Belief in Diplomacy." London Review of Books. 1 January 2009.
- Schrank, Peter. "Egypt and Gaza: Egypt's Government Takes the Heat as the Gazans' Lot Gets Even Worse: Can Nothing Be Done?" The Economist. 18 December 2008.
- Serapioni, Martino. The Gaza Strip Crisis: The Economic Impact of Israel's Siege on Gaza. Ramallah: Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group, December 2008.
- United Nations Department of Political Affairs. "UN Official: Gaza Medical System in 'Pathetic State.'" Ha'aretz. 7 April 2008.
- . "UNRWA: New Israeli Restrictions Curtailing Aid to Palestinians." Ha'aretz. 19 November 2007.
- United Nations General Assembly, Human Rights Council. Fifth Session (Distr. General A/HRC/5/11). Implementation of General Assembly Resolution 60/251 of 15 March 2006. Report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Palestinian territories occupied since 1967. 8 June 2007.
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. Assessment of the Future Humanitarian Risks in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, April 2006.
- . Gaza Humanitarian Situation Report: The Impact of the Blockade on the Gaza Strip, A Human Dignity Crisis. 15 December 2008. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, December 2008.
- . Gaza Humanitarian Situation Report: The Impact of the Blockade on the Gaza Strip. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, December 2008.
- . Palestinian Death Toll Reaches 202 as "Operation Summer Rains" Extends into Its Tenth Week. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, August 2006.
- . Situation Report: Escalation in Conflict in the Gaza Strip. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, June 2006.
- . Situation Report: Gaza Strip—27 July 2006. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, August 2006.
- United Nations Relief and Works Agency. Gaza: Siege Report for the Past 20 Days. Gaza City (Gaza Strip). 24 November 2008.
- . "Gaza Violence—"Horroric." YNetnews.com. 3 February 2008. www.ynet.co.il.
- . "Report: Gaza Appeal Making Very Slow Progress." Electronic Intifada. 12 February 2008. www.electronicintifada.net.
- . "UNRWA Chief: Blockade on Gaza Is Fueling Support for Extremists." Ha'aretz. 8 November 2007.
- . UNRWA Gaza Field Assessment of Israeli Army Operations in Gaza. Gaza City (Gaza Strip). 23 October 2004.
- Witte, Griff. "Israel Poised for Long Fight: Palestinian Deaths Near 300: Hamas Calls for Suicide Strikes." The Washington Post. 29 December 2008.

Oriental Jews

See MIZRAHI

Orient House

Orient House is a JERUSALEM mansion that has belonged to the prominent AL-HUSAYNI FAMILY since it was built in 1897 by MUSA AL-HUSAYNI. Historically, the building was the site of many diplomatic functions, including two notable ones: an 1898 reception held in honor of the German emperor, Kaiser Wilhelm, when he visited Jerusalem; and, in 1936–1937, a haven for Emperor Haile Selassie and Empress Minan of Abyssinia and their court when the Italians invaded Ethiopia and forced them into exile.

In contemporary times, with its large library and many conference and reception rooms, Orient House has served as the national gathering place for Palestinians in Occupied East Jerusalem and was the political headquarters for the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION in the city. In 1988, after several attempts to close off the services provided by the Orient House, Israel broke into the building and closed down the establishment for “security reasons.”

On 26 October 1992, Israel permitted Orient House to reopen, and it played a vital role in the initiation of the OSLO PROCESS (1993–2000). During this period, the Orient House regained its diplomatic status in Jerusalem and once again became the official Palestinian political address in Jerusalem. Yet despite the peace process, the Israeli government continued to undermine the initiatives of the Orient House as part of its efforts to physically isolate Jerusalem from the WEST BANK and deny the Palestinians political rights in the city. For example, it placed enormous pressure on all foreign governments not to meet with Palestinian officials in East Jerusalem, especially not at Orient House.

On 10 August 2001, Israeli authorities again occupied and closed the Orient House. The Israeli army and police confiscated all the computer equipment, files, data, and confidential information regarding issues in Jerusalem, which were intended for use in negotiations with the Israeli government. This was one of many Israeli “statements” declaring that Jerusalem would remain unified and Jewish.

See also FAYSAL AL-HUSAYNI; JERUSALEM; OSLO PROCESS

Oslo Accords: Documents

The following is a list of the documents that make up the Oslo Accords between Israel and the Palestinians. (See OSLO PROCESS for description and analysis of the agreements.)

1. Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements, 13 September 1993.
See DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES; OSLO PROCESS
2. Israel-PLO Partial Agreements on Implementation of Declaration of Principles, Cairo, 9 February 1994.
See GAZA-JERICO AGREEMENT I; OSLO PROCESS
3. Israel-PLO Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area, Cairo, 4 May 1994, with five annexes, including Annex I, Protocol Concerning Withdrawal of Israeli Military Forces and Security Arrangements; Annex II, Protocol Concerning Civil Affairs; Annex III, Protocol Concerning Legal Matters; Annex IV, Protocol on Economic Relations; and Annex V, Protocol Concerning Confidence Building Measures. Also known as the Cairo Agreement.
See ECONOMIC PROTOCOL; GAZA-JERICO AGREEMENT II; OSLO PROCESS
4. Israel-PLO Protocol on Economic Relations, Paris, 29 April 1994, which is Annex IV to the 4 May 1994 Gaza-Jericho Accord.
See ECONOMY, PALESTINIAN; GAZA-JERICO AGREEMENT II; OSLO PROCESS
5. Israel and the PLO, Agreement on Preparatory Transfer of Powers and Responsibilities, Erez Checkpoint, Gaza, 29 August 1994.
See EARLY EMPOWERMENT; OSLO PROCESS
6. Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Washington, 28 September 1995.
See INTERIM AGREEMENT; OSLO PROCESS
7. Sharm al-Shaykh Declaration, Sharm al-Shaykh, Egypt, 13 March 1996. (This was a US-sponsored summit on terrorism in the wake of several suicide bombings in Israel.)
See OSLO PROCESS; SHARM AL-SHAYKH DECLARATION; SUICIDE BOMBINGS; TERRORISM
8. Israel and the PLO Joint Communiqué on the Permanent Status Negotiations, Taba, Egypt, 5–6 May 1996. (In the first session of permanent status negotiations, little progress was made on substance but there was agreement that the negotiations on final status between them would be conducted on the basis of Article V of the Declaration of Principles.)
See OSLO PROCESS
9. Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, Protocol Concerning the Redeployment in Hebron (Agreed Version), Eretz Crossing, Gaza, 15 January 1997.

See HEBRON PROTOCOL; OSLO PROCESS

10. Israel and the Palestinian Authority Memorandum on Security Understanding, 17 December 1997. (In December 1997 the United States drafted a memorandum of understanding on principles to govern Palestinian National Authority [PNA] performance on security and counterterrorism, which was incorporated into the Wye Memorandum, signed by Israel and the PNA on 23 October 1998. The memorandum, a result of nine days of high-level US-sponsored negotiations, included Israeli and PNA commitments to “take all measures necessary in order to prevent acts of terrorism, crime, and hostilities.” PNA implementation of the security aspects of the memorandum was to be supervised by US Central Intelligence Agency officials.
See CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY; OSLO PROCESS; TERRORISM; UNITED STATES; WILLIAM CLINTON
11. Wye River Memorandum, Washington, D.C., 23 October 1998.
See OSLO PROCESS; WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM
12. Israel and the PLO, Sharm al-Shaykh Memorandum on Implementation of Outstanding Commitments of Agreements Signed and the Resumption of Permanent Status Negotiations, Sharm al-Shaykh, Egypt, 4 September 1999 (also known as Wye II).
See OSLO PROCESS; SHARM AL-SHAYKH MEMORANDUM
13. Camp David Summit, July 2000.
See BARAK’S GENEROUS OFFER; CAMP DAVID SUMMIT, 2000; OSLO PROCESS
14. The Clinton Parameters, 23 December 2000
See WILLIAM CLINTON
15. Taba Summit, 27 January 2001.
See OSLO PROCESS; TABA

Oslo II

See INTERIM AGREEMENT

Oslo Process

The announcement of an Israeli-Palestinian agreement signed in Oslo, Norway, toward the end of August 1993 was received all over the world as a historic moment, the beginning of a new era in the Middle East. And, indeed, for the first time after decades of confrontation and conflict, both parties had recognized “their mutual legitimate and political rights” and committed themselves “to live in peaceful coexistence and mutual dignity . . . [and] to achieve a just, lasting and comprehensive peace settlement and historic reconciliation.”

For the first time in the history of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the two sides agreed to meet and formulate agreements that would end the conflict. The DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP), the first step in what became known as the OSLO ACCORDS, was followed by thirteen more agreements over an eight-year period that ended in 2001 with the TABA TALKS. Yet, although Oslo was connected to real political events and deep social changes that made it possible, in the end the Oslo Accords failed to lead to a lasting peace. Was its failure inevitable? Was the DOP a genuine opening for peace, or was it no more than a maneuver by Israel to neutralize the Palestinian movement’s quest for freedom and independence? An attempt to answer these questions must situate Oslo (as the talks came to be abbreviated) in the global context in which it was born and analyze the motivations that brought both the Israeli and the Palestinian leadership to sign the DOP in September 1993.

From the First Intifada to the Madrid Conference

After twenty years of OCCUPATION, in December 1987 the Palestinian population in the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP revolted against Israeli rule. During the previous two decades, Palestinians had engaged in many actions of resistance—civilian as well as military, and local as well as regional. Israeli Occupation forces, however, had been able to keep this resistance under control and at a relatively small cost—both for Israel and for the Palestinian population. These were the years of the “benign Occupation,” as some Israelis described it.

The core of the Palestinian resistance prior to 1987 was the ARMED STRUGGLE, which was organized and often launched from the Palestinian refugee camps in the neighboring Arab countries, but which was ineffectual in challenging the Israeli Occupation. In the eyes of the Israeli political class as well as in public opinion generally, the future of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES would eventually be decided by negotiations with JORDAN. Although Israel would not agree to a Palestinian state, it might return a part of the West Bank to Jordan, which had occupied it from 1948 through 1967. In fact, until 1987, no one in Israel—except a very small anti-Occupation minority—seriously foresaw a qualitative change in this “provisory Occupation.” Israel referred to the military rule of the Occupied Territories as a CIVIL ADMINISTRATION, as it unsuccessfully sought local leaders—that is, COLLABORATORS—who would help Israel to control the Palestinian population. In a short time this approach, with its VILLAGE LEAGUES and civil administrators, collapsed in the face of huge mass nationalist demonstrations and successful general strikes against the Occupation: this general upsurge eventually took the name of INTIFADA in 1987. As Palestinian strikes, demonstrations, and protests increased, the relatively small number of Israeli military units serving in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank had to be replaced by huge numbers of soldiers, especially reserve units that were obliged to confront, more and more brutally, daily acts of mass resistance.

Thus for many Israelis, the Occupation became a problem that required a solution, yet Israeli society was deeply divided about the remedy—ranging from mass expulsion of Palestinians (TRANSFER), advocated by the far right, to total withdrawal from the Occupied Territories, supported by the far left. The mainstream ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT rapidly evolved toward the belief that the Occupation must be ended as soon as possible and through peace negotiations with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), which only a few years earlier it considered a terrorist organization. Gradually, important segments of Israeli public opinion accepted the inevitability of negotiations with the PLO, with the aim of ending the Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza and the creation of a Palestinian state in these territories. But the government and the majority in the Israeli parliament continued to hold a rejectionist position.

While the Intifada was still alive, IRAQ invaded KUWAIT, and the GULF WAR began (1991). For the GEORGE H. W. BUSH administration, the war against Iraq was waged not only to force Iraq president Saddam Husayn to withdraw from Kuwait but also to establish the groundwork for a “new Middle East,” one more directly under US control. After the collapse of the SOVIET UNION, most of the Arab states were ready to accept US hegemony in the Middle East, which they demonstrated through various forms of participation in the war. The importance of this new alliance had implications for US-Israel relations, as was illustrated in the strong veto imposed by the Bush administration on any Israeli involvement in the war, even after Israel was attacked by Iraqi Scud missiles. Moreover, part of the new US-Arab partnership and the new Middle East project was the promise of a settlement of the Palestinian question.

Immediately after the war on Iraq, the US administration called for a multilateral peace conference to be held in Madrid, Spain, where Israel, led at that time by one of its most rejectionist prime ministers, YITZHAK SHAMIR, was forced to take part. Israel objected to any Palestinian presence but finally agreed that Palestinian leaders from the Occupied Territories (but not from the PLO, JERUSALEM, or the DIASPORA) could be integrated into a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. Although the PLO was formally excluded from the MADRID CONFERENCE (30 October 1991), the US administration was obliged to accept that the Palestinian delegation would coordinate all its decisions with the PLO leadership in TUNIS.

Despite Israeli attempts to neutralize the Palestinian presence at the Madrid Conference and to minimize its importance, the Palestinian delegation not only had the same status as the other delegations, including displaying the forbidden Palestinian FLAG and the right to its own opening speech, but, in fact, became the focus of the conference. These achievements were in part the result of tough negotiations directed from PLO headquarters in Tunisia, but also from the political and intellectual skills of the Palestinian delegates, advisers, and observers, including HAYDAR ‘ABD ‘AL-SHAFI, HANAN ASHRAWI, and SAEB EREKAT, among others. FAYSAL AL-HUSAYNI headed an “advisory delegation” that acted as a liaison between the PLO and the Palestinian delegation.

The Madrid Conference was basically a formal opening of thematic multilateral negotiations that were subsequently held in other places in the world. MOSCOW held five separate forums, on WATER resources, ENVIRONMENTAL DEGRADATION, arms control, REFUGEES, and economic development. Other participating cities were Brussels and Rome (regional economic cooperation); the Hague and Tokyo (environment); Washington, Vienna, and Geneva (water resources); Washington and Moscow (arms control); and Ottawa and Oslo (refugees). Washington, D.C., was chosen as the city where the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations would be conducted. These negotiations lasted for two years without any result on the many topics that were on the agenda. Shamir put Yossi Ben Aharon, former general director of Shamir's office and an ultra-rightist, at the head of the delegation to make sure that no compromise would be formulated that could lead to a freeze of Jewish SETTLEMENT activity or to a change in the direct rule and control by Israel of the Occupied Territories. At the same time, the Palestinian delegation put the issue of settlements and the necessity of freezing all settlement activity at the core of their demands. The negotiations were interrupted several times for long periods, during which Shamir was defeated in the elections and YITZHAK RABIN was elected prime minister. For Rabin the first priority was a political agreement with SYRIA, not the Palestinians, and the UNITED STATES tended to agree with him. But Rabin's relative indifference to an agreement with the Palestinians was not shared by important segments of the Israeli elite, especially in the LABOR PARTY. In particular, SHIMON PERES, number two in the Labor Party, was convinced that normalization with neighboring Arab countries was a strategic interest for Israel but that it could only materialize if a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was achieved.

Declaration of Principles

A series of unofficial meetings between left-leaning senior officials in the Labor Party and senior Palestinian officials, both from within and outside the Occupied Territories, convinced Peres that any attempt to reach a political agreement without the PLO was doomed to failure: the entire Palestinian society in the Occupied Territories, as well as in the Diaspora, considered the PLO as its only legitimate representative and leader. Peres's viewpoint led to the opening of the informal, secret talks conducted in Oslo in 1993, under the auspices of the Norwegian government, between Peres's representatives and PLO officials. The talks represented a major turning point in Israel's perspective toward the Palestinians, because they ended Israel's rejection of the PLO, recognized the legitimacy of the Palestinian national liberation movement, and opened negotiations with senior PLO officials.

PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT's position had become extremely difficult following his public support for Iraq in the Gulf crisis, for which he was punished by the withdrawal of financial support from SAUDI ARABIA and several Gulf countries. Thus, recognition of the PLO by Israel was a priority for which he was ready to pay with substantial concessions, which was well understood by "Peres's boys" (a name given by the Israeli MEDIA to Peres's assistants and followers), in particular, YOSSIE BEILIN, who was the driving force behind the Oslo negotiations. It was Beilin who convinced Israelis that recognition of the PLO would make possible what the Israeli leadership considered the necessary Palestinian compromises for reaching a settlement. In May 1993, the secret talks began, and less than five months later they were concluded by a Declaration of Principles to be ratified by the Israeli government and the PLO central leadership. The Israeli negotiators were Foreign Ministry general director Uri Savir and two Israeli academics, Ron Pundak and Yair Hirshfeld, while the Palestinian side was led by AHMAD QUREI' (Abu 'Ala). On 13 September 1993, at the White House, Rabin and Arafat publicly ratified the DOP.

A very short document (seventeen articles, each three to nine lines), the DOP marked the "mutual recognition" of the state of Israel and the PLO and set a timetable to negotiate a final solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. It provided a framework for gradual Palestinian self-government (which Israel later renamed "autonomy") for residents of the West Bank and Gaza, based on a gradual redeployment of Israeli forces from these areas, starting with Gaza and JERICHO. The major issues of the conflict—sovereignty, BORDERS, settlements, the status of Jerusalem, and the issue of the Palestinian refugees—were to be negotiated as "early as possible, but not later than the beginning of the third year of the transitional period," that is, May 1996.

Instead of an agreement on the issue of Palestinian refugees from the 1967 WAR, the DOP "invited" the governments of EGYPT and Jordan to set up, with Israel and the Palestinians, a committee that would decide on the methods for admitting the "persons displaced from the West Bank and Gaza Strip in 1967, together with necessary measures to prevent disruption and disorder" (Article XII). A solution to the status of refugees from 1948 was deferred until FINAL STATUS TALKS.

Immediately after signing the DOP, the two parties were supposed to begin negotiations on the Israeli redeployment parallel to the establishment of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) for self-government of the West Bank and Gaza and on the ECONOMY aspects of the new situation. The PNA, or "elected Council for the Palestinian people in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip," was to last “for a transitional period not exceeding five years, leading to a permanent settlement based on [UN] SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338,” which called for Israel’s withdrawal from the Palestinian territories.

The Oslo Declaration of Principles (DOP) was a framework for the future relations between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). It was not a peace treaty between the two parties; rather, it established a negotiating process without a defined outcome. Negotiations were to take place over a five-year interim period during which Israel was to withdraw from “Gaza and Jericho first,” and then from unspecified parts of the West Bank. Interim self-government was to be granted by Israel in phases. In exchange, the PLO recognized Israel’s “right to exist” and pledged to cooperate in suppressing TERRORISM. The Palestinian Authority was to establish a strong police force to protect Israel’s security while Israel would continue to hold responsibility for defending against external threats.

The DOP provided for the creation of a Palestinian Authority with limited powers and a limited geographical area in which to exercise such powers. All of the major issues of the conflict—Jerusalem, refugees, settlements, security, and borders—were deferred for “final status” talks. The DOP was not grounded in any aspect of INTERNATIONAL LAW or human rights, nor was it based on any UN resolutions, such as UN RESOLUTIONS 181 (on partition) or 194 (on compensation and repatriation of refugees). It acknowledged Resolutions 242 and 338 (the end of the 1967 WAR), but Israel has maintained since its withdrawal from Sinai and peace with Egypt that it has met all obligations under Resolution 242 and will make no further concessions in terms of giving up land. The United States was the de facto arbitrator of any disputes that might emerge.

Together with the DOP, the two parties signed “Letters of Mutual Recognition”—the Israeli government recognized the PLO as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people while the PLO recognized the right of the state of Israel to exist and renounced terrorism.

The announcement of the Israeli-Palestinian agreement was widely understood as the beginning of the end of a century-old conflict. And, for a majority of both peoples, the joy was visible and real, though on the Palestinian side the lack of a clear Israeli commitment to a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza was obvious and worrisome. In the Occupied Territories, including East Jerusalem, the Palestinian flag appeared everywhere; in Tel Aviv, people were dancing in the streets, though to a lesser extent in Ramallah and in Gaza, and at several CHECKPOINTS there were even scenes of fraternization between the two sides, usually at the initiative of young Palestinians.

The Israeli joy was easily understandable. In exchange for recognition by the Israeli government, the Palestinian leadership announced a unilateral cease-fire. Through a letter from Arafat, on behalf of the PLO, to Rabin, Arafat “renounced the use of terrorism and other acts of violence” and announced again “that those articles of the PLO Covenant that denied Israel’s right to exist are now inoperative and no longer valid.” Although not part of the Oslo agreement, the letter was a precondition imposed on the PLO chairman by the Israeli prime minister as a prerequisite for Tel Aviv’s ratification of the DOP. The Palestinian leadership, however, was so happy about its recognition by Israel and so sure that the end of the Israeli Occupation of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank was almost achieved that it did not give much thought to Rabin’s new demand, which was the first step in a unilateral reshaping of the whole Oslo agreement.

Opposition to the DOP in both societies came from the extreme ideological sides. On the one hand, the Palestinian left (mainly the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE and DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE) and HAMAS, but also the refugee communities inside the Occupied Territories as well as abroad, denounced the lack of commitment by Israel to an independent Palestinian state and the likely abrogation of the refugees’ right of return. On the other hand, the Israeli right, in particular the settlers, considered the Oslo Accords as selling out the God-given right of the Jewish people to historic Palestine as well as surrendering to terrorism. However, the massive international support for the bilateral agreement and the conviction that an irreversible process was in motion marginalized these opposition groups for nearly half a year.

Cairo Agreement and the Withdrawal from Gaza and Jericho

Shortly after the signing of the DOP, negotiations began between Israeli and PLO representatives on implementation of the INTERIM AGREEMENT, in particular the withdrawal of the Israeli army and administration from Gaza and Jericho. The talks took place in Cairo, and the agreement is officially known as “Israel-PLO Partial Agreements on Implementation of Declaration of Principles, Cairo 9 February 1994.” Sometimes referred to as “GAZA-JERICHO [AGREEMENT] I,” it was succeeded by the GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT II.

Unlike the DOP, which was negotiated and drafted by politicians who had an overall objective of normalization with the Arab world and therefore, necessarily, with the Palestinians, the Cairo agreement was negotiated by senior ISRAELI DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) officers who, like Rabin himself, were far from convinced that peaceful coexistence between Israel and the Palestinians was possible. They thus reduced the DOP to a kind of security arrangement wherein the PLO’s main function was guaranteeing Israel’s security in the Occupied Territories but in a context in which the IDF would maintain overall responsibility for that security. As Rabin explained in the Knesset before signing the DOP in Washington, the only difference the DOP would make is that now the Palestinians would be the ones keeping law and order in Gaza and Jericho without the limitations “of the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT and B’TSELEM,” the human rights organization.

Gaza-Jericho Agreement II, which was signed on 4 May 1994, was a portent in terms of both substance and process of the way the Israeli government intended to negotiate the implementation of the Oslo Accords. It was more a unilateral diktat than an agreement, and the few objections the Palestinians tried to make to the Israeli demands were met with brutal pressure by Egyptian president HOSNI MUBARAK on Arafat. Even on the day of the signing, when Israel presented Arafat with a series of maps to sign, the nature of which Arafat had serious disagreements about, Mubarak intervened to insist that the Palestinian leader sign whether or not he agreed.

In the DOP, it was agreed that the final status of the Jewish settlements would be negotiated later, but nothing was said about their status during the interim. In the Cairo Agreement, however, Israel imposed a clause that stated that the “zones of the settlements” would be excluded from the Palestinian self-ruled areas. As a result, almost immediately the pace of new settlement construction accelerated rapidly and set a precedent for unparalleled settlement expansion throughout the Oslo years. While it is difficult to know if Rabin, under pressure from the settlers’ movement, felt forced to make a compromise, what is certain is that the Cairo accord established a pattern and made the Cairo model a guideline in the following years, reducing quantitatively and qualitatively the reality or possibility of Palestinian self-rule in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. First, the Cairo agreement determined the scope and the modalities of the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and Jericho, excluding the areas of Jewish settlement—in particular, the Katif bloc, which constituted more than a quarter of the Gaza Strip—and reducing the withdrawal, in the Jericho District, to the city of Jericho and the village of Ujja, far less than what was initially envisioned in the DOP. Moreover, under pressure from the settlers and in order to allow Israelis to cross the Palestinian area, the main street of Jericho and the road between Jericho and Ujja were put under “joint” Israeli-Palestinian control, rather than complete Palestinian control as promised in the DOP. The Jericho “joint patrol” would later serve as a negative precedent for other Palestinian self-administered cities, because it assumed full freedom of movement for Israelis everywhere in the Occupied Territories, while the Palestinians were denied this right not only on Israeli territory but also in the Occupied Territories themselves.

At the time of Israel’s redeployment from Gaza and Jericho, the high expectations that followed the DOP had already begun to disappear. Palestinians were deeply disappointed in the negotiating procedures, which became more a series of diktats than bona fide negotiations. They were dismayed at Israel’s lack of good faith, its unilateral decisions, and above all its rapid reversion to colonist behavior, not only toward the Occupied population but also toward the negotiations. For example, immediately after Rabin signed the DOP, with its specific timetable for future negotiations, he announced that “there are no holy dates” and postponed negotiations for the Cairo agreement. Later, Israel postponed the date of the elections for the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL as it carried out the first stage of the redeployment. At the same time, Rabin attempted to reassure the Israeli opposition by falsely claiming that the DOP provided Israel a number of guarantees, for example, that the Palestinian refugees would not return to Israel and that the only commitment made by Israel was “to discuss the issue in a joint committee.”

On 29 April 1994 a protocol on economic relations was signed in Paris and, from August to December 1994, three additional agreements were reached concerning the transfer of civil powers (EDUCATION, welfare, HEALTH CARE, tourism, and taxation) to the PNA. In the meantime, PLO chairman Arafat was permitted to return to Palestine in July 1994, together with tens of thousands of PLO officials and soldiers with their families, and this gave a new impetus and sense of permanency to the process.

On 28 September 1995 the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip was signed in Washington, D.C., which marked the conclusion of the first stage in negotiations between Israel and the PLO. Its main objective, as required in the DOP, was to enlarge the area of Palestinian self-government in the West Bank and was to be followed by further redeployments of the Israeli army, leading to a full redeployment with the exception of “strategic locations.” The agreement was based on the division of the West Bank into three zones: Area A—the cities, with the exception of HEBRON, where the PNA had administrative autonomy and security control; Area B—most of the villages and their immediate surroundings, where the Palestinians had administrative authority but both Israelis and Palestinians had responsibility for security (although in reality it remained an Israeli-only function); and Area C (the remaining West Bank, about 70 percent)—where the Israeli military and civil administration would keep full control. This meant in practical terms that Israel had full control over 70 percent of the West Bank (Area C), while the PNA exercised limited autonomy over only 3 percent (Area A). In consequence, Israeli public opinion saw Area C as Israeli or, in the best case, an area in dispute and not Occupied Palestinian territory.

In January 1996, just after the beginning of the implementation of the Interim Agreement and the redeployment of the Israeli army from the Palestinian cities, general ELECTIONS were held in the Occupied Territories (20 January 1996) in which the Palestinian Legislative Council was constituted, and Arafat, by a large majority, was elected PNA president. In the meantime, however, Rabin had become the target of an enormous campaign by right-wing political leaders and ideologists, who portrayed him as a traitor for signing the Oslo Accords and for agreeing to return at least part of the Occupied Territories to the Palestinians, and he was condemned to death by fanatic settler rabbis for “selling out the Land of God.” Throughout 1995, the right wing monopolized the streets in more and more violent demonstrations while the peace camp relied on the government to do what it had promised in the DOP. On 5 November 1995, YIGAL AMIR, a far-right religious activist, shot Rabin to death at the end of a mass rally in Tel Aviv that was supposed to be the beginning of a campaign to counter the right under the slogan “for peace, against violence.”

The murder of the Israeli prime minister sent shock waves throughout Israeli society, and even the right-wing parties entered into a phase of disarray, realizing that their systematic incitement against Rabin was partly responsible for his murder. The situation initially seemed to shut out the right and to implement what everyone called “Rabin’s testament”—peace with the Palestinian people based on the withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza. However, the choice of Shimon Peres, who replaced Rabin, turned out very differently. Peres called for “national reconciliation” with the right wing and decided to slow down the peace process. All the agreements between Israel and the PLO were suspended, and new commitments were made to the settlers, including strengthening of the CLOSURE of the Occupied Territories and establishing more settlements. As a result, the anger of the Palestinian population grew dramatically, and a new wave of terrorist operations hit the cities of Israel, which resulted in the right-wing parties immediately regaining their strength and support and consequently winning the 1996 elections.

The new prime minister, BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, considered the Oslo Process treason and did everything he could to put an end to the negotiations with the PLO. He had to take into consideration, however, the fact that the United States expected the peace process to move forward and that to maintain a modicum of stability in the Occupied Territories the Palestinian leadership needed to retain some legitimacy in the eyes of its people. Under pressure from Washington, Netanyahu was finally obliged to sign the WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM (October 1998), bringing about a partial Israeli redeployment from the city of Hebron as well as a commitment for additional enlargements of Area B. Yet despite signing the agreement, Netanyahu never implemented most of its provisions.

Camp David Accords

In 1999, EHUD BARAK was elected prime minister, and many in Israel as well as abroad believed that, with Labor back in power, the peace process would get a new start. To give Barak the time needed to implement the many unfulfilled Israeli commitments concerning the interim period, Arafat agreed to postpone the start of final-status negotiations. Few people remembered that Barak had publicly opposed the Oslo Process from its outset, and most were not prepared to believe that he would do everything he could to make it fail. For an entire year, Barak refused to deal with the suspended issues of the transitional period and did not even convene the preparatory committees that were to draft position papers on the issues slated for final-status negotiations. Pressured by President BILL CLINTON to move forward, but unwilling to implement the long series of Israeli commitments linked to the interim period, Barak announced in June 1999 that he wanted to jump directly to the final-status talks and intended to reach “the end of the conflict” in a few weeks. Clinton was surprised, while Arafat was stunned and worried, because such issues as the refugees, Jerusalem, and the final borders had to be resolved in a few weeks when no preparatory work had been done and many Israeli commitments were still unfulfilled. Arafat asked, in vain, to postpone the summit planned for mid-July at CAMP DAVID and instead to immediately get the working groups to undertake necessary preliminary planning for such a summit. However, Clinton acquiesced to Barak, and the Palestinians had no choice but to go along.

The Israeli and Palestinian delegations met during the period 11 to 24 July and were hosted by Clinton in his residence at Camp David. For well over a year, Barak’s report of the summit, which was publicly backed by Clinton, provided the only information available about what happened during those thirteen days. Barak claimed he had made extremely generous offers to Arafat, including giving 94 percent of the Occupied Territories to the PNA, but that Arafat rejected the offer because he was never truly interested in a fair compromise and secretly continued to strive for Israel’s destruction. A few journalists, including Ha’aretz political editor Akiva Eldar, immediately rejected Barak’s claims, and some even argued that they were a cynical, well-planned slander campaign intended to put an end to a process that Barak had never endorsed. But they were in effect silenced by Clinton and Barak, as were the Palestinians, who said Barak had made no concrete offers. Two years later, Clinton’s chief adviser at Camp David, Robert Malley, provided a different version than Barak. In short, Malley said that Barak’s offers were not genuine peace offers, the Palestinian rejection was not a rejection, and that the Palestinian delegation requested to continue the negotiations after they were better prepared.

With the collapse at Camp David, a concerted international campaign was initiated to delegitimize not only Arafat but the Palestinian people as a whole. For example, in the Israeli peace camp and among its main intellectuals—for example, the writers AMOS OZ and A. B. YEHOASHUA—there was an outpouring of claims that for the past ten years they had been naïve and fooled by the Palestinian rhetoric about peace. At the same time, the Israeli army put in place scenarios of “retaliation” and prepared for the reconquest of the territories, including the limited spaces of power gained by the Palestinians throughout the Oslo Process. It was the provocation by Barak, who allowed the head of the opposition, ARIEL SHARON, to visit the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, the Muslim holy site in Jerusalem, on 28 September 2000 that ignited a fire in the Occupied Territories in the form of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA and allowed the government and the IDF to begin the process of reconquest of the achievements of Oslo.

The diplomatic efforts, however, did not stop immediately. Clinton, who was at the end of his presidency, wanted to reach a historic agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. Negotiations were reconvened in Washington in December 2000, and an agreement was reached in Taba, Egypt, between the two delegations around what became known as the “CLINTON PARAMETERS”:

- Israel will withdraw from all the Occupied Territories.
- Palestinians will accept an exchange of territories that will allow the Israelis to keep the settlement blocs where 85 percent of the settlers live on 2.5 percent of the land in the West Bank, including in Jerusalem.
- The WESTERN WALL and the Jewish Quarter in Jerusalem will be annexed by Israel, and the rest of East Jerusalem will be under Palestinian sovereignty.
- Israel will recognize the right of return of the Palestinian refugees, but the actual return will be negotiated according to the DEMOGRAPHICS of Israel's need for an overwhelming Jewish majority in Israel.

Barak rejected the Taba agreement, claiming that he could not accept such compromises at the end of his mandate and knowing that, in a few weeks, Sharon would undoubtedly be elected the new prime minister. Elected by a large majority and released from any pressures from the moribund Israeli peace movement, Sharon was ready to start the reconquest of the Palestinian territories and the destruction of the PNA.

Evaluation of Oslo

When the DOP was made public, Palestinians as well as Israeli peace activists were divided on the evaluation of this historic move. On the one side, there were those—and they were the majority—who believed that this process would lead, almost inexorably and independent of the political actors, to the creation of an independent Palestinian state, and that it would bring an end to the century-old Jewish-Arab conflict. On another side were those who saw it as an Israeli maneuver aimed at destroying the Palestinian national liberation movement and pushing it to capitulate to an Israeli diktat on limits of PNA governance that was not in the interest or objectives of the Palestinians. In the middle were those who thought that the DOP was indeed a bad agreement imposed on the Palestinians by unfavorable power relations, but that it nevertheless could bring about a better situation for the Palestinian population in the Occupied Territories, and that it could change the perceptions and behaviors of both sides in a way that could bring about, in the longer term, a real peace.

Today, the Oslo Accords are viewed as a failure, in terms of ending the conflict. However, the DOP seems to have been a good deal for the Israeli government and a bad one for the Palestinians. Looking at the situation on the ground, the PLO is weaker than ever before and the PNA has lost most of its control not only over civil institutions but also over the Palestinian population. In the 2006 elections for the Palestinian Legislative Council, Hamas, the militant Islamist organization, won a landslide victory, pushing FATAH and other PLO factions to the margins of Palestinian political life. Israeli control of the West Bank is stronger than ever, and the number of Jewish settlers in the Occupied Territories has doubled since 1990.

The main questions, however, remain: Was it unavoidable? Was it a planned maneuver by Israel to weaken the PLO, to strengthen Israeli control in the Occupied Territories, and to give a strong push to the settlement enterprise? Was the Palestinian leadership an accomplice in selling out the rights of its own people? The last question, at least, can be easily answered: Arafat's rejection of Barak's offers and the subsequent major crisis of the al-Aqsa Intifada prove beyond any doubt that the Palestinian leader was not part of any secret agreement with the Israelis. When he signed the DOP, Arafat's goal was to end Israeli occupation, establishing an independent state on 22 percent of historical Palestine, and negotiate a solution for the refugees based on an Israeli recognition of their right to return to their country. Was Arafat intentionally fooled by the Israelis and made to believe that he would get what he was expecting, while at the same time they intended to do the exact opposite? In other words, while for the Palestinians the Oslo Process was a deadly trap in which they were led by their blind leadership, from an Israeli point of view it was definitely a successful move.

There were two currents of thought in Israel about the Oslo Accords, according to Palestinian scholar Camille Mansour. The first was "based on the true spirit of the agreement and good faith, which implied not only the freezing of settlement activities but its de-legitimization, that security should be understood in its broad political context, [and] that the political, financial and psychological dividends of the peace process will be shared by both sides." The second was based on a military balance of power that pushed Israel to sign the DOP only because Occupation was, since the Intifada, too expensive, and therefore "it was necessary to give to the Palestinians control over Palestinian daily life in the urban centers of West Bank and Gaza, while keeping the main ROAD axes and the rest of the space—especially in and around Jerusalem—to strengthen and enlarge the settlement project.

The two options existed simultaneously and were the object of a political struggle among the Israeli leadership. The "Peres boys" represented the first option, and they convinced the Palestinians to accept the deal, despite its lack of clear commitments concerning the future and its lack of guarantees, because they themselves thought that the final outcome would be the end of the Israeli Occupation in the West Bank and Gaza and the creation of a sovereign Palestinian state. Rabin embodied the second reading and gave responsibility for the negotiations on the implementation of the DOP to senior army officers, who subcontracted to the PLO leadership the job of law and order in the Palestinian populated areas. When Rabin changed course, apparently toward the beginning of 1995, and rejoined the Beilin perspective—that Israel needed to move bona fide forward on the peace process—it was already too late. The dominant interpretation of the Oslo Process and the arguments used to justify the DOP among the Israeli public had already become the military ones. The days of reconciliation and true Israeli-Palestinian peace were over, and the Oslo Process entered a dead end that led to a new circle of violence and, finally, the recolonization of the Occupied Territories by Barak and Sharon.

See also BARAK'S GENEROUS OFFER; WILLIAM CLINTON; DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT; OSLO ACCORDS

Bibliography

- Agha, Hussein, Shai Feldman, Ahmad Khalidi, and Ze'ev Schiff. Track-II Diplomacy: Lessons from the Middle East. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2004.
- Arc, Thomas, and Thomas L. Are. Israeli Peace/Palestinian Justice: Liberation Theology and the Peace Process. Atlanta, GA: Clarity Press, 1994.
- Avnery, Uri, and Mamduh el-'Aqer. Oslo, One Year After. Tel Aviv: Gush Shalom and Al-Jiser, 1994.
- Behrendt, Sven. The Secret Israeli-Palestinian Negotiations in Oslo: Their Success and Why the Process Ultimately Failed. New York: Routledge, 2007.
- Beilin, Yossi. Touching Peace: From the Oslo Accord to a Final Agreement. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1999.
- Benin, Joel. "The Demise of the Oslo Process." Middle East Report. 26 March 1999.
- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Deeb, Dennis J., II. The Collapse of Middle East Peace: The Rise and Fall of the Oslo Peace Accords. Bloomington, IN: Universe, 2003.
- Enderlin, Charles. Shattered Dreams: The Failure of the Peace Process in the Middle East (1995–2002). New York: Other Press, 2003.
- Ferneu, Elizabeth Warnock, Mary Evelyn Hocking, and H. L. Taylor, eds. The Struggle for Peace: Israelis and Palestinians. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1992.
- Giacaman, George, and Dag Lønning, eds. After Oslo. London: Pluto Press, 1998.
- Khalidi, Rashid. The Iron Cage: The Story of the Palestinian Struggle for Statehood. Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 2006.
- Malley, Robert. "Camp David and the Tragedy of Errors." New York Review of Books. 9 August 2001.
- Mansour, Camille. "L'Impasse coloniale israélienne." Revue d'études palestiniennes. 28 (Summer 2001).
- Peres, Shimon, and Arye Naor. The New Middle East. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.
- Qurei, Ahmed, with John King. From Oslo to Jerusalem: The Palestinian Story of the Secret Negotiations. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Reinhart, Tanya. Israel/Palestine: How to End the War of 1948. New York: Seven Stories Press, 2002.
- Rothstein, Robert L., Moshe Maoz, and Khalil Shikaki, eds. The Israeli-Palestinian Peace Process: Oslo and the Lessons of Failure: Perspectives, Predicaments and Prospects. East Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 2004.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestinians: In Search of a Just Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Said, Edward W. The End of the Peace Process: Oslo and After. New York: Vintage, 2001.
- Savir, Uri. 1,100 Days That Changed the Middle East. New York: Vintage, 1999.
- Singer, Joel. "Manipulating Arafat: Behind the Scenes at Oslo: Recognizing the Need for Mutual Recognition." Ha'aretz. 18 September 1998.
- Swisher, Clayton E. The Truth about Camp David: The Untold Story about the Collapse of the Middle East Peace Process. New York: Thunder's Mouth/Nation Books, 2004.
- Watson, Geoffrey R. The Oslo Accords "International Law and the Israeli-Palestinian Peace Agreements". New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Weinberger, Peter Ezra. Co-opting the PLO: A Critical Reconstruction of the Oslo Accords, 1993–1995. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 2006.

—Michael Warschawski

The Other Israel

The Other Israel is the English-language publication of the ISRAELI COUNCIL ON ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN PEACE. The quarterly newsletter, first published in 1983, aims to provide extensive coverage of the diverse struggles waged by the Israeli peace movement at large and reports on a variety of peacemaking activities, most of which find little or no mention in the world media. It also contains commentaries on events in Israel and the Middle East from a perspective that reconciles the interests of Israelis and Palestinians. The Other Israel is available at libraries in Israel, in the Occupied Territories, and in universities throughout the world. (<http://otherisrael.home.igc.org>).

See also MEDIA, ISRAELI; MEDIA, PALESTINIAN; MEDIA, US

Ottoman Empire

The Ottoman Empire ruled the Middle East from 1299 to 1 November 1922 CE. It was a Turkish imperial monarchy, not an Arab empire, but the state religion was Islam. At the height of its power (sixteenth to seventeenth centuries), it spanned three continents, controlling much of southeastern Europe and North Africa as well as the Middle East. The empire was at the center of interactions between the Eastern and Western worlds for six centuries, and it was Western penetration of the empire, starting with economic penetration and gradually involving military occupation, that resulted in the ascendancy of the West and the dependency of the East. Its capital, Istanbul (previously known as Constantinople), was for centuries the jewel of the East.

In 1516 the Ottoman Turks conquered Palestine, and the country was incorporated in the dominions of the empire. Local governors were appointed from Istanbul, to which annual revenues were sent.

Later, in order to boost its tax base, the Ottomans undertook land reform and passed the Land Law of 1858, which required Arabs in Palestine, like its citizens elsewhere, to register their lands for the first time. Since many fellahin (peasants) wished to avoid paying taxes to the ailing regime or to be conscripted into its army, and furthermore were unable to write, many local mukhtars collectively registered village lands under their own name. The mukhtars were eventually able to claim ownership and to sell the local peasants' lands to the new Jewish immigrants, as they themselves relocated permanently to SYRIA or LEBANON.

In 1867, foreigners received the right to own land throughout the empire, which was a much-needed revenue source for the Ottoman administration but became a disaster for the indigenous peasants. At the outset, the Ottoman Porte (foreign ministry) actively encouraged European immigrants to buy LAND for cultivation and development. This was the context in which Jewish communities from Russia and Central Europe, fleeing from pogroms and systematic social oppression, were initially able to settle in Palestine. Many Arab estates were sold to Jewish settlers after 1880, but by the 1890s the Ottomans had begun to understand what Zionism was actually about and had moved in various ways to try to prevent foreign Jews from entering Palestine, settling there, and buying up land. The Ottomans passed a variety of new laws, gave directives to local officials, and made policy statements to the effect of limiting land sales to European Jews in Palestine. These were often not enforced or were unsuccessful, as ways were found to circumvent the new restrictions: for example, some Jews declared themselves pilgrims, not settlers, to evade entry restrictions and then just stayed on; bribes were paid to extend visas; European governments and consuls used their influence to enable their Jewish subjects to stay and buy land; and Ottoman Jews (who were initially not subject to any restrictions) bought land on behalf of foreign Jews and the Zionist land-purchasing agencies. By 1920, ABSENTEE LANDLORDS who had made large profits by selling off small plots or becoming brokers for others had become immensely wealthy.

By 1900, 5,000 Jewish agricultural settlers had settled in nineteen colonies. The general increase in foreign trade and settlement throughout the Palestine region led to rises in land prices and to waves of speculation that lasted until the end of the BRITISH MANDATE in 1948.

When, in the context of World War I, the Ottomans joined the Germans and the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the British explicitly promised the Arab leadership (in the HUSAYN-McMAHON CORRESPONDENCE) that if the Arabs would support the Allies against the Ottomans, at the war's end Britain would facilitate the unity and independence of the Arab world. The Arabs rose up against the Ottomans; however, when the war ended, the great powers carved up the Arab world into separate mandates and gave Zionists special rights in Palestine.

After Israel's OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP in 1967, Tel Aviv resurrected, when it suited its purpose, the Ottoman Land Law of 1858 to confiscate Palestinian property.

See also IMMIGRATION

Bibliography

- Eldar, Akiva. "IDF Petitions over State's Ottoman Land Law in West Bank." Ha'aretz. 13 November 2008.
- Gilbar, Gad G. Ottoman Palestine, 1800–1914. Haifa, Israel: Gustav Heinemann Institute of Middle Eastern Studies, University of Haifa, 1990.
- Shafir, Gershon. Land, Labor and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict 1882–1914. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Tilsen, Rabbi Jon-Jay. Ottoman Land Registration Law as a Contributing Factor in the Israeli-Arab Conflict. New Haven, CT: Congregation Beth El–Keser Israel, <http://www.beki.org/landlaw.html>.

Outposts

Outposts are, in reality, new settlements. According to Israel's PEACE NOW, at the end of 2008 there were approximately 100 new settlement-outposts in the WEST BANK housing several thousand extremist settlers. In the 2005 SASSON REPORT, the author found 150 outposts (and believed there were more), and in August 2009 a delegation composed of JIMMY CARTER, Desmond Tutu, Fernando Henrique Cardoso, MARY ROBINSON, and Ela Bhatt found 200 outposts. Whatever the reason for the discrepancy (i.e., new or existing), it is not Tel Aviv's dismantling of outposts; at most it has dismantled three or four, and new ones have been continually established.

The ROAD MAP requires Israel to dismantle outposts established after ARIEL SHARON'S March 2001 election as prime minister and to freeze construction in older outposts (and settlements). Yet Israel has done neither. The UNITED STATES has declared that the outposts are a threat to the territorial integrity of a future Palestinian state. Yet Israel claims that it has secured US agreement to keep some of the outposts intact, something the US does not deny.

Peace Now comments: "According to the Ministry of Defense, 26 outposts meet the criteria stipulated in the Roadmap and therefore must be evacuated. However, according to the data collected by Peace Now, there are in fact at least 44 inhabited outposts that meet the criteria, in addition to a handful of uninhabited outposts. Aerial photos showing that the outposts did not exist before March 2001, but did exist after, can be found on Peace Now's website."

At the 27 November 2007 Annapolis Conference at the US Naval Academy in Maryland, Israeli prime minister EHUD OLMERT pledged to freeze settlement construction and remove some existing outposts and settlements. In November 2008, he announced that the government would cut off funding for illegal outposts—thereby admitting that it had continued to fund them up to that point.

No outposts have been evacuated since the Annapolis Conference. According to Peace Now, "Worse yet, since Annapolis there has been further investment, development, and construction in a number of outposts that Israel is required to remove under the Roadmap (i.e., outposts established after March 2001). This includes: (1) New, permanent structures are being built in the outposts of Kida, Hill 725 and Gilad Farm; (2) New caravans have been added in 11 outposts (Givat Assaf, Mevo'ot Jericho, Mitzpe Yitzhar, Yair Farm, Migron, Neve Daniel North, Nofe Nehemia, Susiya North West, Asa'el, Kida, Ramat Gilad).

"In addition, since Annapolis there has been construction and development in outposts established before March 2001. While some might argue that this construction is not relevant to Israel's Roadmap obligations (since, as explained earlier, under the Roadmap Israel is only required to remove outposts that were established after March 2001), they would be wrong: such construction conflicts with another Israeli obligation under Phase I of the Roadmap, under which Israel 'freezes all settlement activity (including natural growth of outposts and settlements).' Further, in 2008 alone at least 261 new structures were built in or set up in outposts, including 227 caravans and 34 permanent structures. This represented a 250 percent increase compared to 2007, when approximately 98 structures were built in outposts (including approximately 82 caravans and 16 permanent structures).

"It should be noted that on 17 March 2008 Prime Minister Olmert declared that two illegal outposts had been evacuated. He was referring, first, to 'Ofra East'—which consisted of a single, damaged, vacant travel trailer placed near the settlement of Ofra, with another small trailer that was recently added next to it. This 'outpost'—which was never counted by Peace Now as a real outpost, was indeed 'evacuated,' with the two empty trailers removed from the site. The second outpost he was referring to, 'Yatir South West,' is a different story. This outpost consists of 4 caravans (travel trailers) located adjacent to the settlement of Metzadot Yehuda. Notwithstanding Olmert's declaration, the reality on the ground is that these caravans were never removed—a fact confirmed by Peace Now's Settlement Watch Team, which visited the site on March 28, 2008 and found the four caravans still in place."

Just like the official settlements, these outposts were established to realize two objectives: to create a continuity of Israeli presence by taking over as much LAND as possible and to create barriers among the various Palestinian population centers, leaving them as isolated CANTONS. This project precludes the possibility of creating a Palestinian state that can be viable, contiguous, independent, and self-sufficient. As the outposts steadily spring up and become permanent communities, taking up ever wider swaths of the West Bank that Palestinians envision as the heartland of their future state, the prospects for any comprehensive and peaceful resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict correspondingly decrease.

Typically, small groups of settlers—often young men (the “hilltop youth”)—undertake the initiative to establish an outpost, assuming, correctly, that once they are in place the government will provide the necessary support. Indeed, the settlers do not act alone in the establishment of outposts; rather they have the massive assistance of government officials and ministries who are operating against Israeli law, but who are committed to establishing and expanding a web of settlements in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. This activity, which involves creating new outposts under the guise of constructing new neighborhoods in existing settlements, educational institutions, natural growth, acclimatization farms, and dummy antennas, reached its peak during two separate periods: the first was 1997 to 1999, when BENJAMIN NETANYAHU was prime minister, and the second was 2001–2002, when ARIEL SHARON held that position.

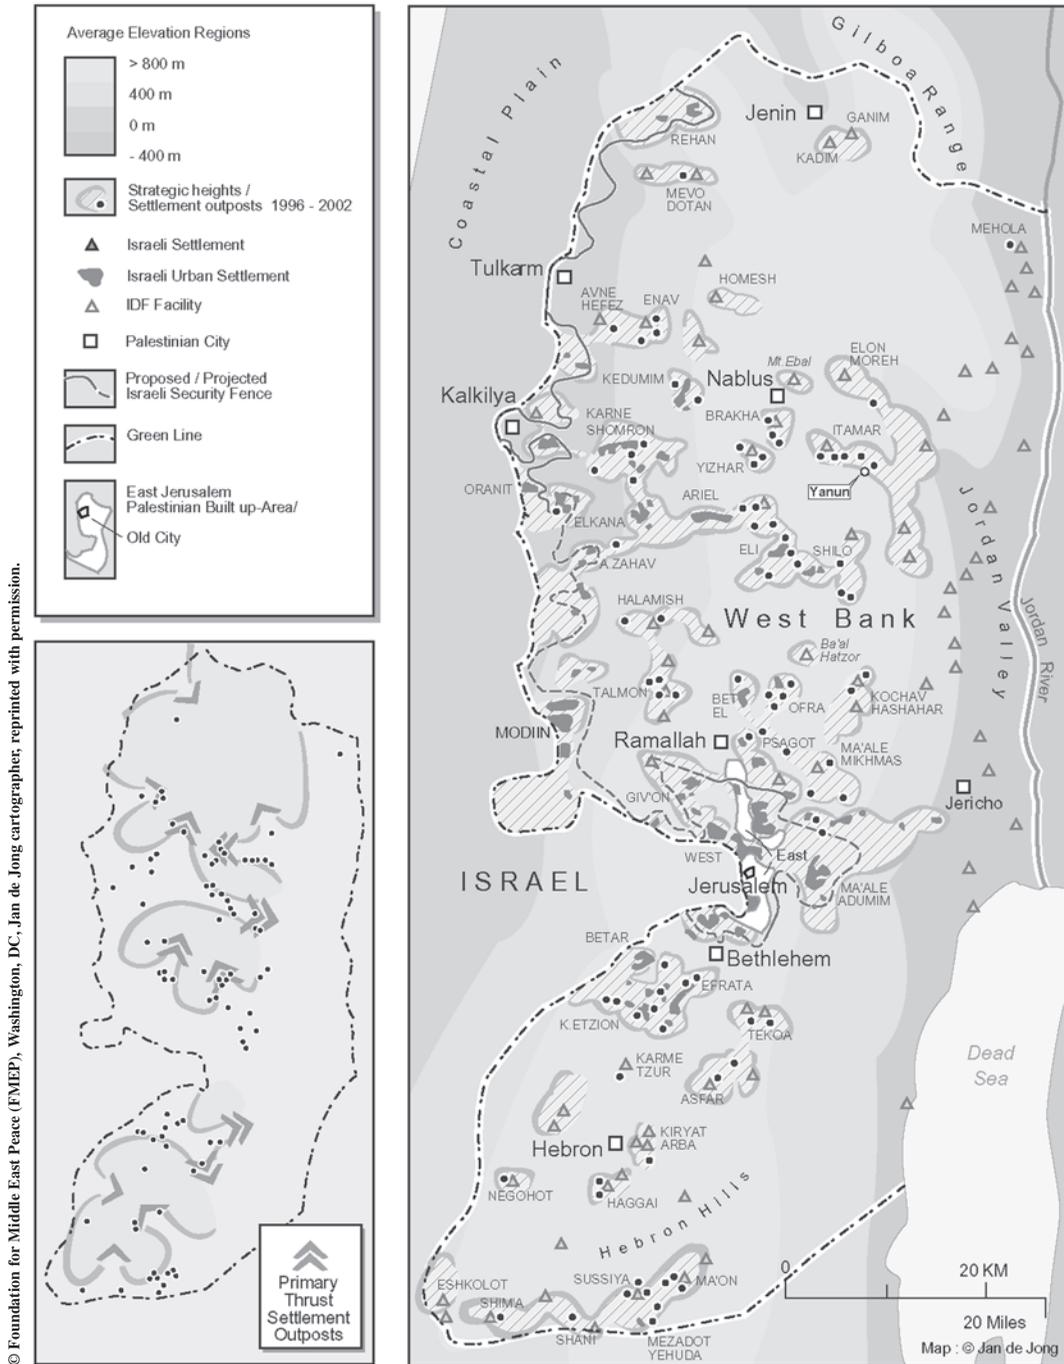

Despite the fact that this phenomenon significantly changed the map of the West Bank, it did not receive much public attention until about 2004; however, the Israeli MEDIA and the US government were able to bring sufficient pressure to bear that Prime Minister Sharon was forced to appoint Attorney Talia Sasson to examine the scope of the phenomenon and the involvement of various government officials in the effort. The Sasson Report found that while Israel does not officially recognize these communities, they are illegal, as noted, even by Israeli laws or international mandates that prohibit expansion of established settlements outside an occupier’s borders. Nevertheless, government ministers, bureaucrats, and others have fueled the expansion of outposts by providing funds, granting PERMITS (or looking the other way when settlers build without permits) for construction, electricity, phone lines, security, and so on. For example, from 2000 to 2003, Israel’s Housing Ministry funneled nearly US$6.5 million to the illegal outposts, with more than half going to outposts that Israel had pledged to the US government to remove. During the same period the Housing Ministry approved seventy-seven contracts for construction projects in thirty-three West Bank areas—eighteen of them for unauthorized outposts—with funding of about US$4 million. Sasson wrote that “the process of outpost expansion is profoundly under way.”

Peace Now reports that at the end of 2008, there were 100 outposts, plus a large number of additional points controlled by the settlers but without a permanent settler presence. During 2008, no new “real” outposts (sites with an even moderately well-established settler presence and inhabited on a regular basis) were established and no “real” outposts were evacuated. Instead, many “dummy” outposts—uninhabited sites where settlers placed a container or vehicle, but no real structures—were established, and some of these were “evacuated.” Peace Now further comments that these “were often part of a cat-and-mouse game settlers played with the Israeli army—wherein the settlers create the new ‘outpost’ and the army comes in and removes it, only to see the settlers reestablish it or move it to another site nearby.”

Existing outposts were expanded significantly during 2008. At least 261 new structures were built in or set up in outposts in that year alone, including 227 caravans and 34 permanent structures. This represented a 250 percent increase compared to 2007, when approximately 98 structures were built in outposts (including approximately 82 caravans and 16 permanent structures). Peace Now also discovered that the government is directly funding some of the outposts: “Figures that show the State is funding illegal outposts: . . . at least 16 outposts are enjoying the settlement department support.”

All outposts wish to become de facto settlements in their own right. Each outpost collects its own taxes and has its own secretariat, absorption committees, and the like. Many outposts grow within a few years into full-scale settlements with hundreds of residents. For example, the six-year-old outpost of Bruchin (near the western edge of the northern West Bank) is populated mainly by a core group of students from the Peduel Yeshiva, and in July 2002 comprehensive land work began for permanent settlement west of the outpost. Bruchin is well developed with uniform houses, brick sidewalks, and street lamps, and in a few years it grew to forty-five trailers and fifty-six permanent structures housing some twenty-seven families. Yet because it is considered illegal, Bruchin cannot be found in any conventional Israeli atlas.

Another example of a new illegal outpost is Migron, a settlement of about forty-five religious families on a ridge next to the Palestinian city of Ramallah. Migron has parks, children’s playgrounds, a daycare center, and a synagogue, all paid for by the government. Migron is supposedly linked to the biblical site where King Saul based himself during his fight against the Philistines, and thus attracts primarily religious settlers. Yehudit Genud, a resident of Migron, told a reporter: "This place is holy to the Jewish people and we have a duty to be here. The whole land of Israel belongs to us and we should not be afraid to live wherever we want to. The Arabs must accept that." Further, Ms. Genud said, "We are connected to the water grid, we have phone lines from the national company Bezeq, we have been hooked up by the electricity company and have street lighting. We also have a kindergarten paid for by the state and a group of soldiers stationed here to protect us. How can we be 'illegal'?"

© Foundation for Middle East Peace (FMEP), Washington, DC. Jan de Jong cartographer, reprinted with permission.

Map 33. Israeli Settlement "Outposts"

In November 2008, SHIN BET chief Yuval Diskin said that hundreds of people are regularly involved in extremist violence in the West Bank, and, if necessary, they could recruit another few thousand people for a violent confrontation. In the early months of 2008, Shin Bet discerned a gradual rise in right-wing settler violence. Even though settlers still see no great likelihood of settlements being evacuated in the near future, the fact that senior government officials, such as outgoing prime minister Ehud Olmert, KADIMA leader TZIPI LIVNI, and LABOR leader and Defense Minister EHUD BARAK, all speak about the need for such an evacuation increases the settlers' sense of being under pressure. In the words of Amos Harel in March 2005 in Ha'aretz, "The distance from hitting and kicking soldiers and policemen to a political assassination is shorter than it seems."

In 2009, Ha'aretz wrote, "An infrastructure of Jewish terror is being created in the West Bank. Through a policy they have dubbed 'Price Tag,' the settlers have the declared aim of attacking innocent Palestinians in response to any perceived threat to a settlement or outpost, verbal or physical. This is merely the anecdotal and the blunt, extreme end of this infrastructure. Through intimidation and systematic violations of the law, the supreme goal of the settlers who exercise this policy is to seize more and more land. This, in turn, causes harm to the livelihood, property and welfare of tens of thousands of Palestinians."

The weakness of the IDF in dealing with the violence is pronounced. The reserve soldiers at Yad Yair, for example, like the regular soldiers at Yitzhar outpost, were unable to stop the settler outbursts and made do with standing aside. Since the dismantlement of Amona outpost in 2006, the army has changed its approach and prefers to send in the police and the border police to clash with the rioters. But the police are not always available, and the message that comes down to the officers (even if it is not always intentional) is that it is best not to tangle with Jews, whether an extreme right-wing activist at Yitzhar, an anarchist at Na'alim, or a religious fundamentalist at Migron.

The settlers, in fact, are unrestrained and have made shocking declarations and accusations at the various authorities. Moreover, it can be assumed that what has been, will be: the attacks and the violence around Yitzhar, for example, have been going on intermittently for more than twenty years. The outposts are a constant source of front-line friction between the settlers and the Palestinians. Occasionally, the IDF has attempted to allow Palestinians to reach their lands near the outposts, but the residents of the outposts use threats and violence to keep the Palestinians away. And the IDF does not protect them. When the Palestinians use violence, as was the case with the stabbing of a boy in Yitzhar, the laws of the jungle take over. The residents of the outposts are convinced that only if their Arab neighbors exist in a constant state of fear will quiet prevail and their families be able to live in relative security.

See also SASSON REPORT; SETTLEMENTS; SETTLER VIOLENCE

Bibliography

- Benn, Aluf. "Settlers Preparing for War, Says Shin Bet Chief." Ha'aretz. 3 November 2008.
- Carter, Jimmy. "The Elders' View of the Middle East." Washington Post. 6 September 2009.
- Cook, Jonathan. "Israel's Outposts Seal Death of Palestinian State." Atlantic Free Press. 4 September 2008.
- Etkes, Dror. What Is an Outpost? Jerusalem: Peace Now, n.d. <http://www.peacenow.org.il/site/en/peace.asp?pi=195&docid=1507>.
- Friedman, Laura, and Israel Ofran. 2008—The Year in Settlements in Review. Jerusalem and New York: Peace Now and Americans for Peace Now, 2009.
- . Outposts, Post-Annapolis. Jerusalem and New York: Peace Now and Americans for Peace Now, 2008.
- Friedman, Matti. "Israel Spy Chief Fears Jewish Extremist Plot." Huffington Post. 2 November 2008. http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/11/02/israel-spy-chief-fears-je\_n\_140236.html.
- Ha'aretz*. "EU Condemns Settler 'Acts of Brutality' against Palestinians." 31 October 2008.
- Harel, Amos. "Who's Kidding Whom? Sharon Knew Exactly How Settlement Outposts Began." Ha'aretz. 9 March 2005.
- "Israel Funds Illegal Outposts: Report." The Age (Australia). 7 May 2004. <http://theage.com.au/articles/2004/05/06/1083635276898.html?from=storyrhs>.
- Lynfield, Ben. "Israeli Outposts Still Growing." Christian Science Monitor. 9 July 2004.
- Maor, Roi, and Dror Etkes. "An Infrastructure of Jewish Terror." Ha'aretz. September 2009. <http://www.haaretz.com/hasen/spages/1113843.html>.

- McGreal, Chris. "Israel Accused of Assisting Illegal Outposts." The Guardian (London). 10 March 2005.
- Mitnick, Joshua. "Next Up for Israeli Bulldozers: Outposts? The Fast Withdrawal from Gaza May Add New Pressure for the Removal of 101 Illegal Settlements." Christian Science Monitor. 26 August 2005.
- Moore, Molly. "Israel Is Funding Outposts: 'Blatant Violation' of Law Alleged." Washington Post Foreign Service. 9 March 2005. www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/articles/A17499-2005Mar8.html.
- MSNBC/AP. "Israel to Build New West Bank Outpost." 24 July 2008. www.msnbc.com.
- Ofran, Hagit. Summary of Construction in the West Bank 2008. Jerusalem: Peace Now, 2008.
- Peace Now. Outposts List. Tel Aviv and Jerusalem: Peace Now, n.d. www.peacenow.org.il/site/en/peace.asp?pi=58.
- Peace Now, Settlement Watch Team. Bypassing the Settlement Freeze—Semi-Annual Report on Settlement Construction—January–June 2009. Jerusalem: Peace Now, August 2009.
- . Ministry of Housing's Plans for the West Bank. Jerusalem: Peace Now, March 2009.
- Sasson Report about Illegal Outposts. Summary of the Opinion Concerning Unauthorized Outposts. Full text. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, 2005. www.fmep.org/documents/sassonreport.html.
- Yesh Din. About the Security Forces' Criminal Accountability Project. n.d. <http://www.yesh-din.org/site/index.php?page=criminal&lang=en>.
- . Law Enforcement upon Israeli Civilians in OT Project. n.d. <http://www.yesh-din.org/site/index.php?page=law.enforcement&lang=en>.
- . Settlement Policy Judicial Advocacy Project. Tel Aviv: Yesh Din, Volunteers for Human Rights. n.d. <http://www.yesh-din.org/site/index.php?page=lands&lang=en>.
- . Yesh Din and ACRI Take IDF Commanders to the High Court. 2009. <http://www.yesh-din.org/site/index.php?lang=en>.
- . Yesh Din Brings Precedent-setting Settler Land-grab Method to the High Court. 2009. <http://www.yesh-din.org/site/index.php?lang=en>.
- . Yesh Din's Teport Reveals: No Due Process in the Military Courts. <http://www.yesh-din.org/site/index.php?page=militarycourts&lang=en>.

Oz, Amos (1939–2009)

Amos Oz was one of Israel's foremost writers. Born in JERUSALEM, at the age of fifteen he went to live on a KIBBUTZ, after which he studied philosophy and literature at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and was a visiting fellow at Oxford University. Oz was author-in-residence at the Hebrew University and writer-in-residence at Colorado College in the UNITED STATES. An author of prose for children and adults as well as an essayist, he was widely translated and is internationally acclaimed. Oz was honored with the Prix Femina and the honorific title of Officer of Arts and Letters from FRANCE and the Frankfurt Peace Prize. He lived in the southern town of Arad and taught literature at Ben Gurion University of the Negev.

Oz rooted his writing in the tempestuous history of his homeland. A common thread runs through his writing, both fiction and nonfiction: examining human nature, recognizing its frailty, but glorying in its variety. Some of his better-known works are A Tale of Love and Darkness (2005); Israel, Palestine and Peace: Essays (1995); In the Land of Israel (1993); To Know a Woman (1992); and Elsewhere, Perhaps (1985). Oz consistently argued for an end to ambivalence with regard to the Palestinians, for dialogue, for a channeling of passions toward faith in the future, and for peace. He wrote with an economy of words yet managed to present panoramic perspectives of the people of Israel, their political tribulations, and the biblical landscape. Newsweek once wrote of Oz: "Eloquent, humane, even religious in the deepest sense, Oz emerges as a kind of Zionist Orwell: a complex man obsessed with simple decency and determined above all to tell the truth, regardless of whom it offends."

See also HEBREW LITERATURE

Oz Veshalom-Netivot Shalom

Oz Veshalom-Netivot Shalom, based in JERUSALEM, was founded in 1975 to present an alternative, peaceful expression of religious ZIONISM. It is committed to promoting the ideals of tolerance, pluralism, and justice, which have long been central to Jewish tradition and law. As the only religious Zionist peace organization of its kind, it counters fundamentalist and extremist political arguments that place the value of the LAND of Israel ahead of human life. The organization seeks to effect a fundamental change within the national religious community and throughout Israeli society by demonstrating support for the peace process on the basis of political reality and justice; enhancing Jewish unity and pluralism among Israel's religious and secular publics; practicing coexistence and support for equality for Israel's Arab minority; and advocating political rights for Palestinians, including the establishment of a Palestinian state. (www.netivot-shalom.org.il).

---

P

---

Pale of Settlement (1791–1917)

Pale of Settlement was a western border region of imperial RUSSIA in which Jews were permanently allowed to live, extending from the pale, or demarcation line, to near the border with central Europe. More than 90 percent of Russian Jews were forced to live in the Pale, and the population grew from 1.6 million in 1820 to 5.6 million in 1910. Although comprising only 20 percent of the territory of European Russia, the Pale corresponded to the historical borders of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and included much of present-day Lithuania, Belarus, Poland, Moldova, Ukraine, and parts of western Russia. Only a few categories of Jews were allowed to live outside the Pale.

Life in the shtetls (villages) of the Pale of Settlement was hard and stricken by poverty. To meet the needs of the population, a sophisticated system of volunteer Jewish social welfare organizations developed, following the time-honored Jewish tradition of tzedakah. Various organizations supplied clothes to poor students, provided kosher food to Jewish soldiers conscripted into the czar's army, dispensed free medical treatment for the poor, offered dowries and household gifts to destitute brides, and arranged for technical education for orphans. According to historian Martin Gilbert's Atlas of Jewish History, no province in the Pale had less than 14 percent of the population on communal social welfare, and Lithuanian and Ukrainian Jews supported as much as 22 percent of their poor populations.

The concentration of Jews in the Pale made them an easy target for pogroms and massive (and often government-sponsored) anti-Jewish riots. These, along with the repressive May Laws, anti-Jewish regulations enacted in 1882 by Czar Alexander III, often devastated whole communities. Though pogroms were staged throughout the existence of the Pale, particularly devastating attacks occurred in 1881–1883 and 1903–1906, targeting hundreds of communities, killing thousands of Jews, and causing tens of thousands of rubles in property damage.

A positive outgrowth of the concentration of Jews in a circumscribed area was the development of the modern yeshiva system. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century, each town supported its advanced students, who were taught in the local synagogues by the rabbinical head of the community. Each student would eat his meals in a different home each day, a system known as essen teg (eating days). A Jewish quota for education was set by the Russian government: since 1886, the percentage of Jewish students could be no more than 10 percent within the Pale, 5 percent outside the Pale, and 3 percent in the capitals (Moscow, St. Petersburg, Kiev). The quotas in the capitals were slightly increased in 1908 and 1915.

During World War I, the Pale lost part of its Jewish population when large numbers of Jews fled into the Russian interior to escape the invading GERMAN army. On 20 March 1917, the Pale was abolished by the provisional Russian government. A large portion of the Pale, together with its Jewish population, became part of Poland. The Bolshevik Revolution and the wars of 1918–1920 also resulted in many pogroms and military excesses—over 1,236 of them in the Ukraine alone, during which, conservatively, 31,000 Jews were killed.

Bibliography

- Bucher, Greta. Daily Life in Imperial Russia. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2008.
- Gilbert, Martin. The Atlas of Jewish History, revised, updated ed. New York: William Morrow, 1993.
- Klier, John Doyle, and Shlomo Lambroza, eds. Pogroms: Anti-Jewish Violence in Modern Russian History. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Nathans, Benjamin. Beyond the Pale: The Jewish Encounter with Later Imperial Russia. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.

Palestine Central Council

The Palestine Central Council (PCC) was established in 1970 as a consultative body to the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, especially in periods between meetings of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC). Its membership is composed of sixty individuals. In 1991, at the twenty-ninth PNC, the PCC became a legislative as well as consultative body. Members are elected from among members of the PNC, and the PCC meets regularly every six months. When the PNC is not in session, the PCC assumes the role of the PNC.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Norton, Augustus, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Quandt, William B., Faud Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Resistance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl. The Palestine Liberation Organization: Its Institutional Infrastructure. Belmont, MA: Institute for Arab Studies, 1983.

Palestine Conciliation Commission

See UNITED NATIONS CONCILIATION COMMISSION FOR PALESTINE

Palestine Economic Policy Research Institute

The Palestine Economic Policy Research Institute (MAS) was founded in JERUSALEM in 1994 as an independent, nonprofit think tank to contribute to the policymaking process of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY by conducting economic and social policy research. Based in Ramallah in the WEST BANK, MAS produces and publishes high-quality research relevant to economic and social development in Palestine. (www.mas.org.ps).

Palestine Executive Committee

See PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

Palestine Jewish Colonization Association

The Palestine Jewish Colonization Association (PICA) was established in 1924 and played a major role in supporting the Yishuv in Palestine until its disbandment in 1957. It was originally founded as the JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION (ICA) by Baron Maurice de Hirsh in 1891 to help Jews from Russia and Romania to settle in Argentina. The baron died in 1896, and thereafter the ICA began to assist the Palestinian colonies. In 1899 BARON EDMOND JAMES DE ROTHSCHILD transferred title to his colonies in Palestine plus fifteen million francs (around $3 million at the time) to the ICA, which was reorganized as the Palestine Jewish Colonization Association in 1924. After the WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES in 1929, PICA helped to rehabilitate agricultural colonies that had been damaged. Rothschild's will instructed the PICA to transfer most of its land in Israel to the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND.

Bibliography

- Buntun, Martin. Colonial Land Policies in Palestine, 1917–1936. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.

Palestine Land Development Corporation

The Palestine Land Development Corporation (PLDC) was the second land redemption agency (after the JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION) founded by Zionists. It was established in 1908 by the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION (WZO) and headed by Otto Warburg and ARTHUR RUPPIN, whose mandate was to purchase LAND for the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF), which held the land in perpetuity for the Jewish people. Shortly thereafter, JOSHUA HANKIN joined the PLDC and later became a key figure in land reclamation in Palestine.

In the early years of the PLDC, the WZO focused on placing Jewish IMMIGRANTS in agricultural SETTLEMENTS, but few immigrants had agricultural training. Thus the PLDC initiated a series of training facilities, known as "National Farms," on JNF land. While alumni of this training leased land in other JNF-sponsored localities, most importantly, the farms served as incubators for the philosophies and practices of various kinds of rural settlement. Thus, by the time the BRITISH MANDATE came into effect (1920), the land-redemption model had been consolidated as institutional, as distinct from entrepreneurial (although its leading figures thought entrepreneurially), and increasingly rural rather than urban. Nearly all of the settlers were lessees, not owners, of their land.

Bibliography

Tuten, Eric Engel. Between Capital and Land: The Jewish National Fund's Finances and Land-Purchase Priorities in Palestine. London: Routledge-Curzon, 2005.

Palestine Liberation Army

The Palestine Liberation Army (PLA) was founded at the first meeting of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (together with all the major institutions of the PLO) in May 1964 in JERUSALEM under the chairmanship of AHMAD SHUQAYRI. The ARAB LEAGUE had decided to create a regular military force (as opposed to guerrillas) recruited from Palestinian REFUGEES in SYRIA, IRAQ, and EGYPT, who performed their military service in separate Palestinian battalions in the armies of those states. Although the PLA was the official military wing of the PLO, in reality it was under the effective military command of the countries in which it was stationed. Initially there were three battalions of Palestinians: 'Ayn Jalut in Egypt; Qadisiyya in Iraq, though it moved to JORDAN and came under Amman's control after 1967; and Hittin in Syria.

The PLA reached a maximum strength of 12,000 men deployed in eight brigades around 1978 and eventually came to be concentrated in LEBANON under the control of the PLO. However, the PLA was largely destroyed as a fighting force during the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon; its fighters were dispersed throughout the Arab world, and the leadership settled in TUNIS. Some PLA members later became part of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY'S PRESIDENTIAL GUARD.

Bibliography

Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, CA: Clarendon Press, 1997.

Palestine Liberation Front

The Palestine Liberation Front (PLF, Jabhat al-Tahrir al-Filastiniyya) was formed by MUHAMMAD ABBAS ZEIDAN (Abu al-Abbas) and Tal'at Ya'qub in April 1977 after a split with the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND

(PFLP—GC). The split came about because of the PFLP—GC's support for SYRIA's attacks on the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in LEBANON in 1976 and occurred in the context of bitter inter-Arab rivalries. FATAH, the strongest faction within the PLO, at the time was feuding with Syria and helped in the formation of the PLF, whose leadership accepted the patronage of the IRAQ regime. The PLF and al-Abbas both were supportive of and supported by Fatah. Although the PLF was always a small group, with no supporters in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, it was quite militant and pursued a strategy of ARMED STRUGGLE, mainly by attacks on Israel across the Lebanese border.

In the early 1980s, the PLF split into three small organizations, with a centrist, pro-Damascus faction under Ya'qub challenging the pro-Iraqi faction under al-Abbas and 'Ali Ishaq, who in turn effected a rapprochement with the mainstream Fatah in 1983 in the context of the post—LEBANON WAR Palestinian civil war. Al-Abbas and 'Ali Ishaq even took part in the Amman (JORDAN) PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL of November 1984, where, for the first time, the PLF was allotted a seat on the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE. The third and minor faction was under the leadership of 'Abd al-Fattah Ghanim, who was militantly pro-Syrian and later reconciled with Ya'qub's faction when the latter left the DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE to join Ghanim in creating the Palestine National Liberation Front (PNLF). This group declined significantly with the death of Ya'qub in November 1988 and because of the PLO's reunification at the same time. After Ya'qub's death, al-Abbas became leader of a reunited PLF and was elected to the Executive Committee, at which time the PLF became, in effect, a satellite of Fatah, though never completely relinquishing its Iraqi connections.

When, in October 1985, the PLF hijacked the cruise ship ACHILLE LAURO and then attempted a seaborne raid near Tel Aviv in May 1990, al-Abbas brought intense international criticism on the PLO. In 1991, to defuse the criticism, PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT replaced al-Abbas with 'Ali Ishaq on the Executive Committee. But 'Ali Ishaq's opposition to the MADRID CONFERENCE and the OSLO ACCORDS led him to resign his Executive Committee seat. After the Oslo agreement, al-Abbas's PLF faction accepted the PLO's policy of curtailing guerrilla activity against Israel. The organization is currently based mainly in Lebanon and Tunisia, where it has several hundred members.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Norton, Augustus, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

Palestine Liberation Organization

In 1964, at the first Arab Summit, held in Cairo, Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR engineered the creation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) as an “independent” institution through which Palestinians could struggle for their rights. The PLO, however, was neither independent nor capable of struggle—not even politically. As a creation of EGYPT, it was controlled by Egypt and functioned mainly as an instrument of Egyptian diplomacy in Arab politics. Its establishment was specifically undertaken to relieve the Arab states of responsibility for Palestine and to control the Palestinians so that they would not drag the Arab countries into an unwanted war with Israel. In May 1964, the PLO was formally founded in JERUSALEM at an assembly of 422 Palestinians from ten Arab countries. There they drafted the PALESTINE NATIONAL CHARTER, a Declaration of Independence, and the General Principles of a Fundamental (Basic) Law, a constitution outlining the basic political structure of the PLO. The PLO was permitted to have a military wing (the PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY), but it consisted of three Palestinian contingents under the control of Arab countries, had no independence, and was not involved in guerrilla or other military activities. AHMAD SHUQAYRI became the organization's first leader. He resigned in December 1967 and was replaced by Yahya Hammouda, who served until February 1969, when YASIR ARAFAT was elected chairman.

In the years immediately following Nakba, when some 800,000 Palestinians fled the 1948 WAR between Israel and the Arab states, dispossessed Palestinian REFUGEES were mostly preoccupied with the basics of existence in the refugee camps, located in various Arab states. Conditions in the camps were deplorable: water, electricity, and sewerage were nonexistent. For at least fifteen years, there was no organized political activity among the refugees; indeed, Palestinians thought it was only a matter of time before they could return to their homes and land in Palestine. At the same time, middle- and upper-class Palestinians who left in 1948 and who had the means to settle in urban areas migrated to Beirut, LEBANON; Cairo, EGYPT; Amman, JORDAN; KUWAIT; and elsewhere. They played pivotal roles in the development of numerous Arab countries and made educating their children their first priority. Universities, especially in Lebanon and Egypt, introduced Palestinians to Arab nationalist ideas, movements, and parties and became fertile ground for the development of Palestinian nationalist thought and organization. By the mid-1960s, Palestinians who were exposed to these trends began to organize, to recruit supporters from the masses, and to coalesce in several groups of fida'iyyun (freedom fighters or self-sacrificers) committed to the liberation of Palestine. The various factions recruited from the masses and solidified their organizations, and then joined the PLO as an umbrella that eventually subsumed eight independent groups. So, for example, supporters of one faction continued to give their first loyalty to that group but were also part of the PLO. Arafat, to implement policy, always had to bargain and negotiate with the various factions because each could leave the PLO at any time (and often did), lessening the political power of the PLO.

Shortly after the creation of the PLO, Palestinian resistance groups exploded onto the Middle East scene. FATAH (the Palestine National Liberation Movement), the organization with the widest support, had its origins in GAZA among a group of university student activists studying in Egypt. They included the major leaders of the PLO throughout the 1970s and 1980s and a few into the 1990s: SALAH KHALAF (Abu Iyad), KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad), FAROUQ AL-QADDUMI (Abu Lutuf), KHALID AL-HASAN (Abu Said), his brother HANI AL-HASAN, and Yasir Arafat (Abu Ammar). The POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), the second strongest group, had its roots in the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS, which had a strong organizational base at the American University of Beirut in Lebanon. PFLP leaders and ideologues who came from this university setting included, among others, GEORGE HABASH, WADI' HADDAD, Muhsin Ibrahim, and NAYIF HAWATIMAH. Hawatimah later split from the PFLP and formed the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP), the third most populous organization. Though operating independently, these groups collectively constituted the Palestine Nationalist Movement. They were underground, secretive, populist, activist, and radical, in contrast to the PLO, which was aboveground, was elitist, toed the line of the Arab states (in particular, Egypt), and was legitimized by the status quo ARAB LEAGUE. In 1969, the fidai'iyun took over the PLO and transformed it into an independent, revolutionary organization; eight distinct guerrilla organizations came together under its unifying umbrella, Fatah, the PFLP and the DFLP being the largest. The smaller factions included the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (PLF), the Abu Abbas faction, minor, left-wing; the ARAB LIBERATION FRONT (ALF), a minor faction aligned with the Iraqi Ba'ath Party; SA'IQA, a Syrian-backed Ba'athist faction; the PALESTINE POPULAR STRUGGLE FRONT (PPSF), the Samir Ghawsha left-wing faction; and the Palestinian Arab Front (PAF), another minor faction. The PALESTINIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY (PPP), founded in 1982 as the Palestinian Communist Party, only joined the PLO in 1987. It was communist, was opposed to ARMED STRUGGLE, supported a two-state solution, and its followers came primarily from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. It was led first by Bashir Barghouti, then MUSTAFA AL-BARGHUTHI.

Without any independent territorial base and with Palestinians geographically fragmented, it would have been unlikely for one party to dominate resistance activities. The situation was further complicated by the fact that the resistance constituency was socioeconomically diverse and included the destitute camp population, middle- and upper-class teachers, bureaucrats, educated professionals, and wealthy businessmen working in Jordan, the Gulf States, and elsewhere, plus Christians (Habash and Hawatimah, for example) and Muslims. The class and religious variations, as well as the divergent life experiences of the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA, were reflected in ideological differences and disagreements regarding the appropriate strategy and tactics for Palestinian resistance. The main disagreement was between an Arab nationalist and a Palestinian nationalist orientation, including what should be the appropriate relationship between the fidai'iyun and the Arab states. Arafat and Fatah believed that the focus of the resistance should be exclusively on Palestine and that, given the absence of an independent territorial base and the necessity of organizing in and operating from the Arab states, the Palestinian movement needed to maintain good relations with the Arab regimes. Habash and the PFLP believed, on the other hand, that Palestinian objectives could only be realized through the existence of progressive, pan-Arab nationalist leaders, necessitating the overthrow of the current Arab regimes. It was this PFLP worldview that led to BLACK SEPTEMBER after the organization unsuccessfully attempted to oust King Husayn. Thereafter, while maintaining a rhetorical commitment to revolution throughout the Arab world, the PFLP adhered to Fatah's policy of attempting to maintain good relations with existing regimes.

Yet, despite the ideological differences, occasional feuds, and the temporary withdrawal of one or another group from the fold, the eight resistance organizations worked together under the PLO umbrella and remained committed to the principles of consensus and unity until 1993. That year Arafat broke their consensus when he signed the OSLO ACCORDS with Israel, which did not reflect the political principle of commitment to an independent, sovereign state in the pre-1967 boundaries, which had constituted PLO policy for twenty years.

PLO Structure

Each of the PLO's eight parties had its own internal organizational structure and political apparatus in which issues of theory, practice, and so forth were discussed and debated, and where the political program of each group was formalized. These political organs were separate from each organization's guerrilla contingent, although it was not uncommon for individuals to function in both capacities. In addition, the PLO had its own political apparatus, which superseded the structures of the individual groups. The PLO's political institutions were established in 1964 at its founding meeting, remained viable after the 1969 resistance takeover, and continued functioning as originally intended until 1991. They included the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC), the PALESTINE CENTRAL COUNCIL (created in 1970), and the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE. The PNC was a parliamentary body that was confirmed by the PLO constitution as the PLO's supreme policymaking authority, although in practice it usually set broad policy guidelines of sufficient ambiguity to allow the Executive Committee flexibility in their implementation. The policy guidelines were typically shaped by the PLO leadership and presented to the PNC for discussion and ratification. According to the constitution, PNC members were to be elected by the Palestinian people, though in practice this was never possible because the Arab states did not allow that level of Palestinian organization. Instead, participation was normally the result of negotiations among the leaders of the various resistance groups prior to each PNC session and reflected the relative strength of each faction. Between May 1964 and September 1991, the PNC held twenty regular sessions and one extraordinary session, with 100 to 450 delegates in attendance.

In addition to establishing the framework of PLO policy, the PNC was charged with electing the Executive Committee, although, in actuality, the PNC essentially ratified a list of committee members presented to it after lengthy behind-the-scenes negotiations among resistance group leaders. Consisting of twelve to fifteen members, the Executive Committee was the de facto ruling and decisionmaking body of the PLO, and its composition also reflected the relative strength of the resistance organizations. The Executive Committee also elected the PLO chairman, who, from 1969 until his death in 2004, was Yasir Arafat. The Central Council was an intermediary body consisting of twenty-one to fifty-five members elected by and from the PNC and headed by the PLO chairman. It functioned both as an advisory body to the EC and, in situations requiring an immediate decision when it was impractical to convene the PNC, as a decisionmaking forum.

By 1973–1974 Fatah was by far the most powerful and best organized of all the resistance organizations. It had many thousand more men in its armed forces than the other groups; it controlled most of the mass, civilian organizations; and it dominated all three PLO political institutions. Even with all these caveats, however, the politics of the PLO was remarkably democratic. Arafat could not command obedience but had to persuade and win support. Bargaining and negotiation, give-and-take, and compromise—not fiat—were the norm. The PLO could not have remained organizationally intact, exercised regional and international influence, or maintained its status as the “legitimate representative of the Palestinian people” if the theories, opinions, and policies of each group had not been allowed to play out in a democratic manner. The emphasis on unity and consensus added to the PLO’s legitimacy and mass support, which in turn contributed to the institutionalization of the PLO as the organizational embodiment of Palestinian nationalism. Subsequently, this institutional legitimacy precluded any other group from unilaterally claiming to represent Palestinian interests or pursuing an independent policy. The failure to establish legitimacy by those groups (e.g., Abu Nidal’s organization and the Fatah “dissidents” in 1983) that did split from the organization serves to illustrate this point.

Changing Objectives

During the same period—1969–1991—while the PLO maintained this structural continuity (the leadership of Fatah and the persistence of the political institutions), it radically transformed itself from a national liberation movement to a conservative nationalist organization. In the early period, Fatah leaders were deeply influenced by the revolutions in Algeria and Cuba, the Vietnamese resistance to the UNITED STATES, and Arab nationalism. Thus they espoused objectives similar to those of other twentieth-century, anticolonialist liberation movements, proclaiming their intention of freeing their homeland from foreign oppression and colonialism and of using armed struggle as the means to that end.

Between 1 January 1965 (when Fatah launched its first guerrilla operation) and September 1970 (when King Husayn drove the fida’iyyun from Jordan in Black September), the various resistance groups carried out hundreds of guerrilla operations against Israel. The majority of these were little more than pinpricks that caused relatively few Israeli injuries or deaths. Yet, insofar as they breached Israeli sovereignty, they were an embarrassment to the government, and Israel responded with massive retaliatory strikes on the territory of the Arab states from which the guerrillas operated. The guerrilla operations, regardless of their effectiveness, gave momentum to the Palestinian Nationalist Movement and brought many new recruits to the various groups.

Egypt and Syria both prohibited guerrilla raids from their territories, although, until September 1970, Jordan allowed the fida’iyyun to operate from bases on its soil. King Husayn’s tolerance stemmed from a variety of factors, though primarily from his shaky domestic legitimacy combined with his large population of Palestinian refugees. After Black September, however, Jordan joined Syria and Egypt in prohibiting such operations. The only remaining “front” for guerrilla incursions was Lebanon, to which the guerrillas fled after being driven out of Jordan and where they significantly enlarged an already considerable Palestinian population. Additionally, the period prior to 1970–1971 witnessed major terrorist operations—mainly carried out by the PFLP—such as airline hijackings, the MUNICH OLYMPICS kidnappings, and others.

A late 1967 meeting of Fatah’s Central Committee marked the beginning of the retreat from “liberating” Palestine and the opening of a debate on a democratic secular state program. This innovative concept was based on Western democracies, which meant in practice a state wherein Jews, Muslims, and Christians would live together with equal access to human, civil, and political rights. Fatah’s first public statement on the democratic position was made on 1 January 1968, and it was formally adopted in the political program of the third Fatah General Congress in October 1968. At the fifth PNC session in February 1969, the establishment of a secular democratic state in Palestine became official PLO policy. Israel’s response to this proposal was that it was one more means toward the destruction of Israel. Both Israel and the United States vehemently denounced it, and little more was heard of it as the PLO moved on to the TWO-STATE SOLUTION of a separate Israel and Palestine.

After the dismissive response to its proposal for a democratic secular state, the PLO again altered its goals. At the close of the twelfth PNC in June 1974, the PLO issued its political communiqué that called for the establishment of “a Palestinian national authority in any Palestinian areas liberated from Israeli control.” This was the first formulation of the idea of an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel. A further point in the PNC program stated that the PLO would use “every means” to achieve its ends, implying a retreat from armed struggle. In fact, since 1970, the number of guerrilla operations had drastically declined, both because the PLO was confined to Lebanon and because it had become painfully aware of the futility of such operations in achieving its goals. In another notable event from this period, Arafat wrote to US secretary of state HENRY KISSINGER during the OCTOBER WAR of 1973, declaring the PLO’s willingness to take part in a postwar political settlement. Kissinger declined to reply to the letter, and the Palestine issue was firmly excluded from postwar diplomacy. Additionally, in the aftermath of the 1973 war, Kissinger provided Israel with a memorandum of understanding that pledged, among other things, never to negotiate with or recognize the PLO as long as it did not formally recognize Israel’s right to exist. In 1976, Kissinger engineered a US veto of a UNITED NATIONS Security Council resolution (supported by the PLO and all the Arab confrontation states) that called for a two-state settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Despite Israeli and US abjuration, the PLO achieved considerable international legitimacy. In October 1974 an Arab Summit conference, meeting in Rabat, Morocco, proclaimed the PLO “the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinians.” The following month, Arafat was invited to address the UN General Assembly, where the PLO was accorded the status of an “observer-member.” At the thirteenth PNC in March 1977, the two-state idea was further refined and clearly articulated as policy, and the PLO formally declared its willingness to participate in negotiations for a political settlement. Official PLO policy, then, from 1977 through 1993 (explicitly detailed in 1988 PNC resolutions), was centered on the objective of securing an independent Palestinian state in the WEST BANK, Gaza, and East Jerusalem. It also disclaimed the armed struggle and sought to engage in a diplomatic process that would achieve its goals.

By 1978 PLO guerrilla activity had declined even further, and, in March of that year, in the aftermath of Israel’s first invasion of Lebanon, Arafat agreed to cooperate with a United Nations peacekeeping force (United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, UNIFIL) in South Lebanon. In so doing, the PLO chairman was, by implication, endorsing Security Council Resolution 425, which created UNIFIL’s mandate and specifically mentioned Israel, thus inferring PLO recognition. In the words of one analyst, this commitment “marked a turning-point in the history of the Palestinian resistance movement. . . . It constituted the first open acceptance by the leader of the PLO of a cease-fire agreement with Israel, and Arafat’s decision to co-operate with UNIFIL was subsequently endorsed by all the official PLO bodies.” Again, in July 1981, the PLO accepted a cease-fire agreement, this one mediated by US envoy Philip Habib, which it scrupulously honored for eleven months (in spite of repeated Israeli provocations) until Israel again invaded Lebanon in June 1982 (LEBANON WAR).

In 1979 Austrian chancellor Bruno Kreisky and West German leader Willy Brandt both met with Arafat and issued statements of unqualified support for the PLO's inclusion in the peace process. During the ensuing months, Arafat met with most of the top officials from the European countries, and several conferred diplomatic recognition on the PLO. In June 1980 the European Council issued what came to be known as the VENICE DECLARATION; this declaration distanced itself from UN RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338, which called for Israel's withdrawal from the Occupied Territories in exchange for an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict and referred to the Palestine question only as a "refugee problem." The European declaration called for the Palestinians "to exercise fully [their] right to self-determination" and also recognized the PLO as the legitimate representative of the Palestinians.

Effects of the Lebanon War

The 1982 war dealt the Palestinians a devastating blow. In an intense three-month air, land, and sea campaign, Israel destroyed all the refugee camps in southern Lebanon to end guerrilla operations originating in the camps. It decimated the PLO's entire civilian infrastructure, including the clinics and hospitals of the Red Crescent, the factories of SAMED, the research center and archives, trade union offices, schools and kindergartens, cultural centers, and the PLO's political headquarters. Israel killed some 20,000 individuals, drove the PLO militias from Lebanon, and presided over the massacres in the SABRA AND SHATILA refugee camps. In the aftermath, a mini civil war (the FATAH UPRISING) erupted in the Palestinian camps in Lebanon, and 1983 saw a split in the PLO.

In this, the darkest hour of the resistance, Arafat convened the seventeenth PNC, in Amman, in November 1984. With the exception of Fatah, most of the other resistance organizations chose not to attend. In February 1985 Arafat signed an accord with King Husayn in which the concept of an independent Palestinian state was reduced to the notion of a "homeland" and self-government to a "confederation" with Jordan. The agreement also contained the idea of a joint Jordanian-PLO negotiating team, which, in effect, compromised the status of the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people. In 1985 Arafat made a formal pronouncement in Egypt known as the CAIRO DECLARATION, in which he stated the PLO's condemnation of "all [guerrilla] operations outside [Palestine] and all forms of TERRORISM." The resolutions of the Amman PNC and the HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT were strongly opposed by the majority of Palestinians and never acquired popular legitimacy. In February 1986, they were abrogated.

In April 1987, when the eighteenth session of the PNC convened, the various resistance groups were reunited. The PLO restated the objective of national self-determination in an independent state in part of Palestine. The emphasis on diplomacy was also reiterated, with the PLO calling for an international conference under the auspices of the UN Security Council as the means to facilitate a solution to the question of Palestine. During this session, the Executive Committee declared the Jordanian-PLO agreement (the Husayn-Arafat Agreement) "null and void." Thereafter, Arafat sought by all diplomatic means to make the PLO a full partner in a political settlement.

In March 1988, four months into the First INTIFADA, Arafat again publicly called for an international peace conference to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, with full, independent PLO participation. He declared that the PLO accepted "all UN resolutions on Palestine," including 242 and 338; referred to a 1984 PNC resolution calling for "land in exchange for peace"; and concluded with the statement "With whom am I going to make peace at an international conference? With my enemies, with the Israeli government." In June 1988, at an Arab Summit conference, BASSAM ABU SHARIF, one of Arafat's closest advisers, issued a statement that emphasized the common suffering of Israelis and Palestinians and their mutual desire for peace and security. In September 1988 Arafat addressed, by invitation, the socialist members of the European Parliament in Strasbourg, FRANCE, where he once more stressed the PLO's commitment to negotiations, peace, and justice; to UN Resolutions 242 and 338; to the UN Charter and all its resolutions; and to a two-state solution. He also repeated his denunciation of TERRORISM.

The momentous nineteenth PNC, in November 1988, concretized the PLO's historic compromise, unconditionally defining its territorial objective as an independent state in the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem—comprising 22 percent of historic Palestine—and committing itself solely to peaceful means of struggle. On 13 December 1988 the UN General Assembly convened in a special session in Geneva specifically to hear an address by Arafat after the US government denied him permission to come to New York. In his speech, Arafat reviewed the history of the Palestine issue, discussed the concessions made by the PLO over the years, and unequivocally reaffirmed its commitment to diplomacy and a two-state solution. The following day he gave a press conference in which he spoke of peace as salvation for both Israelis and Palestinians, renounced all forms of terrorism, called for an international peace conference, reiterated the PLO's commitment to Resolutions 242 and 338, and recognized Israel's right to exist.

In response to these cumulative efforts by the Palestinians, on 14 December 1988, the United States reluctantly opened a low-level, short-lived dialogue with the PLO. The talks were conducted through Washington's ambassador to Tunisia, Robert Pelletreau, and involved no high-level US or PLO personnel. Substantively, the dialogue primarily involved US pressure on the PLO to stop the Intifada (in the Occupied Territories) and to relinquish its claim to being the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinians. There were no discussions about a territorial solution for the Palestinians or any other major issue of concern to them. In June 1990, Washington terminated the UNITED STATES-PLO DIALOGUE, eighteen months after its start, ostensibly because the PLO failed to condemn a 30 May aborted raid on Israel by the PLF, following the ACHILLE LAURO affair (1985) by the same group. The PLF is a small faction, backed by IRAQ and headed by ABU AL-ABBAS. Because the PLO refused to submit to the US demand that it expel al-Abbas from its Executive Committee, the United States charged that the PLO was again engaging in terrorism.

Fatah's fifth General Congress was held in August 1989. Mourning Israel's assassination of Abu Jihad (Khalil al-Wazir) in TUNIS four months earlier, it nevertheless reiterated its support for the resolutions taken by the nineteenth PNC and pledged adherence to the principles of international legitimacy. It denounced all forms of terrorism and stressed the need to continue to work for a just and lasting peace. In February 1990 Arafat wrote a letter to the International Conference of World Jewish Leaders, which was meeting in Jerusalem, and made a forceful declaration for peace: "We remain deeply convinced that the only real security guarantee for Israel lies in a peaceful settlement based on the termination of the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territories . . . and the acceptance of the two-state principle that the Palestinian people have already accepted. . . . The option we have chosen is peace. . . . [The PLO] has made all the commitments it can make in favor of a settlement. It has laid the foundations of a comprehensive peace based on international legitimacy and a balance of the interests of all the parties to the conflict. In return, we have received from the Israeli government no positive response and no commitment to the peace process."

In May 1990, following another US visa denial to Chairman Arafat, the UN Security Council convened a special session in Geneva to enable him to address the council, which was attended by all members except the United States. Additionally, because the PLO subsequently refused to submit to the US demand that it expel al-Abbas from its Executive Committee, the United States ended the talks.

Israel continuously used propaganda as a weapon to discredit PLO peace initiatives. For example, the commitment in the organization's original charter to regain all of Palestine was held up as "proof" that the PLO remained committed to the destruction of Israel, even though the objectives laid out in the charter were superseded by PNC resolutions. Although the charter remained an important and potent symbol to Palestinians, Arafat was anxious to convince Israelis and Americans of Palestinian sincerity and finally bowed to pressure to renounce the charter. In a May 1989 interview with the French media, when asked about the issue, Arafat responded, "C'est caduc," meaning, roughly, it is null and void.

Relationship with Arab States

The fact that the Palestinian resistance was not based on its own soil was inherently disadvantageous and left it dependent on Arab "host" states. Thus the PLO was severely restricted by the environment in which it had to function—that is, the nature of the Arab state system. As noted earlier, in considerable measure the structural characteristics of the PLO derived from the circumstance of Palestinian dispersion and displacement. After 1948 the majority of Palestinians were scattered in various countries throughout the Middle East and came under the rule of the Arab regimes and, in turn, the Arab state system. Rhetorically the Arab states supported the Palestinians, but in practice they often worked to undermine the PLO because they feared a confrontation with Israel.

When Fatah became the dominant force in the PLO, it concluded that to strengthen the organization's legitimacy, independence, and influence, the PLO needed to maintain the support of all Palestinian constituencies. At the same time, Fatah did not want to alienate the Arab governments—especially Syria—and it feared that if those resistance groups promoted by Arab states (notably Syrian-sponsored Saiqa and the Iraqi-sponsored Arab Liberation Front [ALF]) were excluded from the PLO, the regimes might act against the organization. Thus the structure of the PLO as an “umbrella” for all the Palestinian and Arab-sponsored groups was established and institutionalized. On the other hand, the politics of unity and consensus constrained the PLO's strategy and tactics to the lowest common denominator that was acceptable to all the factions—Palestinian and Arab-sponsored—and ultimately allowed the Arab regimes to strongly influence Palestinian politics.

This anomalous situation, of lacking an independent base, also made the movement susceptible to Arab state interference, and Arab regimes, seeking to maximize their own state interests, acted in every possible way to dominate the movement's politics. For instance, they created and supported groups such as Saiqa and the ALF that functioned to serve the Arab states rather than Palestinian interests. They also attempted to co-opt genuine Palestinian groups. Moreover, they engaged in overt repression of the PLO (e.g., Jordan in 1970, Syria in 1976, Syria's sponsorship of the Fatah dissidents in 1983 and of Amal in the “CAMPS' WAR” in 1985–1987). The willingness of these regimes to use force against the Palestinians provides clear evidence of the extent of the PLO's subordination to the Arab states. The problematic relationship between the Arab states and the PLO is also evident in the refusal, after 1970, of any Arab regime to permit guerrilla activity from its territory. (Lebanon was the exception, but that was only because it was so continuously wracked by civil insurrection that it was too weak to act against the resistance.) Thus, while the PLO maintained its independence from any one Arab government in the post-1969 period, it was, in essence, dependent for its very existence on the grace of the Arab regimes. This situation was a major determining factor in the transformation of fundamental PLO goals and methods.

In the aftermath of 'Abd al-Nasir's defeat in the 1967 WAR with Israel (and the defeat as well of Jordan and Syria), these regimes were adamant about prohibiting guerrilla activity from their territories for fear of another Israeli attack. Additionally, after the June conflict, the locus of power in the Arab world shifted toward the conservative states—led by SAUDI ARABIA—that had strong ties with the United States. After the 1973 War, the dominance of the conservative order was fully established, and that order involved the recognition, at least de facto, of Israel's permanence in the region. Even Syria, which regularly presented itself as a “radical” state, was prepared to conclude an accord with Israel—as testified to by the 1974 Syrian-Israeli disengagement agreement. After the Arab regimes acquiesced in Israel's existence (though without formal peace treaties), they exerted strong pressure on the PLO to do likewise. To a considerable extent they did so out of fear that an “unchecked” PLO might enmesh the Arab states in an undesired war with Israel. But, in addition, the Arab state system mandated the PLO's abandonment of the democratic secular state concept, because such an idea directly threatened the Arab regimes, whose political authority did not rest on the consent of the governed. Moreover, the “lesson” of the Jordanian repression against the Palestinians in September 1970, implemented by King Husayn but sanctioned by Nasir and the entire Arab state order, was that the Arab regimes were prepared to annihilate the Palestinian resistance if it transgressed the parameters set by the Arab states.

It is also true that the PLO's success in establishing institutional legitimacy derived from the October 1974 Arab Summit decision at Rabat that granted the PLO the status of “sole legitimate representative” of Palestinians. At the same time, the Arab regimes advocated recognition for the PLO at the United Nations, which resulted in Arafat being invited to address the General Assembly in November 1974. But the willingness of the Arab states to confer the Rabat mantle and to lobby the General Assembly came only after the twelfth PNC in June 1974, when the PLO altered its objectives and brought them into line with what was acceptable to the Arab regimes—a Palestinian state alongside Israel and the declared willingness to engage in diplomacy.

Equally significant is that the transformation in PLO objectives and the organization's accommodation to the policies prescribed by the Arab regimes were facilitated through Fatah's leadership. The party had a solid alliance with Syrian-sponsored Sa'iqa and the Marxist DFLP (which owed its existence to Fatah's support for its split from the PFLP). Fatah's control of the PLO's political apparatus—the Executive Committee, the Central Council, and the PNC—facilitated its shaping of PLO policies that accorded with Fatah's objectives. In the final analysis, the wealthy, conservative Arab states “rewarded” Fatah leaders for their promotion of “acceptable” policies—accepting a two-state solution, abandoning armed struggle—by making large financial contributions to the PLO through Fatah. This allowed Fatah to increase its control over the mass organizations, recruit more supporters, and develop the civilian institutions in Lebanon, which Fatah dominated and which, in turn, contributed to Fatah's organizational power.

Israel's Unique Challenges to the PLO

As important as the Arab states' pressure in altering and determining fundamental PLO objectives were factors uniquely related to Israel. These included the ideology Israel espoused as a “national liberation movement,” the successful linking of political ZIONISM with the legacy of the HOLOCAUST and historic ANTI-SEMITISM, and the linkage of biblical images and symbols with concepts of “restoration” and “return.” Indeed, the PLO was not struggling against an ordinary colonial-settler, imperialist regime. Moreover, Israel has been clear and consistent on its policy toward the Palestinians, which can be categorized as absolute rejectionism, expressed in three “no's”: no recognition of the Palestinian right to self-determination, no Palestinian state, and no negotiations with the PLO (though under the Oslo Accords, Israel agreed to negotiate, that is, to engage in process, without altering its substantive opposition to a Palestinian state).

In 1969, Israeli LABOR prime minister GOLDA MEIR denied the existence of the Palestinian people, stating: “It was not as though there was a Palestinian people in Palestine considering itself as a Palestinian people and we came and threw them out and took their country away from them. They did not exist.” In 1975 Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN explained why Israel would never negotiate “with any Palestinian element . . . [stating that to do so would provide] the basis for the possibility of creating a third state between Israel and Jordan,” which Israel would never accept. In 1982 Rabin spoke in support of MENAHEM BEGIN's LIKUD government, again declaring that the PLO could never be a partner to any negotiations,

“because the willingness to speak with the PLO is the willingness to speak about the establishment of a Palestinian state, which must be opposed.”

Israeli refusal to negotiate with the PLO must be viewed in light of the Jewish state's desire to expand into all the territory it considers Eretz Yisrael, the biblical land of Israel. This plan includes Israel's retention of East Jerusalem, the West Bank since 1967, and Gaza (until 2006); the ever-expanding construction of SETTLEMENTS, INFRASTRUCTURE, and military bases therein (including the enormous financial investment involved); and its dependence on Palestinian WATER resources. Additionally, Zionist intellectuals and Israeli leaders have been clear and unequivocal about this objective. For example, Israel's first prime minister, DAVID BEN-GURION, said he “regarded the creation of a Jewish state in part of Palestine as a stage in the longer process toward a Jewish state in all of Palestine.”

In addition, the Zionist movement/Israel was able to forge alliances with Western powers, especially the United States and the Soviet Union. In the post-1967 period, Israel enjoyed the full moral, diplomatic, social, economic, cultural, and military support of the United States, the most powerful state in the international system. Israel became so intertwined with US foreign policy and political culture that Washington buttressed and advanced every aspect of the Jewish state's policy toward the Palestinians. As a result, Israel succeeded in transferring to the United States its hostility toward and rejection of the PLO and its claims.

The European powers, especially during the decade of the 1980s, were far more sympathetic to the PLO. Yet, regardless of their intentions and efforts to advance the Palestinian cause, European states exist, de facto, in a subordinate position to the United States—a situation that places significant limitations on their freedom to maneuver on the international scene. This is nowhere more apparent than in the Middle East, where US oil interests and the special US-Israeli relationship render the Europeans mere bystanders. Indeed, since the 1956 Sinai/Suez crisis, the United States has been the sole external power in the region—challenged only occasionally, and then tepidly, by the Soviet Union and deferred to by London, Bonn, and Paris. Moreover, the Soviet position regarding the Palestinians has been ambiguous at best. As a supposedly “revolutionary” state with a mission to support revolutionary movements elsewhere, its policy toward the PLO has seemed enigmatic. The Soviet Union was the first state to afford de jure recognition to Israel in 1948. Thereafter, convinced that Israel was as socialist as it proclaimed, Moscow pursued it with offers of arms sales. However, Soviet policy changed after the 1956 Sinai/Suez War, when it sought allies among the Arab states; following the 1967 War, Moscow broke diplomatic relations with Israel. Nevertheless, it remained committed to Israel's continued existence as a Jewish state. Thus, when the PLO proposed "liberation" or a secular democracy, it confronted Soviet opposition. The PLO's desire to secure Soviet diplomatic support, arms, and aid was one factor that nudged the PLO toward the two-state proposal. Once it adopted that policy, Moscow rewarded it with all three.

The PLO's Precipitous Decline

While 1988 marked a high point for the PLO, 1990 was a nadir. The Intifada was losing much of its original dynamism and momentum. Israeli repression left West Bank and Gazan Palestinians debilitated, economically enfeebled, and without any political gains to show for their years of struggle. Additionally, Israel initiated a new, more intense settlement drive in the Occupied Territories, while inside the Green Line it expanded its population with several million immigrant SOVIET JEWS. The collapse of the Soviet Union and the end of the Cold War left the PLO without the diplomatic support of a great power. In the Arab world, the PLO was totally isolated from Syria, owing to a long-standing feud between Syrian president Hafez al-Assad and Arafat; its relations with Jordan and Egypt were cool; and its Saudi and Gulf state friends were diminishing their economic aid. Only Iraq appeared to be an ally, but Baghdad's support proved to be the PLO's undoing.

Iraq's 2 August 1990 invasion of Kuwait shifted world attention from the Israeli-Palestinian front to the oil-rich Persian Gulf, leaving the Palestinians even more isolated and vulnerable. When the West, led by the United States, began to prepare for an attack—claiming that the international community could not tolerate an invasion and illegal occupation of one country by another—the Palestinian masses throughout the Diaspora reacted with scorn and outrage at what they saw as US hypocrisy. As the war drew closer, that sentiment was transformed into overt Palestinian support for Iraq, although the initial outpouring of Palestinian sentiment became far more nuanced, complex, and diverse. Arafat, responding to his mass constituency and to the fact that Iraq was the only Arab state providing the PLO with significant financial assistance and strong public support, initially backed Baghdad. The damage to the PLO's image in regional and world public opinion was almost irreversible. Arafat could have ameliorated the harm created in the public perception, but he made the situation worse with vague, ambiguous, and contradictory pronouncements about Iraq. He avoided a public and forthright condemnation of Iraq's actions and refrained from a public call for Iraq to unconditionally withdraw from Kuwait. As a result, the PLO's already shaky fortunes plummeted, and it was politically discredited. European support substantially diminished, and the organization was completely isolated in the Arab world, which was more united behind the United States than it ever had been. Thereafter no Arab state was willing to challenge the United States on issues relating to the Palestinians—even had one been inclined to do so. Moreover, the US-Israeli alliance was firmer than ever. The PLO also experienced financial disaster as its traditional Arab donors cut off aid while remittances from Palestinian workers in the Gulf ceased, because the workers were expelled.

During the spring and summer of 1991, the United States, sensing the need to polish its image among the Arab people (and in turn shore up the pro-US Arab regimes), undertook an intensive venture to catalyze an Arab-Palestinian-Israeli peace process. In mid-July, the United States presented the terms of reference for the MADRID CONFERENCE. In effect, the conference would (1) be chaired by the United States, along with a weak Soviet Union, and not by the United Nations, which would act as an observer, along with the EUROPEAN UNION; (2) be largely symbolic, without any binding power and with indeterminate follow-up meetings; (3) use the relevant UN resolutions—mainly 242 and 338—as a "basis for talks" rather than being binding—that is, "land for peace" was no longer the basis for agreements; and (4) set the stage for separate bilateral talks between Israel and individual Arab states.

In addition, the PLO was prohibited from participating. Israel insisted that the only Palestinian participation could be as a junior member of a joint Jordanian-Palestinian team; Palestinian participants could come from the West Bank and Gaza but not from East Jerusalem and not from the Diaspora; they could have no obvious affiliation with the PLO; and Israel demanded an ultimate veto over each individual who would take part. Additionally, the Palestinians were required to negotiate in two separate stages—the first to reach an interim self-government arrangement in the Occupied Territories and the second to reach a final settlement that would begin only in the third year of the interim period. There were no references to Palestinian self-determination or statehood.

These were highly unfavorable terms for the PLO; indeed, they were, in every respect, at odds with fundamental PLO policies. Yet, in its diminished condition, there was little the PLO could do to influence or alter the US proposal. The issue for the PLO basically boiled down to one of two choices: permit Palestinians from the Occupied Territories to participate, accept the terms as stipulated, and hope that the conference would constitute a first step to more favorable conditions or boycott the conference entirely. The gut feeling of most PLO officials was to boycott, yet the precariousness of the organization's situation made that a risky choice. It could have meant that the Palestinians might be out of the "game" ever after. At the twentieth PNC, convened in Algiers in September 1991, under Arafat's intense pressure a majority was persuaded that it was in the best long-term interests of the Palestinian people to participate in the conference. At Algiers, Arafat negated the principles of unity and consensus on which the PLO had successfully functioned since 1969.

On 30 October 1991, President GEORGE H. W. BUSH opened the first session of the Madrid Conference. Subsequently, there were ten rounds of talks through July 1993, plus innumerable multilateral and bilateral talks on specialized issues such as water and refugees. Yet, despite nearly two years of dialogue, the Palestinians made no progress on any of their objectives. Despair at this lack of headway became disbelieving shock when, in late August, Israel and the PLO announced that they had reached agreement on a "set of principles" to resolve the 100-year conflict between the two peoples. On 13 September 1993, Chairman Arafat and Prime Minister Rabin formally signed the document entitled the "Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements" (also known as the Oslo Accords) in Washington, D.C. The DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES was secretly negotiated in Oslo with Arafat's approval, not participation, and it took place during the last four months of the Madrid talks. The initiative originated with a quasi-governmental organization based in Norway, which persuaded SHIMON PERES and Arafat to send advisors to Oslo to try to craft some agreement.

To many, it was the weakness of the PLO that led Arafat to participate in the OSLO PROCESS. He had nothing left to lose; thus the symbols of power that Oslo conferred—Israel's recognition of the PLO and of Arafat, and his return to Palestine, talks with the Israelis, and mantle of peacemaker, for example—were apparently seductive to the aging leader. Conversely, by practically trading the PLO for the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), he may have hoped that he could extract concessions from Israel that would realize Palestinian rights, including statehood. Moreover, after 1994, when Arafat and the PNA were seated in Gaza, the PNA de facto superseded the PLO. The PLO continues to exist somewhere among a potentiality, a theoretical referent, and a symbol of Palestinian nationalist aspirations. In the post-AL-AQSA INTIFADA era there are individuals from inside the Occupied Territories (the so-called YOUNG GUARD) and individuals in the Diaspora who are attempting to resurrect the PLO, but a democratized, transparent, noncorrupt PLO.

See also CHINA; EUROPEAN UNION; FRANCE; GERMANY; MOSCOW; WAR, 1967; individual Palestinian factions

Bibliography

- Abed, George T. "The Palestinians and the Gulf Crisis." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:2 (Winter 1991).
- Abu Iyad (Salah Khalaf) with Eric Rouleau. My Home, My Land: A Narrative of the Palestinian Struggle. Translated by Linda Butler. New York: Times Books, 1981.
- Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim, ed. The Transformation of Palestine: Essays on the Origin and Development of the Arab-Israeli Conflict. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1971.
- Abu-Sharif, Bassam. "The European Road to Tel Aviv Goes through Washington." Media Monitors Network. 10 September 2001. www.mediamonitors.net/bassamabusharif4.html.
- Agha, Hussein, and Robert Malley. "The Road from Mecca." New York Review of Books. 54:8 (10 May 2007).
- Allan, David, and Alfred Pijpers, eds. European Foreign Policy Making and the Arab-Israeli Conflict. The Hague, Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 1984.
- Alnasrawi, Abbas. "The Arab Economies: Twenty Years of Change and Dependency." Arab Studies Quarterly. 9:4 (Fall 1987).
- Andoni, Lamis. "The PLO at the Crossroads." Journal of Palestine Studies. 21:1 (Autumn 1991).

- Arafat, Yasir. "Letter to an International Conference of World Jewish Leaders, Tunis, 17 February 1990." Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:3 (Spring 1990).
- . "Yasir Arafat, Speech to the UN Security Council, Geneva, 28 May, 1990." Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:4 (Summer 1990).
- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Buettner, Friedemann, and Martin Landgraf. "The European Community's Middle Eastern Policy: The New Order of Europe and the Gulf Crisis." In The Gulf War and the New World Order: International Relations of the Middle East. Edited by Tareq Y. Ismael and Jacqueline S. Ismael. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.
- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Policies. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Fatah. "Final Political Statement of Fatah's Fifth General Congress, Tunis, 11 August 1989." Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:1 (Autumn 1989).
- Frangi, Abdullah. The PLO and Palestine. London: Zed Books, 1983.
- Gabriel, Richard. Operation Peace for Galilee: The Israeli-PLO War in Lebanon. New York: Hill and Wang, 1984.
- Golan, Galia. The Soviet Union and the Palestine Liberation Organization: An Uneasy Alliance. New York: Praeger, 1980.
- . "The Soviet Union and the PLO since the War in Lebanon." Middle East Journal. 40:2 (Spring 1986).
- Greilsammer, Ilan, and Joseph Weiler, eds. Europe and Israel: Troubled Neighbors. Berlin, Germany: de Gruyter Publishing, 1988.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State, 2nd ed. Totowa, NJ: Zed Books, 1988.
- Halevy, David, and Neil C. Livingstone. Inside the PLO: Covert Units, Secret Funds, and the War against Israel and the US. New York: William Morrow, 1990.
- Haley, P. Edward, and Lewis W. Snider, eds. Lebanon in Crisis: Participants and Issues. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1979.
- Hallaj, Muhammad. "Taking Sides: Palestinians and the Gulf Crisis." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:3 (Spring 1991).
- Ibrahim, Nassar. "The European Role in the Middle East: Between Reality and Potential." News from Within (Jerusalem). 17:5 (July 2001).
- Jureidini, Paul, and William E. Huzen. The Palestinian Movement in Politics. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1976.
- Khalidi, Rashid. Under Siege: PLO Decision Making during the 1982 War. New York: Columbia University Press, 1986.
- Khouri, Fred J. The Arab-Israeli Dilemma, 2nd ed. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1976.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. The Palestinians: The Making of a People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Kirisici, Kemal. The PLO and World Politics: A Study of the Mobilization of Support for the Palestinian Cause. London: Frances Pinter, 1986.
- Lesch, Ann M. "The Palestine Liberation Organization." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Makofvsky, David. Making Peace with the PLO. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1996.
- Meir, Golda. Interview. Sunday Times (London). 15 June 1969.
- MERIP Reports. The PLO Split. MERIP Reports No. 119. (November–December 1983).
- Miller, Aaron David. The PLO and the Politics of Survival. Washington, DC: The Center for Strategic and International Studies, Georgetown University, and New York: Praeger Special Studies, 1983.
- Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat: Between Gun and Olive Branch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.
- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Norton, Augustus Richard, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Palestine National Council. "20th Palestine National Council Meeting, Political Statement, Algiers, 28 September 1991." Journal of Palestine Studies. 21:2 (Winter 1992).
- Palmer, John. "The European Community." Middle East International (London). 406 (16 August 1991).
- Quandt, William B., Faud Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Resistance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Rabi, Mohamed. U.S.-PLO Dialogue: Secret Diplomacy and Conflict Resolution. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1995.
- Riad, Mahmoud. The Struggle for Peace in the Middle East. New York: Quartet Books, 1981.
- Robinson, Glenn E. Building a Palestinian State: The Incomplete Revolution. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Rodinson, Maxime. Israel: A Colonial-Settler State? New York: Monad Press, 1973.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. "Conflict and Contradiction in the Relations between the Arab States and the Palestine National Movement." In Palestine: Continuing Dispossession. Edited by Glenn Perry. Belmont, MA: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1986.
- . "The Gulf War, the Palestinians, and the New World Order." In The Gulf War and the New World Order: International Relations of the Middle East. Edited by Tareq Ismael and Jacqueline Ismael. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.
- . Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- . The Palestine Liberation Organization: Its Institutional Infrastructure. Belmont, MA: Institute for Arab Studies, 1982.

- . “Reflections of the Continuity of American Foreign Policy.” In Consistency of US Foreign Policy: The Gulf War and the Iran-Contra Affair. Edited by Abbas Alnasrawi and Cheryl A. Rubenberg. Belmont, MA: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1989.
- Rubin, Barry. Revolution until Victory? The Politics and History of the PLO. Cambridge, MA, and London: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Sahliyeh, Emile. The PLO after the Lebanon War. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1986.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Institute for Palestine Studies Series. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Shemesh, Moshe. The Palestinian Entity, 1959–1974: Arab Politics and the PLO, 2nd ed. London: Frank Cass, 1996.
- Sicherman, Harvey. “Europe’s Role in the Middle East: Illusions and Realities.” Orbis. 28:4 (Winter 1985).
- Smolansky, Oles M. “The Soviet Role in the Emergence of Israel.” In The End of the Palestine Mandate. Edited by W. Roger Louis and Robert W. Stookey. London: I. B. Tauris, 1986.
- Sternhell, Zeev. The Founding Myths of Israel, Nationalism, Socialism, and the Making of the Jewish State. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.
- Tevet, Shabtai. Ben-Gurion and the Palestinian Arabs: From Peace to War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

—Khalil Barhoum

Palestine Liberation Organization Executive Committee

The Executive Committee (EC) of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) is, in practice, the “government in exile” of the yet-to-be state of Palestine. It typically has seventeen to nineteen members who are elected by the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC). Although the PNC is officially the legislative body of the PLO, most actual political power and policy decisions are exercised by the Executive Committee. The EC has full operational authority over all PLO organizations and budgets and directs the activities of the PLO in accordance with the PALESTINE NATIONAL CHARTER and the BASIC LAW. Its members have ministerial positions in the various PLO departments, including foreign affairs, higher EDUCATION, the military, the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, national relations (with Arab states), popular organizations, information and culture, administration, social affairs, economics, planning, health, and finance.

The signing of the OSLO ACCORDS led to a political crisis within the PLO, precipitating the resignation of several members of the EC and marginalizing the committee, as power shifted to those inside the Occupied Territories and away from PLO leadership groups in JORDAN, LEBANON, and TUNISIA. Nevertheless, in juridical terms, the EC is still the de facto sole organ of governance for the Palestinian people, which is why several officials (YASIR ARAFAT, ABU MAZEN, YASIR ‘ABD RABBU, etc.) held double responsibilities—to the EC and to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Norton, Augustus, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Quandt, William B., Faud Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Resistance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl. The Palestine Liberation Organization: Its Institutional Infrastructure. Belmont, MA: Institute for Arab Studies, 1983.

Palestine Liberation Organization Information Office (US)

The PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) first opened a registered (with the Department of Justice) information office in Washington, D.C., in 1978. Under pressure from the Israeli lobby, in 1987 Congress passed the Anti-Terrorism Act, which mandated the downgrading of the PLO office. The law also required that the US president sign a waiver every six months to allow the office to remain open. In 1989 the US government closed the Palestine Information Office as a result of additional pro-Israel lobbying; however, it reopened in 1990 as the Palestine Affairs Center. In 1994 it became the PLO Mission to the United States, although its status continued to require presidential renewal on a semiannual basis. GEORGE W. BUSH temporarily downgraded, and then reinstated, the mission. In what appeared to be a final decision, in a July 2006 memorandum prepared for US secretary of state CONDOLEEZZA RICE, President Bush declared that he was imposing a “downgrade in status of the PLO Office in the United States [for] non-compliance by the PLO and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY with certain commitments.” The first PLO representative in Washington was Dr. Hatem I. Husayni, who later became the first president of al-Quds University in JERUSALEM. He was followed by Hasan Abdul Rahman, and, in 2005, the highly respected diplomat AFIF SAFIYYA was appointed to head the mission. Safiah resigned in 2008 and was replaced by Dr. Nabil Abuznaid.

In 1997 the PLO Mission faced an unsuccessful challenge from Representative John Saxton, who attempted to pass legislation suspending all US contacts with the PLO for three months, including closing the Washington office. In 1999 Senator Jesse Helms attempted to have the PLO Mission closed, but he too failed. After the victory of HAMAS in the 2006 elections for the Palestinian Legislative Council, the United States froze all the US-based PNA assets, substantially limiting the mission’s activities, especially in lobbying and advocacy. Moreover, after the departure in January 2007 of Edward Abington, former lobbyist for PNA president MAHMUD ABBAS, the PLO Mission in Washington, D.C., is considered more of a symbolic presence than a full diplomatic mission. However, the mission remains open and functions at many levels. The PLO has diplomatic missions in almost all other countries. They function as embassies and consulates, and in no other country have they been treated as in the United States.

Bibliography

- Guttman, Nathan. “As Hamas-Fatah Struggle Gains Steam, P.A. Loses Its D.C. Voice.” The Forward (New York). 20 June 2007.
- Stockman, Farah. “Palestinian Authority’s US Assets Are Frozen.” Boston Globe. 30 August 2005.

Palestine Liberation Organization National Council

The PLO National Council (PNC) is the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION’S (PLO) legislative body and the parliament-in-exile of the Palestinian people. As the most representative body in the PLO, the PNC, at least theoretically, is the preeminent decisionmaking institution. The PNC elects the PALESTINE CENTRAL COUN-CIL, which assumes leadership of the PLO between PNC biennial sessions. The PNC also elects a presidential office composed of the chairman, two vice-chairmen, and a secretary. The PNC formulates policies, issues guidelines to the Executive Committee, nominates its members, and passes resolutions by a simple majority with a two-thirds quorum. It represents all sectors of the Palestinian community: political factions/resistance groups, trade unions, professional organizations, and independents have seats in the PNC according to the relative strength (number) of each. Membership varies from session to session due to a variety of factors, especially local conditions, such as travel restriction, prevailing in the countries where Palestinians live. Eighty-four seats are always set aside for representatives from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, but as of this writing, Israel has never permitted any Palestinians from the Occupied Territories to travel to attend PNC sessions (except for the 1996 and 1998 meetings in Gaza).

The first PNC, composed of 422 representatives, met in JERUSALEM in May 1964 and adopted the PALESTINE NATIONAL CHARTER, established the PLO as the political expression of the Palestinian people, and elected AHMAD SHUQAYRI as the first chairman of the PLO Executive Committee. At the conference were representatives from Palestinian communities in JORDAN, the WEST BANK, the GAZA STRIP, SYRIA, LEBANON, KUWAIT, IRAQ, EGYPT, Qatar, Libya, and Algeria. Subsequent sessions were held in Cairo, Egypt; Gaza; Damascus, Syria; Algiers; and Amman, Jordan. At the February 1969 meeting in Cairo, YASIR ARAFAT was appointed chairman of the Executive Committee, hence leader of the PLO.

In the November 1988 meeting in Algiers, the PNC unilaterally declared the independence of the Arab state of Palestine as a state beside Israel (i.e., the TWO-STATE SOLUTION). After the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS, the PNC met in Gaza in April 1996 and voted 504–54 to void parts of the charter that denied Israel’s right to exist. In December 1998, the PNC met in Gaza at the insistence of Israeli prime minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, who called it a condition of the continuation of the peace process. In the presence of US president BILL CLINTON, the PNC reaffirmed the annulment of the parts of the charter that denied Israel’s right to exist.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Norton, Augustus, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Quandt, William B., Faud Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Resistance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl. The Palestine Liberation Organization: Its Institutional Infrastructure. Belmont, MA: Institute for Arab Studies, 1983.

Palestine Monitor

The Palestine Monitor is an information clearinghouse that was created in September 2000 at the outbreak of the Second INTIFADA by the Palestinian NGO Network (PNGO) to provide a Palestinian perspective to the media—especially the foreign media covering the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. Individuals involved with the PNGO sought to rectify what they considered an absence of the Palestinian narrative in television and print reporting. The Palestine Monitor was the PNGO's answer to this problem, with an emphasis on quality of information and analysis in an accessible and user-friendly presentation, especially for foreign audiences. Based in Ramallah, it is available on the Internet, where information and analyses are continually updated about the latest developments in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. In addition, it has several publications, including In Focus, Reports, Newsletter, and Daily Press Briefing. (www.palestinemonitor.org).

See also MEDIA, ISRAELI; MEDIA, PALESTINIAN; AND MEDIA, US

Palestine National Charter

The Palestine National Charter (al-Mithaq al-Qawmi al-Filastini, or the Palestine Covenant) was adopted on 28 May 1964 when the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) was first established in JERUSALEM. It was promulgated along with another document, variously known as the Basic Constitution, Basic Law, or Fundamental Law of the PLO. While the charter addresses the aims of the PLO, the Fundamental Law is concerned with the structure and procedures of the organization.

Although unacceptable to Israel and the UNITED STATES because of its call for the destruction of Israel, the Palestine National Charter served as the foundation of the Palestinian struggle for an independent Palestinian state for thirty-some years. It reflected the hopes and aspirations of a people who had been dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and found themselves, sixteen years later, no better off and with no prospects. The initial charter was an uncompromising document that sought to restore Palestine to Arab rule and refused to accept Israel's "right to exist." It emphasized several points: the total liberation of Palestine, the principle of self-determination, and a definition of "who" was a Palestinian. The means of liberating Palestine were not explicit, although the charter implied that "Arab unity" would accomplish the goal.

Four years later, in 1968, the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC, the PLO parliament) amended the charter to reflect the dominant view of the guerrilla groups in the PLO and placed emphasis on popularly based ARMED STRUGGLE. The amended charter rejected ZIONISM and the partition of Palestine, termed Judaism "a religion . . . not an independent nationality" (Article 20), and called for "the total liberation of Palestine" (Article 21). The charter upheld Arab unity but emphasized that, just as the PLO would "not interfere in the internal affairs of any Arab state" (Article 27), it would also "reject all forms of intervention, trusteeship and subordination by Arab governments" (Article 28). The PNC further determined that the charter could only be amended by a two-thirds vote of the entire membership of the PNC at a special session.

Israel's objections to the charter included the description of the establishment of the state of Israel as "entirely illegal" (Article 19), the definition of Palestine "with its original [BRITISH MANDATE] BORDERS as the indivisible homeland of the Arab Palestinian people" (Articles 1 and 2), the call to eliminate Zionism in Palestine and the world (Article 15), and the demands throughout to "liberate" Palestine.

Beginning in 1974, the PLO moved toward the acceptance of a TWO-STATE SOLUTION and during the 1980s escalated its diplomacy and advocacy through numerous means to attempt to convince Israel of its desire for peace in an independent state alongside Israel on the 22 percent of Mandatory Palestine that remained. Nevertheless, no matter what concessions the PLO made or how far it went in extending its hand in peace, Israel always pointed to the charter, accused the Palestinians of hypocrisy, and demanded that it be amended extensively or negated entirely. In August 1993, Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN insisted on changes to the charter as part of the OSLO ACCORDS. Complying, PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT, in a 9 September 1993 letter of mutual recognition, committed in writing to “submit to the Palestine National Council for formal approval” the changes to the charter; in particular, the letter stated that “those articles of the Palestinian Covenant which deny Israel’s right to exist and the provisions of the Covenant that are inconsistent with the commitments of this letter are now inoperative and no longer valid.” On 24 April 1996, the PNC met in Gaza and adopted the changes proposed by Arafat by a vote of 504–54.

In May 1996 the LABOR government under SHIMON PERES accepted these changes as fulfilling the Palestinian commitments, but Peres’s successor, BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, expressed strong dissatisfaction with the charter amendments and demanded greater clarity and precision. Arafat again complied, this time in the context of the WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM. In January 1998, Arafat wrote letters to President BILL CLINTON and British prime minister Tony Blair explicitly listing the articles of the charter nullified by the PNC’s 1996 vote: the call for Palestinian unity in armed struggle; denial of the legitimacy of the establishment of Israel; denial of the existence of a Jewish people with a historical or religious connection to Palestine; and anti-Israel labels, including Zionism as “racist,” “imperialist,” “fanatic,” “fascist,” and “aggressive.”

Although this was seen as progress in some quarters, most Israeli officials remained unconvinced that the charter had been amended, while Palestinians began to feel that they were being humiliated and opposed further concessions. In an attempt to allay Israeli concerns, Clinton suggested adding a special provision to the Wye River Memorandum containing clarifications and elaborations. Again complying, Arafat drafted a new version of the amendments in a letter on 22 January 1998 to Clinton, who pronounced the letter “acceptable” and publicly thanked Arafat. Following President Clinton, Netanyahu, most LIKUD PARTY officials, and several ministers made positive, public, official statements formally declaring that they agreed that the objectionable clauses of the charter had been abrogated. Unofficially, however, these same officials continued to reject the PLO’s changes to the charter as “meaningless.”

Bibliography

- Abu Iyad (Salah Khalaf), with Eric Rouleau. My Home, My Land. New York: Times Books, 1981.
- Abu Sharif, Bassam. “A Message from the PLO: Give Peace a Visa, London, 28 November 1988.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:3 (1989).
- . “Prospects of a Palestinian-Israeli Settlement, Algiers, 7 June 1988.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:1 (1988).
- Frangi, Abdallah. The PLO and Palestine. London: Zed Books, 1982.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Khalidi, Walid. “Toward Peace in the Holy Land.” Foreign Affairs. Spring 1988.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. The Palestinians: The Making of a People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Lesch, Ann M. “The Palestine Liberation Organization.” In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat: Between Gun and Olive Branch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.
- Palestine National Council. Palestine National Charter. 1–17 July 1968. Full text. July 2003. www.state.gov/p/nea/rls/22573.htm.
- Rodinson, Maxime. Israel: A Colonial-Settler State? New York: Monad Press, 1973.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestine Liberation Organization: Its Institutional Infrastructure. Belmont, MA: Institute of Arab Studies, 1983.
- Sahliyeh, Emile F. The PLO after the Lebanon War. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1986.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Palestine National Council

See PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION NATIONAL COUNCIL

Palestine National Front

The Palestine National Front (PNF) was a WEST BANK coalition of Palestinian leftist-nationalists and Communists, including the Jordanian Communist Party (JCP), which was active from 1973 to 1976. While decisions made by the tenth (1972) and eleventh (1973) PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCILS placed a new emphasis on political organization within the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, there can be little doubt that the decision to form the PNF came from within the territories.

Early in 1972, representatives from the JCP, Palestinian Communists, and Palestinian nationalists from GAZA and the West Bank met in East JERUSALEM and agreed on the need to establish the PNF to oppose OCCUPATION. The JCP members drafted a platform and distributed copies to progressive activists, and in the summer PNF representatives traveled to Amman, JORDAN; Damascus, SYRIA; and Beirut, LEBANON, for consultations with various Palestinian organizations in search of support and acknowledgment. On 15 August 1973, the PNF published its program throughout the territories, and in November the PNF's Central Committee met for the first time.

Throughout the early 1970s, Israel had tolerated the Communists' existence in the Occupied Territories and had allowed them some level of political activity, perhaps because the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) refused to admit the Palestine Communist Party because it rejected ARMED STRUGGLE and recognized Israel's right to exist. Also, since the Communists recognized Israel's right to exist (they had supported UN RESOLUTION 181) and favored political rather than military struggle, they were initially considered less of a threat in Israel's eyes. Additionally, RAKAH, the Israeli Communist Party, had a large Arab contingency, which Israel may not have wanted to alienate. The tolerance was short-lived, however, and in the late fall of 1973, Israel deported eight members of the PNF for their activism in the nationalist struggle.

The PNF was instrumental in nationalist politics and institution building in the Occupied Territories, which made the territories independent of services provided by Israel or Jordan and was an attempt to build independent representative institutions for the conduct of day-to-day political and administrative life. Municipal administration, labor, and EDUCATION were national as well as local issues, and it was in these areas that the PNF was most effective. In late 1974 the PNF resumed its activities, now in coordination with the PLO leadership in Beirut, mobilizing people through 1976 on a mass scale, largely because of the organizational framework established by the JCP and the rising prestige of the PLO. Like its predecessor organization, the NATIONAL LIBERATION LEAGUE, the JCP reached its supporters principally through high school and college student associations.

The PNF made a significant contribution to the PLO's acceptance of diplomacy and the TWO-STATE SOLUTION. The PNF was strongly anti-Jordanian and opposed all PLO-Jordan agreements and alignments, but it supported the GENEVA CONFERENCE and advocated for PLO admission. It supported UN RESOLUTION 242, which called for Israel's withdrawal from the Occupied Territories in exchange for peace, and an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem. In 1974 and 1975, under the direction of the PNF, there was a sharp increase in acts of civil disobedience as well as a few violent incidents in the West Bank. In response, Israel launched a campaign to eliminate the PNF, with DEPORTATION of two prominent leaders, after which the tendency for militant activity was sharply diminished, while the majority within the PNF that favored institution-building activities was strengthened.

It can be argued that the crowning achievement of the PNF was the victory of nationalist candidates in the 1976 ELECTIONS for West Bank municipal councils in a contest between the PLO and Communists on one side and pro-Jordanian politicians on the other. Israel had worked hard to ensure that pro-Jordanian candidates were elected, and its reversal of fortune was a stunning defeat. By one estimate, about 40 percent of the newly elected councilors and about 33 percent of the new mayors were politically nationalistic and/or leftist radical. In particular, the larger West Bank cities, comprising NABLUS, HEBRON, Ramallah, and Tulkarm, reflected Communist and nationalist successes. In BETHLEHEM, the pro-Jordanian mayor ELIAS FREIJ was reelected, but the second-highest number of votes went to Communist George Hazbun. During the following year, several of the mayors mutually cooperated in leadership that openly supported the PLO, including BASSAM SHAKA'A from Nablus, Fahd Qawasmah from Hebron, Karim Khalaf of Ramallah, Hilmi Hanun of Tulkarm, and Ibrahim al-Tawil of Al-Birah.

To punish the nationalists, Israel decreased its contribution to West Bank annual municipal budgets from 30 percent in 1973–1974, to 18.5 percent in 1975–1976, to 17 percent in 1977–1987, and to about 7 percent in 1979–1980. In response, in the spring of 1977, West Bank mayors began traveling to the Gulf States to solicit donations, grants, and loans for their cities. In March, the money began to arrive from Palestinians living in SAUDI ARABIA, who financed the purchase of electrical generators for the city of Nablus. Thereafter, funds and products flowed to all the municipalities. Again, in punishment for their nationalism, Israel forbade the mayors from taking any additional fund-raising trips. Within a short time, FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT and political activities were severely curtailed, the independence of the West Bank nationalist leadership began to erode, and the strength of the leftist-nationalist coalition was greatly diminished.

Despite the fact that, by 1976, the dissolution of the PNF was well under way, the period of 1974 to 1976 could be regarded within the Palestinian national movement as a high point of resistance in the territories and of the role of the PNF as central. By the following year, the organization had disappeared entirely. In 1979, activists unsuccessfully attempted to resuscitate it, but by then both the harshly repressive policies of the LIKUD government and the ascendancy of the right in Palestinian politics contributed to the failure. Still, as the PNF disintegrated, a new nationalist group emerged in the West Bank—the NATIONAL GUIDANCE COMMITTEE, which was formed to coordinate opposition to the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS—and less than a decade later the First INTIFADA erupted.

Bibliography

- Dakkak, Ibrahim. "Back to Square One: A Study of the Re-emergence of the Palestinian Identity in the West Bank, 1967–1980." In Palestinians over the Green Line: Studies on the Relations between Palestinians on Both Sides of the 1949 Armistice Line since 1967. Edited by Alexander Scholch. London: Ithaca Press, 1983.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Kapeliuk, Amnon. "Communists in the West Bank." New Outlook (Jerusalem), 4 May 1980.
- Ma'oz, Moshe. Palestinian Leadership on the West Bank: The Changing Role of the Arab Mayors under Jordan and Israel. London: Frank Cass, 1984.
- Matthews, Weldon C. "The Rise and Demise of the Left in West Bank Politics: The Case of the Palestine National Front." Arab Studies Quarterly. Fall 1998.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Sahliyyeh, Emile. In Search of Leadership: West Bank Politics since 1967. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 1988.
- Saleh, Abdul Jawad. "The Palestinian Non-Violent Resistance Movement." Alternative Palestinian Agenda. 2002. www.ap-agenda.org/11-02/asaleh.htm.
- Tamari, Salim. "Left in Limbo: Leninist Heritage and Islamist Challenge." MERIP Reports. 6 (1992).

Palestine National Fund

The Palestine National Fund (PNF) was set up in 1964 at the first meeting of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL, the legislative body of the PALESTINE

LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), with the purpose of raising money to finance the PLO, in particular the operations of its PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE. In time, the PNF funded, as well, the PLO's social institutions (the Red Crescent, the Research Center, SAMED, and others). Officially, it was named the National Palestinian Fund and was to have a board of directors whose members were to be elected by the Palestine National Council.

According to the Basic Law (constitution) of the PLO, the PNF's sources of funding were to be fixed taxes levied on the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA and collected in accordance with special laws; financial assistance offered by the Arab governments and people; a "liberation stamp" to be issued by the Arab states and used in postal and other transactions; donations on national occasions; loans and assistance given by Arab or other friendly nations; and "Support Palestine Committees," which were to be established in Arab and other friendly countries to collect donations and to support the PLO. In reality, the most important sources of funding for the PNF have been contributions from wealthy Arab states, donations from wealthy Palestinians, a "liberation tax" levied on Palestinians working in other Arab countries, and profits from PNF investments.

The PNF was first headed by Palestinian banker 'Abd al-Majid Shoman. Subsequently it was headed by Hanna Nasir, the deported president of BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY, and later by Jawad Ghusayn.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestine Liberation Organization. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.

Palestine National Liberation Movement

See FATAH

Palestine National Salvation Front

The Palestine National Salvation Front (PNSF) emerged on 25 March 1985 as an umbrella organization for factions within the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) that opposed YASIR ARAFAT's policies in the post-LEBANON WAR (June 1982) period, especially the alliance with JORDAN and his visit to EGYPT. The post-1982 crisis in the Palestinian political order vented itself in a series of divisions, including the FATAH UPRISING, the NATIONAL ALLIANCE, the DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE, and finally the PNSF. The POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP) joined the PNSF, which led to the breakup of the Democratic Alliance that had included the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP) and the PFLP. Based in Damascus, SYRIA, the PNSF was supported by Damascus and headed by Khalid al-Fahum, the pro-Syrian speaker of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC), the PLO's legislative body.

The PNSF rejected the 1985 HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT, which gave up Palestinian independence for a union with Jordan, and the holding of the seventeenth PNC meeting in the Jordanian capital. In its founding statement, the PNSF condemned the accord and called for "action to topple the trend of deviation and relinquishment" within the PLO. In spite of these events, however, the major PLO factions, including the PFLP, continued to recognize the legitimacy of the PNC and the general framework of Palestinian political organization, even while boycotting the PLO. This situation persisted for two years until the PNC's reunification convention in April 1987, when all the dissenting factions returned to the framework of the PNC and PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, which foreshadowed the outbreak of the First INTIFADA in December 1987.

Bibliography

- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Palestine Popular Struggle Front

The Palestine Popular Struggle Front (PPSF, Jabhat al-Kifah al-Sha'bi, sometimes Popular Struggle Front) is a small faction that was founded in 1968 by Bahjat Abu Gharbiyya and Fayiz Hamdan. The PPSF's most prominent attack, possibly the only one of significance, was the 1970 hijacking of an Olympic Airways jet to Cairo. With the Red Cross mediating, the group successfully negotiated the release of a number of imprisoned Palestinian militants, including PPSF member Mildos Dergarabedian and Mansour Marad, who later became a member of the Jordanian parliament.

Until the events of September 1970 (BLACK SEPTEMBER), the PPSF was based in JORDAN and then in LEBANON until the Israeli invasion of 1982, after which the group relocated to Damascus, SYRIA. Today its members, which number fewer than 300, are based mostly in Syria and Lebanon, and the PPSF has almost zero presence in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. In Palestinian politics, the PPSF has generally followed the FATAH/PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION position and supported the OSLO ACCORDS.

Bibliography

- National Memorial Institute for the Prevention of Terrorism. MIPT Terrorism Knowledge Base: A Comprehensive Data Bank of Global Terrorist Incidents and Organizations. n.d. www.tkb.org/Group.jsp?groupID=4183.
- Sahliyyeh, Emile. The PLO after the Lebanon War. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1986.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Palestine Rejection Front

The Palestine Rejection Front (Front of the Palestinian Forces Rejecting Solutions of Surrender) was a minority current, but nonetheless significant, in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). Established in 1974 in Baghdad and active until 1977, the front was supported by IRAQ and initially included four Palestinian groups: the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), the ARAB LIBERATION FRONT (ALF), the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND (PFLP—GC), and the PALESTINE POPULAR STRUGGLE FRONT (PPSF). Later the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (PLF) joined the Rejection Front.

The emergence of the front grew out of the PLO's adoption at the twelfth PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC) in 1974 of the "Ten Point Program," which authorized the PLO to establish an independent national authority for the Palestinian people on any part of Palestinian territory that could be liberated. This was the genesis of the TWO-STATE SOLUTION. Groups who joined the front adamantly rejected PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT's and FATAH's efforts to alter the PLO's objectives from the liberation of all of Palestine to the acceptance of a two-state solution and to transform its tactics from ARMED STRUGGLE to diplomacy—both of which it considered a betrayal of the national cause. The PFLP and other rejectionist groups froze their membership in the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE and announced they would never accept the “surrenderist solutions” adopted by Arafat.

Israel’s defeat of SYRIA and EGYPT in the 1973 October War had made a strong impact on the mainstream PLO leadership, which came to believe that Palestinian objectives could only be realized through diplomacy. Therefore, Fatah began to develop a strategy aimed at obtaining recognition of the PLO by the Arab states and the international community as a preliminary stage to the PLO’s participation in international negotiations. The decisions of Arafat and Fatah brought a number of successes to the PLO, and the PLO’s new program was accepted by virtually the entire international community, with the exception of the United States and Israel.

Meanwhile, Rejection Front organizations used cross-border attacks (from LEBANON into Israel) to demonstrate their militancy and to derail the PLO’s diplomatic moves. Fatah and the DFLP were pressured to use similar attacks to advertise their continued commitment to armed struggle. In 1977, however, the Palestine Rejection Front began to rethink its positions, and in 1978, member groups rejoined the PLO. By 1980, the front ceased to exist as an independent organization.

Bibliography

- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Jabber, Fuad. “The Arab Regimes and the Palestinian Revolution, 1967–71.” Journal of Palestinian Studies. 2:2 (1973).
- Khalidi, Rashid. “The Palestinian Dilemma: PLO Policy after Lebanon.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 15:1 (1985).
- . “The Resolutions of the 19th Palestine National Council.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:2 (1990).
- Kurz, Anat, ed. International Terrorism. Tel Aviv, Israel: Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, Project on Terrorism and Jerusalem Post, 1988, 1989.
- Lukacs, Yehuda, ed. The Israeli-Palestinian Conflict: A Documentary Record. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Merari, Ariel, and Anat Kurz, eds. A Review of International Terrorism. Tel Aviv, Israel: Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, Project on Terrorism and Jerusalem Post, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987.

Reppert, John. “The Soviets and The PLO: The Convenience of Politics.” In The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Edited by Augustus Richard Norton and Martin Greenberg. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.

Rubenberg, Cheryl. “The Structural and Political Context of the PLO’s Changing Objectives in the Post-1967 Period.” In The Arab-Israeli Conflict: Twenty Years after the Six-Day War. Edited by Yehuda Lukacs and Abdalla Battah. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1988.

Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Taylor, Alan. “The PLO in Inter-Arab Politics.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 11:2 (1982).

Palestine Research Center

The Palestine Research Center, established in Beirut in 1965 and one of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION’S (PLO) most important social institutions, serves as a repository of Palestine’s historical, political, social, and cultural heritage. During the 1982 LEBANON WAR, Israel confiscated the entire archive, and, after the war, only a single office associated with the center (headed by long-time PLO representative to Lebanon SHAFIQ AL-HUT) remained in Beirut. On 3 February 1993, the facility that had housed the archive was devastated by a car bomb, and thereafter it was closed by the Lebanese army. In December 1983, Israel returned the major collection to the Palestinians, and it was subsequently reconstituted in Cyprus. When the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) was established in GAZA pursuant to the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS, one of PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT’S first priorities was moving the entire collection from Cyprus to Gaza, which he was successful in achieving.

The Research Center comprises some 25,000 volumes in Arabic, Hebrew, English, and French, in addition to microfilms, manuscripts, and documents. The collection is divided into three general areas: documentation, research, and information. The center has its own printing press and publishes books, pamphlets, and a scholarly journal—Shu’un Filastiniyya (Palestinian Affairs). Since its inception, the center has published some 400 books and pamphlets and translates many of its publications into foreign languages, including English, French, German, Dutch, Spanish, Italian, and Japanese.

Palestine Right to Return Coalition

See AL-AWDA

Palestine Royal Commission

See PEEL COMMISSION

Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs

The Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA) is an educational organization that was founded in JERUSALEM (with a second institution in Ramallah, WEST BANK) in March 1987 by Dr. Mahdi Abd al-Hadi and several other Palestinian academics and intellectuals. A financially independent nonprofit institution, PASSIA seeks to present the Palestinian question in its national, Arab, and international contexts through academic research, dialogue, and publications. Through its international and intra-Palestinian symposia and workshops, PASSIA provides a forum for free expression and analysis of a plurality of Palestinian perspectives and methodology and strives to develop and clarify its own and others' understanding of international relations as they affect the Palestinian struggle for justice and peace. (www.passia.org).

Palestinian Armed Struggle

See ARMED STRUGGLE, PALESTINIAN

Palestinian Center for Human Rights

The Palestinian Center for Human Rights is an independent legal body based in Gaza City that is dedicated to protecting human rights, promoting the rule of law, and upholding democratic principles in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Established in 1995 by a group of Palestinian lawyers and human rights activists, under the directorship of Raji Sourani, the center documents and investigates human rights violations, provides legal aid and counseling to both individuals and groups, and prepares research articles relevant to issues such as the human rights situation and the rule of law in the Occupied Territories. The group holds special consultative status with the Economic and Social Council of the UNITED NATIONS and is an affiliate of the International Commission of Jurists (Geneva), the Fédération Internationale des Ligues des Droits de l'Homme (Paris), the Euro-Mediterranean Human Rights Network (Copenhagen), and the International Legal Assistance Consortium (Stockholm). In 1996 it was a recipient of the French Republic Award for Human Rights. (www.pchrgaza.org).

Palestinian Center for the Study of Non-Violence

The Palestinian Center for the Study of Non-Violence was founded by Dr. Mubarak Awad to promote nonviolent action as an effective means for citizen diplomacy and the resolution of conflict as well as to offer an alternative to violence. In 1988 Awad was deported by Israel, who considered his nonviolence a threat to its security, and the center was closed. In the context of the OSLO PROCESS of the early 1990s, Israel allowed the center to reopen. It remains grounded in Awad's Gandhian philosophy and practice. Based in East JERUSALEM, it is an affiliate of Nonviolence International. One of its projects, "Islam and Peace," or "Non-Violence in Islam," aims to critically examine the intellectual, cultural, and spiritual resources for peace and nonviolent change that would lead to democratization in Palestine and other Islamic societies.

See also NONVIOLENCE IN ISRAEL/PALESTINE

Bibliography

Dajani, Souad. "Nonviolent Resistance in the Occupied Territories: A Critical Re-evaluation." In Nonviolent Social Movements: A Geographical Perspective. Edited by Stephen Zunes, Lester R. Kurtz, and Sarah B. Asher. New York: Blackwell Publishing, 1999.

New York Times. "Israel Overreacts to Nonviolence." Opinion. 18 May 1988.

Palestinian Cinema

See CINEMA, PALESTINIAN

Palestinian Citizens of Israel

The Palestinian Arab citizens of Israel are those individuals and their descendants who remained on the land of Palestine that became Israel in 1948; this excludes those Palestinians living in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. At once Israeli citizens and Palestinian, they constitute one dimension in the complex Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In Israel they are a distinct and unequal minority, essentially excluded from national decisionmaking and unable to materially alter their situation. Their situation derives from the fact that Israel is constructed as a Jewish state—for Jews and by Jews—and non-Jews do not share equally in the resources (power, privilege, economic, social, or cultural) of the state. Israeli Arabs, as they are referred to by Israel, make up 17 to 20 percent of the country's total population, depending on the balance of Jewish in- and out-migration. They also constitute approximately 11 percent of the total, global Palestinian population but have tended to be overlooked by the dominant trends in the Palestinian national movement, including that of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). At the same time, Israel's Palestinian citizens have overwhelmingly poured their political energy into struggles for equality within Israel rather than into Palestinian nationalist struggles. Almost universally, these Palestinians believe there should be a Palestinian state in the WEST BANK, GAZA, and East JERUSALEM, but most also say that given the proposal of two states (Israeli and Palestinian) living side by side in peace, they would prefer to live in Israel and continue to struggle for their full rights there.

In 2009, Israel's total population, according to figures released by the Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS), stood at 7,411,000. Some 5,593,000 of the population (75.5 percent) are Jewish Israelis; 1,498,000 (20.2 percent) are Israeli Arabs; and the remaining 320,000 (4.3 percent) are immigrants and their offspring who are not registered as Jews by the Interior Ministry, including some 200,000 foreign workers. This demographic distribution has profound implications for Israeli policymakers; a fundamental government objective is preventing an Arab majority in any given area because Israel deems such a DEMOGRAPHY a "security" threat to the Jewish state. Approximately 92 percent of the Palestinian population live in urban or village communities, and 8 percent live in the UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES.

Palestinian annual population growth averages 3 percent but with slight regional differences. The Palestinian gender distribution is 51 percent male and 49 percent female. The Palestinian community is young: those 25 and younger constitute 59.1 percent of the overall population, and the average age is 19.7 years.

The Palestinian community is also poor. In 2006, 56 percent of Israeli Arabs lived below the poverty line, compared to 16 percent of Israeli Jews. Also, the average level of poverty among Palestinian children is twice that of their poor Jewish counterparts, and poverty among Israeli Palestinians has increased by 50 percent since the early 1990s. In 2003, the average annual income for Israeli Arab families was NIS 99,000 ($22,200), while the average annual income for Israeli Jewish families was NIS 138,000 ($30,900), and the average annual income for non-Orthodox Jewish families was NIS 145,000 ($32,500). In 2009 life expectancy for Israeli Jews significantly exceeded that of Israeli Arabs. Jewish women live an average of 82.5 years and Jewish men live 78.8 years. For Israeli Arabs that number falls by 4.0 years for men and 3.8 years for women.

Israel as an Ethnocracy

Democracies typically have laws and norms that ensure freedom and equality under the law for all citizens as well as institutional arrangements designed to ensure that minorities' rights are protected. Rather than being a democracy, by this definition, Israel is instead an "ethnocracy." The concepts guiding ethnocratic regimes are control of active minority ethnic or racial groups by the state apparatuses, allocation of resources and power on the bases of ethnicity (and religion) instead of citizenship, and gradual ethnicization of the politics that emerge according to ethnic strata. For example, Israel's IMMIGRATION policy, which was legalized in the LAW OF RETURN, is only for Jews, while Palestinians are excluded from this right. Its policies concerning LAND distribution, namely Israel's confiscation of Palestinian land, are also enshrined in law. And there is an enormous discrepancy between Israel's allocation of resources for the development of Jewish cities and villages and the small sums provided to non-Jewish municipalities. In all areas—the Knesset, courts, media, and others—the Hebrew/Jewish culture holds central status.

Israel allows its Palestinian citizens to practice basic rights such as voting and standing for election and, since 1966, has allowed them to freely express their views as well as practice freedom of movement and assembly. On the other hand, the state ensures the supremacy of Jews in all areas, including national legislation and decisionmaking. Israel is a state that identifies with a singular nationalist/ethnic/religious group—Jews. The state’s resources—land, symbols, or finances—are distributed on an ethnic basis and are overwhelmingly allocated for the benefit of Jews.

The political activity undertaken by Palestinians in Israel to express their needs and demands is diverse but limited in its capacity to bring about meaningful change in their living conditions, status, and situation. As a Jewish state, Israel’s fundamental obligation is to advance the interests of Jews. Thus the very character of the state is an impediment to real change in the situation of Arabs within the state. The situation of Palestinian citizens began to deteriorate in 2000, plummeting in 2008–2009. In 2008, Palestinian intellectual Ali Abunimah wrote, “Israeli society is in the grip of a wave of unchecked racism and incitement that seriously threatens Israel’s Palestinian Community.”

On 1 October 2000, Israeli police used live ammunition against unarmed civilians demonstrating their solidarity with Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. Thirteen Palestinians, of whom twelve were Israeli citizens, were shot dead. More than one thousand Arab Israelis were arrested in the first few months of the Intifada. Israel’s Arab citizens were denounced as the “enemy within” and as a fifth column, and Arab Knesset members were portrayed as arch-traitors. Chief of Staff Moshe Ya’alon described Israeli Arabs as a “cancerous manifestation.”

An official commission, headed by Judge Theodor Or, was appointed to look into the events that came to mark the deterioration in Arab-Jewish relations inside the country. In 2003, the Or Commission confirmed that the police used “excessive” and unjustifiable force, reported that the police viewed the country’s Arab citizens as “enemies,” and documented a pattern of “prejudice and neglect” toward them by Israel’s establishment. While the Or Commission recommended a number of measures to redress the sharp disparities between Jews and Arabs in the country, families of the victims regarded the report as a whitewash. The commission failed to examine the forensic evidence in each of the killings, and none of the killers, or any responsible official, was ever brought to justice. By 2007, according to Elie Rekhess of the Moshe Dayan Center at Tel Aviv University, “There remained ‘yawning’ gaps between Jews and Arabs in Israel and the bottom line is that the conclusions and recommendations of the 2003 Or Commission remain conspicuously unimplemented.” Since then, twenty-seven Israeli Arab citizens have been killed by the police. There has been only one conviction with a token fifteen-month sentence handed out for the shooting of Mahmoud Ghanaïm in the head at point-blank range.

The October 2000 event and the lack of response to the Or Commission’s findings are the backdrop to the later period of confrontation. Amid the increasingly precarious situation of Palestinian citizens of Israel, prominent and broadly representative leaders of that community published in 2007 a series of documents setting out visions for Israel as a state of all its citizens with equality for all.

It is possible to analyze the basic character of the state on three levels: ideological-declarative, structural, and policy implementation.

1. Ideological-declarative. Israel’s goals, symbols, and policies are premised on its being a Jewish state, and Palestinian Arabs—even citizens—do not have equal status in this state. An amendment to the Basic Laws of the Knesset in 1985 prohibits election slates that do not expressly recognize the state of Israel as the state of the Jewish people. Legally and formally, this situation leaves Palestinian citizens in Israel without any formal entity defined as their state.

The Israeli national anthem, “Hatikva” (The Hope), written by a Galician Jew and set to music in Palestine in the early 1880s, is about the undying hope of the Jewish people to someday return to independence in their homeland. Israel’s flag includes two blue stripes on a white background with a Shield (Star) of David in the center, inspired by the tallit (the prayer shawl with blue stripes worn by Jews during prayer). The Star of David is a common Jewish symbol of biblical times. The Israeli emblem consists of a menorah with an olive branch on either side, a potent symbol in Jewish history found in every synagogue. In comparison with Jews, for whom the symbols, values, and institutions of the state embody their Jewishness and reinforce their traditions and identity, Palestinian citizens are estranged and unable to identify with them because they are rooted exclusively in the religious and ethnic heritage of another group.

The symbolic or ideological sphere continues to grow more difficult for Palestinians. Writing in Ha’aretz in August 2009, Ron Gerlitz, executive director of Sikkuy: The Association for the Advancement of Civic Equality in Israel, discussed some of the new difficulties: “Material discrimination against Israel’s Arab citizens is pervasive and well documented. It manifests itself in almost every sphere of life: welfare and development budgets, funding for education, land allocation and more. Recently, though, we have been witness to a growing and disturbing trend: the attempt to deprive Arabs of certain intangible, or symbolic, rights.

“Take the way the state relates to Arabic, which together with Hebrew is an official language [English is not] that at a minimum means all government offices must publish all official documents in both Arabic and Hebrew. Signs on Israel’s highways are trilingual—in Hebrew, Arabic and English. And yet, anyone who travels those roads will encounter an almost totally Jewish public space, even in areas with a predominantly Arab population. For example, at many major intersections, though the signs may be in three languages, they designate the routes to Jewish communities while ignoring the Arab ones. To add insult to injury, the minister of transportation now plans to replace the Arabic names of destinations, with the Arabic transliterations of their Hebrew names.

“Both of these practices seem to reflect a more general trend, whose clear message seems to be that intangible assets—such as names of cities, streets and mountains; the linguistic and cultural character of public spaces; and the historical narrative children learn at school—all belong to Jewish Israelis alone.”

Gerlitz further observed that in practice Arabic is treated as inferior, and the obligations inherent upon the state from its official status are routinely neglected. The text of the website of the Interior Ministry, for example—perhaps the most critical ministry in terms of its oversight of domestic concerns, including those related to citizenship, construction, and local government—is in Hebrew only, with a small English translation of its main title. There is no Arabic. This is also true for the sites of most other ministries. “And when one travels on Israel Railways, the conductor informs passengers of approaching stations in Hebrew, and sometimes English but never in Arabic. This happens even when the next station is in the BEDOUIN city of Rahat in the Negev.”

Israel also has hundreds of publicly funded museums and cultural institutions celebrating Jewish and Zionist history and culture. Their brochures and other explanatory texts are available only in Hebrew and, at times, English. But more significant is that there are no such publicly funded institutions commemorating Palestinian history or culture from a Palestinian perspective. The result is that Palestinian history is absent not only from school textbooks, but also from the general cultural-historical sphere: it becomes an unknown—not only to Israel’s Jews, but even to Arab citizens, unless they learn it at home.

Gerlitz concludes: “Such exclusion from the Israeli symbolic realm and discourse generates a sense of disorientation and alienation among the Arab public—a feeling of being a stranger in one’s own land. . . . Implicit in the rhetoric that justifies this exclusion ‘campaign’ is the sense that there is a need to strengthen Israel as a state inclusive of all Jews, but totally exclusive of Arab citizens, who ‘should thank us for letting them stay here.’ This feeling may be fueled by fears that sharing the intangible symbolic spheres is potentially dangerous to the State of Israel. Exactly the opposite is true. The continued exclusion of Arabs is a most dangerous process, because it conveys a clear message to Palestinian citizen, one that says, ‘You are not authentic members of this state.’ Dissemination of such a message to a large national minority is a recipe for alienation and escalation of domestic conflict. And demanding new and outward expressions of ‘loyalty’ to the state at the same time can only exacerbate such feelings.”

2. Structural. Arabs in Israel find themselves excluded from Israeli institutions, which are considered to be the purview of Jewish citizens. Palestinians are kept at a distance from key centers of political decisionmaking, are not conscripted into the armed forces (which involves broader exclusions), and are not hired for senior positions. Such political exclusion also includes the systematic underfunding and discriminatory structuring of Arab education, the discrimination in the institutions of the mass media, and the existence of lesser civil institutions serving Arabs only.

3. Policy implementation. This level includes various kinds of discrimination relating to laws, the distribution of state financial resources, and the allocation of territory. Legal discrimination involves the state’s basic goals as they are expressed by its leaders and by the Jewish majority. For example, the Law of Return and the Law of Citizenship are intended to preserve and augment the Jewish majority of the state and reduce the number of non-Jews, including specifically Palestinians. This is also obvious in the special legal status of non-Israeli Jewish institutions and Amendment 7A to the Basic Law of the Knesset, 1985. In addition, there is a whole series of legal arrangements that discriminate against Arabs and give preference to Jews. In the realm of resource distribution, research has verified in comparisons of various indicators that the gaps between allocation to Jewish and Arab communities arise mainly from outright discrimination and remain substantial.

At the level of policy implementation, too, Palestinian citizens of Israel have found themselves increasingly threatened. In 2003 the Knesset passed the Citizenship Law, which prevents Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza who marry an Israeli Arab from moving to Israel with their spouses. In May 2009, cabinet ministers voted to introduce a pair of bills to parliament, the first of which would institute a loyalty oath as a requirement for citizenship. The second would outlaw public expressions of grief over the Palestinian displacement in 1948—known as the Nakba, or catastrophe—on Israel's Independence Day holiday. The proposal to ban Nakba observances suggests a three-year jail term for public expressions of “mourning” on Israeli Independence Day. Additionally, draft legislation was prepared for a loyalty oath requiring all citizens to declare “loyalty to the State of Israel as a state that is Jewish, Zionist, and democratic, to its symbols and values,” and to promise to fulfill national service requirements before receiving identity cards.

The proposals have since been watered down somewhat, and it is highly unlikely they would pass the required three readings in the Knesset. But their effect has already been internalized. Moreover, Education Minister Gideon Saar plans to drop the word “Nakba” from Arab textbooks, while introducing classes on Jewish heritage and Zionism in Arab schools. Future budgets for schools will be linked to the percentage of students going on to perform military service. This would adversely affect Arab schools. As it is, Jewish schools currently receive nine times more funding per child than Arab schools. AVIGDOR LIEBERMAN, foreign minister and deputy prime minister in the government of BENJAMIN NETANYAHU (elected March 2009), announced that training for the diplomatic service would only be open to those who had completed military service. (In 2009 only 15 of the Foreign Ministry's 980 employees were Arab, a pattern reflected across the civil service sector.) The housing minister, Ariel Atias, demanded segregation between Jews and Arabs and launched a drive to “Judaicize” the Galilee where most Arabs live, to prevent any land swap in a peace deal with the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. Meanwhile, Interior Minister Eli Yishai approved a wave of HOUSE DEMOLITIONS in Arab towns.

Government ministers have made provocative verbal attacks on Arab Knesset members, suggesting that they would be legitimate subjects for TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS. Lieberman said, “Our central problem is not the Palestinians, but AHMAD TIBI [an Arab member of the Knesset] and his ilk—they are more dangerous than HAMAS or the [ISLAMIC] JIHAD combined.”

Other statements have been aimed at delegitimizing, intimidating, and threatening with expulsion Palestinian citizens of Israel for exercising their democratic rights. In early March, thousands of Palestinian citizens staged a peaceful rally attended by several Arab members of the Knesset to protest Israel's military attacks in the Gaza Strip. In the Knesset, former cabinet minister Effie Eitam accused the Arab legislators of “treason” for participating in the rally, adding, “We have to drive you out, as well as everyone else who took part” in the demonstration. Days later, Lieberman repeated the ethnic-cleansing threat in the Knesset, telling Arab members, “You are temporary here,” and “One day we will take care of you.”

Israeli extremists appear to be getting the message. Representatives of three Arab parties have reported that their Knesset members have been receiving death threats in the mail daily. A spokesman for one Knesset member said, “We have always received threats but they have recently escalated to the point where we are growing truly concerned.”

This atmosphere gave rise to two cases of ethnic-based rioting. The first, on 10 March 2008, occurred a week after a Palestinian opened fire in the MERCAZ HARAV KOOK YESHIVA in JERUSALEM, killing eight students, apparently in revenge for Israel's killing of dozens of civilians in Gaza. Hundreds of Israeli Jews converged on the Palestinian neighborhood of Jabel Mukaber in occupied East Jerusalem where the gunman's family lived. In what Ha'aretz termed an “organized, synchronized pogrom” the mob threw stones at Palestinian homes, smashing windows and destroying water tanks; damaged cars; and shouted “Death to the Arabs,” while police made little effort to stop them. Ha'aretz further observed that such an attack “could never take place in a Jewish neighborhood,” and noted that while “Israel and the Jewish world raise a huge cry over every suspicion of an attack on Jews because of their ethnicity, it is intolerable that residents of the capital [sic] are attacked solely because of their nationality.”

One of the most blatant examples of public incitement in the days before the attack on Jabel al Mukaber was a circular widely distributed and posted around Jerusalem and in West Bank settlements. Signed by a long list of rabbis, it called for acts of revenge on Palestinians in retribution for the Mercaz HaRav shooting: “Each and everyone is required to imagine what the enemy is plotting to do to us and match it measure for measure.” Among the signatories was Rabbi Ya’acov Yosef, son of Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the former Sephardic chief rabbi of Israel and spiritual leader of Shas, a party in the coalition governments of both Ehud Olmert and Benjamin Netanyahu. The younger Yosef is himself a former Knesset member representing Shas. Another signatory, Rabbi Uzi Sharbav, was one of a group of extremists who murdered three Palestinian students at a school in the West Bank city of Hebron and set off bombs that maimed the mayors of Nablus and Ramallah in the early 1980s. Sharbav served a short prison sentence for the murders but was pardoned and freed with other extremists by Israel’s president in 1990.

Although the mob action had been planned and advertised days in advance, the Israeli police did nothing to prepare for it. “The district police didn’t need to be surprised,” said the former Jerusalem district police commander Mickey Levy. “There was no need to collect intelligence, it was right there in their hand. Appropriate preparation was called for in order to prevent the violent demonstration.” In Abunimah’s concluding words, “This event indicates that Israel’s official institutions have failed to learn any lessons from the Or Commission report but also serves as a warning sign of worse to come, against a backdrop of highly tolerated public incitement and widespread racist attitudes towards Arabs.”

The second incitement, on 24 March 2009, was a march on the Israeli-Palestinian town of Umm al-Fahm, organized by some of the most extremist individuals in Israel, including Baruch Marzel, Itamar Ben-Gvir, and member of the Knesset Michael Ben Ari (NATIONAL UNION), all former members of the late MEIR KAHANE’S KACH party, which was outlawed in 1994 and is considered a terrorist organization. Ben-Gvir declared on his way to the march, “Our statement is loyalty to the state of Israel. There are a bunch of law-breakers in Umm al-Fahm that think they will win with violence. The state of Israel is the state of the Jewish people [i.e., there is no place for Arabs in it]—we are here to tell our truth and not to provoke.” About one hundred activists waving Israeli flags, backed by 2,500 police in riot gear to protect them, marched through the outskirts of the town. Israeli-Arab residents of Umm al-Fahm, who considered the marchers racist, had called a general strike, but said they would use peaceful methods to prevent the activists from entering the town. “Racism is not freedom of expression, it’s a criminal act and the law should punish it,” Israeli member of the Knesset Jamal Zahalka told the APF news agency.

Residents of Umm al-Fahm held a counter-demonstration, and police responded with stun grenades, water cannons, and tear gas, and had undercover officers among the crowd who arrested thirteen for throwing stones. Twenty-seven people were injured, including fifteen policemen. Umm al-Fahm is the town in which thirteen Palestinians demonstrating in support of the Palestinians under Occupation were shot to death on 1 October 2000. It is a nationalist town, but it is a curious kind of nationalism. The residents of Umm al-Fahm have repeatedly asserted their desire to remain part of Israel while they support the right of West Bank and Gazan Palestinians to have an independent state. Their main desire is that Israel become “a state of all its citizens” rather than an exclusionary Jewish state. Leonard Fein, writing in the Jewish newspaper The Forward, commented that the march itself was not so important, but it was about something, “something big and growing—to wit, the unresolved dilemma of the place of some 20 percent of Israel’s people.”

With respect to the distribution of land, there is long-standing discrimination in national and regional development plans. The vast majority of land that belonged to Palestinian citizens was confiscated between 1948 and the present. Various means have been employed to divest the Arabs of their land, most of which became STATE LAND, which is centrally administered by national and regional planning commissions. On these commissions, the Israeli Ministry of Defense, the Ministry of Housing and Construction, the JEWISH AGENCY

FOR ISRAEL, and the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND have permanent representation. The latter two, together with the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, are constituted by Jewish communities abroad and are meant to serve the interests of the Jewish people globally at the same time that they enjoy quasi-governmental status as NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS of the state. This necessarily involves ignoring Arabs as potential beneficiaries of State Land. In practice, Israeli planning policy is designed to serve Jews, and Palestinians by default are entitled to little or nothing. Ninety-three percent of the land in Israel cannot be rented, leased, bought, or otherwise used by Arab citizens. Planning policy thus becomes a tool for control of the Arabs; it requires massive investment in the establishment of Jewish towns with land reserves for future development (for example, the creation and development of NATZERAT ILLIT, the strategically placed Jewish town surrounding Palestinian NAZARETH) and contributes to the Judaization of Galilee.

Palestinians' Internal Crisis

The Palestinians in Israel are facing a deep internal crisis that permeates their social, political, economic, and cultural life as well as their collective identity. The crisis is manifest on two levels that are intertwined: the daily practical and the general strategic. The daily practical predicament is expressed in the population increase and physical expansion of the community, which are not matched by increased inclusion in Israel's power structure, by an innovative (Arab) political leadership, or by appropriate economic development of the Arab sector. On the general strategic level the predicament is expressed in an identity crisis, haphazard social and cultural change, fallout from the paradoxes of democratization, and the community's lack of vision about its collective future. Some of these crises might have been less acute if the community had had a more normal political, cultural, and social existence. Others are clearly internal.

The nature of the crisis affecting Palestinians in Israel can be examined through basic situation indicators: increased poverty and economic hardship, the development of a partial Israeli-Palestinian identity, the failure to adapt to modern times, weak democratization together with a deep cultural crisis, and a failure of Palestinian leadership.

Increased poverty. In 2006, Palestinians constituted 20 percent of the total Israeli population. This increase has resulted in the expansion of Arab towns, some into cities. In 2006, there were eight Arab towns with a population of more than 25,000, including Nazareth with 64,300, plus another seven towns with populations ranging from 17,200 to 24,400, reflecting a striking increase in the Palestinian urban centers. The growth in the Arab population and of Arab villages was not coupled with economic development, because appropriate industries and industrial zones are lacking in the Palestinian towns, which are situated at the lowest level of the social and economic indicators of cities and villages in Israel. State planning policies put industry and development in Jewish towns and zones. This lack of industry and jobs contributes to poverty among the Palestinians. Government policies controlling access to land and housing PERMITS also contribute to a situation of housing shortages—a problem that is growing rapidly.

Partial identity. The complex situation of the Arab citizens of Israel is also related to the fact that they are partially Israelis and partially Palestinians at the same time, meaning that they have dual and incomplete identities. This is the crux of the collective identity crisis for the Palestinian citizens in Israel. Palestinians are Israeli citizens according to official status but can't identify with a culture that ignores Palestinian history, culture, and society. For example, Israeli student textbooks present the Nakba, the 1948 Palestinian exodus, as Israel's War of Liberation and Independence. Moreover, after 1948, through RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT and travel, Israel prohibited its Palestinian citizens from interacting with the Arab world or participating in the Palestinian national movement—both of which were natural identity affiliations. The PLO, in any case, tended to ignore the Palestinian-Israeli community, even after the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS, and to exclude it from participation in the movement. The Arab states, likewise, even those that have formal relations with Israel, completely ignore Israel's Palestinians. Finally, Palestinian identity is complicated by the ongoing conflict between Israel and external Palestinians.

Adapting to modernity. The hamula (extended family) continues to serve as the basis of the social fabric for the Palestinians in Israel. The status of the individual within the hamula is subordinate to the patriarchal social, cultural, and ideological norms of the clan, hindering any possibility for individuation and self-development. The status of Arab women, in particular, highlights the oppressive situation of the Arab individual. Women live within a repressive social structure that permits them almost no possibility for self-fulfillment. Palestinian women, then, are a minority within a minority. Compared to the status of Jewish women in Israeli society, Arab women are extremely deprived. The enduring importance of the hamula raises questions about the ability of the Arabs in Israel to adapt to modernity and social democratic behaviors.

Lack of democratic values. The failure of Palestinian Arabs to fully internalize democratic norms is related to the conflict between the private and public spheres. The internal distortions arising from demographic stress, economic and social changes coupled with the discriminatory experience of the Arabs in Israel, and the symbolic participation of Arabs at the national level (in the Knesset, for example) while being simultaneously excluded from the decisionmaking process have combined to produce an incomplete adaptation to democratic values and have given rise to certain ideological trends among the Palestinian minority. These discrepancies indicate the real difficulty Palestinian Israelis have had in embracing democracy and transforming it into an integral part of their life. The Arabs find it difficult to move effortlessly between two different “worlds”—one democratic yet discriminatory, the other traditional and undemocratic.

Cultural crisis. Following the 1948 WAR, the Israeli Palestinians found themselves in compulsory seclusion from Palestinian culture and the Arab world. The war resulted in immense destruction to Palestinian civil centers and removed the middle class and cultural elite that had the potential to continue strengthening Palestinian culture. As a result, over time and mainly in the middle class that began to emerge in the late 1980s, various forms of Western culture have been adopted—music, makeup, fashion (for men and women), movies, and consumption in general—though often as a thin veneer over traditional values and culture. The intrusion of Western culture has made the Palestinian community as a whole highly schizophrenic and exacerbated the identity crisis. Moreover, because the dominant Jewish-Israeli culture is Western, Palestinians question whether adopting Western ways will bring them more respect and less discrimination.

Leadership crisis. The leaders produced by the Israeli-Palestinian community have been essentially ineffectual. Regardless of political ideology or party, the Arab leaders have failed at three crucial tasks. No one has formulated a collective vision for the Arab community in Israel. Although the Israeli Communist Party incorporated the slogan “national minority,” it never provided the criteria for defining the status of Palestinians as a minority. Palestinian leaders never developed a strategy and tactics for effecting change, and no leader or party has effectively mobilized the Palestinian community. At one time, the Communist Party was able to mobilize the community, followed by the Islamic movement, but neither has had staying power and neither was able to mobilize the whole community.

Palestinians were deprived of a strong leadership largely because of the military rule under which they existed from 1948 to 1966. Once that military regime was removed, by 1974 a collective leadership, represented by the Local Authorities Chiefs Committee, was established. That was followed in 1982 by the HIGH FOLLOW-UP COMMITTEE (HFC). Both led the struggle of the Israeli Arabs from the mid-1970s through the mid-1980s, which culminated in the 1987 “Equality Day” and the “Peace Day” the same year. These two strike days highlighted the two points around which the Palestinian struggle was conducted in Israel: peace and equality. Since that time, a slow process of deterioration has taken place in the HFC. The 1980s marked the emergence of political plurality among the Palestinians in Israel, which was reflected in the emergence and institutionalization of the Islamic movement, the progressive movement, the ARAB DEMOCRATIC PARTY, and several local organizations. Although some thought this trend would strengthen and boost the status of the Israeli Arab leadership, plurality weakened it, and the HFC fragmented, with the result that Palestinian leaders had no place for dispute resolution. At the same time, the participation of Arabs in the Knesset elections nourished the misconception among the Palestinians and other sectors in Israel that the Arabs in Israel now had their own collective leadership. It is true that the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality (Jabha) behaved as a collective leadership in 1970s and formulated a collective vision for the community, yet since that time the Arabs in Israel have lacked leadership. Although most of the young leadership that emerged in the 1990s was more educated and better understood the system and how to maneuver in it, it suffered from disarray and lacked the ability to build a joint leadership forum. When elections for the Sixteenth Knesset were held in 2003, three Arab parties managed to enter the Knesset while six left it. This generation of leaders tended to encourage personality cults and did not develop strong, direct relations with the public; thus they lacked the ability to mobilize the community.

New leaders are emerging, and older ones are becoming more outspoken. In early 2007 the High Follow-Up Committee published a study it had commissioned on the place of Palestinians in Israeli society. The Mada Manifesto, or The Future Vision of the Palestinian Arabs in Israel, set out a vision for Israel as a state of all its citizens with equality for all. It was followed by three additional documents along a similar vein: (1) The Democratic Constitution (published by ADALAH: The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel), (2) An Equal Constitution for All? On a Constitution and Collective Rights for Arab Citizens in Israel (published by Mossawa Center: The Advocacy Center for Arab Citizens in Israel), and (3) The Haifa Declaration (published by the Mada Institute).

The response of the Israeli body politic was overwhelmingly to view these initiatives as an unwelcome threat to the “Jewish character” of the state. They were denounced in the media, the Knesset, and throughout society. Israel’s SHIN BET secret police went so far as to warn that it would “disrupt the activities of any groups that seek to change the Jewish or democratic character of Israel, even if they use democratic means.”

To observe, then, that Israel’s Palestinian citizens are in a crisis—politically, socially, economically, and culturally—is not hyperbole, but reality.

See also HIGH FOLLOW-UP COMMITTEE AND THE MADA MANIFESTO; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION; KOENIG MEMORANDUM; LAND DAY; NATZERAT ILLIT AND NAZARETH; STATE LAND; UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES.

Bibliography

- Abunimah, Ali. “Anti-Arab Racism and Incitement in Israel.” The Palestine Center, Washington, DC. 26 March 2008.
- Adler, Katya. “Israeli-Arab Protesters Have Clashed with Police as Jewish Israeli Right-wingers Marched in the Majority-Arab Town of Umm al-Fahm.” BBC News. 24 March 2009.
- Arian, Asher, Nir Atmor, and Yael Hadar. The 2007 Israeli Democracy Index. The Israel Democracy Institute. June 2007. <http://www.idi.org.il/english/article.asp?id=31052007141057>.
- Associated Press. “Israel Frees 3 Jewish Radicals: Killers of Arabs Served Less Than 7 Years of Life Sentence.” Associated Press. 27 December 1990.
- Awawda, Bachar, and Alla Heider. “Index of Racism for 2006: Racism against Israeli Arabs—Citizens of the State of Israel.” The Center Against Racism, April 2007, cited in The State of Human Rights in Israel and the Occupied Territories, 2007 Report, Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI). <http://www.acri.org.il/pdf/State2007.pdf>.
- Bar-Tal, Daniel, and Yona Teichman. Stereotypes and Prejudice in Conflict: Representations of Arabs in Israeli Jewish Society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Bennet, James. “Police Used Excessive Force on Israeli Arabs, Panel Says.” The New York Times. 2 September 2003.
- Ben-Porat, Amir. “Death to the Arabs: The Right-Wing Fan’s Fear.” Soccer & Society. 9:1 (January 2008).
- Cook, Jonathan. Blood and Religion: The Unmasking of the Jewish and Democratic State. London: Pluto Press, 2006.
- . “Palestinian Citizens of Israel: General Strike.” BADIL Resource Center, Bethlehem, West Bank, Palestine. 1 October 2009. <http://www.badil.org/en/component/jevents/icalrepeat.detail/2009/10/01/228/-/YWM0ZTBkM2VhZjNkMmMyYjhlMDA3N2MzMjgzOTZhZTI>.
- . “Still No Justice for October 2000 Killings.” The Electronic Intifada. 26 February 2008. <http://electronicintifada.net/v2/article9329.shtml>.
- Eyadat, Fadi. “Poll: Half of Jews Oppose Living in Neighborhoods with Arabs.” Ha’aretz. 13 March 2008.
- Frenkel, Sheera Claire. “Death Threats to Arab MKs on the Rise.” The Jerusalem Post. 14 March 2008.
- Gerlitz, Ron. “Strangers in Their Own Land.” Ha’aretz. 16 August 2009.
- Ghanem, A. The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel: A Political Study. New York: SUNY Press, 2001.
- . “The Palestinian Minority in Israel: The Challenge of the Jewish State and Its Implications.” Third World Quarterly. 21:1 (2000).
- . “State and Minority in Israel: The Case of the Ethnic State and the Predicament of Its Minority.” Ethnic and Racial Studies. 21:3 (1998).
- . “Zionism, Post-Zionism, and Anti-Zionism in Israel: Jews and Arabs in the Conflict over the Nature of the State.” In The Challenge of Post Zionism. Edited by Ephraim Nimni. London: Zed Books, 2003.
- Ghanem, A., N. Rouhana, and O. Yiftachel. “Questioning ‘Ethnic Democracy.’” Israel Studies. 3:2 (1999).
- Ginat, J. “Israeli Arabs: Some Recent Social and Political Trends.” Asian and African Studies. 23:2–3 (1989).
- Golan, Avirama. “Racist? Us?” Ha’aretz. 19 March 2008.
- Al-Haj, M., and H. Rosenfeld. Arab Local Government in Israel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Ilan, Shahr. “Lieberman to Arab MKs: One Day We Will ‘Take Care of You.’” Ha’aretz. 10 March 2008.

- . “MK Eitam to Arab MKs: One Day We Will Expel You from Israel.” Ha’aretz. 5 March 2008.
- . “The Vision of an Arab-free Knesset.” Ha’aretz. 24 March 2008.
- Israeli Central Bureau of Statistics. Latest Population Figures for Israel. Jewish Virtual Library, 2009. http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Society\_&\_Culture/newpop.html.
- Mitnick, Joshua. “On Sunday, Netanyahu’s Government Votes on Two Bills Designed to Shore Up Support for Israel as a Jewish State.” The Christian Science Monitor. 27 May 2009.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizen of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Rekheiss, Elie. The Arab Minority in Israel: Between Communism and Arab Nationalism. Tel Aviv, Israel: The Dayan Center, Tel Aviv University, 1993.
- . Israel and Its Arab Citizens: Taking Stock. Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies at Tel Aviv University. 16 October 2007. <http://tau.ac.il/dayancenter/Israel%20and%20its%20Arab%20Citizens.pdf>.
- Reuters. “Lieberman’s Party to Seek Cabinet Okay for Loyalty Oath.” Ha’aretz. 29 May 2009.
- Rouhana, N., and A. Ghanem. “The Crisis of Minorities in Ethnic States: The Case of the Palestinian Citizens in Israel.” International Journal of Middle East Studies. 30:3 (1998).
- . “The Democratization of a Traditional Minority in an Ethnic Democracy: The Palestinians in Israel.” In Democracy, Peace, and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. Edited by E. Kaufman, S. Abed, and R. Rothstein. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1993.
- Sela, Neta. “Prominent Rabbi to Yeshiva Heads: Don’t Hire Arabs.” Yediot Aharonot. 17 March 2008.
- Shagrai, Nadav. “Right-wing Demonstrators Try to Storm Home Village of Mercar Harav Gunman.” Ha’aretz. 17 March 2007.
- . “Top Yesha Rabbi Says Jewish Law Forbids Renting Houses to Arabs.” Ha’aretz. 20 March 2008.
- Shihadeh, M. Poverty as Policy, Report and Comparative Study: The Average Poverty Level of Palestinian Citizens in Israel during the Last Decade. Haifa, Israel: Mada al-Carmel, The Arab Center for Applied Social Research, 2004.
- . Unemployment and Exclusion: The Arab Minority in the Israeli Labor Market. Haifa, Israel: Mada al-Carmel, The Arab Center for Applied Social Research, 2004.
- Stern, Yoav. “Arab Leaders Air Public Relations Campaign against Shin Bet.” Ha’aretz. 6 April 2007.
- Sultany, N. Israel and the Palestinian Minority. Haifa, Israel: Mada al-Carmel, The Arab Center for Applied Social Research, 2004.
- Yiftachel, O., and A. Ghanem. “Understanding ‘Ethno-ocratic’ Regimes: The Politics of Seizing Contested Territories.” Political Geography. 23:6 (2004).

Yoaz, Yuval, and Jack Khoury. “Civil Rights Group: Israel Has Reached New Heights of Racism.” Ha’aretz. 9 December 2007.

Zarchin, Tomer, and Jack Khoury. “Ministers Okay Bill Banning Nakba Day.” Ha’aretz. 26 May 2009.

—As’ad Ghanem and Mtanes Shihadeh

Palestinian Communist Party/PCP

See PALESTINIAN PEOPLE’S PARTY

Palestinian Conflict Resolution Center

The Palestinian Conflict Resolution Center (Wi’am, Cordial Relationships) is a grassroots organization located in BETHLEHEM and established in 1995. Known as Wi’am, the center helps to resolve disputes within the Palestinian community by complementing the traditional Arab form of mediation (sulha) with Western models of conflict resolution. Given the nature and length of the OCCUPATION, the weakness of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, and the lack of legitimacy of traditional village leaders (mukhtars) owing to their appointment by Israel, there has been no clear means of resolving disputes, while the need for local conflict resolution is high. Believing that individuals who learn how to manage conflict at the local level without violence will contribute to a nonviolent resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Wi’am works in different areas at the grassroots level in the greater Bethlehem area. (<http://www.alaslah.org/>).

See also NONVIOLENCE IN ISRAEL/PALESTINE

Bibliography

Hutchison, Peggy. “Wi’am: Palestinian Conflict Resolution Center.” New World Order. July–August 1999.

Palestinian Democratic Union

The Palestinian Democratic Union (FIDA, al-Ittihad al-Dimuqrati al-Filastini) is a reformist movement within the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) that arose from a 1990–1991 split within the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP). YASIR ‘ABD RABBU formed the breakaway faction because he opposed involvement in Jordanian politics and supported the MADRID and OSLO PROCESSES. Initially, 'Abd Rabbu's group continued to call itself the DFLP, but, in 1993, it took the name Palestinian Democratic Union. Its primary constituency is among middle-class, urban, WEST BANK residents, although it has plans to organize in the Palestinian refugee camps in JORDAN, SYRIA, LEBANON, and the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. FIDA has twenty-one members in the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC), the PLO's exile parliament. It gained a seat on the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE in 1992, and in the 1996 elections won a seat on the Palestinian Legislative Council from the Ramallah district.

FIDA describes itself as "a national, socialist, and democratic movement that is progressive and secular and seeks to include a range of groups—organizations, parties, unions"—within its coalition "to further the ends of national liberation and social justice." 'Abd Rabbu said that FIDA would work to exert pressure on the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY to solve the economic and social problems that exist in the Occupied Territories and would fight corruption in the PNA, including the illegal spending of public money. (www.fida.ps/english/tadamon/tadamon.html; www.fida.ps/english/english.html).

Bibliography

- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. The Palestinians: The Making of a People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Routledge, 2006.

Palestinian Diaspora

See DIASPORA, PALESTINIAN

Palestinian Economic Council for Development and Reconstruction

The Palestinian Economic Council for Development and Reconstruction (PECDAR) was established to solicit financial assistance from European donors (and in accordance with European government conditions), which would then be disbursed as aid to Palestinian developmental and humanitarian projects. AHMAD QUREI' (Abu Ala), of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO)

Palestine Martyrs Works Society (SAMED), the economic arm of the PLO, created the institution in 1993 specifically to receive funds from donors for development projects in the Occupied Territories under the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). It was designed to uphold Western standards of transparency and accountability and to be the official address for foreign aid to the PNA. In 1993, PECDAR's mandate was endorsed by the General Meeting of Donors that was held in Washington under the chairmanship of the US secretary of state and the World Bank. Most of its projects are done by local contractors, while technical assistance work is conducted by international firms and consultants. PECDAR's existence was a central condition for the PNA to receive the $2.5 billion in aid that was pledged over five years by the donor nations.

Shortly after the establishment of the PNA in 1994, YASIR ARAFAT assumed control of PECDAR, displacing Ahmad Qurei'. Arafat took great personal interest in the affairs of PECDAR, and, as one former PNA official noted, "no amount, no matter how small, [left] the PECDAR funds without the president's signature." PECDAR is said to have raised a total of some $2.1 billion from European donors and the UNITED STATES. There have been allegations from some sources—primarily US conservatives—that Arafat looted PECDAR of hundreds of millions of dollars. Several European committees have examined the allegations and to date have found no irregularities. However, that there was financial corruption within the PNA is incontrovertible.

From the outset of the PNA's creation there was tension and competition for funding from PECDAR between the Finance Ministry, headed by MUHAMMAD RASHID, and the Ministry of Planning, headed by NABIL SHA'TH. The competition between the ministries led to confusion among the donor nations about which agency was responsible for receipt of aid. As a result, in 1995 the PNA and the World Bank agreed to bypass PECDAR and transfer aid directly to the PNA via its economic ministries, primarily the Ministry of Finance.

In 1999 the European Investment Bank (EIB), the EUROPEAN UNION's financing institution, contributed 10 million euros (around $10 million) to support small-scale INFRASTRUCTURE in Palestine, including support for the Community Development Project for upgrading projects in GAZA and the WEST BANK, such as ROADS, WATER schemes, and community buildings. The funds from the EIB were made available to the PNA, through the Ministry of Finance, under the 1997–1999 “Euro-Med Partnership” mandate. The investment was implemented by the Ministry of Local Government in conjunction with PEC-DAR, the main agency still responsible for managing international donor aid, particularly for infrastructure projects.

In 2005 Dr. Mohammad Shtayyeh was the president of PEC-DAR.

Bibliography

- Baskin, Gershon. What Went Wrong: Oslo—The PLO(PA)—Israel—Some Additional Facts. Jerusalem: Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information, February–March 2001.
- Ben Efrat, Roni. “The Manifesto of the Twenty: The Hidden Consensus Finds a Voice.” Challenge (Tel Aviv, Israel). 59 (January–February 2000).
- Bergman, Ronen, and David Ratner. “The Man Who Swallowed Gaza.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 4 April 1997.
- Detmer, Jamie. “Arafat Misusing U.S. Aid, GAO Analysis.” Washington Times. 5 August 1995.
- Ehrenfeld, Rachel. “Arafat’s Stash: The Guy’s a Billionaire. Where Does His Money Come From?” National Review. 15 August 2002.
- European Investment Bank. EIB Support for Palestinian Development. 26 October 1998.
- . EUR 10 Million EIB Support for Small-Scale Infrastructure in Palestine. 3 June 1999.
- Halevi, Ilan. “Self-Government, Democracy, and Mismanagement under the Palestine Authority.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 27:3 (1988).
- Hass, Amira. Drinking the Sea at Gaza: Days and Nights in a Land under Siege. New York: Metropolitan Books, Henry Holt, 1999.
- Jarad, Ali. “Corruption Is Obstructing the Development of Our Society.” News from Within (Jerusalem). 17:3 (2001).
- Kahl, Murray. Corruption within the Palestinian Authority: Report Prepared for Congressman Jim Saxton (R.–3rd District, NJ) for Use by the US Congress to Suspend Aid to the PA under the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act (MEPFA). 30 October 1997.
- Mediterranean Development Forum. Local Government in the West Bank and Gaza. Conference proceedings, Marrakech, Morocco, 12–17 May 1997. www.worldbank.org/mdf/mdf1/westgaza.htm.
- Myers, Clayman. “Project Management in the Occupied Territories.” World Bank EDI Review. April–June 1995. www.worldbank.org/wbi/review/review\_proj\_Apr95.html.
- Roy, Sara. “The Crisis Within: The Struggle for Palestinian Society.” Critique: Journal for Critical Studies of the Middle East. 17 (2000).

Saleh, Abdel-Jawad. “Something’s Missing Here.” Al-Ahram (Cairo). 30 September–6 October 1999. <http://weekly.ahram.org.eg>.

Schwartz, Michael. “The Great Gasoline Scam: Fueling Coexistence.” Challenge. 53 (January–February 1999).

———. “A Secret Account in Tel Aviv Funds Arafat’s Oppression.” Challenge. 43 (May–June 1997).

Usher, Graham, and Tarek Hassan. “More of the Same.” Al-Ahram. 13–19 August 1998. <http://weekly.ahram.org.eg>.

Warner, Margaret. “Rating Arafat’s Rule.” PBS Online Focus. 28 May 1997. www.pbs.org/newshour/bb/middle\_east/may97/arafat\_5-28a.html.

Wilkinson, Tracy, and Mary Curtis. “Statehood No Panacea for the Palestinians.” Los Angeles Times. 4 September 2000.

Palestinian Elections

See ELECTIONS, PALESTINIAN

Palestinian Flag

Before the OSLO ACCORDS, the Palestinian flag was taken very seriously by the Israelis, and any display of it was strictly forbidden. Individuals caught attempting to place a flag on a rooftop or a pole were arrested and imprisoned. Moreover, the colors of the flag were prohibited. Paintings that contained the four banned colors could be confiscated and the painter fined or arrested; if the painting was found in an art gallery, the gallery was closed indefinitely.

As a part of its general war against Palestinian self-determination, Israel actively pursued a policy of stifling the concept of a Palestinian nation or Palestinian nationalism, and therefore any form of expression of the concept was forbidden. The war against the flag’s colors became so extreme that if a man’s shirt or the embroidery on a woman’s dress contained the four colors, the person was fined and often detained.

The Palestinian flag is constituted of three equal horizontal stripes (black, white, and green from top to bottom) overlaid by a red isosceles triangle issuing from the hoist and reaching one-third of the way to the fly. Sharif Husayn of Mecca designed the current flag in June 1916 as the flag of the Arab revolt against the OTTOMAN EMPIRE. In 1917 the Arab people raised it as the flag of the Arab national movement. In 1947 the Arab Ba’ath Party interpreted the flag as a symbol of the liberation and unity of the Arab nation. In 1948 the Palestinians adopted it at the Palestine Conference of the ALL PALESTINE GOVERNMENT in GAZA. Subsequently, the flag was recognized by the ARAB LEAGUE as the flag of the Palestinian people. In 1964 it was further endorsed by the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION during the first meeting of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL in JERUSALEM.

After 1967 and Israel's OCCUPATION of the Palestinian territories of the WEST BANK, Gaza Strip, and East JERUSALEM, succeeding military governors undertook systematic policies to eliminate all manifestations of Palestinian nationalism or national identity. This campaign involved every aspect of Palestinians' lives—EDUCATION, journalism, literature and PALESTINIAN POETRY, painting, folklore, and symbolic representations of Palestinian national identity.

After 1993, the war against the flag and Palestinian nationalism in general virtually ceased because the Oslo Accords in effect "denationalized" Palestinian nationalism. The flag, its colors, and other previously potent symbols were no longer perceived as a threat. Instead, Israel focused on any symbolic or actual opposition to the OSLO PROCESS.

Bibliography

- Hallaj, Muhammad. "Palestine—The Suppression of an Idea." The Link (Americans for Middle East Understanding). 15:1 (1982).
- Shahak, Israel. "The Four 'Terrible' Colors." Palestine/Israel Bulletin. March 1981.

Palestinian Foreign Nationals

See DEMOGRAPHY

Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group

The Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group was founded in December 1996 in response to the deteriorating state of democracy and human rights under the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). The organization was established by a diverse group of Palestinian leaders, including Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC) members, newspaper editors, journalists, a union leader, veteran human rights activists, and religious leaders. Its mandate is to document human rights violations committed against Palestinians in the WEST BANK, GAZA STRIP, and East JERUSALEM, regardless of who is responsible. In practice, however, the group has dedicated most of its work to monitoring human rights violations committed by the PNA. The monitoring group believes that, in spite of the ongoing Israeli OCCUPATION and the need to denounce Israeli human rights abuses, similar scrutiny of the PNA is essential to the process of state building, to ensure that the future Palestinian state will be truly democratic. In the long run, it argues, the protection of human rights can only strengthen the PNA. (www.phrmg.org).

Palestinian Identity

Zionists claim that Palestinian identity only emerged in response to the process of Zionist colonization of Palestine. Yet, in 1919, a monograph entitled Reconstruction of Palestine and published by the Palestine Anti-Zionism Society in New York City illustrated that a strong Palestinian identity was already in place in the early part of the twentieth century. As revealed by different authors, including the distinguished historian Philip Hitti, this identity was deeply rooted, nationalist, secular, and Arab in nature, yet threatened by the process of Zionist settlement. This document demonstrates quite clearly that the fundamental issues facing Palestinians have changed little since 1919. The voices of the writers in the manuscript clearly reflect a native population that is threatened by Zionist colonial settlers coming from Europe and bringing with them superior technology, money, and the backing of a great power, Britain.

There is an overarching Palestinian identity that is grounded in the history of ancestors who once inhabited the LAND known as Palestine, whose BORDERS were delineated by the BRITISH MANDATE. In spite of the variety of peoples who migrated to Palestine since 2000 BCE, a Palestinian character emerged—Arab in language and literature. It involves a way of life, a unique attachment to the land, and defined social and cultural forms.

Palestinian identity is also grounded in the experience of the Nakba, during which more than two-thirds of the Palestinian population were driven from their homes in a historic act of ethnic cleansing carried out by the newly established state of Israel in 1948. The collective trauma of this experience is deeply etched in Palestinian consciousness, as is the experience of dispersion and exile. In the immediate aftermath of the Nakba, Palestinians focused almost exclusively on recovering their lost land and their patrimony. The REFUGEES carried with them the keys to their houses and the titles to their land. In the early period, from 1948 through the 1960s, poets such as MAHMUD DARWISH expressed this deep attachment in poetry and songs that became popular with Palestinians wherever they were. The refugees in JORDAN, LEBANON, SYRIA, and the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES—by far the largest percentage of the entire Palestinian population—have maintained over the decades since 1948 a deep attachment to their homes and land that has nourished a sense of identity as Palestinians who differed substantially from the populations in the host countries. This deep sense of identity has remained strong in spite of significant events that have had a major impact on these populations: the 1970 civil war in Jordan (BLACK SEPTEMBER); the 1975–1976 civil war in Lebanon, culminating in the forced departure of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) following Israel’s 1982 invasion (LEBANON WAR); and the harsh and discriminatory treatment the Palestinians received from authorities in the Arab countries.

Those who stayed behind were subjected first to Jordanian and Egyptian occupation in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP, respectively, until 1967, when they came under Israeli military control. The impact of the years of Israeli OCCUPATION served to strengthen the sense of Palestinian identity as a form of resistance against the Occupation. Similarly, the Palestinians who remained in Israel, even after years of living within the Israeli system as second-class citizens, to a large measure still define themselves first as Palestinians and then as Israeli citizens. In the 1960s, a new symbol of resistance began to emerge with the fidaiyyun, who were willing to sacrifice their lives for the sake of Palestine. This was followed by the symbol of sumud, or steadfastness, meaning refusing to depart in the face of Zionist attempts to engage in forcible population TRANSFER from the Occupied Territories. More recently, the symbol of shahid (martyr) has begun to emerge.

At the same time, there are also multiple Palestinian identities that have grown out of different experiences, such as refugee/nonrefugee, rural/urban, kin/nonkin, Muslim/politicized Islamist/Christian, male/female, class, and foreigner/nonforeigner. In the particular cultural, economic, and social systems in which Palestinians live and have lived—Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, Israel, the Occupied Territories, and other PALESTINIAN DIASPORA locations—multidimensional perspectives or social forces define the individuals within a given social space. Thus the experiences of Palestinians in, for example, Tunis are likely to be different from those in Lebanon.

Palestinian refugees who have lived in a refugee camp most of their lives have given rise to a “refugee identity.” Being a son or daughter of refugee camp parents also marks a person’s identity. In the beginning, refugees were badly treated by other Palestinians, who blamed them for leaving their homes and land to the Jews. Over the years, a clear distinction emerged between camp dwellers and city residents, and problems came to the surface in a variety of ways. This remains the case today in cities such as NABLUS and Ramallah, with their neighboring camps. The unhappy experience of refugees within the Occupied Territories was mirrored by and increased in the Arab states, where many Palestinians took refuge.

An additional and more recent Palestinian identity distinction emerged between those who returned to the Occupied Territories after the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS (known as the “returnees” or “Tunisians”) and the local population of the West Bank and Gaza Strip who had lived and suffered under the Israeli Occupation. The returnees, mostly active members of the PLO, arrived with romantic and idyllic visions of a Palestine they had left behind years before and were shocked to find a population that had changed drastically over the years. Moreover, as they brought with them values and behaviors they had learned from their host populations, the local Palestinians looked at them as ajanib (foreigners, nonkin). Julianne Hammer and Helena Schultz have examined issues related to the Palestinian Diaspora as well as the problems encountered by those who returned after the Oslo Accords. Hammer distinguishes between returnees (aideen) and Amrikan (those who returned from North America to invest and settle in the West Bank and Gaza Strip after the Oslo Accords). She suggests that for the aideen, Palestine is al-Watan, the national homeland (a political entity), whereas for the Amrikan, it is balad, a cultural homeland. She also notes that the process of return has strengthened Palestinian identity, replacing idyllic images with more nuanced ones that appreciate the complexity of the place and the changes that have occurred.

Over time, Palestine had become a vibrant symbol for many Palestinians living in the Diaspora. Perhaps because of distance, fragmentation, and the problems of access, the majority of Palestinians came to believe in Palestine as a "cause" and knew little about the reality on the ground. "Palestine" had become an abstract notion or an idea that one fought for and was willing to die for. Upon their return, many of the exiles were shocked to discover a Palestinian society that had been emasculated and psychologically mutilated as a result of the oppressive conditions it experienced during the many years of Israeli Occupation after 1967.

Prior to the 1993 Oslo Accords, a consensus galvanized the Palestinian communities scattered throughout the world. There was a general agreement, regardless of political leanings, that one must support the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, that the Palestinian right to self-determination is a basic right, and that the Palestinians are entitled to establish their independent and sovereign state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip with East JERUSALEM as the capital of this state. The PLO was the representative of the Palestinian national movement, a secular, relatively progressive movement whose initial objective was to liberate Palestine from Israeli control and establish a Palestinian state in its place, a goal that was radically transformed by 1988 to the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. Following the Oslo Accords, however, and with the creation of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), the center of gravity of the Palestinian national movement shifted from the Diaspora, specifically from the refugees, to the Occupied Territories—the "inside." The Palestine "cause" began to narrow and fragment into ever smaller parcels: Israeli withdrawal from some areas, security control, WATER problems, refugees, Jerusalem, borders, SETTLEMENTS, and so on. Gone was the old consensus that helped mobilize large segments of Palestinian society.

The Oslo Process did not culminate in the promised Palestinian state. More land was confiscated and more illegal Jewish settlements were established by successive Israeli governments. This has brought about conditions that make it almost impossible to establish a viable Palestinian state in the Occupied Territories. Increasingly, there is a significant shift in the discourse about the nature of a possible settlement of the conflict from a two-state to a one-state formula. What is in place at the moment is one state where Jews enjoy basic rights and Palestinians live in an apartheid-like system. The old nationalist discourse is beginning to give way to a new kind of discourse that emphasizes equal rights for all citizens in a democratic state in the historic land of Palestine. Increasingly, as Palestinian Arabs and Israeli Jews begin to launch initiatives in this direction, an important shift in their identity as potential citizens in a secular and democratic entity will also begin to emerge.

See also PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL; PALESTINIAN POETRY; PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948; REFUGEES AND THE RIGHT OF RETURN; TUNIS: THE TUNISIAN INTERLUDE; ZIONISM

Bibliography

- Brand, L. "Palestinians and Jordanians: A Crisis of Identity." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:4 (1995).
- Caplan, G. Arab and Jew in Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon, 1987.
- Gorenberg, Gershon. "Israel's Tragedy Foretold." New York Times. 10 March 2006.
- Hammer, J. Palestinians Born in Exile: Diaspora and the Search for a Homeland. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2005.
- Hilal, J. The Palestinian Political System after Oslo. Ramallah, West Bank: Muwatin, 1998.
- Khalidi, R. Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Khalidi, W. Defending Haifa and the Problem of Palestine: The Memoirs of Rashid al-Haj Ibrahim, 1891–1953. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 2005.
- Lamar, H., and L. Thompson. The Frontier in History. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981.
- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestine Refugee Problem. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- . Israel's Border Wars, 1949–1956. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Pappé, Ilan. The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict. London: I. B Tauris, 1994.
- Rouhana, N. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities in Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Salah, Hanna. Reconstruction of Palestine. New York: The Palestine Anti-Zionism Society, 1919.

- Sayigh, R. Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon. Washington, DC: Middle East Policy Council, 2001.
- Schultz, H. The Palestinian Diaspora. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- . The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab world. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.

—Fouad Moughrabi

Palestinian Independent Commission for Citizens' Rights

The Palestinian Independent Commission for Citizens' Rights (PICCR) is a PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) human rights institution, although it exists and operates independently of the PNA. Its mandate is to ensure respect for citizens' rights in Palestine through respect for the rule of law by all official Palestinian bodies. PICCR was established in September 1993 by YASIR ARAFAT, in his capacity as president of the state of the PNA and chairman of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION.

PICCR establishes its own legislation, finances, policy, and operation, although its policy and program were created by a Board of Commissioners consisting of Palestinian individuals, both in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA, known for their commitment to human rights. European and other international institutions, plus some external private donations, provide all of PICCR's funding. To guarantee its independence from the PNA, PICCR board members who belong to the PNA have their membership suspended for the duration of their government posts; PICCR's commissioner-general and director-general are elected by and accountable only to the PICCR board; and PICCR staff members are directly and exclusively responsible to PICCR, not to the PNA. (www.piccr.org).

Palestinian Initiative for the Promotion of Global Dialogue and Democracy

The Palestinian Initiative for the Promotion of Global Dialogue and Democracy, or MIFTAH, is a nongovernmental, nonpartisan, JERUSALEM-based institution dedicated to fostering democracy and good governance within Palestinian society through promoting public accountability, transparency, and the free flow of information and ideas. MIFTAH was established in December 1998 with HANAN ASHRAWI as its secretary-general and with the goal of serving as a Palestinian platform for global dialogue and cooperation guided by the principles of democracy, human rights, gender equity, and participatory governance. To this end, MIFTAH generates and presents policy proposals and disseminates reliable information. MIFTAH is a founding member of the National Coalition for Transparency and Accountability, established in February 2000, which is working on a national plan aimed at combating corruption and administrative and financial mismanagement across all sectors of the PNA. (www.miftah.org).

Palestinian Legislative Council

See PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY

Palestinian Media

See MEDIA, PALESTINIAN

Palestinian National Authority

The Palestinian National Authority (PNA, As-Sulta al-Wataniyya al-Filastiniyya) was established through the series of Israeli-Palestinian agreements, known collectively as the OSLO ACCORDS, that were signed by Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). Although the first agreement, the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES of 13 September 1993, created the framework for future negotiations, the structure of the PNA was formalized in the Cairo Agreements (GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENTS I AND II) of 4 May 1994 (allowing PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT to end his exile and enter the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES) and the 29 August 1994 Agreement on the Preparatory Transfer of Powers and Responsibilities, as well as in the INTERIM AGREEMENT of 28 September 1995.

The purpose of the PNA was to transfer administration of Palestinian-populated areas of the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP from Israel, ostensibly to prepare Palestinians for some form of limited sovereignty after a five-year transitional period that was to end with the completion of FINAL STATUS TALKS. According to its mandate, the PNA would function as a quasi-governmental administration that would manage, in part, the political, economic, social, and—especially important from Israel’s perspective—security situation in the Occupied Territories during the transitional period. The PNA, however, had no jurisdiction over the LAND or its resources, while its jurisdiction over Palestinians living in the Occupied Territories was challenged structurally by Israel’s routine military operations in the West Bank and Gaza and, more broadly, by the SETTLEMENT enterprise that intensified during the Oslo years.

The terms of the Oslo agreements encouraged such a dynamic. In the Interim Agreement that divided the West Bank into three areas, the PNA was to have control over both security-related and civilian issues in Palestinian urban areas, excluding HEBRON (referred to as Area A, constituting about 3 percent of the West Bank), and civilian control over Palestinian village populations, while Israel retained all security functions (Area B, some 27 percent). The remainder (Area C, over 70 percent), including Israeli settlements, the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, military encampments, and bypass ROADS, remained under exclusive Israeli control. This was part of a larger division of powers between Israel and the PNA in which Israel maintained control over foreign affairs, BORDERS, and most economic issues, while the PNA was given authority over most civil matters, such as providing EDUCATION, HEALTH CARE, and social services.

History and Structure of the PNA

From a political perspective, the roots of the PNA can be said to lie most immediately in the November 1988 decision by the PLO to formally and publicly recognize Israel and endorse a TWO-STATE SOLUTION (Israel and Palestine) to the conflict, in the PLO’s position in the GULF WAR, in the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE, and in the failure of its “Washington Track.” This failure occurred at the same time that Israel had succeeded in largely crushing the First INTIFADA and when the PLO was operating from a position of international weakness. The foundation for the PNA’s creation can further be said to reside in the “implosion of FATAH,” the challenge of the Islamic party HAMAS, the wholehearted support of Israel by successive US administrations, and the lack of any positive options for Palestinians other than signing on to a process that they had very little power to shape.

Former Israeli prime minister SHIMON PERES described how Israel saw the PNA and the OSLO PROCESS when he explained before the Knesset on 23 October 1995, “The edifice we are building is based on a change in relations, not in location.” That is, Israel was not going to leave the Occupied Territories (especially the West Bank). The primary change it hoped to achieve was to establish a set of Palestinian institutions that would create vested interests and would tie the OLD GUARD PLO leaders, the Oslo elite, to the Oslo Process while preserving Israel’s presence and power in the territories. Additionally, from Tel Aviv’s viewpoint, the overriding purpose of the PNA was to guarantee Israel’s security in the context of the Palestinian struggle for a state and against OCCUPATION. In retrospect, the PNA, as well as the Oslo Process, failed. In attempting to explicate that failure, we begin with an examination of the institutional structure of the PNA.

The executive: President Arafat. When Yasir Arafat returned to Gaza and JERICHO in May and July 1994, he was welcomed with enthusiasm by a majority of Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. Arafat had been not only the leader of the PLO since 1969 but, more importantly, the personification of Palestinian nationalism, the symbol of Palestinian identity, and the embodiment of Palestinian aspirations. He alone, among the PLO leaders, enjoyed a special status among Palestinians throughout the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA and (perhaps somewhat less so) in the Occupied Territories, even with the many that supported different political factions. Within a relatively short time, however, Arafat became the object of Palestinian frustration, disappointment, and eventually anger.

After Arafat returned to the Occupied Territories from TUNIS and was elected president of the PNA, his governance became increasingly undemocratic, as he marshaled power unilaterally in his person and used an easily corruptible patronage system to ensure the loyalty of the various people and forces under his command. As one analyst wrote concerning Arafat’s concentration of power: “He exercises more than sixty functions, which include not only those of a chief executive and chief of state, but also extend to many mundane chores. The fact that those functions include several chairmanships of newly established boards and no less than twelve new committees of the transitional authority . . . [suggests] that the national project is in trouble.” This observation was made in 1995, and the centralization of power in Arafat’s hands grew significantly every year thereafter.

Arafat established and controlled six separate “security” services (eventually mushrooming to eleven) that initially comprised between 35,000 and 40,000 individuals. The Oslo agreements mandated the creation of “a strong Palestinian police force” to provide unconditional security for Israel. In the 1995 Interim Agreement, the PNA was obliged “to act systematically against all expressions [including verbal] of [Palestinian] violence and terror;” to “arrest and prosecute [Palestinian] individuals suspected of perpetrating acts of violence and terror;” and to “cooperate in the exchange of information as well as coordinate policies and activities” with the Israeli security services.

Arafat, however, took this mandate as license to create multiple security forces all directly under his control, which not only acted to protect Israel but also interfered in every aspect of Palestinian institutional and individual life. The institutions were highly repressive, monitoring public speech and written publications, and punishing anyone critical of the PNA or Arafat. The original six were (1) the General Intelligence Service, the “official” PNA intelligence agency that coordinated with Israel’s SHIN BET (internal security service); (2) the Preventive Security Service (PSS), a second intelligence service that monitored Palestinians for any expression of opposition to Arafat or the Oslo Process and oversaw Palestinian PRISONERS, including interrogations; (3) the Presidential Guard/FORCE 17, whose specific task was to protect Arafat; (4) the Special Security Force/Military Intelligence, headed by Musa Arafat, which gathered intelligence on and scrutinized the PNA’s other security services and, like the PSS, collected information on opposition organizations and individuals, inspected the press, and led internal investigations; (5) the Palestinian Police Force, which kept general order; and (6) a special “Chairman’s Guard” under Force 17, which also shielded Arafat. In addition, there was a Civil Defense Force, a Maritime Police, an Airborne Force, an Air Police, and the General Security Administration. In effect, Arafat created a mukhabarat (internal state security apparatus) state wherein the intelligence services usurped individual civil liberties and freedoms and severely compromised—to the point of rendering impotent—the civilian judiciary, interfering with the jurisdiction of the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (PLC), particularly with implementation of the few laws it passed. All of this activity, which directly undermined the rule of law, was undertaken on behalf of the executive’s interests, in particular Arafat.

When Arafat returned to the Occupied Territories, he brought with him several thousand PLO cadres from Tunis (plus their families), and these men largely filled the security services. They were mainly men who had left Beirut with Arafat during the LEBANON WAR in 1982 and who regrouped with him in Tunis, running the political affairs of the PLO from there. Their style of governance was centralized, secretive, partisan, elitist, and disdainful of pluralism and democracy, and they exercised their control over the Palestinian people ruthlessly, imprisoning journalists and closing television stations. Arafat’s closest advisers and “inner circle”—the only individuals who had access to him—were known as the “Tunisians.”

The local Palestinian population was incensed, because many highly educated and experienced individuals in all areas, from political leadership to professional expertise, were passed over by Arafat in favor of the leadership that came with him from Tunisia. His choice of outsiders and their governing style were foreign to the political culture of the Occupied Territories, where Palestinians had developed a strong commitment to political democracy and CIVIL SOCIETY IN THE WEST BANK AND GAZA. The friction undermined Arafat’s and the PNA’s legitimacy. On the other hand, democracy was institutionalized enough that, shortly after Arafat’s death in January 2005, the PNA held presidential elections and MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen) won a clear majority. A year later, in January 2006, the PNA held elections for the PLC, and Hamas won an overwhelming majority, attesting both to the viability of the democratic process and to the people’s dissatisfaction with Arafat’s party, Fatah.

The legislative branch. The legislative branch of the PNA—the Palestinian Legislative Council—was originally composed of 88 members, first elected in January 1996. In 2006 the number of members was increased to 132, and a new electoral system was established that combined a majority arrangement based on district voting and a proportional representation system similar to Israel’s. Hamas participated in the 2006 election, unlike the first, which it boycotted, and won some 80 percent of the seats. It was unable to govern, however, because Israel and the UNITED STATES considered it a TERRORIST organization because of its participation in the ARMED STRUGGLE, which included SUICIDE BOMB-INGS, and because it refused to recognize Israel's right to exist. Israel, the United States, and the EUROPEAN UNION cut funding, making the PNA unable even to pay government salaries, much less provide services. In the summer of 2006, Israel arrested and imprisoned most of the PNA cabinet and many of the legislators who were Hamas members.

The PLC was intended to function independently of the executive and to act as a check on its power. After the first election in 1996, Arafat's party, Fatah, controlled seventy-one of the eighty-eight seats, and Abu Ala (AHMAD QUREI'), Arafat's chief negotiator at Oslo, was elected speaker. Still, the majority of the council members came from the West Bank and Gaza and were not returnees from Tunis, and the potential existed for the parliament to function as envisioned.

The most important initial task facing the PLC was the writing of a constitution for the PNA. Various nongovernmental groups in Palestinian society had consulted over a period of two years about the nature and content of a constitution, coordinating their discussions with the PLO's National Council Legal Committee and the PNA's Ministry of Justice. After two years, they presented the PLC with a draft proposal for the Basic Law for the National Authority in the Transition Period. The PLC debated the proposal and made several minor changes, and in 1997 the Basic Law passed the required three readings (three separate votes). However, to actually become law, it required ratification by President Arafat. Fearing it would curtail some of his power, he refused to sign it until April 2002, and then only under extreme pressure from many quarters.

But with Arafat's 1997 refusal the PNA was left without a constitution and the Palestinian people without the means to ensure democratic processes to protect citizens' rights, to enforce the rule of law, or to secure constitutional accountability. Moreover, by refusing to sign the Basic Law, Arafat sent the PLC a clear message that he would veto any legislation passed by the council that did not accord with his wishes. As a precedent, this rendered the legislative branch impotent from the outset.

Another issue that reflected legislative weakness was that of the local nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). From their inception, these grassroots groups had been distinguished by their independence, which was intolerable to Arafat, who was determined to control them. His attempts to extinguish their autonomy, in turn, made the NGOs vociferous detractors of the PNA's authoritarian rule. Soon the PNA and Arafat were waging a concerted campaign of criticism, harassment, and vilification of the NGOs. Finally, the atmosphere became so ugly that the Legislative Council attempted to pass a law that would regulate relations between the NGOs and the executive. The law, which was generally acceptable to the NGO community, defined the relationship between the PNA and NGOs, made the NGOs accountable for their practices and finances to both the government and the public (ironic in that no such requirement existed for PNA accountability and transparency), and required all NGOs to register with the Ministry of Justice. The bill passed the requisite three readings in the PLC—the final in December 1998—and was forwarded to Arafat for his signature, but he declined to sign it. After several months, Arafat returned it to the PLC with an amendment requiring the NGOs to register instead with the Ministry of the Interior, placing them directly under the PNA's security and intelligence apparatus. Moreover, they would have to obtain a license from Interior Ministry, which would be predicated on an investigation and approval by the security services. Initially, the PLC refused to accept the amendment, but several months later it capitulated to Arafat's wishes. The NGOs, however, refused to register under the Ministry of the Interior, and relations between the NGO community and the PNA continued to deteriorate. Thereafter, the NGOs and especially their prominent heads were subject to ceaseless harassment and occasionally violence.

In general, the Legislative Council was unable to develop and implement an independent legislative or policymaking agenda of its own. When it did challenge PNA corruption or some other sensitive issue, Arafat by various means was able to thwart the PLC.

The judiciary. The absence of a legal system enshrined in a constitution had a highly negative impact on the independence, immunity, and integrity of the Palestinian judiciary. The fundamental problem involved the ways by which Arafat and the PNA Executive compromised the judiciary. Arafat personally transferred and dismissed judges for no professional reason but that they in some way displeased him or proved insufficiently loyal. At the same time, he appointed judges who were often unqualified, on the basis of personal and political fidelity or to further his own political support.

The PNA relied heavily on clan politics to govern. For example, to obtain a government job one had to be from a large hamula (extended family) or belong to Fatah. Handing out “carrots”—for example, a judgeship—to particular clans to garner support may have served Arafat’s personal interests, but it led to serious inter-hamayel rivalry and contributed to increasing fragmentation in Palestinian society. In the Gaza Strip, in particular, there was a significant increase in interclan violence beginning in 1998, a phenomenon that had been dormant, at least on a wider community level, for over two decades.

More delegitimizing of the judiciary than clan politics was the increasing reliance on clan or “tribal” law—traditional, nonformal mechanisms for settling disputes, which are particularly deleterious to women. Reliance on tribal law began to intensify during the First Intifada and continued to strengthen thereafter. Thus, although it did not arise specifically under the PNA, the PNA’s practice of undermining the legitimate independent judiciary did nothing to impede people’s reliance on this system but, in fact, encouraged it. A second area of judicial interference involved Arafat’s and the PNA’s failure to execute court decisions. If Arafat did not like a judicial decision, he simply ignored or reversed it. In general, Arafat and the PNA did not treat judicial decisions seriously. Arafat often disregarded a law to protect a crony or political ally or, conversely, bypassed entirely the judicial process to punish someone who had criticized him publicly or in some other way offended him. A third problematic area involved Arafat’s establishment, by a presidential decree on 7 February 1995, of a State Security Court—a military court—with jurisdiction over “security offenses,” which included opposition to Arafat and the PNA, or affiliation with Hamas. The operations of this court, which began in April 1995, were accountable to no one but Arafat. Arrests were arbitrary, and trials were held in secret and typically conducted in the middle of the night. Members of the security forces served as judges, and there was no right of appeal. Torture was routine, sometimes resulting in deaths during detention, and death sentences were summary.

Arafat also interfered with the attorney general (AG). Although the executive appoints the AG, who is subject to approval by the PLC, there are no legal or legislative guarantees preventing the executive from dismissing the AG at will. The AG office is officially part of the executive, but because its mandate is to ensure the rule of law, the AG’s work actually falls within the responsibility of the judiciary. From 1995 to 1998, Arafat appointed, and then dismissed, two individuals—the first allegedly resigned because of corruption, and the second officially resigned but did so, he stated, because “of the difficulties created by pressure and interference” from Arafat. Eighteen months passed before Arafat appointed a third attorney general, in June 1999. On taking office the new AG warned that his tenure would meet the “same fate of [my] predecessors, if the Executive leadership refuses to come to terms with the supremacy of the law.” He was no more successful than the AGs before him in enforcing the rule of law and eventually resigned. There were multiple additional problems with the judiciary, which were the basis for the extensive human rights violations under the PNA.

Most important, the nature of the PNA allowed the executive, embodied by Arafat, and sometimes with the help of the Israeli and US security/intelligence services, to manipulate the political process to maintain its hold on Palestinian society. This dynamic also served Israel’s interests by emasculating independent institutions and grassroots initiatives that could have challenged the policies of the PNA, and by extension Israel, and would likely have led to political challenges to the Oslo Accords before the eruption of violence in September 2000 (the AL-AQSA INTIFADA).

Forces Contributing to the PNA’s Failure

The PNA’s lack of success is related to several external as well as internal factors, some previously discussed. Several main issues undermined the ability of the PNA to function as a representative and effective government.

The Oslo Accords and the power asymmetry between Israel and the PNA. Beginning with the Declaration of Principles, the Oslo Accords were a reflection of the enormous power differential between Israel and the PLO. As such, they favored Israel’s interests while minimizing or negating Palestinian interests. These terms were and largely remain unacceptable to the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories (and particularly to the REFUGEES), which meant that, for the Oslo Process to succeed, the PNA had to suppress all opposition, even peaceful dissent, effectively depoliticizing Palestinian society. This authoritarianism, which kept Palestinians silent or punished if they did speak out, combined with the PNA's failure to deliver on its political, economic, or social promises, contributed to the downward spiral of the PNA's legitimacy and credibility.

Nevertheless, Palestinians searched for ways to express their political grievances. Without recourse to political means, the opponents of Oslo gathered around Hamas and smaller parties such as the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, which were prepared to use violence. Hamas, in particular, used suicide bombings against Israelis, and, in turn, Israel made the elimination of Hamas the primary task of the PNA. This responsibility led the PNA to take greater measures of repression against its own people, especially Hamas, and led it into a tight security alliance with the US CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY and Shin Bet, making the PNA appear as a collaborator. Meanwhile, Hamas earned popular support for its lack of corruption; its provision of crucial social services, particularly in health and education; and its willingness to fight the "enemy," Israel.

Land, water, and settlements. Land, WATER, and other resources are at the heart of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In the Declaration of Principles, the PLO failed to secure a clear commitment from Israel that it would cease confiscating Palestinian land and water. From the beginning of the Oslo Process, Israel accelerated its confiscation of Palestinian land and water, which directly and negatively affected thousands of Palestinians who lost their resources and pessimistically affected all Palestinians who had believed that Oslo was going to retrieve these assets. The PNA had neither the ability nor the power to stop the continuing confiscations, while the dissonance between what Arafat was telling his people—that he was stopping land confiscation and settlement, and that a state was in the making—and what they observed became a chasm. In the end, Palestinians lost faith in the process and in their leadership. Indeed, during the seven years of Oslo, the PNA never gained control of more than 18 percent of Palestinian land and was unable to gain control over any Palestinian water resources, while Israel continued to expropriate water for its own use.

While unable to affect Israel's usurpation of Palestinian land and water, the PNA was also impotent to stop the relentless expansion of Jewish settlements into the Occupied Territories undertaken by Israel during the Oslo Process, a phenomenon that greatly enraged the Palestinian public. The settlement expansion directly contravened the spirit of Oslo, and anti-Oslo sentiment spread uncontrollably through Palestinian society. That Arafat and the PNA continued to express support for Oslo and continued to engage with Israel produced such indignation among the public that the PNA eventually lost all legitimacy.

Violence and security. From Israel's perspective and reflected in the Oslo Accords themselves, the raison d'être of the PNA was to guarantee Israel's security. Israel blamed most acts of violence that occurred in the Occupied Territories during the Oslo Process on the PNA's lack of commitment to the accords, which gave Israel the "right" to suspend or renege on its commitments (e.g., by not carrying out withdrawal from areas to which it had committed itself in signed accords) and to impose various types of punishment on the Palestinians, which ranged from tightening the CLOSURE of Israel to residents of the Occupied Territories to carrying out TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS. Israel's continuing land confiscations, ongoing settlement growth, statements asserting sovereignty over all of JERUSALEM, refusal to allow any return of refugees, and failure to live up to its commitments made in a variety of agreements resulted in Palestinian violence that the PNA simply could not control. Additionally, the massacre of twenty-nine Muslims in al-Ibrahimi Mosque in Hebron by settler BARUCH GOLDSTEIN in February 1994 directly led to the first Hamas suicide bombing the following April at the Afula bus station, which resulted in nine deaths. Subsequently, Israel's targeted assassinations of Hamas leaders resulted predictably in more suicide bombings, for each of which Israel held the PNA and Arafat responsible.

In turn, the United States and Israel intensely pressured Arafat to fulfill his security obligations and suppress the violence, which led to crackdowns by the PNA. For their part, Palestinians criticized these crackdowns as heavy-handed tactics and an abuse of human rights.

What is more, the PNA was unable to prevent continued Israeli violence by settlers, the IDF, and the Border Police against Palestinians and their property or to protect its people. The continuing cycles of Israeli and Palestinian violence during the Oslo years had structural causes as well, including the downward economic spiral and the descent into unemployment and poverty by the majority of the Palestinian population, as well as the regime of PERMITS, closure, CHECKPOINTS, and other measures of Israeli control that made life unbearable for the Palestinians.

Corruption in the PNA. The PNA was rife with corruption, and, although Arafat was never personally accused of self-aggrandizement, he used or allowed the use of the financial resources intended for the development of the Occupied Territories to ensure the loyalty of his highest officials as well as to guarantee the support of the masses. The system of corruption was complex and involved four interconnected issues. The first resided in the 1994 Paris ECONOMIC PROTOCOL, in which the Palestinians agreed to a customs union with Israel and to Israel's collection of import, VAT (value-added), excise, and income taxes. The second originated in the relationships that were developed between Israelis and Palestinians during the process of negotiations beginning with Oslo and continuing thereafter. The third related to Arafat's vast enlargement of the bureaucracy to nearly 100,000 (civilian and security/police), which guaranteed him a loyal following because their livelihood was tied to their fidelity to him. The fourth was a manifestation of the absence of the rule of law and the power and lawlessness of the security services.

The Paris Protocol. As a consequence of the customs and taxation policies specified in the protocol, Israel collected and remitted a variety of taxes due the PNA. For example, if televisions were imported into the West Bank via the HAIFA port, the Israeli importer paid an import tax on them to the Israeli government, which, in turn, gave it to the PNA. Similarly, VAT garnered on goods purchased from Israel and excise taxes on fuel, alcohol, tobacco, and so forth were accumulated by Israel and given to the PNA. The income and health taxes Israel extracted from the salaries of Palestinian workers in Israel were likewise turned over to the PNA. This arrangement led to multifaceted opportunities for corruption. For example, Arafat had numerous secret bank accounts in various cities around the globe. One that he maintained at the Hahashmonaim branch of Bank Leumi in Tel Aviv, known in the Occupied Territories as "al-sondouk al-thani" (the second account), became public knowledge and caused him considerable embarrassment. The only two people who had access to this account were Arafat and his close personal adviser MUHAMMAD RASHID. From 1994 to January 1997, at the request of Arafat via an intermediary, Israel transferred NIS 500 million ($125 million) into this account from the various taxes it collected for the PNA. During 1997 alone, it is believed that Israel transferred NIS 1.5 billion ($400 million) into the secret fund in Tel Aviv. In contrast, Israel transferred NIS 264 million ($66 million) directly to the PNA between 1994 and January 1997.

The taxes that were put into this secret account were intended for the treasury of the PNA and were to be used to develop INFRASTRUCTURE and to fuel economic growth in the West Bank and Gaza. But Arafat used them for three main purposes. First, he used them to fund his overblown bureaucratic payroll, and he hid this money from foreign donor countries and organizations that made large contributions to the PNA, insisting that their moneys be used to initiate self-sustaining economic projects to develop the Palestine ECONOMY, not for salaries of PNA employees. Second, and also related to Arafat's need to maintain his power base, the secret account was used to pay for a series of activities that ensured mass loyalty, including martyr allowances to widows and orphans and social services in the Lebanese refugee camps. The third, and by far the largest share of the account, was a "fallback" fund for Arafat and his family as well as his senior aides, in the event of a coup or some other political misfortune. Given such a cushion, they would be able to safely leave the country and establish themselves comfortably in exile.

Of course, should Israel choose to—and it did on more than one occasion, including a complete cessation of transfers after September 2000 upon the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada—it could deny Arafat access to this account.

PNA monopolies. Simultaneous with the establishment of the PNA, its top officials, with the blessing of Arafat, assumed control over the essential sectors of the economy through monopolies that would provide them with personal wealth. There are believed to have been approximately twenty-seven monopolies held by PNA officials, including steel, wheat, meat, wood, paint, building materials, feed for sheep and cattle, cement, flour, fuel, gravel, cigarettes, cars, computers, televisions and VCRs, and electrical appliances.

In general, the pattern was that a PNA official contracted with an Israeli firm or individual to purchase large quantities of a product at a given price, sold the product on the Palestinian market at a greatly inflated price, and pocketed the profit for his personal benefit. If Palestinian wholesalers had access to an alternate source for the same product at a lower price, the PNA security services often employed strong-arm tactics to “persuade” the wholesaler to purchase only the product sold by the official monopoly. At the same time, companies that attempted to sell products in competition with the official monopoly were often pressured by the security services to cease.

In addition, many officials created monopolies for their children, wives, and other relatives. An example of such nepotism involves PNA president Mahmud Abbas’s son, Yasser Abbas, who shared the monopoly on consumer entertainment. In addition, Palestinians wishing to open a business had to offer PNA officials bribes to obtain permits, which varied from onetime payments to monthly percentages of the businesses’ profits. The bribes, or “fees,” went to the senior official of whatever agency issued the permit or to the security services. Furthermore, senior security officials and members of the PNA frequently demanded from businesspeople regular financial payments for “protection.”

Muhammad Rashid held one of the largest monopolies in the territories. His company, the Palestinian Company for Commercial Services (PCCS), had several subsidiaries and controlled a number of markets. One was cement, and all Palestinian contractors were required by the PNA to buy Neshet (an Israeli firm) cement from PCCS. Trucks carrying cement from other manufacturing companies were stopped by the security services and sent home—usually after the drivers were beaten. In 1996 Neshet sold the PNA/Rashid more than a million tons of cement for between $50 million and $60 million, which was resold to Palestinian contractors at significant markup. Later, it was decreed by the PNA that Palestinians could purchase cheaper cement (than Neshet’s) from Jordan. Palestinians welcomed the pronouncement, but in practice Israeli officials on the bridge checkpoint from Jordan subjected the Jordanian trucks to extensive searches and the drivers to humiliating harassment so that very little Jordanian cement actually arrived in the Occupied Territories.

In 2004 a Palestinian parliamentary committee found that Ahmad Qurei’ was assisting in the building of the Israeli BARRIER in the Occupied Territories. Qurei’s family company, Al-Quds Cement, ships cement to Israel from EGYPT. That cement, the committee found, was specifically used for building the wall.

When a monopoly ran into a problem, Arafat fixed it. For example, the PNA minister who had the monopoly on flour in the West Bank improperly stored 5,000 tons of Romanian (via Israel) flour, which spoiled. An Israeli associate contacted through Arafat’s office came to his rescue and sent a convoy of trucks to the official’s NABLUS storehouse, loaded the flour, and transported it to Israel, where it was repackaged in fresh sacks so it appeared unspoiled. The PNA official then had the spoiled flour returned to the territories and put on the local market. Eventually, when the public discovered that their newly purchased flour was spoiled, the episode became known throughout the Occupied Territories, resulting in outrage over the economic collusion between Israel and the PNA, and the PNA’s disregard for the welfare of its people.

PNA officials earned hundreds of thousands of dollars per year from their monopolies, and this revenue effectively constituted a transfer of income from poorer economic groups to the new political class, which used the profits for personal gain or to buy political loyalty. Because the PLC was weak and the rule of law nonexistent, there were no laws protecting a company from demands of paybacks, protection, or other forms of extortion; no requirements for competition in tenders; no organized system for enforcing or collecting debts; and no way of documenting joint entrepreneurial initiatives.

Israeli involvement in the monopoly system was wide-ranging. Without exculpating the PNA officials, Israeli analyst Gershon Baskin wrote in March 2001 that “Israeli officials facilitated and encouraged what must be called ‘the ripping off of the Palestinian people’ through shady deals and schemes conducted in broad daylight by tens of former Israeli security officials with agents of the Palestine Authority including Palestinian intelligence officers, policemen, and ‘advisors’ working on behalf of themselves and on behalf of Arafat directly.”

Israeli and Palestinian economies during the Oslo era. A final factor that contributed to the failure of Oslo involved economics. One of the real purposes underlying the Oslo initiative was, from Israel’s perspective, to bring about a certain amount of stability to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as a means of facilitating Israel’s economic integration into the Middle East region—a strategic goal that would transform the Middle East and Israel's place in it. In his 1993 book The New Middle East—published the same year as the Oslo Accords—Shimon Peres laid out a far-reaching plan for the region, based on integration and economic cooperation, that would be followed by increasing political understanding and agreements until regional stability and development were achieved. Peres's vision, at least for a time, helped convince most Israelis, the international community, and significant elements in the Arab world. But the failure of the Oslo Process as a negotiated settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict meant the end of Israel's regional integration objective. During the process, two economic tracts pursued between Israel and the Palestinians were also failures. These included the effort to "integrate" the Palestinian and Israeli economies (already totally integrated but in a structural relationship of dependency) and the Paris Economic Protocol.

Integration. At the same time the Madrid process began (1991), planning for a "new" Palestinian economy commenced. Israeli liberals such as Yossi Beilin and Yair Hirschfeld set up an Economic Co-operation Foundation, which produced economic surveys with Palestinian researchers to better assess the potential for developing links with the Occupied Territories, based on the idea of moving "from dependence to interdependence." Soon after the start of Oslo, however, it became clear that four dynamics would make it very hard for the PNA to shape the development of the Palestinian economy toward the interests of Palestinians rather than Israelis. First was the continuation of the Occupation, with all the restrictions, prohibitions, permits, closures, and so forth that had kept the Palestinian economy subordinate to Israel since 1967. Second was the nature of the economic agreements and development plans themselves, which were skewed to Israel's interests. Third was the mismanagement of the economy by the PNA, and fourth (and related to the third) was the endemic corruption in the PNA and larger Palestinian and Israeli societies.

In terms of the privatization efforts associated with Oslo, the PNA was directly involved in these programs, which were sponsored—and, in some senses, imposed—by the international community. One component of these measures was the Palestine Securities Exchange, which was established in 1995 with the Palestine Development and Investment Company as a major institution to attract private investment from abroad. Yet while private investment was deemed important, at the same time, according to the International Monetary Fund (IMF), "The fundamental task of the PNA was the provision of basic public services to improve living conditions and to enhance the economy's human capital." Moreover, the PNA needed to create an environment conducive to economic growth. This required embarking on an ambitious public investment program to meet the economy's significant infrastructure needs, pursuing sound macroeconomic policies, and developing institutions in support of a market economy that would encourage private investment and foster growth. The PNA did not fulfill these requirements.

The attempt to impose a neoliberal program in the Palestinian economy became intimately tied to the corruption in the PNA. When Arafat first arrived in Gaza, he promised to turn it into a "new Singapore," but he was stymied by the PNA's regime of nepotism, monopolies tied to senior officials, and even extortion. Further, one of the signature effects of the Oslo Process was that the expatriate Palestinian bourgeoisie increasingly squeezed out and even displaced local entrepreneurs, creating a new elite and private sector.

The Paris Protocol. The Paris Protocol (GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT II) was promoted as bringing prosperity to the Palestinian economy, correcting the flaws of previous arrangements, and maintaining free movement of goods and labor between the two economies within the framework of a customs union. The import taxes collected by Israel on behalf of the PNA were to provide the PNA with a grace period in which an independent fiscal system would be established. Employment of Palestinian workers in Israel would continue, while the PNA would create a badly needed public sector. Although the protocol appeared on the surface as an agreement between two equal partners, in reality it reflected almost entirely the objectives of Israel at the expense of the Palestinian economy. For example, Palestinians could not develop new industries that would compete with existing Israeli industries. This left little room for any sort of industrial development aside from small-scale industries, usually agricultural in nature. Similarly, in terms of the import sector, Palestinians faced multiple restrictions on what goods and materials they could import from any country other than Israel. This left Palestinians a captive market in which they could import only goods that Israel deemed "amenable to Palestinian development"—goods that were peripheral to Israel's economy and did not threaten existing Israeli industries. It was precisely because of terms such as these that, as the IMF admitted in a later report, the protocol led not to sustained development or a “sound economic base” for the territories, but rather to “economic growth [that] has been sluggish, to per capita income [that] has declined,” and ultimately to the intensification of economic inequalities between the two parties.

Growing out of the protocol was the formation of Palestinian “industrial estates,” marketed “as a template for the Occupied Territories’ integration into global markets.” The industrial estates negatively shaped Oslo’s political economy by combining flawed economic theory with a system in which Israeli middlemen, the Israeli military, and Palestinian Oslo-elites worked together to enrich themselves, and in turn weakened the PNA. The industrial parks produced textiles and similar products through Israeli middlemen and mainly for the Palestinian market. The Palestinian economy remained largely unable to access the global economy except when Israel occasionally permitted it. For example, the only Palestinian cell phone company (Jawwal) is linked to an Israeli company, Orange, and its network.

Given the nature of the Oslo Accords and the policies Israel implemented during the seven years of the peace process, it seems fair to conclude that Israel never intended to permit the establishment of a viable, independent, sovereign Palestinian state in the Occupied Territories. In this context, the PNA was crippled from the start, prevented by the terms of the Oslo Accords from protecting or advancing the interests of the Palestinians it was charged with serving. Given the massive power asymmetries between Israel and the PNA, and despite the myriad flaws in the PNA, it does not appear that anything the PNA could have done would have allowed it to realize its goal of Palestinian statehood. On the other hand, the election of Hamas in 2006 and the effective splitting off of Hamas-controlled Gaza from the Fatah-controlled West Bank marked the realization of an over two-decade-long Israeli goal of splitting and, through it, weakening the Palestinian national movement. Indeed, this was, according to many analysts, a primary reason why Israel tolerated and even encouraged the emergence of political Islam, and ultimately Hamas, in the Occupied Territories when the phenomenon first appeared in the early 1980s.

The continued inability as of late 2009 of Hamas and Fatah to unite in a common policy either of pursuing the peace process or resisting Occupation points to the success of this policy by Israel, and of the difficulties Palestinians will have in forging a common structure and program for moving toward independence in the foreseeable future.

Bibliography

- Agha, Hussein, and Robert Malley. “The Road from Mecca.” New York Review of Books. 54:8 (10 May 2007).
- Alonso-Gamo, Patricia, Max Alier, Thomas Baunsgaard, and Ulric Erickson von Allmen. West Bank and Gaza Strip: Economic Developments in the Five Years since Oslo. New York: International Monetary Fund, 1999.
- Arnon, A., and J. Weinblatt. “Sovereignty and Economic Development: The Case of Israel and Palestine.” Unpublished paper, 2000.
- Beilin, Yossi. Touching Peace: From the Oslo Accord to the Final Agreement. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1999.
- Brown, Nathan. Palestinian Politics after the Oslo Accords: Resuming Arab Palestine. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Giacaman, George. “In the Throes of Oslo: Palestinian Society, Civil Society and the Future.” In After Oslo: New Realities, Old Problems. Edited by George Giacaman and Dag Jorund Lonning. London: Pluto Press, 1998.
- Hammami, Rema, and Salim Tamari. “Anatomy of Another Rebellion.” Middle East Report. 14 (Winter 2000).
- Hanafi, Sari. Huna wa Hunak: Nahwa Tahlil li al-’Alaqa bayna al-Shatat al-Filastini wal Markaz (Here and There: Toward an Analysis of the Relationship between the Palestinian Diaspora and the Center). Ramallah, West Bank, and Jerusalem: Muwatin and the Institute of Jerusalem Studies, 2001.
- Hazbun, Waleed. “Mapping the Landscape of the ‘New Middle East’: The Politics of Tourism Development and the Peace Process in Jordan.” In Jordan in Transition, 1990–2000. Edited by George Joffo. London: Palgrave, 2002.
- Hilal, Jamil. “Reform and Resistance.” Bitter Lemons. 13 May 2002.
- . Takween al-Nukhba al-Filastiniyya: Munth Nushu’ al-Harka al-Wataniyya ila ma ba’d Qiyam al-Sulta al-Wataniya (The Formation of the Palestinian Elite: From the Emergence of the National Movement to the Establishment of the National Authority). Ramallah, West Bank, and Amman, Jordan: Muwatin and al-Urdun al-Jadid, 2002.
- Hirst, David. “The New Oppressor of the Palestinians.” The Guardian (London). 6 July 1996.
- . “Shameless in Gaza.” The Guardian Weekly. 27 April 2002.

- Khalidi, Raja. "Reshaping Palestinian Economic Policy Discourse: Putting the Development Horse before the Governance Cart." In State Formation in Palestine: Viability and Governance during a Social Transformation. Edited by Mushtaq Husain Khan, George Giacaman, and Inge Amundsen. London: Routledge Curzon, 2004.
- LeVine, Mark. Why They Don't Hate Us: Lifting the Veil on the Axis of Evil. Oxford, UK: Oneworld Publications, 2005.
- Lia, Brynjar. A Police Force without a State: A History of the Palestinian Security Forces in the West Bank and Gaza. London: Ithaca Press, 2006.
- Lindholm Schulz, Helena. "The 'al-Aqsa Intifada' as a Result of Politics of Transition." Arab Studies Quarterly. Fall 2002.
- Nitzan, Jonathan, and Shimshom Bichler. The Global Political Economy of Israel. London: Pluto Press, 2005.
- Palestinian National Authority. www.pna.gov.ps.
- Parker, Christopher. Resignation or Revolt? Socio-Political Development and the Challenge for Peace in Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 1999.
- Parsons, Nigel. The Politics of the Palestinian Authority: From Oslo to al-Aqsa. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Peres, Shimon. The New Middle East. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.
- Roy, Sara. "Palestinian Society and Economy: The Continued Denial of Possibility." Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:4 (July 2001).
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestinians: In Search of a Just Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Samara, Adel. "Al-Iktisad al-Aakhar lil-Intifada" (The Other Economy of Intifada). In Al-Intifada Mubadarah. Ramallah N.p., 1990.
- Selby, Jan. "Joint Mismanagement: Reappraising the Oslo Water Regime." Unpublished paper for the Israel-Palestine Center for Research and Information, 2004.
- . Water, Power and Politics in the Middle East: The Other Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. London: I. B. Tauris, 2003.
- Usher, Graham. Palestine in Crisis: The Struggle for Peace and Political Independence after Oslo. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1995.
- Ya'ari, Ehud. "Intifada." Jerusalem Report. January 2005.

—Mark LeVine

Palestinian National Initiative, 2002

The Palestinian National Initiative (PNI, al-Mubadara) was a peace proposal conceived by a group of well-respected Palestinian activists and intellectuals and presented to the public on 17 June 2002. The PNI, for the first time, articulated an authentic Palestinian position on the peace process. Three key individuals, each known for his commitment to the Palestinian struggle, spearheaded the initiative: the late Dr. HAYDAR 'ABD 'AL-SHAFI, a physician and nationalist leader from Gaza, head of the Red Crescent Society for the GAZA STRIP, and commissioner-general of the PALESTINIAN INDEPENDENT COMMISSION FOR CITIZENS' RIGHTS; Ibrahim Dakkak, a veteran political analyst and commentator from East JERUSALEM who played a significant role during earlier stages of Palestinian resistance; and Dr. MUSTAFA AL-BARGHUTHI, a physician, longtime president of the Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees and founder of the Health, Development, Information and Policy Institute and International Protection for the Palestinian People program.

Although the PNI's long-term objectives were to bring an end to the Israeli OCCUPATION of East Jerusalem, the WEST BANK, and the Gaza Strip and to create a sovereign Palestinian state, the immediate goals included the formation of a national emergency leadership and the restructuring of governmental institutions to replace those of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), which was perceived as corrupt and hampered by bureaucratic mechanisms. The initiative also called for free, democratic, and internationally monitored elections that reached "all institutions and political posts in the Palestinian Territories including the Presidency, the Palestinian Legislative Council (Parliament) and local councils."

Once formulated, the PNI garnered the support of leading Palestinian intellectuals, including the late scholars EDWARD SAID and HISHAM SHARABI, and galvanized the support of many Palestinians, both in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA, who agreed with the initiative's key premise that a political alternative was needed. Like any consequential political event, the PNI must be situated and analyzed within the political and historical context from which it emerged. The early months of 2002 witnessed an Israeli reinvasion of the population centers in the West Bank in the context of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in a show of force unprecedented since the 1967 WAR. Hundreds of Palestinians were killed, and thousands more were wounded in the towns and refugee camps. The PNA was incapable of challenging the Israeli invasion, although its military vulnerability did not come as a surprise to most Palestinians. What many found disquieting was the PNA's total failure to mold and present an alternative strategy at such a crucial time. PNA officials, including President YASIR ARAFAT, confined themselves to repeated condemnations of TERRORISM in an attempt to highlight the PNA's commitment to the "peace process," but offered little in terms of a national contingency plan with the aim of unifying Palestinian ranks.

Additionally, the PNI was a response to the excessive militarization of the al-Aqsa Intifada, which started in 2000. The SUICIDE BOMBINGS directed at Israelis alienated traditionally pro-Palestinian voices worldwide and supplied Israel with the rationalization for its deadly military campaigns—aimed at destroying the "terrorist infrastructure." Moreover, the Intifada's violence had sidelined methods of popular, nonviolent resistance and civil disobedience that had united Palestinians from all walks of life in past revolts, especially during the First INTIFADA. Edward Said was one of several who established a correlation between the PNI and the PNA leadership vacuum and the directionless and dangerous resistance tactics. "One of the main elements in the creation of al-Mubadara is precisely the issue of leadership of the Intifada and [its] militarization," he told Al-Ahram Weekly.

Indeed, the primary force behind the PNI was a protest against the PNA's corrupt, undemocratic leadership, which was sustained almost entirely through a process of tribal-like political affiliations, nepotism, and marginalization of the opposition. This was also why the PNI gathered the support of many Palestinians; in the ELECTIONS for PNA president held in January 2005, Mustafa al-Barghuthi managed to garner 20 percent of the Palestinian vote. For a young movement that relied little on the system of political patronage, the numbers equaled a victory and perhaps represented the actual establishment of the PNI as a considerable yet unique indigenous force in Palestinian political life. The fact that al-Barghuthi was not the only candidate offering himself as an alternative to the political reign of the PNA and still managed to garner a substantial showing at the ballot box, second only to MAHMUD ABBAS, indicates the appeal of the PNI's program and political line. On the other hand, the PNI has yet to capture the imagination and the support of the poorer segments of Palestinian society, the dwellers in REFUGEE camps and villages scattered across the West Bank and Gaza. Al-Mubadara is still seen by some as an elitist, urban movement with no serious weight among the Palestinian masses, whose allegiances remain divided between FATAH and the Islamic movements, particularly HAMAS.

See also OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD

Bibliography

- Abuateya, Hala. "In Memory of a Great Public Intellectual: Professor Edward Said." Speech at Leicester University, UK, 2003.
- Barghuthi, Mustafa. "The Future Is on Our Side: An Interview with Mustafa Barghouthi." Middle East Report. 234. www.merip.org/mer/mer234/barghouthi.html.
- Elbendary, Amina. "Resources of Hope." Al-Ahram Weekly. 27 March–2 April 2003. <http://weekly.ahram.org.eg/2003/631/focus.htm>.
- Hilal, Rashid. "Some in Mubadara Trying to Sabotage Barghouthi Campaign." Palestine News Network. 7 January 2005. www.palestinenet.org/english/archive2005/jan/week1/070105/archive7jan2005.htm.
- Palestinian National Initiative, Al-Mubadara. <http://www.almubadara.org>.
- Sabawi, Samah. "Hope, out of Ramallah: The Rise of the Palestinian Alternative." Media Monitor. 7 March 2004. www.palestinemonitor.org/mustafa/hope\_out\_of\_ramallah.htm.

—Ramzy Baroud

Palestinian National Unity Government, 2007

See MECCA AGREEMENT AND THE PALESTINIAN UNITY GOVERNMENT

Palestinian People's Party

The Palestinian People's Party (PPP, Hizb Ash-Sha'ab) is an extension of the communist movement in Palestine that was formed in the early 1920s. The origins of the PPP go back to 1921, when Eastern Europeans, Marxist Jews, and Palestinians established the Palestine Communist Party, which split along ethnic lines in 1943, with the Palestinian communists forming the NATIONAL LIBERATION LEAGUE (Usbat al-Taharrur al-Watani). In 1947, the league called for the acceptance of the Partition Resolution (UN RESOLUTION 181) issued by the UN General Assembly, stipulating the establishment of a state for the Palestinian people adjacent to a Jewish state in Palestine. After 1947, Palestinian communists working through the Jordanian Communist Party and the Palestinian Communist Party in the GAZA STRIP defended the right of the Palestinian people to regain their LAND and to exercise their right to self-determination, including the right of return for Palestinian REFUGEES, in accordance with UN RESOLUTION 194.

In the aftermath of the 1967 WAR, the Palestinian communists were the only party calling for a political solution on the basis of implementing UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242, which called for Israel's withdrawal from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES in exchange for peace and an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict. They stressed guarantees for Israeli security if it withdrew from all territories occupied in 1967, resolution of the Palestinian refugee issue, and the right of the Arab Palestinian people to self-determination. Accepting Resolution 242 was not a popular position at the time because it said nothing about Palestinian political or national rights, merely making note of the need to solve the refugee problem. Moreover, as guerrilla groups burgeoned in the 1960s and ARMED STRUGGLE was the mantra of the Palestinian movement, the Palestinian communists eschewed the use of violence or armed struggle, committing themselves instead to diplomacy and negotiation.

After the 1973 War, the Palestinian Communists supported UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 338 (a restatement of Resolution 242) and the GENEVA CONFERENCE. They played an important role in reinforcing recognition of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) as the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, even though the PLO did not permit the group to become a member until 1987. They called for the establishment of an independent Palestinian state within the 1967 borders and, in this connection, formed the PALESTINE NATIONAL FRONT in the WEST BANK and the UNITED NATIONAL FRONT in the Gaza Strip, both important indigenous nationalist movements in the Occupied Territories. Later, the Palestinian communists were among the founders of the NATIONAL GUIDANCE COMMITTEE, which agitated against acceptance of the concept of "autonomy" for the Palestinians in the 1979 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS.

In 1982, the Palestinian communists held their first conference and established the Palestinian Communist Party (PCP) in the West Bank, Gaza, and the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA. Their political program demanded the end of OCCUPATION, the securing of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination, the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the right of return for Palestinian refugees.

From 1986 to 1987 the PCP participated in efforts to reunify the PLO; consequently, in 1987 the PCP was designated as a full member of the PLO, becoming the first exclusively "political" party to be accepted in the PLO, all other factions having both political and paramilitary groups. During the INTIFADA that erupted in 1987 in the Occupied Territories, the PCP contributed to the formation of the popular committees (voluntary organizations that responded to the material needs of the Palestinian population) and participated in the Unified National Leadership of the Intifada command that planned and orchestrated Intifada activities. Although the party's platform during the Intifada was somewhat at odds with that of other parties in that it already recognized Israel, nevertheless it played a major role throughout the Intifada in organizing the various forms of grassroots and popular nonviolent resistance against the Occupation.

In late 1991 the PCP held its second conference and changed the name of the party to the Palestinian People's Party to avoid the communist designation, although it maintained its basic political positions. After the GULF WAR in 1991, the PPP approved the formula for the MADRID CONFERENCE and, in September 1993, gave its support to the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES and the OSLO ACCORDS, the agreements between Israel and the PLO.

The PPP initially refrained from joining the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), but succeeding developments in mid-1996 led it to respond positively to calls by President YASIR ARAFAT to participate. However, on 15 August 1998 the politburo of the PPP announced, following reports of corruption and the collective resignation of some members of the PLC, that it did not consider itself a representative or participant in that government and therefore could not assume any responsibility in its performance.

Although indigenous to the West Bank and Gaza and despite more than eighty years of organizing and activism, the PPP garnered only 2 percent of the public's support in a 2005 public opinion survey conducted by the Palestinian Center for Research and Cultural Dialogue. Much of Palestine is a conservative and Muslim society, and communism is anathema to both. On the other hand, many Palestinians belong to leftist factions—the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, FIDA, and others—that are not consonant with Islam. The party's acceptance of the Partition Resolution, recognition of Israel, and eschewing of armed struggle were the likely reasons it was set apart from other factions.

In the current phase, the PPP calls for a comprehensive review of the entire Oslo Process and the PNA's performance. (www.palpeople.org).

Bibliography

- Budeiri, Musa. The Palestinian Communist Party, 1919–1948. London: Ithaca, 1979.
- Musleh, Isam, and Walid Shomaly. A Public Opinion Survey. Beit Sahour: The Palestinian Center for Research and Cultural Dialogue, 9 March 2005.
- Sahliyah, Emile. In Search of Leadership: West Bank Politics since 1967. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 1988.

Palestinian Poetry

Palestine is richly meditated in the poetry of its most well-known, and less well-known, writers. This poetry provides a profound testament to the endurance of Palestine and to the eternal durability of poetry as a synthetic medium of expression and a concise reservoir of evocative communication harboring meaning, signification, resonance, and music. From before the time of the Prophet Muhammad, poetry has been an iconic part of Arab culture, and the intensely opulent Arabic language has been its vehicle. It is the ultimate expression of individual emotion, but for Palestinians, particularly after the creation of the Zionist state in 1948, poetry serves as a collective expression of people's loss, memory, exile, unsettled identity, resistance, and struggle.

Palestinian poetry of the twentieth century is frequently characterized by a heightened sense of irony and the exploration of existential themes. References to resistance, OCCUPATION, exile, loss, and love and longing for homeland are prominently depicted. A common theme that runs through nearly all Palestinian poetry is that of a strong affection for, and longing for, a lost, beloved homeland. It is a common loss, everybody's loss; hence resistance poetry belongs to everybody, to the whole Palestinian community. Reproducing and spreading this poetry requires no permission, because, like the land, classified as Musha'a ("property held in common"), it is a product that belongs to the people. Another theme that pervades Palestinian poetry is that of exile. In "Who Am I, without Exile?" by MAHMUD DARWISH (1941–2008), exile is interrogated existentially, but the Palestinian experience foregrounds and molds it. We are therefore locked into close intimate reading of exile as a collective and personal destiny.

From "Letter from Exile" by Mahmud Darwish
I am now grown—over twenty/The burden of life I shoulder like men

I work in a tavern, as a dishwasher/And coffee maker

You should see me mom/I am well/I have a loaf of bread

And some vegetables/I heard on the radio: messages of the Exiles/They all concurred, without dissent:

"We are quite well"/No one has said: "I am distressed."

*Or "it is wretched here."/How's my father?
Does he still pray?/Does he love children,
The land and olives?*

As he always did? And how are my brothers?/Did they graduate?

Are they teachers now?/Like my father used to say.

Growing out of the condition of exile is the problematic of identity, and this too is a recurrent theme in the poetry of almost all the Palestinian poets. Many of the greatest poets have by birth or force found themselves in exile, living among other cultures; thus their sense of their identity runs deep into the lines of their poetry. Even for those who remained in Palestine after it became Israel, the sense of internal exile is profound, and their identities are even more disjointed by the dichotomous situation of being "Israeli Arabs." For all Palestinians, then, identity is ambiguous, obscure, indefinite, and unsettled. Palestine, the site of that struggle for a collective national self, is rendered with yearning and tenderness in many poems: Palestine is no ordinary place: "The mother of beginnings, the mother of ends," as Darwish put it. Thus, it is the extraordinariness of Palestine—its fertile and beautiful landscape, its people's infusion with history, its culture—preserved in the words of the best poets and thinkers, that makes their poems great and striking. Each of the poets has a story, memory, and vision of and about Palestine to tell. It is through the prism of historic Palestine that the poems mushroom into different trajectories, where love, yearning, hope, memory, resistance, injustice, and death are sites of contextual reflection.

Palestinian poetry of the period 1920–1945 is considered to contain the origins of “resistance poetry,” in which poets focused on the struggle against the Zionists and the British occupying forces. Poets Abu Salma (the pseudonym for ‘ABD-AL-KARIM AL-KARMI, 1907–1980), IBRAHIM TUQAN (1905–1941), and Abd al-Rahim Mahmud (1913–1948) were among the foremost spokesmen of this period. Ibrahim Tuqan conveys a sense of urgency about saving his homeland. Tuqan could very well have written the following words as a form of resistance poetry to the Palestinians struggling today—praising them for their courage and loyalty to the cause of freeing their Palestinian homeland.

From “Lest We Lose” by Ibrahim Tuqan
You’re the ones loyal to the cause/You’re the ones who carry its burden
You’re the ones who act without speech/God bless your strong arms!
A declaration from you equals an army/with all its military might
Your gatherings restore/the glory lost since Umayyad conquests/But we still have bits of country left in our hands/so rest awhile, lest we lose what remains.

The period from about 1945 through 1956 was a time of sorrow, despair, and stasis, and it preceded the emergence of any resistance groups. Poetry of the period reflected these feelings. Typical is this poem by Abu Salma.

From “We Shall Return” by Abu Salma
We’ll return some day while generations listen/to the echoes of our feet.
We’ll return with raging storms,/holy lightning and fire,/winged hope and songs, soaring eagles,/the dawn smiling on the deserts. Some morning we’ll return riding the crest of the tide,/our bloodied banners fluttering/above the glitter of spears.

Nevertheless, after the 1948 Nakba and especially after the 1967 Occupation, poetry was gradually transformed into a vehicle for political activism. From among those Palestinians who became Arab citizens of Israel and after the passage of the Citizenship Law of 1952, a school of resistance poetry was born that included poets such as FADWA TUQAN (1917–2003, who lived in NABLUS), RASHID HUSAYN (1936–1977, who lived in a village near HAIFA until fleeing into exile in 1967), Taha Muhammad Ali (1931–, who lives in NAZARETH), Samih al-Qasim (1939–, from the town of RAMLA in the Upper Galilee), and TAWFIQ ZAYYAD (1929–1994, who was mayor of Nablus). These poets lived in Israel; most were members of the Communist Party and, as such, had a degree of freedom of expression within the contours of Israeli political parties, although all were subject to harassment, arrest, and imprisonment for their work. Khalid Sulaiman writes of Palestinian poetry in this era, “The loss of Palestine formed the tragic reality which determined the climate within which Arabic poetry has developed since the late forties. The Palestine experience has radiated a new poetic tone, a new symbolism, a new angst which forms a subterranean level of modern poetry.”

By 1967, as the armed resistance to Israel grew, the voices of the poets expanded. Traditional styles, rhythm, forms, and themes were transformed, and a new poetics emerged. That post-1948 mood of despair and stasis was transformed with the emergence of the resistance fighter, the Fida’i, which soon became as important a figure in poetry as the REFUGEE had been after 1948.

As Aida Hasan wrote, “New themes emerged and became predominant in these years, driven by a successive round of defeats, leading ultimately to poetry reflecting the rise of resistance.” The words of the poets became, if not weapons, at least powerful tools, for as writer and critic JABRA IBRAHIM JABRA (1919–1994, lived in exile in IRAQ) wrote (quoted in The Object of Memory), while poetry might be condemned as too weak a toy against guns, “in actual fact it was often as good as dynamite. It gave point to a whole nation’s suffering and wrath. It crystallized political positions in telling lines, which, memorized by old and young, stiffened popular resistance and provided rallying slogans.” New expressions appeared: terms such as jurh (wound), khayma (tent), manfa (exile), sumud (steadfastness), and awdah (return) became symbols for the Palestinian tragedy itself.

Indeed, from 1970 through the present, poetry has poured forth from Palestinians living in Israel, from those in exile throughout the Arab world and beyond, and from those living under Occupation in the WEST BANK, GAZA STRIP, and East JERUSALEM. Hasan further notes that the important duality of roles for Palestinian poets is apparent in these and other works. “Darwish, Abu Salma, Tuqan [Zayyad, Husayn, Taha Muhammad Ali, Kamal Butros Nasir (1925–1973)], and other Palestinian poets are more than just poets. They and their experiences are part of a tragic Palestinian history, and they have recorded it for us to experience, understand, and remember. They write not because they want to, but because they have to; not merely for themselves, but for their people. They are poets, but consciously or not, they are spokespeople as well.” For a Palestinian—whether in exile or in the homeland—the experience of misery, loss, sorrow, and yearning for justice is the same. And while it may not be the job of poets to speak our collective experiences and feelings, Palestinian poets have done just that.

The following is illustrative of later resistance poets.

“Against” by Rashid Husayn (translated by As’ad AbuKhalil)

Against the revolutionaries of my/country injuring a spike

Against a child—any child—carrying/a grenade

Against my sister studying the muscles/of a rifle

Against whatever you want . . . , but what does even a prophet or a prophetess to do

when their eyes drink the horses/of killers

Against a child becoming a hero/at ten

Against the heart of the tree bearing/mines

Against the bushes of my orchard/becoming gallows

Against the basin of flowers in/my land becoming gallows

Against whatever you want . . . but/after the burning of my country,

my comrades, and my youth

Other samples are from individuals whose poetry is so known and beloved among Palestinians that they have become the poetic voice of the Palestinian people. They are, as Salma Jayyusi states in her anthology, “household names” in the Arab world. They have provided Arab readers with a “potent verbal weapon” against their tragic history. Zayyad represents the continuing Palestinian struggle for justice—a strong, solid, determined spirit defying the injustices, aggression, and suffering that typify the Palestinian collective experience. This well-known poem by Zayyad is typical of his work: its central message is steadfastness (sumud) in the face of Zionist aggression.

“On the Trunk of an Olive Tree” by Tawfiq Zayyad

I shall carve my story and the chapters of my tragedy, I shall carve my sighs

On my grove and on the tombs of my dead;/I shall carve the number of each deed

Of our usurped land/The location of my village and its boundaries.

The demolished houses of its peoples, My uprooted trees

And to remember it all,/I shall continue to carve/All the chapters of my tragedy,

And all the stages of the disaster,/From the beginning/To end,

On the olive tree/In the courtyard/Of the house.

In “We Shall Remain” Zayyad expresses even more intensely sumud and the determination that the Nakba of 1948 will not be repeated.

“We Shall Remain” by Tawfiq Zayyad
(translated by Naseer Aruri)

It is a thousand times easier/For you/To pass an elephant

Through a needle’s eye/To catch fried fish in the Milky Way

To plough the sea/To teach the alligator how to speak

...

Here upon your chest/We shall remain

Like broken glass/And cactus/In your throat A fiery whirlwind in your eyes . . ./Here, we shall remain

*A wall on your chest/We starve; go naked;
sing songs;*

*And fill the streets with demonstrations/And the jails with pride
We breed rebellions/One after one/Like twenty impossible, we shall remain
In Lydda, Ramleh, and the Galilee/Here we shall remain
You can drink the sea/We squeeze the rock/To quench our thirst
And if we starve/We eat the dirt/And never depart
Or grudge our blood./Here, we have a past/A present
And a future*

Of those who remained after 1948 and the transformation of Palestine into Israel, Samih al-Qasim has written quite profoundly about sumud. He and Mahmud Darwish, who left to various parts of the Arab world and finally died after a massive heart attack, often debated sumud (al-Qasim) versus raheel migration/expulsion (Darwish). Under the title of “Enemy of the Sun,” which also became the title of a book translated by Naseer Aruri and Edmund Ghareeb (Drum and Spear, 1970), al-Qasim wrote the following.

From “Enemy of the Sun” by Samih al-Qasim
*I may if you wish, lose my livelihood/I may sell my shirt and bed
I may work as a stone cutter, a street sweeper, a porter.
I may clean your stores/or rummage your garbage/In pursuit of nourishment.
I may lay down hungry/Oh enemy of the sun,/But/I shall not compromise
And to the last pulse of my veins/I shall resist.
You may confiscate the last strip of my land/Feed my youth to prison cells
You may plunder my heritage./You may burn my books, my poems
Or feed my flesh to the dogs./You may spread a web of terror
On the roots of my village. O enemy of the sun, But I shall not compromise/And to the last pulse in my veins
I shall resist/You may put out the light in my eyes*

*You may deprive me of my mother’s kisses.
You may curse my father, my people./You may distort my history.
You may deprive my children of a smile/And of life’s necessities.
You may fool your friend with a borrowed face.
You may build walls of hatred around me/You may glue my eyes to humiliation
O enemy of the sun/The celebrations fill the air.
The decorations are raised at the port/A glow in the heart and in the horizon
A sail is seen challenging the wind and the depth/It is Ulysses returning home From the sea of trouncing/BUT, it is the return of the sun, O my exiled ones
And for her sake and his/I swear/I shall not compromise
And to the last pulse in my veins/I shall resist, Resist—and RESIST.*

Collective punishment by the Israeli occupier captured the attention of West Bank poets such as Fadwa Tuqan of Nablus. Here is a monologue between Fadwa and her cousin, Hamza, who languishes in prison while the Israelis prepare to demolish his old father’s home as a punishment for Hamza.

From “Hamza” by Fadwa Tuqan
*That his father was 65 has fallen on deaf ears/And the governor has issued his orders: “Demolish the house and torture the son.”/Having issued his orders he rose up Reciting slogans of love, security, and order./The soldiers encircled the home Wriggled like the serpent, and The knocks commandingly heightened Enjoining the inhabitants to depart/Quite generously—in an hour or so.
And Hamza opened the windows/On looking at the soldiers and the sun
He exclaimed:/“Oh Palestine be assured/The house, the children, and myself
Will be sacrificed for your deliverance./We live and die for your sake.”*

*The echo of Hamza's howl/Sent shivers through the nerves of town
While the house stood silent—and somber/Not an hour yet, the house went up and down. The rubble of the rooms which housed the dreams/And the warmth which was
And the years of childhood/The memories of building
The struggle and determination/Tears and happy laughter
Yesterday, I saw Hamza in the street/Stepping forward with steadfastness and conviction /And uphill brow*

Tuqan's sense of injustice and outrage was matched by that of Nizar Tawfiq Qabbani (1923–1998), who was one of the most revered contemporary poets in the Arab world; not Palestinian, he probably felt Palestinian given his passionate identification with the Palestinian cause. Qabbani was a Syrian poet whose early poetry focused on love, eroticism, and affection, but he was transformed by the 1967 Arab defeat, which deeply influenced his poetry and provoked his lament for Palestine and the Arab cause. The defeat marked a qualitative shift in Qabbani's work—from erotic love poems to poems with overt political themes of rejection and resistance. For instance, his poem "Marginal Notes on the Book of Defeat" is a stinging self-criticism of Arab inferiority. He attributed the overwhelming defeat in six days to endemic problems and entrenched traditions that retarded society and crippled its capacity to advance and resist. Additionally his "Reflections on the Nakba" is a piece of social history containing a sophisticated, if subversive, analysis of the ills of Arab society.

From "Marginal Notes on the Book of Defeat" by Nizar Qabbani
*My friends, I mourn for the language of the past/and the old books
This discourse punctured like battered shoes/This verse of profanity, slander, aspersion, I mourn—I mourn Bitter to our mouth is poetry/Bitter to our eyes is beauty
The night—the curtains—the seats/Oh my sad Homeland
You have changed me over night/From a poet of love and longing* *to one who writes with a knife/the summation of our case is reduced to one sentence/we adopted the facade of civilization

while our spirit remained antiquated/It aches me to hear the news in the morning and to hear the dogs bark/Our skin is senseless/our souls suffer from bankruptcy
Our days revolve around chess, drowsiness, visitation. /Are we truly the best nation?
Our oil which floods the desert/could have become a burning spear
If I am granted amnesty/If I can meet with the Sultan/I would say your fierce dogs have torn my suit . . ./They interrogate my wife and compile a list of my friends
my master my sultan, you were defeated twice./If I am granted amnesty against the soldiers/I would say to the Sultan/you lost twice because you were unenlightened about human rights/We want an angry generation/to aim towards the horizon to search the roots of history/and penetrate the annals of thought
We are vanquished, insipid like a watermelon's rind/Do not study our news
Do not track our footsteps/Do not accept our thought/Oh children you are the spring rain, the blossom of hope/You are the generation which will conquer defeat.*

Yet Qabbani's poetry is also infused with a sense of optimism matching that of the Palestinian poets who lived under Occupation and vowed to resist it and succeed. An illustration of this theme appears in the following.

From "Jerusalem" by Nizar Qabbani
*I wept until my tears became dry/I prayed until the candles flickered
I knelt until the floor creaked/I asked for Mohammed and Christ
Oh Jerusalem, the fragrance of prophets/The shortest path between earth and sky Oh Jerusalem, citadel of laws/A beautiful child with fingers charred*

*And downcast eyes/You are the shady oasis, route of the prophets
Your streets are melancholy/Your markets are mourning
You, the young maiden dressed in black/Who will ring the bells in the Nativity? On Sunday morning? Who will bring toys to the children?
On Christmas eve?/Oh Jerusalem, city of sorrow
A big tear is wandering in your eye/Who will halt the aggression
On you, o pearl of religions?/Who will wash your bloody walls?
Who will safeguard the Bible?/Who will rescue the Quran?
Who will save Christ?/Who will save man?
O Jerusalem my town/O Jerusalem my love Tomorrow the lemon tree will blossom/And the olive trees will rejoice
Your eyes will dance/The migrant pigeons will return
To your sacred roofs/And your children will play again
Fathers and sons will meet/On your rosy hills
My town/The town of peace and olive trees*

Mahmud Darwish is the best known of the Palestinian poetic lights. He is called the Olive Tree of Palestine as a symbol of rootedness and undying dedication and identification with the Palestinian cause in his poetry. Raymond Deane describes him as “the national poet of a non-existent nation, the love poet whose beloved is both a woman and a country, [who] saw metaphor as the essence both of poetry and of his everyday life. Such a vision dissolves secure perceptions of self, form, language and ‘things-in-themselves.’”

Darwish began his poetic career in the 1960s and rose to fame in the 1970s, when he became noted for his metaphorical explanations of the Palestinian reality. The suffering he writes of is his own, but he knows that he is writing for his people, and thus he is recognized as one of the greatest Arab poets writing today. Mahmud Darwish became the main exponent of the literature of resistance in the sixties, and was, like many fellow poets, often imprisoned by Israeli authorities. He earned international acclaim for his poetry on the Palestine experience, etching the details of human moments rather than ideology, but constantly imbued with a drive for his people’s dignity.

When his poem “A Lover from Palestine” was going to be published, he presented it to the Israeli censor, who crossed out the word “Palestine” and replaced it with “Eretz Israel.” The insistence on his identity later prompted him to compose what is probably the most internationally celebrated Palestinian poem, “Bitaqat Hawiyya” (Identity Card), in which the poet, in the voice of a worker, addresses just such a bureaucrat. Here is Mahmud Darwish on the loss of al-Barwah, his childhood village.

From “Write Down! I Am an Arab” by Mahmud Darwish

*I wasn’t able to memorise the words and protect the place from being transferred to a strange name fenced in with eucalyptus trees. While the posters told us:
“You were never here.”*

The following small excerpt is from a poem called “Poem of the Land,” which refers to the Day of the Land, a day that is marked annually by Palestinians on 30 March. It is a dedication to the demonstrators and the protesters who were shot and killed by the Israeli army in 1976.

From “Poem of the Land” by Mahmud Darwish

*A small evening/A neglected village/Two sleeping eyes/Thirty years/Five wars
I witness that time hides for me/an ear of wheat
The singer sings/Of fire and strangers/Evening was evening
The singer was singing/And they question him/Why do you sing?
He answers them as they seize him/because I sing.
And they have searched him:/In his breast only his heart
In his heart only his people/In his voice only his sorrow*

For the young, contemporary Palestinian poets, sorrows and worries notwithstanding, sentiments of hope and defiance serve as antidotes to suffering and pain. Ultimately, the Palestinian struggle for a counternarrative is one that spawns interrelated disparate realms to achieve liberation and emancipation, and a historical grounding that makes the freedom of Palestine special. Here are the defiant words of Nizar Wattad (1980–, born in the United States to exiled Palestinian parents).

From “Poets for Palestine” by Nizar Wattad
Put it down for posterity’s sake, free P
[Palestine]
from the West Bank to the West Coast we start to connect and get close, professin’ our best hope
—despite the stress blessed ’cause it is something in our chest that love.

Another young poet, Sammer Abu Hawwash (1972–, born in Beirut to a family of Palestinian refugees), conveys his solitude and detachment from the outside world as follows.

From “A Cold Day” by Sammer Abu Hawwash
A cold day/I didn’t think at all to turn on the heat/wear a third sweater or stand by the window/and wait for the rain because it won’t fall today/it will fall tomorrow
and I won’t ask ever/how old I’ve become at this hour/it is sometimes sufficient to sit and think/it is a cold day

There are numerous other contemporary Palestinian poets who may be yet less well-known than those discussed above, including Sharif S. Elmusa, Saud el-Asadi, Izzidin al-Manasrah, Ahmad Dahbour, Anas al-Ayla, Mohammad H. Ghanaïem, Salman Masalha, Khaled Abdallah, Walid Khazendar, Youssef Abd al-Aziz, Ghazi al-Theeba, Khairi Mansour, Mourid al-Barghouti, and Ghassan Zaqtan, to name a few. The tradition of Palestinian poetry lives on.

See also INDIVIDUAL PALESTINIAN POETS: MAHMUD DARWISH; RASHID HUSAYN; ‘ABD-AL-KARIM AL-KARMI; KAMAL BUTROS NASIR; FADWA TUQAN; IBRAHIM TUQAN; TAWFIQ ZAYYAD. OTHER MAJOR LITERARY AND ARTISTIC FIGURES WITH ENTRIES HEREIN INCLUDE NAJI AL-AZAMI AL-ALI, POLITICAL CARTOONIST; EMILE HABIBI, NOVELIST; JABRA

IBRAHIM JABRA, NOVELIST AND POET; GHASSAN KANAFANI, JOURNALIST AND WRITER; ISMA’IL ABDUL-QADER SHAMMUT, ARTIST

Bibliography

- AbuKhalil, As’ad. “The Poetics of Palestinian Resistance.” The Electronic Intifada. 18 August 2008. <http://electronicintifada.net/v2/article9772.shtml>.
- Alshaer, Atef. “Palestine in Verse: ‘Flawed Landscape’ and ‘Poets for Palestine.’” The Electronic Intifada. 6 October 2008.
- Ammous, Saifedean. “Arab Poetry’s Sometimes Subversive Answer to ‘American Idol.’” The Electronic Intifada. 25 September 2007.
- Aruri, Naseer Hasan. Enemy of the Sun: Poetry of Palestinian Resistance. San Francisco: Drum and Spear Press, 1970.
- Bainbridge, Charles. “Modern Poetry in Translation: Palestine.” The Guardian (UK). 29 November 2008.
- Berger, Maurits. “The Palestinian Paradox.” Banipal: Magazine of Modern Arab Literature. Feature on Palestinian Literature, Nos. 15–16 (Autumn 2002–Spring 2003).
- Boullata, Issa J. Critical Perspectives on Modern Arabic Literature. Washington, DC: Three Continents Press/Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1980.
- Boullata, Kamal, and Mirene Ghossein. The World of Rashid Hussein: A Palestinian Poet in Exile. Boston: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1979.
- Darwish, Mahmoud. The Butterfly’s Burden. Port Townsend, WA: Copper Canyon Press, 2006.
- . Unfortunately, It Was Paradise: Selected Poems. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Deane, Raymond. “Darwish: Between the National and the Human.” The Electronic Intifada. 6 October 2009.
- Elmessiri, Abdelwahab M., and A. Elmessiri, eds. The Palestinian Wedding: A Bilingual Anthology of Contemporary Palestinian Poetry. Washington, DC: Three Continents Press/Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1982.
- Elmusa, Sharif S. Flawed Landscape: Poems 1987–2008. Northampton, MA: Interlink Publishing Group, 2009.
- Gabriel, Judith. “Al Nakba—Dark Ruins of the Tribal Poets: Tragedy Expressed via New Literary Forms Infuses Half Century of Palestinian Poetry.” Al Jadid Magazine. 4:22 (Winter 1998).
- Gander, Forrest. “A Poet’s Life in the Palestinian Century: Don’t Look Away.” The Poetry Foundation. 28 November 2008. <http://www.poetryfoundation.org/harriet/2008/11/a-poets-life-in-the-palestinian-century-dont-look-away/>.
- Handal, Nathalie, ed. The Poetry of Arab Women. Northampton, MA: Interlink Publishing Group, 2000.
- Hasan, Aida. “Voices from the Homeland (Part One).” Suite101.com, The Genuine Article, Literally. 6 November 2000. http://www.suite101.com/article.cfm/arab\_culture\_and\_identity/52704/1.

- . “Voices from the Homeland (Part Two).” Suite101.com, The Genuine Article, Literally. 3 December 2000. http://www.suite101.com/article.cfm/arab\_culture\_and\_identity/52704/1.
- Hashim, Lamyaa. “Poetry of Revolution: Poetry as a Vehicle for Social Change.” Suite101.com, The Genuine Article, Literally. 14 December 2008. http://writing-poetry.suite101.com/article.cfm/poetry\_of\_revolution.
- Hoffman, Adina. My Happiness Bears No Relation to Happiness: A Poet's Life in the Palestinian Century. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009.
- Honaida Ghanim. “Poetics of Disaster: Nationalism, Gender, and Social Change among Palestinian Poets in Israel after the Nakba.” International Journal of Politics, Culture, and Society (Netherlands). 22:1 (March 2009).
- Jabra, Ibrahim Jabra. The First Well: A Bethlehem Boyhood. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 2003.
- . Princesses' Street: Baghdad Memories. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 2005.
- . The Ship. Washington, DC: Three Continents Press/Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1985.
- Jayyusi, Salma Khadra, ed. Anthology of Modern Palestinian Literature. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Kanazi, Remi, ed. Poets for Palestine. Astoria, NY: Al Jisser Group, 2008.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. Politicide: Sharon's War against the Palestinians. London: Verso, 2003.
- Masriyyeh, Norma. “In the Wake of Identity: Silencing the Palestinian Voice.” This Week in Palestine. 97 (May 2006).
- Al Messiri and Abdul Wahab, eds. A Lover from Palestine and Other Poems: An Anthology of Palestinian Poetry. Washington, DC: Palestine Information Office, 1970.
- Muhawi, Ibrahim, and Sharif Kanaana. Speak, Bird, Speak Again: Palestinian Arab Folktales. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.
- Al-Musawi, Mushin. Arabic Poetry: Trajectories of Modernity and Tradition. London: Routledge, 2006.
- Parmenter, Barbara M. Giving Voice to Stones: Place and Identity in Palestinian Literature. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994.
- “Poetry of Revolution: Poetry as a Vehicle for Social Change.” Suite101.com, The Genuine Article, Literally. n.d. http://writing-poetry.suite101.com/article.cfm/poetry\_of\_revolution#ixzz0FmYtKz8h&A.
- Qabbani, Nizar. From Arabian Love Poems by Nizar Qabbani, rev. ed. Bassam K. Frangieh and Clementina R. Brown, translators. Full Arabic and English Texts. Boulder CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1988.
- Salaam, Hala. The Conscience: The Story of Kamal Nasir. Beirut: Palestine Research Center, 1974.
- Smith, Michael, ed. Contemporary Palestinian Poetry. Free Verse: A Journal of Contemporary Poetry and Poetics. Special Supplement (2008).
- Slyomovics, Susan. The Object of Memory: Arab and Jew Narrate the Palestinian Village. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Sulaiman, Khalid A. Palestine and Modern Arab Poetry. London: Zed Books, 1984.
- Tuqan, Fadwa. Daily Nightmares: Ten Poems. Translated by Yusra A. Salah. New York: Vantage Press, 1988.
- . A Mountainous Journey: A Poet's Autobiography. Olive E. Kenny and Naomi Shihab Nye, translators. St. Paul, MN: Graywolf Press, 1990.
- Tuqan, Ibrahim. Diwan Ibrahim Tuqan, 1905–1941. Beirut: Maktabat al-Muhtasib, 1984.

—Naseer Aruri

Palestinian Refugee Property Claims

The Zionist movement has been able to create and defend a Jewish state successfully because it has gained and maintained control over increasingly larger amounts of LAND in Palestine/Israel, to the detriment of the Palestinian Arab population that formerly controlled much of the land. Although Zionist organizations like the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF) gradually purchased land in Palestine from the late nineteenth to the mid-twentieth century, Jews owned only 6.59 percent of the total surface area of Palestine on the eve of the first Arab-Israeli war of 1948 (although this amount represented about 20 percent of Palestine's cultivable land). This situation changed dramatically as a result of Israel's victory in the war, when it confiscated a huge amount of land abandoned by Palestinian REFUGEES.

During the 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors, approximately 750,000 Palestinians fled their homes or were expelled across the cease-fire lines by Jewish forces—approximately one-half of the entire Arab population. Israel completely destroyed more than 400 Palestinian villages. Compounding the refugees' staggering political and demographic loss was their abandonment of a huge amount of movable and immovable property (land). For Israel, the abandoned property was a major boon to its devastated postwar economy. Even as the war was still raging, Jewish forces and civilians began occupying some of the homes abandoned by the refugees and tilling some of their fields. The new Israeli government quickly enacted legislation to sequester the property and provide a “legal” regime for controlling it. On 20 June 1948, it froze all refugee bank accounts. The following day, it enacted the Abandoned Property Ordinance and, on 24 June, the ABANDONED AREAS ORDINANCE. On 15 July a Custodian of Abandoned Property was established, which later gave way to a CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY after promulgation of the Emergency Regulations (Absentees’ Property) of 2 December 1948.

This law allowed the state to sequester the property of persons defined as “absentees.” Movable property could be sold, although the custodian could only lease land, not sell it. The definition of an absentee was much wider than the conventional definition of a refugee. Any citizen of an Arab state was declared an absentee, as was any person who, after 29 November 1947 (the date the UN partition plan for Palestine, UN RESOLUTION 181, was adopted), traveled to an Arab state for any reason. Individuals who were in any part of Palestine not under Jewish control—which was much of the country—were declared absentees. Persons who were in any location other than their “habitual residence” were declared absentees, even if they were in areas under Israeli control. The ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW, enacted by the Israeli Knesset on 14 March 1950, was the most significant law to affect Palestinian property. It granted the Custodian of Absentee Property the ability not just to lease sequestered property but also to sell it to a “DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY,” a governmental body later created by the Development Authority (Transfer of Property) Law of 31 July 1950. The custodian thereafter sold the bulk of the refugee land to the Development Authority, and title to the land was transferred officially on 1 October 1953. Together, these two laws were the first major steps by which Israel sought to sever the refugees’ legal title to their abandoned property and confiscate it permanently.

Even before that sale occurred, the Israeli government agreed to sell most of the abandoned Palestinian property to the Jewish National Fund (JNF), the premier Zionist land-purchasing company. The two sides signed agreements on 27 January 1949 and 4 October 1950 in which the state agreed to sell a large amount of mostly rural land to the JNF. The JNF’s charter forbade it from ever selling any of its land; it could only lease it, and then only to Jews. The JNF then worked with another Zionist organization, the JEWISH AGENCY

FOR ISRAEL, to build settlements on this land to house new Jewish IMMIGRANTS. While some abandoned Palestinian housing was utilized for the newcomers, most dwellings in abandoned villages were destroyed, leaving only vacant land. Over 300 new settlements were built by the end of 1953. By 1954, one-third of Israel’s Jewish population lived on confiscated refugee land, although much rural refugee land today remains uninhabited.

The United Nations General Assembly expressed its concern over the refugees and their property by adopting UN RESOLUTION 194 (III) on 11 December 1948. In addition to establishing the UN CONCILIATION COMMISSION FOR PALESTINE (UNCCP), paragraph 11 of the resolution stated that “the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practical date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for the loss of or damage to property which, under principles of INTERNATIONAL LAW or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible.”

The UNCCP began functioning in January 1949 and immediately tried to engineer peace treaties between Israel and several Arab states. It also undertook the more specific task of implementing Resolution 194’s call for property compensation. Within two years, the UNCCP had failed in its mandate to effect peace treaties and then pursued in vain its mission to work on behalf of refugee compensation until its functional demise in 1966 (the commission technically still exists). Starting in 1952, the UNCCP also supervised the restitution of £3,595,160 sterling ($14,488,495 in 1947 dollars) in refugee bank accounts that had been blocked by Israel.

However, its major efforts were in assessing the scope and value of the refugees’ losses. From 1953 until 1964, the UNCCP worked on the largest project it ever undertook: identifying Arab land in Israel and assigning it a value. Because UNCCP staff did not know which land belonged to refugees, it decided to identify every parcel of Arab-owned land in Palestine as of 14 May 1948, the date on which Israel declared independence. It then determined the value of each parcel as of 29 November 1947, the date marking the UN General Assembly’s vote to partition Palestine and the effective start of the war. On 13 May 1964, the UNCCP published the amount of land in Israel that it had identified: 5,258,091 dunums (approx-mately 1,314,523 acres), of which most was refugee land. It estimated that an additional 1,811,000 dunums of land (approximately 452,750 acres) had been owned by Arabs, although it could not document this. The UNCCP estimated the value of all this land to be £235,660,250 in 1947 Palestinian pounds ($949,710,808 in 1947 dollars), although it never published this information.

The refugee property issue has defied solution because it is intertwined with the wider Arab-Israeli conflict, especially the Palestinian refugee problem. From the beginning, Israel stated its willingness to compensate the refugees for their property but refused to allow either large-scale refugee return or property restitution. For this reason, and because Resolution 194 refers to compensation being paid to nonreturning refugees, most Palestinian refugees have refused to contemplate compensation, because this would mean abandoning their right of return. Israel also raised counter-claims that it said would affect its eventual compensation payments to Palestinians. The most significant of these claims arose in 1951, when Israel linked Palestinian compensation with compensation for lands taken from Jews who emigrated from several Arab states starting in 1948. Because the property claims were connected with other difficult issues, no progress was made during the long decades of conflict. Although the OSLO ACCORDS of September 1993 set in motion an Israeli-Palestinian peace process, the two sides deferred dealing with the refugee problem in all its aspects until the so-called FINAL STATUS TALKS. With the subsequent breakdown of peace negotiations in 2000, Palestinian refugee property claims remain unresolved.

See also JOHN F. KENNEDY; REFUGEES AND THE RIGHT OF RETURN

Bibliography

- Dumper, Michael. The Future for Palestinian Refugees: Toward Equity and Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2007.
- Fischbach, Michael R. The Peace Process and Palestinian Refugee Claims: Addressing Claims for Property Compensation and Restitution. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press, 2006.
- . Records of Dispossession: Palestinian Refugee Property and the Arab-Israeli Conflict. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Forman, Jeremy, and Alexandre Kedar. "From Arab Land to 'Israel Lands': The Legal Dispossession of Palestinians Displaced by Israel in the Wake of 1948." Environment and Planning D: Society and Space. 22 (2004).
- Golan, Arnon. "The Transfer to Jewish Control of Abandoned Arab Lands during the War of Independence." In Israel: The First Decade of Independence. Edited by S. Ilan Troen and Noah Lucas. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Kubursi, Atef. "Part V: An Economic Assessment of Total Palestinian Losses." In Palestinian Rights and Losses in 1948: A Comprehensive Study. Edited by Sami Hadawi. London: Saqi Books, 2000.
- Peretz, Don. Israel and the Palestine Arabs. Washington, DC: Middle East Institute, 1958.
- . Palestinian Refugee Compensation. Information Paper No. 3. Washington, DC: The Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine, 1995.

—Michael R. Fischbach

Palestinian Society, Pre-1948

The modern history of Palestine begins around 1800 and ends in 1948, with Israel's establishment as a state and the Nakba—the exodus of some 750,000 Palestinians. It is divided into two main historical periods: the first covers the nineteenth century and World War I, and the second, which is the subject of this essay, begins after World War I with the establishment of the BRITISH MANDATE of Palestine under the auspices of the League of Nations. The transforming forces of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, which had severe consequences for Palestinian society, may be summarized in one phrase: European interventionism. European intervention in Palestine encouraged the process of European settlement in the country, transformed its economy, created new social classes, and rearranged power relations among existing social groups, including the recent Jewish IMMIGRANT settlers. This process of intervention started slowly in the early nineteenth century but intensified and accelerated in its second half. European interventionism propelled Palestine from a largely subsistence and semifeudal, tribute-paying mode of existence into a market economy and, finally, before its destruction, into an underdeveloped capitalist-dependent economy. Most significantly, it created the conditions for the destruction of Palestine and the dispossession of its people in 1948.

In the mid-nineteenth century, the traditional economy of Palestine was eroding under a regime of clan-based, local notables subject to Ottoman suzerainty. The old order gave way to a new one consisting of commercial agriculture, a monetized economy, and the beginnings of an indigenous market linked by trade to the region and to Europe under more centralized Ottoman control. In the second half of the nineteenth century and the early twentieth century prior to World War I, however, this new order was itself restructured and reoriented toward dependent peripheral market capitalism as a result of both European intervention and the active participation of native landed and comprador classes. This transformation was similar to that of the surrounding Arab region except in one major respect: the arrival in the country of European colonial settlers and immigrants, principally Jewish, which eventually led to the dispossession of Palestine's native people.

During the British Mandate, two structural processes—rapid settler colonialism and colonial capitalist transformation—combined to subjugate the Palestinian people and destroy Palestinian society. Although the emergent Palestinian bourgeoisie participated in a minor way in the latter process, it was the European Jewish settlers who were the principal agents of the dual processes.

The British Mandate, 1920–1948

After the breakup of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, Palestine was unique among the mandates created by the League of Nations in that the Mandatory power encouraged European Jewish immigrants to settle in the country (in accordance with the BALFOUR DECLARATION). Otherwise the British treated Palestine as an ordinary colony, with typical trade, finance, currency, administrative, and defense policies. Like other colonies, Palestine was supposed to pay the costs of its own internal and external security and, in this instance, to guarantee the safety of Jewish colonial settlers against the native Palestinians.

Palestine was a poor country lacking in resources and in investment and growth potential. Britain's main interest in Palestine was strategic, despite the Balfour Declaration's religious and cultural justifications. The country was the key buffer state in the British imperial defense of India, EGYPT, and the Suez Canal (the shortest sea route to India); part of the air routes to India and IRAQ; and the principal terminus of the oil pipelines from the Iraqi oil fields (of the British-owned Iraq Petroleum Company, or IPC). However, British and Zionist ideology saw the potential for the economic growth of Palestine in the "yeast" of Jewish immigrants with superior education, technological know-how, and capital that would produce an economic "cake" that could be shared with the poor and backward Palestinian Arabs.

The number of Jewish settlers in Palestine increased in sporadic waves between 1919 and 1931. The December 1931 British census of the country showed that, of the 1.04 million people, 84 percent were Arab and 16 percent Jewish. By 1936, the Jewish population was estimated at 370,000, or 28 percent of the total, a dramatic increase from the 1931 census. Eighty-five percent of the Jewish population remained centered in three major urban centers and their surrounding areas: JAFFA—Tel Aviv, JERUSALEM, and HAIFA. In response, the Arab population became alarmed at the rapid rate at which the DEMOGRAPHY of their country was being altered, without their consent and against their will, thus contributing one factor to the 1936 ARAB REVOLT.

Land acquisition. By the mid-nineteenth century, except for certain swampy areas, Palestine was densely populated and intensively cultivated. Moreover, the land tenure and ownership system was complex and encumbered by varied forms of private and public usufruct rights, despite nineteenth-century Ottoman reforms and liberalization. Available LAND was expensive and became more so with the rising demand of a population growing as a result of both natural increase and in-migration. With the establishment of the British Mandate, Zionist hopes that STATE LAND—perceived as vast and potentially accessible—would serve as a basis for land acquisition turned out to be largely unrealistic. Nevertheless, by 1947, approximately 195,000 dunums (48,000 acres) of State Land were granted or leased to Jewish settlers by the British Mandate authorities.

The Zionist policy of land acquisition had a political logic: the Zionists looked for quantity and quality, location and contiguity. Accordingly, they tended to purchase land in large, contiguous areas of the inland and coastal plains. These acquisitions were made not by private individuals but by political agencies of the Zionist movement, such as the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF), the Keren Hayesod (or the Palestine Foundation Fund, established in 1920), the PALESTINE LAND DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION (PLDC), the PALESTINE JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION (PJCA), and the JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION. Around 70 percent of all Palestinian land that Zionists acquired was purchased by the PLDC on behalf of the JNF. Collectively owned land was purchased in the name of the Jewish people and reserved for exclusive Jewish use. The formal establishment of the Palestine Mandate under Britain, and to the north the LEBANON Mandate under FRANCE, created a strong impetus for the sale of vast estates by mainly Lebanese and Syrian Arab ABSENTEE LANDLORDS to Zionist organizations, which were well endowed with hard capital. Between 1920 and 1927, 82 percent of all land acquired by such groups was purchased from absentee landlords.

It is possible to discern three periods of intensive land acquisition by Jews and Zionist organizations in Palestine: 1923–1927, an average annual 61,400 dunums (15,000 acres) of land purchased; 1932–1935, 59,500 dunums (14,500 acres) purchased; and 1942–1947, 61,200 dunums (15,000 acres) purchased. Whereas in 1922, Jews owned 751,192 dunums (185,000 acres), representing 3 percent of the land of Palestine, the total area purchased by Jews by 1947 was 1.73 million dunums (427,000 acres), representing only 7 percent of the total surface area of Palestine but including nearly 24 percent of all the arable land. At no time did the percentage of Jews living on farms exceed 19.3 percent. The withdrawal of so much arable land from access or use by Palestinian peasants led not only to their landlessness and proletarianization but also to economic hardship. Thus Palestinian peasant discontent, political activism, and hostility to and violence against the Zionists and the British authorities were highest after periods of high transfer of land, accounting for the 1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES, the 1936–1939 Arab Revolt, and the 1948 WAR. These periods also coincide with heavy waves of Jewish migration into Palestine, particularly in the five years before the Arab Revolt of 1936.

A separate Jewish economy. The British policy of economic development in Palestine and, specifically, of granting Jewish settlers monopolistic concessions and industrial protectionism, facilitated the building of an exclusive Jewish economy that Zionists called the “conquest of land and of labor.” Britain also facilitated Jewish land acquisition (except when Palestinian political or violent action caused a reconsideration of policies) and provided for Jewish enterprises through a protectionist policy and preferential tariffs that included the importation of raw materials produced in Palestine by Palestinians.

Besides land for Jewish colonies in Athlit, Caesarea, Kabbara, and Beisan, the British Mandate granted three main national monopolistic concessions to Jewish entrepreneurs in 1920–1930: the Rutenberg, the Dead Sea salt, and the Athlit Salt Company. Although Palestinians opposed the Rutenberg concession, viewing it as economically privileging Jews, the British government ignored these objections and allowed the Jaffa Electric Company and the Palestine Electric Corporation to form, with a majority of Jewish capital, in 1921 and 1923. These companies helped electrify a new settlement, Tel Aviv, providing a service crucial to its rapid rise from a suburb of Jaffa to a modern, European-style Jewish city. In 1930, after a long controversy in the British Parliament, the Palestine Potash Company, a Zionist industrial venture, was granted to a team headed by Moses Novomeysky, a Russian Zionist. One final major concession—in addition to several smaller ones—was the Athlit Salt Company, a Jewish enterprise licensed to produce salt, which showed special favoritism to the Zionist Jews. The artificially high price placed on salt hurt the Palestinian Arabs in all walks of life, because salt was not just a basic daily food necessity but also a crucial element in the manufacture of soap and leather goods, long-established industries of Palestine.

Even before the Mandate, Jewish enterprises introduced steam, electric, and internal combustion power into production as oil presses, flour mills, and power motors in soap manufacturing. In addition, Jewish and German settlers came to dominate the building industry. Also prior to the Mandate, the Jewish settlers had laid the foundation for an industrial sector that was more capital-intensive and efficient than the Palestinian one. This transplanted, well-organized Jewish industrial sector experienced a new and significant advance during the Mandate. Although British authorities did not materially support industrialization in their colonies, they encouraged private development of Jewish industry in Palestine. In the mid-1920s, industrialization took off after an urban boom following the wave of migration of middle-class Polish Jews, who were sophisticated in industry and business and who settled in cities rather than rural agricultural settlements.

During World War II, the Jewish industrial base became stronger, as the British encouraged it to supply the needs (including military hardware) of Allied forces and of the domestic market. By 1939, the Survey of Palestine indicated that although Jews comprised only 31 percent of the total population, Jewish capital investment in industry was 88 percent of total industrial investment, 90 percent of installed horsepower, and 89 percent of total net industrial output, while Jewish workers represented 79 percent of all industrial workers in Palestine. In short, by 1929, British and Zionist policy had brought forth a Jewish industrial sector that had little connection to the Palestinian Arab economy or population.

Most directly deleterious to Palestinian industry and agriculture was the exemption of duties on the importation of olive oil and sesame seeds to benefit the Jewish-owned Shemen Palestine Oil Industry. At the same time, import duties on cement were constantly raised to protect the Jewish-owned Neshet Cement Company. Similarly, Mandate import duties on a whole host of items (salt, jelly, jam, cakes, chocolate, etc.) were also specifically raised to protect Jewish manufacturers.

Jewish labor. As in the development of an exclusive Jewish economy, institutions, and land base, the British colonial government of Palestine contributed to the exclusive creation, protection, and unemployment relief of Jewish labor. The British did not, however, extend this policy to the Palestinian Arab labor force. Further, the British facilitated the creation of a two-tier wage structure for Palestinian Arabs and Jews in both the private and public sectors. These discriminatory labor policies handicapped Palestinian labor in wage levels and working conditions, contributing to Palestinian unemployment, indebtedness, and severe discontent. These factors were important determinants of the sociopolitical upheavals of the Palestinians in 1929, 1936–1939, and 1947–1948.

British colonial economic development policy in Palestine had three basic tenets. The first was a conservative fiscal policy (common to other colonies) by which the colonized people had to pay internal and external security and public expenditures, no matter how narrow their revenue base. The second was a development theory that postulated that Jewish inputs in the undeveloped, resource-poor Palestine would lead to a structural rise of the whole economy. This idea was predicated on the potential importation of vast Jewish capital and skilled Jewish capitalists into the country. However, because Zionist organizations encouraged Jewish employers to hire more expensive Jewish workers over the much cheaper Palestinian Arab workers, the growth of all sectors of the Palestinian economy was hurt. According to the third tenet, Britain regulated Jewish migration into Palestine in accordance with the “absorptive capacity” of the country. Early in the Mandate period, this concept was redefined to mean the absorptive capacity of the Jewish economy only.

The principal means through which the Zionists succeeded in building a separate and privileged Jewish labor force was the HISTADRUT (the General Federation of Jewish Labor), established in 1920. Unlike any other union, it owned a construction cooperative (called Solel Boneh), consumer and marketing cooperatives, a bank (Bank Hapoelim), and credit, insurance, and publishing institutions. The great majority of Jewish workers belonged to the Histadrut, and it became one of the largest employers after the establishment of Israel. In contrast to the poorly organized Palestinian workers, organized Jewish labor exerted strong pressure on the ZIONIST EXECUTIVE and the British government in Palestine. As a result, the Histadrut was able through the Zionist Executive to gain many concessions from the Mandate government.

Separate social and political institutions. Like other practices of the Zionists, the social service institutions exclusively served Jews. The most important of these was Hadassah Medical Organization, which established a number of hospitals, with clinics, laboratories, and pharmacies, in most of the Palestine cities with heavy Jewish populations (e.g., Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa, Tabariyya, and SAFED). Hadassah also established the nurses’ training school, the Straus Health Center for All Races and Creeds, infant welfare stations, school hygiene, school lunch programs, and playgrounds, and it developed public health programs for reducing trachoma and malaria among Jews. As a consequence of these raised health standards, the death rate among Jews was less than half that among the majority of the Palestinians.

One of the most important efforts in creating a new Jewish-Zionist national identity was the educational system. In the Mandate agreement, the Zionists won from the British and the League of Nations the recognition of Hebrew as an official language, along with Arabic and English, although at the time Jews represented no more than about 10 percent of the population in Palestine. They also acquired British consent and financial support for a separate and exclusive private Jewish school system. Zionist authorities, furthermore, gained autonomy over the curriculum, which was imbued with Zionist-inspired Jewish nationalism.

At the same time, British authorities denied such freedom—and financial support—to the Palestinian Arabs, who were again greatly disadvantaged relative to the settler-immigrant Jews. Mandate government figures indicate that, in 1944, only 32.5 percent of Palestinian Arab children five to fourteen years old were enrolled in schools; the figure was 97 percent for Jewish children in the same age group. The private and governmental Palestinian school system helped reduce illiteracy substantially yet failed to provide the technical or higher education that the Jewish community provided. Secondary education for urban Palestinians was limited, and, unless they attended a teachers' college in Jerusalem, Palestinians had to leave the country to go to a university. Palestine's educational system for the two communities under the Mandate was separate and unequal in terms of quality, financing, levels, and delivery, especially in the rural areas. To suppress the rising Palestinian consciousness, British authorities denied the Palestinians the right to teach nationalism. Nationalist sentiment and activity nonetheless surged in the schools, which became the loci of political mobilization during the Mandate, as they were later for Palestinians in exile and during OCCUPATION in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP.

Moreover, the British authorized the JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL, in addition to acting as a quasi-government for the Jewish community, to establish various social, economic, and political agencies, institutions, and organizations, including military and intelligence units. Together these organizations were the nucleus of an emerging autonomous Jewish political authority within the British Mandate government. The Palestinian Arabs, on the other hand, had no such centralized political agency, nor did their political leaders have the capacity to mobilize the population effectively on a national level. Although the British made several proposals for the formation of a parallel Arab agency, Palestinian Arab leaders rejected the notion because it would have placed the Arab and Jewish agencies on an equal political and moral level at a time when the indigenous people and their leaders were in a highly unequal situation vis-à-vis the Zionists. At the time, they were not prepared to accept the Zionist settler-colonial project and were demanding independence from British rule.

Economic Transformation of the Mandate

As the Jewish settlers created in Palestine a Westernized enclave society with a European standard of living and a demand for European goods and services, these socioeconomic developments vastly escalated the pace of change and reoriented the structure of the Palestinian economy and society. To begin with, the population increased rapidly. As two British censuses (in 1922 and 1931) and subsequent governmental estimates suggest, Palestine's population more than doubled between 1922 and 1946, from 750,000 to 1.8 million. The rate of increase of the migrant Jewish population was higher than the natural increment among Palestinians, and therefore the Jewish ratio to the total population grew larger: from roughly 11 percent to 31 percent in twenty-four years. While the Palestinian population doubled in size, the Jewish population nearly tripled. Nevertheless, the Palestinian population was still greater by a ratio of two to one.

The population shifted toward urban centers, although the distribution between Jews and Palestinians was uneven. The Palestinian population was still largely rural in the mid-1930s and less so in the 1940s, with roughly 25–35 percent urban; the opposite held for the Jewish population, with roughly 75 percent urban in the same period. Although Palestinians outnumbered Jews two to one, both labor forces were roughly the same size as a result of the age distribution (50 percent of Palestinians were below the age of fifteen), low Palestinian female participation in wage labor, and the fact that most Jewish migrant-settlers were of the productive age (fifteen to twenty-nine years old). Furthermore, well over 90 percent of the Jews were literate, in contrast to 30 percent of the Palestinians, and the two-tier wage system instituted by the British provided Jewish workers with a wage rate up to three times higher than for the Palestinians. Accordingly, the per capita income for Jews was also nearly three times as high as that for Palestinians: £P44 (around $175 in 1935) compared to £P17 (around $68).

The first economic phase, 1920–1939. The structure and dynamics of Palestine's economy during the Mandate went through two distinct phases. The first extended from the beginning of the Mandate until 1939, and the second, a wartime economy, lasted until 1945, its consequences reaching into 1948. In both periods the Jewish and Palestinian communities developed differently, but during the war the Palestinian economy, which remained overwhelmingly agrarian, experienced much greater rates of change and transformation. In the plains, large tracts of land were devoted to irrigated, export-oriented citrus fruits, while in the hill country, cereal, olives, and olive oil were produced for self-consumption, the local market, and, if there was a surplus, for export. The whole Palestinian economy, however, turned more capitalistic as land was lost to Jewish purchases, as agricultural stagnation created surplus labor and high unemployment in the countryside, and as more Palestinians entered the wage labor market and rural-to-town migration gained momentum.

Substantial growth in Palestinian manufacturing also occurred during the first phase. The number of industrial enterprises rose from 1,240 in 1913 to 3,505 in 1927, and about 6,000 in 1936. Industrial workers also grew in number (from 17,955 in 1927 to 48,000 in 1939), although industrial enterprises remained largely small handicraft workshops. Most factories employed fewer than 100 workers, and only a fraction ran on motor power. The 1939 government census of industry found 13,678 Jewish workers engaged in industry, in contrast to only 4,117 Palestinian Arab workers. Nevertheless, the number of Palestinian wage laborers increased steadily throughout the 1930s as opportunities in public works and private enterprises, including some Jewish ventures, increased (e.g., in citrus groves, the Nesher Cement Company, and the Palestine Potash Company). However, much of Palestinian wage labor remained seasonal and itinerant, and a reserve army of labor grew in size and destitution by the end of the 1930s, contributing to the violent explosion of the 1936 Arab Revolt.

The consequences of the first two decades of the British Mandate's economic growth and development varied widely between the two communities. While economic growth strengthened and consolidated the Jewish immigrant-settler community and its political leadership, the uneven, differential, and rapid capitalist economic change polarized the Palestinian people; dispossessed and substantially impaired the well-being of increasing numbers of peasants; fragmented, displaced, and proletarianized much of the Palestinian population; and fractionalized Palestinian social and political leadership.

The second economic phase, 1939–1945. During World War II, Palestine became a strategic outpost for the British in the Middle East and the eastern Mediterranean region: the fortified base of large land, air, and naval military forces; the terminus of oil pipelines from Iraq; and the location of a key oil refinery. The British devised an economic plan—through the Middle East Supply Center (in Cairo), the War Supplies Board, and the Directorate of War Production—to mobilize local and regional agricultural and industrial production for both military and civilian needs to reduce dependence on external (European and US) sources of supply. This successful strategy resulted in rapid economic development of nearly all sectors of Palestine's economy, though the Jewish share was larger than the Palestinian.

In a short period of five years, Palestine underwent a profound structural transformation. There was a phenomenal increase in industrial capacity, output, and types of products supplied to the military, Palestine's internal market, and the region. By 1946, the number of industrial enterprises rose to well above 6,000, the majority Jewish-owned and only several hundred owned by Palestinians. Most remarkable was the production of military and other sophisticated hardware (antitank mines, steel containers, hydraulic jacks, and bodies for military vehicles), especially in the peak years of the Allied North African Campaign against German general Erwin Rommel's Afrika Korps. Also during this period the Jewish-owned diamond-cutting and polishing industry (thirty factories employing 3,000 workers) expanded.

Because of increased mechanization, production on small farms and large estates owned by Palestinians increased sharply and was accompanied by the decline, from 180,000 in 1939 to 100,000 in 1944, of rural male laborers who derived a livelihood from agriculture. Delayed British efforts to introduce modern production techniques, however, meant that these techniques were not broadly adopted. Without a comprehensive road network, production in Palestinian Arab agriculture remained largely traditional, especially on the smaller and more remote farms.

As a consequence of the demand for labor, average industrial wage earnings rose by 200 percent for Palestinians and 258 percent for Jews, and those for unskilled construction workers advanced by 405 percent and 329 percent, respectively. Despite the rise in their wages, the unskilled Palestinian workers remained disadvantaged in comparison to Jewish laborers, lacking benefits and facing lower wages. Socioeconomic differentiation and polarization in the population swelled the ranks of both the middle class and landless peasantry and also the urban middle class and the city poor. Nearly one-third of Palestine's Arab peasantry was landless by the end of the war, and urban misery increased tremendously.

With the rapid formation of the Palestinian wage-earning labor force in the 1940s, working-class organizations sprang up throughout the urban centers. Established in 1925, the Palestine Arab Workers Society (PAWS) grew rapidly during the war: from 2,000 members in 1939 to over 9,000 members in 1943 and 15,000 in 1945. Unions were especially active in the coastal industrial cities of Haifa and Jaffa and in Jerusalem. Another major union, the Federation of Arab Trade Unions (FATU), emerged in 1942 in a split with PAWS, whose political orientation was social democratic, whereas FATU was communist-influenced. FATU, whose membership may have reached 4,500, concentrated on organizing skilled workers and affiliated worker associations in such large establishments as the British-owned Iraq Petroleum Company, Shell Oil, Consolidated Refineries, the Haifa Harbor, the Royal Depot at Haifa Bay, and the Haifa Public Works Department. While originally owned and managed by the workers, both PAWS and FATU became increasingly politicized by the end of the war.

Palestinian wage labor by the end of the Mandate had scored impressive gains, as witnessed by its growth, activism, and independence. There is no doubt that it had succeeded, despite the absence of progressive labor laws, in forging a relatively strong class consciousness and a working-class culture. Whereas early in the war the British encouraged unionization as part of their labor recruitment policy, by the end of the war the authorities were hostile to the increasingly politicized movement. But neither the labor movement nor the political organizations were sufficiently strong to enable them, along with the more traditional leadership and parties, to succeed in the national political struggle against dispossession in the postwar era.

Palestinian Struggle against Dispossession

The process of Jewish empowerment and the commensurate inverse process of Palestinian disenfranchisement, both highly politicized under British auspices, developed through three stages that coincided roughly with the three decades of British colonial rule. The period from 1920 to 1929 culminated in serious rioting, political conflict and violence, and critical British government investigative and policy reports: the SHAW COM-MISSION report, the HOPE-SIMPSON COMMISSION report, and the PASSFIELD WHITE PAPER. The period from 1930 to 1939 witnessed a general Palestinian revolt between 1936 and the 1939 Arab Revolt and forced the British government to issue the 1937 PEEL COMMISSION Report and the 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER. The period from 1940 to 1948, a time of dramatic economic transformation and political conflict, saw the establishment of the UN partition plan in 1947 (UN RESOLUTION 181), an internal Jewish-Palestinian war, the destruction of Palestine, and the rise of Israel as a Jewish state.

The 1920–1929 decade. In Palestine, mass Jewish immigration commenced in accordance with the British policy of establishing a Jewish national home. Palestinians perceived the arrival of 10,000 Jewish immigrants from December 1920 to April 1921 as a harbinger. A riot started in Jaffa and spread to rural areas, fueled by wild rumors of Jews killing Arabs. Several Palestinians were killed by British soldiers defending Jewish settlements. In the aftermath, the British appointed the HAYCRAFT COMMISSION to investigate the situation and found that the Palestinian Arabs were intensely agitated over political and economic issues, especially Jewish immigration into Palestine.

While peasants and the urban poor rioted and used violence against Jewish settlers (but not yet against the British authorities), the Palestinian people in the towns and villages organized themselves into MUSLIM-CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS, Arab literary clubs, the Higher Islamic Council, and other groups in a national effort to resist Zionist designs. The elite launched a movement to unite their political efforts to influence British policy. In December 1920, a Palestine Arab Congress, representing, it claimed, “all classes and creeds of the Arab people of Palestine,” was held in Haifa and elected a twenty-four-member leadership called the Palestine ARAB EXECUTIVE, which joined the leaders of the two competing notable families of Jerusalem who had national stature—the AL-HUSAYNIS and the NASHASHIBIS. The political platform of the congress included condemnation of the Balfour Declaration, the idea of a Jewish national home and the British Mandate’s support of it, and the principle of mass Jewish immigration into Palestine; instead, it voiced support for the establishment of a national government in Palestine. Diplomatic pressure by the Palestine Arab delegation of the Arab Executive that lobbied in London and Geneva (at the League of Nations) led the British colonial secretary, Winston Churchill, to clarify the Balfour Declaration. In 1922, the CHURCHILL MEMORANDUM reasserted British pro-Zionist policy but proposed to allow Jewish immigration only in accordance with the economic "absorptive capacity" of the country and to establish a legislative council made up of Palestinians, Jews, and British.

In October 1923 the British offered to create an ARAB AGENCY analogous to the Jewish Agency, but the Palestinian leadership turned down the proposal because they believed that an analogy was unfair, given demographic and historical conditions. Further, the Jewish Agency was elected by the whole Jewish community, whereas the proposed Arab Agency would be appointed by the British authorities. When the Palestinian leadership sought an elected parliament for self-rule, the British blocked it, leaving the Palestine Arab Executive merely a mouthpiece, unlike the powerful Jewish Agency. The executive was not even officially recognized by the British Mandate government and had no official advisory or consultative status. Instead, the Palestine Arab Congress, which met regularly, remained the principal Palestinian representative despite deep fissures in the nationalist ranks, until it was replaced by the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE in 1936. The demands of the congresses (the fifth in 1923 and the sixth in 1924) presented to the British authorities evolved as the economic and financial policies of Histadrut and the exclusion of Palestinian labor came to the fore. An early harbinger, the question of land—the critical issue of the 1929 violent political upheaval—was considered by the 1922 congress, which demanded protection for small peasants against Jewish expropriation, an indication of the fast-deteriorating economic conditions of Palestine's peasantry.

The Mandatory government legitimized and recognized the religious leadership of AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI. However, to counter his influence and his control of the Palestine Arab Executive, the Nashashibis attempted to form an opposing power base. RAGIB AL-NASHASHIBI formed national Muslim societies and the National Party (1923) and encouraged the creation of peasant parties (1924). These latter moves were supported by the Zionists as an effort to split Palestinian ranks along social class lines. These political developments both reflected and fueled the bitter rivalry between the two nationalist factions, which in turn kept the Palestinians from achieving their larger political goals.

The peasant parties or groups were the vanguard of the violent struggle against the Zionists in the 1920s and the British authorities in the 1930s. The leaders of the peasantry, perhaps more than the elite politicians, demanded immediate social and economic protection against the peasants' worsening situation. The platforms of the rural political groups were noteworthy for their attention to economic matters. They called on the government to adopt specific policies: reduce taxes; extend the maturity of debts; provide long-term loans; build roads, schools, and the educational system; and encourage agricultural cooperation.

During the 1920s a sudden downturn in the economy caused a sharp decline in the well-being of all Palestinians, especially the peasantry. Palestinian concern was reflected in the agenda for the seventh Palestine Arab Congress, held in 1928, which reunified the Palestinian nationalist factions. Its resolutions stressed the economic dilemma and called for tax reform, social welfare for the workers, and increased public expenditure in education. Although violence against the Zionists had largely subsided by 1921, a combination of factors created a highly charged political situation. As was often the case, a minor religious incident in 1929 at the WESTERN WALL of the ancient Jewish Temple triggered a crisis over rights to the wall and an explosion of violence known as the Western Wall Disturbances.

The British government response was predictable. It set up the Shaw Commission to study the causes of the disturbances; sent another, the Hope-Simpson Commission, to conduct a thorough study of the socioeconomic conditions in the country; and issued a policy statement, the Passfield White Paper, in 1930. The Shaw Commission concluded that the basic cause of the disturbances was the Palestinian people's feeling "of disappointment of their political and national aspirations and fear for their economic future." Hope-Simpson concluded his report with a number of specific and general policy proposals. For immediate relief, he recommended an end to imprisonment for debt; taxation exemption for any peasant making less than £P30 (around $120) per annum; credit and education for the peasantry; and, for the longer term, extensive agricultural development programs. He also urged regulation of land transfer and tight restrictions on immigration. Although he said that Palestinian Arab unemployment was not directly linked to Jewish immigration, he stated that the policy of the British government in regard to immigration must be determined by unemployment in Palestine overall, not just in the Jewish community. He wrote that “it is wrong that a Jew from Poland, Lithuania or the Yemen, should be admitted to fill an existing vacancy, while in Palestine there are already workmen capable of filling that vacancy, who are unable to find employment.”

The recommendations of the Hope-Simpson and Shaw commissions were largely reflected in the 1930 Passfield White Paper, which also stated that it was time to develop self-rule institutions in Palestine, although the LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL it proposed was styled after that in the 1922 Churchill Memorandum. Lord Passfield and his white paper came under vigorous attack by the Zionists and pro-Zionists in Britain and Palestine. This political pressure overwhelmed the minority government of Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald, who, in effect, repudiated and reversed the policy changes of the Passfield White Paper in a letter to CHAIM WEIZMANN, dubbed by the Palestinians the “black letter.” This policy reversal kept in place the social, economic, and institutional processes that the British authorities had determined to be the causes of the disturbances in Palestine.

The 1930s and the Great Revolt. Through moderate political-diplomatic tactics, including petitions, testimonies, delegations, public meetings, congresses, and discussions with the Mandate government, elite Palestinian leaders achieved little. The MACDONALD “BLACK LETTER” added proof of the ineffectiveness of moderate politics. A new tone of militancy imbued newspaper articles, reports, and public speeches that challenged the traditional leadership and its unsuccessful methods, and there emerged a new generation of leaders. An all-out revolt was in the making.

The root causes of the revolt remained unchanged: the Palestinians’ antipathy toward pro-Zionist British policies and their inability to advance toward self-rule. Exacerbating the situation for the peasantry was a land tax introduced by the British authorities in 1928, based on the value of the higher crop prices of the boom years of 1924–1927. These crippling tax rates and a sharp drop in income may have led some peasants and landlords to sell their land. Palestinian land brokers, usurers, and middlemen were especially active in land sales to the Jewish organizations, despite being pilloried and on occasion threatened with physical harm. The difficult economic situation led the British government to remit the taxes of the poorest peasants, as recommended by Hope-Simpson. More alarming for the Palestinians in this economic context was the sudden and spectacular rise of Jewish immigration into the country in the first half of the 1930s. In spite of governmental decisions to regulate and reduce the number of Jewish immigrants into the country in accordance with the vague concept of “absorptive capacity,” tens of thousands of Jews poured into Palestine when the rise of Nazism in GERMANY pushed them out of central Europe.

These contextual factors coincided with the death in 1934 of the head of the Palestine Arab Executive, the subsequent demise of the organization, and the emergence of more militant groups, especially the ISTIQLAL (Independence) Party. These new groups tended to be pan-Arabist and highly critical of the moderate Palestinian leadership and its diplomatic methods. They included such articulate and modern men as AWNI ‘ABD AL-HADI, Akram Zu’ayter, Izzat Darwaza, and AHMAD SHUQAYRI (who became the first chairman of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION in 1964). These leaders advocated strong active opposition to the Zionists and, significantly, to the British and Mandate governments and called for the dismantlement of the Mandate and its replacement by a parliamentary Palestinian Arab government. Such views captured the imagination and support of a frustrated and combative public. By 1936, a number of Palestinian political parties reflecting varied socioeconomic and ideological interests had formed, including the Youth Congress, the National Defense Party (dominated by the Nashashibis), the Palestine ARAB PARTY (dominated by al-Hajj Amin and the Husaynis), the REFORM PARTY, and the NATIONAL BLOC PARTY. A Palestine Communist Party, which had existed since the early 1920s but had little direct influence, called for an independent Palestine for both Palestinian Arabs and Jews free from British imperialism.

The activism that produced the new political groupings found a stronger and more militant echo in an underground religious organization led by SHAYKH ‘IZZ-AL-DIN AL-QASSAM. Like the Istiqlal, pan-Arabists, and nationalists, he became convinced that the diplomatic and political tactics of the elite leadership not only were ineffective in securing Palestinian rights but also had brought the country to the edge of disaster. Al-Qassam and his followers took up arms in the countryside as the renewed urban violence and Jewish counterviolence intensified. In November 1935, he and his band of guerrillas were ambushed and killed by British troops. His martyrdom, self-sacrifice, and commitment to the national cause offered the Palestinian people a more honorable and popular model of struggle than that of the elite leadership. A large number of youths throughout Palestine formed guerrilla bands, called themselves Ikhwan al-Qassam (Brothers of al-Qassam), and launched an ARMED STRUGGLE against both the Jewish settlers and the British authorities.

Organizations of the emergent Palestinian civil society (unions, chambers of commerce, the All-Palestine Conference of Arab Students, etc.) and traditional BEDOUIN and clan leaders supported a general strike. To lead the strike, the elite leadership quickly reorganized into the Arab Higher Committee, made up of representatives of the new parties under the chairmanship of the mufti, al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni, who although appointed by and beholden to the British authorities, had no alternative but to join the militants. Representing all political factions and social sectors of Palestinian society, the committee announced its goals to be the complete cessation of Jewish immigration, the prohibition of land transfer to Jews, and the establishment of a national government responsible to a representative council.

The strike lasted six months, and before it ended, civil disobedience had turned into armed insurrection, the beginning of the Arab Revolt. In the countryside the revolt was to a considerable extent spontaneously organized, autonomous, and anchored in peasant norms. There was wide variation in the recruitment, organization, leadership, and command structures. For example, recruitment ranged from voluntary enrollment, selection by hamula, or family, and selection by village elders to compulsion. Despite coercion in recruitment or in material contributions, such methods did not alienate the villagers. Most peasant families enthusiastically contributed men, money, food, shelter, and matériel. The whole family collected money to purchase the soldier's rifle and decided which young men would fight and which would stay at home.

In the course of the revolt, the rebels gained control of much of the countryside and were then faced with administering it. They developed systems of taxation, supply, and armaments. Rebel courts, created to adjudicate village civil conflicts and criminal cases, replaced traditional institutions, such as elders, and the British courts as well. Some rebel leaders codified new regulations in written form and appointed qadis (judges) and other officials. Both the strike and the armed insurrection were thus a direct challenge to British authority. In an early attempt to end the unrest, the British appointed a new commission to investigate Palestinian grievances. The Peel Commission report lucidly stated that the causes of this revolt were the same as those that had triggered the "disturbances" of 1920, 1921, 1929, and 1933: "the desire of the Arabs for national independence" and "their hatred and fear of the establishment of the Jewish National Home." Its recommendations were therefore to end the Mandate and to partition Palestine into a Jewish state, an Arab state, and a British zone in and around Jerusalem.

This proposal outraged the Palestinians, who viewed it as a means to dismember their homeland. The revolt intensified and reached its climax in the summer of 1938. Major Palestinian cities, including Jerusalem, joined the rebellion. With rumors that the war was easing in Europe (because of the 1938 British appeasement pact with Germany), the British launched an all-out campaign to crush the revolt. But they could not defeat the estimated 2,000 Palestinian rebels until 1939, when the Palestinians became exhausted. With its political leaders in exile, its military commands contained and segmented, the revolt dwindled. The British government issued a white paper that, for the first time during the Mandate, reversed its previous policy and responded to Palestinian concerns. The 1939 MacDonald White Paper capped Jewish immigration at 75,000 over five years, restricted land transfers to limited areas, and proposed to make Palestine independent within ten years if Arab-Jewish relations improved. The rebels rejected the white paper, as did the Arab Higher Committee and the Zionist Jewish leadership. Despite its rejection by both sides, the British implemented the new policy unilaterally. Although it gained important concessions from a British government faced with a new world war, the revolt failed to achieve its principal goal of immediate Palestinian independence.

1940–1948: Palestinian political and military collapse. The war in Europe, the HOLOCAUST, the increased Jewish immigration (legal and illegal) to Palestine, sympathy for European Jewry, the rising international influence of the Zionist movement (especially in the UNITED STATES), the weakening of the British Empire, the emergence of the UNITED NATIONS, the dramatic structural transformation within Palestine, and the defeat of the Palestinian revolt all combined to overwhelm Palestine and the Palestinians during the 1940s.

The harsh British suppression of the Palestinian revolt and the reconquest of the country by 1939 decimated Palestinian political and military institutions. Palestinian parties and political activity were made illegal by the British, Palestinian leaders were either in detention camps or exile, political activists and fighters in the thousands were in prison or concentration camps, and the community was largely disarmed. Palestinian society was economically devastated, politically and militarily defeated, and psychologically crushed. The collective will to struggle had been broken. The forceful spirit that animated political activism and revolt in the 1930s did not return in strong enough force in the 1940s to allow meaningful resistance to the Zionist campaign of 1947–1948 that resulted in the Palestinian Nakba.

In contrast, the Jewish community in the 1940s grew economically strong, tightly organized politically, and militarily mobilized. With the aid of British training, the HAGANA, the military forces controlled by the Jewish Agency, and other militia grew in numbers, skill levels, and sophistication during the 1936–1939 Palestinian revolt. In addition, underground extremist and terrorist Jewish groups, such as the IRGUN and the LOHAMEI HERUT YISRAEL (LEHI, or the Stern Gang, as the British called it), also proliferated. Jewish military power was further augmented by the experience and technical skill acquired by the 37,000 volunteers in the Jewish Brigade and other units that served in the British army during World War II.

International Zionist organizations, along with the Jewish Agency, mounted a vigorous diplomatic campaign to undermine the provisions of the Passfield White Paper. Frustrated with Britain, whose regional political calculations in the context of World War II necessitated placating Arab public opinion and the Arab states, the Zionists turned for support to the United States, the emerging world power. In 1942, at a Zionist conference at the Biltmore Hotel in New York, the Zionist program was announced. In opposition to the white paper, it demanded open immigration into Palestine and settlement of unoccupied land in the country; for the first time, it publicly declared the Zionist intention to establish a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine. Since 1917, Zionist policy goals had evolved from a Jewish national home to a state in part of Palestine (the 1937 Peel partition proposal) to a state in the whole of Palestine. Shortly after the Biltmore convention, a number of US senators and members of Congress signed a letter to President Franklin Roosevelt supporting Jewish rights to Palestine. And in January 1944, in less than two years, the US Congress passed a joint resolution endorsing the BILTMORE PROGRAM.

The Palestine quandary after World War II led the British and US governments in 1946 to form an investigative commission jointly headed by a British and a US representative. The ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY (also called the Morrison-Grady Commission) recommended the conversion of the Palestine Mandate into a trusteeship divided into two autonomous Jewish and Arab provinces, while Jerusalem and the Naqab Desert would remain under British control. Although the Zionists, the US government, and the Palestinians rejected the plan, the British accepted it and resisted US and Zionist pressure to open the gates of Palestine to another 100,000 Jewish immigrants before the trusteeship proposal was considered in a London roundtable conference planned for September 1946. Perhaps because of this, the Jewish forces of the Hagana and the Irgun launched a terror campaign and revolt against the British in Palestine.

United Nations partition plan and descent into war. After diplomatic machinations in which the Palestinians and the Arab states were at a distinct disadvantage, on 29 November 1947 the UN General Assembly approved Resolution 181 on the future of Palestine, partitioning it into an Arab and a Jewish state. At a time when the Jewish population of Palestine was around 31 percent of the total, the size of the proposed Jewish state was roughly 55 percent of historic Palestine and included a sizable Palestinian minority of 45 percent. The proposed Palestinian Arab state, in contrast, was awarded 45 percent of the land of Palestine and a negligible Jewish minority. Jerusalem and BETHLEHEM were supposed to be separate bodies under international auspices.

By the end of May 1948, the British pulled out their forces as planned and left Palestine in disarray. The disorderly withdrawal added confusion to the rapidly developing internal war between the Jewish forces and the Palestinians. The self-contained, well-organized, and highly institutionalized Jewish community was well positioned to assume the functions of government. Throughout the Mandate they had built parallel autonomous institutions of governance and control with the support of the British authorities. When the British abandoned the Arab areas, they left to the unprepared municipal and village authorities the immense responsibility of providing security, policing, defense, electric power, water and sanitation, medical care, education, and other services.

With Arab public concern for their compatriots in Palestine, the nominally independent Arab states began discussing how best to assist the beleaguered Palestinians. The machinations of one Arab leader, the ambitious Abdullah Ibn al-Husayn, ruler of Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950), worked to undermine the interests of the Palestinians. After World War II, he had set his sights on reuniting and ruling greater SYRIA (which had been under the control of Vichy FRANCE) with the backing of the British. In return, he supported British policy (especially the Peel Commission's recommendation of partition) on Palestine and secretly colluded across the Jordan River with the Zionist leadership for the partition of Palestine. As a participant in ARAB LEAGUE deliberations and decisions on the Palestine question, the Transjordanian government of King Abdullah was able to undercut both Palestinian and Arab efforts to save the country.

Since 1942, the Zionists had planned and organized a Jewish army, not just defensive guards—one of the two key decisions of the Biltmore Program—while the Palestinians were being disarmed by the British authorities. Jewish forces numbered roughly 15,000 in early 1948 but swelled to over 60,000 by May 1948. The majority of them were part of Hagana (with World War II experience), and the rest belonged to the TERRORIST groups, the Irgun and the Stern Gang. For the 1947–1948 hostilities, they recruited a large number of professional military volunteers from all over the world.

The Palestinian leader, al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni, waited to form a volunteer force, al-Jihad al-Muqaddes (the Holy Struggle), until December 1947, after the United Nations partition decision and after hostilities began. By March the irregular force, under two commanders, numbered around 1,600. The Arab League organized and financially supported a volunteer Arab force, Jaysh al-Inqadh (Arab Rescue Army), under the command of FAWZI AL-QAWUQJI. With a promised 10,000 rifles, 3,830 Arab men, including 500–1,000 Palestinians, were organized into eight battalions that operated in north-central Palestine. Palestinian and Arab fighters were outnumbered, outarmed, and outclassed (in training, technical knowledge, experience, firepower, and mobility) by the armed Jewish regulars and their allied international volunteers. The Palestinians were unprepared politically and militarily to defend the integrity and unity of their country.

The intercommunal Jewish-Palestinian fighting unleashed after the United Nations partition decision was both offensive and defensive. By March 1948, it appeared that the Palestinians and their volunteer Arab supporters had the upper hand, but this was a false impression, as the Zionists had yet to implement their offensive plan. In April 1948, the Hagana launched major operations throughout Palestine, dismembering the country, destroying over 400 of its villages, and expelling much of its people. As hundreds of thousands of REFUGEES poured into safer areas of Palestine and into neighboring Arab countries, the Arab League could no longer simply engage in talks. Arab states mobilized their regular armies for battle, but the numbers, equipment, and firepower of those armies were less than half of what the Arab League's own Military Technical Committee had recommended. Equally important was the collusion of King Abdullah with the Zionists: he ordered his British-commanded Arab Legion to secure only the part of Palestine allotted to the Arab state, which he had planned, with the agreement of the Zionists, to annex to Transjordan.

Arab state intervention arrived too late and was too little to save Palestine. By 1 January 1949, the transformation of Palestine was complete. Some 750,000 to 800,000 Palestinians were stateless refugees, their villages razed, their social life disrupted, and their lands and property now in Jewish hands. Palestinians came under Jordanian rule, Egyptian administration, or Israeli military rule, though with "citizenship" in the Jewish state, while others were flung across the Arab world—peasants in refugee camps in Lebanon, Jordan, and Syria; the educated middle class to the Gulf and SAUDI ARABIA, where they built these new states; and still others around the world.

See also ARAB CONGRESSES; BRITISH MANDATE IN PALESTINE; WAR, 1948; Zionism

Bibliography

Esco Foundation for Palestine. Palestine: A Study of Jewish, Arab, and British Policies. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1947.

- Farsoun, Samih K., with Christina E. Zacharia. Palestine and the Palestinians. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1997.
- Hurewitz, J. C. The Struggle for Palestine. New York: W. W. Norton, 1950.
- Hyamson, A. M. Palestine under the Mandate, 1920–1948. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1950.
- Khouri, Fred J. The Arab-Israeli Dilemma, 3rd ed. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1985.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. Zionism and Territory. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
- LeVine, Mark. Overthrowing Geography: Jaffa, Tel Aviv, and the Struggle for Palestine, 1880–1948. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Mandel, N. The Arabs and Zionism before World War I. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.
- Migdal, J. S., ed. Palestinian Society and Politics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980.
- Miller, Y. N. "Administrative Policy in Rural Palestine: The Impact of British Norms on Arab Community Life." In Palestinian Society and Politics. Edited by J. S. Migdal. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980.
- Owen, Roger. "Economic Development in Mandatory Palestine, 1918–1948." In The Palestinian Economy: Studies in Development under Prolonged Occupation. Edited by G. T. Abed. London: Routledge, 1988.
- Porath, Y. The Emergence of the Palestinian-Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- Seikaly, M. Haifa: Transformation of an Arab Society, 1918–1939. London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.
- Shafir, G. Land, Labor and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882–1914. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Smith, B. J. The Roots of Separatism in Palestine: British Economic Policy, 1920–1929. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1993.
- Stein, Kenneth W. The Land Question in Palestine. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.

—Samih Farsoun (edited by Naseer Aruri after Dr. Farsoun's death)

Palestinian Universities Under Siege

Most Palestinian institutions of higher education were developed after the Israeli OCCUPATION in 1967. Eleven Palestinian universities, five university-colleges, and twenty-six community colleges operate in the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP, serving a population of 3.5 million. Bethlehem University, a Roman Catholic institution partially funded by the VATICAN, opened its doors in 1973. In 1975, Birzeit College (located in the town of Birzeit north of Ramallah) became BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY after adding third- and fourth-year college-level programs. An-Najah College in NABLUS likewise became an-Najah National University in 1977. The Islamic University of Gaza (also known as IUG, IU Gaza, or the University of Gaza) is an independent Palestinian university established in 1978. HEBRON University was established in 1980. Al-Azhar University in Gaza City began operations in 1992. Al-Quds University, whose founders had yearned to establish a university in JERUSALEM since the early days of Jordanian rule, finally realized their goal in 1995. Also in 1995, the Arab-American University, the only private university in the West Bank, was founded right outside the town of Zababdeh, with the purpose of providing courses according to the US system of education. According to the 2002 census, 3,474 teaching faculty were serving 83,408 students at all Palestinian higher education institutions.

By 2003, nearly three years into the AL-AQSA INTIFADA and as a result of Israel's military response to the Palestinian uprising (CURFEWS, CLOSURES, CHECKPOINTS, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, forced entries, and destruction of public buildings—including the two ministries of education), Palestinian institutions of higher education suffered serious human losses (24 teachers, 194 students, and 7 employees killed and 1,245 students injured) plus severe material losses (estimated at $4.85 million). As a result of income compression, nearly 20 percent of the student body in Palestinian higher education is no longer able to pay its fees. In addition, physical access to higher education institutions by students and faculty has become extremely difficult as a result of long curfews and other drastic RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT. In an attempt to overcome Israeli-imposed restrictions, many university faculty began to communicate with their students via the Internet, and some universities have tried to find alternate venues for holding classes and seminars, sometimes even in neighboring cities. The problem with these alternatives is that not every student has access to e-mail, and many students are scattered in villages far from urban centers; moreover, travel between areas is prohibited.

The financial crisis facing higher education presents a much more difficult challenge. A 2003 World Bank report states that "Palestinian institutions face the worst financial crisis over the last thirty odd years and their continued operation without emergency assistance is in serious doubt.” Some institutions will be forced to reduce course offerings, increase class size, and rely on part-time or unqualified instructors. Unfortunately, resulting from the multiple hardships during the years of the OSLO PROCESS, an exodus of qualified faculty was already under way even before the Intifada. The crisis has exacerbated this phenomenon, as capable teachers look for better-paying opportunities in the various nongovernmental organizations working in the country or leave the country altogether.

Some universities have set up new degree programs and graduate programs that have higher tuition rates. Others have begun to relax admission requirements as a way of increasing revenue with larger attendance. Library holdings are declining, and journal subscriptions are not being renewed, mainly because of a lack of funding and the unreliability of postal delivery. All of these factors will eventually lead to a further decline in the quality of education.

In general, the Palestinian Ministry of Higher Education has tried to deal with this crisis in three ways: tuition and fees increased sharply as a percentage of the overall budget (now at 70 percent); a student revolving-loan fund was initiated to enable needy students to obtain low-interest loans to cover tuition; and a voucher system was also created, although not yet implemented, whereby universities receive public funding by cashing in student vouchers. The ministry created an autonomous, semiofficial commission responsible for the accreditation and licensing of new programs and institutions. This commission reviews existing criteria, develops new criteria for accreditation, and produces procedures for an ongoing assessment of all programs that grant academic degrees. All this is based on a two-tier methodology of self-evaluation and external review.

Other possible developments, including the pursuit of administrative efficiencies, the modernizing of management systems, and the establishment of joint and combined operations, are being delayed because of the financial environment. These measures relate mostly to the financial crisis and are aimed not only at trying to make do in abnormal conditions but also, in the long run, at paving the way for future reforms. It is not clear whether they will be enough to enable the universities to withstand the cumulative effects of a protracted war situation and an endemic financial crisis.

See also EDUCATION AND THE ROLE OF TEXTBOOKS; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD

Bibliography

- Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim. Palestinian Higher Education: National Identity, Liberation, and Globalization. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2000.
- World Bank Group. Two Years of Intifada: Closures and Palestinian Economic Crisis. 2003. <http://www.middle-east=info.org/league/pa/paleconcrisis.pdf>.

—Fouad Moughrabi

Palin Commission, 1920

The Palin Commission was created by the British Foreign Office in May 1920 to investigate the causes of the previous month's violence in Palestine—the AL-NABI MUSA DEMONSTRATIONS. In April, five Jews and four Palestinians died during protests against Zionist IMMIGRATION, after which British authorities cracked down on Palestinian nationalist leaders and established the commission of inquiry headed by Major-General P. C. Palin.

The commission's report, issued on 1 July 1920, stated that Palestinians were frustrated because the promise of independence and unity for the Arab world, made by the British to the Arabs at the beginning of World War I in the HUSAYN-McMAHON CORRESPONDENCE, had not been kept and was, in fact, being negated by British support for the Zionist program. Additionally, the commission noted the Palestinians' fear of the political and economic consequences of ZIONISM and criticized the "arrogance" of the Zionists. The report was never made public.

Bibliography

- Cohen, Michael J. The Origins and Evolution of the Arab-Zionist Conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Fischbach, Michael. "Palin Commission." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Halpern, Ben. The Jewish State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1961.
- Huneidi, Sahar. "Was Balfour Policy Reversible? The Colonial Office and Palestine, 1921–23." Journal of Palestine Studies. 27:2 (1998).
- McTague, John J., Jr. "The British Military Administration in Palestine 1917–1920." Journal of Palestine Studies. 7:3 (1978).
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 2000.

Palmah

The Palmah (Pelugot Mahatz, or Crushing Battalions) was the elite fighting force of the HAGANA, the clandestine military wing of the Yishuv (pre-state Israel) in Palestine during the BRITISH MANDATE from 1920 to 1948. Established on 15 May 1941, the Palmah had grown to three fighting divisions and auxiliary aerial, naval, and intelligence units by the 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

The Palmah was originally created by the British military, in cooperation with the Hagana, to help the British protect Palestine from a threatened invasion from Nazi GERMANY. It was also intended to assist British forces with the planned invasion of SYRIA and LEBANON, then held by pro-German Vichy FRANCE forces. Even though British experts trained and equipped the Palmah, after the British victory at El-Alamein in 1942, London ordered the dismantling of the Palmah. Instead, the Palmah went underground and proceeded to fight the British and the Palestinians.

After World War II, the Palmah grew, thanks to a unique arrangement with the KIBBUTZ movement. Initially, the organization was not only underground but also without funds, because British financing had stopped. Yitzhak Tabenkin, head of the kibbutzim union, suggested that the Palmah could be financially self-sufficient by letting the warriors work in the kibbutzim. Each kibbutz would host a Palmah platoon and supply them with food, housing, and resources. In return, the platoon would safeguard the kibbutz and carry out agricultural and other work. Accepted in August 1942, the plan worked well for both the Palmah and the Zionist settlers; it also educated the soldiers in Zionist values. Subsequently, the Palmah forged an agreement with Zionist youth movements, requiring that each person from the age of eighteen to twenty undergo military training. This was the basis of the NAHAL military cadre.

In 1945 and 1946, Palmah units were active in attacking British infrastructure, such as bridges, railways, radar stations, and police stations, in an attempt to drive the British out of Palestine to make room for the establishment of their state. Such activities declined markedly, however, after "Black Sabbath" (29 June 1946), when British forces carried out mass arrests of Palmah and Hagana leaders. Palmah units also played a major part in the 1948 War. In particular, the town of SAFED was attacked and conquered by the Palmah on 9 May 1948. The town's Arab population of 10,000 was dispossessed on 10 May. The remainder of eastern Galilee was conquered by Palmah units between 2 May and 25 May, after which the villages in that area were depopulated.

Notable Israeli leaders whose origins reside in the Palmah include, among others, MOSHE DAYAN, Yitzhak Sadeh, YIGAL ALLON, YITZHAK RABIN, Chaim Bar-Lev, Mordechai Gur, MATTITYAHU PELED, Yair Tsaban, SHULAMIT ALONI, REHAVAM ZE'EV, and Rafael Eitan.

See also WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Brenner, Uri. The Palmah: Its Warriors and Operations. Special edition for the Palmah National Convention, 1978.
- Mossek, Moshe. Palestine Immigration Policy under Sir Herbert Samuel: British, Zionist and Arab Attitudes. London: Routledge, 1978.
- Rogan, Eugene L., ed. The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.
- Shapira, Anita. Land and Power: The Zionist Resort to Force, 1881–1948. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000.
- Zadka, Saul. Blood in Zion: How the Jewish Guerrillas Drove the British out of Palestine. Washington, DC: Brassey's, 1995.

Parents' Circle: The Association of Bereaved Families in the Middle East

The Bereaved Families' Forum ("Bereaved Parents' Circle") was founded in 1995 by Israeli businessman Yitzhak Frankenthal, whose son was killed by Palestinians while serving in the Israeli army. Members are Palestinians and Israelis who have lost loved ones in the conflict. They have held numerous dialogues and taken joint action for peace, and continue to do so, even in the midst of the turmoil now gripping Israel and Palestine. The families share the experience of having lost a son or daughter to the conflict, and bereaved families, victims from both sides, pursue a joint reconciliation even though the conflict is still active. The group consists of several hundred bereaved families, half Palestinian and half Israeli. The Families' Forum has played a crucial role since its inception in spearheading a reconciliation process based on nonviolence between Israelis and Palestinians.

The objectives of the Parents' Circle include (1) to prevent further bereavement, in the absence of peace; (2) to influence the public and the policy-makers to prefer the way of peace to the way of war; (3) to educate for peace and reconciliation; (4) to promote the cessation of acts of hostility and to achieve a political agreement between Israel and the Palestinians; (5) to prevent the use of bereavement as a means of expanding enmity between the two peoples; and (6) to uphold mutual support among the members. The organization strives "to offer a breakthrough in people's frame of mind, to allow a change of perception, a chance to reconsider one's views and attitudes towards the conflict and the other side. [Its] activities are a unique phenomenon, in that they continue during all political circumstances and in spite of all tensions and violence in our region. [Its] members initiate and lead projects throughout the Israeli and Palestinian communities."

The Parents' Circle produced a film, Counterpoint, which has been shown throughout Israel, the WEST BANK, the UNITED STATES, and Western Europe. <http://www.theparentscircle.com/about.asp>.

Bibliography

- Dressler, Tamar. "A Weekend of Grief, Discussion and Optimism." YNET News (Israel). 29 August 2007.
- Kretman, Kathy. "The Parents Circle—Family Forum." Washington Post. 2 January 2009.
- Macintyre, Donald. "Crossing the Divide: Cooking with the Enemy." The Independent (UK). 4 July 2008.
- Manzoor, Sarfraz. "She's Israeli, He's an Arab: War Has Made Them Like Mother and Son." The Observer (UK). 10 May 2009.
- Shalev, Anat. "Israeli, Palestinian Bereaved Families Meet." YNET News (Israel). 25 September 2008.
- Wunderlich, Shaila. "Art and the Road to Reconciliation." Chicago Tribune. 28 October 2007.
- www.theparentscircle.org/ActivitiesMain.asp?id=87&sivug\_id=15.

Partition Resolution

See UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 181

Passfield White Paper, 1930

In the aftermath of the 1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES between Palestinians and Jews, the BRITISH MANDATE government established a series of fact-finding commissions to investigate the situation and determine the causes of the violence. The first, the 1929 HOPE-SIMPSON COMMISSION, had pointed to the likelihood that the economy and DEMOGRAPHY of Palestine would be further destabilized by Zionist IMMIGRATION and settlement. Its recommendations, echoed by those of the 1930 SHAW COMMISSION, urged the British government to expediently reassess its immigration policy that allowed Jewish immigration to Palestine with little restriction, and to address the "meaning of the passages in the Mandate which purported to safeguard the interests of the non-Jewish communities." The third commission, headed by Colonial Secretary Lord Passfield (Sidney Webb), issued its report in October 1930, and its findings and recommendations were in line with those of the previous two commissions.

The Passfield White Paper asserted that "equal weight shall at all times be given to the obligations laid down with regard to the two sections of the population [Arabs and Jews] and to reconcile those two obligations where, inevitably, conflicting interests are involved." It did not suggest an end to Jewish immigration but emphasized the condition of the Mandate that safeguarded the rights of the indigenous population, the Palestinians, and stressed that these were of equal importance to creating a Jewish homeland. By inference, it raised the question of whether immigration and safeguarding Palestinian rights were contradictory. Referring to the Hope-Simpson Report, the Passfield paper stated that no more LAND reserves were available for cultivation and that the temporary suspension of immigration (undertaken the previous April) was justified and should continue.

The Passfield White Paper reiterated the cultural nature of a Jewish national home, as defined in the CHURCHILL MEMORANDUM of 1922 and in the BALFOUR DECLARATION itself, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine, and it proposed the creation of a LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL modeled on the lines of one suggested in 1922 that had failed. The report further stated: "His Majesty's Government feel[s] it necessary to emphasize, in the strongest manner possible, that . . . a double undertaking is involved, to the Jewish people on the one hand and to the non-Jewish population of Palestine on the other."

In another section, the White Paper implicitly criticized the Zionist leaders: "His Majesty's Government has reason to think that one of the reasons for the sustained tension and agitation on both sides has been the creation by misguided advisers of the false hope that efforts to intimidate and to bring pressure to bear upon His Majesty's Government would eventually result in forcing them into a policy which weighted the balances in favor of the one or the other party." Substantively, it also stated "that in estimating the absorptive capacity of Palestine at any time account should be taken of Arab as well as Jewish unemployment in determining the rate at which immigration should be permitted." This became known as the "twin and equal purpose policy."

Zionists were outraged by Passfield's paper and began to exert intense pressure on London. CHAIM WEIZMANN, leader of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, played a particularly active role, immediately contacting leading officials in the British government. In his memoirs, Weizmann described the White Paper "as rendering and intending to render, our work in Palestine impossible. There was nothing left for me but to resign my position as President of the JEWISH AGENCY." Fortuitously for the Zionists, there was a change of government in Great Britain, and with it came a new prime minister, Ramsay MacDonald, who was more sympathetic toward the Zionist project. MacDonald was immediately subjected to a great deal of pressure from Zionist interests, including Weizmann. In February 1931, he wrote the so-called MACDONALD "BLACK LETTER" to Weizmann, in which he rescinded the Passfield Commission's recommendations, going so far as to praise "the constructive work done by the Jewish people in Palestine [and their] . . . beneficial effects on the development and well-being of the country as a whole."

Bibliography

- Cohen, Michael J. The Origins and Evolution of the Arab-Zionist Conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917-1922. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.
- Shepherd, Naomi. Ploughing Sand: British Rule in Palestine, 1917-1948. Piscataway, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2000.
- Weizmann, Chaim. Trial and Error: The Autobiography of Chaim Weizmann, reprint ed. Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing Group, 1972.

Peace

Knowing that "peace" is a subjective concept, we solicited three essays, from an Israeli, a Palestinian, and an American, on scenarios for ending the

Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In the first, entitled "Current Options for Resolving the Conflict," US sociologist Gordon Fellman argues for the two-state option. Palestinian analyst and doctoral student in philosophy and ethics at Tel Aviv University Omar Barghouti contributes the second essay, entitled "Peace and Justice," which offers a perspective on the solution to the conflict through a "one-state" concept. Israeli scholars Arie Nadler and Nurit Schnabel provide the third article, entitled "Settlement, Resolution, and Reconciliation," in which they set out the processes of reconciliation necessary for any lasting solution. These three are followed by "The Other Zionism: Reconciliation Attempts between Arabs and Jews in Palestine Prior to 1948," a discussion of efforts undertaken by individuals and organizations, collectively often referred to as "the Other Zionism," which considered some form of binationalism as the only just solution for Arabs and Jews in Palestine. —Editor

Peace: "Current Options for Resolving the Conflict"

In one way or another, Israelis and Palestinians have been locked in combat for more than a century. The encounter, though, can no longer be understood entirely as a death struggle with Israelis and Palestinians at each other's throats. Nevertheless the "Israeli-Palestinian conflict" is understood as such by much of the world and majorities in both nations.

That designation is no longer accurate. The confrontation has morphed from one in which two communities are pitted against each other, each trying to make sure the other does not exercise national self-determination, into a different one, between two sides: Israelis and Palestinians who favor the end of violence and want to share the land between two independent nation-states, referred to here as "accommodationists," and Israelis and Palestinians who want to keep the fighting going until one side has lost everything and the other side is left with all of "Israel" or "Palestine" as entirely its own country, designated here as "rejectionists." It is the rejectionists who insist on continuing the violence that has characterized the relationship for nearly a century, and the accommodationists who seek to end it. Or to put it another way, one is committed to war, the other to peace.

It is not hard to script the vision of the war parties. On the Israeli side, there have been endless ASSASSINATIONS of leaders of the Palestinian war party, endless bombings of refugee camps, endless destruction of Palestinian homes and fields, endless taking of LAND for further Jewish SETTLEMENTS and settlement expansion, endless fears that any kind of acceptance of Palestinian nationalism will compromise Israeli nationalism and national security, and endless terror that Israel might one day dissolve in the cauldron of the raging hatred of Palestinians. On the Palestinian side, there have been endless expressions of rage, frustration, and humiliation; endless INTIFADAS marked by escalating violence; endless SUICIDE BOMBINGS; and endless despair that, come what may, Israel will never allow and accept a separate Palestinian nation-state alongside it. One would be a fool not to imagine this scenario continuing to play out as the tormented relationship between two aspiring nationalisms.

Yet it is not the only imaginable state of affairs. Several others have appeared over the years, with varying degrees of support for each. On the far right in Israel, there is hope of expelling all the Palestinians from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and even from Israel itself. The euphemistic term used is "TRANSFER," but how the two million or so Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, with or without the addition of another million-plus who are Israeli citizens, would actually be forced out of Israel and the OT is never specified. Nor is there an actual idea of where they would go or how they would get there or why they would give up their nationalist dream. There was an idea in vogue for several years among some Israelis and American Jews that "JORDAN is Palestine," bolstered by the fact that Palestinians comprise a sizable group in Jordan and that Jordan was once part of what was historic Palestine, but the idea of transferring Palestinians to Jordan never got off the ground anywhere in the world except among its limited fervent advocates.

The idea of expulsion seems to be a nationalist/racist/xenophobic expression of both the extreme Jewish renewal in ZIONISM and genuine fear of annihilation at the hands of Palestinians and other Arabs. In some very deep way, people proposing transfer seem to be creating—whether consciously or not—a defense against a potential second HOLOCAUST. (Indeed, much of the Jewish response to the conflict might be seen as part of a desperate effort to come to terms with the Holocaust by seeking a situation where Jews are in power rather than powerless, as they were in Europe during the Nazi period, and where there are no Arab leaders calling for the extinction of all Jews.) On the far right among Palestinians is the same idea—mass ejection of Jews and leaving the land as Palestine once and for all—related to the history of conquest and degradation following Israeli independence in 1948 and the 1967 WAR.

In the rejectionist scenario, then, the conflict persists until, following massive carnage and ever-intensifying hatred, one side has, in conventional terms, won, and the other has, in conventional terms, lost. As the outcome of this possibility, there would be Israel but no Palestine or Palestine but no Israel. In either case, large numbers of the other community would have been killed and/or expelled, or some form of enforced BINATIONALISM would be imposed, which could take different forms. As a political majority, the victorious power could deprive the minority of any number of political and civil rights and/or could dominate the society and all its institutions. Under this scenario, an Israeli or Palestinian state might be religiously based or secular. In either case, dominance and forced submission are conceivable as the base of binationalism.

Another form of binationalism is what has been called for years a "democratic secular" binationalism, meaning that Jews and Palestinians would participate equally in the ELECTIONS, government, and institutions. Israelis fear this possibility, because once Palestinians outnumber Jews in the binational state, by voting strength they would take over the government and possibly much else. The entire point of Zionism historically has been that persecution of Jews will end only when Jews enjoy sovereignty in their own society, and that means a state with a Jewish majority. Another binational solution might be some sort of political arrangement, such as LEBANON knew for decades, with a presidency in the hands of one community and the prime ministership in the other. Cabinet portfolios could be allocated according to a formula that would see rotation of such positions between the two communities. However, the goodwill, patience, and risk-taking that would be required for effectively enacting this setup in Israel are, without question, absent on both sides.

Although binationalism makes a certain logical sense, it seems to have no viable political support in either community, beyond a fringe of intellectuals who find the idea of a binational secular democratic state attractive for various reasons. On the other hand, neither community shows substantial support for continuing the status quo or for complete expulsion of the other party. Another possibility is continuing Israeli OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK and JERUSALEM (not, since 2005, the GAZA STRIP) with some sort of limited cultural and political autonomy for Palestinians. Although this vision is attractive to some Jews, as it would reduce the fears of an independent state of Palestine becoming strong enough to threaten Israel, the limited autonomy idea has no support among Palestinians.

The only option that seems to have substantial support among both populations and a realistic possibility is the TWO-STATE SOLUTION, which is the focal point of accommodationist thought. Two-state proponents reject the binary thinking of the rejectionists, who insist it has to be all ours or all theirs, and thereby reject the demonization of the other party that is essential to rejectionist thinking in any situation. Rejectionism means full demonization of the "enemy"—seeing the "other" as somehow purely evil not only in intention but in its very nature. Anti-Semites who see Jews as irredeemably malevolent are in this respect remarkably similar to Jews who see Palestinians as incurably evil. Complementarily, rejectionists see their own side of the conflict as heroic, entirely in the right, and pure, noble, and idealistic in the best sense.

The two-state solution is a goal and a vision that assume the real possibility of peace between two nation-states even though one of them is at an earlier stage of economic development than the other. Today, organizations in the nongovernmental and private nonprofit sector in Israel are working out details of how to guarantee security for both sides: how to share the most precious and scarce resource in the Middle East—WATER; how to develop healthy economic interdependence between Israel and Palestine; how to continue to use Palestinian labor in Israel but to treat laborers more fairly than has been the case so far; and how both communities can work together to address shared environmental concerns, peace education, issues of security, and more. Despite such work that moves ahead, there is as yet no clear-cut blueprint for the two-state solution, and thorny issues persist.

Perhaps the greatest is the so-called right of return. Israel is founded on the prerogative of all Jews in the world to migrate to Israel easily and freely. In the wake of the Holocaust, this made perfect sense, but that right turned out to be predicated on the fleeing of and expulsion of large numbers of Palestinians from what became Israel in the 1948 WAR. Many of them, who have been rootless and homeless for half a century or more, insist on the right to return to live in what were their homes in what was Palestine before 1948. Although there are various proposals to allow limited return for reasons of FAMILY REUNIFICATION, Israel fears that it could be overwhelmed by Palestinians returning if no quotas were established. Two-state proponents have yet to resolve this issue to everyone's satisfaction. Lingering behind the claim to return is the alternative claim of compensation and its attendant issues: who would be eligible, how much would be offered, how claims would be processed, and so forth.

The gigantic issue of security is also nowhere near resolution. It is widely understood that Israel would not tolerate a fully armed Palestine that could join in concert with Arab neighbors to threaten and attack Israel. Most Palestinians seem to accept that reality, yet how much of an armed force, what kind of police force, and what sorts of arms and so forth that Palestine might claim continue to be sore and open issues. Another thorny issue is the status of Jerusalem. Is this religious city to remain the "eternal, undivided capital of the Jewish people," as the current Israeli government insists? Or might it be divided according to the already existing lines of where Jews and Palestinians live? Other possibilities are for joint governance by a Palestinian-Jewish council or division into cantons or boroughs, some of which are Jewish and some Palestinian.

Once these issues are resolved, if they ever are, other crucial ones remain. One is reconciliation. Over thirty countries have established truth and reconciliation commissions to help facilitate peace between parties long in contention and scarred by acts of hideous and sustained brutality. Reconciliation processes are meant to acknowledge deep wounds and scars and bring to light massacres, rapes, and other atrocities in order for the perpetrators to confess their deeds and seek forgiveness. This process is conducive to clearing the air so that formerly contending adversaries can proceed in healthy ways. There are no examples yet of such a process between parties that began under one authority administratively but evolved into two states in the conflict's resolution. And there have been, as yet, few calls for a truth and reconciliation commission to bring Palestinians and Israelis to face each other in the hurts, grievances, and grief clearly attributable to actions by the other side. Real peace would demand some such process.

One Israeli thinker, Yehoshafat Harkabi, suggests that Palestinians and Israelis have an opportunity to devise a unique conclusion to their history of wars and hatred. Many members of each community, even after a political two-state solution, will most likely continue to relate emotionally to all of the Land of Israel or Palestine. For example, Rivka, a Jewish woman living in Israel, might visit HEBRON in Palestine and see where her grandparents once lived and feel a deep connection with the graves of the Jewish patriarchs and matriarchs in Hebron. Correspondingly, Muhammad, a refugee living in a camp in Gaza, might visit JAFFA in Israel and see where his grandparents once had an orchard and visit the site of a mosque that was important to them. In each case, Rivka and Muhammad would live in Israel or Palestine politically but relate emotionally to parts of what they consider their inheritance, which is now located in the country of the other people. Harkabi speculates that each party will have to grieve for what it has given up and believes to belong rightfully to it. He thus adds the idea of a collective grieving process—yet to be designed, if at all—to that of truth and reconciliation.

It is useful to distinguish between violence that is proactive or offensive and violence that is reactive or defensive. All aggrieved violent parties claim they are acting defensively. Whether an action is defensive or offensive depends, in other words, on one's point of view. In 1948, several Arab states attacked the newly founded Israel, which Israelis experienced as offensive violence, and Israel defined its reaction as defensive. Arabs viewed their war upon Israel as a defensive struggle against a population that was invading Palestine with plans of displacing Palestinians from their homes and land. To this day, neither side seems able to see itself as offensive in its actions at any stage of the conflict. From the late nineteenth century on, Jewish entry into Palestine was a Jewish initiative meant to counter the resurgence of ANTI-SEMITISM in Europe in the late nineteenth century and the Holocaust of the twentieth century. From the Jewish point of view, IMMIGRATION to Palestine/Israel was a defensive reaction against continuing persecution and victimization of Jews in virtually every country in Europe for more than a thousand years. What is then a defensive move in the Jewish experience was in the Palestinian experience an offensive move. The Palestinians were not involved in persecuting Jews in Europe and hence viewed immigration as an invasion of their land and a threat to their culture and rights. Yet Palestinian violence against Jews was, not unreasonably, experienced by most Jews as an act of aggression on their national project.

Part of the problem is that Jews and Palestinians, like Croats and Serbs in the former Yugoslavia, Tamils and Sinhalese in Sri Lanka, Protestants and Catholics in Ireland, and other parties in conflict, tend to see themselves as victims and miss the socio-political truth that any party can be both victim and victimizer. If peace is possible between the two peoples, one condition will have to be each party recognizing and taking responsibility for its own part in continuing the violence. This approach is as much social psychological as political, or rather a combination of the two. It demands that each party face and cope with its own real behavior as well as that of the other. If peace comes to Israelis and Palestinians, it will more likely be according to the two-state solution than any other, but that is not guaranteed. And if peace does come about, whether in a two-state form or something else, issues of hurt, resentment, hatred, grievance, and fear will have to be dealt with for the peace to be solid and trustworthy.

—Gordon Fellman

Peace: "Peace and Justice"

What do we imply when we speak of peace? At the most general level, peace represents two conditions. The first and most common, especially in real politics, is the absence of or freedom from war or conflict. This assumes a variety of forms and is typically characterized by the victor imposing the terms of peace. An example is the peace of Versailles, in which the victors humiliated and dismembered GERMANY, thus contributing to the inexorable rise of National Socialism/Nazism. There is the peace of a victory so overwhelming and total that the majority of the vanquished population is exterminated and the remainder can only submit without hope of altering their status. The European conquest of the indigenous Indians in America was such a peace. Excluding the situation of mass genocide, virtually all examples of imposed peace result in efforts by the defeated, weaker party to alter their oppressive situation. In asymmetric power relationships, the powerful have historically sought to maintain the status quo, while the vanquished have struggled for a more equitable change, whether evolutionary or revolutionary.

Thus peace has had diametrically opposing connotations to either side and is inherently unstable.

The post–World War II conception of peace, formulated by the war’s victors led by the UNITED STATES, was informed by the “scourge of war” and the desire to achieve international stability, recognized and respected interstate borders, and intrastate tranquility. Yet the very leaders who imposed the peace had themselves employed horrific violence to achieve their political ends: Dresden, Hiroshima, Nagasaki. What is an acceptable price to achieve the absence of violent conflict? Who decides? These post–World War II questions were among the most important that prompted the establishment of the UNITED NATIONS as an international, objective guardian of world peace, above everything else.

The second condition of peace, markedly different from the first, involves peace based on justice. In contrast to an imposed peace, such a formation is typically stable and lasting, largely because neither side has been humiliated, dehumanized, or subjected to inequality. The starting point for a just peace is a belief in the fundamental human dignity and equality of all persons and their right to share equally the resources, benefits, and responsibilities of their society.

Voltaire wrote, “The sentiment of justice is so natural, and so universally acquired by all mankind, that it seems to be independent of all law, all party, all religion.” Martin Luther King Jr. commented, “Justice denied anywhere diminishes justice everywhere.” Samuel Johnson averred that “an injustice anywhere is an injustice everywhere.” Perhaps most pertinent to the Arab-Israeli conflict, Corazon Aquino argued, “Reconciliation should be accompanied by justice, otherwise it will not last. While we all hope for peace, it shouldn’t be a peace at any cost but peace based on principle, on justice.” The Israeli-Palestinian colonial conflict has been the object of so many “peace plans” it would be impossible to catalog them all. But each of these multiple projects has had one thing in common: it has sought to impose a settlement based on the existing vast power asymmetries that leave one side—the Palestinians—humiliated, excluded, and unequal. Because these projects have been unjust, they have failed. In a relationship involving colonial oppression, a just peace entails, first and foremost, ending the central aspects of this oppression. Advocating peace without justice is tantamount to institutionalizing injustice and therefore perpetuating the oppressive status quo.

Although the founding charter of the United Nations did not explicitly disavow the realpolitik definition of peace, it conceptualized world peace as a function of several factors that transcend the mere absence of war, as essential as that factor may be. Two categories of conditions conducive to a just peace appear in the charter’s preamble: the first comprises respect for fundamental human rights, the dignity and worth of every person, and the equality of rights among all humans; and the second includes justice and obligations under INTERNATIONAL LAW. Peace in accordance with UN principles must be understood in light of the totality of these conditions, primary among which is the fulfillment of the basic requirements of justice.

In the context of national liberation struggles against settler colonialism—as was the case in Algeria and South Africa and is the case with the Palestinian struggle against Israel—absolute justice, as in comprehensively reversing historical wrongs committed against the indigenous people, is realistically and morally unattainable. Even if it were achievable, pursuing absolute justice may lead to the commission of fresh injustices against the settler community, which would call into question the ethicality of the process. The more reasonable and ethical approach is therefore to seek relative justice, which entails redressing the fundamental rights of the indigenous people while avoiding the infliction of any unnecessary or unjust suffering on the settler community. In Algeria, that meant the wholesale flight of the settler-colonist community to its country of origin, FRANCE; and in South Africa, relative justice was achieved through ending racial privilege in the laws and practices of the state and giving all the citizens an equal right to vote and to run for office, among other economic and social measures.

In the Israeli-Palestinian case, the path to justice and peace must take into account the particularities of the conflict, its origins, and its international context. At its core, Israel’s oppression of Palestinians encompasses three major dimensions: (1) denial of REFUGEE rights, including their right to return to their homes of origin, in accordance with UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 194; (2) military OCCUPATION of the GAZA STRIP (until 2005, after which there has been “effective” Occupation) and the WEST BANK (including East JERUSALEM), as well as the colonization of the latter; and (3) institutionalized and legalized racial discrimination against PALESTIN-IAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL. A just peace would have to ethically and practically address all three components as a minimal requirement of relative justice.

At best, a negotiated TWO-STATE SOLUTION, based on UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242—which emphasized the “inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war” and the need to achieve “a just and lasting peace,” calling for Israel’s withdrawal from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES in exchange for an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict—can only address the second of the three dimensions of oppression, bringing partial justice to a mere one-third, or less, of the people of Palestine (i.e., those who live in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT), many of whom are also refugees), ignoring the majority who are refugees living in exile. From another angle, if morality and justice are put aside, is the two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict still possible? Have decades of Israeli “facts on the ground” created an irreversible reality that cannot allow for dividing historic Palestine into two sovereign, contiguous, and viable states?

Two-State Solution

Although still a small minority, a growing number of observers are no longer convinced that the two-state solution can be achieved or can even bring about a lasting—let alone just—peace. Especially after the eruption of the second Palestinian INTIFADA in September 2000, these doubts were given credence due to several compelling factors. First, Israel’s almost complete hegemony over the 1967 OPT—as manifested in the immense growth of its colonial SETTLEMENTS, settlers-only ROADS, and massive colonial Wall (BARRIER), as well as in its control over Palestinian resources—has gradually but fundamentally eroded the principal foundations upon which an independent Palestinian state was intended to be established.

Second, Israel’s division of the OPT into disconnected zones, coupled with its military SIEGE of Palestinian population centers, has essentially turned these areas into BANTUSTANS, or holes in the proverbial Swiss cheese.

Third, Israel demonstrated during the OSLO PROCESS that it is unwilling to genuinely accept a full withdrawal from the 1967 OPT (including East Jerusalem), or to accede to the establishment of a truly independent, sovereign Palestinian state. The OSLO ACCORDS and the ensuing systematic co-optation of a visionless and mostly corrupt Palestinian leadership provided a rare opportunity for Israel to gain recognition from the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY of its claimed right to exist as a Jewish state. But Israel failed to resist the temptation to carry on additional colonial and exclusionary designs.

Fourth, the Palestinian political leadership dismally failed to transform the wide international support for the two-state solution into concerted pressure on Israel to accept it, which resulted in the substantial squandering of the international community’s long-standing support for the Palestinian people. Through a combination of blurred vision, miscalculated tactics, lack of ability and stamina, vested personal interests, and a politics of submission, Palestinian leaders have failed to bring the Palestinians any closer to their aspired and internationally recognized national rights, particularly their right to self-determination.

Fifth, Israel’s substantial influence on US foreign policy in the region has further distanced the possibility of any consequential pressure on Israel to implement UN resolutions and comply with international law.

Sixth, the entrenchment of the institutionalized racial discrimination against Palestinian citizens of Israel has further confirmed the irreconcilability of having a Jewish and democratic state within the 1948 areas, a combination that is viewed as an oxymoron by many. A two-state solution would therefore not bring justice to this approximately 1.3-million-strong component of the Palestinian people.

Seventh, the incompatibility between a negotiated two-state settlement and the right of Palestinian refugees to return—due to Israel’s insistence on maintaining Jewish supremacy and DEMOGRAPHY domination—has meant that any settlement reached along the lines of two states will essentially undermine the legal and moral rights of the Palestinian refugees, which are at the core of the entire conflict. This means that such a solution can never endure.

One-State Solution

During the last three decades, the slogan “Two States for Two Peoples” was widely viewed as both realistic and politically wise. Now, given all the evident problems, some reconsideration is due. Those proposing a one-state solution as an alternative, though, must face up to a crucial question: if Israel has so systematically and relentlessly crushed the foundations of a mini Palestinian state within the Occupied Palestinian Territory, why should anyone expect it to accept a democratic state over the entire area of BRITISH MANDATE Palestine, an entity that would by definition negate the very concept of a Jewish state? It may be argued, in response, that Israel's acceptance is not a necessary condition for the implementation of a one-state democracy; after all, South African apartheid was abolished by compulsion, not persuasion. Specifically, it took a sustained internal campaign of resistance and a persistent international campaign of boycott, divestment, and sanctions—spearheaded by the African National Congress—to reach this end. Similarly, Palestinians, conscientious Israelis, and international supporters of a just peace can mobilize an international civil struggle aimed at negating the Zionist colonial character of the state and the attainment of equal rights in the framework of a unitary, democratic state.

There are many thorny issues that ought to be scrutinized when raising the slogan of a "Democratic State in Historic Palestine." For the most part, these revolve around how, even whether, such a concept can deal with the repatriation of Palestinian refugees; the development of a "national Israeli identity" and the corresponding acquired rights; the fate of Jewish colonies in the West Bank; the centrality of Jerusalem to the Christian, Islamic, and Jewish faiths; the ethnic and cultural character of Palestinian Arabs and Israeli Jews; reconciling the new progressive and egalitarian identity of such a state with its surrounding Arab context; and the requirements for a "new Arabism" that can tolerate such a model of diversity and democracy.

Ethical De-dichotomization

Regardless what shape or form a just and peaceful solution ultimately takes, for coexistence to succeed a process of de-dichotomization of the two conflicting identities must be judiciously considered. To do so, it is necessary to examine whether the existing dichotomy between Palestinians and Israelis is a cause or an effect of the oppression in question. It could be argued that ingrained differences exist in a conflict due to an exclusive sense of subjectivity or as embodiments of established conflicts and injustices. Each of these two views will influence the foundations of any conceptual process of de-dichotomization, which is a necessary condition for a just reconciliation.

If the dichotomy is regarded strictly as a cause of the conflict, efforts are focused on challenging the prevailing or established forms for defining identity, and, therefore, these efforts explore intergroup commonalities, or attributes, that are shared across the subjective border lines. Precedence, in this case, is given to conceptual change. All the joint, "apolitical" Palestinian-Israeli projects since the Oslo Accords belong to this category, aiming to bridge a perceived psychological and/or cultural gap separating the two entities. If, on the other hand, the separation is viewed exclusively as a result of the conflict, the struggle to change the concrete reality on the ground—the actual experiences of the subjects involved in the conflict—is given priority, with the hope that it would effect a corresponding flux in intragroup awareness, hence promoting the prospects for intergroup compromise.

These arguments and the questions raised themselves tend to dichotomize reality and conceptualization, presenting them as mutually exclusive. A different approach is to examine the dialectical interaction between the two, which makes each of them cause and effect simultaneously. What varies is the degree of relevance of each in a given time-space context. From this viewpoint, there is a need to explore a process of de-dichotomization that takes into account the epistemological as well as the ontological dimensions of the conflict between the two identities, Palestinian Arabs and Israeli Jews. However, there are ethical implications that should not be ignored even in such an approach.

If de-dichotomization takes place in perception alone, then it may be accused of complicity since, for all intents and purposes, it advocates a change in the "consciousness of the oppressed, not the situation which oppresses them," to borrow from Simone de Beauvoir. The inherently contradictory identities of the oppressor and oppressed cannot find a moral middle ground. So long as the relation of oppression obtains, only coercion, submission, and injustice are possible outcomes.

If, on the other hand, de-dichotomization is sought only in action aimed at fighting the oppressive relation, without a corresponding change in perception, it may lead to revenge. If Palestinians decide to pursue the path of revenge, far from ending the relationship of oppression, they would, in this case, be interchanging roles with their current oppressors while maintaining a relationship of oppression. So long as the oppressed can only see the "other" as devoid of all attributes except being oppressor, they cannot possibly challenge the dichotomy of oppressor-oppressed; they can only reverse it. Challenging the dichotomy would require exploring the human commonalities, which must be viewed in a specific context of time and space, rather than as absolute, eternal, or transcendental factors; otherwise, they may turn into a tool of imposing conformity, or forced identification, a more subtle form of oppression.

Ethical de-dichotomization ought to be envisioned, as Brazilian educator Paulo Freire argues, in both reflection and action—in conceptualizing the relations between Palestinians and Israelis in the process of undoing the injustice and in the situation after the causes and manifestations of oppression have been overcome. Like any other people on earth, the Palestinians cannot be expected to accept injustice as fate. The entire relationship of oppression and inequality that has so far prevailed is morally intolerable and practically unsustainable. Zionist Israel, as an exclusivist and colonial state, has no hope of ever being forgiven or accepted as a normal or legitimate state by its victims, the Palestinians. Reconciliation and oppression cannot coexist. A secular, democratic state that can offer the most ethical and therefore enduring path to a just peace must first and foremost allow and facilitate the return of and compensation for all the Palestinian refugees, as the only moral restitution acceptable for the injustice they have endured for decades. Such a process, however, must uphold at all times the moral imperative of avoiding the infliction of any unnecessary or unjust suffering on the Jewish community in Palestine. A just peace would also grant full, equal, and unequivocal citizenship rights to all its citizens, Israeli Jews and Palestinian Arabs, including the refugees. Moreover, it would be required to recognize, legitimize, and even nourish the cultural, religious, and ethnic character and traditions of each respective community. Coexistence should not imply uniformity or even conformity in these vital domains.

Advocating such a vision for a just peace poses a moral challenge to Israel's colonial existence, not an existential threat to Israeli Jews per se. Through dismantling the colonial character of the state and ending racial/ethnic oppression, a secular, democratic state will allow the Jews in Palestine to finally enjoy normalcy as equal humans and equal citizens of a secular democratic state—a truly promising land and a genuine hope for peaceful coexistence.

See also OCCUPATION; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Bibliography

- Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil, reissued. New York: Penguin Classics, 2006.
- . The Human Condition, 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- . The Origins of Totalitarianism, reissued. Berlin: Schocken, 2004.
- Barghouti, Omar. "Ethical Implication of the De-dichotomization of Identities in Conflict." In Controversies and Subjectivity. Edited by Pierluigi Barrotta and Marcelo Dascal. Amsterdam: John Benjamins, 2005.
- Halwani, Raja, and Tomis Kapitan. The Israeli-Palestinian Conflict: Philosophical Essays on Self-Determination, Terrorism and the One-State Solution. Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.
- Judt, Tony. "Israel: The Alternative." New York Review of Books. 23 October 2003.
- Kovel, Joel. Overcoming Zionism: Creating a Single Democratic State in Israel/Palestine. London: Pluto Press, 2007.
- Lazare, Daniel. "The One-State Solution." The Nation. 3 November 2003.
- Tilley, Virginia. The One-State Solution: A Breakthrough for Peace in the Israeli-Palestinian Deadlock. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2005.

—Omar Barghouti

Peace: "Settlement, Resolution, and Reconciliation"

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict began in the late nineteenth century, spans the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, and remains the central reality of the Middle East. Despite the fact that the conflict's 100-plus-year history is dotted with periods of high hopes for peace (the 1993–2000 OSLO ACCORDS), its conclusion remains elusive. This entry provides a social-psychological analysis of conditions and processes that might facilitate the transition from a reality of a protracted conflict to one of peaceful coexistence between Israelis and Palestinians. This is presented against the background of three approaches to ending international conflicts: conflict settlement, conflict resolution, and reconciliation. Each of these approaches encapsulates different assumptions about the antecedents of international conflict, the forces that maintain it, and the road that needs to be taken to end it. The argument made here is that failures to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict are at least partly due to the relative lack of attention to processes of reconciliation.

Conflict Settlement

The conflict settlement approach has dominated much of the discourse on conflict in the social sciences (economics, sociology, social psychology, and political science) and is situated within a real-conflict (realpolitik) view of discord. Applied to the international arena, it suggests that conflicts between nations emerge because the parties covet the same limited resource (e.g., LAND), and each is motivated to maximize its own gain. Conflict is said to persist as long as its costs are lower than the alternative costs associated with giving up on demands for maximal self-gain. This economic-rational view of conflict emphasizes the parties' constant vigilance of what is to be gained by continuing the conflict vs. the alternative costs that are associated with reaching a settlement. According to this view, the king's road to end an international conflict is to negotiate a formula for the division of the disputed resources. Achieving such a formula is possible because the contested resources are concrete and divisible (land, WATER, or other natural resources). The negotiations can consist of distributive bargaining, which is dominated by a win-lose perspective and focuses on the parties' opposite positions, or integrative bargaining, which focuses on the underlying concerns of both parties and is said to be dominated by a win-win perspective.

Most of the efforts over the past 100 years to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict have been couched within the conflict settlement approach. From the days of the PEEL COMMISSION in 1936 to the days of the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT in July 2000, plans were devised on how to divide the land between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean between Israelis and Palestinians. There were always those on both sides who rejected any settlement and kept claiming, "this is all ours." But, in recent years, a growing number of Palestinians and Israelis recognize the necessity of concluding the distributive bargaining with a TWO-STATE SOLUTION along the 1967 BORDERS. If this is so, one may wonder, why are Israelis and Palestinians still fighting? One answer to this query by those who have been close to the peace process is that the prevailing distrust between the parties is the major stumbling block on the road to peaceful coexistence. After a century of violence and mutual infliction of pain, each party doubts the other party's promises for a violence-free future that will be based on equality and independence. Thus, the problem is not the parties' inability to find a formula to settle their conflicting claims but their lack of trust in the other side's intention to commit to such a formula. The conflict resolution approach aims to deal with this problem of distrust by attempting to change the nature of the relationships between the adversaries.

Conflict Resolution

Efforts at conflict resolution are guided by the idea that repeated positive interactions between the adversaries will lead to the buildup of more trust between them. This idea is consistent with the basic rationale of the contact hypothesis within social psychology. Theory and research in this tradition identified four conditions that are needed in order for such interactions to yield more trustworthy relations and less animosity: (1) prolonged positive interaction (2) between equal parties (3) that cooperate to achieve a common goal (4) within a supportive social context. Further, after the work of conflict resolution has restored a degree of working trust between the adversaries, they will be more prepared to settle the conflict by reaching an agreement on the concrete issues that separate them.

There are numerous examples for conflict resolution within the Israeli-Palestinian context. Herbert Kelman's seminal work with groups of Israelis and Palestinians and the theoretical insights that resulted from it are a prime example of how this approach has been used to increase trust and improve relations between Israelis and Palestinians. There are many other examples of programs of conflict resolution, conducted within and outside the Middle East. A major example of the conflict resolution approach as a tool of diplomacy is the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES, part of the Oslo agreements signed in 1993. An important element in the Oslo Accords was the idea that Israelis and Palestinians had to change the nature of their relations before they could tackle and settle the concrete issues that separated them. To this end, both sides agreed to postpone negotiations on issues such as land, REFUGEES, and the status of JERUSALEM. Consistent with the logic of the conflict resolution approach, the interim between the signing of the Declaration of Principles and the FINAL STATUS TALKS was intended to allow the parties to learn to trust each other and be more prepared to settle the conflict. The joint activities between Israelis and Palestinians during the interim period of trust building (1993–2000) had three of the previously mentioned four determinants of constructive inter-group contact. The parties were involved in numerous cooperative projects designed to achieve common goals (e.g., economic prosperity for the region) in a context of active international support. However, the fourth determinant of "equal status" contact was missing. Although some control was handed over to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), in general throughout this period Israel remained the occupying force that controlled the daily lives of Palestinians. It has been suggested by many that this unequal relationship may have been a prime reason why the seven years of the Oslo conflict resolution efforts resulted in the resumption of hostilities rather than settlement of the conflict.

Just a couple of months before the OSLO PROCESS evaporated into the smoke of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, Israelis and Palestinians met at Camp David (July 2000) under the auspices of US president BILL CLINTON to try to conclude a final status agreement. After seven years of trust building, some thought that enough trust had been established to settle the conflict, yet no agreement emerged. In the language of the present analysis, neither the gradual approach of trust building and conflict resolution (the Oslo Process) nor the efforts toward settlement with one swoop (the peace conference at Camp David) seems to have worked. One reason for this may be that the parties had never taken the road of reconciliation to end the conflict.

Socio-Emotional Reconciliation

Socio-emotional reconciliation is a "healing" process that reflects the internal identity changes that each of the parties involved in the conflict undergoes. In this process, each party strengthens the core elements of its own identity while accommodating the other, and conflict-related emotional barriers are removed. The Needs-Based Model suggests that the weaker group's unfulfilled need for restoration of its sense of power and the stronger group's unfulfilled need for social acceptance and restoration of its moral image constitute such emotional barriers that the path to reconciliation is blocked. The model's hypothesis that fulfilling these needs should facilitate reconciliation received support in the context of various inter-group conflicts, including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

A common way in which the fulfillment of these needs for the stronger and the weaker parties may be achieved is the use of what was labeled by Tavuchis the Apology-Forgiveness cycle. By apologizing and taking responsibility for past wrongdoings the stronger party acknowledges a debt to its adversary. Only the recipient of this apology (i.e., the weaker party), by expressing forgiveness for and acceptance of the stronger party, can annul this debt and remove the threat of the stronger party's labeling as the guilty perpetrator. The control over these psychological resources that are desired by the stronger party is an empowering experience for the weaker party. Mutual interaction that grants power to the weaker party by the stronger party and acceptance to the stronger party by the weaker party lowers the motivation for revenge by the weaker party and for belittling the consequences of one's actions by the stronger party, which results in greater readiness to reconcile and end the conflict.

If it is so simple, why is it so difficult? Why have Israelis and Palestinians not taken this road of socio-emotional reconciliation through a reciprocal fulfillment of their needs for acceptance and power, respectively? The first reason is the deep distrust that exists between the two parties. The initiation of socio-emotional reconciliation requires that the stronger side acknowledge responsibility for past wrongdoings. Yet, when lack of trust dominates, such a unilateral admission of responsibility is risky. It can be misused by the adversary as a pretext for claiming moral superiority and making more demands. This risk is diminished when the stronger party trusts the weaker party to reciprocate its responsibility-taking with expressions of acceptance and empathy. Because trust is a rare commodity in Israeli-Palestinian relations this does not happen. Consider the example of the Camp David 2000 meeting in which the Israeli delegation refused to accept responsibility for Palestinians' suffering. No one knows if Camp David 2000 would have ended differently if the Israelis trusted the Palestinians to reciprocate responsibility for infliction of suffering with a message of social acceptance toward the Israelis. The logic of the Needs-Based Model suggests that it would have ended more positively had this been the case. Yet, the wide gulf of distrust that exists between the parties prevents the exchange of the psychological commodities that each party desires: empowerment for the Palestinians who covet the acknowledgment of their sufferings and loss of land, and social acceptance for the Israelis who covet empathy and understanding of their perspective.

The second reason that prevents the process of socio-emotional reconciliation from occurring between Palestinians and Israelis is their competition over the role of the "real victim" of the other's wrongdoings. In most protracted conflicts like the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, even if there is power asymmetry (i.e., one party possesses more power than the other), both parties view themselves as the "real victim" of the other's malevolence. Because of this, each side believes that it is the other's responsibility to initiate the process of socio-emotional reconciliation by admitting to past wrongdoings. Yet, such an admission replaces the morally advantageous identity of a victim with the moral inferiority associated with the identity of a perpetrator. Therefore, neither Palestinians nor Israelis are ready to initiate such a process. Each expects the other side to take the initiative by acknowledging past wrongdoings and intransigence.

This analysis suggests that in the context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict socio-emotional reconciliation needs to be carefully planned in advance in order to overcome the obstacles of distrust and competitive victimhood. An agreement needs to ascertain that the process of socio-emotional reconciliation is reciprocal and simultaneous. Both parties need to structure this interaction in a way that minimizes perceived risks. The party that accepts responsibility for past wrongdoings must trust that its adversary will reciprocate with an expression of understanding, empathy, and acceptance. The party that expresses empathy and acceptance, in turn, must trust that its adversary will not use this expression as legitimization that allows unjust practices to continue. Part of the social contract that underlies such a process needs to ascertain both parties' agreement that each is a victim and a perpetrator of violence and intransigence and that neither occupies a monopoly over the moral high ground that is in the "real victim's" territory. We are not naïve enough to suggest that such a planned and agreed-upon process will miraculously transform a reality of more than a century of intractable conflict into a paradise of social harmony. The realistic, tangible issues that separate the parties need to be negotiated and settled. But an approach that does not lose sight of the importance of the different psychological needs of the parties will pave a smoother road for getting there.

The simmering hostility and sporadic outbreak of violence between Israelis and Palestinians tell us that neither the conflict settlement nor the conflict resolution approach is the "philosopher's stone" to transform this conflict into peaceful coexistence. The approach of socio-emotional reconciliation has been missing from past efforts to bring peace to the region. If successful, it can supplement the approaches of conflict resolution and conflict settlement and boost the overall effectiveness of efforts to achieve a lasting peace in this region.

Bibliography

- Cross, S., and R. Rosenthal. "Three Models of Conflict Resolution: Effects on Intergroup Expectancies and Attitudes." Journal of Social Issues. 55 (1999).
- Halabi, R., and N. Sonnenschein, eds. Inter-Group Dialogue: The Neve Shalom/What al-Salam Model. Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2003.
- Kelman, H. C. "Reconciliation as Identity Change: A Social-Psychological Perspective." In From Conflict Resolution to Reconciliation. Edited by Y. Bar-Siman-Tov. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- . "Reconciliation from a Social-Psychological Perspective." In Social Psychology of Intergroup Reconciliation. Edited by A. Nadler, T. Malloy, and J. D. Fisher. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- . "Social-Psychological Contributions to Peacemaking and Peacebuilding in the Middle East." Applied Psychology. 47:1 (1998).
- Nadler, A., and I. Liviatan. "Inter-Group Reconciliation: Effects of Adversary's Expressions of Empathy, Responsibility and Recipients' Trust." Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin. 32 (2006).
- . "Inter-Group Reconciliation Processes in Israel: Theoretical Analysis and Empirical Findings." In Collective Guilt: International Perspectives. Edited by N. R. Branscombe and B. Doosje. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Nadler, A., T. Malloy, and J. D. Fisher. "Intergroup Reconciliation: Dimensions and Themes." In Social Psychology of Intergroup Reconciliation. Edited by A. Nadler, T. Malloy, and J. D. Fisher. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Nadler, A., and N. Schnabel. "Intergroup Reconciliation: The Instrumental and Socio-Emotional Paths and the Need-Based Model of Socio-Emotional Reconciliation." In Social Psychology of Intergroup Reconciliation. Edited by A. Nadler, T. Malloy, and J. D. Fisher. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.
- Nadler, A., and T. Saguy. "Trust Building and Reconciliation between Adversarial Groups: A Social Psychological Perspective." In The Psychology of Diplomacy. Edited by H. Langholtz and C. E. Stout. New York: Praeger, 2004.
- Pettigrew, T. F. "Inter-Group Contact Theory." Annual Review of Psychology. 49 (1998).

- Ross, D. The Missing Peace: Inside the Story of the Fight for Peace in the Middle-East. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2004.
- Rouhana, N., and D. Bar-Tal. "Psychological Dynamics of Intractable Conflicts: The Israeli-Palestinian Case." American Psychologist. 53 (1998).
- Schnabel, N., A. Nadler, J. Ulrich, J. F. Dovidio, and D. Carmi. "Promoting Reconciliation through the Satisfaction of the Emotional Needs of Victimized and Perpetrating Group Members: The Needs-Based Model of Reconciliation." Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin. 35 (2008).
- Tavuchis, N. Mea Culpa: A Sociology of Apology and Reconciliation. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 1991.

—Arie Nadler and Nurit Schnabel

Peace: "The Other Zionism: Reconciliation Attempts between Arabs and Jews in Palestine Prior to 1948"

The main currents of ZIONISM have focused on maximum Jewish IMMIGRATION and utmost LAND acquisition as well as on the establishment and maintenance of a Jewish state, while ignoring the indigenous inhabitants of Palestine as a nation of people with rights and aspirations. But there was another Zionism—one that considered Palestinians equal to Jews and that attempted to find a political solution that would accommodate the basic human rights and desires of both peoples. These "Other Zionists," who were active in Palestine from the 1920s through 1948, were motivated by deep ethical precepts and viewed Palestine not as an empty land but as one that contained another and kindred people. They were an isolated handful then and are an almost unknown one now, when the pendulum of contemporary power in Zionist/Israeli politics has swung to the right to the ultra-nationalists, who are willing to use military power to expand Jewish land and repress the Palestinians.

In their time, however, the spokespersons for the Other Zionism were not obscure and peripheral figures but among the most highly respected personages in the history of early Zionism. They were among the greatest of the thinkers and pioneers who prepared the way for the establishment of Israel. One of them, AHAD HA'AM (1856–1927), was the foremost philosopher to take part in the rebirth of Hebrew as a living language. A Jewish immigrant from Russia, he had played a significant role in obtaining the British BALFOUR DECLARATION in 1917 to establish in Palestine "a national home for the Jewish people." Yet, Ha'am was also one of the few in the Zionist movement who stressed the parallel obligation expressed in the declaration "that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine." Ha'am called himself a "cultural Zionist," concerned with spreading the Hebrew language and culture, as opposed to a nationalist Zionist, focused on establishing and sustaining the state of Israel. He wanted the political aims of Zionism delayed by "consideration for the national rights of the Palestinian Arabs."

Four years after the Balfour Declaration was promulgated, Ahad Ha'am expanded his views on this in a preface to the Berlin edition of his book At the Cross Ways. He wrote that the historical right of the Jewish people to a national home in Palestine "does not invalidate the right of the rest of the land's inhabitants." He recognized that they have "a genuine right to the land due to generations of residence and work upon it." For them, "too," Ahad Ha'am went on, "this country is a national home and they have the right to develop their national potentialities to the uttermost." This right, he explained, was why the BRITISH MANDATE government "promised to facilitate the establishment in Palestine of a National Home for the Jewish people and not, as was interpreted by the political Zionists, the reconstruction of Palestine as the National Home of the Jewish People." Ahad Ha'am argued that the purpose of the Balfour Declaration was twofold: (1) to establish a Jewish national home there and (2) also not to deny "any right to deprive the present inhabitants of their rights" and any intention "of making the Jewish people the sole ruler of the country."

After Ahad Ha'am died in 1927, his disciple, JUDAH L. MAGNES (1877–1948), followed in his footsteps. Magnes was a San Francisco-born rabbi who immigrated to Palestine in 1922, established the Hebrew University in JERUSALEM, and served as its first president until his death in 1948. He made a lifelong effort to bring Arabs and Jews together and to work for a binational state in which the national rights and aspirations of both peoples would be safeguarded by fundamental constitutional guarantees. In such a state, the constitution would recognize two nations within one state, with full rights to cultural autonomy and fostered by two official languages—Arabic and Hebrew. In his address at the opening of the Hebrew University for its 1929–1930 academic year, Magnes put forward the principles of BINATIONALISM: “One of the greatest cultural duties of the Jewish people is the attempt to enter the Promised Land, not by means of conquest as Joshua, but through peaceful and cultural means, through hard work, sacrifices, love and with a decision not to do anything which cannot be justified before the world conscience.”

Another of the Other Zionists was A. D. Gordon (1856–1922), whose writings reflected much the same spirit as those of Magnes. Gordon, who died the same year Magnes immigrated to Palestine, was a Zionist who left his family in Russia in 1904 to live in Palestine. He believed that the Jews could reestablish a nation in Palestine only if they began to build it, literally, with their own hands. Though he was already forty-eight years of age when he emigrated and a writer and philosopher not accustomed to physical labor, he set out to live as he believed. He worked as a manual laborer in the vineyards and orange groves of Petah Tikvah and Rishon le-Zion—two of the oldest Jewish farming settlements in Palestine—and, after 1912, in various villages in Galilee, suffering all the tribulations of the pioneers: malaria, unemployment, hunger, and insecurity.

A secular mystic, nationalist, and universalist, Gordon wrote of the Jews: “We were the first to proclaim that man is created in the image of God. We must go further and say: the nation must be created in the image of God. Not because we are better than others, but because we have borne upon our shoulders and suffered all which calls for this. It is by paying the price of torments the like of which the world has never known that we have won the right to be the first in this work of creation.” In Gordon’s opinion, the crucial test of the Jews would be their position toward the Arabs. “Our attitude toward them,” he wrote, “must be one of humanity, of moral courage which remains on the highest plane, even if the behavior of the other side is not all that is desired. Indeed,” he concluded, “their hostility is all the more reason for our humanity.” In Gordon’s view, “each and every nation must see itself as a unit responsible for the fate of humanity and for the attainment of universal justice.” From this it followed that “the relationship between the Jews and the Arabs in Palestine was important because if the Jews were to recreate their nation as a just nation this could not be done on the basis of injustice.” The Jews, in his view, had a right to return “to Palestine and become once again a part of it, but the Arabs were part of it too.”

For Gordon, as with Ahad Ha’am, the Arab problem was central. He recognized that the Arabs were “a living nation, though not a free one” (he was writing in 1919), and that, whether Zionists liked it or not, they would be “partners with us in the political and social life” of the country. He saw Arab-Jewish relations as “a great moment,” because “here we have the first lesson and the first practical exercise in the life of brotherhood between nations.” The test of Jewish humanity was in the Jewish attitude toward the Arabs. Nor did Gordon see this relationship purely in terms of ideals. He translated it into terms of the land question, fearing for the coming dispossession of the Arab peasant. In 1922, when drafting statutes for the guidance of Zionist labor settlements, he included a provision (ignored by the people implementing them): “Wherever settlements are founded, a specific share of the land must be assigned to the Arabs from the outset. The distribution of sites should be equitable so that not only the welfare of the Jewish settler but equally that of the resident Arabs will be safeguarded. The settlement has the moral obligation to assist the Arabs in any way it can. This is the only proper and fruitful way to establish good neighborly relations with the Arabs.”

A similar message came from a very different sector of European Jewry, from the German-Jewish philosopher MARTIN BUBER (1878–1965), who also was influenced by Ahad Ha’am. He became a Zionist as early as 1898, but for him Zionism was to be different from all other nationalisms. It was to be Der Heilige Weg (The Holy Way), also the title of a book he published in 1919 in his native GERMANY. In it, Buber espoused a “Hebrew humanism.” He, too, saw relations with the Arabs as crucial and emphasized in his writings “that Zionism should address itself to the needs of the Arabs.” As early as 1921, Buber set forth the germ of the idea of a binational state in a proposal to the WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS that year. He wanted the congress to officially proclaim “its desire to live in peace and brotherhood with the Arab people and to develop the common homeland into a republic in which both peoples will have the possibility of free development.” They declined. In Palestine, where he immigrated in 1938, Buber made the quest for Arab-Jewish friendship one of his main concerns. Even after the outbreak of the 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Buber "called for a harnessing of nationalistic impulses and a solution based on compromise between the two peoples." He was a close friend of Magnes and taught at the Hebrew University until his death in 1965.

One of the earliest figures in the Other Zionism was Moshe Smilansky (1874–1953). The son of a tenant farmer near Kiev in Russia, he immigrated to Palestine in 1890 and was active as a farmer, writer, and Zionist. A binationalist also, Smilansky opposed the movement to restrict employment in Jewish colonies and fields to Jewish labor only. He had the distinction of being the first modern Hebrew writer to write about the Arabs among whom he settled. Under the pen name Hawaja Mussa, he published amiable short stories about Arab life before World War I. These stories, "the first of their kind in Jewish literature," introduced "to the Jewish reader a new world—exotic, colorful, throbbing with its own rich humanity."

A similar figure, out of that same pioneering generation, was the agronomist Hayim Kalwariski-Margolis (1868–1947). His was the only Jewish home in which one encountered Arab intellectuals. By 1945, he had already spent fifty years in Palestine devoted to Jewish resettlement and Arab-Jewish friendship. Many of the earliest and most famous pre-World War I Jewish settlements in Galilee owe much to Kalwariski-Margolis for their foundation and survival. To protect these colonies, Kalwariski-Margolis helped to organize the HASHOMER, the Jewish armed watchmen's organization, from which the HAGANA ultimately developed. And, in his search for better relations with Arab neighbors, he persuaded BARON EDMOND DE ROTHSCHILD to establish a Hebrew-Arab school, the first of its kind, for the children of the Arab village of Ja'uni near the Jewish village of Rosh Pina in Galilee.

Kalwariski-Margolis played a part in a series of attempts to establish amicable relations between the rising forces of Arab and Jewish nationalism. As early as 1913, he arranged meetings in Damascus, SYRIA, and Beirut, LEBANON, between the famous Zionist leader NAHUM SOKOLOW and Arab nationalists. After World War I, Syrian king Faysal I, who had led the Arab revolt against the Turks, paid Kalwariski-Margolis an unusual tribute. Kalwariski-Margolis was invited by the newly crowned king to Damascus and the presidium of the All-Syrian Congress "to suggest proposals for the regulation of Jewish-Arab relations in Palestine." In 1922, Kalwariski-Margolis participated in Arab-Jewish negotiations in Cairo, which were discontinued after the British government opposed them. In those years, he was not acting merely as an unauthorized Zionist heretic but was one of the three Jewish members of the Arab-Jewish Advisory Council set up for Palestine by the first British High Commissioner, Sir HERBERT SAMUEL. Kalwariski-Margolis also served on the executive of the Va'ad Le'umi, or National Council, which was the unofficial governing body of the Palestinian Jewish community between the two world wars. From 1923 to 1927, he directed the Office of Arab Affairs of the ZIONIST EXECUTIVE. In 1929, after the Arab uprising that year, he was appointed head of the combined office set up by the JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL and the Va'ad Le'umi to deal with Arab-Jewish tensions.

Kalwariski-Margolis did not, however, limit his activities to these official Zionist bodies. He was a leading figure in a series of maverick organizations, established in the 1920s through 1940s, that advocated a binational state to bring about Arab-Jewish reconciliation. Though they were all politically marginal movements with little impact on majority opinion, they attracted many of the best minds and most illustrious intellectuals of the Jewish community. The earliest was the Berit Shalom (Covenant of Peace), formed in 1925 by leading pioneers and intellectuals such as ARTHUR RUPPIN, Hans Kohn, Gershom Scholem—and Kalwariski-Margolis. This was the first organization to call for the establishment of a binational state in Palestine, and it was bitterly attacked by most of the Zionist parties, especially by the right-wing Zionist Revisionists, as "defeatist." Yet these men were not utopian idealists but believed that the Palestinians were justified in fearing a Zionism that spoke in terms of a Jewish majority and a Jewish state. They believed that both nations were in Palestine by right and if the Jews wished to live there in peace and security, they had to acknowledge and live by this reality.

Berit Shalom lasted until the early 1930s and was succeeded by three similar organizations: Kedma Mizraha (Forward to the East), established in the 1930s; the League of Arab-Jewish Rapprochement in 1939; and the last and most important binationalist group, IHUD (Unity), which referred to Arab-Jewish unity, in 1942. Kalwariski-

Margolis played a leading role in all these organizations. Ihud was organized four months before the 1942 BILTMORE Conference by a group of Zionist dissidents, among them Magnes and another American Jew, Henrietta Szold, with the stated purpose of establishing friendly contact with the Arabs and working for a binational solution. Magnes testified for Ihud in 1947 before the UNITED NATIONS SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PALESTINE in favor of a binational state. After the UNITED NATIONS voted for the partition of Palestine between an Arab and a Jewish state in UN RESOLUTION 181, with economic and other links between them, Magnes pressed for the establishment of a Semitic Confederation, including Israel, as a means of preventing the war he saw would result from partition, but was unsuccessful. With the 1948 War and the establishment of a Jewish state, the binational movement came to an end, but not the Other Zionism, which continued to struggle for justice for the Arabs in Israel and later in the Occupied Territories and for Arab-Jewish reconciliation.

These Jewish binationalist groups, as their Zionist adversaries have pointed out, rarely if ever attracted Arab support, although one of the groups, the League of Arab-Jewish Rapprochement, achieved a breakthrough in 1946. It came in HAIFA, where Jews and Palestinians rotated the municipal offices between them: when the mayor was an Arab, the vice mayor was a Jew, and vice versa. There, in 1946, a leading Arab intellectual declared himself for a binational Palestine. This maverick, Fauzi Darwish al-Husayn, was a member of the most influential Arab clan in Palestine, the AL-HUSAYNIS, and a cousin of the mufti of Jerusalem, AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, a bitter opponent of Zionism, who took the Axis side in World War II. But at a public meeting in Haifa in 1946, Darwish al-Husayn called for an Arab-Jewish agreement under the auspices of the United Nations, for a "bi-national independent Palestine," which would, in turn, link itself by "an alliance with the Arab neighboring countries."

Al-Husayn amplified his views in a talk before an Arab-Jewish gathering in the home of Kalwariski-Margolis a few days later. He said he had taken part in the 1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES as a follower of his cousin, the mufti, but had begun to realize "that this road has no purpose. Experience has proven," al-Husayn went on, "that the official policy of both sides brings only damage and suffering to both." He said that in Palestine "the Jews and Arabs once lived in friendship and cooperation" and added that "there are Jews and Arabs from the older generation who nursed from the same mother. The imperialist policy plays with us both, with the Arabs and the Jews, and there is no other way except unity and working hand in hand."

Al-Husayni stressed that the moderates must organize. "A club must be set up immediately in Jerusalem to acquire friends, to begin producing a written organ, to visit other cities for propaganda and making ties." In response, an Arab organization was formed, called the Falastin al-Jedida (the New Palestine), and, on 11 November 1946, five of its leading members signed an agreement with the League for Jewish-Arab Rapprochement and Cooperation. The two sides agreed to "full cooperation between the two national movements in all fields on the basis of political equality between the two nations in Palestine as a means to obtaining the independence of the country . . . and the joining of the shared and independent Palestine in an alliance with the neighboring countries in the future." They even reached agreement on the thorniest problem of all—Jewish immigration, which was to be regulated "according to the absorptive capacity of the country." But this potentially promising beginning—at least from the perspective of the Other Zionists—was brought to an end twelve days later when al-Husayn was murdered by unknown Arab nationalists.

The tradition of the Other Israel is carried on today by Israeli intellectuals, activists, and organizations, and though, like their predecessors, they are marginalized in Israeli society and politics as well as being disunited, their efforts are significant. Although they are not all binationalists, they believe in the basic humanity of the Palestinians and in their right to share and participate equally in all fundamental civil, human, and political rights. These individuals include writer Meron Benvenisti; historians Avi Shlaim, Tom Segev, and Ilan Pappé; academics Uri Ram, Tanya Reinhart, Jeff Halper, the late Baruch Kimmerling, Neve Gordon, and Ze'ev Sternhell; moral philosopher Adi Ophir; journalists Amira Hass and Gideon Levy; activist intellectual Michel Warschawski; lawyers Tamar Peleg, Lea Tsemel, and self-exiled Felicia Langer; the military officers who have refused duty in the Occupied Territories; activists such as Uri Avnery and Gila Svirsky; the members of B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories; and Israeli organizations such as WOMEN IN BLACK, Anarchists Against the Wall, TA'AYUSH, YESH G'VUL, and COURAGE TO REFUSE.

Bibliography

- Brinner, William M., and Moses Rischin, eds. Like All Nations: The Life and Legacy of Judah L. Magnes. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1987.
- Buber, Martin. "Hebrew Humanism." In The Zionist Idea: A Historical Analysis and Reader. Edited by Arthur Hertzberg. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1959.
- . A Land of Two Peoples: Martin Buber on Jews and Arabs, 2nd ed. Edited by Paul Mendes-Flohr. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2005.
- Carey, Roane, and Jonathan Shainin, eds. The Other Israel: Voices of Refusal and Dissent. New York: W. W. Norton, 2002.
- Ewins, Tristan. "Binationalism an Option in Search of Peace in the Middle East." ZNet. 19 June 2002. <http://www.zmag.org/znet>.
- Gendzier, Irene L. "Palestine and Israel: The Binational Idea." Journal of Palestine Studies. 4: 2 (1975).
- Gordon, A. D. "A Bit of Observation." In The Writings of Aharon David Gordon, 2 vols. Edited by S. H. Bergman and A. L. Shochat. Tel Aviv: HaSifriya HaTzionit, 1952.
- . Selected Essays. Edited and translated by F. Burnce. New York: League for Labor Palestine, 1973.
- Goren, Arthur A. Dissenters in Zion: From the Writings of Judah L. Magnes. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.
- Ha'am, Ahad. "The Jewish State and the Jewish Problem." In Nationalism and the Jewish Ethic. Edited by Hans Kohn. New York: Schocken Books, 1962.
- Hattis, Susan Lee. The Bi-national Idea in Palestine during Mandatory Times. Jerusalem: Shkmona Publishing Company, 1970.
- Hermann, Tamar. "The Bi-national Idea in Israel/Palestine: Past and Present." Nations and Nationalism. 11:3 (2005).
- Judt, Tony. "Israel: The Alternative." New York Review of Books. 23 October 2003.
- Kohn, Hans. Western Civilization in the Near East. Manchester, NH: Ayer Company Publishers, 1937.
- . "Zion and the Jewish National Idea." Menorah Journal. (Autumn–Winter 1958).
- Loewe, Raphael, ed. Studies in Nationalism, Judaism and Universalism. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1966.
- Nimni, Ephraim, ed. The Challenge of Post-Zionism: Alternatives to Israeli Fundamentalist Politics. London and New York: Zed Books, 2003.
- Scholem, Gershom Gerhard, Anson Rabinbach, Gary Smith (translator), and Andre LeFevre (translator). The Correspondence of Walter Benjamin and Gershom Scholem, 1932–1940, 2nd ed. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Scholem, Gershom Gerhard, and Paul Mendes-Flohr, eds. Gershom Scholem: The Man and His Work. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.
- Shafir, Gershon. Land, Labor and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882–1914. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Smilansky, Moshe. The Jewish Colonization and the Arab Farmer. Jerusalem: Am Oved, 1947.
- . The Land's Redemptors. Jerusalem: KKL–Jewish National Foundation, 1947.
- . The Path to Redemption. Jerusalem: KKL–Jewish National Foundation, 1944.
- Sternhell, Zeev. The Founding Myths of Israel: Nationalism, Socialism, and the Making of the Jewish State. Translated by David Maisel. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.
- Stone, I. F. "The Other Zionism." In Underground to Palestine and Reflections Thirty Years Later. New York: Hutchinson, 1978.
- Wigoder, Geoffrey, and Fern Seckbach. Encyclopaedia Judaica: The Most Comprehensive Authoritative Source on the Jewish World. Boston: Brill Academic Publishers, 1999.

Peace Bloc

See GUSH SHALOM

Peace Movement

See ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT

Peace Now

Peace Now is the largest extra-parliamentary movement in Israel, the country's oldest peace movement, and the only peace group to have a broad public base. It describes itself as "Israeli pacifists for Palestinian self-determination within the 1967 borders." The movement was founded in 1978 during the Israeli-Egyptian peace talks. At a moment when these talks appeared to be collapsing, a group of 348 reserve officers and soldiers from Israeli army combat units published an open letter to the prime minister of Israel calling upon the government to make sure this opportunity for peace was not lost. Tens of thousands of Israelis sent in support for the letter, and the movement was born.

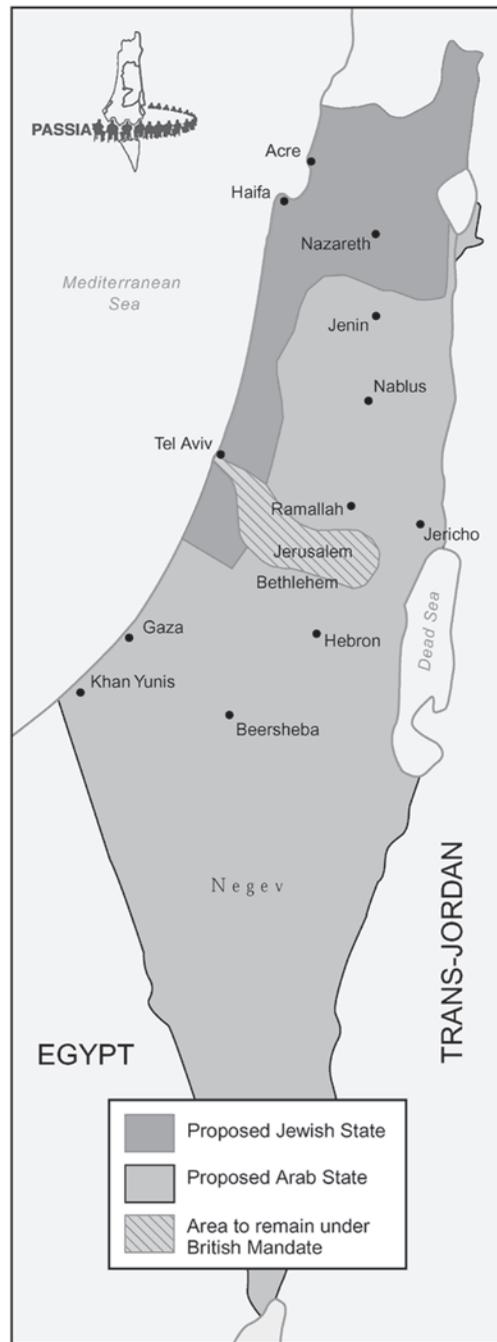

The basic principles of the movement from the outset were the right of Israel to live within secure BORDERS and the right of their neighbors to do the same, including the right of Palestinians to self-determination. In time the movement became convinced that the only viable solution to the conflict was the creation of a Palestinian state in the territories adjacent to Israel, which were occupied as a result of the 1967 WAR. In 1988, upon PLO acceptance of UN RESOLUTION 242 and the principle of the TWO-STATE SOLUTION, Peace Now led a massive demonstration of 100,000 persons calling on the government to negotiate with the PLO. Fully supporting the breakthrough represented by the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS, Peace Now supported all steps promising to promote a resolution to the conflict until the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. The most important continuous project of Peace Now is its "Settlement Watch," which carefully monitors the building of settlements, including housing tenders, expropriation of lands, budget allocations, new outposts, and all else related to settlement expansion. It publishes detailed reports with statistics and analysis available on its website. <http://www.peacenow.org.il>.

See also ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT

Peel Commission, 1937

The Peel Commission, also known as the Palestine Royal Commission, was a British Royal Commission sent to Palestine in the wake of the 1936 ARAB REVOLT. Despite the recommendations of prior British fact-finding commissions to limit Jewish IMMIGRATION and LAND purchases, including the 1929 HOPE-SIMPSON COMMISSION, the 1930 SHAW COMMISSION, and the 1930 PASSFIELD WHITE PAPER, Jewish immigration nevertheless continued to increase, land purchases escalated, and the Jewish community in Palestine successfully created statelike institutions (hospitals, universities, a military, agricultural communes, and a quasi-government in the JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL). Thus, by 1936, Palestinian frustration, resentment, and anger had reached the boiling point. Moreover, the British had been duplicitous in their dealings with the Palestinians, and few any longer believed they would achieve their right to self-determination under the BRITISH MANDATE.

The situation in Palestine had been tense for several years before the Arab Revolt erupted. In October 1933, nationwide strikes and demonstrations against ZIONISM and British targets were met with force, leaving at least twelve Palestinians dead and fueling outrage at Britain's strong-arm tactics. By 1936, seven years after the Hope-Simpson Commission, the Jewish population had risen by more than 150 percent, an additional sixty-two Jewish settlements had been created, and nearly 1.5 million dunums (370,000 acres) of Palestinian land was the property of the Zionists. In mid-April 1936, a series of Arab-Jewish clashes in the JAFFA area provided the revolt's trigger, as Palestinian national committees sprang up across the country in support of a call for a general strike issued by the Palestinian leadership, the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE. The British banned the Arab Committee soon after, but, despite the arrest of its leaders and the nationwide imposition of CURFEWS, the uprising surged, and from April until October 1936 the Arab Revolt swept Mandate Palestine. The extent of the revolt and its support throughout the region worried the British, who requisitioned additional troops in September to suppress the uprising. Regional Arab leaders, fearing domestic instability and under pressure from their British benefactor, eventually provided the necessary mediation to bring about a lull in the uprising, while Britain dispatched the Peel Commission to investigate.

Map 34. Peel Commission Partition Plan, 1937

Arriving in November 1936, the Peel Commission, headed by Lord Peel, set out to assess the feasibility and future of the Mandate. Published in July 1937, the Peel Commission's report concluded that "the Mandate for Palestine should terminate and be replaced by a Treaty System." The proposed treaty envisioned a partition of Palestine, with JERUSALEM and BETHLEHEM retained under a separate British Mandate that would extend to the port at Jaffa. The part allotted the Palestinians was to be united with Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950), and on the land that was to go to the Jewish state, the Palestinians would be compelled to leave and the Jews would be required to pay a subsidy for the Palestinians' loss. With its twin premises of partition and population TRANSFER, the Peel Plan became the point of reference for most future schemes to solve the Palestine question.

The Palestinians flatly rejected the notion of a Zionist state on nearly 33 percent of Palestine and the dispossession of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians, which the plan would entail. The Zionist leadership accepted in principle but rejected in detail the Peel partition plan; it was encouraged by the legitimization the plan granted its program but was not content with the amount of land offered. VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY's Revisionist Zionist movement rejected the idea outright and by September 1937 had commenced a violent campaign against the Palestinians and the British, marking the resumption of violence and the resurgence of the Arab Revolt.

Bibliography

- Caplan Neil. Futile Diplomacy: Arab-Zionist Negotiations and the End of the Mandate, vol. II. London: Frank Cass, 1986.
- Cohen, Michael Joseph. Palestine, Retreat from the Mandate: A Study of British Policy, 1936–45. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1978.
- Hope-Simpson, Sir John. Palestine: Report on Immigration, Land Settlement and Development. Presented by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to Parliament by Command of His Majesty, October 1930. Command Paper No. 3686. London: His Majesty's Stationery Office, 1930.
- Horowitz, Dan, and Moshe Lissak. Origins of the Israeli Polity: Palestine under the Mandate. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.
- Hurewitz, J. Diplomacy in the Near and Middle East: A Documentary Record. New York: Van Nostrand, 1956.
- Lesch, Anne M. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2000.
- Taylor, Alan R. Prelude to Israel: An Analysis of Zionist Diplomacy 1897–1947. New York: Philosophical Library, 1955.

Peled, General Mattityahu (1923–1995)

Mattityahu (Matti) Peled was an Israeli army major general, member of the Knesset, professor of Arabic literature, and founder of the ISRAELI COUNCIL ON ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN PEACE (ICIPP). Born in Palestine of parents who had immigrated from Eastern Europe, he started his political life as a "Canaanite," a group that sought cultural as well as political integration with the Arab world. However, Peled soon dropped out of the organization, and the group itself—with its ideal of creating "the New Hebrew Nation"—remained a marginal phenomenon.

Peled joined the PALMAH, the elite fighting force, in 1946, while still a pupil at a prestigious JERUSALEM high school. The same year, he went to London to study law, but his studies were cut short by the outbreak of the 1948 WAR between Israel and its Arab neighbors. He returned to Palestine; fought—with distinction—with the HAGANA, the underground military organization; and stayed on in the army through 1969. During Israel's 1956–1957 campaign against EGYPT, Peled was appointed governor of the GAZA STRIP. Prior to the 1967 WAR, Peled was among the generals who strongly pressured Prime Minister LEVI ESHKOL to undertake a preemptive strike against EGYPT, JORDAN, and SYRIA. Immediately following the war, however, he raised the idea of a bold peace initiative directed at the Palestinians, including the possibility of creating a Palestinian state, but found no support among his fellow generals or from then chief of staff YITZHAK RABIN.

When Peled left the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES in 1969, it was to pursue an academic career in Arab literature, and he served as chair of Tel Aviv University's Arab Language and Literature Department from 1974 to 1978. He entered politics in 1973, spent a short period on the left of the LABOR PARTY, and formed a brief partnership with SHULAMIT ALONI, a left-wing politician and Knesset member. During this time, possibilities developed for political dialogue between Israelis and Palestinians, and Peled soon became part of this clandestine endeavor. As the chief coordinator of the ICIPP (established in 1975), he had a key role in formalizing the dialogue within the framework of the ICIPP. Although the talks began as a series of secret meetings between PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) representative SA'ID HAMAMI and Israeli peace activist and writer URI AVNERY, they quickly expanded to involve more Israelis and Palestinians (continuing from 1976 through 1993), though all such meetings were illegal according to Israeli law.

Peled was one of the earliest advocates of a land-for-peace agreement with the Palestinians (i.e., Israeli withdrawal from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES in exchange for peace with Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and LEBANON and the establishment of a Palestinian state in the WEST BANK and Gaza Strip). In Paris in 1973, he met with Dr. ISAM SARTAWI, sent by PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT, and these two men—each a significant figure in his own camp, each a patriot convinced that he was acting in the true interest of his people—recognized each other as coequals and discovered that they could talk about the common problems of their peoples. It was the beginning of true friendship. Later, in 1976, Peled met with Arafat in Paris, and, in 1983, a second meeting took place. Peled briefed Prime Minister Rabin on his talks with the PLO leaders, which often contained direct messages for the Israeli leader, but while Rabin heard him out, he never consented to send a message in return. “That would be negotiating with the PLO, and I will never do that.” Both Sartawi (1983) and Hamami (1978) were assassinated by Palestinian extremists, and, while Peled did not suffer such a fate, he was subjected to death threats and public accusations of treason.

Peled returned to politics in 1977, founding the short-lived SHELLI (Peace & Equality for Israel) Party, whose platform focused on advocating peace negotiations with the Palestinians. Virtually the entire membership of the ICIPP joined the new party, but, although all members of Shelli were doves within the Israeli general political spectrum, there were considerable differences and many difficulties over political strategy and tactics. Peled remained a member of the Shelli executive for the whole of the party's six years of existence, though he never held public office on its behalf. He was implacable in his opposition to Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and in particular to the bombing of Beirut, which he considered a war crime, and said so in public. Peled supported the reserve soldiers who refused to take part in the LEBANON WAR, who were organized by the newly founded YESH G'VUL movement, some 200 of whom served terms in military prisons. Because of his illustrious military past, Peled's support for the “refusers” drew much public attention. However, some of his fellow members in the Shelli party regarded reserve service in Lebanon as the correct course, and Peled precipitated a split in the party.

In 1984, Peled was elected to the Knesset, on behalf of the newly formed PROGRESSIVE LIST FOR PEACE (PLP), which advocated an independent Palestinian state. Peled and Avnery were the Jewish founders of the PLP, together with their Arab partners Muhammad Mi'ari, a veteran political activist and human rights lawyer specializing in LAND confiscation cases, and the Reverend Riah Abu El-Assal, vicar of the Anglican Church in NAZARETH (later Anglican bishop of Jerusalem). The Israeli government and right-wing parties made several attempts to outlaw the PLP for its advocacy of a Palestinian state and prevent it from running in elections, which was the fate of earlier parties in which Mi'ari was involved, such as AL-ARD in 1965. However, the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT overturned these attempts. Thus, in the general elections that year, Mi'ari and Peled were elected to the Knesset. Peled's parliamentary term coincided with the outbreak of the First INTIFADA, and he soon gained a reputation as one of the most serious and industrious of Israel's parliamentarians.

Peled dedicated his last years to advancing a dialogue of mutual recognition and respect between Israelis and Palestinians and to research of Arabic literature. He was the first Israeli professor of Arabic literature who introduced studies of Palestinian literature into the academic curriculum. Peled published numerous political articles in ISRAELI MEDIA and international media and translated several pieces of Arabic literature into Hebrew. For what turned out to be his last work of translation, The Sages of Darkness by the Syrian-Kurdish writer Salim Barakat, Peled won the Translators' Association Prize in the early 1990s.

In 1993 Peled participated in the formation of GUSH SHALOM, the Israeli Peace Bloc, a grassroots peace movement in whose ranks Peled alternately expressed a sharp criticism of his old friend Rabin for severe human rights violations in the Occupied Territories; commended him for his dramatic rapprochement with the PLO and the handshake with Arafat on the White House lawn; and finally expressed great concern at the slow pace of the peace process and the continuing OCCUPATION, oppression, and SETTLEMENT activity.

Ill with liver cancer by 1994, Peled continued to write political commentary. His last essay, penned a few weeks before his death and published in The Other Israel, was entitled "Requiem to Oslo." It expressed immense disappointment with the OSLO PROCESS and predicted the explosion that was to break out with the Second Intifada in 2000.

Bibliography

- Avnery, Uri. My Friend, the Enemy. Chicago: Lawrence Hill, 1987.
- Peled, Mattityahu. "The Chances for Peace: An Interview with General Peled." New York Review of Books. 23 February 1978.
- . "The Gulf Crisis: An Israeli View: An Interview with Mattityahu Peled." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:2 (1991).
- . "Israel and the PLO: A Way out of the Impasse." New York Review of Books. 15 May 1975.
- . "The Palestinian Position: An Exchange." New York Review of Books. 6 March 1980.
- . Religion, My Own: The Literary Works of Najib Mahfuz. Raritan, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 1983.
- Preuss, Teddy, Uri Avnery, Walid Khalidi, Inge Hoffmann, Joyce Blau, Alain Gresh, Joseph Hazan, Haim Hanegbi, Haim Baram, Yosi Amital, and Lutfi el-Kholi. A Collection of Articles about Matti Peled. Jerusalem: The Other Israel, 1995.

The People's Voice

See NUSEIBEH-AYALON AGREEMENT, 2002

Peres, Shimon (1923–)

Shimon Peres is an Israeli politician who served as the prime minister of Israel from 1984 to 1986 and again from 1995 to 1996 and served twice as the head of the LABOR PARTY. On 13 June 2007 he was elected president of Israel, a largely symbolic position, for a seven-year term beginning in July. The eighty-three-year-old Peres was the ninth president of Israel. Peres was foreign affairs minister of Israel from 2001 to 2002 and became vice premier in a coalition under ARIEL SHARON at the start of 2005. In 1994, Peres won the Nobel Peace Prize, together with former prime minister YITZHAK RABIN and PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman YASIR ARAFAT, for their efforts toward peace, which culminated in the OSLO ACCORDS. Peres is one of Israel's most durable politicians and is currently the longest-serving member of the Knesset.

Peres was born in Wieniawa, Poland (now Vishniev in Belarus), and immigrated to Palestine with his parents in 1934. He was educated at the agricultural school of Ben Shemen. In 1947 he was conscripted into the HAGANA, the Jewish underground military organization, and was given responsibility for personnel and arms purchases. In 1952 he was appointed deputy director-general of the Ministry of Defense, and in 1953 he became its director-general, through which he was involved in procuring weapons for Israel, acquiring from FRANCE the advanced Dassault Mirage III jet fighter and a nuclear reactor.

In 1959 Peres was elected to the Knesset as a member of MAPAI, the Israel Workers' Party. From 1959 to 1965 he served as deputy defense minister until he was implicated, with Defense Minister MOSHE DAYAN, in the failed Israeli covert operation that became known as the LAVON AFFAIR. Peres and Dayan left Mapai with DAVID BEN-GURION, Israel's founder and first prime minister, to form a new party, RAFI, which reconciled with Mapai in 1968 (without Ben-Gurion), resulting in the formation of the Labor Alignment.

In 1969 Peres was appointed minister of absorption, responsible for IMMIGRATION and settlement in Israel, and in 1970 he became the minister of transportation and communications. In 1974, after a period as information minister, he was appointed minister of defense in the Rabin government. Peres had been Rabin's chief rival for the post of prime minister after GOLDA MEIR resigned in 1974, and he continued to challenge Rabin for the leadership of the party. While again narrowly defeated in 1977, he succeeded Rabin as Labor leader when Rabin resigned after his wife Leah was found to have maintained bank accounts abroad in violation of then-existing Israeli currency regulations.

Subsequently, Peres led the Labor Party to its first ever electoral defeat in 1977, which was repeated in 1981. However, it won more seats than any other party in 1984, and Peres became prime minister at the head of a national unity government composed of Labor, LIKUD, and several minor parties. After leaving the premiership in 1986, he became foreign minister the same year and finance minister in 1988. For a time, Peres hoped that King Husayn of JORDAN could be Israel's Arab negotiating partner rather than Arafat. He met secretly with Husayn in London in 1987 and reached an agreement with him (HUSAYN-PERES AGREEMENT), but this was rejected by Israel's prime minister YITZHAK SHAMIR. Shortly afterward, the First INTIFADA erupted in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, and whatever plausibility King Husayn had as a potential Israeli partner in resolving the fate of the West Bank evaporated. Subsequently, Peres gradually moved closer to support for talks with the PLO, although he avoided making an outright commitment to this policy until 1993.

Peres and the Labor Party finally left the government in 1990 after making a failed bid to form a narrow government based on a coalition of Labor, small leftist groupings, and HAREDI parties. In the National Unity government (1988–1990), Peres served as vice premier and minister of finance. From 1990 to 1992, he led the opposition in the Knesset. In early 1992, branded as a hopeless loser, Peres was defeated by Rabin in the first primary elections in the history of the Labor Party. However, Peres remained active in politics, serving as Rabin's foreign minister from 1992 and briefly succeeding him after his assassination in 1995. In the first direct elections for prime minister in Israel's history, in 1996, Peres was defeated by Likud leader BENJAMIN NETANYAHU. In 1997, he did not seek reelection as Labor Party leader and was replaced by EHUD BARAK, who rebuffed Peres's attempt to secure the position of party president and, upon forming a government in 1999, appointed Peres to the minor post of minister for regional development.

However, after the defeat of Barak by Ariel Sharon in the 2001 election, Peres made yet another comeback. He led Labor into a national unity government with Sharon's Likud Party and secured the post of foreign minister. The formal leadership of the party passed to Benjamin Ben-Eliezer and later to HAIFA mayor General Amram Mitzna. On 13 June 2007 Peres was elected president of the State of Israel by the Knesset. Peres was much criticized on the left for remaining in his position as foreign minister in a government that was not seen as advancing the peace process, despite his own declared liberal stance. He left office only when Labor resigned in advance of the 2003 elections. Subsequent to Labor's crushing defeat under Mitzna, Peres again emerged as interim leader. He led the party in a coalition with Sharon once more, at the end of 2004, when the latter's support of ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA presented a diplomatic program Labor could support.

As a protégé of Ben-Gurion and Dayan and an early supporter of the WEST BANK settlers during the 1970s, Peres was at one time considered something of a hawk. However, after becoming the leader of his party, his stance evolved, and since the 1990s, he has been seen as a leftist and a strong supporter of the notion of peace through economic cooperation. During the 1970s and early 1980s, he was opposed to talks with the PLO, but he later distanced himself from the Jewish settlers and spoke of the need for "territorial compromise" over the West Bank and GAZA STRIP.

Peres was perhaps more closely associated with the Oslo Accords than any other Israeli politician (Rabin included), with the possible exception of his own protégé, YOSSI BEILIN. He has remained a supporter of the Oslo Accords and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY since its inception in 1993, despite the AL-AQSA INTIFADA of September 2000. However, Peres also supported Sharon's military policy of using the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES offensively against the Palestinians. Whatever Peres's image internationally, within Israel he tends to be viewed by friends and foes as a ruthless and opportunistic wheeler-dealer.

Bibliography

- Cohen, Avner. "Peres: Peacemaker, Nuclear Pioneer." Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 52:3 (1996).
 Golan, Matti. Road to Peace: A Biography of Shimon Peres. New York: Warner Books, 1989.

- Keren, Michael. Professionals against Populism: The Peres Government and Democracy. New York: State University of New York Press, 1995.
- Peres, Shimon. Battling for Peace: A Memoir. New York: Random House, 1995.
- . David's Sling, The Arming of Israel. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1970.
- . The New Middle East. New York: Henry Holt, 1995.

Permits

Of all the elements in Israel's control of the Palestinians in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, none is more all-encompassing or more effective than the permit system. Permits regulate Palestinian employment, access to medical care, attainability of EDUCATION, where they can worship, and their ability to travel—abroad, between the GAZA STRIP and the WEST BANK, and within the West Bank, as well as to JERUSALEM. The permit system adversely affects the entire Palestinian ECONOMY by regulating Palestinians' ability to build or enlarge a home, determining what goods they can export or import, developing their municipalities, tending their fields, digging or repairing a well, and living in their village of origin. It even determines the ability of families to live together as married couples with their children. So comprehensive is this “matrix of control,” as Israeli academic Jeff Halper has termed it, that the permit system allows Israel to control 2.3 million people in the West Bank (and until 2005, 1.5 million Gazans). The principal question underlying this system is why any human being should need a permit to travel to see a doctor, visit relatives in the next town, attend university, move from his or her place of residence to another, or perform any other routine modern human activity.

History and Mechanics of the Permit System

From 1967 to 1991, restrictions on the movement of Palestinians were relatively light. However, with the beginning of the First INTIFADA in 1987, Israel increasingly restricted Palestinians' freedom of movement by implementing a permit system, and in 1988, Israel began preventing Palestinians from traveling between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. With the start of the GULF WAR in 1991, the Israeli military implemented further restrictions in the permit system. Every Palestinian was required to obtain an individual permit, in contrast to the general permits that had previously applied to the population as a whole. In the Gaza Strip, Israel imposed a magnetic-card system whereby only those with such a card were allowed to leave the Strip. In the West Bank, green, rather than orange, IDENTITY CARDS were issued to Palestinians whom Israel prohibited from leaving the Occupied Territories.

In 1993, Israel imposed an overall CLOSURE on the Occupied Territories “until further notice,” and to enforce the closure, Israeli military CHECKPOINTS were established along the 1949 armistice line (Green Line) between the West Bank and Israel, between the West Bank and East Jerusalem, and between cities within the West Bank. Permits to move among the three areas were granted sparingly and according to criteria unknown to Palestinians. One had to receive a special permit to enter East Jerusalem and very few were granted. The OSLO ACCORDS and the geopolitical changes that followed had almost no effect on these restrictions, which, together with other factors, seriously eroded Palestinian confidence in the peace process. From the beginning of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000, the Israeli military increasingly restricted Palestinians from moving freely. From 2002 through the time of this writing (summer 2009), almost no permits have been issued or renewed, closure policies have substantially tightened, and the entry of Palestinian workers into Israel has dramatically decreased. The perfection of the permit system over the years led Amira Hass to comment that Israel “is fragmenting not only Palestinian territory, but the Palestinian population into categories which are characterized by their accessibility to the privilege of freedom of movement.”

Revocation of the general exit permit in 1991 marked the beginning of the permanent CLOSURE policy, which reached its apex in 1993. Subsequently, total closures became a regular Israeli policy instrument, and with the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada Israel imposed a comprehensive closure on the Occupied Territories. The severity of the closures changed depending on circumstances. For example, after Palestinian violence against Israelis, the authorities imposed a total closure, during which no exit permits were granted (except in very exceptional cases). A total closure is also always imposed on the Occupied Territories during Israeli holidays. At times, Israel also imposed an internal closure on specific towns or villages in the West Bank, often after some act of Palestinian resistance or protest. In 2002 the Israeli army began tightening its grip on movement of Palestinians in cities and towns within the West Bank by insisting that they obtain new freedom-of-movement permits from the regional administration to travel from one city to another. One result of this new internal permit system and accompanying measures has been to divide the West Bank into eight population regions, effectively isolating each from the others, with traffic and movement control exercised by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES. The eight regions are JENIN, NABLUS, Tul Karm, Qalqilya, Ramallah, JERICHO, BETHLEHEM, and HEBRON. East Jerusalem, once the economic heart of the West Bank, annexed by Israel and cut off from the rest of the West Bank, can be added as a ninth sealed-off enclave. In the Gaza Strip, which was split in two, the 200,000 residents of Rafah were required to obtain permits to move to the northern part of the Strip including Gaza City.

Traditionally, there had been regular traffic between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank with Israel, which was due to the extensive family ties between residents of the occupied areas and Palestinian citizens and residents of Israel. In 2001 it became illegal for Israeli citizens to travel to Area A (areas under full Palestinian control) in the West Bank or to enter the areas of Gaza controlled by the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, affecting the ability of Palestinian-Israeli citizens to unite with their families. By the end of the year, the ability of Israelis to obtain permits to enter Gaza fell by 98 percent, thus Tel Aviv made it almost impossible for couples, one of whom was Israeli and the other a resident of Gaza, to live together under one roof, and consequently for their children to live with both parents. Israel generally suspends the permits of Israeli Arabs to enter Gaza following Palestinian attacks or during extensive military operations. The vast majority of those holding such permits, which are suspended in a wholesale manner with no notice of the decision or how long it will be in effect, are women with Israeli citizenship or residency who are married to Gazans. During such periods, women who left Gaza for a brief visit in Israel are unable to return to their homes, husbands, and children. In January 2002, Israel decided to shorten the period of the entry permits for divided families—from three months to one month. Thus women who wished to obey the law had to travel to the ERETZ CROSSING between Israel and Gaza twelve times a year to renew their permits. Owing to harsh conditions and poverty, many women failed to reach Eretz to renew their permits on time. When they later tried to get new permits, their applications were rejected on the grounds that they had “stayed illegally in the territory of the Palestinian National Authority.”

The institution that controls the permits and thus every aspect of Palestinian existence is a massive bureaucratic edifice known as the CIVIL ADMINISTRATION, or the District Coordination and Liaison Administration Offices. Its Subcommittee for Supervision of the Supreme Planning Council specializes in providing or withholding permits and issuing demolition orders for Palestinian houses and stop-work orders for construction projects, decisions that are ultimately made by the General Security Services (GSS, Shabak, SHIN BET). Decisions by the GSS are confidential and often arbitrary. The Shin Bet frequently attempts to recruit COLLABORATORS as the basis for granting a permit. It is estimated that hundreds of thousands of Palestinians, mostly men, are blacklisted by the GSS for alleged political activity against the Occupation and cannot get a magnetic card, which is a necessary, though not solely sufficient, condition to get a permit of any kind. Those who are rejected often make appeals to a court or hire a lawyer, which ironically often brings about a positive decision, thus exposing the arbitrariness of their previous rejections. The authority to issue permits is exclusively in Israeli hands. Applicants wait for hours on end, are treated like cattle, and are humiliated by Israeli soldiers. A permit is issued—or, more often, not issued—by a confidential, unaccounted-for decision by the GSS. If issued, a permit can be valid for a few days or for a month, or just for a single day from sunrise to sunset, and all permits have to be renewed regularly.

When Israel institutes a new permit regulation or tightens its closure policy, residents do not receive any formal notification, discovering the change only when they show up at checkpoints and are ordered by soldiers to go to a civil administration building and bring a new or revised permit that will allow them to leave or enter whatever city or town they are facing.

Permits for Building, Work, Driving, and Goods

Since the beginning of the Occupation, Israel has employed in the West Bank a policy of planning, development, and building that severely restricts construction by Palestinians. All construction requires a permit from the Israeli authorities, which grants very few. Obtaining a building permit is a prolonged, complicated, and expensive procedure, which generally results in denial of the application. In this situation and with no other option, many Palestinians who need to provide housing for their families build without a permit. In response, Israel has adopted a policy of mass HOUSE DEMOLITIONS of Palestinian homes—ostensibly because they are illegal. During the 1990s, the authorities demolished more than 3,000 residences, leaving more than 18,000 Palestinians homeless.

To obtain a permit to work in Israel, Palestinians have to pass certain conditions established for “security reasons.” However, Israel also places quotas on the number of permits it issues to those who pass the security checks. These quotas are set by the political echelon, for economic reasons of supply and demand unrelated to security. Throughout the years of the Oslo Accords (1993–2000), the number of workers who were able to obtain work permits declined precipitously, resulting in a severe economic crisis in the Occupied Territories by 1997.

Individual drivers, as well as taxi, truck, and other drivers, must have permits to get from one area to another (these are different from driver’s licenses, which are also required). Many areas have only one entrance or exit that can be crossed only after receiving the proper freedom-of-movement permit. Israeli authorities claim that the permits were intended to ease the lives of Palestinians because they would reduce the need for closures and SIEGES. As of 2008, however, there has been no reduction in closures and sieges.

Under the system implemented in 2002, goods require a permit to enter or leave the Occupied Territories or to be transported within the territories, and Israel strictly regulates what can be imported (e.g., in Gaza, cooking gas, industrial diesel fuel, cement, and 20 percent of UNRWA’s humanitarian supplies, among most other goods, are prohibited) or exported (e.g., in both the West Bank and Gaza, textiles and agricultural products, among other items, cannot be exported). Even when goods are permitted they can only be moved through a “back-to-back system” in which a truck goes to a certain location where goods are unloaded to another waiting truck, which then carries the merchandise further. Both truck drivers must have valid permits as well. The list of prohibited goods is so extensive and the permits so few, both the agricultural and commercial sectors have been devastated. The new system contributed significantly to the increased economic disintegration Palestinians experienced.

Intifada and the Barrier

In September 2000, with the eruption of the al-Aqsa Intifada, Israel initiated a policy of refusing most requests for permits for everything—including work, travel, or movement within the territories.

In 2002, Israel began construction of a BARRIER wall, most of which lies outside the Green Line in West Bank territory, to separate Palestinians and Israelis. The Barrier leaves some entire Palestinian villages on the Israeli side of the wall, but more often it severs villages from their farmland, with the agricultural land on the Israeli side and the village in the West Bank. In October 2003, Israel implemented a permit system in the enclaves it created between the Barrier and the Green Line. Palestinians living in these village enclaves must have a permit to cross a gate in the wall to reach and work their land, but obtaining such a permit is difficult. B’Tselem, the Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, reported that during the first six months of the enclave permit regime, the Civil Administration rejected some 25 percent of the permit requests in the Tulkarm-Qalqilya area alone.

The Israeli military has ordered thousands of Palestinians living near the steel and concrete Barrier in the West Bank to obtain special permits to live in their homes. Any Palestinian who lives in the area is defined by a new category of “long-term resident,” and everyone over the age of twelve is required to obtain a permit to live in his or her own home and travel beyond his or her village. The order immediately affected about 12,000 Palestinians in fifteen villages squeezed between the Green Line and Barrier, and within months another 40,000 or more were in a similar position once construction of the fence was completed around the north of Jerusalem. The number has grown exponentially since.

In an arc around much of Jayyous, a village in the West Bank near Qalqilya, the Barrier caused 70 percent of the villagers’ farmland—and all their irrigated land—to end up on the western (Israeli) side. There are gates for Jayyous’s farmers to access their land, but Israel has made the ability to do so steadily more difficult. On 2 October 2002, the Israeli West Bank military commander declared the area between the Green Line and Barrier—Jayyous’s farmlands—a CLOSED MILITARY ZONE. The Israelis call this area the “seam zone,” and the rules require that no Palestinian can enter the seam zone without a permit issued by Israel. Although permits have since been given to children, old men and women, and Jayyousians who currently live outside the country, no permits were given to any of the farmers who had participated in Jayyous's campaign of nonviolent protests against the Barrier in the preceding year or to anyone who had a family member seized by Israel's security forces. Only 30 percent of the farmers who needed them were able to obtain permits, and they were issued for only two months. Many farmers went to the Occupation authorities to try to obtain permits to work their land, and some hired Israeli lawyers to help. The answers were always the same: "Permit denied," with no explanation given. It should be noted that the permits that were issued contained seven numbered items, the most salient of which is number 6: "This permit does not prove your ownership of the land, or if you have a house there, this permit does not prove you are the owner of the house." This naturally caused great anxiety. Additionally, many shepherds cannot graze their sheep because they cannot obtain a permit to access their land.

When the villagers' permits expired in January 2003, even fewer farmers were given new ones, and Israel delivered a set of new rules for permits. Farmers must now provide pictures for the magnetic permits and declare that they will not rent their lands and that they own the land directly and work it themselves. (It is a common practice for the farmers to rent land and hire additional workers.) If their names do not match those on the title deeds, they have to prove in Israeli court that it is their land, and the mayor's office must certify they own the land and work on it and how much land they have. After all these conditions are fulfilled, Israel then requires that all back taxes on the land be paid. The Jayyousians stopped paying their taxes in 1995, when the village came under the jurisdiction of the Palestinian National Authority, which did not compel the farmers to pay. Now they are required to come up with nine years of back taxes, which few farmers can afford.

The permit system is a policy in the name of security that forces many people to leave their own land and their own homes if they want to conduct a decent life. But it is not only the robbery of land, the demolished houses, the inability to engage in commerce, and the RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT; the permit system has also appropriated Palestinian time. Amira Hass writes in this regard, "Palestinians' time has been robbed in the last thirteen years, because they have to wait for a permit and they don't get it, then they have to wait again. Then they waste time waiting at the checkpoint, then they waste time in submitting another request for a permit, then they waste time trying to go through all kinds of small, dangerous bypass ROADS. And time is a means of production. Time is so precious for one's development, internal development, community development, and this has been taken by the permit system. Consider that time is even more precious than land. It is possible that land will be given back, but lost time will never be returned." During the OCCUPATION Israel has used time, space, and force as major controlling mechanisms to sustain hegemony over the Palestinian population.

See also OCCUPATION; RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT I and II

Bibliography

- Bencivenga, Jim. "What's Behind Israeli Construction Permits?" Christian Science Monitor. 18 August 2004.
- Bloom, David. "Letter from Jayyous." The Nation. 18 February 2004. www.thenation.com/doc/20040308/bloom.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). 11,400 Palestinians Need Permits to Live in Their Homes. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2003.
- . Case Study: The Zufin Settlement, the Barrier, and Jayyus. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2005.
- . Closure. 2004. www.btselem.org/English/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Closure.asp.
- . Economy. 2004. www.btselem.org/English/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Economy.asp.
- . Forbidden Roads: The Discriminatory West Bank Road Regime. Information Sheet: Roads. 2004. www.btselem.org/English/Publications/Summaries/200408\_Forbidden\_Roads.asp.
- . Permit System to Cross Separation Barrier Is Racist. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2004.
- . Planning and Building. 2004. www.btselem.org/English/Planning\_and\_Building/Index.asp.
- Diamond, Eitan. Crossing the Line: Violations of the Rights of Palestinians in Israel without a Permit. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2007.
- Gradstein, Linda. "Israel Limits West Bank Residency Permits." National Public Radio. 17 September 2006. www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=6091997.
- HaCohen, Ran. "The Permit System: The Quiet Occupation. Part II." Antiwar.com. 26 October 2005. www.antiwar.com/hacohen/?articleid=7762.
- Hanieh, Adam. "Israel's Clampdown Masks System of Control." Middle East Report Online. 14 February 2003. www.merip.org/mero/mero021403.html.
- Hass, Amira. "Has the Transfer of Enclaves Begun?" Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 26 February 2004.
- . Interview: Conversations with History. Interviewed by Henry Kreisler. Berkeley: University of California

- Institute of International Studies, 24 October 2003. <http://globetrotter.berkeley.edu/people3/Hass/hass-con3.html>.
- . “Israel Forces Internal Movement Permit on Palestinians.” Ha’aretz. 19 May 2002.
- . “The Mirror Doesn’t Lie.” Ha’aretz. 1 November 2000.
- . “Oslo All Over Again: It’s Not the State, It’s the Liberation.” Ha’aretz. 3 March 2005.
- . “Palestinians Also Sleep in the Day.” Ha’aretz. 31 March 2005.
- McGreal, Chris. “Israel Excludes Palestinians from Fertile Valley: Permit System Seen as Bid to Annex West Bank Land.” The Guardian (London). 14 February 2006.
- . “Permits Ordered for Palestinians.” The Guardian (London). 27 October 2003.
- Palestine Monitor*. “Movement Restrictions.” Palestine Monitor. n.d. www.palestinemonitor.org/spip/IMG/.../Movement\_Restrictions.pdf.
- Rubinstein, Danny. “Shabah, Permits and Manhunts in the Streets of Jerusalem.” Ha’aretz. 12 October 2003. Reprinted in the Journal of Palestine Studies. 33:2 (Winter 2004).
- Tarabay, Jamie. “Israeli Restrictions Limit Travel by Palestinians.” Associated Press. 25 May 2002.
- Taraki, Lisa. “Permits from Hell: What Happens at Israeli Checkpoints in Occupied Palestine?” Al-Ahram Weekly (Cairo). 26 July 2003.

Phalange

Phalange is the political party and the militia (Al Kata'eb) of the Maronite Christian Gemayel clan/family in LEBANON. Founded in 1936 by Pierre Gemayel, it remains the Gemayels' most important instrument to obtain and hold power in Lebanon. The Phalange has a historic relationship of quiet diplomacy with Israel dating to the days of DAVID BEN-GURION, Israel's founder and first prime minister. When, in 1975, civil war broke out in Lebanon, the leaders of the Christians—specifically the Gemayel and Chamoun families—asked Israel for military aid. The government of Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN responded positively, and, via the MOSSAD, the Israeli intelligence agency, Israel began to provide weapons to the Phalange. Israel's strategy in the 1982 LEBANON WAR was deeply dependent on the cooperation of the Gemayel clan, but Tel Aviv felt it failed to deliver. In the aftermath of the war it refused to agree to a peace treaty with Israel and pursued a more independent policy in the following years. The Phalange was directly responsible for the SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE.

Bibliography

- Fisk, Robert. Pity the Nation: Lebanon at War. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Robach, Livia. Israel's Sacred Terrorism: A Study Based on Moshe Sharett's Personal Diary and Other Documents, 3rd ed. Boston: AAUG Press, 1985.

Philadelphia Route

The Philadelphia Route is a narrow swath of land variously 50 to 100 meters (164 to 328 feet) wide that runs the length of the southern GAZA STRIP—Egyptian border between Palestinian Rafah and Egyptian Rafah. In the 1979 Israel-Egypt peace treaty, control was given exclusively to Israel. Under the OSLO ACCORDS, Israel retained sole control of the route in cooperation with EGYPT. After ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in 2005, Israel handed over nominal control of the Philadelphia Route to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in conjunction with the EUROPEAN UNION Border Assistance Mission Rafah, but Israel maintained ultimate control through its technology and military at the nearby Israeli town of Keren Shalom. Simultaneously, Tel Aviv secured Egypt's agreement to accept primary responsibility for providing security along the route. In March 2005 Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz and Egyptian president HOSNI MUBARAK reached a preliminary agreement for Egypt to provide security along the Philadelphia Route, including an Egyptian offer to deploy national guard personnel along its border. Mubarak insisted, however, that he would act only after Israel removed its troops from the buffer zone. Still, Israel was not entirely satisfied, delaying arrival at the final agreement until it received guarantees from Egypt that Cairo would not provide the PNA with weapons or ammunition. In August 2005, the two countries reached a new and final agreement.

The Israeli-Egyptian agreement is called “Agreed Arrangement in the Matter of Deployment of a Task Force of the Border Guards along the Length of Border in the Rafah Region.” Egypt was to deploy 750 border police to control the area from the Mediterranean coast all the way to the Negev border and Keren Shalom. To avoid conflicts with the Israel-Egypt peace treaty, the Egyptian forces are not permitted to bring tanks or antitank weapons, or to construct permanent military infrastructure. Its soldiers may only carry light arms and rocket-propelled grenade launchers and use police-style personnel carriers. Egypt is also permitted to construct “unfortified” observation posts. Israel began its withdrawal in mid-August 2005, completing the operation on 12 September, and the Egyptians deployed border police in September.

Tel Aviv considers the area of vital security interest: Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON declared after Egypt assumed control that Israel’s policy would be to “continue to maintain military presence along the border between the Gaza Strip and Egypt. This presence is an essential security requirement. The physical widening of the route where the military activity will take place may be necessary in certain areas.” One purpose of the Philadelphi Route was to prevent the movement of illegal materials (including weapons, ammunition, and illegal drugs) and militants between Egypt and the Gaza Strip. Palestinians, in cooperation with some Egyptians, have built tunnels under the Philadelphi Route to move food, medicine, fuel, as well as some illegal materials. Most of the tunnels are based in both sides of Rafah. From the outset of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) began operating against the tunnels, repeatedly bombing them, destroying hundreds of Palestinian houses in Rafah (which it claimed housed one end of a tunnel), and establishing a fortification system that includes a steel anti-sniper wall and armored outposts.

By April 2004, IDF forces discovered and destroyed more than ninety tunnels. Alleging that Palestinians were smuggling arms through tunnels along the Philadelphi Route, Israel undertook an offensive in these areas in May 2004 known as OPERATION RAINBOW. The campaign’s efforts were focused in the Rafah Refugee Camp, especially on neighborhoods close to the Route. According to Human Rights Watch (HRW), the IDF used the tunnels as a pretext to create a depopulated “buffer zone” along the Gaza-Egypt border, resulting in the destruction of 1,600 homes and the razing of at least 700 dunums (175 acres) of agricultural land by September 2004. In a report on HOUSE DEMOLITIONS in Rafah, HRW argues that the IDF should have been able to detect and neutralize tunnels at the point where they cross underneath the border using technologies proven at the Korean demilitarized zone and the US-Mexico border.

In June 2006, Israel opened a new military campaign in Gaza—OPERATION SUMMER RAINS—to free an abducted soldier and stop Qassam rocket fire. The invasion began with Israeli fighter planes carrying out air strikes on Gazan bridges, its power plant, and other INFRASTRUCTURE, followed by ground troops moving into the area east of Rafah. By the end of August the carnage continued unabated, while SHIN BET chief Yuval Diskin told government ministers that the Philadelphi Route had been breached and that recently several tons of explosives and hundreds of weapons had entered Gaza via the route. Diskin further claimed that $1.5 million had been smuggled in through Rafah by the HAMAS Agriculture Ministry and that “terror experts” had also entered. The Shin Bet chief recommended reviewing all agreements on the passages, which he claimed “are ineffective in actuality under Egyptian monitoring.” In November Egypt deployed 5,000 additional troops to attempt to halt the smuggling that Israel alleged continued unabated, while several members of the Israeli cabinet argued for Israel to reoccupy the Philadelphi Route.

Following the Hamas coup in Gaza in June 2007, Israel declared that because the PNA was gone, there was no one to observe the Route. The EU Monitors left, the RAFAH CROSSING was closed, but the tunnels along the Philadelphi Route continued to function. They became even more important than before for transporting food, medicine, flour, and so on in the context of Israel’s total blockade around the Gaza Strip.

On 23 January 2008, Palestinian militants destroyed several parts of the wall dividing Gaza and Egypt in the town of Rafah and as many as 1.5 million Gazans flooded across the Philadelphi Route into Egypt, in search of food and supplies. Egyptian president Mubarak ordered his troops to allow the Palestinians in due to the humanitarian crisis, but to verify that they did not bring weapons back. The border remained open for five days, and Egypt estimated that Gazans spent some $250 million in Egypt’s northern Sinai town of al-Arish alone buying medicines, food, clothing, flour, cooking oil, cigarettes, biscuits, cheese, small generators, sheep, soap, Coca-Cola, gasoline, appliances, and other basics of existence that Israel’s boycott had kept out of Gaza.

On 12 January 2009, during OPERATION CAST LEAD, Reuters, citing anonymous Western diplomats, reported that the Israeli military was considering retaking the Philadelphi Route area in order to prevent Hamas from rearming.

See also RAFAH CROSSING

Bibliography

- Applied Research Institute-Jerusalem. Environmental Impact Assessment of the Planned Expansion of the Philadelphi Corridor at the Southern Border of the Gaza Strip. Jerusalem: ARIJ, 12 January 2005.
- Bahur-Nir, Diana. "Philadelphi Deal Struck." YNetnews.com. 24 August 2005.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). B'Tselem's Position on the IDF's Plan to Build a Trench along the Philadelphi Route. n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Razing/20050126\_Rafah\_Trench.asp.
- "Document: Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Four-Stage Disengagement Plan." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 18 July 2004.
- Forgione, Fabio. The "Rainbow" over Rafah: Thousand Palestinian Hopes under the Rubble. Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group. 2004. www.phrmg.org/the%20rainbow%20over%20rafah.htm.
- Harel, Amos. "Road-Tripping in the Strip." Ha'aretz. 30 May 2005.
- Jewish Virtual Library. "Egypt Agrees to Police Philadelphi Route after Israeli Disengagement." 2005. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourc/Peace/phild.html.
- Keinon, Herb. "Eitan, Yishai: Retake Philadelphi Route." Jerusalem Post. 22 October 2006.
- Marciano, Ilan. "Diskin: Gaza Could Become Lebanon." YNetnews.com. 20 August 2006.
- McGreal, Chris. "The Army Has Said It Will Not Allow Gaza to Become 'Hamasland.'" The Guardian (London). 26 May 2004.
- Pedatzur, Reuven. "The Philadelphi Route and the Next War." Ha'aretz. 15 September 2005.
- Regular, Arnon. "IDF Demolishes 20 More Palestinian Homes in Gaza." Ha'aretz. 31 May 2004.
- Reuters. "Israeli Military Is Considering Retaking the Philadelphi Route." Reuters. 12 January 2009.
- Rubin, Andrew. "We Are No Longer Able To." Al-Ahram. Cairo. English weekly. 7 July 2005. <http://www.globalpolicy.org/component/content/article/163/28669.html>.
- Stern, Yoav, Amos Harel, and Avi Issacharoff. "Egyptians Deploy 5,000 Troops near Philadelphi Route." Ha'aretz. 30 October 2006.
- Yehiav, Ayellet. "The Egyptians at Philadelphi: Regional Interests, Local Challenges." Strategic Assessment. 8:3 (2005).

Physicians for Human Rights—Israel

Physicians for Human Rights—Israel (PHR-Israel) was established in 1988 as a nonpartisan and non-profit organization dedicated to promoting and protecting the right to HEALTH CARE. A motivating factor for its founding was the worsening situation in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES with the outbreak of the First INTIFADA and the heightened need at that time for protection of human rights. It initially focused on issues of health in the Occupied Territories and the medical aspect of Israel's human rights violations, such as the participation of doctors in the practice of torture. Over the next few years, PHR-Israel widened the scope of its activities to a variety of other fields and the protection of groups suffering from systematic denial of their right to health, such as migrant workers. Additionally, concern for the rights of PRISONERS and detainees, both Israeli and Palestinian, was the basis for a project on health and on conditions for people in custody and provision of health care services for them.

In recent years PHR-Israel has further widened the scope of activities to deal with other marginalized groups, such as the BEDOUIN and the residents of the UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES (by Israel), as well as those who are socioeconomically deprived. It supplies individual and direct medical treatment to residents in the Occupied Territories through its Mobile Clinic and to prisoners and detainees through its volunteer physicians. Much of its effort is concentrated on bringing about changes in Israeli policy and ending systematic abuses of the right to health. PHR-Israel often utilizes legal means, such as appeals to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT, and engages in advocacy to raise public awareness. Throughout the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, PHR-Israel continued its cooperation with Palestinian medical and human rights organizations and provision of health services. (www.phr.org.il/phr).

Bibliography

- Horton, Richard. "Health in the Occupied Palestinian Territory." The Lancet. 373:9666. 4 March 2009.
- . "The Occupied Palestinian Territory: Peace, Justice, and Health." The Lancet. 373:9666. 4 March 2009.
- Mazali, Rela, Nogah Ofer, and Neve Gordon. Annual Report—1992: Focus on the Occupied Territories' Health-Care System. Tel Aviv: Physicians for Human Rights—Israel, 1993.
- Physicians for Human Rights—Israel. Emergency Gaza Update. Physicians for Human Rights—Israel. January 2009.
- . Five New MRI Machines Will Be Added [Israel]; Priority Will Be Given to Peripheral Areas. Tel Aviv: Physicians for Human Rights—Israel, 2008.
- Physicians for Human Rights—Israel, The Palestinian Center for Human Rights, Gisha—Legal Center for Freedom of Movement, and B'Tselem. Protest Violations of the Rights of Palestinian Patients. March 2009.

Physicians for Human Rights–Israel and Human Rights organizations. Decision to Stop Covering Palestinian's Medical Care in Israel. Joint position paper. Physicians for Human Rights–Israel. 8 March 2009.

Pilots' Letter

The “Pilots' Letter,” published on 24 September 2003 during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, was signed by twenty-seven Israeli reserve pilots and former pilots already exempt from reserve duty. In it they declared that they would refuse to fly missions that would endanger civilians in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP. The declaration was aimed at Israel's policy of TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS of activists of HAMAS, the ISLAMIC JIHAD, and the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES.

The impetus for most of the pilots was the bombing in 2002 of the home of Hamas leader Salah Shehade, which killed him and fourteen members of his family, mostly children. All agreed that the attack sowed the doubts that resulted a year later in their letter.

The signatories included Brigadier General (res.) Yiftah Spector and Yonatan Shapira, a former officer in a Black Hawk helicopter squadron who had flown hundreds of missions over the Occupied Territories in his eleven years in the Israeli air force.

In their letter the pilots stated: “We oppose obeying illegal and immoral orders to attack, such as those carried out by the State of Israel in the Occupied Territories.” They continued by explaining their reason: “These orders are illegal and immoral, and the result of an ongoing OCCUPATION that has had a corrupting effect on all of Israeli society.” The signatories clarified that they did not reject military service in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES: “We will continue to serve in the Israel Defense Force and the Israeli Air Force [IAF] in any assignment in defense of the State of Israel.”

In response, the Israeli chief of staff announced that the pilots would be grounded and would no longer be allowed to train cadets in the country's flight school. The letter inspired hundreds of IAF pilots to sign a petition denouncing the letter and the pilots' refusal to serve. Because of the harsh response and the negative social pressure, several of the pilots who were original signatories removed their names. Other signatories stood by the letter, and subsequently more pilots signed it. The letter is considered part of the wider “REFUSENIKS” phenomenon that began during the 1982 LEBANON WAR and has been growing significantly since the start of the al-Aqsa Intifada. (www.jfjfp.org/BackgroundW/refusenik\_pilots.htm or www.seruv.org.il/english/combatants\_letter.asp).

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; COURAGE TO REFUSE

Pinsker, Leon (1821–1891)

Leon Pinsker (Yehuda Leib) was an early Zionist whose book Autoemancipation, published in 1882 as an analysis of the roots of ANTI-SEMITISM and a call for the establishment of a Jewish home, was highly influential in the Zionist movement. Born in Poland, he studied law at Odessa University in Ukraine, then redirected his interest and studied medicine at the University of MOSCOW. In 1849 he opened a practice in Odessa.

Pinsker was one of the founders of a Russian-language weekly that encouraged Jews to speak Russian, and was later a contributor to a weekly that urged Jews to assimilate. He viewed the HASKALAH, the movement for the dissemination of modern European culture among Jews, in a strongly positive light. Yet, after the pogroms against Jews in Odessa in 1871 and in southern Russia in 1881, Pinsker made a complete about-face. He came to agree with the HOVEVEI ZION movement in Russia that Jews needed a homeland of their own, preferably, but not necessarily, in Palestine. He eventually became chairman of the Hovevei Zion and remained in charge of the organization until he died.

In 1882 Pinsker toured Western European capitals, including Vienna, Berlin, Paris, and London, to sound out Jewish leaders on the idea of funneling Russian Jewish emigration to a Jewish homeland, but the leaders favored emigration to the UNITED STATES. A few agreed with Pinsker that the Jewish question had to receive international recognition, but interest in Palestine was negligible. He returned to Odessa discouraged and began to investigate other possibilities, such as settling Jews in Argentina. Just before his death, Pinsker wrote an article (never published) stating that he feared Palestine or Zion would never be more than the spiritual center of the Jewish people. In his final days, Pinsker expressed a willingness to leave the final decision on the location of a homeland to a national congress, anticipating that the worldwide process of national awakening would benefit the Jewish people.

Bibliography

- Ha'am, Ahad. Pinsker and Political Zionism. London: The Zionist, 1916.
- Johnson, Paul M. A History of the Jews, reprint ed. New York: HarperPerennial, 1988.
- Pinsker, Leon. Suicidal Europe, 1870–1933: A History of Anti-Semitism. Reissued. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- . Writings and Addresses. New York: Scopus Publishing, 1944.
- Sokolow, Nahum. History of Zionism: 1600–1918, 2 vols. London: Longmans, 1919.

Plan Dalet

See DALET PLAN

Po'ale Zion

Po'ale Zion (Workers of Zion) was a movement of Marxist, Zionist, and Jewish workers' circles, founded in various Russian cities around the turn of the century, that became the core of the Labor Zionist movement. In 1906 a formal Po'ale Zion Party was established in Poltava, Ukraine, under the leadership of Ber Borochov, and other groups soon formed elsewhere in Europe. The key feature of the party's ideology was acceptance of the Marxist view of history combined with nationalism (which Marx would have considered a contradiction). Po'ale Zion sought to combine political ZIONISM with the class interests of the Jewish proletariat, although not the interests of the Palestinian Arab proletariat.

In 1906 a party branch was formed in Palestine, mainly by the Russian immigrants of the second ALIYA. Initially, the Palestine group was primarily concerned with class struggle and the formation of trade unions. Soon, however, Po'ale Zion took up the ideology of the "conquest of labor" (Kibbush Ha'avodah) and Avoda Ivrit (Hebrew labor), which held that Jewish workers should do all tasks in society, from most menial to most advanced. Po'ale Zion set up employment offices, kitchens, and health services for members, which later became central institutions in the prestate Yishuv, and founded the HASHOMER paramilitary organization that guarded settlements.

In 1920, Po'ale Zion split into left and right factions, although the leftist wing was not significant in the politics of the Yishuv. The right wing was non-Marxist, favoring a more moderate socialist program, and essentially became a social-democratic party led by Israel founder DAVID BEN-GURION and YITZHAK BEN-ZVI, the latter a close friend of Borochov. Ben-Gurion and Ben-Zvi controlled and directed the party, eventually merging it with other movements to form larger constituencies. They quickly eschewed class issues in favor of political activity to realize the Zionist project.

Bibliography

- Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Kolatt, Israel. "Po'ale Zion." In New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel. Edited by Geoffrey Wigoder. London and Toronto: Associated University Presses, 1994.

Political Parties

See individual parties

Political Zionism

See ZIONISM

Polls and Palestinian Public Opinion

Reliable public opinion polling is usually only found in well-developed Western democracies; however, Palestinians have made several notable efforts in this regard. The first attempts at a systematic survey of Palestinian public opinion in the occupied WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP began in 1993. The JERUSALEM MEDIA AND COMMUNICATION CENTER (JMCC), located in East JERUSALEM, released its first survey in February 1993, which dealt mainly with attitudes toward the peace process. The Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research (PSR), headquartered in NABLUS, now in Ramallah, in the West Bank, released its first comprehensive survey in September 1993 on perceptions of the GAZA-JERICO AGREEMENT. More recently, Al-Najah and BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY entered the fray and began to produce their own public opinion polls. One should avoid making conclusions based solely on these surveys because of the severe RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT within the Occupied Territories as well as questionable methodological practices that characterize most of these surveys.

Bibliography

Jerusalem Media and Communication Center. <http://www.jmcc.org/>.

Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research. <http://www.pcpsr.org/about/about.html>.

—Fouad Moughrabi

Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine

See DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE

Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine

The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP, al-jabha al-sha'biya li'tahrir Filastin) was founded in December 1967 by three groups: the HEROES OF THE RETURN (Abtal al-Auda), the YOUTH REVENGE GROUP (shebab al-tha'r), and the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (jabhat al-tahrir Filastin). This new Palestinian guerrilla group was established as a response to the sweeping Israeli military victory in the 1967 WAR and its OCCUPATION of the remaining historic Palestinian lands—the WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, and GAZA STRIP. The PFLP's main objective was to liberate Palestine from “the river to the sea”—all of BRITISH MANDATE Palestine—both the territory of the state of Israel as created in 1948 and the newly occupied areas.

Historical Roots

The PFLP's “mother” organization was the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN, or harakat al-qawmiyin al-'Arab), which had been established in the early 1950s as a response to the 1948 WAR and the Palestinian Disaster (an-nakba, the expulsion and flight of Palestinians from their homeland, which was transformed into the state of Israel). MAN was created by Palestinian and Arab students at the American University of Beirut and led by a young Palestinian medical student, GEORGE HABASH, a refugee from LYDDA, and his Syrian comrade, Hani al-Hindi. As an intellectual and political avant-garde, they had hoped to lead the Arab people to victory over the newly established state of Israel, which in their perception was an illegal and unacceptable creation of colonialism. In the second half of the 1950s, MAN aligned itself closely with Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR, whom it considered the Arab leader capable of leading the Arab nation to victory over Israel.

By the first half of the 1960s, MAN's attempt to dominate the Arab and Palestinian political and ideological scene ran into problems. For a while MAN had religiously followed the political course of Nasir, avoiding direct confrontation with Israel and leaving all decisions in Nasir's hands. In the mid-1960s, however, MAN came under intense pressure from its members and from Palestinians in general to begin preparations for guerrilla action and a war of national liberation. Still, the leadership of the movement did not want to put Nasir under pressure. Therefore, and in order to prepare guerrilla attacks against Israel, MAN established the Heroes of the Return and the Youth of Revenge as front organizations, trying to avoid direct entanglement. This new course had been provoked by young Palestinians living in various Arab states, first and foremost YASIR ARAFAT's FATAH, who had begun to organize for independent guerrilla struggle against Israel and who hoped to provoke the Arab states, especially EGYPT, into a war against the Israeli occupier. The Arab defeat in the 1967 WAR finally broke the spell and set MAN free from its almost blind allegiance to Nasir. The establishment of the PFLP was their organizational, political, and ideological response to the defeat of their erstwhile hero, Egyptian president Jamal 'Abd al-Nasir.

Infighting in the PFLP: 1967–1969

The young PFLP, which established its headquarters in JORDAN, based its ideology on the founding documents written by the Palestinian poet and intellectual GHASSAN KANAFANI, but had to deal with continuous ideological infighting and fierce personal struggles for leadership and domination, both of which it inherited from MAN. These struggles tended to center on Habash and his younger competitor, NAYIF HAWATIMAH, who espoused different ideological directions for the PFLP. In early 1968, SYRIA imprisoned Habash, and Hawatimah dominated the PFLP during its first National Congress in August, which passed the so-called August Program. But, by February 1969, Hawatimah decided to split from the PFLP and establish the Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (its name changed in 1974 to the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, or DFLP). Yasir Arafat's Fatah, by then the dominant Palestinian political force, supported Hawatimah in his breakaway and protected the new organization against the revenge of the PFLP, which lost many of its best-trained activists in the conflict with Hawatimah. Despite the 1969 split, competition, at times violent, continued between the PFLP and Fatah on the one hand and the PFLP and the DFLP on the other. Habash and other former MAN leaders, who had dominated the political scene of the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA in the 1950s and early 1960s, had to watch from the sidelines as Arafat's Fatah, in a matter of two years, mobilized the Palestinian masses in numbers they could only dream of.

These ideological-programmatic differences turned the two wings of the PFLP into deadly enemies, while neutral observers had difficulty even grasping what the differences were. Both criticized Fatah from the left, both wanted to pursue a revolutionary course, and both fiercely attacked the Arab regimes for their "reactionary" politics. Yet, the competition between the PFLP and the DFLP continued and seemed particularly senseless, because both fought for the same goals: revolutionizing Palestinian and Arab society and leading the masses to a long-term people's war, first against reactionary Arab political leaders and then against the Israeli enemy.

The third group that joined the two MAN front organizations, the Palestine Liberation Front, had been established as an independent organization in Syria in the early 1960s by a seasoned military man, AHMAD JIBRIL. Following in the footsteps of the Algerian National Front, Jibril sought to prepare the Palestinian people for a war of liberation. But the former members of Jibril's Palestine Liberation Front were not interested in the ideological infighting of the PFLP leaders and activists, and in October 1968 they and Jibril left the PFLP to establish the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND (PFLP—GC), which from then on focused almost exclusively on ARMED STRUGGLE against Israel. Some of the most spectacular Palestinian military operations against Israel were led by Jibril, such as the kidnapping of Israeli soldiers in LEBANON, which led to a major prisoners' exchange in 1985, and the hang-glider attack on an Israeli army camp in 1987, which contributed to the outbreak of the First INTIFADA.

The Arab defeat in the 1967 War challenged the MAN leaders and activists to take up independent Palestinian armed struggle against Israel, thereby following their former rival Fatah, whom they had fiercely criticized for what they considered an adventurous course of guerrilla war. In July 1968 the PFLP hijacked an Israeli airplane on its way from Rome to Tel Aviv, forcing it to land in Algiers, and succeeded in getting Israel to release sixteen Palestinian prisoners from Israeli detention. This first hijacking by a Palestinian organization was followed by a series of plane hijackings all over the world by the PFLP, which hoped to establish itself in this way as the leading revolutionary force in the Arab region and in Palestinian politics. The climax came in the multiple hijackings of 6 September 1970, when several PFLP commandos landed their hijacked planes on an airstrip in the desert outside Amman, Jordan, evacuated all the passengers, and then exploded one plane after another. This proved to be the last straw for the Jordanian monarch, igniting King Husayn's war against the Palestinian guerrilla movement in Jordan—the bloody "BLACK SEPTEMBER."

For the Hashemite monarchy, this was a war for control of the state and preservation of the throne, since the Palestinian left, led by the DFLP, had begun to talk about taking over power in Jordan, while the PFLP had challenged the sovereignty of the state with its hijackings. Undoubtedly, the left had vastly overestimated its capabilities and at the same time had underestimated the readiness of the monarchy to use all the force at its disposal to defeat the challenge that was posed. The number of victims of Black September amounted to thousands of dead, especially among the civilian Palestinian population in Amman.

Palestinian Resistance in Lebanon: 1971–1982

By 1971 the PFLP, like all other Palestinian resistance organizations, had left Jordan and moved to Lebanon. As a result of its self-criticism for the disaster in Jordan, during its 1972 conference the PFLP decided to stop all hijackings, or "external operations," as they were called in its jargon. This led to a split—or so it was announced publicly—between two former comrades in arms and cofounders of MAN—Habash, the head of the PFLP, and WADI' HADDAD, responsible for external operations. Haddad allegedly left the PFLP and continued on his own in cooperation with the Iraqi government but also in close collaboration with an array of extremist leftist groups from all over the world. However, after his death he was openly welcomed back by the Front and is celebrated as one of its heroes on the official PFLP website.

The PFLP's ultranationalist positions, insisting on the liberation of all of Palestine and its implementation through revolutionary means alone, led it to view the Fatah-led PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) with deep distrust. Under the direction of Arafat, the PLO had been moving toward accepting a TWO-STATE SOLUTION implicitly recognizing Israel since 1972–1973. At this crucial turning point in the history of Palestinian nationalism, the first real political split occurred in the ranks of the Palestinian left. Hawatimah's DFLP not only aligned itself with Arafat's PLO/Fatah, but actually claimed that the idea for a two-state solution was its original proposal, which Arafat and Fatah only later adopted as their own political program.

The PFLP's adamant opposition to the two-state solution led to a split both within the left and within the PLO. In October 1974, the minority opposition, made up of the PFLP, the PFLP–GC, the pro-Iraqi Arab Liberation Front, and the PALESTINE POPULAR STRUGGLE FRONT, convened in Baghdad, IRAQ, and established the PALESTINE REJECTION FRONT (jabhat al-rafd). Only Egypt's decision, under Anwar Sadat, to start peace negotiations with Israel that led to the 1979 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS overcame the internal Palestinian split and led to a joint Arab-Palestinian front against Egypt. The PFLP rejoined the ranks of the PLO and took up its seat inside the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

The second half of the 1970s was dominated by the split between Egypt and the other Arab states over Camp David, as well as by the civil war in Lebanon. The PLO participated as the partner of the Lebanese left, fighting against the Christian-dominated Lebanese right and supported in the early stages by Syria. The PFLP entered the fighting and played a role commensurate with its size until Israel's 1982 LEBANON WAR. Despite a fierce fight against the invading Israeli army, the Palestinians had to accept defeat, and the resistance movement, led by Arafat, was forced to leave Lebanon for its next refuge in TUNIS, while the PFLP found a new sanctuary in Syria.

The war of 1982 led directly to a challenge to Arafat's leadership and fierce internal fighting, including an armed rebellion within Fatah for control of the main Palestinian Resistance Movement. The PFLP attempted to stay neutral, but this proved extremely difficult because Damascus supported and even encouraged the Fatah rebels. Thus the PFLP first joined the DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE, a coalition of the DFLP, the Palestine Liberation Front, and the PALESTINIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY; then, in a more serious opposition move, it participated in the PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT, a Syrian-backed, Damascus-based umbrella group that rejected the 1985 HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT and the holding of the seventeenth meeting of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (the PLO legislative body) in the Jordanian capital. The alliance called for "action to topple the trend of deviation and relinquishment" within the PLO. In the end, Arafat prevailed over his challengers, most of whom fell into oblivion, with many of them rejoining Fatah years later.

From the War of 1982 to the Intifada

The 1980s were dominated by international political and diplomatic efforts to bring both the Palestinian resistance and the Arab states as a whole closer to official recognition of Israel and adoption of a two-state solution. While Arafat expended enormous energy to bring Fatah and the PLO to accept this strategy, the PFLP went to equally great lengths to resist it and to prevent its acceptance. The first great grassroots rebellion, the INTIFADA by the Palestinian population under OCCUPATION in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, began in December 1987 and very quickly brought the Palestinian Resistance Movement to the threshold of accepting the two-state solution. In Algiers, the Palestine National Council proclaimed on 15 November 1988, only one year into the Intifada, a PALESTINIAN DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, unanimously supported by all political forces, including the PFLP. Only Israel refused to accept the historic offer of negotiations toward a two-state solution made by the entire Palestinian national movement.

As the Intifada continued, the PFLP inside the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES played, for the first time in its history, a major role, overshadowing its leadership in exile in Damascus. In 1990 Habash was allowed to return to Jordan; though motivated by the desire to be closer to Palestine, he was also trying to escape the not-always-welcome tutelage of Damascus. The PFLP leadership inside the Occupied Territories was part and parcel of the broad-based United National Leadership of the Intifada composed of all the factions, and its cadres played an important role in organizing the uprising.

Israel managed to restore control, and by 1991 the repercussions of Iraqi president Saddam Husayn's invasion of KUWAIT and the ensuing GULF WAR helped it to finally crush the Intifada.

From Madrid to Oslo and After

After the Gulf War in 1991, the UNITED STATES called for a major peace initiative—the MADRID CONFERENCE—with the participation of Arab states but excluding the PLO and, above all, Arafat. Instead, Palestinians were represented as a junior partner in the Jordanian delegation. Arafat, however, managed to slip in through the back door by signing with Israel the first of the OSLO ACCORDS, the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES, in September 1993. The PFLP immediately protested and denounced this as a “sellout.”

Nevertheless, the OSLO PROCESS went forward, and a large part of the Palestinian Resistance Movement was allowed to return to the Occupied Territories. However, Habash refused to accept the Oslo agreements and renounce the use of violence, which were the conditions set by the Israeli government for his return, and he remained in exile in Jordan, making it clear that his condition for returning would be the return of Palestinian REFUGEES. In 2000, with his health having deteriorated during the previous years (a first stroke in 1972, another one in 1980, and finally a major operation in FRANCE in 1992), Habash announced his resignation from his position as head of the PFLP. In his place, the PFLP elected Abu Ali Mustafa (MUSTAFA AL-ZABRI), who had been Habash's deputy since 1972. In contrast to Habash, Mustafa had returned to the Occupied Territories in 1999. For the first time in its history, the PFLP leadership and also the bulk of the organization were inside Palestine.

The breakdown of the Oslo Process led to the start of the Second or AL-AQSA INTIFADA at the end of September 2000. Fighting between the Israeli army and the Palestinians turned extremely violent, with the notorious SUICIDE BOMBINGS (or martyrdom operations) undertaken mostly against civilians inside Israel. Although the PFLP participated in the Intifada and in armed struggle against the Occupation, it did not take part in the suicide bombings. Nevertheless, the Israeli army targeted Mustafa early in the Intifada, and he was the victim of a TARGETED ASSASSINATION in August 2001. The PFLP responded in kind in October 2001, assassinating REHAVAM ZE'EV, then Israeli minister of tourism, in a daring operation in the middle of Jerusalem. Ze'evi was one of the most extreme and openly racist Israeli rightists, who had just announced his resignation (in protest against ARIEL SHARON's policy, which he considered not extremist enough).

The PFLP elected as the new secretary general Ahmad Sa'dat, who was arrested only months later by the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) for his alleged role in the assassination of Ze'evi and held in Arafat's presidential compound in Ramallah. In May 2002, an international agreement was reached to jail Sa'dat, together with the four PFLP activists who had been sentenced by the PNA for the assassination of Ze'evi in a prison in JERICHO. After the second Palestinian parliamentary elections in January 2006 and the success of HAMAS, the Israeli army moved in and captured Sa'dat and the other arrested PFLP activists, putting them on trial in Israel.

The PFLP, meanwhile, participated in the elections held in the Occupied Territories between December 2004 and January 2006 and was successful in the municipal elections in BETHLEHEM, Ramallah, and Birzeit, where it won elections either directly or in a coalition with independent candidates. In the parliamentary elections in January 2006, under the “List of the Martyr Abu Ali Mustafa,” the PFLP slate ran a distant third after the two major parties, Hamas and Fatah, with approximately 3 percent of all votes, sending three deputies to the Palestinian Legislative Council. From jail, Ahmad Sa'dat led the slate, just as his Fatah counterpart MARWAN AL-BARGHUTHI headed the Fatah slate from his prison cell.

The PFLP today is considered one of the historical organizations inside the Palestinian national movement and within the PLO. With the taking over of the PLO by Fatah in 1969, the PFLP became essentially the opposition or, at times, the junior partner of Fatah. Under the new political constellation in the Occupied Territories established by the Hamas victory in the parliamentary elections of 2006, the PFLP aligned itself in a loose coalition with Hamas against Fatah, while jealously guarding its ideological and political independence. Thus the PFLP declined at the last minute to join the Hamas government in Gaza as a junior partner, although it had to give up four ministries reserved for it. Against this PFLP history, it is an ironic twist that the reason given for this rejection was the PFLP's insistence on the 1988 Palestinian Declaration of Independence, which clearly implied the acceptance of a two-state solution and the recognition of Israel.

Bibliography

- AbuKhalil, As'ad. "Internal Contradictions in the PFLP: Decision-Making and Policy Orientation." Middle East Journal. 41 (1987).
- Baumgarten, Helga. "The Three Faces/Phases of Palestinian Nationalism, 1948–2005." Journal of Palestine Studies. 34:4 (2005).
- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Cubert, Harold M. The PFLP's Changing Role in the Middle East. London: Routledge, 1997.
- Hoepf, Gerhard. From Nationalism to Socialism: History and Ideology of the "Movement of Arab Nationalists" (MAN) and Its Successor Organizations, 1948–1975. Dissertation, Humboldt University (East Berlin), 1985.
- Kazziha, Walid. Revolutionary Transformation in the Arab World. London and Tonbridge: Charles Knight, 1975.
- Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. A Radical Voice from Palestine: Recent Documents from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. Oakland, CA: Abraham Guillen Press/Arm the Spirit Publishers, 2002.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

—Helga Baumgarten

Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine—General Command

The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine—General Command (PFLP–GC) was a left-wing militant Palestinian nationalist organization. The group was founded by AHMAD JIBRIL, a former captain in the Syrian army, in April 1968 as a splinter group from the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP). The PFLP–GC was disenchanted with the ideological disputes within the PFLP and declared that its focus would be on military operations, not philosophy. It supported ARMED STRUGGLE against the Israeli OCCUPATION and is known for cross-border attacks into Israel using unusual means such as hot-air balloons and motorized hang gliders. Its primary focus was on guerrilla operations from southern LEBANON and small-scale attacks in Israel, although it has not carried out any operations since 1993.

At its inception, the central leadership of the PFLP–GC was composed mostly of former Syrian army officers, and its largely pro-Syrian stance resulted in an April 1977 split of a pro-Iraqi faction within the organization. In June 1974, the PFLP–GC joined the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), but its membership was suspended ten years later due to the PFLP–GC's support for factions opposing PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT and the FATAH party. In 1984 the PFLP–GC joined the PFLP in the PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT, opposing what they saw as the PLO's move toward an accommodation with Israel. Although the PFLP eventually returned to the PLO, the PFLP–GC did not. In fact, the PFLP–GC always opposed Arafat and any political settlement with Israel. It never participated in the peace process and, because of Arafat's leadership in moving the PLO in that direction from 1974 onward, became strongly anti-PLO. Numbering about 300 cadres, the PFLP–GC remained close to SYRIA, and its base of operations remained in SYRIA and LEBANON.

In May 2002, Jibril's son, Jihad, was killed by a car bomb thought to have been planted by Israel.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Norton, Augustus, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Quandt, William B., Fuad Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Resistance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

Popular Liberation War Pioneers

See SA' IQA

Popular Struggle Front

See PALESTINE POPULAR STRUGGLE FRONT

Population

See DEMOGRAPHY

Post-Zionism

The term post-Zionism was first used as early as 1989, spurring a fruitful debate among scholars on the relation of ZIONISM to the Palestinian conflict and to the discrimination against Arab Jews, as well as the relation between theory and political action. Post-Zionist scholars examine the collapse of the traditional foundations of Zionist ideology, as formulated by the founding fathers and mainstream scholars, and aspire to produce an effective critique of the status quo. What is distinctive about post-Zionism is the attention to aspects of the past that, until recently, were mostly ignored by scholars. Post-Zionism, then, is a rereading of history in the context of critical questions about the Zionist tradition. Most of the material for this radical questioning is found in the tradition itself but is examined with new perspectives and interpretations.

Critical scholars from the social sciences and humanities, most notably Uri Ram, Oren Yiftachel, Amnon Raz-Krakotzkin, Adi Ophir, Avi Shlaim, Ilan Pappé, Benny Morris, the late Baruch Kimmerling, Gershon Shafir, Shlomo Swirski, and Azmi Bishara, were grouped under the term new—new historians, new sociologists, and so on. The accuracy of this labeling, however, is of some dispute. For example, there are questions about whether Swirski and Bishara are post-Zionists or new sociologists. Moreover, some of the scholars disagree with the definition, while others, such as Shlaim, use it to distinguish themselves from mainstream scholars. There is also a contribution from non-Zionists, such as Sami Michael, and from anti-Zionists, such as Daniel Boyarin. Their voices offer different perspectives on the Zionist image of itself and its past, especially regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In the 1980s, British and Israeli archives were first opened to the public and offered previously classified material to scholars for research and analysis. Thus historians such as Morris, Shlaim, Pappé, and author Tom Segev reexamined the hallmarks of Zionist history in light of newly available documents. Sociologists influenced by postmodern critics also used the newly available data in their own discipline. Unlike the mainstream historians or sociologists, who produced manuscripts from well-established governmental archives, the new historians and sociologists worked according to the Foucaultian method of genealogy: using the uncontested facts and reinterpreting them from various perspectives and disciplines.

The ultimate aim is to appropriate Zionist materials in such a way as to avoid being dominated by them, but to utilize them critically. The work of Raz-Krakotzkin provides a vivid illustration of that methodology by linking contemporary Israelis' deepest fear of the Palestinians to the study of Jewish history. "Can a Jewish collective live in Israel basing its life on the recognition of rights of the Palestinians and taking responsibility for their fate?" This rhetorical question provides the conclusion to one of Raz-Krakotzkin's articles, thus tying Jewishness and Israeliness to the conflict with the Palestinians. In doing so he subverts the traditional dichotomy between Zionism and the negation of DIASPORA constructed in traditional historiography.

Post-Zionism has led to a crisis in the whole notion of the history and periods of Zionism. In her article "The Legend of Sarah: Gender Memory and National Identities," Billie Melman demonstrated how historiography could change in three historical phases of Israel's nation-building project, each serving different national purposes. Melman's account examined different interpretations of the life and death of SARA AARONSOHN (1890–1917), who committed suicide after being captured by OTTOMAN officials who suspected her of membership in NILI, a pro-British Jewish underground group. Melman found that Aaronsohn was presented in one biography as a heroine who preferred to sacrifice her life rather than give up her comrades' names. In a second account, she was depicted as one of the first female pioneers who paved the way for the establishment of the state of Israel. A third biography presented Aaronsohn as an unfulfilled woman, a childless divorcee who, missing the opportunity to have a family of her own, committed suicide.

The rise of theory, particularly that inspired by the late EDWARD SAID, Ella Shohat, and the French philosophers/theorists Jacques Derrida and Michel Foucault, imported Orientalism and post-modernism into the academy. Following these theorists, post-Zionists emphasize antifoundational and antiholistic approaches as well as deconstructing the eternal, metaphysical “truths” or “realities” and the grand narratives of Zionism that pretend to provide totalizing explanations. Critical scholars of the post-Zionist genre distinguish their writings from mainstream research that considers itself “high Zionism,” the traditional history that sees Zionism as flawless. Post-Zionism spurred skepticism and, like Kimmerling, undertook a critical evaluation of the nation-building Zionist myths, while others, such as Shlaim, used a similar approach to deconstruct the Zionist founding fathers’ management of the conflict with the Palestinian people and to present the realities.

The conflict, post-Zionists are convinced, is maintained by language, images, and other cultural phenomena that are as central, if not more central, to conflict management as economic, political, or militaristic processes. Kimmerling, for example, brought into the Israeli sociological discourse the Nakba (catastrophe, or the Palestinian exodus from Israel during the 1948 WAR). In doing so, he linked the establishment of the state for the Jews with the Palestinians’ devastation. Gabi Piterberg’s critique of the historiography of the grand Zionist narrative shows how the Arabs were presented as the “other” in school curricula to enhance the construction of Zionist self-identity. Another example is the Arab Jews, who were introduced in Israeli culture as inept and thus unfit to enjoy an equal share in the society. Their “backwardness” was depicted as a threat to the Zionist project. These examples illustrate how images and language demonized the Arabs and the Arab Jews, building up walls that separate Israelis and Palestinians and legitimizing discrimination against those who were associated with Arabness.

One enters a post-Zionist world once one is convinced that the production of images and information (not only the production of material goods) of Israel and of conflict management determines who holds power. The “linguistic turn” in post-Zionist studies explains the centrality of the critique of Jewishness and nationalism to all current versions of an oppositional politics. But the critics of post-Zionism accuse it of having no model of conflict resolution beyond intellectual disputes, and the theorists have paid little explicit attention outside the academic world to the issues raised by Palestinians. Given this position toward politics, relations between Palestinians and post-Zionists have been wary. The prominent figures who lead post-Zionist scholarship remain outside politics and limit themselves to semi-academic conferences, publicist expressions, or, at most, participation in NGOs. Since “grand policy” is the object of their criticism, they refrain from immersing themselves in institutionally established politics or in executive positions. The promise of conflict resolution, however, is concealed within post-Zionism, which regards it as the only context in which the Israeli-Palestinian conflict can be seen. Individuals and groups participate in a multitude of localities, and the lessons, beliefs, and practices of the way to the conflict resolution become the heart of the study for post-Zionists and the compos for the resolution.

Pulling Zionism from the hands of the mainstream academic scholars and delivering it to the hands of critical postmodern scholars gave rise to the exploration of the complex relations between Zionism and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The traditional analysis of Zionism in terms of victimization, as represented in school curricula, for example, yielded to an examination of the conflict determinants in texts and to the ideological impact those texts had on both Palestinian and Israeli Jews. Politically, the analysis showed that the emphasis on victimization was misleading because the political materials regarding the conflict (language, images) come from basic Zionist perceptions that demonize Arabs and, even more radically, because the state and its citizens are constituted by that Zionism. The exploration of the conflict determinants in the text and the ideological impact the text has on its audience is in a sense also synthetic because the purity of the alienated forecloses access to the energies and disputes that are lived while also severing any connection to an audience beyond the Zionist elites. Thus, the post-Zionists argue, the belief that Israel can enjoy autonomy from the contemporary conditions of the conflict while maintaining the OCCUPATION in the territories and the oppression of the Palestinians is both misleading and synthetic. Mainstream Zionist texts do not address the Palestinian Other. Though post-Zionism is often identified with the political left wing in Israel, Zionism has also been contested from the right and from the Orthodox religious. Religious Zionist leadership is challenged by a radical younger generation who oppose any position that favors resolution with the Palestinians. This position is best represented by the “Hill Youth” (No’ar Hagva’ot) and by SHAS, the ultra-Orthodox party representing religious people of Arab-Jewish origin who reclaim Zionism and proclaim that they are the true Zionists.

Against the traditional Zionist history and Jewish nationalism, post-Zionism inspired study groups and produced works and journals such as Theory and Criticism by the Van Leer Institute, an ivory tower at the service of well-established scholars, both Zionist and post-Zionist. These works insisted that practices, linguistic usage, media work, EDUCATION, and techniques were all crucial sites of oppression and of maintenance of the Zionist elites. The disruptive narrative techniques in post-Zionist works stress the significance of ignoring the old distinction between high univocal hegemonic history and the low polyvocal history of the subordinated groups, such as Arab Jews, Palestinian Israelis, the ultra-Orthodox, and women. Post-Zionist study aspires to use the power of heterogeneous voices and images, but it fails to open the door to mixed genres that threaten to breach the decorum because all the post-Zionist scholars except Swirski are active within the well-established Israeli, US, and English academia and obediently follow the conventions of academic behavior.

The hegemonic academic establishment, represented by distinguished scholars such as Moshe Lissak, Shlomo Deshen, Eliezer Ben Raphael, Anita Shapira, and Joseph Gorni, dismiss post-Zionism as a distortion of history. Post-Zionists explore the hidden issues in the Zionist grand narrative regarding the Palestinian Nakba, the discriminatory relations of the ASHKENAZI (European Jews) toward the MIZRAHI (Arab Jews), and the close ties between political power and academia in Israel, which nourishes the traditional Zionist narrative. In turn, establishment scholars criticize the post-Zionists for their alleged lack of seriousness and “addiction” to casting Zionism in a negative light. Boyarin’s portrayal of THEODOR HERZL, for example, as a homophobic sexist who simply wanted to join the colonialist club of his day is perceived by the establishment as anti-Zionist contempt for the founding fathers.

The multiple critiques of the Zionist narratives are problematic in new ways. On the one hand, they have generally reverted to a discourse on the extent to which Israeli society has changed and the fact that contemporary studies consider the multiplicity of Jewish religious, national, and cultural styles and practices. There is also a multiplicity of “language games” and ceaseless experimentation in all these games. However, no rules are followed except one—“To speak is to fight,” to use Jean-François Lyotard’s words—and the playing and speaking are part of a general agonistics. The notions of Nakba or Mizrahim are displayed with initial ostensive meaning or set up next to their antonym, such as “the war of independence” or the Ashkenazim, thus contributing to both plurality and subversion of the unified canonical study.

Many Palestinian scholars, such as Bishara, have been impatient with the abstruse arguments surrounding the epistemological foundations of post-Zionism and have concentrated instead on more historically informed studies of the political conditions and biases of particular knowledge claims. Such work ultimately derives from the late Edward Said, as does appropriation of Said’s account of Western scholars’ hostility to and fascination with the “other” in postcolonial literature. A complete immersion in the conflict allows many ways to judge it and is thus doomed to the intellectuals’ accommodation to it. After all, post-Zionists offer no collective agreement on means to solve the conflict. What remains is the ethics of lessening the suffering of the victims. The close proximity between the conflict and its theorization as reflected in the new historians’ works and the other “new” scholars, according to Shafir, generates motion in search of a resolution. But a vision of conflict resolution cannot be formulated as long as the univocal hegemonic Zionist view of the conflict prevails and post-Zionists continue to refrain from taking active political roles. Moreover, a theory that is capable of representing the complex realities and components in which multiple political entities exist is lacking. The global-local ties and the powers that exploit the vast majority on both sides are not fully comprehended. The debate focuses on whether post-Zionism actually disrupts Zionism by advocating a varied, heterogeneous different view against the unifying, identity-obsessed practices of the massive state and its bureaucracies in contemporary Israel. I suggest, then, that the new historians’ contribution to the public debate has been minor, albeit significant.

Bibliography

- Benjamin, Walter. "Theses on the Philosophy of History." In Illuminations, Essays and Reflections. Edited and with an introduction by Hannah Arendt. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1968.
- Bishara, Azmi. "On the Question of the Palestinian Minority in Israel." Theory and Criticism. 3:1 (1993).
- Boyarin, Daniel. Carnal Israel: Reading Sex in Talmudic Culture. of The New Historicism: Studies in Cultural Poetics, vol. 25. Series Editor Stephen Greenblatt. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- . "The Colonial Masqued Ball." Theory and Criticism: An Israeli Forum. 11 (1997).
- Dahan-Kalev, Henriette. "'The Riots of Wadi Salib.' Fifty to Forty-Eight Critical Moments in the History of the State of Israel." Theory and Criticism: An Israeli Forum. 12–13 (1999).
- . "You Are So Pretty, You Don't Look Moroccan." Israeli Studies. 6 (2001).
- Kimmerling, Baruch. "'Al Nakba.' Fifty to Forty-Eight Critical Moments in the History of the State of Israel." Theory and Criticism: An Israeli Forum. 12–13 (1999).
- Matta, Nada. Postcolonial Theory, Multiculturalism and the Left: A Critique of Post-Zionism. New York: Continuum Publishing Group, 2003.
- Melman, Billie. "The Legend of Sarah: Gender Memory and National Identities (Eretz Yisrael/Israel, 1917–90)." Journal of Israeli History. 21:1–2 (2002).
- Michael, Sami. "An Author under Influence" (Sofer Takhat Hashpaah). Interview with Daliya Karpel. Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 15 April 2005.
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–1949. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Ophir, Adi. "A Time of Occupation." In The Other Israel: Voices of Refusal and Dissent. Edited by Roane Carey and Jonathan Shainin. New York: New Press, 2002.
- Pappé, Ilan. The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951. London: I. B. Tauris, 2001.
- . "The New History of the War of 1948." Theory and Criticism: An Israeli Forum. 3 (1993).
- Peters, Michael, ed. Education and the Postmodern Condition. Westport, CT: Bergin and Garvey, 1995.
- Piterberg, Gabi. "The Nation and Its Narrators: National Historiography and Orientalism." Theory and Criticism: An Israeli Forum. 6 (1996).
- Ram, Uri. "The Promised Land of Business Opportunities: Liberal Post-Zionism in the Global Age." In The New Israel: Peacemaking and Liberalization. Edited by Gershon Shafir and Yoav Peled. New York: Westview Press, 2000.
- Raz-Krakotzkin, Amnon. "Between 'Brit Shalom' and the Holy Temple: The Dialectic of Redemption and

- Messianism Following Guersom Sholem." Theory and Criticism: An Israeli Forum. 20 (2002).
- Said, Edward W. Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books, 1979.
- Segev, Tom. 1949: The First Israelis. New York: Henry Holt, 1986.
- Shafir, Gershon. Land, Labor, and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882–1914. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W.W. Norton, 2000.
- Silberstein, Laurence. Post-Zionism Debates: Knowledge and Power in Israeli Culture. New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Stein, Rebecca, and Ted Swedenberg, eds. Palestine, Israel, and the Politics of Popular Culture. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2005.
- Swirski, Shlomo. Lo Nechshalim Ela Menuchshalim: Nituah Sociology Vesihot Im Pe'eilim Upe'eilot (Not Naturally Inept but Socialized to Be Inept: A Sociological Analysis and Discussions with Social Activists Both Men and Women). Haifa, Israel: Haifa University Press, 1981.
- White, Hayden V. Meta-History: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe. Baltimore, MD, and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973.
- Yiftachel, Oren. "Planning as Control: Policy and Resistance in Deeply Divided Societies." Progress in Planning Series. 44 (1995).

—Henriette Dahan Kalev

Poverty, Palestinian

See ECONOMY: THE EFFECTS OF OCCUPATION ON THE PALESTINIANS

Powell, Colin Luther (1937–)

Colin Luther Powell was a UNITED STATES army general, government official, and, from 2001 to 2005, the sixty-fifth secretary of state, under President GEORGE W. BUSH. He was the first African American and the youngest person to chair the Joint Chiefs of Staff (1989–1993) and the first African American to head the Department of State. From 1983 to 1986, Powell was military assistant to the secretary of defense, and in 1986 he served as commander of the V Corps in Western Europe. The next year he was named assistant to the president for national security affairs. He had an important role in planning the US invasion of Panama in late 1989, and, prior to the 1991 Persian GULF WAR, he played a crucial role in planning and coordinating the victory of US and allied forces.

When Powell became secretary of state, he advocated the so-called Powell Doctrine—that US military power be used in overwhelming strength only to achieve well-defined strategic national interests. He also promoted a “uniquely American internationalism” and showed a particular interest in African affairs. As he was secretary of state in an administration composed overwhelmingly of NEOCONSERVATIVES, his influence on foreign policy was not significant enough to institutionalize his ideas as policy. Powell lacked the authority to have a decisive say in the appointment of reputable diplomats or the latitude to develop a coherent foreign policy. On issues concerning the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Powell played a secondary role and made no substantive contribution to resolving the conflict. It is difficult to know if there were ever serious, substantive disagreements between Powell and Bush, since he kept such matters to himself, or if he was in essential agreement with Bush’s strongly pro-Israel policy.

On the one occasion in June 2002 when Powell publicly expressed an opinion that differed from the president’s, he was roundly chastised. In an interview with the BBC, the secretary commented that President Bush favored creating a “temporary” state for the Palestinians ahead of a full-fledged state. Such a formula, he averred, would “allow the Palestinians to achieve their hopes and dreams and secure the confidence of the international community.” He cautioned, though, that a temporary state needed to rely on “democratic power, transparency without corruption and effective security agencies.” The White House immediately and sharply distanced itself from Powell. Bush spokesman Ari Fleischer dismissed Powell’s comments, declaring that he “receives information and advice from foreign leaders who have different thoughts about what they would like the president to say. And so the secretary from time to time will reflect on the advice that he gets and do so publicly, which is his prerogative, of course.”

A second incident occurred in August 2002, just days before Powell was about to convene a meeting with several high-ranking Palestinian officials in Washington. Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld told a public forum of Pentagon employees that Israel won the 1967 WAR and acquired the territories legitimately, and he also made several derogatory comments about the Palestinian leadership. The Powell meeting was called off, which was viewed by Rumsfeld and Bush as something of an end run around the president’s policies.

In November 2001 Powell gave his first major address on the Middle East: “To begin with, Palestinians must accept that, if there is to be real peace, Israelis must be able to live their lives free from terror as well as war. The Palestinian leadership must make a 100 percent effort to end violence and to end terror. There must be real results, not just words and declarations. Terrorists must be stopped before they act. The Palestinian leadership must arrest, prosecute and punish the perpetrators of terrorist acts. The Palestinians must live up to the agreements they have made to do so. They must be held to account when they do not.

“Whatever the sources of Palestinian frustration and anger under OCCUPATION, the INTIFADA is now mired in the quicksand of self-defeating violence and terror directed against Israel. Palestinians need to understand that however legitimate their claims, they cannot be heard, let alone be addressed, through violence. And as President Bush has made clear, no national aspiration, no remembered wrong can ever justify the deliberate murder of the innocent. Terror and violence must stop and stop now.”

In the first twenty months of the Bush-Powell administration, Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON visited Washington seven times, while Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT was never invited to the White House. Israeli and US leaders established an intimate relationship, and Bush intensified STRATEGIC COOPERATION, provided new and more sophisticated weapons to Israel, was receptive to Sharon’s diplomatic offensives, and provided a green light for Israel’s 2002 massive military campaigns (OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD, OPERATION DETERMINED PATH, OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS) against the Palestinians and for construction of the BARRIER wall.

In April 2002, after the siege of JENIN, the international outcry about the Israeli attack against the civilian population forced the United States to react, but it did so in a manner that made it clear that Washington was not going to interfere with Israel’s military offensive. The president dispatched Powell to Israel, but instead of proceeding directly and immediately to JERUSALEM, Powell took a circuitous route through various Arab capitals. Once in Jerusalem, Powell did not demand a cessation of hostilities, and his very cordial public relations with Sharon signaled no opprobrium.

At Bush's direction, Powell effectively sabotaged the UNITED NATIONS commission charged with investigating the deaths in Jenin. First, the State Department attempted to stack the commission in such a way that would be favorable to Israel—for example, by appointing military experts and some dubious diplomats. Finally, it vetoed the commission altogether. Moreover, the Bush-Powell team aided Israel in trying to stop the International Court of Justice (ICJ) hearings investigating international complaints about the Barrier as a violation of basic INTERNATIONAL LAW. Powell sought to pressure many countries to submit advance objections to the ICJ hearing on the specious grounds that this would “politicize” the issues surrounding the construction of the Barrier. He also helped to delay, at Israel's request, the issuance of the State Department's human rights report until after the ICJ hearings because Israel feared the report could contain criticism of the Barrier. His efforts proved successful, as it was released a week after the ICJ hearings, more than a month after it was originally scheduled for publication. Finally, the United States attempted to delay the ICJ's rulings on the matter until it would be useless—that is, months after the Barrier had been completed. Powell was personally active in all these efforts, lobbying hard in foreign capitals and from Washington.

Under Powell's tenure, the United States initiated the “ROAD MAP,” but the comprehensive settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was quickly downgraded and eventually disappeared from the US policy agenda. In May 2004 Powell met with QUARTET officials, Kofi Annan, and Javier Solana, supposedly to revive the Road Map, but Powell's statements at the meeting suggested this was simply pro forma. The secretary revealed details of US policy at this meeting, including that Israel and the United States would from now on negotiate with JORDAN and EGYPT as partners in imposing the new plan and controlling Palestinian interests and affairs, thus supplanting Palestinian representation. He resigned on 15 November 2004 without giving specific reasons. The Washington Post reported that he had previously told the president that he would stay under two conditions: greater engagement with IRAN and a harder line with Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon.

Bibliography

- Allen, Mike. “Powell Announces Resignation.” Washington Post. 16 November 2004.
- Associated Press. “Colin Powell's Statements on Arafat, Other Palestinian-Israeli Issues.” Jerusalemites. 14 September 2004. www.jerusalemites.org/press\_release/14-09-04.htm.
- Bahour, Sam. “Watching It Unfold: Colin Powell and My Grandmother.” CounterPunch. 31 July 2004.
- BBC. “Powell Condemns War on Palestinians.” BBC News. 7 March 2002.
- CNN. “Powell: Bush Pondering ‘Temporary Palestinian State.’” CNN.com. 12 June 2002.
- De Rooij, Paul. “A Political Obituary: Colin Powell, DOA.” CounterPunch. 22–23 May 2004.
- Fisk, Robert. “Mr Powell Must See for Himself What Israel Inflicted on Jenin.” The Independent (UK). 14 April 2002.
- Global Policy Forum. “State Department, White House at Odds over Palestinian State.” Dawn Internet Edition. 13 June 2002. www.globalpolicy.org/security/issues/israel-palestine/2002/0613interim.htm.
- Harari, Oren. The Leadership Secrets of Colin Powell. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2003.
- Levin, Mark R. “Secretary of Incoherence: Colin Powell Speaks on U.S. Mideast Policy.” National Review. 27 January 2003.
- MacAskill, Ewen, and Simon Tisdall. “Bush and Powell in Public Split over Israel.” The Guardian (London). 13 June 2002.
- Mann, James. Rise of the Vulcans: The History of Bush's War Cabinet. New York: Viking, 2004.
- Powell, Colin L., Secretary. “Remarks at the McConnell Center for Political Leadership, University of Louisville, Kentucky.” Full text. The Avalon Project at Yale Law School. 19 November 2001. http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/sept\_11/powell\_brief39.htm.
- Shuman, Ellis. “Israeli Leaders Satisfied with Powell's Middle East Vision.” Israelinsider. 20 November 2001.
- Steins, Richard. Colin Powell: A Biography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2003.
- Tobin, Jonathan. “Rumsfeld to the Rescue: The Pentagon Chief Is a Bastion of Common Sense.” Jewish World Review. 20 August 2002.

Present Absentees

Present absentees are Palestinians whose property was confiscated under Israel's ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW (1950) but were present (within the borders of the new Israeli state) in the first population census and were thus registered as citizens of the state, according to the Israeli Nationality Law (1952). “Present absentee” is thus the contradictory appellation given to the more than 200,000 PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL (out of a total of 1,498,200 Israeli Arabs) whose property and homes were taken by the state, making them REFUGEES within their own country. Most were forced to leave their villages under military orders during the 1948 WAR; they locked their doors, took their keys and land deeds, and planned to return as soon as the fighting ended (as did all the refugees). Following the war and under the pretense of security needs, the state evicted others to break up areas of Palestinian concentration. They are “present” because they have never left the country, remaining through the 1948 War and the years following. They are “absentees,” according to Israeli laws passed to gain LAND for the state, because in 1948 they left their original villages, regardless of the reason. As present absentees, they are prevented from regaining their property, homes, and land. In 2005, Israel had thirty-six laws and regulations that limited the right of Palestinian citizens of Israel to use the lands they once owned.

Professor Don Peretz provided human meaning to one dimension of the concept of present absentees: “Any Arab of NAZARETH who might have visited the OLD CITY of JERUSALEM or BETHLEHEM on Christmas 1948 automatically became an ‘absentee’ under the law. Nearly all the Arab refugees in Israel as well as the 30,000 inhabitants of the little Triangle, which became part of the state under the armistice with JORDAN, were classified as absentees. Arabs, who during the battle of ACRE, fled from their homes to the old city of Acre, lost their property. . . . All of the new city of Acre was turned over to the recent (Jewish) immigrants despite the fact that many of its Arab ‘absentee’ home owners were living a few yards away.” Palestinian villagers often left their homes with the understanding, promulgated by the military, that after the war they could reclaim their property and return to their homes. Most of the internal refugees or present absentees come from the more than 400 Palestinian villages destroyed during the 1948 War. This massive destruction was not simply a by-product of war but part of a conscious effort to secure certain areas of land for the state and prevent return of the refugees. Instead, the government destroyed most of the villages and later turned the land over to the JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL or the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND to build Jewish settlements. In urban areas, the reclamation of land for Jewish residents was even more blatant. In HAIFA, JAFFA, and Jerusalem, where over 100,000 Palestinians resided before 1948, tens of thousands of families fled to safer areas during the war. Using the Absentee Property Regulations of 1950, the state seized their homes and resettled Israeli Jews in them.

Land evictions of the Israeli-Arab population did not end with the cessation of fighting in 1948. Through the 1970s and even today, Israel continues to evacuate villagers and take their lands for Jewish settlements in any area deemed “too densely settled” with Palestinians. These actions uphold the policy position promulgated in the Interior Ministry’s KOENIG MEMORANDUM on Handling the Arabs of Israel, 1976. Israel’s current National Master Plan, TAMA 35, makes similar statements with less incendiary wording. The current plan upholds the policy of “equalizing” population in the Galilee, one of the areas with significant Palestinian population concentration, by bringing in more Jewish settlers.

Israel has also continued to destroy villages located in “sensitive areas.” For example, when Israel moved to take de facto control of demilitarized zones along the cease-fire lines with SYRIA and EGYPT, it decided to clear the area of all villages. From 1949 to 1956, Israel carried out expulsion campaigns, destroying ten villages and forcing the inhabitants to move to other villages in northern Israel. Many refugees fled to Syria, but a fifth of the villagers—numbering more than 4,000 people—are now internally displaced citizens of Israel, living in the area of Acre.

By imposing martial law from 1948 to 1966 on parts of the country with high concentrations of Palestinians, the state prevented Arab citizens from pressing their claims for their property. During those nearly two decades, Arab citizens of Israel were governed by the DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS of the BRITISH MANDATE. For what Israel deemed security reasons, these regulations prevented the present absentees from entering their own land without prior permission. For nearly twenty years, present absentees were not allowed to visit the homes they had owned and had no ability to press for a legal claim to their property.

The plight of internal refugees has had far-reaching effects throughout the Palestinian-Israeli population. The populations of remaining Arab towns skyrocketed overnight, causing serious urban planning problems. Given the limitations on land available to Arab municipalities for growth, these towns have become overcrowded, with no room for public parks and other public amenities. Additionally, inequitable distribution of state funds to Arab locales has meant that Arab towns have not had the money to deal with the INFRASTRUCTURE needs caused by their sudden growth.

The influx of refugees brought thousands of people with no possessions and few savings, keeping tax revenues low while straining the cities' social services. With no access to their land, their traditional source of income, internal refugees increased unemployment problems already significant in Arab locales.

See also BEDOUIN IN ISRAEL; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL; UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES

Bibliography

Abu-Saad, Ismael. Indigenous Education and Empowerment: International Perspectives. Lanham, MD: AltaMira Press, 2006.

———. "The Portrayal of Arabs in Textbooks in the Jewish School System in Israel." Arab Studies Quarterly. 29:1 (2007).

Abu-Saad, Ismael, and John Mburu. The Influence of Settlement on Substance Use and Abuse among Nomadic Populations in Israel and Kenya. Research for Policy Series 7. Amsterdam: Koninklijk Instituut Voor de Tropen, 2002.

Arab Association for Human Rights. Discrimination Diary. 25 May 2000. www.arabhra.org/publications/shortreports/shortreports000525.htm.

Champagne, Duane, and Ismael Abu-Saad, eds. Contemporary Issues in Palestinian Arab Education. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 2006.

———. The Future of Indigenous Peoples: Strategies for Survival and Development. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2003.

Fenster, Tovi. "Belonging, Memory and the Politics of Planning in Israel." Social and Cultural Geography. 5:3 (2004).

Ghanem, A. The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel: A Political Study. New York: SUNY Press, 2001.

———. "The Palestinian Minority in Israel: The Challenge of the Jewish State and Its Implications." Third World Quarterly. 21:1 (2000).

Ghanem, A., N. Rouhana, and O. Yiftachel. "Questioning 'Ethnic Democracy.'" Israel Studies. 3:2 (1999).

Ginat, J. "Israeli Arabs: Some Recent Social and Political Trends." Asian and African Studies. 23:2-3 (1989).

Jabarin, Yosef. Tama 35 and Its Implications on the Palestinian Minority in Israel. Nazareth: Arab Center for Alternative Planning, 3 March 2002.

Jewish Virtual Library. Latest Population Figures for Israel. Jewish Virtual Library. 2009. http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Society\_&\_Culture/newpop.html.

"The Koenig Report: Top Secret: Memorandum-Proposal: Handling the Arabs of Israel." Full report. Journal of Palestine Studies. 6:1 (1976). Originally published in SWASIA. 3:41 (15 October 1976).

Ministry of Environmental Protection. "Planning for Building and Development in the 21st Century: National Outline Plan 35." Israel Environmental Bulletin. 31.

http://www.environment.gov.il/Environment/Static/Binaries/ModulKvatzim/31\_26-27\_1.pdf.

Norwegian Refugee Council/Global IDP Project. Profile of Internal Displacement: Israel. Compilation of the Information Available in the Global IDP Database of the Norwegian Refugee Council (as of 14 January 2002). 2002. www.idpproject.org.

Peretz, Don. Israel and the Palestine Arabs. Washington, DC: Middle East Institute, 1958.

Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.

Reitter, I., and R. Aharoni. The Political Life of the Arabs in Israel. Beit Berl, Israel: Center for the Study of Arab Society, 1992.

Rekhess, E. The Arab Minority in Israel: Between Communism and Arab Nationalism. Tel Aviv, Israel: The Dayan Center, Tel Aviv University, 1993.

Rouhana, Nadim. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities and Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Rouhana, N., and A. Ghanem. "The Crisis of Minorities in Ethnic States: The Case of the Palestinian Citizens in Israel." International Journal of Middle East Studies. 30:3 (1998).

Sharon, Ariel. "Address by PM Ariel Sharon: Government Approved the National Contour Plan 'Tama 35.'" Globes. 2 December 2005.

Slyomovics, Susan. The Object of Memory: Arab and Jew Narrate the Palestinian Village. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.

Sultany, N. Israel and the Palestinian Minority. Haifa, Mada al-Carmel: Arab Center for Applied Social Research, 2004.

Yiftachel, O., and A. Ghanem. "Understanding 'Ethno-crac' Regimes: The Politics of Seizing Contested Territories." Political Geography. 23:6 (2004).

Zureik, Elia. The Palestinians in Israel: A Study in Internal Colonialism. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1979.

Presidential Guard

The Presidential Guard, formerly FORCE 17 (Al-Amn al-Ri'asa), is an elite force that was the personal guard of YASIR ARAFAT during his years as chairman of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and president of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). Since MAHMUD ABBAS was elected president of the PNA, he has been supported by the Presidential Guard, although its strength is estimated now at about 2,500, down from Arafat's 3,000. The INTERIM AGREEMENT signed between Israel and the PLO specifically authorized a presidential guard. The guard, which wears military-style uniforms and is equipped with light weapons and armored cars, is considered the best trained and most sophisticated of the various Palestinian security forces.

When the Presidential Guard was originally established, by 'ALI HASAN SALAMAH, in the early 1970s as Force 17, its purpose was to provide security for PLO officials and to protect Arafat, VIPs, and official institutions, and it was rarely involved in military operations against Israel. Two exceptions were the 1985 killing of three Israelis in Cyprus and the July 1987 assassination in London of political cartoonist NAJI AL-ALI, who had incensed Arafat with his acerbic lampooning. But aside from these two operations, Force 17 has played a nonviolent, behind-the-scenes role. Even during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the guard chose not to take part in the violence, although its offices have been systematically targeted by Israeli bombing raids. On 19 October 2000, an explosion destroyed the Presidential Guard's headquarters in BETHLEHEM; although the perpetrators have yet to be identified, many in the organization believe that the Islamic militant organization HAMAS was behind the episode. On 20 April 2001, the Presidential Guard's temporary headquarters in Ramallah was also destroyed. Despite these attacks, the organization remains a highly respected intelligence-gathering and protective organization in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

Bibliography

- Avrahami, Avner. "Structure of the Palestinian Security Apparatus." Special for the online edition. Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). n.d., ca. 2000.
- Luft, Gal. "The Palestinian Security Services: Between Police and Army." Middle East Review of International Affairs. 3:2 (1999).
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Usher, Graham. "The Politics of Internal Security: The PA's New Intelligence Services." Journal of Palestine Studies. 25:2 (1996).

Principles of Peace

Principles of Peace was a document issued on 1 January 1977 as a result of negotiations between PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION member MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen) and Israeli general MATITYAHU PELED. It was based on a TWO-STATE SOLUTION with Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 borders.

Bibliography

- Abbas, Mahmud. "Inaugural Speech—Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmud Abbas (Abu Mazen)." Mideastweb. 29 April 2003. www.mideastweb.org/abumazen.htm.
- Sedan, Gil. Profiles of Possible Palestinian Leaders. New York: United Jewish Communities, 2001.

Prisoners and Prison Conditions

The experience of Palestinian prisoners inside Israeli prisons and detention facilities is an integral part of the continuum of arrest, interrogation, and sentencing under Israeli military law. The prison experience is characterized by extremely harsh detention conditions and enforced isolation from families and communities. Prisoners are almost continuously engaged in a collective struggle against these conditions and play a central role in the broader Palestinian national movement.

The number, location, and characteristics of Israeli detention facilities have varied considerably since 1967 and are largely dependent on the political situation. From 1967 to 1987, Israel maintained an extensive network of detention facilities inside Israel as well as throughout the major towns of the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP. Soon after the beginning of the First INTIFADA (1987–1993), Israel opened a number of new detention centers to cope with the large influx of prisoners.

At the end of the Intifada and following the establishment of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in 1994, prisons in Palestinian towns in the West Bank and Gaza were closed. By mid-2005, there were twenty-four Israeli detention facilities holding Palestinian political prisoners: fourteen prisons and military camps, five detention and holding centers, and five interrogation centers. Nineteen of these facilities were outside the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the remainder were located inside military camps or Israeli SETTLEMENTS throughout the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Some facilities are administered by the Israeli military, and others are administered by the Israeli Prisons Services under the authority of the Ministry of Public Security.

Most administrative detainees and prisoners who have been sentenced in an Israeli military court are held in prisons or military camps inside Israel, whereas detainees awaiting trial or interrogation are usually held in facilities in the Occupied Territories. The transfer of prisoners outside the West Bank and Gaza Strip is in violation of Article

47 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which states, "Protected persons accused of offences shall be detained in the occupied country, and if convicted they shall serve their sentences therein." Israel maintains that the convention does not apply to the Occupied Territories because they are not "occupied," but rather "disputed."

In addition to these twenty-four facilities, a secret prison known as Facility 1391 exists and is renowned for particularly severe methods of torture. The exact location of this prison is unknown, and lawyers and the International Committee of the Red Cross are denied access. A Lebanese prisoner, Mustafa Dirani, spent eight years in Facility 1391 before being released from Israeli detention in 2004 and is suing the Israeli state for two cases of sexual abuse while under interrogation there.

As of August 2006, 9,273 Palestinian prisoners were being held in Israeli prisons or detention camps. Of these, 351 were under the age of eighteen, 75 were women, and 42 were over the age of fifty. Of the total number, 433 remain in prison despite the INTERIM AGREEMENT of 1995 in the OSLO ACCORDS calling for their release. The prisoners include nearly half of the elected Palestinian Legislative Council and many other prominent Palestinian political leaders. Of the 9,273 prisoners held in Israeli prisons in 2006, only an estimated 1,800 had actually been put on trial and convicted of an offense. As of mid-2009, Israel's prisons and detention centers held close to 11,000 Palestinian prisoners.

The vast majority of Palestinian prisoners are political prisoners who have been arrested for an alleged security violation of Israeli military law. As the human rights organization B'TSELEM has pointed out, under military law in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Israel defines security "in an extremely broad manner such that non-violent speech and political activity are considered dangerous." Trials take place before a military court, which, according to Amnesty International and other human rights organizations, does not meet international standards for fair trials. Moreover, in 2006, Israel held in prison an estimated 800 Palestinians who had not been charged with any offense; they were held under ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, a practice that violates INTERNATIONAL LAW. Administrative detention orders may last for up to six months, and Palestinians are imprisoned, without charge or trial, during this period. Israel routinely renews the detention orders and may do so without limitation, thereby holding Palestinians without charge or trial indefinitely.

Israel also practices mass arrest, as, for example, from February to March 2002 during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, when it rounded up approximately 8,500 Palestinians and held them without charge. In many areas of the Occupied Territories, all Palestinian males from the ages of fifteen to forty-five were rounded up and detained or imprisoned. Palestinians were blindfolded, handcuffed, and forced to squat, sit, or kneel for prolonged periods of time. Mass arrests and detentions of this type have been condemned by Amnesty International as a breach of human rights.

Conditions inside Detention Facilities

Detention conditions fluctuate depending upon the political circumstances, worsening considerably during times of heightened political mobilization in the Occupied Territories. Nevertheless, since 1967, certain themes are consistent. Palestinian political prisoners are held in overcrowded and unsanitary conditions; given food of poor quality, quantity, and nutrition; denied adequate medical treatment and access to EDUCATION and books, magazines, and other materials; lack adequate clothing; are prevented from regular contact with families and lawyers; and are subject to frequent beatings, isolation, and other punishment. In facilities where Israeli prisoners are held alongside Palestinian prisoners, there is a significant disparity in conditions and rights between the two sets of prisoners. Likewise, Palestinians charged with criminal offenses are held in better conditions than Palestinians arrested and charged with security offenses.

During the 1970s a series of reports from Amnesty International (1972), the Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights (1973), the Christian Science Monitor (1977), the Swiss League for Human Rights (1977), and the American National Lawyers Guild (1978) detailed the harsh conditions inside Israeli prisons. This period saw a large increase in arrests and administrative detention orders coinciding with the establishment of the pro-PLO PALESTINE NATIONAL FRONT resistance group in 1973. Prisons became a key site of struggle and repression, particularly toward the end of the decade. A major concern at the time was severe overcrowding. The 1977 report by the Swiss League for Human Rights cited the situation in the Ramallah (West Bank) Prison, where approximately 200 detainees were held in a facility designed for no more than 40. In HEBRON Prison, prisoners each had an average of one square meter of cell space. In Beersheba Prison in the Negev Desert, 80 to 95 prisoners were crowded into cells that measured no more than 120 square meters (1,290 square feet). While Israeli prisoners in Beersheba were provided with beds, Palestinians were forced to sleep on the floor. Overcrowding and the generally poor conditions led to widespread respiratory problems, skin diseases, and rheumatic disorders. Prisoners frequently complained that they were given only basic pain relievers, such as aspirin, regardless of their ailments.

Some of the worst conditions at the time were found in Ashkelon Prison in southern Israel. A 1977 report by the Middle East and Research Information Project cites Israeli attorney LEA TSEMEL, who detailed the grievances and demands of the prisoners during a prisoner hunger strike in Ashkelon in 1976–1977. According to Tsemel, prisoners were forced to sleep twenty to thirty to a room in dark, damp cells without beds or mattresses. They were required to eat, sleep, defecate, and play inside the cells where they were locked for twenty-three hours a day. The cells were unlit during the daytime, and at night the lights were switched off at 9:30 P.M. Prisoners were not provided with clothes apart from two sets received following their entry into the prison, and underwear could only be brought by families once a year. Prisoners and their lawyers noted the stench of the cells and the lack of fresh air with no windows to the outside. All prisoners suffered from rheumatic pains, and most had ulcers. Prisoners claimed that the physician would see around fifty prisoners in fifteen minutes, and serious medical problems, many resulting from interrogation, went untreated.

During the Intifadas

During the First Intifada, imprisonment rates skyrocketed to an estimated 20,000–25,000 per year, forcing Israel to open a number of new prisons and detention centers to cope with the increased numbers. Among the most notorious was the Ketziot Military Detention Center, opened on 18 March 1988, which held thousands of Palestinians and was known for its harsh conditions. Palestinians called this facility Ansar III after the open-air tent prison used to hold Lebanese and Palestinian detainees during the Israeli occupation of LEBANON, but it was also described by detainees as the “camp of the slow death.” Located in the Negev Desert 68 kilometers (42 miles) south of Beersheba, Ansar III experienced very hot temperatures during the daytime and freezing temperatures at night. The Palestinian human rights organization AL-HAQ had fieldworkers detained in Ansar III and documented conditions in which prisoners were kept in tents infested with insects, scorpions, and rodents; water supplies were inadequate; and prisoners were permitted to shower only once each week. Individual and collective punishment of prisoners included cutting off water supplies, depriving detainees of food, and solitary confinement during which detainees would be bound in contorted positions for long periods of time.

Another detention center opened specifically for the First Intifada was the Dhahriya detention center, located south of Hebron and under the authority of the Israeli military. For the first six months of the Intifada in particular, Dhahriya suffered from severe overcrowding; in some cases, 170 detainees were held in an area as small as 100 square meters (1,080 square feet). To cope with the increased numbers, prisoners were forced by the military authority to build additional cells, which remained small and windowless. They were kept in their cells for twenty-four hours a day except when engaged in forced labor or moved outside for punishment. Prisoners were provided with buckets in their cells to use as toilets, as there was no water source in the room, and they were permitted to bathe only once every ten days. Severe and arbitrary beatings were common. Conditions in all prisons during the First Intifada deteriorated as the number of arrests increased and prison guards employed more violent means to suppress prisoner unrest. It became common practice for guards to spray tear gas into the small cells or, in the case of open-air tent prisons such as Ansar III and Megiddo, to fire at prisoners. On 16 August 1988, two prisoners were shot dead during a protest at Ansar III, and others were injured by gunshot in January 1989. A detainee was shot dead in February 1989 at Megiddo prison.

With the signing of the 1993 Oslo Accords between the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION and Israel and the establishment of the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) in 1994, the rate of arrests dropped. Israel closed Ansar III (in 1995) as well as prisons in the major Palestinian towns in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Although thousands of prisoners were released, political arrests continued, and the number of prisoners fluctuated between 3,000 and 4,000 from 1993 to 1998. Moreover, administrative detention continued to be widely used against left-wing and Islamic organizations. A characteristic of this period was a large increase in the length of administrative detention orders and their frequent renewal. Of particular concern was the lack of family visits. Prisoners were generally detained outside the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and it was difficult for family members to obtain PERMITS due to the new movement restrictions put in place following the Oslo Accords.

The beginning of the al-Aqsa Intifada, on 29 September 2000, once again witnessed a large increase in the number of prisoners. Ansar III was reopened in 2002, following the wave of mass detentions that began in March–April of that year. Military camps in the West Bank were expanded to cope with new detainees, and many of the detention facilities suffered from overcrowding and unsanitary conditions. Palestinian minors held in Hasharon reported in March 2003 that seventy-two prisoners were being held in a section with the capacity for only forty-eight prisoners, so new prisoners were forced to sleep on the floor. In Megiddo, Ofer, and Ansar III, prisoners were held in tents filled with dust, insects, and rodents. During the cold, rainy winter months, lack of protection from the elements was a particularly severe problem. Tents were leaky, and prison authorities did not provide adequate bedding or warm blankets. Beds usually consisted of a wooden shipping pallet covered by a thin sponge.

Attacks by prison guards, repeated and invasive body searches, and raids of cells were a frequent occurrence. During these attacks, personal possessions were often confiscated or damaged. In Ramle Prison in 2001, Palestinian women prisoners were subjected to months of particularly severe beatings as well as punishment through isolation. In June 2001, twenty prison guards used tear gas and heavy batons to attack female prisoners during a hunger strike over lack of access to medical treatment. A fourteen-year-old female prisoner was badly beaten with her arms tied behind her back and punched in the stomach repeatedly until she coughed up blood. In September 2001, six female prisoners were beaten when they refused to stand up during roll call in a protest over poor conditions and were kept in overnight isolation with each of their limbs tied to the bed. In March 2002, thirteen female prisoners were forcibly stripped and searched while handcuffed and then left in an area where male wardens were present.

Ablution facilities are often lacking or unsanitary. A 2003 report by Defence for Children International–Palestine Section on the conditions in the reopened Ansar III noted that the toilet consisted of a small channel dug into the ground, and one shower was available for approximately sixty prisoners. There was little hot water even in the winter months, and one bar of soap was provided for every ten detainees. Another issue facing Palestinians in detention is lack of medical treatment. The Palestinian Prisoners Society estimated in 2004 that 700 Palestinians in detention were suffering from severe medical problems for which Israel refused to provide treatment, and at least 110 Palestinians had died in Israeli prisons since 1967 due to torture or medical negligence. Israel has denied the use of torture. Israeli medical professionals have been complicit in the practice of torture and mistreatment. Prisoners consistently complain that the sole medical treatment offered for all maladies is basic pain relievers. In a series of interviews with sixty ex-prisoners from the BETHLEHEM area in 1994, 90 percent of those interviewed claimed that the prison administration used the denial of medical treatment as a way of pressuring detainees to become COLLABORATORS. So common was this belief that detainees were reluctant to seek medical treatment for fear of being suspected a collaborator, according to former prisoners.

A clear aim of imprisonment is isolation from family and community. From 2000 to 2004, it was almost impossible for families to visit prisoners due to the denial of permits to Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip. In 2005, after a limited number of visits resumed in coordination with the International Committee of the Red Cross, family members complained of humiliating and invasive checks prior to entering the prison. In addition, prisoners are forbidden from communicating with their families by phone, although letters are permitted.

Prisoner Resistance

Prison resistance is etched into Palestinian culture. Thousands of poems, songs, and stories are devoted to life behind bars. During the First Intifada, underground cassettes of songs written by prisoners circulated throughout the Occupied Territories. A major theme of this resistance culture is the commemoration of hunger strikes and other actions used to protest conditions inside the prisons.

During the period 1976–1980, a series of prolonged hunger strikes in protest of prison conditions took place in Israeli prisons. On 11 December 1976, 450 Palestinian prisoners in Gaza launched a hunger strike that rapidly spread to other prisons in Beersheba, Ashkelon, and Ramle, as well as to all prisons in the West Bank. The largest of these strikes, in Ashkelon Prison, continued until late January 1977 for a total of forty-five days and was then renewed on 26 February 1977 when the prisoners' demands were not met. High school students and prisoners' families organized demonstrations in support of the strike throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and Palestinian students in Israeli universities launched solidarity strikes. Another major hunger strike began in Nafha Prison on 12 July 1980 and lasted for forty-two days. According to testimonies received by a United Nations Special Committee, Nafha Prison was built in early 1980 to hold prison leaders, isolate them from other prisoners, and disrupt political organization within the prisons. Attorney FELICIA LANGER told the committee that the prison was designed to break the prisoners both mentally and physically. During the Nafha strike, prisoners raised the slogan "yes to the pain of starvation, no to the pain of submission." Two prisoners—Ali Jaafari and Rasem Halaweh—died while being force-fed in a prison hospital during the strike.

Smaller hunger strikes and other protests occur frequently. Often these take place in a single prison or among a specific group of prisoners. In October 1995, thirty Palestinian women prisoners in Telmond Prison barricaded themselves in two cells and threatened to set themselves on fire if the guards forced their way in. The women were protesting Israel's refusal to release five of the women prisoners according to an agreement under the Oslo Accords. In response, all of the women refused to be set free, and they remained in prison until they were all released in February 1997.

Palestinians have widely referred to prisons as universities, a place to study political theory and the practical tasks of movement building. Political factions, particularly during the First Intifada, promoted a strict regime of early rising, study circles, and organized political discussions inside the prisons. In defiance of prison regulations, prisoners undertake one-day hunger strikes and other actions to commemorate events of national significance.

Prison authorities attempt to undermine collective organization by frequently transferring prisoner leaders among different prisons or placing them in solitary confinement. The administration also refuses to negotiate with collectively elected leaderships inside prisons, instead pursuing individual negotiations with each prisoner. During the al-Aqsa Intifada, prison services were increasingly commercialized by allowing prisoners to purchase their own food and other items if they had the financial means. In this manner, Israel has attempted to weaken bonds of solidarity among prisoners.

Outside the prisons, networks of family committees in the West Bank and Gaza Strip organize for the release of their relatives. Family committees hold regular demonstrations outside the International Committee of the Red Cross, PNA offices, and in other central locations to maintain the high profile of the prisoner issue. The PNA's Ministry of Detainee Affairs and several nongovernmental organizations monitor the situation of prisoners, provide legal support, and coordinate with families. The prisoner struggle is commemorated each year on 17 April, Palestinian Political Prisoners Day, and prisoners remain central to the broader Palestinian national movement. At sensitive junctures in political negotiations with Israel, prisoners have drafted joint communiqués placing demands on their counterparts outside the prison. Every Palestinian political faction has made it clear that no political settlement is possible without the release of all political prisoners.

See also ADDAMEER: PRISONERS SUPPORT AND HUMAN RIGHTS ASSOCIATION; ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION; ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Bibliography

- Addameer Association and Sumoud Prisoner Group. Status of Palestinian Political Prisoners in Israeli Prisons, Detention and Interrogation Centres. 2004. www.addameer.org/detention/background.html.
- Addameer Prisoner Support and Human Rights Organization. www.addameer.org.
- Amnesty International. Administrative Detention. 27 July 2006. <http://web.amnesty.org/pages/isr-action-detention>.
- . Israel and the Occupied Territories: Mass Detention in Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Conditions. MDE 15/074/2002. London: Amnesty International, 23 May 2002.
- . Israel and the Occupied Territories: Overview—Covering Events from January–December 2005. 2005. <http://web.amnesty.org/web/web.nsf/print/isr-summary-eng>.

- Aruri, Naseer. "Resistance and Repression: Political Prisoners in Israeli Occupied Territories." Journal of Palestine Studies. 7:4 (Summer 1978).
- Barsella Anat. Violation of the Right to Visit Palestinians Held in Israeli Prisons. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2006.
- B'Tselem. Prisoners of Peace: Administrative Detention during the Oslo Process. 1997. www.btselem.org/English/Publications/Summaries/199707\_Prisoners\_of\_Peace.asp.
- . Routine Torture: Interrogation Methods of the General Security Service. 1998. www.btselem.org/English/Publications/Summaries/199802\_Routine\_Torture.asp.
- Cohen, Stanley, and Daphna Golan. Interrogation of Palestinians during the Intifada: Ill-Treatment, "Moderate Physical Pressure" or Torture? Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1991.
- Cook, Catherine, Adam Hanieh, and Adah Kay. Stolen Youth—The Politics of Israel's Detention of Palestinian Children. London: Pluto Press, 2004.
- Defence for Children International–Palestine Section. Ramallah, West Bank. www.dci-pal.org.
- . "Freedom Now: Campaign to Release Palestinian Child Prisoners." 30 August 2006. www.dci-pal.org/english/camp/freedom/display.cfm?docid=244&categoryid=14.
- . Palestinian Child Arrest Figures Top 2,000 in 2nd Intifada. 26 June 2003. www.dci-pal.org/english/display.cfm?DocId=102&CategoryId=1.
- . Palestinian Children in the Judicial System. Ramallah, West Bank: Defence for Children International–Palestine Section, 2003.
- Ess, Kristen. "The Crisis for Palestinian Political Prisoners." Counterpunch. 23 May 2006.
- Ginbar, Yuval. Legitimizing Torture: The Israeli High Court of Justice Ruling in the Bilbeisi, Hamdan and Mubarak Cases. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1997.
- . Routine Torture: Interrogation Methods of the General Security Service. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1998.
- Ginbar, Yuval, and Tami Bash. The Death of Mustafa Barakat in the Interrogation Wing of the Tulkarm Prison. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1992.
- Ginbar, Yuval, and Yael Stein. Torture during Interrogations: Testimony of Palestinian Detainees, Testimony of Interrogators. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1994.
- Golan, Daphna. Detained without Trial: Administrative Detention in the Occupied Territories since the Beginning of the Intifada. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1992.
- Al Haq. Punishing a Nation. Boston: South End Press, 1988.
- Al-Hindi, Khalid. The Democratic Practice of the Palestinian Prisoners Movement. Ramallah, West Bank: Muwatin, 2000.
- Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights. The Shahak Papers. Edited by Adnan Amad. Beirut, Lebanon: Palestine Research Center, 1973.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Absolute Prohibition: The Torture and Ill-Treatment of Palestinian Detainees. Jerusalem: B'Tselem/Hamoked, 1992.
- Mandela Institute for Human Rights. Open Ended Palestinian and Arab Hunger Strike Started on 15/8/2004. 2004. www.mandela-palestine.org.
- Middle East Report and Information Project. "Ashkelon: Palestinian Prisoners on Strike." MERIP Report No. 57. Washington, DC. May 1977.
- National Lawyers Guild. Treatment of Palestinians in Israeli-Occupied West Bank and Gaza. Report of the National Lawyers Guild, 1977 Middle East Delegation. New York: National Lawyers Guild, 1978.
- O'Connor, Pat. "Reflections on Life in Israeli Prison." Znet. 15 February 2005.
- Palestinian Prisoners' Society. Bethlehem. www.ppsmo.org.
- Ron, James. Torture and Ill-Treatment: Israel's Interrogation of Palestinians from the Occupied Territories. New York: Human Rights Watch, 1994.
- Samoudi, Ali. Palestinian Prisoners Participate in Hunger Strike at Jalameh Prison. Sumoud, Gaza: Palestinian Resistance Inside Prisons, 4 August 2006.
- Stein, Yael. Death in Custody: The Killing of Murad 'Awaia, 17, in Ramallah 31 March 2002. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2002.
- . Torture of Palestinian Minors in the Gush Etzion Police Station. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- Swiss League for Human Rights. Violations of Human Rights in the West Bank, September–October 1977. Geneva, Switzerland: Swiss League for Human Rights, 1978.
- UN General Assembly. Report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Population of the Occupied Territories. Report A/35/425. New York: United Nations, 6 October 1980.

—Adam Hanieh

Prisoners' Document

On 25 May 2006, highly respected Palestinian leaders representing five major Palestinian political parties announced that they had reached agreement on a proposal for national unity. Officially entitled the National Reconciliation Document, it was produced by PRISONERS in the Israeli Hadarim prison, including MARWAN AL-BARGHUTHI of FATAH, Shaykh Abdel Khaliq al-Natshe of HAMAS, Shaykh Bassam al-Saadi of ISLAMIC JIHAD, Abdel Rahim Malouh of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, and Mustafa Badarneh of the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE.

The National Reconciliation Document was inspired by a dire need for Palestinian unity. Divisions, which had been encouraged and exploited by Israel, had weakened the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). In particular, the conflict between Hamas and Fatah factions portended an all-out civil war. Israel's reoccupation of the WEST BANK in the context of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA further damaged internal Palestinian relations. The Prisoners' Document was also drawn in the context of international sanctions imposed on the PNA after Hamas won the Palestinian Legislative Council ELECTIONS in January 2006, which were followed by the devastating economic crisis. By June 2006, the Hamas-led government had been unable to pay its state employees for over three months. Unemployment was over 40 percent, and the number of people living below the poverty line was approximately 70 percent. With increasing demonstrations and strikes against the Palestinian government, internal and external pressures gave rise to the Prisoners' Document.

The document is composed of eighteen points, which are here summarized. The Palestinian people at home and in the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA seek and struggle to:

1. Liberate their lands, secure the right of return for REFUGEES evicted from their homes in the 1948 WAR, and establish an independent Palestinian state with JERUSALEM as its capital on all the territories occupied by Israel in 1967.
2. Accelerate efforts to achieve what was agreed in Cairo in March 2005: developing and reactivating the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and forming a new PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL to represent the Palestinian people.
3. Exercise the right to resist the OCCUPATION in the lands occupied by Israel since 1967, together with political and diplomatic work.
4. Unify the Palestinian discourse on the basis of national goals and the resolutions and peace plans of the ARAB LEAGUE.
5. Protect and support the PNA as the nucleus of the future Palestinian state.
6. Establish a national unity government that includes all political factions and that implements a program to improve the Palestinian situation at all levels.
7. Affirm that the administration of peace negotiations with Israel is within the jurisdiction of the PLO and the presidency of the PNA and ensure that negotiations will be conducted to achieve the national goals of the Palestinians.
8. Liberate all Palestinian prisoners and detainees held by Israel.
9. Double efforts to support and care for the Palestinian refugees and form a popular body to defend their rights, particularly the right of return and compensation as stipulated by UN RESOLUTION 194.
10. Form a united resistance front that will be called the Palestinian Resistance Front to lead the struggle against Occupation.
11. Adhere to the principles of democracy and free and fair elections.
12. Condemn and reject the Israeli and US siege on the Palestinian people following the Hamas electoral victory in 2006 and call on fellow Arab peoples to support the PNA and the PLO.
13. Promote Palestinian unity and rally behind the PNA, the president, the PLO, and government.
14. Condemn the use of weapons in all internal disputes.
15. Find the means to improve the participation of the Palestinian people in the GAZA STRIP in achieving freedom and independence.
16. Reform and modernize the Palestinian security forces in all its branches so that they are able to defend the homeland and enforce law and order.
17. Call on the Palestinian Legislative Council to pass laws that regulate the security forces and ban the exercise of political and partisan action by its personnel.
18. Expand the role of international solidarity committees and peace-loving groups that support Palestinians' struggle against Israeli Occupation, Jewish SETTLEMENTS, and the BARRIER that severs part of the West Bank.

In short, the document seeks to affirm the basic political rights of the Palestinians and to create a national consensus around pursuing them. Written in the spirit of a united front alliance, the document is based on agreement over common aims and objectives without forgoing the legitimate right of political and ideological contestation. Clause 14 states that internal disagreements do not conflict with unity so long as they are resolved peacefully, politically, and legally. This is an obvious attempt to avert civil war and to prohibit other internal violence, as well as to affirm the value of dialogue, discussion, and contestation (including demonstrations) in the resolution of conflicts and political differences within the alliance. The document is fundamentally democratic, affirming democratic elections and accountability as the best means of conducting Palestinian politics.

The document clearly allows PNA president MAHMUD ABBAS (of the Fatah party) to pursue a negotiated, diplomatic course with Israel and implicitly approves of the Arab League Peace Initiative of 2002; it also stipulates that any major end-of-conflict agreement is subject to PLO approval (which would by then include Hamas and Islamic Jihad) and popular ratification. The Prisoners' Document also suggests that any future fateful referendum would be open to both Occupied and Diaspora Palestinians, reflecting the fact that popular Palestinian sovereignty is the ultimate arbiter of national goals and programs. The prisoners also call for the end of the Israeli Occupation and the creation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, with East Jerusalem as its capital, thus abiding by INTERNATIONAL LAW and UN resolutions over Palestine, effectively endorsing a TWO-STATE SOLUTION. It also calls for the continuation of resistance against the Occupation, along with negotiation and diplomacy, until withdrawal is secured. Clause 3 involves a broad conception of resistance that is military as well as popular and focused on the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, and it implicitly prohibits SUICIDE BOMBINGS against civilians in Israel as a legitimate form of violence.

In sum, then, the Prisoners' Document strongly affirms all Palestinian rights and calls for a unity government to withstand the pressures of political and economic SIEGE and international boycotts. It affirms democracy and democratic representation as the only means of resolving internal conflicts and of moving forward as a nation. The prisoners also recommend that Hamas and Islamic Jihad join the PLO as permanent members, making the PLO again the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

The day the document was released, 25 May 2006, PNA president Abbas gave Hamas an ultimatum: a ten-day deadline to agree to the proposals in the document or face a national referendum on the document in forty days. The referendum was intended as a vote on the Hamas government and its policy of refusing to recognize Israel, which had led the West to impose the crippling sanctions on the PNA.

Initially, Hamas leaders dismissed Abbas's calls for a referendum as "illegal" and vowed to boycott it, but they later agreed to negotiate with Fatah on the document's contents. However, the talks ultimately broke down, and Abbas announced that the referendum would go ahead, despite appeals by Arab leaders and representatives of the Palestinian prisoners to delay the announcement. He extended the deadline for three additional days, and an agreement on the clauses of the Prisoners' Document was reached on 27 June 2006. However, Hamas did not agree to a referendum.

A poll released in early June showed that 77 percent of Palestinians supported the Prisoners' Document, and a full 83 percent supported the creation of a Palestinian state within the 1967 borders—one of the primary tenets of the document. Ironically, Islamic Jihad, which continued to engage militarily with Israel (Hamas had maintained a unilateral cease-fire for seventeen months), approved the document with some reservations, as well as the plan to put it to a referendum.

All the political maneuvering over the Prisoners' Document took place simultaneously with a massive Israeli military operation (OPERATION SUMMER RAINS) that began on 28 June 2006 and lasted well into the fall. The invasion of Gaza was triggered by a Hamas commando operation on 25 June that left two Israeli soldiers dead and a third, Gilad Shalit, kidnapped. Hamas claimed that the attack was carried out in response to the death of the Ralia family, killed by an Israeli bomb on a north Gaza beach a few weeks before. The Hamas operation and the Israeli invasion were the culmination of increasingly hostile relations in the aftermath of ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in the summer of 2005. Hamas militants regularly fired QASSAM ROCKETS into Israel from Gaza, while Israel continually tightened the siege on Gaza, preventing the opening of border crossings and other restrictions. Shalit's kidnapping also revealed serious internal tensions within Hamas that involved a power struggle between more militant factions in Gaza and Damascus on the one hand and the political leadership within the PNA on the other. Prime minister and Hamas member ISMAIL HANIYEH had agreed to accept the Prisoners' Document, with PNA president and Fatah leader Abbas calling for a two-state solution, thus giving implicit recognition of Israel's existence by Hamas's governing wing. This was apparently too much for the militants to swallow and may have led to the decision to kidnap the soldier and force the struggle with Haniyeh's wing into the open.

On 29 June Israel arrested sixty-four Hamas officials, including PNA cabinet ministers and members of the Palestinian Legislative Council. In addition, eight Hamas government members (five of whom lived in Ramallah in the West Bank) and up to twenty Legislative Council representatives were detained. In the aftermath of the military operation in Gaza, the Prisoners' Document and the referendum were left hanging. Because Tel Aviv had made it clear from the outset that the document was unacceptable to Israel, possibly the massiveness of Israel's invasion was intended to abort the possibility of a national unity government.

See also MECCA AGREEMENT AND THE PALESTINIAN UNITY GOVERNMENT; EHUD OLMERT

Bibliography

- Abu-Manneh, Bashir. "Occupied Palestine: Prisoners, Colonial Elites, and Fundamentalists." ZNet. 11 June 2006.
- Abunimah, Ali. "Abbas' Referendum: A Dirty Trick for Regime Change in Palestine." Monthly Review. 12 June 2006.
- Barghuthi, Marwan. "An Interview with Marwan Barghouti." Palestinian-Israeli Crossfire. Bitterlemons.com. 20 June 2006.
- Barghuthi, Marwan, Abdul Khaleq al Natsheh, and Coalition of Prisoners. Palestinian Prisoners' Document. Text. National Conciliation Document of the Prisoners. 26 May 2006. http://blog.onevoicemovement.org/one\_voice/2006/05/text\_of\_palesti.html.
- CAABU. Palestinian Prisoners Document. 2006. www.caabu.org/index.asp?homepage=publications&article=israel\_palestine\_factsheets&detail=prisoners\_document\_2006.
- Hijab, Nadia. Will Palestinian Prisoner Plan Set Compatriots Free? Note 3. Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 6 June 2006.
- Issacharoff, Avi. "Poll: 77 Percent of Palestinians Support the Prisoners' Document." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 7 June 2006.
- McGreal, Chris. "Palestinian President Puts Hamas on the Spot with Ultimatum to Revive Peace Talks." The Guardian (London). 26 May 2006.
- Rubinstein, Danny. "Palestinian Prisoners Document: Barghouti Leads, Abbas Asserts Himself." Palestinian-Israeli Crossfire. Bitterlemons.com. 20 June 2006.

Professors for a Strong Israel

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

Progressive List for Peace

The Progressive List for Peace (PLP, or Progressive National Movement) was an Israeli political party active from 1984 to 1992 that was formed from an alliance of both Arab and Jewish left-wing pro-peace parties. Its platform advocated recognition of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION and the establishment of a Palestinian state in the WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, and the GAZA STRIP. The PLP insisted that Israel and the PLO must recognize each other mutually and simultaneously if a lasting peace was to be achieved in the region and that Israel's Palestinian citizens must receive fully equal treatment. The party was unique on the political scene in that Arabs and Jews enjoyed equal representation.

In 1984 two candidates from the PLP slate were elected to the Knesset: Muhammad Mi'ari and MATTITYAHU PELED. Only Mi'ari was reelected in 1988, reducing the party's representation to one, and it failed to gain any seats in the 1992 elections. Though short-lived, the party was controversial enough that, in 1985, the Knesset approved an amendment to the BASIC LAW directed at the PLP's philosophy. Added to Section 7(a), "Prevention of Participation of Candidates List," this provision stated: "A candidates' list shall not participate in elections to the Knesset if its objective or actions, expressly or by implication include one of the following . . . negation of the existence of the State of Israel as the state of the Jewish people." In turn, the Israeli Central Elections Committee used this amendment as a justification for banning the PLP from participating in the 1988 elections. The PLP appealed to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT, which overruled the Elections Committee decision and permitted the PLP to run in the election. However, the high court did not overturn Section 7(a) but merely held that the PLP policies did not fall under it.

Bibliography

- Edmunds, June. The Left and Israel: Party-Policy Change and Internal Democracy. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Roberts, Samuel J. Party and Policy in Israel: The Battle between Hawks and Doves. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.

Pro-Israel Lobby

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS

Propaganda, Arab

One of the major myths about the Middle East conflict is that the Arab states have been relentlessly engaged in a serious effort to destroy Israel since its inception in 1948 and that they have supported their Palestinian brothers to the fullest extent. According to this myth, Israel was “invaded” by five Arab armies directly upon its independence with the intent of driving the nascent state “into the sea,” and, although the Arabs were roundly defeated, Israel has remained surrounded by hostile Arab regimes that have launched war after war to destroy it and eradicate the Jewish state. The reason for this implacable animosity was never fully linked to the injustice inflicted on the Palestinians initially by the Zionist organizations, then by Israel, but to an inherent Arab rejection of a Jewish state in Palestine. This myth is deeply rooted in Zionist-Israeli discourse, widely projected in Israel’s foreign policy, and remains a powerful component of the militarized ideology that informs Israel’s state and society.

The official rhetoric of the Arab states contributed significantly to the perpetuation of the myth. The questions are: why Arab leaders spoke in such bellicose terms when they had neither the ability nor the willingness to fight Israel, why the Arab regimes never actually supported the Palestinians (except with inadequate money and superabundant rhetoric), and how the Arab states’ own domestic survival and national interests, not the Palestine conflict, animated their policies. The aspect of the myth concerning the “mighty power and huge numbers” of the Arab armies that fought Israel in the 1948 WAR has been disproved by a number of archive-based studies by Israeli scholars and others.

Dichotomy between Rhetoric and Reality

The rhetorical aspects of official Arab discourse, which promise all-out support for the Palestinians, have been repeated so often and in so many contexts that it is easy to present a picture of unified, hostile aggression—especially if that serves one’s purpose. One of the most common assertions made by Arab leaders has been that the question of Palestine and the plight of the Palestinians are the primary interest of Arab state and pan-Arab agendas. Another frequent contention by Arab regimes has been that internal power struggles, including military coups in one or another country, have been caused, partly if not entirely, by the issue of Palestine. Also common has been the assertion that the Palestine question is not exclusively Palestinian but rather of pan-Arab interest, necessitating the involvement of all Arab states in an arena of “Arab national security.” In other words, assisting the Palestinians was not just a question of dealing with Palestine but also involved the fundamental national interests of each Arab state. A further rhetorical claim by Arab leaders has been that the “liberation of Palestine” (a term diluted after the 1967 WAR to “removing the Israeli OCCUPATION”) overwhelmingly preoccupies the states surrounding Israel, compelling them to shelve all other pressing issues—domestic and international—that are vital to their survival. Finally, there has been the myth that the Arab states must commit themselves to continuous financial assistance to the Palestinians. Yet, if any of these rhetorical statements are tested against historical facts (with the exception of the one that links the concerns of individual Arab states with their own national security), it is easy to demonstrate the emptiness of that rhetoric and to expose the huge gap between what, at one time, may have been the wishes of some Arab regimes and realpolitik.

More often than not, Palestinian interests have been at odds with the declared or tacit Arab objective of ending the conflict with Israel. In 1947 some Arab states, primarily JORDAN, encouraged the Palestinian leaders to accept the UNITED NATIONS plan to partition Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state (UN RESOLUTION 181), against vehement Palestinian opposition. In 1965, Tunisian president Habib Bourguiba called upon the Palestinians to recognize Israel and accept the UN plan (one that had already been refused by Israel, announcement of the rejection having been suppressed in the hope of leaving to the Palestinians the responsibility for its demise). In 1970 the Jordanian army attacked Palestinian guerrilla forces in Jordan and forced them to flee to LEBANON after Palestinian guerrilla operations from Jordan brought Israeli reprisals and Jordanian-Israeli border friction that neither side wanted. From 1976 to 1982, PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) factions in Lebanon were implicated in the bloody civil war there, which ended in Syrian suppression. In 1982, Israel forced the Palestinians to leave Lebanon for TUNIS, after which Syrian forces in Lebanon fought mercilessly against the remaining Palestinians, backing AMAL in the “CAMPS’ WAR” and bombarding the refugee camps for weeks.

Although official Arab rhetoric against Israel soared to new heights during Israel’s 1982 invasion of Lebanon (LEBANON WAR), it was no more than an effort to contain the anger of the Arab masses and shore up regime legitimacy. Not one Arab state came to the assistance of the Palestinians, who were under continuous siege for three months. In fact, that same year Arab leaders convened in Fez, Morocco, and proffered the FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE, which recognized, collectively, publicly, and for the first time, the right of Israel to exist. Successive developments on the ground emphasized the great gulf between what Arab leaders said and what they did regarding Palestine and the Palestinians.

In the aftermath of HAMAS's victory in the Palestinian Legislative Council ELECTIONS in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in January 2006, the UNITED STATES and Israel led an international campaign to isolate the new Hamas-led government. The campaign succeeded by imposing three conditions on the Hamas government: recognizing Israel, acknowledging previous agreements with Israel, and denouncing violence; without meeting them, all financial and diplomatic links with the government (and people) would cease. Hamas refused the conditions and immediately the Palestinian people faced the brunt of drastic cutting of Western financial aid. Similar to their inaction in 1982, the Arab states, by and large, caved in to the US- and Israeli-led policies to isolate the Palestinians. Had there been a collective Arab state position that was clearly supportive of the Palestinians, acknowledging their right to choose their leaders in free and fair elections, the isolationist policy would have failed.

More to the point, if more scandalously, the Arab states again remained on the sidelines during the massive Israeli war against the Gaza Strip in late 2008 and early 2009. Over three weeks of sustained land, air, and sea bombardment of the defenseless Palestinians, after which Israel was accused of committing war crimes, the Arab regimes for a second time did nothing. In fact, there is some emerging evidence pointing to Egyptian and Jordanian preapproval of the Israeli war. The leaders in these two countries, together with a long list of other Arab governments, saw in that war an opportunity to end Hamas's control over the Gaza Strip and deflect the growth of Islamic fundamentalism in their own countries.

Even in the era of "peace," after the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE and the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS between the PLO and Israel, Arab diplomatic and financial support to the Palestinians was far less than the Arab leaders promised and what outside observers believed was flowing into PLO coffers. The Arab states frequently failed to honor commitments made at Arab summits, in terms of both financial assistance and diplomacy, in the sense that they publicly maintained that peace with Israel should be pursued only in a collective manner and not bilaterally. In fact, the framework of the Madrid Conference was based on bilateral negotiations with Israel, reached individually with SYRIA, Jordan, and the Palestinians. In any case, parallel, multitrack negotiations at the conference, which included the Gulf States and other Arab countries, proved to be a futile exercise. After the establishment of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in 1994, the PNA annual budget came largely from European and other non-Arab sources rather than from the Arab states.

In their relationships with foreign powers, particularly with the United States, the most influential external player in the Middle East, the Arab states rarely used their leverage for, or exercised any pressure on behalf of, the Palestinians. Studies of the foreign policies of individual Arab states, especially the major ones such as EGYPT, Syria, IRAQ, the rich Gulf States, and particularly SAUDI ARABIA, reveal that bilateral relationships with influential Western or non-Western powers were always forged according to the specific national interest of the individual state. So pronounced has this phenomenon been that numerous American and European officials have openly expressed their surprise and puzzlement at the absence of a Palestinian dimension in Arab state foreign policies and in bilateral meetings with Western leaders. To a great extent, this explains the massive increase of US political, military, and financial support to Israel over the years, because Washington did not have to be concerned about Arab states' opposition. The onetime use of an oil embargo against the West by OPEC in the aftermath of the 1973 War is the exception that only affirms the rule. Yet even the oil embargo was undertaken to support Syrian and Egyptian interests, not Palestinian, and to punish the United States for its massive resupply of weapons to Israel.

It is misleading, however, to conclude that the Palestine question was only a marginal issue for the Arabs—though it is important to distinguish between popular mass sentiment and that of regime elites. The Palestine question in Arab public opinion is deeply rooted, intensely felt, and has persisted over time—often despite Arab ruling elites but never because of them. In the 1990s, when Israel and the Arab states were busy establishing “regional economic integration,” the depth of mass popular sentiment was evident in the pressure that was brought to bear on Arab governments not to proceed with “normalization” with Israel. Ultimately, Arab states as far from the center of the conflict as Mauritania, Tunisia, Morocco in the west and Oman, Bahrain, and the United Arab Emirates in the east were forced by their own people to terminate the process.

Reasons for the Dichotomy

The evident dichotomy between Arab rhetoric and Arab inaction on Palestine evokes three questions: the causes of this dichotomy, its development over the years, and its consequences for the parties involved: the Palestinians, the Arab states, and Israel.

Causes. This dichotomy originally resulted from a host of pressing issues that were facing the newly founded Arab states that gained independence from colonial powers around the same time as the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948. These new states were confronted with endless challenges, including the consolidation of their political legitimacy, the formulation of distinct national identities, the defense of their newly demarcated boundaries, and the problems inherent in constructing a functioning government and economy. These Arab states also had to contend with overwhelming feelings of resentment and anger on the part of their populations that they had betrayed the promise of pan-Arab nationalism and were little more than creations of the colonial powers whose aim was the dismemberment of Arab territory and control, via surrogates, of their people and resources. Such sentiment on the part of the masses obviously complicated the legitimacy crisis.

Primarily because of this legitimacy crisis, combined with the need to create national identities and to put distance between themselves and their former colonial masters, regime elites seized on the plight of the Palestinians as a means of demonstrating to their own people that they remained part of the pan-Arab movement, were committed to the pan-Arab cause, and were dedicated to rectifying the injustice committed against the Palestinians. The rhetoric about Palestine served several practical ends for the new Arab leaders. Primarily, it provided credibility to the new leaders and states as bearers of the “liberation torch.” By adopting a strong rhetorical discourse against Israel, ruling elites sought to vent popular feelings of humiliation and loss of honor after the Arab defeat of 1948 and the creation of Israel. The highly inflammatory rhetoric against Israel was taken literally by Israel, because it suited Israel’s interests to do so and justified its military endeavors. For the Arab states, it became the cornerstone of a strategy that was intended to absorb popular anger, garner national and regime legitimacy, and buy time so that these elites could consolidate their position and control domestically. So they offered grand slogans and promises about Palestine as a verbal replacement for their political and military failures and continuing inaction.

This rhetorical emphasis on the “liberation of Palestine” and “restoring Arab national honor” led the Arab states into a thorny trap. On the one hand, they had to circumvent their own people’s high expectation of fighting the newly established Jewish state, an expectation nurtured by the states’ own rhetoric but which was far beyond the states’ capabilities to undertake. On the other hand, such continuing hostile pronouncements provided Israel with an excuse to massively develop its military resources—human and material, aided by FRANCE, BRITAIN, and the United States—until, within a few years, it possessed an offensive military capable of defeating all the Arab states combined, thus creating a whole new balance of power and dynamic in the region and presenting the Arab governments with a host of new challenges. After 1956, these challenges boiled down to guns and butter and seriously complicated the internal development plans of the new states, creating an even more complex legitimacy problem for regime elites.

Historical development. “I am the prime minister of Egypt, not of Palestine” was the answer of Egyptian prime minister Muhammad Mahmud in 1936 to a question about Egypt’s reaction to the Palestinian ARAB REVOLT against the BRITISH MANDATE and the rise of the Zionist movement. Shocking and perhaps dismaying as it was to Palestinians and many Arabs, including Egyptians, the answer was at least honest and reflected starkly and realistically Egypt’s nonaction policy toward helping the Palestinians in their resistance efforts.

At that time in Egypt there was neither internal popular pressure for the Palestinian issue nor yet the pan-Arab aspirations that would accompany the military coup of Egyptian leader JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR in 1952.

In the late 1940s and early 1950s, however, the nature of Arab discourse measured against Arab action on the Palestine issue gravely changed. The interplay of factors noted above brought the rhetoric on Palestine to the forefront. Although Arab states were reluctant to concretely help the Palestinians, because of internal weakness and fragility, including limited military capabilities and/or external pressures, many Arab prime ministers, presidents, kings, and revolutionary commanders rhetorically embraced the question of Palestine and even spoke in the name of Palestinians. Some of them fought battles "in defense of Palestine"; some even fought against the Palestinians themselves, who were perceived as too immature to take their fate into their own hands. In the late 1940s, Jordan's king Abdullah Ibn al-Husayn and Syrian leader Husni al-Za'im, for example, espoused strong rhetoric about Palestine and the Palestinians in public while dealing with the Zionist movement and later with Israel in secret.

With Nasir's assumption of power in Egypt, the rhetoric about the Palestine question reached unprecedented heights. Advocating pan-Arab nationalism, Nasir stressed "liberating Palestine and defeating the Zionist entity." His popularity in the 1950s, especially after his decision to nationalize the Suez Canal in 1956, the Czech arms deal, and the Sinai/Suez War, alarmed other Arab states. By the late 1950s and throughout the 1960s, the Syrians, Iraqis, Saudis, Jordanians, and later the Libyans were competing over the torch of the "Palestine question" as part of a larger game of intense regional power rivalry that had come to be called the "Arab cold war."

Whereas Nasir's Egypt considered the Palestine question an Arab issue and assumed the leadership over its affairs, King Husayn's Jordan considered the Palestine issue a national concern because Jordan was the controlling power in the West Bank before the 1967 War and because Husayn had ambitions of regaining the land and incorporating it into Jordan. In addition, successive military ruling elites in Syria and Iraq expressed a desire to adopt the Palestine question locally and regionally. A conference of the Syrian BA'ATH Party in 1966, for instance, declared that "the Palestinian issue is at our core domestic, regional and international politics." In the late 1960s and 1970s, King Faisal's Saudi Arabia considered the question of Palestine an Islamic issue that should not be left to Egyptian leftists or Syrian or Iraqi Ba'athists. All these players claiming to speak in the name of and for the Palestinians severely exacerbated the gulf between Arab rhetoric and practice.

When the Palestinians decided to take their destiny into their own hands, in the mid-1960s and onward, by establishing first the FATAH movement and then dominating the PLO, the latter had to struggle with the Arab states for years to obtain the formal legitimacy of representing the Palestinians. In the late 1960s and 1970s, Palestinians fought against Jordanian, Lebanese, and Syrian military forces at the same time as those states were publicly trumpeting the Palestine issue. The "Arab cold war," with its Palestinian dimension, developed even further after the Iranian revolution in 1978, followed in 1981 by the IRAN-IRAQ WAR, which lasted until 1988. Syria supported Iran against Iraq, while Saudi Arabia and Egypt backed Iraq. During the years of that war, the rhetoric of the Palestine question was exercised as much as ever, yet in practice, the cause of Palestine was further marginalized. When, in 1982, the PLO was besieged by the Israeli army in Beirut for almost three months during the Lebanon War, the Arabs did nothing, and the Palestinians had to face their fate alone.

In later stages, when the First INTIFADA erupted in late 1987, real Arab help was nonexistent, while the rhetoric continued unabated. Jordan and Egypt even worried about the possible demonstration effect of the uprising among their own people. The 1990 Iraqi invasion of KUWAIT dealt the harshest blow to the Palestine cause and further weakened the remaining collective Arab solidarity with the Palestinians. The PLO was perceived by Kuwait and other Gulf countries as having sided with Iraq leader Saddam Husayn and was made to pay a dear price for that after the war. All aid from the Gulf States and Saudi Arabia was terminated, and Kuwait expelled its entire Palestinian population—some 400,000 people. Weakened by the sudden ending of the minimal financial and diplomatic support from the Gulf States and isolated in the Arab world and elsewhere, the Palestinians agreed to take part in the 1991 Madrid Conference on highly unfavorable terms. Following that, the 1993 Oslo Accords, decidedly disadvantageous to the Palestinians, reflected the stark imbalance of power between Israel and the Palestinians, while the Arab states were entirely absent from the process, failing to provide anything to improve the asymmetry.

In retrospect, it is evident that Arab states used the Palestinian issue to distract attention from a number of domestic concerns; for example, the pretext that "the country is at war against Israel" seemed to co-opt a number of ills. The most obvious of these was the Arab governments' intractable refusal to permit any popular political participation. Multiparty systems, democracy, and/or any form of political openness were consistently rebuffed, in many cases overtly attacked, allegedly because they were neither timely nor appropriate during the "struggle." "No voice overrides the voice of the battle" was the predominant official motto in many Arab capitals, which lasted for decades. It meant that all efforts had to be directed at the struggle against Israel, including subordination of democratization, press freedom, and economic development. In reality, the emptiness of this motto stood in sharp contradiction to its wording. In Jordan, for example, the democratic process of the 1950s with successive parliamentary elections was aborted because of the Arab defeat in the 1967 War.

In Arab countries that have no direct borders with Israel, such as Saudi Arabia, the Gulf States, and the Maghreb countries, the regional climate was poisoned by the conflict, and its rhetoric helped relegate the issue of political openness and democratization to the back burner. Almost every Arab country espoused some Palestinian element in its national discourse to appease public opinion on the one hand and to claim some influence in Palestinian affairs on the other. For example, Morocco headed an ineffective suborganization, the Al-Quds Committee, formed in 1975 by the Organization of the Islamic Conference, an umbrella of fifty-seven Muslim countries, with the vague aim of defending JERUSALEM and promoting the Palestinian issue. From the 1960s to the mid-1980s, Algeria adopted a supportive revolutionary discourse toward the Palestinians and nurtured a strong relationship with the PLO, including offering Palestinian factions military training camps. But its distance from Palestinian land made the Algerian aid hardly practical. TUNIS's offer to host the PLO after its forced departure from Lebanon in 1982 gave the country a degree of regional leverage and international prestige stemming from its role as mediator between the Palestinians and the outside world. Libya helped radical Palestinian factions fight the mainstream Fatah movement, although it eventually ended up doing more damage than good for the Palestinians. In the aftermath of the Oslo Accords, Libyan authorities forced thousands of Palestinian families to leave the country because they theoretically had a country of their own by then.

Consequences of the dichotomy. Over the decades, the increasing gap between the action taken on the ground to help the Palestinians and the high pitch of rhetoric was devastating for the Palestinians and caused them great political and financial losses. Israeli politicians have ironically benefited from official Arab rhetoric, particularly in light of the absence of accompanying actual support on the ground. No great effort has been required for the Israeli propaganda machine to accumulate piles of official Arab statements calling for the immediate liberation of Palestine and the elimination of Israel, as well as Arab declarations that the Arab states are preparing their armies for the final and decisive battle against Israel and the Zionist movement. As Arab rhetoric has fed into Israeli rhetoric and propaganda, both have succeeded in exacerbating Western fears about the fate of the Jewish state and thus generated more external military, financial, and diplomatic support for Israel.

Bibliography

- Aloni, Shlomo, with Mark Styling. Israeli Mirage III and Nesher Aces: Aircraft of the Aces. Westminister, MD: Osprey Publishing, 2004.
- Aruri, Naseer H. Dishonest Broker: The U.S. Role in Israel and Palestine. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 2003.
- Barnett, Michael. Dialogues in Arab Politics. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.
- Cordesman, Anthony H. Peace and War: The Arab-Israeli Military Balance Enters the 21st Century. New York: Praeger Publishers, 2001.
- Europa Publications. A Survey of Arab-Israeli Relations, 2nd ed. London: Taylor and Francis Group, 2002.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon, 1988.
- Hudson, Michael. Arab Politics: The Search of Legitimacy. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1977.
- Kerr, Malcolm H. The Arab Cold War: Gamal 'Abd Al-Nasir and His Rivals, 1958-1970. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Korany, Bahgat, and Ali E. Hillal Dessouli. The Foreign Policies of Arab States: The Challenge of Change, 2nd rev. ed. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1991.

- Massad, Joseph. Colonial Effects: The Making of National Identity in Jordan. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.
- Miller, Aron David. The Arab States and the Palestine Question: Between Ideology and Self-Interest. New York: Praeger Paperback, 1986.
- Pollack, Kenneth. Arabs at War: A Military Effectiveness, 1948–1991. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2002.
- Rubin, Barry. The Arab States and the Palestine Conflict. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1981.
- Seale, Patrick. Asad: The Struggle for the Middle East, reprint ed. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Telhami, Shibley, and Michael N. Barnett, eds. Identity and Foreign Policy in the Middle East. New York: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Zyadeh, Radwan. Al salamo al danee: Al mofawadat a soureyah–al esraeelyeah (The Pending Peace: The Syrian-Israeli Negotiations). Beirut, Lebanon: Centre for Arab Unity Studies, 2005.

—Khaled Hroub

Public Committee Against Torture in Israel

The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel (PCATI) is an independent human rights organization founded in 1990 and based in JERUSALEM. In September 1999, in response to a PCATI petition, nine justices of the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT prohibited the use of torture during interrogation. PCATI monitors the implementation of this ruling in detention centers and continues to oppose the use of torture in interrogation in Israel and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. In pursuing its objective, PCATI focuses on an information campaign aimed at raising public awareness of the subject and also uses legal means, including support of relevant legislation, provision of legal counsel, and advice and assistance to attorneys representing victims of torture. (www.stoptorture.org.il/eng).

Public Opinion

See POLLS AND PALESTINIAN PUBLIC OPINION

Al-Qaddumi, Farouq (1931–)

Farouq Al-Qaddumi (Abu Lutf) is, at least on paper, the most senior member of the FATAH movement and one of the last remaining Fatah founders. He headed the Political Department (foreign ministry) of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and served as the movement's foreign minister from 1973 onward. Born in Qalqilya in the northern WEST BANK, his family later relocated to HAIFA but was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and fled to NABLUS. When Qaddumi, like many other Palestinians, could not find work in the Arab east, he moved to SAUDI ARABIA in the early 1950s, where he worked for the Arabian American Oil Company (ARAMCO). He moved to EGYPT in 1954, where he earned degrees in sociology and economics from Cairo University in 1958. In the early 1960s, he joined Fatah and was one of the few hard-core BA'ATHIST ideologues in its leadership. In 1965, he moved to KUWAIT (where many Palestinian Fatah leaders relocated) and worked for the Kuwaiti government, but he was expelled in 1966. He relocated to JORDAN and then to SYRIA.

Qaddumi joined the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE in 1969 and led the Department of Popular Organizations, before heading the Political Department. He developed extensive contacts with the Arab states through the 1970s, although he was closest to Syria and IRAQ. Indeed, Qaddumi maintained excellent relations with the Syrian regime and often served as PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT's emissary to Damascus after Arafat and Syrian president Hafaz al-Asad had a serious falling-out. Qaddumi distanced himself from Arafat's inner circle and succeeded in insulating himself from the corruption that surrounded Arafat's lieutenants. Instead, he immersed himself in his work at the Political Department and in serving as de facto foreign minister for the PLO, although he often bitterly complained that Arafat's secret diplomacy undermined his position. He was considered a hard-liner in the movement and opposed Arafat's double-dealing and pragmatic diplomacy, particularly with Arab states. After the 1982 LEBANON WAR Qaddumi relocated to TUNIS with Arafat and other PLO leaders. In 1983 the pro-Syrian Palestinian dissidents who split from Fatah to form the FATAH UPRISING asked Qaddumi to join their ranks and head the movement. He apparently considered the idea but decided to stay at Arafat's side on the condition that Arafat would not tie himself to any Arab states. He then became secretary general of the Fatah Central Committee.

Qaddumi rejected the OSLO ACCORDS and refused to sign the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES. He never became a minister in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) or even entered PNA areas, but he continued to serve as PLO foreign minister. He was considered by many members of the Fatah Central Committee, who also rejected the Oslo Accords, as a potential successor or replacement of Arafat, but that was not to be.

He was not involved with the secret negotiations that led to the Oslo Accords and criticized Arafat and his policies publicly, yet he remained in the movement, feeling obligated to stay because the Political Department's vast budget was funded by Arafat. After the death of Arafat, Qaddumi, as the most senior member of the Fatah movement, constitutionally succeeded him as Fatah chairman; however, a Fatah General Conference was not held until August 2009, and MAHMUD ABBAS, with Arab and Israeli/US support, was chosen to head Fatah. Despite Qaddumi's sense of injustice, the rise of HAMAS, the militant Islamic group, in 2006 brought him closer to Abbas, who needed him to revive Fatah and the PLO in the face of Hamas's electoral success.

When Abbas finally planned to convene a meeting of Fatah's policymaking council, he insisted on holding it in occupied BETHLEHEM, which enabled Israel's security forces to completely control who could attend and who could not. Qaddumi was excluded, and the historic leadership of Fatah was split down the middle. Qaddumi called the decision illegitimate, unilateral, and negating the founding idea of Fatah back in the 1950s, which was to demand the “return” to their original homes and farms of all those Palestinians who had been expelled by the Jewish/Israeli forces in 1948, or who left during the intensity of that fighting, and have never been allowed to return home.

The split between Qaddumi and Abbas goes back to before Oslo. Abbas had been the main architect within Fatah and the PLO of the whole Oslo approach. His idea, as he said in interviews in the late 1980s, was to show the Israelis so much friendship, and give them so many assurances of concern for their safety, that they “could not avoid” meeting the Palestinians’ demand for an independent mini-state alongside Israel. At that time Qaddumi was the person on the PLO’s ruling Executive Committee charged with running PLO foreign policy. When Abbas pursued the discussions in Norway that led to the Oslo Accords, he was going behind Qaddumi’s back. But he had the backing of the powerful, yet always very manipulative, PLO/Fatah head, Yasir Arafat.

On 12 July 2009 (a month before Fatah’s conference), Farouq al-Qaddumi, still the secretary general of Fatah’s Central Committee, held a press conference in Amman, Jordan, in which he disclosed information impugning the legitimacy of the current Palestinian leadership. Holding up three typeset pages in Arabic, Qaddumi claimed he had the minutes of a secret meeting among Abu Mazen, MUHAMMAD DAHLAN, former Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON, former Israeli defense minister Shaul Mofaz, and a US delegation led by William Burns, then a State Department envoy. The meeting was presumably held in the run-up to the 4 June 2003 Aqaba Summit, where the Israeli and Palestinian sides declared their commitment to the QUARTET-sponsored ROAD MAP.

The document essentially alleges that Mahmud Abbas and Dahlan were privy to Israeli intentions to assassinate Arafat through poisoning. The need to get rid of Arafat and other Palestinian resistance figures is described as a means to facilitate an internal putsch within the PNA and Fatah so that a new class of leaders, led by Abbas and Dahlan, could take control. The assertions played across the Palestinian and Arab worlds like bombshells. Qaddumi’s allegations carry weight because he is one of the last remaining, heavy-hitting Palestinian figures from the era when the PLO was established and one of a handful of surviving founders of Fatah. Nevertheless, numerous critics challenged the veracity of the document as well as Qaddumi’s motivation because he had not publicly challenged Mahmud Abbas prior to this incident.

Qaddumi’s exclusion from the Fatah conference was compounded by his expulsion from the leadership of Fatah at the conference.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. “Fatah’s Leadership Crisis Deepens.” Weekly Middle East Analysis from Helena Cobban. Posted by hcobban in Uncategorized. July 25, 2009. <http://hcmideast.wordpress.com/category/uncategorized>.
- . The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Haddad, Toufic. “New Details on the Alleged Plot to Kill Arafat.” The Fastertimes. 15 July 2009. <http://thefastertimes.com/Palestine/2009/07/15/qaddoumis-hydrogen-bombshell-abu-mazen-was-privy-to-arafat-assassination-plot/>.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Institute for Palestine Studies Series. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1999.

—As’ad AbuKhalil

Al-Qassam, Shaykh ‘Izz al-Din (1882–1935)

Shaykh ‘Izz al-Din al-Qassam was a Muslim preacher, religious teacher, and social reformer who played a key role in the 1936 ARAB REVOLT in Palestine by mobilizing the peasants and laborers. Born in Jaballah near Latakia, SYRIA, he was educated at al-Azhar University and was associated with the conservative Sunni Salafi movement. He was a key figure in the 1921 Syrian revolt against FRANCE, which sentenced him to death, but he escaped and fled to HAIFA, Palestine, then under the BRITISH MANDATE. In Haifa he became imam of a masjid (mosque) and formed strong ties with the oppressed and downtrodden in the city. He was critical of the moderate approach toward the British taken by the mufti of JERUSALEM, AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, and the SUPREME MUSLIM COUNCIL.

He was a prominent member of the Young Men’s Muslim Association, and in 1929 he was appointed to a role in the Shari’a court in Haifa, which allowed him to tour the northern villages, whose inhabitants he encouraged to set up agricultural cooperatives. He was also keen to give young women political and religious education, setting up the women's group Rafiqat al-Qassam (the Comrades of Qassam). For the first time, women began to receive training in the use of weapons. As with his other work, al-Qassam focused his political activities on mobilizing the lower classes with whom he lived, setting up a night school for casual laborers, and recruiting followers from among the peasants throughout the Galilee and migrants in Haifa shantytowns to form an underground organization. When the mufti rejected his plans to divert funding for mosque repairs toward the purchase of weaponry, Qassam found support in the Arab nationalist ISTIQLAL movement. By 1935, al-Qassam had managed to enlist a substantial group of men well trained in military actions. His organization was known as the Black Hand, and his message was simple and found resonance among peasants: there must be unity, strict piety, struggle, and sacrifice to make a liberation movement to fight the British and the Zionists. Al-Qassam's success resided in his emulation of early Islamic heroes and in his transformation of traditional religious values into revolutionary practice. He fused the growing Palestinian nationalist sentiments with religion- and class-conscious components in an anti-colonial movement. Al-Qassam is considered by many historians as the spark that ignited the Arab Revolt of 1936–1939 against the British Mandate and the Zionist movement. His death by British soldiers led directly to the outbreak of the revolt, an act of fidelity to his call for revolt to claim Palestinians' rights in their LAND, which differed from the accommodating path of the elite a'yan (notables). In the 1980s the Islamist movement revived al-Qassam's heroic image as their symbol for resistance and sacrifice. HAMAS, the militant Islamic organization, named its military division AL-QASSAM BRIGADES and its QASSAM ROCKETS after al-Qassam.

See also ARAB REVOLT; ARMED STRUGGLE; ZIONISM

Bibliography

- Baroud, Ramzy. "Izz al-Din al-Qassam . . . an Inspiration for Muslims in Palestine." Muslimedia. 16–31 March 1999.
- Israeli Army. The Great Arab Revolt in Palestine 1936–1939: An Official Israeli Account, Vol. 2, Part 6: Sefer Toldot ha-Haganah (The History of the Hagana).

- Translated from the Hebrew into Arabic by Ahmad Khalifeh. Revised by Samir Jabbour. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestinian Studies, 1989 [1964].
- Kayyali, Abdel-Wahab. Palestine: A Modern History. London: Croom Helm, 1979.
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Milton-Edwards, Beverly. Islamic Politics in Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 1996.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- Sayigh, Rosemary. "Femmes Palestiniennes: Une histoire en quête d'historiens." Revue d'études Palestiniennes. 23 (Spring 1987).
- Swedenburg, Ted. Memories of Revolt: The 1936–39 Rebellion and the Palestinian National Past. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1945. Reprinted with a new afterword, Fayetteville: University of Arkansas, 2003.
- . "Al-Qassam Remembered." Alif: Journal of Comparative Poetics. 7 (1987).
- . "The Role of the Palestinian Peasantry in the Great Revolt (1936–1939)." In Islam, Politics and Social Movements. Edited by Edmund Burke and Ira Lapidus. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.
- Townshend, Charles. "The Defence of Palestine: Insurrection and Public Security, 1936–1939." English Historical Review. 103:409 (1988).

Al-Qassam Brigades

Al-Qassam Brigades, or 'Izz al-Din al-Qassam Brigades, is the armed branch of the Islamic resistance movement HAMAS. Officially established on 14 December 1987, the al-Qassam Brigades have taken credit for many of the SUICIDE BOMBINGS in Israel since 1994.

See also HAMAS

Bibliography

- Budeiri, Musa. "The Nationalist Dimension of Islamic Movements." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:3 (1995).
- Burgat, Francois. "Ballot Boxes, Militaries, and Islamic Movements." In The Islamism Debate. Edited by Martin Kramer. Tel Aviv, Israel: The Moshe Dayan Center, Tel Aviv University, 1997.
- International Crisis Group. "Enter Hamas: The Challenges of Political Integration." Middle East Report. 49 (January 2006).
- . "Islamic Social Welfare Activism in the Occupied Territories: A Legitimate Target?" Middle East Report. 13 (April 2003).
- Milton-Edwards, Beverly. Islamic Politics in Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 1996.

- Mishal, Shaul, and Avraham Sela. The Palestinian Hamas: Vision, Violence, and Coexistence. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.
- Mitchell, Richard P. The Society of the Muslim Brothers. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1993 [1969].
- Al-Nawati, Muhib Salman Ahmad. Hamas from the Inside. Gaza: Dar al-Shuruk l'il nashr, 2002.
- Nuesse, Andrea. Muslim Palestine: The Ideology of Hamas. London: Routledge, 1998.

Qassam Rockets

The Qassam rocket is a relatively primitive steel rocket filled with explosives that was developed by the Palestinian armed group HAMAS and named after the armed wing of Hamas, the AL-QASSAM BRIGADES. Three models have been used, but all three lack a guidance system. Human Rights Watch said that Qassam rockets are by their very nature problematic weapons because they cannot be directed at military targets with any degree of precision. "They are primitive, short-range, home-made rockets that do not have the technical capability to be guided." The original Qassam rocket was a 1-meter-long tube filled with 6 kilograms (13 pounds) of explosives and had a range of 3 to 10 kilometers (1.8 to 6.2 miles). The Qassam-2 has a range of up to 8.8 kilometers (5 miles) and can carry a payload of some 9 kilograms (20 pounds) of explosives. The upgraded rockets, or Qassam-3s, now have a range of more than 12.5 kilometers (7.5 miles). The longest shot to date was an attack on Ashkelon, an Israeli town 8 kilometers north of the Gaza Strip.

Qassams were first fired at Israeli targets on 16 April 2001; the firings have been ongoing and have increased in frequency since then. The first time an Israeli city was hit was on 5 March 2002, when two rockets struck Sderot.

Credible sources provide varying statistics on the number of Qassams fired into Israel and the number of resulting deaths. One states that from 2001 until May 2008, over 3,050 Qassam rockets have been fired at Israeli targets; these have killed fifteen Israelis and injured 433. Israeli photo-journalist Edi Israel reports that, between 2001 and 2008, twenty Israelis were killed, mostly civilians, and 583 were wounded, most not seriously, by some 15,000 Qassam rockets. B'Tselem reports that, from June 2004 to the end of 2007, eleven Israelis, four of them minors, were killed by Qassam rockets fired by Palestinians. According to United Nations figures, 1,194 Qassam rockets were fired at Israel (about 100 a month) in 2005; in 2006 the rocket fire increased to 1,786 (an average of 149 a month), and in 2007 it decreased to 1,331 (an average of 111 a month).

According to the al-Qassam Brigades, the Qassam rocket was first developed by Nidal Fat'hi Rabah Farahat and produced under the direction of Adnan al-Ghoul, known as the "Father of the Qassam," who was killed by the Israeli military in October 2004.

The rockets have been fired at various Israeli towns, in particular at Sderot and Kibbutz Saad and Nir Am in the Negev and, prior to ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in 2005, at some Israeli settlements in the Gaza Strip. However, they rarely caused injuries and did not kill an Israeli in Gaza until 28 June 2004.

Despite the Qassam's meager characteristics as a rocket, its use shocked the Israeli military and public, who are used to the Palestinians lacking any method of long-range warfare. The Lebanese group Hizbullah, in contrast, has long shelled Israel from Lebanon using the Katyusha rocket, hitting cities as well as farms and military targets in the sparsely populated northern border zone.

Israel has tried to stop the development and manufacture of Qassam rockets by assassinating suspected resistance fighters and by destroying facilities (such as metal shops) that could be, or actively are, used for their construction. It has also destroyed the family homes of many Palestinians it claims have been involved in the smuggling or firing of rockets.

See HAMAS

Bibliography

- Burgat, Francois. Face to Face with Political Islam. London: I. B. Tauris, 2003.
- Crooke, Alastair, and Beverley Milton-Edwards. "Elusive Ingredient: Hamas and the Peace Process." Journal of Palestine Studies. 33:4 (2004).
- Global Security. "Qassam Rockets." Globalsecurity.org. n.d. <http://www.globalsecurity.org/military/world/para/hamas-qassam.htm>.
- Hamad, Ghazi. "Divisions Emerge over Qassam Rockets." Palestine Report. 11 August 2004.
- Hroub, Khaled. Hamas: Political Thought and Practice. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 2000.
- Israel Project for Freedom, Security and Peace. Qassam Rockets and Mortars Fired from Gaza, 2003-2008. n.d. http://www.theisraelproject.org/site/c.hsJPK0PIJpH/b.4382271/k.5C4A/Qassam\_Rockets\_and\_Mortars\_Fired\_from\_Gaza\_20032008.htm.

Qassam Rocket. Encyclopedia Beta. n.d. http://experts.about.com/e/q/qa/Qassam\_rocket.htm.

Scheinberg, Stephen. "Qassam Rockets, No Easy Solution." MeretzUSA. 24 November 2007.

Qattan, A. M., Foundation

The A. M. Qattan Foundation is a private, family-funded, Palestinian foundation that began operating in 1998 with a focus on two principal areas: EDUCATION and culture. Its two major educational institutions are the Qattan Center for Educational Research and Development based in Ramallah, WEST BANK, and the Qattan Center for the Child in the GAZA STRIP. The Ramallah Center participates in raising the standards of education and teaching in Palestine by working directly with schoolteachers to develop their skills and improve their knowledge base and by attempting to create better learning conditions for Palestinian schoolchildren. A major objective of the center is improving the curriculum for students at all levels (one through twelve) by developing programs in the arts, alternative mathematics, narrative and language, technology, and other areas. Additionally, the foundation has launched a Culture and Science Program to provide financial and moral support to talented persons in a variety of fields of creative endeavor. (www.qattanfoundation.org).

Al-Qawuqji, Fawzi (1890–1977)

Fawzi al-Qawuqji was an Arab-nationalist military man from Tripoli, LEBANON, and graduate of the Ottoman Military Academy, who fought the British and French throughout the Middle East, including in Palestine. In 1936 he mobilized several hundred volunteers to fight alongside the Palestinians in the ARAB REVOLT, but he stayed in Palestine only a short time because of differences with local leaders. He returned again in 1947 as commander-in-chief of the ARAB LEAGUE'S 4,600 irregular forces. Never very effective on the battlefield, al-Qawuqji was ordered to leave Palestine in May 1948 when the regular armies of the Arab states entered the fray. He returned briefly to assist the Palestinians of JERUSALEM and later fought for a short time in northern Palestine.

Bibliography

Anis, Mona, and Omayma Abdel-Latif. "Fawzi Al-Qawuqji: Yesterday's Hero." Al-Ahram (Cairo). 1998.

Flapan, Simha. "The Palestinian Exodus of 1948." Journal of Palestine Studies. 16:4 (1987).

———. Zionism and the Palestinians. London: Croom Helm, 1979.

Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.

Rogan, Eugene L., and Avi Shlaim, eds. The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Qibya

Qibya was a WEST BANK Palestinian village, then under Jordanian occupation, that was a target of an Israeli reprisal attack on 14 October 1953. The military action by two Israeli units, a paratroop company, and UNIT 101, under the command of ARIEL SHARON, led to the death of over fifty Palestinians, almost all civilians, and the demolition of nearly all the houses in Qibya.

The attack was part of the Israeli strategy, in place from 1951, of carrying out massive military reprisals against Palestinian villages in the West Bank from which Israel believed that a cross-border INFILTRATION had come. The majority of such infiltrations were not military in character but involved Palestinians attempting to return to their homes, harvest their crops, locate family members, and so on. However, on 12 October 1953, an unarmed Jewish woman and her two children were killed in an armed infiltration. Under the order of Israeli defense minister Pinhas Lavon, the Israeli government decided to carry out a retaliatory operation against the village of Qibya, although there was no specific evidence that the infiltrators had come from there.

The military operation at Qibya took place in the evening of 14 October and began with an artillery barrage on the village that continued until Israeli troops reached its outskirts. Land mines were laid on roads to prevent Jordanian troops from fighting the Israelis. Israeli soldiers then laid explosives around many of the houses and blew them up. At dawn the operation was considered completed and the Israeli troops returned home. In addition to the deaths, forty-five villagers' houses were destroyed, as well as the mosque, the school, and the water reservoir. The Israeli government initially claimed that the operation was carried out by Jewish civilians living near the border but later admitted that it was done by military forces.

The original orders issued by the Israeli general staff were relatively confined in scale: "blowing up a number of houses . . . and hitting the inhabitants.” However, going down the command ladder, before they reached the units’ commanders, the orders changed to demand “maximum killing.” Sharon later wrote in his diary that he received orders to inflict heavy damage on the village’s inhabitants. “The orders were utterly clear: Qibya was to be an example for everyone.”

The UNITED NATIONS observer who investigated the scene, Major General Vagn Bennike, chief of staff of the UN TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION, wrote: “One story was repeated time after time: the bullet splintered the door, the body sprawled across the threshold, indicating that the inhabitants had been forced by heavy fire to stay inside until their homes were blown up over them.” Israeli historian Avi Shlaim wrote this of the massacre: “Sharon’s order was to penetrate Qibya, blow up houses and inflict heavy casualties on its inhabitants. His success in carrying out the order surpassed all expectations.” Initially, via the heavily censored ISRAELI MEDIA, the Israeli public was left unaware of the attack, but word got out through a number of sources, and the attack had far-reaching consequences. It was widely criticized, not only by the international community but also by many Israelis themselves. The UN Security Council condemned Israel in a resolution on 24 November, and the UNITED STATES temporarily suspended economic aid to Israel.

See also INFILTRATION (PALESTINIAN) AND RETALIATION (ISRAELI)

Bibliography

- Burke, Jason. “From Butcher to ‘Lion’ to Prime Minister of Israel.” The Guardian (London). 4 February 2001.
- Morris, Benny. “The Israeli Press and the Qibya Operation, 1953.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 25:4 (1996).
- . Israel’s Border Wars, 1949–1956: Arab Infiltration, Israeli Retaliation and the Countdown to the Suez War. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- . Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881–2001. New York: Vintage, 2001.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- United Nations Security Council. Resolution 101, “Condemning the Qibya Massacre.” 24 November 1953. www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/mideast/mid009.htm.

Quartet

The Quartet was a loose association among the UNITED STATES, the UNITED NATIONS, the EUROPEAN UNION, and the RUSSIAN FEDERATION that came together in Madrid, Spain, on 10 April 2002 to press for a peaceful settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Later, the Quartet produced the ROAD MAP—a process or set of procedures—for Israel and the Palestinians to follow so as to attain peace.

The Quartet first began to coalesce late in 2001, although it is not clear why the United States opted for this multilateral approach when it had a firm unilateral policy on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict (articulated most clearly in a speech by President GEORGE W. BUSH on 24 June 2002). The administration may have felt that, given its plans for a global war on TERRORISM in the post-9/11 era and its war on IRAQ, having a cooperative relationship with the Europeans, Russians, and the United Nations would be in its interest as it pursued controversial policies globally.

On 10 April 2002, the Quartet produced its first joint communiqué, calling for a TWO-STATE SOLUTION based on the relevant UN Security Council resolutions (UN RESOLUTIONS 242, 338, and 1397), for negotiations leading to Israeli withdrawals, and for Arab recognition of and peace with Israel. It warmly endorsed Saudi crown prince Abdullah’s peace initiative, in turn supported in Beirut in the ARAB LEAGUE Peace Initiative (27–28 March 2002), as a “significant contribution toward a comprehensive peace including SYRIA and LEBANON.”

In terms of immediate and concrete steps, the Quartet called on Israel to “halt immediately its military operations” in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and asked for an “immediate, meaningful ceasefire and an immediate Israeli withdrawal from Palestinian cities” to positions held on 28 September 2000. It required “an end to all SETTLEMENT activity” and called on the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) “to act decisively and take all possible steps within its capacity to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, including terrorist financing, and to stop incitement to violence.” To this end, the Quartet also urged the parties to agree to a cease-fire. Last, it called upon Arab states to assist in rebuilding the PNA and for international donors to contribute to a humanitarian relief effort in the wake of the destruction caused during Israel’s 2002 offensives.

From the outset, the Bush administration had pursued a significantly different policy on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict than that of its predecessors and of the Europeans and the United Nations. Bush was uninterested in mediation, preferring “conflict management”—for example, the cease-fire initiative of the Mitchell Commission Report (May 2001) and the Tenet Plan (June 2001)—and tilted decisively toward Israel. Then, just two months after the Quartet’s first joint policy communiqué, President Bush delivered a major policy address that was radically at odds with the Quartet’s statement. In fact, the president introduced two completely new elements into the Israeli-Palestinian equation: first, he insisted on a new Palestinian leadership before there could be any movement on a peace process, and second, he negated the concept of an independent Palestinian state, calling instead for a “provisional state.” Instead of urging the Arab states to bolster the PNA, Bush called on them to cooperate in suppressing all terrorism and incitement. And, instead of urging Israel to immediately halt its military operations and withdraw its forces, he stated that Israel could only be expected to do this “as we make progress towards security.” Bush set out major preconditions in the sphere of Palestinian political, economic, and social reform and specified that they must be fulfilled before Israel needed to reciprocate. Bush’s “performance-based plan” held the Palestinians to an extremely high standard while requiring little of the Israelis.

On 16 July in New York, the Quartet issued its second joint communiqué by explicitly reaffirming its first statement of 10 April; however, it went on to say that, although the Quartet “recognized [the] elected leader [the PNA] of the Palestinian people,” it also, like Bush, wanted reform in the PNA. It welcomed the willingness of Arab states to contribute to peacemaking and called upon them to do this by “helping Palestinians build institutions of good government and democracy.” The Quartet renewed its call for an immediate Israeli withdrawal from the Occupied Territories and progress in moving toward security. It affirmed a process of parallel Israeli and Palestinian peacemaking steps that appeared to differ from Bush’s emphasis on Palestinian performance in fighting terror and ending incitement and violence, and called for immediate Israeli release of Palestinian funds frozen at the beginning of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. The Quartet did not repeat Bush’s call for a provisional Palestinian state, but neither did it affirm the idea of an independent state. Although there were some variances between the Bush plan and the Quartet’s proposal, it appeared that the Quartet was moving closer to the Bush perspective.

On 17 September 2002, the Quartet issued a third communiqué, the Road Map, following a meeting of its principals as well as representatives of five Arab states (EGYPT, JORDAN, Lebanon, SAUDI ARABIA, and Syria), the Palestinians, and Israel. In the Road Map, the Quartet called for a “performance-driven and hope-driven” plan aimed at achieving a “final and comprehensive settlement within three years.” The 17 September communiqué, which more obviously reflected Bush’s ideas, implicitly endorsed the idea of a new Palestinian leadership produced by ELECTIONS. It also called for an Israeli halt to settlement activity but only following the Palestinian establishment of the conditions and reforms first outlined in the Bush speech. It also acknowledged Bush’s idea of a provisional Palestinian state by proposing that the definition of the state’s BORDERS be deferred to FINAL STATUS TALKS. It did, however, leave out one item from Bush’s proposal: it required immediate Israeli withdrawals in parallel with Palestinian steps rather than as a result of them.

This outline was finally fleshed out in a draft document circulated on 15 October 2002, entitled “Elements of a Performance-Based Roadmap to a Permanent Two-State Solution to the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict,” which would later be published as the official Road Map. Circulated in October and published in April, it described three phases of implementation for a final peace in 2005. The Quartet met again on 20 December 2002 to discuss the gap between Bush’s plan and the Quartet’s proposal. Bush indicated that he was “strongly committed to the vision that [he] outlined on June the 24th” and insisted the other members “get on board.”

On 18 March 2003, PNA president YASIR ARAFAT bowed to intense pressure for reform in the PNA and appointed a prime minister, MAHMUD ABBAS, who accepted the Road Map. The United States and Israel had demanded that Arafat be neutralized or sidelined in the Road Map process, claiming that he had not done enough to stop Palestinian attacks against Israelis while in charge, and the United States refused to release the Road Map until a Palestinian prime minister was named. With Abbas in place, the Road Map was released on 30 April 2003. On 26 May 2003, Israel announced a highly qualified acceptance of the plan with fourteen reservations—substantive enough to undercut the acceptance.

With Israel opposed to the involvement of the European Union, Russia, and the United Nations and with the United States unhappy with the Quartet's divergences from Bush's June 2002 parameters—though at this point they were minor indeed—any meaningful diplomacy on the Israel-Palestine question was ended. Then, less than a year later, Israel came up with a “revised disengagement plan” after it concluded “that at present, there is no Palestinian partner with whom it is possible to make progress on a bilateral peace process.” This was the genesis of ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA. The first paragraph of the plan continued: “The State of Israel is committed to the peace process and aspires to reach an agreed resolution of the conflict based upon the vision of US President George Bush.”

With this unilateral move, Israel simply eliminated the Palestinian people from the list of decisionmakers and in practice abolished all the agreements signed with them—from the OSLO ACCORDS to the Road Map. George Bush was in full collaboration with Israel on this step and in turn persuaded the Quartet to accept Israel's “Revised Disengagement Plan” for all of the Occupied Territories.

Bibliography

- Annan, Kofi. “Quartet Statement on Israel-Palestinian Peace Process.” Jewish Virtual Library. 4 May 2004. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourcel/Peace/quartet1.html.
- Anthony, John Duke. “Crown Prince Abdullah's Peace Initiative.” Saudi-American Forum. 10 December 2002.
- Avnery, Uri. “Decoding Sharon's Speech.” Znet. 24 December 2003. <http://www.zmag.org/znet>.
- . “Gaza Withdrawal: Israel's Intelligence Scandal.” Counterpunch. 21 June 2004.
- Benn, Aluf. “Sharon Fleshes Out His Own ‘Road Map’: Prime Minister Insists on a Complete Termination of Terror and Full PA Reform.” Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 26 January 2003.
- Carter, Jimmy. Palestine Peace, Not Apartheid. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2006.
- Christison, Kathleen. “What Sharon Wants, Sharon Gets.” Counterpunch. 27 May 2003.
- Mandel, Daniel. “Four-Part Disharmony: The Quartet Maps Peace.” Middle East Quarterly (Summer 2003).
- McGreal, Chris. “Sharon Derides EU Peace Efforts: Israeli Leader Says Only the US View Is Relevant.” The Guardian (London). 20 January 2003.
- Said, Edward. “Archaeology of the Roadmap.” Al-Ahram Weekly (Cairo). 15 June 2003.
- Sharon, Ariel. “Disengagement Plan of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon—Revised.” Disengagement Plan: Original Version and Letters Exchanged between Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and President George W. Bush. 28 May 2004. http://www.knesset.gov.il/process/docs/DisengageSharon\_eng\_revised.htm.
- . “Israel's Acceptance of the Roadmap with 14 Reservations.” Bitterlemons.org. 27 May 2003. www.bitterlemons.org/docs/14reservations.html.
- Siegmán, Henry. “Don't Be Fooled by Sharon's ‘New’ Message.” International Herald Tribune. 26 December 2003.

Qurei', Ahmad Ali Muhammad (1937–)

Ahmad Qurei' (Abu Ala) is an economist who was director-general of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION'S (PLO) Economic Department. He was an architect of the OSLO ACCORDS between the PLO and Israel, a PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) legislator, head of the Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC), and PNA prime minister. Born in ABU DIS (a suburb of JERUSALEM), Qurei' remained in the WEST BANK under Jordanian rule and then fled in 1968 after the Israeli OCCUPATION to SAUDI ARABIA, where he worked as a banker. He joined the FATAH party in the late 1960s and moved to LEBANON with the PLO after BLACK SEPTEMBER, the 1970 civil war in JORDAN.

As head of the PLO's economic and production enterprises in Lebanon, Qurei' developed a system (SAMED) for employing Palestinians and marketing the products they produced. By the mid-1980s, his business generated an annual income of about $40 million and, with 6,500 full-time employees, ranked as one of the largest employers in Lebanon. When the PLO was forced out of Lebanon, Qurei' went to TUNIS with PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT. With the death or assassination of other senior PLO leaders, he gradually gained more influence until he was elected a member of the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE in 1989.

That marked the start of his political career, and he began to play an increasing role in peace negotiations. He was the key Palestinian negotiator in the Oslo Accords, after which he continued to participate in numerous negotiations with the Israelis. One of his main contributions was to help put together a Palestinian development plan, which was presented to a World Bank conference on aid in 1993. It was Qurei' who came up with the idea and found funding for the plan, which then became a central aspect in the PLO's development strategy for the Palestinian territories. He played a key role in developing the PALESTINIAN ECONOMIC COUNCIL FOR DEVELOPMENT AND RECONSTRUCTION (PECDAR), an organization that raises international capital from donor countries for projects in the Occupied Territories, and headed it until he was elected to the PLC in 1996.

Since founding PECDAR, Qurei' has continued to play a crucial role in the organization and was, additionally, minister of economy and trade and minister of industry in the PNA from 1994 to 1996. He also headed the negotiations for the GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT II on economic relations between the autonomous Palestinian territories and Israel in April 1994 and negotiated the Oslo INTERIM AGREEMENT in September 1995.

After the resignation of Palestinian prime minister MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen) on 6 September 2003, Arafat nominated Qurei' to fill the post, but Qurei' said he would only accept the job if Washington "guarantees Israeli compliance with a United States-backed peace plan, including a halt to military strikes." Although the UNITED STATES provided no guarantees, he bowed to pressure from Arafat and accepted the position. Appointed by an emergency decree on 5 October 2003, he was sworn in on 7 October but on 12 October threatened to resign due to a dispute with Arafat over control of the security services. The emergency cabinet's term expired on 4 November, and Qurei' declared that he was willing to lead a new cabinet provided he could obtain the support of the PLC, which he received on 12 November. Nevertheless, on 17 July 2004 he submitted his resignation amid growing chaos in the GAZA STRIP, the rising strength of HAMAS, and the kidnapping of Palestinian security officials, including the chief of police for the Gaza Strip and five Frenchmen. Arafat refused to accept his resignation, reportedly drawing a giant X over Qurei's letter of resignation.

Subsequently, Arafat granted Qurei' limited control over parts of the security apparatus, one of the powers he requested to carry out reforms, and Qurei' retracted his resignation on 27 July 2004, stating: "I am satisfied that President Arafat is serious this time, that it is not just words but that this time there will be action." Arafat, however, retained control over the bulk of the dozen or so security services, which Qurei' and other critics claimed exhibited internal corruption and lawlessness, while United States-led mediators blamed the Palestinians for preventing the advance of the ROAD MAP for peace.

When Arafat became ill in October 2004, Qurei', together with Abbas, took control of the PNA and PLO. After Arafat's death and Abbas's subsequent victory in the Palestinian presidential election of 2005, Qurei' was asked to continue in his post and form a new cabinet. Because of repeated demands by Fatah officials and PLC members to make the new cabinet more reform-minded, a vote of confidence was repeatedly delayed. It was finally passed on 24 February 2005 after Qurei' revised the list of ministers to accommodate these demands.

In 2004, a Palestinian parliamentary committee found that Qurei's family company, Al-Quds Cement, ships cement to Israel from Egypt. That cement, the committee found, was specifically used for building the Barrier. The inquiry committee first investigated whether Qurei's cement company had been selling cement to Israeli settlements. On 11 February 2004, Israeli Channel 10 TV reported that the Al-Quds Cement company was providing the materials to help build Israel's Barrier Wall. Television footage also showed cement mixers leaving the Al-Quds company and driving to the Jewish settlement of MA'ALE ADUMIM, just a few kilometers away. Qurei' denied the claims.

A further serious scandal involving Ahmad Qurei' emerged when the PNA ambassador to Romania, Adli Sadek, released a document purporting to demonstrate that Qurei' deposited $3 million of PLO funds into his private bank account. Qurei' published a strong denial in the PALESTINIAN MEDIA. While admitting that he did take the money, Qurei' said he transferred the sum to a PLO bank account. He added that the $3 million was part of a $5 million investment that had been deposited in a bank account under Yasir Arafat's name.

Qurei' argues that some of his rivals in Fatah are trying to discredit him so as to destroy his chances of emerging as potential successor to Abbas, whose term in office officially expired. Sources close to Qurei' have named former Fatah security commander MUHAMMAD DAHLAN and top PLO official YASIR 'ABD RABBU as those behind the "smear campaign." Qurei' has demanded that Fatah take disciplinary measures against the two, vowing to file libel suits against all those who try to damage his reputation.

Bibliography

Abu Toameh, Khaled. "Palestinian Affairs: Abbas's Latest Headaches." The Jerusalem Post. 27 March 2008.

Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.

El Fassed, Arjan. "Cement and Corruption." The Electronic Intifada. 11 June 2004.

Qurei', Ahmad. From Oslo to Jerusalem: The Palestinians' Story of the Secret Negotiations. Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave, 2006.

---

R

---

Ra'am

Ra'am (Reshima Aravit Me'uhedet, or United Arab List) is a primarily Palestinian political party in Israel that was established in 1996 as a union between two political forces: the ARAB DEMOCRATIC PARTY (consisting of Hezb al-Democraty al-Arabi and Miflaga Democratit Aravit) and elements related to the Islamic movement and to the National Unity Front. (It is not related to the original United Arab List that existed in the late 1970s and early 1980s.) In the 1966 elections, the party won four seats. During the Knesset term, the Arab Democratic Party became a faction within the United Arab List, and its name was dropped from the party title.

The next elections saw the party increase its share of the vote and pick up five seats. However, internal disagreements saw three members of the Knesset leave; two left and established the Arab National Party and the third left and formed the National Unity–National Progressive Alliance Party. In the 2003 elections, Ra'am support dropped by more than a third, with the party winning only two seats.

For the 2006 elections the party entered an alliance with AHMAD TIBI's Ta'al party. Running together, the alliance won four seats, three of which were taken by the United Arab List. The same alliance was maintained for the 2009 elections, which initially saw the Israeli Central Elections Committee ban the party from participating, but this was overturned by the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT. In these elections, the alliance again won four seats.

Ra'am supports the creation of a Palestinian state, with East JERUSALEM as its capital, and a TWO-STATE SOLUTION as a resolution for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Ra'am also promotes strengthening the Arab sector within Israel. In the 1999 elections, it won five seats, making it the largest Israeli-Palestinian list in the Knesset. Its constituency consists mostly of religious and/or nationalist Israeli Arabs, and it enjoys popularity among the BEDOUIN.

Bibliography

Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.

Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.

Rabat Summit, 1974

The Rabat Summit conference in October 1974 brought together the leaders of twenty Arab states, including JORDAN's King Husayn and representatives of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). The PLO asked the conference for an official statement to the effect that any Palestinian territory liberated by Arab forces would be turned over to the "Palestinian people" as represented by the PLO. Although Jordan protested, because it had its own designs for reoccupying the WEST BANK, the summit adopted a compromise solution that favored PLO interests. The conference formally acknowledged the right of the Palestinian people to a separate homeland but without specifying that its territory was restricted to the West Bank. Most important, the PLO was for the first time officially recognized by all the Arab states as the "sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people." The Arab heads of state further called for close cooperation between the front-line states (EGYPT, Jordan, SYRIA, and LEBANON) and the PLO but prohibited interference by other Arab states in Palestinian affairs. The Rabat Summit declaration conferred a mantle of legitimacy on the PLO that had been previously absent. It gave official Arab recognition to PLO territorial claims to the West Bank and unambiguously put the fate of the Palestinian people solely in the hands of the PLO.

Although King Husayn opposed the declaration, he eventually signed it under intense Arab pressure and after the Arab oil-producing states promised to provide Jordan with an annual subsidy of US$300 million. Despite his acquiescence to the Rabat declaration and subsequent statements in support of the PLO, Husayn persisted in viewing the West Bank as rightly Jordanian territory, although the PLO, along with the rest of the Arab world, viewed Husayn's consent at Rabat as a renunciation of Jordanian claims to the West Bank. The wide gulf separating the two views was the major source of tension between the PLO and Jordan throughout the late 1970s and early 1980s.

Following the Rabat Summit and because of it, the PLO scored an impressive political victory in the international arena. In late November 1974, the UNITED NATIONS recognized PLO representation of the Palestinian people, and PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT addressed the General Assembly. In addition, in a joint communiqué issued the same month, US president GERALD R. FORD and general secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union Leonid Brezhnev acknowledged the "legitimate interests" of the Palestinians in accordance with UN resolutions. Nonetheless, a UN draft resolution in 1976 proposing to reaffirm the right of the Palestinians to self-determination—including the right to establish an independent state—was vetoed by the UNITED STATES in the Security Council. In the coming years, the PLO was invited to establish diplomatic missions in over 100 countries.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.

Rabbis for Human Rights

Rabbis for Human Rights (RHR) was founded in 1988 in response to serious abuses of human rights by the Israeli military authorities in the suppression of the First INTIFADA. The indifference of much of the country's religious leadership and religiously identified citizenry to the suffering of Palestinians during the uprising was a cause of concern to the Israeli organization. RHR's intent is to remind and demonstrate to both the religious and nonreligious sectors of the public that Judaism has another face, that human rights abuses are not compatible with the age-old Jewish tradition of humaneness and moral responsibility or the biblical concern for "the stranger in your midst"—even in the face of the danger to public order and safety, which the uprising represented to Israel.

RHR is the only Orthodox (or other) religious organization in Israel concerned specifically with giving voice to the Jewish tradition of human rights and the only one that teaches a different understanding of the Jewish tradition. It comprises rabbinic organizations made up of Reform, Orthodox, Conservative, and Reconstructionist rabbis and students. RHR has no affiliation with any political party or ideology and counts among its members rabbis in national leadership positions as well as educators and congregational rabbis capable of influencing change at the grassroots level. RHR attempts to encourage thinking about human rights through the development of a Talmudic-style commentary on the Israeli DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. After completion, this document will be used as a tool in Israeli schools to help Israeli youth understand their rights and obligations as members of a Jewish, democratic state with respect for universal human rights for all peoples. (www.rhr.israel.net).

Rabin, Yitzhak (1922–1995)

Yitzhak Rabin was an Israeli general, politician, and prime minister who was born in JERUSALEM. Following the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS, Rabin received the 1994 Nobel Peace Prize together with Israeli foreign minister SHIMON PERES and PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman YASIR ARAFAT.

Rabin's father immigrated to Palestine in 1917 from the UNITED STATES, and his mother in 1919 from the Ukraine. On completing his secondary schooling, Rabin volunteered for the PALMAH, the elite Zionist fighting force, when it was founded in 1940, and he participated in the Allied invasion of SYRIA in 1941. In 1944, as second in command of a Palmah battalion, he took part in underground military actions against the BRITISH MANDATE regime. In April 1948, Rabin was appointed commander of an elite Palmah unit, the Harel Brigade. Together with YIGAL ALLON, he was responsible for the conquest of LYDDA and RAMLA and the expulsion of the Palestinian residents of the two towns in Operation Danny. Thereafter, Rabin went on to "cleanse" the Negev of Palestinians. After 1948, he joined the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) and remained in the army for twenty-seven years. In the 1967 WAR, as chief of staff, he presided over the defeat of JORDAN, EGYPT, and Syria and the conquest of vast Palestinian and Arab territories.

After retiring from IDF service on 1 January 1968, Rabin was appointed Israeli ambassador to the United States. He returned to Jerusalem in the spring of 1973 amid something of a scandal over his wife's private bank accounts and became active in the Israeli LABOR PARTY. In the December 1973 elections, he won election to the Knesset, and when GOLDA MEIR formed her government in April 1974, he became minister of labor. When Meir's government resigned shortly afterward, on 2 June 1974, the Knesset voted in a new government headed by Rabin. As prime minister, he placed a special emphasis on improving the economy, solving social problems, and strengthening the IDF. Under intense US mediation, he concluded the interim agreement with Egypt in 1975, and consequently the first memorandum of understanding was signed between the government of Israel and the United States. In June 1976, the Rabin government ordered the ENTEBBE rescue operation after a Palestinian group hijacked a commercial French plane.

Following the Labor Party's defeat in the May 1977 elections, Rabin served as a member of the Knesset in the opposition and was a member of the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee until the formation of the National Unity Government in September 1984, in which he served as minister of defense from September 1984 to March 1990. As defense minister during the First INTIFADA, Rabin imposed stringent repressive measures, an "IRON FIST," against what was essentially a nonviolent civil uprising. He instructed the Israeli security forces, without fear of punishment, to enter Palestinian homes and "break the bones" of the residents. During the first two years of the Intifada, 120,000 Palestinians were arrested.

From March 1990 to June 1992, Rabin again served as a Knesset member in the opposition. Before the 1992 elections, in the Labor Party's first nationwide primaries, he was elected party chairman in February 1992, and, in the June 1992 national elections, he was elected prime minister. Although Rabin had given reluctant approval to the secret Oslo talks with the PLO, which were initiated by Peres, he was less than enthusiastic when he was informed of the outcome. On 13 September 1993 in Washington, D.C., Rabin, Peres, and Arafat signed the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES

(DOP) outlining proposed interim self-government arrangements, ostensibly the first step in the Palestinian quest for statehood. The first of the GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT, signed in Cairo on 4 May 1994, addressed the implementation of the first stage of the DOP.

Although Rabin was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his participation in the OSLO PROCESS, in a 21 September 1993 speech to the Knesset, Rabin articulated the limits to the peace process with the Palestinians: "This agreement [DOP], which permits the Palestinians to run their affairs, safeguards the following issues for Israel: Unified Jerusalem remains under Israel's rule, and the body that will run the lives of the Palestinians in the territories will have no authority over it. . . . United and unified Jerusalem is not negotiable and will be the capital of the Israeli people under Israel's sovereignty . . . forever and ever. . . . The Israeli SETTLEMENTS in Judea, Samaria [the West Bank], and Gaza will remain under Israel's rule without any change whatsoever in their status. The authority of the Palestinian Legislative Council will not apply to any Israeli in the areas of Judea, Samaria, and Gaza. The IDF will continue to bear overall responsibility for the security of the Israeli settlements in the territories, the security of every Israeli staying in the territories, and for external security—namely for the defense of the current confrontation lines along the Jordan River and for the Egyptian border. The IDF will deploy in all areas of Judea, Samaria, and the Gaza District on the basis of these missions. All the issues pertaining to the permanent arrangement will be put off for the negotiations that will begin two years after the date stipulated in the agreement, while preserving the Israeli government's freedom to determine its positions regarding the permanent solution. This means that the Declaration of Principles leaves all the options open on this issue. . . . The [Palestinian Legislative] Council will be established only after we agree with the Palestinians about its structure, composition, and functions. . . . In any event, the might of the IDF—the best army in the world—is available for our use if, God forbid, we are faced with such a challenge [from the Palestinians]. . . . Above all, I want to tell you that this is a great victory for ZIONISM."

Rabin again addressed the Knesset on 5 October 1995: "The Palestinians will have a policing authority regarding civilian issues, subject to several constraints. . . . [It] allows blanket [IDF] protection of . . . the settlements in the Gaza Strip.

. . . [There are] constraints on Palestinian building and other issues. . . In other areas—such as religion, ARCHAEOLOGY, WATER, electricity, construction and planning, telecommunications, postal services, and population registration affairs—the transfer of power will be subject to certain constraints in order to secure essential Israeli interests. . . . [It] stipulates that a liaison committee . . . will be established to . . . decide on the principles concerning the entry of persons who left Judea and Samaria in 1967. Take note we are not talking about REFUGEES from 1948 but about people displaced in 1967. . . . This clause stipulates that all decisions on this issue must be made unanimously by all the members of the [joint Liaison] committee. In other words, without Israel's agreement, the committee will not be able to determine how many people will be allowed in and in what stages" (emphasis added).

On 11 May 1994, Rabin put before the Knesset his detailed plans for a permanent settlement, which differed drastically from that of the Palestinian and other observers (except for the United States) regarding the meaning of the Oslo Accords. Rabin stated: "[T]he permanent solution lies in the territory of the State of Israel made up of Eretz Yisrael as it was under the BRITISH MANDATE . . . and alongside it, a Palestinian entity that will be the home of the majority of the Palestinian residents of the Gaza Strip and West Bank. We want the entity to be less than a state. . . . The BORDERS of the State of Israel . . . will exceed the borders that existed prior to the Six Day War. We will not return to the lines of 4 June 1967. . . . [A] united Jerusalem—to include also MA'ALE ADUMIM and GIV'AT ZE'EV—[will serve] as the capital of Israel, under Israeli sovereignty. . . . The security border for the defense of the State of Israel will be situated in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY [the eastern salient of the West Bank] along the broadest possible interpretation of that term. There will be settlement blocs . . . [throughout] Judea and Samaria. . . . I must stress the activity to build security components at the Israeli settlements: fences, by-pass ROADS, lights, electronic gates. The by-pass roads are aimed at enabling Israelis to move without crossing the Palestinian population areas. . . . [We will maintain] responsibility for external security on the borders with Egypt and Jordan, in the airspace over all the territories, and in the naval space in the Gaza Strip" (emphasis added).

Rabin was devoted to the ALLON PLAN and stated repeatedly in public (and private) pronouncements that nothing in the Oslo agreement contradicted that plan. Devised in 1967, the Allon Plan calls for Israeli retention of the Jordan Valley, including the Allenby border crossing with Jordan, absorption of the Judean "desert" region, and the creation of a vastly expanded "GREATER JERUSALEM" that would connect the three areas. The plan indicates that a Palestinian "autonomous" area, whatever its final boundaries, would be an island—or islands—surrounded by Israeli territory, settlements, and military installations.

Thus, Rabin's vision of peace with the Palestinians included territorial compromise only to the extent of ensuring that Israel would maintain an 80 percent Jewish majority in its sovereign territory, and he ruled out a return to the 1949 ARMISTICE AGREEMENT borders. He demanded permanent control of the Jordan Valley as a security border and cited Israel's cluster of communities in Gaza as a model for places to be retained by Israel in a permanent solution. Rabin ruled out the uprooting of any settlement until a permanent agreement was reached. He also emphasized Israel's commitment to retain control over Jewish HOLY SITES in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, including the Cave of the Patriarchs/AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in HEBRON and Joseph's Tomb in NABLUS. Rabin introduced an additional key element of conditionality, linking Israel's further withdrawals from the Occupied Territories to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) and changing the Palestine National Covenant, the founding document, which does not recognize Israel. Rabin further declared, "No [Palestinian] detainee or PRISONER will be released unless he signs a commitment to obey the law, to not commit acts of TERRORISM and involvement in them." Hundreds remained in jail because they refused to sign.

Following the Israeli-PLO Accords, Rabin and King Husayn signed the Israel-Jordan peace treaty on 26 October 1994. On 4 November 1995, a Jewish fundamentalist, YIGAL AMIR, who was influenced by settler rabbis to believe it was against God's will to give away any portion of the biblical land Eretz Yisrael, assassinated Rabin. In considering Rabin's contributions, at the very least, he was a man of many contrapositions. Israeli analyst Gideon Levy pointed out many of these contradictions. Rabin waged war and made peace, issued commands to break the bones of Palestinians, and sat with them at the negotiating table. He built settlements while condemning the settlers in scathing terms. He signed an accord with the PLO but refrained from evacuating even a single settlement. He deliberated with Arafat while expressing physical repugnance for him. He claimed to be ready to travel to Gush Etzion with a visa but did nothing to advance this issue. He was shocked by the massacre of twenty-nine Palestinians in Hebron carried out by Jewish settler BARUCH GOLDSTEIN but was unwilling to evacuate the Hebron settlers.

When he refused to remove the Hebron settlers, Rabin revealed an important, if rarely mentioned, characteristic: although a statesman, he was somehow lacking in courage. Perhaps if he had evacuated the Hebron settlers then, when an excellent opportunity for this arose, he would have prevented the development of the leviathan that grew in the city and that has succeeded in driving tens of thousands of Palestinians from their homes. He also did not have the courage to put the evacuation of settlements, even from the Gaza Strip, on the Oslo agenda, despite his conviction that at least some of them should be evacuated. The decision to recognize the PLO and sign an agreement with it was a courageous act, but it came after years of refusing to deal with the Palestinian organization, years in which the settlement movement implanted itself in the Occupied Territories and in Israeli politics, and years of bloodshed and suffering on both sides.

Bibliography

- Horovitz, David, ed. Shalom Friend: The Life and Legacy of Yitzhak Rabin. New York: Newmarket Press, 1996.
- Karpin, Michael, and Ina Friedman. Murder in the Name of God: The Plot to Kill Yitzhak Rabin. New York: Metropolitan Books, 1989.
- Koret, Reuven. "Rabin Was Right." Reprinted from 29 March 2004. Israelinsider. 26 October 2004. <http://web.israelinsider.com/Views/3471.htm>.
- Kort, Michael. Yitzhak Rabin. Minneapolis: Millbrook Press, 1996.
- Kurzman, Dan. Soldier of Peace: The Life of Yitzhak Rabin, 1922–1995. New York: HarperCollins, 1998.
- Levy, Gideon. "The Rabin State." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 2 October 2005.
- Milstein, Uri, and Aryeh Amit. The Rabin File: An Unauthorized Expose. New York: Gefen Publishing House, 1999.
- Morris, Benny. "Operation Dani and the Palestinian Exodus from Lydda and Ramleh in 1948." Middle East Journal. 40 (Winter 1986).

- Pappé, Ilan. The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951. London: I. B. Tauris, 1994.
- Peri, Yoram, ed. The Assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000.
- Rabin, Yitzhak. "Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Speech to the Extraordinary Knesset Session on the Interim Agreement, Jerusalem, 5 October 1995 (Excerpts)." Journal of Palestine Studies. 25:2 (1996).
- . Rabin Memoirs, expanded ed. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.
- . "Yitzhak Rabin, Speech to the Knesset on Gaza-Jericho Agreement, Jerusalem, 11 May 1994 (Excerpts)." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:1 (1994).
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Rafah Crossing

The Rafah border crossing, between the GAZA STRIP and EGYPT, is Gaza's sole connection with the outside world not under direct Israeli control. In the context of Israel's CLOSURE of all other crossings from Gaza during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, Rafah became a vital window for Gaza residents seeking to enter or leave the Strip for Egypt or other parts of the world. During the periods that regular traffic through Rafah crossing was possible, tens of thousands of people traveled through it in both directions every month. However, beginning in June 2006, Israel, in cooperation with Egypt, kept the crossing closed 85 percent of the time, and after June 2007 it was permanently closed. Gazans wanting to travel abroad, access HEALTH CARE services unavailable in Gaza, seek opportunities for academic studies or employment abroad, end long separations of family members on either side of the border, or engage in commerce and business were increasingly unable to do so. The closure contributed to a humanitarian disaster in Gaza and a feeling among residents of the Gaza Strip that they are enclosed, isolated, and entrapped, resulting in severe psychological repercussions. The Gaza Strip is often referred to as the world's largest open-air prison and this characterization is not hyperbolic.

Historic Background

The Gaza Strip was created following the 1948 WAR; its BORDERS were determined in the ARMISTICE AGREEMENT between Israel and Egypt in 1949; and until 1967, it was under Egyptian administration. Under Cairo's control, entrance into Egypt for Palestinians in Gaza through the Rafah border required a travel document, and this Egyptian document obliged its holder to have a visa to enter or transit Egypt.

After Israel occupied the Gaza Strip in 1967, the Israeli army declared the entire Strip a CLOSED MILITARY ZONE, whose residents could leave only with the approval of the district commander. In 1972, residents were given general exit PERMITS to Israel and the West Bank (a policy that remained in effect until 1991), although those who wished to travel abroad still had to acquire Israeli exit permits, which involved a protracted and tedious bureaucratic procedure. Israel denied many such requests for permits over the years based on individual or collective restrictions. Under the general exit permit system, Gazans wanting to journey abroad—subject to Israel’s approval—could travel to al-Arish (approximately 30 miles [50 kilometers] from Gaza’s border) in Israeli-occupied Egyptian Sinai, but only for “humanitarian reasons” and in coordination with the International Red Cross. Or they could pass through ERETZ CROSSING into Israel, and from there either travel through the Allenby Bridge between the West Bank and JORDAN or fly via Ben Gurion Airport. After signing a peace agreement with Egypt (1979) and withdrawing from the Sinai (1982), Israel opened Rafah Crossing on 25 April 1982, under the operation of the Israel Airports Authority (IAA), once again becoming the link between the Gaza Strip and Egypt.

In September 1991 the general exit permits, which had to be secured in advance, were canceled, and Israel imposed a much harsher, more restrictive policy on Gaza Strip residents under which they were required to ask for exit permits at the border crossing on their way abroad. (This requirement remained in effect until the implementation of ISRAEL’S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in September 2005.) Nevertheless, until the outbreak of the Second INTIFADA in late September 2000, Rafah was open twenty-four hours a day, almost every day, except for Yom Kippur (the Jewish Day of Atonement) and Eid al-Adha (the Muslim Festival of Sacrifice). During those years, between 1,200 and 1,500 Palestinians crossed through Rafah every day in both directions, and twice as many in the summer, when relatives from Arab countries came to visit the Gaza Strip.

In the first stage of the implementation of the OSLO ACCORDS, that is, GAZA-JERICHO Agreement

I (the Cairo Agreement), signed in 1994 between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, which defined the transfer of powers from Israel to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in Gaza and Jericho, Rafah came under joint Israeli and Palestinian control. The agreement, however, left Israel with full security responsibility at the crossing and the power to prohibit the crossing of Palestinians not registered in the Population Registry or whom Israel deemed “security threats,” as well as the right to interrogate or detain travelers. Simultaneous with the negotiation of Gaza-Jericho I, in 1994, Israel built a 36-mile [60-kilometer] BARRIER around the Gaza Strip composed of barbed-wire coils, an electronic fence, and two patrol roads. The ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) layered restrictions around the strip, including remote control machine guns, robotic jeeps, a double fence, ditches, and fifty cement pillboxes equipped with 50-caliber machine guns with laser sights that can be fired from Israeli control rooms equipped with monitors. Additionally, along the Egyptian border with Rafah, Israel erected a steel and concrete wall along the PHILADELPHI ROUTE, with several large armored posts across it.

Nevertheless, Rafah Crossing essentially continued to function in the same way it had in previous years. Despite the presence of Israeli and Palestinian security officers, a similar number of people continued to travel between the Gaza Strip and Egypt every day, although Israel persisted in restricting the exit of Palestinians traveling abroad as it saw fit—even though the agreement did not require a resident of the Strip to obtain a permit from Israel to go overseas. Moreover, as with the Israeli practice before the Oslo Accords, residents did not know that Israel had classified them as “denied permission to go abroad” for security reasons until their arrival at the border.

From the Outbreak of the Intifada (2000) until the Disengagement (2005). With the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada in September 2000, Israel began closing Rafah Crossing periodically. Meanwhile, it prevented the residents of Gaza from going abroad by other means and drastically restricted their access to Israel and the West Bank. On 17 January 2001, Israel completely took over Rafah Crossing and forbade the entrance of the Palestinian border terminal staff. The longest initial period of closure ran from December 2004 to January 2005, following an incident in which Palestinians killed five Israeli soldiers and injured another five by blowing up a tunnel dug under an Israeli sentry position at the crossing. Rafah Crossing remained closed for forty days for entry and fifty-two days for exit, preventing the passage of tens of thousands of Palestinians who were accustomed to crossing between Egypt and the Gaza Strip. On the days that it was open, Rafah Crossing usually operated for only seven hours, compared to the previous twenty-four hours a day. Israel defined tens of thousands of residents of the Gaza Strip as “denied permission to go abroad for security reasons” and imposed collective restrictions for varying lengths of time according to age and family status. Israel forbade the passage through Rafah of people aged sixteen through thirty-five, including the sick, for four and a half months in 2003, as well as for ten months from April 2004 to February 2005. With few exceptions, Egypt also made the terms of entrance into its territory stricter and in the years of the Intifada required all residents of the Gaza Strip to obtain entrance visas to Egypt, a requirement previously applied only to men under the age of forty. The frequent closure of Rafah Crossing, the reduction of its hours of opening, and the restrictions imposed on those passing through it greatly extended the waiting time for travelers, which could last for a number of days or even weeks. Likewise, the number of Gaza Strip residents who managed to travel abroad through Rafah Crossing dropped significantly. According to IAA figures for the years 2001–2004, the average number of passengers per day was 590, meaning there was a 54 percent decrease from the 1,300 passengers who had traveled through previously.

After Israel’s Disengagement and the Agreement on Movement and Access Principles for Rafah Crossing. In August and September 2005, Israel removed all its SETTLEMENTS and military installations from Gaza, and the IAA pulled out of the Rafah terminal. This, however, was a unilateral action; Tel Aviv had not consulted with the PNA about the operation. On 7 September 2005, Israel and Egypt closed Rafah. It remained almost completely closed for two months (12 September–15 November 2005), during which time Egypt and the PNA, in coordination with Israel, opened the crossing for only five full days and six half days. On those days only a limited number of Palestinians traveled through Rafah, and thousands of Palestinians seeking to return to their homes or to leave the strip were stranded on either side of the crossing.

On 15 November 2005, Israel and the PNA signed the “Agreement on Movement and Access Principles for Rafah Crossing” (AMA), mediated by the United States and the EUROPEAN UNION (EU) and with the tacit approval of Egypt. The AMA involved, among other things, agreed-upon principles for the operation of Rafah Crossing. The professed goal of the agreement was “to promote economic development” and to “improve the humanitarian situation on the ground.” US secretary of state CONDOLEEZZA RICE, who played a leading role in the negotiations that led to the agreement, said at a press conference after it was signed that “the agreement is meant to give the Palestinian people freedom to move, trade, live normal lives. . . . For the first time since 1967, Palestinians will gain control over entry and exit from their territory.” Javier Solana, the EU representative on the negotiating team, declared, “This is the first time that a border is open and not controlled by Israelis.” The agreement stated, “Rafah will be operated by the Palestinian Authority on its side, and Egypt on its side, according to international standards.” However, Israel added an important caveat: “The PNA should operate the Palestinian side of the border under the supervision of an EU force.” A World Bank document, meant to clarify the language of the AMA, stated that one of the three principles guiding the agreement is the continuous operation of the crossings. “GOI [Government of Israel] has clarified that it will not close a passage due to a security incident unconnected with the passage itself. . . . A passage will only be closed if there is a clear and direct threat to that specific passage.”

Rafah Crossing was opened on 26 November 2005 under the new arrangement as agreed in the AMA, but an examination of the implementation of the agreement in practice and over time shows that, contrary to the declarations, the agreement did not allow the Palestinians independent control of exit from and entrance into their territory. The principle of the continuous operation of the crossing was not honored, and the crossing was closed frequently by Israel unrelated to incidents threatening the crossing itself. The implementation of the AMA signaled the end of Israel’s military presence at Rafah Crossing, but not the end of its substantive domination over the crossing. Israel continued to exercise authority through its control of the Palestinian Population Registry, which determines who is allowed to go through Rafah Crossing, its power to prevent the passage even of Palestinians listed in the Population Registry on security grounds, the right to veto the passage of foreigners, and its ability to decide to close the crossing at its will. In actuality, Israel's involvement in the border crossing emerges from the provisions of the agreement itself, which states that crossing through Rafah is limited to holders of Palestinian IDENTITY CARDS, namely Palestinians registered in the Palestinian Population Registry, a provision that includes both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, a registry whose updating still requires Israel's permission. This requirement means that a decision by Israel not to register a Palestinian as a resident of the Gaza Strip or the West Bank denies him or her the right to exit or enter the Gaza Strip through the crossing. Moreover, even though the AMA does not say so explicitly, both parties—Israeli and Palestinian—have interpreted it as allowing Israel to veto the passage of registered Palestinians who it claims are “terror operatives.” According to the AMA, foreign nationals, including Palestinians who previously resided in the Gaza Strip or whose relatives hold Palestinian identity cards, are not allowed to enter the Strip through Rafah at all, and therefore need to receive entrance visas to Israel and permits to enter the Gaza Strip through Eretz Crossing. The agreement lists exceptional categories of foreigners allowed to enter the strip through Rafah Crossing: diplomats, foreign investors, employees of international organizations, and humanitarian cases. According to the language of the agreement, the PNA must inform Israel of any such travelers in advance, Israel must explain any objection to their passage, and the PNA must inform Israel of its decision.

Israel's supervision of the travelers at Rafah is carried out from a control room located a few kilometers south at the Kerem Shalom Crossing, under full Israeli control, near the “three borders” point between Israel, Egypt, and the Gaza Strip. In the control room, Israeli security officers, European inspectors, and Palestinian representatives observe the activity at Rafah Crossing through some thirty closed-circuit video cameras. The Israeli representatives can monitor the identities of those wishing to enter or exit the Gaza Strip by looking up information about them in computerized databases. The operation of the control room by Israeli security officers, the presence of EU monitors at Rafah Crossing, and the presence of PNA representatives are conditions for its opening. Therefore, Israel has the de facto power to prevent the opening of the crossing by not operating the Israeli control room or by controlling the arrival of the European team to the crossing. Technically Israel can prevent the European monitors, who live in the southern Israeli city of Ashkelon, from reaching Rafah Crossing because to get there they have to travel through the Kerem Shalom Crossing, which is in Israeli territory and under complete Israeli control. To prevent the monitors from reaching the crossing, all Israel has to do is inform the European team that the crossing is closed. That is because the European force interprets the AMA to commission the EU Border Assistance Mission (EUBAM) authority to oversee the crossing on the participation of both parties to the agreement: Israel and the PNA.

The Passage of Goods through Rafah. After the Gaza-Jericho I accord was signed in 1994, Rafah Crossing began to serve as a terminal for the import of goods as well as the travel of persons, and every month hundreds of trucks entered the Gaza Strip through the crossing, carrying raw materials for construction, food, clothing, medicine, electrical appliances, and other merchandise from various countries. With the outbreak of the Intifada, Israel increasingly restricted the passage of vehicles through the Rafah terminal, allowing only pedestrian traffic. In the first year of the Intifada the freight terminal at Rafah was closed more than 70 percent of the time. The number of trucks passing through Rafah dropped from 5,122 per month in 2000 to only 405 in 2001. In the following years, the number rose gradually, and by 2004 more than 8,600 trucks entered Rafah Crossing. However, Israel prevented all imports through Rafah in September 2005 and thereafter as part of the implementation of the disengagement plan.

Moreover, the November 2005 AMA agreement between Israel and the PNA forbade the entry of merchandise into the Gaza Strip through Rafah Crossing beyond personal effects, thereby preventing the possibility of importing goods such as cement, generators, or other machinery and materials for INFRASTRUCTURE repair and functioning. According to the agreement, import to the Gaza Strip should take place through the Kerem Shalom Crossing, which, as noted, is located inside Israel and is under its direct control. The agreement allowed the use of Rafah Crossing to export goods to Egypt, but arrangements were not established to make that possible. The prohibition on imports through Rafah Crossing also created difficulty for export through it, because Israel demanded that a Palestinian truck loaded with merchandise could leave Gaza through Rafah as part of the AMA, but could not return via Rafah even if empty. Thus, both exports and imports gradually ceased to pass through Rafah.

In the first seven months of AMA implementation, from 25 November 2005 to 24 June 2006, Rafah Crossing operated regularly. During those months, the crossing was open every day for an average of more than 9.5 hours. Every day an average of 1,320 people crossed in both directions, similar to the number of passengers through Rafah Crossing before the imposition of the Intifada restrictions. However, on 25 June 2006, Palestinian militants attacked an Israeli military outpost at Kerem Shalom and captured Israeli soldier Corporal Gilad Shalit. That day Israel ordered Rafah Crossing closed. Thereafter, Israel stopped implementing the AMA and mostly kept the crossing closed. Israel told the European force that security risks precluded opening it; however, comments by senior Israeli security officials revealed that it was a political decision intended to pressure the residents of the Gaza Strip and their leadership to release the captured soldier.

The Israeli Defense Ministry officially declared that Rafah Crossing was “closed to continuous operation, . . . [but will be] open periodically, mainly for humanitarian traffic.” However, once Rafah was closed for regular traffic, the joint committee that was supposed to discuss exceptional requests for the passage of foreigners also stopped meeting. On the few occasions when Israel allowed the crossing to open, it was done ad hoc and without sufficient prior notice to residents. Sometimes the crossing opened for a few hours and only in one direction, sometimes only in the other direction. This situation, according to Noga Kadman from Gisha, the Israeli Legal Center for Freedom of Movement, “caused an extreme and dangerous situation of overload, crowding and congestion at the border crossing by Gaza residents wishing to travel.” On 8 March 2007, for example, word spread throughout the Gaza Strip that Rafah would open and thousands of Palestinians crowded into the Rafah terminal in an attempt to leave to Egypt. An old man was crushed to death and nine residents were injured by the pushing of the crowds and shooting by Palestinian security forces who were trying to restore order. Because of the incident, Israel closed the crossing after only one and a half hours of activity, leaving thousands of residents stranded. Among those waiting were dozens of patients who had been referred for medical treatment in Egypt, and at least some of them never managed to get out.

In practice, it was Israel that made the final decisions and had the power to prevent the entry of foreigners through Rafah Crossing, even when they belonged to one of the categories of foreigners allowed to cross, for example representatives of international NGOs. Israel’s Coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories (COGAT) declared that “requests for the passage of foreigners who do not carry Palestinian documents are subject to the approval of the Israeli side after being approved by the Palestinian side.” According to representatives of EUBAM at the crossing, a joint committee is supposed to decide on the exceptional passage of foreigners, but it is Israel that decides what constitutes a humanitarian case for the purpose of such passage.

Rafah Crossing Shuts Down, Closure Tightens. In the ELECTIONS for the Palestinian Legislative Council in January 2006, the HAMAS movement won a majority of the seats. Movement leader ISMAIL HANIYEH became prime minister of the new Palestinian government, most of whose ministers came from the ranks of Hamas. FATAH continued holding junior positions in the cabinet ministries and retained the authority to coordinate with Israel, including regarding the crossings into the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Fatah leader MAHMUD ABBAS continued to serve as president of the PNA, and the security apparatus of the PNA’s PRESIDENTIAL GUARD continued to operate at the crossing points between the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and Israel. After the elections, Israel and the United States reiterated their declarations that Hamas was a terrorist organization and that their policy was to abstain from contact with it. The United States and the EU froze their aid to the Hamas-controlled PNA, and Israel refused to transfer the customs money it had collected that belonged to the PNA. The ongoing power struggles between Fatah and Hamas forces led to acts of violence between the two movements in the Gaza Strip, even after the MECCA AGREEMENT and the creation of a national unity government in March 2007. The clashes reached a peak during 9–15 June 2007 with a wave of fighting in the Gaza Strip in which 188 Palestinians were killed and 840 were wounded. On 15 June, the fighting ended with Hamas taking over the Gaza Strip and seizing its internal government. Fatah-PNA members were gradually pushed out of their positions of power in the cabinet ministries, in the security apparatuses, and at the border crossings. Hamas members replaced them in all positions, with the exception of low-level Fatah officials who continued to staff positions related to coordination with Israel, such as the Civil Affairs Committee.

On 10 June 2007, Israel froze implementation of the AMA and simultaneously tightened the closure of all the land crossings between the Gaza Strip and the outside world. Tel Aviv claimed that there was no legitimate party on the Palestinian side to take responsibility for operating the various border crossings and that terrorist threats against the crossings had increased, endangering those operating them. In the eleven and a half months between the capture of Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit on 25 June 2006 and 10 June 2007, Rafah Crossing was closed for 265 days, or approximately 76 percent of the time. During those months 163,632 people crossed the border in both directions, averaging 468 people a day—35 percent of the number during the time it operated regularly after the disengagement, when an average of 1,320 people per day crossed in both directions. The figure 1,320 indicates the actual demand for crossing between the Gaza Strip and Egypt and results in an estimate that the closures of the crossing between June 2006 and June 2007 prevented, on average, 852 people from exiting and entering the Gaza Strip every day. In fact, on most days during this period not one person passed through Rafah Crossing because it was rarely open. The inability to predict when it would open made it difficult to plan travel from Gaza in advance and required many residents to wait for days and weeks on the Egyptian side of the border on their way home to the Gaza Strip.

Along with the sweeping prohibition against passage of travelers after the Hamas coup, Israel severely restricted the transfer of goods (e.g., KARNI CROSSING, the main transit point for goods, was closed), upon which the economy and society of the Gaza Strip depend. The main consequence of those developments was a drastic reduction in supplies of food, medicine, fuel, flour, and cooking oil—the essentials of daily existence—resulting in a major humanitarian crisis.

Rafah Crossing, which opened for the last time on 9 June 2007 after being closed for most of the previous year, was thereafter completely closed to regular traffic. The PNA's (Fatah) Presidential Guard, the force that until that time had operated the Palestinian side of the crossing, was pushed out of its position following the Hamas takeover. Therefore, according to Israel, the PNA could no longer carry out its part of the AMA. Egypt closed the border because of its inability to continue operating it in the absence of PNA representatives, even though Hamas guards took over from the Presidential Guard. Israel demanded a total closure of Rafah (over which it claimed to have no control) since stipulations in the AMA were no longer in effect. On 15 June the European force in charge of the border crossing announced it was suspending its activity because of the EU policy of abstaining from contact with Hamas. Yet despite the closure of Rafah, all of the parties involved in the AMA—the PNA and Israel, which were signatories to it; the EU, which constitutes a third party; the United States, which mediated it; and Egypt, which participated in the discussions that preceded it—continued to treat the agreement as valid and as the basis for reopening the crossing. The mandate of the European force, whose job it is to monitor traffic through Rafah according to the AMA, continued to be renewed periodically. Their mandate is in effect as of mid-2009 even though, since June 2007, just a small team of European monitors has been staying in the Israeli city of Ashkelon, awaiting renewed implementation of the agreement.

To counteract Israel's total boycott of the Gaza Strip, Hamas dug hundreds of tunnels from Gazan Rafah to Egyptian Rafah through which most of the necessities of life were transported. Israel, claiming that weapons were being smuggled through the tunnels, relentlessly bombed them, but Hamas just as relentlessly kept digging them. Without them the humanitarian crisis would have been far worse than it was.

An Exception to the Closure. In December 2007, Egypt and Hamas cooperated in the passage through Rafah of pilgrims from Gaza to SAUDI ARABIA for the Hajj, a yearly holy event when Muslim pilgrims from all over the world travel to Mecca and Medina. Egypt, in coordination with the Hamas government and based on lists supplied by the latter, allowed 2,200 Palestinians to leave the Gaza Strip through Rafah, crossing to Sinai and from there to Saudi Arabia. This was done without coordination with the PNA or Israel. Nor was there any Israeli supervision of the passengers. While the event passed smoothly, it created tension between Israel and Egypt, and increased hostility between the PNA and Hamas. European observers were not present because the crossing was, in theory, closed. However, at the end of December, in anticipation of the return of the pilgrims who exited through Rafah, Israel demanded that they return to Gaza only through an Israeli-controlled crossing, and Egypt agreed. The pilgrims, however, protested fiercely, burning tents and vandalizing property in the temporary camps built for them in Al-Arish, Egypt, and refused to undergo Israeli inspection. Ultimately, Egypt allowed the returnees to cross through Rafah, which they did on 2 January 2008, while Israeli officials declared that this contradicted the understandings between the countries.

The Breach of the Gaza-Egypt Border by Hamas. After the return of the pilgrims, Rafah Crossing remained closed, while the needs of the residents of the Gaza Strip to leave—to obtain food, medicine, and other basic goods unavailable in Gaza as a result of Israel's blockade—became more pressing. In mid-January 2008 there was an escalation in fighting between Hamas forces and other militants in the Gaza Strip. Following the clashes on 18 January, Israel hermetically closed the border crossings from Israel to the Gaza Strip and, for the next four days, cut the Gaza Strip off completely from any supplies. The Gaza power plant shut down two days later because Israel prevented the supply of industrial diesel, on which it depends for operation. The duration of ensuing power outages, frequent even prior to the border closure, extended to twelve hours a day in some parts of the Gaza Strip. The electricity shortage prevented the supply of running water to at least 40 percent of the residents of the Gaza Strip and escalated the collapse of the sewage system, leading to the dumping of untreated sewage water into the Mediterranean Sea. On 22 January, Israel somewhat eased the stranglehold on the Strip but still allowed only a very limited entry of goods. According to sources in the Israeli defense establishment, the border crossings would be open henceforth only for the transfer of a minimal amount of goods and aid to prevent a humanitarian disaster and to curb international criticism of Israel.

Early the following morning (23 January), Hamas militants blew up most of the 12-kilometer

(7.5-mile) wall separating the Gaza Strip from Egypt. At dawn, residents from all over Gaza began swarming toward the breached barrier and into Egypt. While no exact number is available, various estimates suggest that as many as a hundred thousand residents crossed the border. The masses stocked up on food, medicine, cigarettes, oil, and many other goods that were severely lacking in the Strip, or whose prices had risen sharply because of the closure. The Egyptian forces let the Palestinians enter Egyptian territory up to Egyptian Rafah and al-Arish, but prevented them from continuing into the Sinai and Egypt proper, excepting a small number of people who were allowed to go to the Cairo airport. The media said that Egyptian president HOSNI MUBARAK instructed the Egyptian security forces to let the Palestinians come in and buy food because they were hungry. Meanwhile, Israel pressured Egypt to close the border crossing: Israel said it “expects the Egyptians to solve the problem,” and the US administration expressed its concern that “Hamas would take advantage of the situation.” On 3 February, twelve days after the border was breached, Hamas and Egyptian security forces closed the border together following Egypt's request.

Rafah Crossing remained closed through the end of 2008 and into 2009, including throughout Israel's OPERATION CAST LEAD in Gaza. Thereafter, despite the carnage of Operation Cast Lead, Egypt opened the border only sporadically, usually for no more than two or three days a month, and carefully monitored who could enter Egypt—usually only the very ill who had doctors' certificates. In the words of the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs in August 2009, “The passage of people into and out of Gaza remains strictly limited, only those classified as medical or humanitarian cases can cross via Rafah with special authorization by the Palestinian authorities in Gaza and Egyptian authorities.”

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; EGYPT; ERETZ CROSSING; GAZA STRIP; ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA; KARNI CROSSING; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION RAINBOW; PHILADELPHI ROUTE; TERRORISM

Bibliography

“Agreement on Movement and Access and Agreed Principles for Rafah Crossing.” Israel-PNA. 15 November 2005. www.palestine-pmc.com/details.asp?cat=11&id=138.

- “Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area.” Cairo. 4 May 1994. www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Peace+Process/Guide+to+the+Peace+Process/Agreement+on+Gaza+Strip+and+Jericho+Area.htm.
- “Agreement: The Cairo Agreement.” 9 February 1994. www.alhaq.org/etemplate.php?id=77.
- B’Tselem. B’Tselem to Defense Minister: Stop Using Rafah Crossing to Pressure Gaza Civilians. 30 August 2006. http://www.btselem.org/english/Gaza\_Strip/20060830\_Closing\_of\_Rafah\_Crossing.asp.
- . Control over Foreign Trade. n.d. http://www.btselem.org/english/gaza\_strip/karni\_crossing.asp.
- . Deportation of Family Members to Gaza: Prohibited Collective Punishment. n.d. http://www.btselem.org/english/Deportation/Deportation\_to\_Gaza.asp.
- . Gaza: Power and Water Cuts and Bread Shortage. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, 27 November 2008. www.btselem.org/Download/200503\_Gaza\_Prison\_English.doc.
- . The Gaza Strip after Disengagement. n.d. http://www.btselem.org/English/Gaza\_Strip/.
- . The Gaza Strip: Grave Dearth of Medical Supplies and Lifesaving Treatments. 15 May 2008. http://www.btselem.org/english/gaza\_strip/20080515\_medical\_system.asp.
- . The Gaza Strip: Rafah Crossing. n.d. http://www.btselem.org/english/gaza\_strip/rafah\_crossing.asp.
- . Joint Call by Israeli, Palestinian and European Human Rights Organizations: The Rafah Crossing Must Be Opened. 30 July 2007. http://www.btselem.org/english/Gaza\_Strip/20070730\_Joint\_call\_to\_open\_Rafah\_Crossing.asp.
- . The Siege on Gaza: Israel Severely Infringes Gazans’ Right to Education. 24 July 2008. http://www.btselem.org/English/Gaza\_Strip/20080724\_Gaza\_Students.asp.
- . Tightened Siege and Intensified Economic Sanctions. 2007. http://www.btselem.org/english/gaza\_strip/siege\_tightening.asp.
- B’Tselem and HaMoked. Gaza Prison: Freedom of Movement to and from the Gaza Strip on the Eve of the Disengagement Plan. Jerusalem. March 2005. www.btselem.org/Download/200503\_Gaza\_Prison\_English.doc.
- Council of the European Union. EU Border Assistance Mission at Rafah Crossing Point in the Palestinian Territories (EU BAM Rafah). November 2005. www.consilium.europa.eu/cms3\_fo/showPage.asp?id=979&lang=EN.
- Gisha. The Collapse of Gaza’s Electricity System—Well Planned and Foretold in Advance. 28 January 2009. <http://www.gisha.org/index.php?intLanguage=2&intSiteSN=119&OldMenu=113>.
- . Commercial Closure: Deleting Gaza’s Economy from the Map. Tel Aviv: Gisha, The Legal Center for Freedom of Movement, July 2007.
- . Disengaged Occupiers: The Legal Status of Gaza. January 2007. www.gisha.org/UserFiles/File/Report%20for%20the%20website.pdf.
- . Disengagement Danger: Israeli Efforts to Separate Gaza from the West Bank. February 2006. www.end-gaza-siege.ps/GazaDocument.htm.
- . Frequently Asked Questions: Students Trapped in Gaza. November 2008. <http://www.gisha.org/index.php?intLanguage=2&intSiteSN=119&OldMenu=113>.
- . Gaza Closure Defined: Collective Punishment. 16 December 2008. <http://www.gisha.org/index.php?intLanguage=2&intSiteSN=119&OldMenu=113>.
- . Summer Closure Report 2007: What Is NOT Moving through Gaza’s Crossing Points. 22 December 2007. <http://www.gisha.org/index.php?intLanguage=2&intSiteSN=119&OldMenu=113>.
- Hussein, Sara. A Special Report on: Rafah Crossing—Gaza’s Only Link to the Outside World. Jabalya Refugee Camp, Gaza Strip: Al Mezan Center for Human Rights, 2005. www.mezan.org/site\_en/resource\_center/mezan\_publications/detail.php?id=125.
- Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip 28 September 1995* (also called the Oslo II Agreement). <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Peace/interim.html>.
- Israel Airports Authority. Rafah Border Terminal: Facts and Figures. www.iaa.gov.il/Rashat/en-US/Borders/Rafah/AbouttheTerminal/Statistics.
- Israel and Palestine Liberation Organization. Gaza-Jericho Agreement, Annex I—Protocol Concerning Withdrawal of Israeli Military Forces and Security Arrangements, article X, 2.b.1. February 1994. www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Peace%20Process/Guide%20to%20the%20Peace%20Process/Gaza-Jericho%20Agreement%20Annex%20I.
- Israeli Prime Minister’s Office. Press Release. 19 February 2006. www.pmo.gov.il/PMOEng/Archive/Press+Releases/2006/02/.
- Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Agreement Concluded on EU Role at Rafah Crossing, 23 November 2005. www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Government/Communiques/2005/Agreement%20concluded%20on%20EU%20role%20at%20Rafah%20crossing%2023-Nov-2005.
- Issacharoff, Avi. “Israel Using Rafah Crossing to Pressure PA on Shalit Release.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 31 August 2006.
- . “U.S. Proposal: Int’l Observers, Expansion at Karni Crossing.” Ha’aretz. 28 August 2006.
- . “World Bank Urges PA to Use Rafah Crossing to Move Goods.” Ha’aretz. 3 September 2006.
- Jerusalemites. “Israel Must Transfer Control over Rafah Crossing.” Jerusalem Forum. 12 June 2005.
- Kadman, Noga. Rafah Crossing: Who Holds the Keys? Tel Aviv: Physicians for Human Rights—Israel and Gisha, March 2009. http://www.phr.org.il/phr/files/articlefile\_1238417950062.pdf.

- Lein, Yehezkel. Gaza Prison: Freedom of Movement to and from the Gaza Strip on the Eve of the Disengagement Plan. Joint report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and HaMoked, Center for the Defense of the Individual, 2005. http://www.btselem.org/English/Publications/Summaries/200503\_Gaza\_Prison.asp.
- . The Gaza Strip: One Big Prison. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2007. <http://www.btselem.org/english/publications/index.asp?TF=30&image.x=14&image.y=8>.
- Al-Mezan. A Special Report on Israel's Restrictions on Palestinian Right of Movement at Rafah Crossing. Jabaliya Refugee Camp, Gaza City: Al-Mezan Center for Human Rights, 8 February 2003. <http://www.mezan.ps/en/a.php?id=180>.
- Palestinian Center for Human Rights. "EU Monitors at Rafah Contribute to the Strangulation and Deprivation of Gaza." Press release. Gaza: Palestinian Center for Human Rights, 3 August 2006.
- Schneier, Bruce. "Israeli Barrier around Gaza." Schneier on Security. 12 September 2005. <http://www.schneier.com/blog>.
- Stern, Yoav, and Amos Harel. "Egypt Expected to Let Pilgrims Straight into Gaza Strip." Ha'aretz. 1 January 2008.
- Stern, Yoav, and Avi Issacharoff. "Palestinian Pilgrims Cross Border to Gaza through Rafah." Ha'aretz. 2 January 2008.
- UN Information System on the Question of Palestine. Situation Report: Rafah Terminal. 19 January 2005. <http://domino.un.org/unispal.nsf/85255db800470aa485255d8b004e349a/111f3adf4cc4ddf785256f8f0069db36!OpenDocument>.
- UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. The Gaza Strip: Access Report. Geneva: UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs in the Occupied Palestinian Territories, various months.
- . Humanitarian Monitor. Various months.
- UN Special Coordinator for the Middle East Peace Process. Closure in the Gaza Strip. December 2004. www.benor.co.il/UNSCO/files/gazaclos%23q404-final.doc.
- US Department of State. Daily Press Briefing. 27 January 2006.
- . Daily Press Briefing. 7 April 2006.
- . Joint Press Conference by Condoleezza Rice, Javier Solana and Jim Wolfensohn on the Rafah AMA, November 15, 2005. Jerusalem. <http://2001-2009.state.gov/secretary/rm/2005/56890.htm>.
- US Information Office. Israel, Palestinians Agree on Two Documents on Movement and Access: Agreement on Movement and Access, and Agreed Principles for Rafah Crossing. 15 November 2005. <http://usinfo.state.gov/mena/Archive/2005/Nov/15-381874.html>.
- . Rice Announces Israel, Palestinian Agreement on Movement and Access: Palestinian Authority Gains Border Crossing Control Point at Rafah. 2005. <http://usinfo.state.gov/mena/Archive/2005/Nov/15-811620.html>.
- World Bank. The Agreement on Movement and Access from 15 November 2005: The Passages—Technical Elaboration. Washington, DC: World Bank Technical Team, 12 February 2005. <http://siteresources.worldbank.org/INTWESTBANKGAZA/Resources/AgreementMovementAccess.pdf>.
- World Health Organization. Medical Treatment Abroad for Gaza Residents: Closures and Access. 31 January 2005. www.ifamericansknew.org/cur\_sit/closure-med.html.

Rafi

Rafi (Reshimat Po'alei Yisrael, or Israel Workers' List) was a political party founded in July 1965 by Israel's first prime minister, DAVID BEN-GURION, and seven other Knesset members. The founders of Rafi seceded from the MAPAI labor party because of dissension created by the controversy over the LAVON AFFAIR, a failed Israeli covert operation in EGYPT. Rafi advocated Israeli self-reliance in matters of national security, peace with neighboring countries through overwhelming strength, electoral reform, and several other domestic issues.

During 1965, Rafi offered its own slate in the HISTADRUT (labor federation), Knesset, and municipal elections and received 12.1 percent of the vote in the Histadrut and 9.7 percent in the Knesset, which gave it ten seats. In the municipal elections in JERUSALEM, Rafi's candidate, TEDDY KOLLEK, was elected mayor. Rafi remained in opposition to the government until the eve of the 1967 WAR, when it entered a government of national unity, and one of its members, MOSHE DAYAN, became minister of defense. In January 1968, Rafi rejoined Mapai and together with AHDUT HA'AVODAH formed the Israel LABOR PARTY. Ben-Gurion declined to participate and formed a party of his own (Reshima Mamlakhit, or State List), which in 1973 merged with the LIKUD PARTY.

Bibliography

- Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Elazar, Daniel. Israel at the Polls 1999: Israel: The First Hundred Years. London: Routledge, 2001.
- Maor, Moshe. Parties, Elections and Cleavages: Israel in Comparative and Theoretical Perspective. London: Routledge, 2000.

Rajub, Jibril (1953–)

Jibril Rajub was PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman YASIR ARAFAT's national security adviser and headed the Preventive Security Service (PSS) in the WEST BANK. He retains considerable influence in both the PSS and the Tanzim, the FATAH-organized military force. Rajub was considered close to PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY president MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen) until Abbas chose MUHAMMAD DAHLAN, Rajub's sworn rival, as minister of security.

Rajub was born to a prominent agricultural and landowning family in Dura near HEBRON, in the West Bank, which remains the geographical base of his support. At fifteen, he was given a life sentence in prison for throwing a grenade at an ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) convoy. He spent seventeen years in Israeli prisons (1968–1985), where he learned fluent Hebrew and English and translated into Arabic former prime minister MENAHEM BEGIN's The Revolt. In 1985 Rajub was released as part of a PRISONER exchange, but in 1988 he was deported from the West Bank to LEBANON in the context of the First INTIFADA. After a short stay, he left Lebanon and moved to TUNIS, where he served as adviser on the Intifada to Fatah deputy leader KHALIL AL-WAZIR. After Israel assassinated al-Wazir, Rajub became a close lieutenant of Arafat and spent seven years in exile with him.

Rajub returned to the West Bank in 1994, following the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS between Israel and the PLO. In May, Arafat appointed him West Bank preventive security chief for the PNA, based in newly autonomous JERICHO. Rajub kept his preventive force from participating in anti-Israeli activity, using it generally as a tool for building up the PNA and defending its institutions from the growing influence of the Islamists. He soon shifted away from the OLD GUARD Tunisian leadership and began to develop his own power base. Rajub became more closely allied with the YOUNG GUARD Fatah leaders in the territories, cultivating close ties with the West Bank Tanzim chief MARWAN AL-BARGHUTHI (with whom he once shared a prison cell in Beersheba jail) and other local leaders. As his power grew, so did his use of repression and involvement in corruption. In a 1997 Palestinian Legislative Council report on corruption, he was criticized for profiting from the PNA's oil-importation monopoly in the West Bank. On the Palestinian streets, Rajub was more feared than popular because he used the PSS (including the use of torture) to quash dissent and harass political opponents critical of the Arafat regime and the PNA.

Rajub is viewed as a pragmatist concerning relations with Israel, advocating a TWO-STATE SOLUTION and peaceful coexistence. He clamped down hard on HAMAS and the Palestinian ISLAMIC JIHAD in 1996–1997 to keep them from undermining the influence of PNA institutions and because he opposed their attacks on Israeli civilians, which he believed undermined rather than strengthened the Palestinian national cause.

Throughout the years of the Oslo Accords, Rajub publicly criticized the rising influence of religious fundamentalism in Palestinian society and schools. Following a 3 April 2002 attack by the IDF during OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD on Rajub's headquarters in the West Bank, he escaped but surrendered some fifty Islamists inside the building to Israel in a deal brokered by the US CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY (CIA). Rajub lost considerable respect for saving himself by "betraying" others and was widely condemned for it—and not only by the Islamists.

When the AL-AQSA INTIFADA began in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, Rajub kept the Palestinian security forces from attacking Israeli targets. It was therefore a cause of some surprise when he was wounded in an IDF tank and helicopter attack on his home on 20 May 2001. The Israeli government offered conflicting explanations for the attack, which was widely regarded as a shift in Israeli policy from not hitting those who did not take an active role in the Intifada. Despite the attack, Rajub's distrust of Islamist organizations has won him favor in Washington and Tel Aviv. He also has long-standing and very close ties to the CIA and with Israeli security officials. In May 2002, US officials urged Arafat to unify the various PNA security agencies into a single organization under the control of Rajub. Arafat responded by firing Rajub on 2 July 2002. Although he refused for two days to go and protests were organized in his support in Hebron, Rajub eventually accepted the decision.

When Abbas was elected PNA president on 9 January 2005, he appointed Rajub as his national security adviser, but relations between the two men have been stormy. Subsequent to Hamas's landslide victory in the January 2006 elections in Gaza and the West Bank, Rajub (and Muhammad Dahlan as well) led armed demonstrations by Fatah supporters in Gaza and the West Bank against Hamas and also called for the resignation of Abbas and the Fatah Central Committee. Some saw this as a crass power grab by Rajub (and Dahlan). In a none-too-oblique reference to Rajub and Dahlan, the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES criticized the organizers of the demonstrations as "ones who spread corruption and greatly contributed to the humiliating Fatah defeat." Rajub has been accused of fomenting a civil war between Hamas and groups loyal to him. Many Palestinians view Rajub as an Israeli collaborator, and some of his longtime supporters have left his force.

At Fatah's sixth convention, held in BETHLEHEM in August 2009, Rajub was elected to the eighteen-member ruling Central Committee.

Bibliography

- Frisch, Hillel. "Debating Palestinian Strategy in the al-Aqsa Intifada." Terrorism and Political Violence. 15:2 (2003).
- Legrain, Jean-François. "The Successions of Yasir Arafat." Journal of Palestine Studies. 28:4 (1999).
- PalestineHistory.com. "Jibril Rajub." Palestinian Biography. n.d. www.palestinehistory.com/biography/palestine/palbio27.htm.
- Shaked, Roni. "Military Intelligence Warns about CIA Training of PN." Yediot Ahronot (Hebrew, Tel Aviv). 27 August 1999.
- Usher, Graham. "The Politics of Internal Security: The PA's New Intelligence Services." Journal of Palestine Studies. 25:2 (1966).

Rakah Party

Rakah (Reshima Komunistit Hadasha, or New Communist List) is a communist political party in Israel and forms part of the political alliance known as HADASH. In 1965, Rakah split from Israel's traditional communist party (MAKI) into a pro-Palestinian faction led by Tawfik Toubi and Meir Vilner. Before the 1977 elections, Rakah joined with other left-wing and Israeli Arab parties to form Hadash. In the meantime, the original Maki had disappeared after merging into RATS in 1981. In 1989, members of Rakah decided to change the party's name to Maki to reflect its status as the only officially communist party in Israel. The party remains to this day the leading force in Hadash, which usually gets about three seats in the Knesset.

After the 1965 split, the SOVIET UNION recognized Rakah as the "official" communist party of Israel, rather than the traditional Maki. The 1965 elections saw the new party, which was non-Zionist and opposed to the 1967 WAR, win three seats, comprehensively beating Maki, which had slumped to just one. In the 1969 elections, Rakah again won three seats. By the late 1960s, Rakah had become a party of mostly Palestinian communists and had increased its strength significantly among the PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL. Its popularity was evident in the 1973 elections, when it won four Knesset seats. After the 1965 split from Maki, Rakah not only increased its share of the Arab vote but also became the single most powerful political force among the Israeli Palestinians.

The first real test of Arab political mobilization with communist backing came about in March 1976 when Palestinians organized a general strike in opposition to Israel's continued confiscation of Arab LANDS. This was not the first LAND DAY demonstration, but because of communist involvement, it was much better organized and had far broader participation. It also involved a change of tactics for the Palestinians that entailed a direct confrontation with the Israeli authorities. In the demonstrations, six Palestinians were killed and some 100 injured. In its aftermath, Rakah emerged as an even stronger institution around which Palestinians could mobilize.

After Land Day, Palestinians saw Rakah as the most important organization working for equality in the social, political, and economic status of Arabs and Jews. It became the single largest party in the Arab sector, despite government warnings to the Arabs not to vote for the communists. Although some Arab communists did not join the party, all saw Rakah as a vehicle for Arab political mobilization in the struggle for equality with the Jewish majority. Rakah was strongest among the GREEK ORTHODOX Christian Arabs from the northern urban areas, while it was weak in the rural areas, mainly because of the Palestinians' attachment to their traditional leaders and social structure and to Islam. Those leaders believed that, in order to assimilate into society and politics, they had to cooperate with the ruling Zionist political parties whose dispensation of patronage was a significant factor in their positions. The small and medium-sized villages, where the local traditional leaders were strong, tried to maintain good relations with the military government, which pressured them not to let the communists gain influence among the rural Arab population.

Rakah attempted to expand its support by incorporating Arab nationalism into its ideology.

Thus, the party attempted to ally itself with Arab national organizations and to champion Arab causes of equality in social and political activities. Some Arab urban dwellers, mostly educated, saw the link as a possible vehicle for Palestinians to reach their goals. Meanwhile, in the early 1970s the party did garner support from some Arab rural men who worked in the cities. Additionally, Rakah helped Arab students lobby for a better educational curriculum, which stressed Arab literature and culture and deemphasized the Zionist and Hebrew culture taught in Arab schools. Rakah also provided Arab high school graduates scholarships to universities in communist bloc countries. In return, these students stayed loyal to the Rakah and evidenced their support at election time, even though some did not support the communist ideology. In addition to the students, their parents typically voted for Rakah in most elections. The 1989 change in the party's name from Rakah to Maki did not affect its support or standing. It remains the leading force in Hadash, which won four seats in the 2010 election.

Bibliography

- Budeiri, Musa. The Palestine Communist Party, 1919–1948: Arab and Jew in the Struggle for Internationalism. London: Ithaca Press, 1979.
- Courbage, Youssef. "Reshuffling the Demographic Cards in Israel/Palestine." Journal of Palestine Studies. 28:4 (1999).
- Darweish, Marwan, and A. Rigby. Palestinians in Israel: Nationality and Citizenship. Bradford, UK: University of Bradford, 1995.
- Ghanem, As'ad. "The Limits of Parliamentary Politics: The Arab Minority in Israel and the 1992 and 1996 Elections." Israel Affairs. 4:2 (1977).
- Al-Haj, Majid. Arab Local Government in Israel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1996.
- Jabareen, Hasan. Legal Violations of the Arab Minority Rights in Israel. Shfaram, Israel: Adalah, The Legal Center for Arab Minority Rights in Israel, 1998.
- Kaufman, Ilana. Arab National Communism in the Jewish State. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1997.
- Khalifa, Osama Fouad. "Arab Political Mobilization and Israeli Responses." Arab Studies Quarterly. (Winter 2001).
- Kretzmer, David. The Legal Status of the Arabs in Israel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Landau, Jacob M. The Arab Minority in Israel, 1967–1991. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1993.
- Lewin-Epstein, Noah, and M. Semyonov. The Arab Minority in Israel's Economy. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1993.
- Lustick, Ian. Arabs in the Jewish State. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1980.
- Neuberger, Benjamin. "The Arab Minority in Israeli Politics 1948–1992: From Marginality to Influence." Asian and African Studies. 27:12 (1993).
- Sa'di, Ahmad H. "Between State Ideology and Minority National Identity: Palestinians in Israel and in Israeli Social Science Research." Review of Middle East Studies. 5 (1992).
- Smootha, Sammy. Arabs and Jews in Israel, Vol. 2: Change and Continuity in Mutual Intolerance. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1991.
- . The Orientation and Politicization of the Arab Minority in Israel. Haifa, Israel: Institute of Middle Eastern Studies, 1984.
- Stendel, Ori. The Arabs in Israel. Brighton, UK: Sussex Academic Press, 1996.
- Touma, Emile. "The Political Coming-of-Age of the 'National Minority.'" Journal of Palestine Studies. 14:2 (1985).
- Zayyad, Tawfiq. "The Fate of the Arabs in Israel." Journal of Palestine Studies. 6:1 (1976).
- Zureik, Elia. The Palestinians in Israel. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1979.

Ramadan War

See OCTOBER WAR

Ramla

The administrative capital of Palestine in the eighth century, Ramla was the site of a mass expulsion of its Arab residents by Israel during the 1948 WAR. Out of a population of more than 15,000, only about 400 inhabitants remained. The city, now located in Israel, was founded in 716 CE by the Umayyad caliph Sulayman ibn 'Abd al-Malik, who made it the Palestinian capital, replacing LYDDA, until the arrival of the First Crusade in 1099. The caliph fortified the city and built public buildings, gardens, and the mosque complex of Al-Jami al-Abyad (the White Mosque). The complex's minaret, known as the White Tower, begun by the MAMLUK sultan Baybars in the thirteenth century and completed a century later, remains standing today. Near the tower is the tomb of a venerated Muslim prophet, Nabi Salih, who lived before the Prophet Muhammad.

Located on the coastal plain a few miles southeast of JAFFA, the city maintained a prominent strategic position at the crossroads of the main caravan route connecting Damascus, Baghdad, and EGYPT. Ramla became a thriving administrative and commercial center and during this period had a flourishing dye industry that exported its products throughout the Arab world.

A coin mint was also established there. After the First Crusade, Ramla became a dominion of the Kingdom of JERUSALEM, but much of the original city was later destroyed by BEDOUIN raids and earthquakes. In 1187 the Muslim leader SALADIN captured the city. Under the rule of the Mamluk sultan Baybars (1260–1277), Ramla revived and became an important commercial center, provincial capital, and the largest town in Palestine.

CHRISTIANITY was always present in Ramla as well. In 1296 a Franciscan community was established there that maintained a hospice for pilgrims traveling from Jaffa to Jerusalem. Another Franciscan monastery was built in 1750 but was deserted in 1948.

At the start of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, the town was in decline but continued as a market center for the region. In the nineteenth century, Ramla, situated in the midst of large olive plantations and orange groves, was a center for agricultural production and one of the main areas of soap production. A carriage road, built in the 1860s, increased travel, and the inauguration of the Jaffa-Ramla-Jerusalem railroad in 1892 further increased the town's importance. According to Ottoman records, in 1548, Ramla's population consisted of 528 Muslim and eighty-two Christian households. Little change in this size or composition of the population occurred until late in the nineteenth century, when a period of expansion began. During the BRITISH MANDATE (1917–1948), the population grew steadily, increasing to about 12,000 Muslims and 3,000 Christians in 1944. Until 1948, there were very few Jewish inhabitants. In the 1947 Partition Resolution (UN RESOLUTION 181), the UNITED NATIONS designated Ramla as part of the Palestinian state.

During the 1948 War, Ramla's geographic location (on the Tel Aviv–Jerusalem road) made it an extremely desirable Zionist target. On 12 July 1948, Ramla fell with almost no resistance as part of Operation Dani. Even after its surrender and the flight of many of its Palestinian residents, Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION gave the order to expel the remaining inhabitants of Ramla "toward the lines of territory held by the Arab Legion"—that is, the West Bank. YITZHAK RABIN, who was a commander in the HAGANA, the underground military organization, wrote that he agreed with Ben-Gurion's order to expel the Arabs of Ramla. The expulsions from Ramla began en masse on 13 July and continued for three days. The city's Arab residents who had surrendered without incident were put on buses and driven to the front lines of the fighting, where they were ordered to walk; most trekked to the Jordanian-occupied WEST BANK in the blazing summer heat. Of the 400 inhabitants who remained, most were either Christian or had had prior dealings with Jews. Some thirty villages in the Ramla District were also depopulated and destroyed. In November 1948, the Israeli government began to use the nearly depopulated town as a source of housing for Jewish immigrants. By February 1949 the Jewish population had exceeded 6,000.

According to the Israeli Central Bureau of Statistics, in 2004 there were 63,462 people living in Ramla, 16 percent Muslim and 4 percent Christian. In 2006, 12,000 immigrants from the SOVIET UNION were settled in Ramla, and 5,000 Ethiopians immigrated there.

See also IMMIGRATION; PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Abramsky, Samuel. Ancient Towns in Israel. Jerusalem: World Zionist Organization, 1963.
- Benvenisti, Meron. The Crusaders in the Holy Land. New York: Macmillan, 1974.
- Khalidi, Walid. "Revisiting the UNGA Partition Resolution." Journal of Palestine Studies. 27:1 (1997).
- Landau, Jacob M. Abdul Hamid's Palestine. London: Andre Deutsch, 1979.
- Morris, Benny. Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881–1999. New York: Alfred Knopf, 2000.
- Pappé, Ilan, ed. Israel/Palestine Question: Rewriting Histories. London: Routledge, 1999.

—Betsy Folkins

Rantisi, Abd al-Aziz (1947–2004)

Abd al-Aziz Rantisi was a physician, Islamic activist, and cofounder and principal spokesperson for HAMAS, the militant Islamic organization. A pediatrician by training, Dr. al-Rantisi was a popular figure in the GAZA STRIP who defended any means that would force Israeli troops and settlers to leave Palestine. Born in Yibna, a village southwest of RAMLA, Palestine, his family was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and fled to Gaza, where Rantisi grew up in Khan Yunis REFUGEE camp amid extreme poverty. For four years, he lived with his parents, eight brothers, and two sisters in a tent; his family then moved into an abandoned school building, where they remained until the UN RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (UNRWA) provided them with a house. In 1965 Rantisi attended UNRWA secondary school in Khan Yunis and graduated at the top of his class. At that time, EGYPT offered university education to exceptional Gazan students who were too poor to pay tuition, and that fall Rantisi began studying pediatric medicine at the University of Alexandria. There he ran into a familiar face, Shaykh Mahmoud Eid, who had been imam of the mosque in Khan Yunis. Eid introduced him to the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD and its belief that native Islam, not Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR's imported socialist-based pan-Arabism, would solve the problems of the Arab world. As a philosophy, Islamism had a great appeal for Egyptian students after Nasir's defeat in the 1967 WAR with Israel.

After Rantisi completed his degree in 1972, he returned to Gaza, where, a year later, he founded the Gaza Islamic Centre. By this time, Gaza was under Israeli OCCUPATION, and its refugee camps provided thousands of recruits for FATAH and the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, while anarchy ruled on the streets, with PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) activists targeting Israeli soldiers and local Palestinian COLLABORATORS. In 1974 Rantisi returned to Alexandria for a two-year master's program in pediatrics. On his return to Gaza in 1976, he formally joined the Muslim Brotherhood and took up an internship at Nasser Hospital, the main medical facility in Khan Yunis refugee camp. (In 1983, Israel dismissed him as the head of pediatrics.) He also joined the faculty of science at the Islamic University of Gaza on its opening in 1978.

In 1986 Rantisi began to organize the Muslim bloc in student council elections at the Islamic University, and Islamists won 80 percent of the vote. That same year, he launched a bloody (and largely successful) campaign to rid the university of the PLO because the organization was not staunchly Islamist. The movement carried out organized attacks on the PLO and purged the school of its supporters, although not all Islamists supported his policy of confrontation with the PLO. In January 1988, Israel arrested Rantisi and accused him of authoring Hamas's street pamphlets, which incited support for the INTIFADA. He was sentenced to two and a half years, and after Israel released him, on 4 September 1990, he effectively led Hamas (with Mahmoud A-Zahhar) until being arrested again for incitement in November 1990. After serving a twelve-month sentence, Rantisi represented Hamas in the July 1992 reconciliation accord that ended Palestinian infighting in the Gaza Strip.

In December 1992, after Hamas killed six Israeli soldiers in one week, Israel responded by expelling 416 alleged Islamists to Marj al-Zuhur in South LEBANON, including Rantisi, who acted as spokesperson for the deportees. On his return, Rantisi was rearrested by Israel (in December 1993) and held until April 1997. In April 1998, the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) arrested Rantisi after he called for the resignation of its leaders, whom he accused of collaborating with Israel in killing a Hamas militant. The PNA held him in custody without trial for twenty months, and he was arrested again in July 2000 after calling the Palestinian participation in the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT an act of treason; he was released in December 2000. Intermittently rearrested, Rantisi nevertheless continued his public opposition of the PNA, which eventually led to his house arrest. Rantisi initially opposed the June 2003 hudna (truce), one of the Phase One obligations of the US-backed ROAD MAP peace plan, although Hamas eventually joined it. Rantisi subsequently defended the hudna as a means of preventing the UNITED STATES from forcing the PNA into a civil war with Hamas.

On 10 June 2003, Rantisi survived an Israeli ASSASSINATION attempt that killed two bystanders and left twenty-seven wounded (including one of Rantisi's sons, who was paralyzed). Although wounded from shrapnel in the chest and leg, Rantisi vowed from his hospital bed that Hamas would "not leave one Jew in Palestine." Coming less than a week after the Aqaba summit that launched the Road Map, the attempt on Rantisi's life caused considerable consternation, even in Washington.

Following the assassination of Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh AHMAD YASIN on 22 March 2004, Rantisi was appointed head of Hamas in the Gaza Strip. He knew he was a marked man as soon as he took office but declined to go underground and was philosophical about the prospect of assassination: "It's death whether by killing or by cancer; it's the same thing," he said the day after he was chosen Hamas leader. "Nothing will change if it's an Apache [helicopter] or cardiac arrest. But I prefer to be killed by Apache.” Rantisi was assassinated in an Israeli helicopter missile strike as he returned from a clandestine visit to his family on 17 April 2004.

See also HAMAS

Bibliography

- Geocities. “Abd al-Aziz Rantisi.” Palestinian Biographies. 27 July 2004. <http://www.geocities.com/lawrenceofcyberia/palbios/pa11000.html>.
- Gunning, Jeroen. Hamas in Politics: Democracy, Religion, Violence. New York: Columbia University Press, 2008.
- PalestinianHistory.com. “Abd al-Aziz Rantisi.” Palestinian Biography. 2004. www.palestinehistory.com/biography/palestine/palbio04.htm.

Ras al-Amud

Ras al-Amud is a Palestinian neighborhood in East JERUSALEM that has been the target of intense colonization efforts by ATERET COHANIM, Nahalat Shimon International, Miami millionaire IRVING MOSKOWITZ, and others. Like other Palestinian neighborhoods, such as SILWAN, A TUR, and SHAYK JARRAH, Ras al-Amud is part of the larger plan for the Judaization of all of East Jerusalem. As of August 2009, Ras al-Amud had two settler colonies: Ma’ale Ha’Zeitim (Olive Heights) Phase 1 (inhabited) with fifty families (some 250 people) and Ma’ale Ha’Zeitim Phase 2 with sixty housing units nearly completed. These two settlements cover an area of some 14.5 dunums or approximately 4 acres, consisting (besides the apartments) of a commercial center, synagogue, kindergarten, clinic, mikveh (ritual bath), and parks and public spaces. There is also a regular bus line to ferry the settlers to a nearby Jewish cemetery (Har HaZaytim). Additionally, a new development is in the making—Ma’ale David. This new settlement extends the existing Ma’ale Ha’Zeitim onto the 11-dunum (3-acre) lot vacated by the WEST BANK police headquarters (which moved to E1). It is planned for 104 housing units, a synagogue, mikveh, kindergarten, country club, library, swimming pool, and large parking lot. At a later stage there will be a bridge connecting Ma’ale David to Ma’ale Ha’Zeitim. Before September 1997, no Jews lived in the neighborhood.

The colony of Ma’ale Ha’Zeitim is strategically located on the slope of the Mount of Olives, creating continuity with the Jewish cemetery and BEIT OROT, a yeshiva with an attached residential complex, on a four-dunum (1-acre) plot between Mountain Scopus and the Mount of Olives in the Arab neighborhood of A Tur, then with the Hebrew University, finally reaching another Palestinian neighborhood, Shayk Jarrah. Right-wing activists ascribe great significance to widening Jewish construction in Ras al-Amud, and to realizing ownership of lots and buildings that it has managed to acquire in recent years in that vicinity. According to the thinking of the settlers (and their supporters), Ma’ale Ha’Zeitim makes it more difficult, if not impossible, for the Palestinians to create a territorial corridor, a “safe passage” between the West Bank to the east and the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF. Indeed, the colony will serve to preempt any possibility of dividing Jerusalem in a future peace agreement.

There is a further dimension to the settlers’ interest in Ras al-Amud, which involves developing the E1 area between the West Bank settlement MA’ALE ADUMIM and Jerusalem. In consequence of US pressure, Israel has several times deferred initiation of settlement construction in the E1 region; however, in 2008 a police station was completed on an area within E1 the size of four football fields, and less than two miles from Jerusalem. It will be followed by full colonization of the area, creating a contiguous swath of Jewish settlement from Ma’ale Adumim to East Jerusalem that severs the Palestinian West Bank in half from east to west. When the police moved to E1, its former headquarters in the East Jerusalem neighborhood of Ras al-Amud was available for conversion into apartments for Jewish settlers. Negotiations for the sale of the building and its land, which is located in a heavily populated Palestinian area about 500 meters from the wall of Jerusalem’s OLD CITY, had been under way for several years.

Prior to its completion, the main police station (the Samaria and Judea District Police Headquarters), which served the settlements in the West Bank, was located in Ras al-Amud on a lot allegedly purchased by the Bukharan Community (Central Asian Jews from the khanate of Bukhara, Samarkand, and the Ferghana Valley) during OTTOMAN EMPIRE times to expand the Jewish cemetery on the Mount of Olives, although it was never used for this purpose. Writing in Ha’aretz in 2008, Nadav Shragai reported that “the right-wing groups active in ‘redeeming Jerusalem’ by buying up Arab land were negotiating with the Bukharan Community Committee to purchase the land and building that housed the police station in Ras al-Amud.”

Effie Eitam, a leader of the pro-settlement NATIONAL RELIGIOUS PARTY and former housing minister (2003–2008), said he initiated the plan to move the police force to E1 to free its building and the 11 dunums (3 acres) of land surrounding it in Ras al-Amud for Jewish housing. “When the Judea and Samaria police move out, the state will have to think about what will be the alternative function of the building, and I see no reason why the state would not allow more Jews to live there. I accelerated the process, and I think it’s very legitimate.” In early 2005, Eitam moved into a five-story, fifty-one-unit apartment compound across the street from the Ras al-Amud police headquarters.

In 2005 Rabbi David Nisanov, head of the Bukharan Jewish Community of Jerusalem, which supposedly owns the police station and the land surrounding it, said he was negotiating to sell the property to the apartment complex’s developers once the police relocate. At the time, Ha’aretz reported that the settlers’ “big plan” was to receive the police building from the Bukharan Community Committee, which would give them significant territorial contiguity within Ras al-Amud.

That same year in an agreement signed between the committee and the Israel police, the Bukharan Committee undertook to apply to the CIVIL ADMINISTRATION to arrange for 14 dunums (approximately 3.5 acres) of land to be allocated in area E1 for constructing a replacement building for the police. The committee also undertook to plan the replacement building and surrounding development at its own expense. This barter arrangement allowed the police to finance the new headquarters while bypassing the Budget Law. The agreement stipulates that the committee “or its agents” would carry out all the construction work on the new police station, after which it would receive the police building in Ras al-Amud, and that the Bukharan Community Committee would obtain from the Civil Administration the 14-dunum (3.5-acre) allotment for the station in the E1 area. Experts estimated the cost of the project at $10 million. The agreement authorized the committee to contract out all of the labor, from the architect and interior designer to the electrician and safety engineer. The only restriction was that they had to meet the field security requirements of the Israel police. The national police commissioner Moshe Karadi signed the agreement.

Approval was almost immediate, and in August 2001, Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON ordered the plans for the new police station in E1 submitted for approval. In February 2002, the Civil Administration’s Supreme Planning Committee approved the plan after rejecting objections submitted by Palestinian residents in the area. The Israeli advocacy group IR AMIM petitioned the state, claiming that the agreement proves that the real reason behind moving the Judea and Samaria police station to E1 is to enable the settlers in Ras al-Amud to use the building.

Asked on what authority the police had handed over land it received from the ISRAEL LANDS ADMINISTRATION (ILA) to an entity that designates it for residential construction in a sensitive area, the Public Security Ministry said: “At issue is an agreement that was signed with the ILA, the police and the Bukharan Community’s endowment, whose rights to the land in Ras al-Amud were recognized by the court. In a circular agreement, the endowment undertook to build a new building for the district headquarters in return for the old headquarters.”

The history of the land involved in the Ras al-Amud settlement dates to the early nineteenth century. In 1928, two Orthodox Jewish organizations, Chabad and Fahlin, registered this piece of land with the British authorities in their names. These organizations may have been part of the Bukharan community that appeared on the scene later, though the document does not say so. However, when Chabad and Fahlin registered the property with BRITISH MANDATE authorities, it already belonged to the Hussein el-Ghoul family, who had purchased it nearly one hundred years earlier, in 1837, and had been using the land ever since. The family, like the majority of both small- and large-scale landowners in Palestine, chose, for tax and conscription purposes, not to comply with the 1859 Ottoman law regarding land registration. In 1960, a representative of the el-Ghoul family sued the Jordanian Custodian of Enemy Properties (CEP) in Jordanian court, although a decision was not rendered until 1962. In that year, both the Jordanian courts recognized the ownership of the land by the el-Ghoul family and registered it officially in the name of the family.

After the Israeli OCCUPATION of the West Bank in the 1967 WAR, the Chabad and Fahlin societies sued the owners (the el-Ghoul family) and users (the el-Ghoul family and tenant farmers) of the land. The societies ignored the decision of the Jordanian courts, relying instead on the registration decree issued in 1928 during the Mandate. The Israeli Central Court issued a decree canceling the Jordanian registration and designated the land as “disputed.” The land was then transferred to the Israel Lands Administration, who placed it under the administration of the Jerusalem Municipality, and it finally went to the police—“for public purposes.” Those were the events of the first stage of Israel taking control of the land.

In 1984 the Jerusalem Municipality sold Ras al-Amud to a housing development corporation owned by Irving Moskowitz. When, in the early 1990s, the Palestinian residents of Ras al-Amud (together with residents of Silwan) submitted a development plan to the Jerusalem Municipality, the municipality deferred adopting the plan for years, claiming that the suburb belonged to the Jewish people. When the municipality finally agreed to the Palestinian Ras al-Amud plan, it imposed the condition that the residents had to accept the establishment of a Jewish colony in the neighborhood. More disturbing, the plan the municipality proffered to the Palestinian residents of Ras al-Amud only allowed them to build on 55–65 percent of the land area and with a maximum of two floors/stories per building. On the other hand, the municipality allowed the Jews to build on 40 percent of the land area with a maximum of seven floors/stories per building.

On 26 July 1997, the Jerusalem municipal government granted Irving Moskowitz permission to build Jewish housing in Ras al-Amud, adding a new source of antagonism to the already tense standoff between Israelis and Palestinians. The decision authorized the financier to construct a two-story apartment building on a plot he owns in Ras al-Amud, and among the first settlers in Ma’ale Ha’Zeitim were Moskowitz and his son-in-law Arie King, a far-right political activist and business associate of Moskowitz.

In early November 1998, Jewish settlers began excavating land in Ras al-Amud using large earth-movers to prepare it for construction. At the time, the Israeli authorities claimed that the digging was an excavation for an archaeological site. In reaction, a wave of Palestinian protests erupted, leading to harsh Israeli reprisals, including the arrest of a number of prominent Israeli and Palestinian peace activists, several members of the Palestinian Legislative Council, and Israeli-Arab Knesset members. Despite being an outspoken supporter of colonization activities, Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU decided to temporarily freeze construction in Ras al-Amud, awaiting the results of Israeli elections on 17 May 1999; however, the legal committees and government agencies heading the project approved its continuation.

LABOR PARTY leaders condemned the Ras al-Amud project, and shortly after taking office in May 1999, Prime Minister EHUD BARAK promised to freeze Jewish settlement expansion in the West Bank. Nevertheless, the prime minister quietly permitted construction of the Ras al-Amud settlement to go forward. After Barak’s election, Irving Moskowitz boldly declared that it was unlikely that the prime minister-elect would bar him from building a Jewish colony in Ras al-Amud, pointing out that Barak was the “godfather of the Ras al-Amud settlement.” Moskowitz added that Barak had personally endorsed the blueprints for the settlement and that he was eager to see East Jerusalem populated by Jews.

In September 2000, new Israeli settlement OUTPOSTS were established in the Palestinian area of Ras al-Amud. According to reports, Jewish youth from the Israeli settler group Ateret Cohanim occupied two Palestinian houses near the Jewish Cemetery on the Mount of Olives. The two houses, which cover an area of 210 square meters (2,260 square feet), had been tenanted by Palestinian families until they were forcefully evacuated in 1988 due to ownership claims made by the Israeli “Jerusalem Burial Society.”

The two occupied houses have given additional support to the other Ateret Cohanim settlement outposts in Ras al-Amud and are being refurbished with the sponsorship of Irving Moskowitz. Jewish settlers in Ma’ale Zeitim Phases I and II have been signing contracts for the apartments at prices ranging from $103,000 to $212,000.

When Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was elected in early 2001, he gave the official go-ahead for completion of Ras al-Amud and stated that he was determined to undermine the “corridor plan” outlined at the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT (2000) for Palestinian access to the al-Haram ash-Sharif. Indeed, it was Sharon’s objective to implant Jewish enclaves and outposts throughout the HOLY BASIN to preclude any division of Jerusalem in future negotiations. His administration provided significant financial and material support to the settler groups working to Judaize Silwan, Ras al-Amud, the Mount of Olives, ABU DIS, and other Palestinian neighborhoods. In short, Israeli settlement activities in Ras al-Amud and elsewhere in East Jerusalem aim to abort any possibility for dividing the city in the future. It is notable that past Israeli-Palestinian talks, especially those at Camp David, included the idea of establishing such a corridor running through the old Jericho road, the Mount of Olives region, Motta Gur Street, up to the Lion's Gate, and to the al-Haram ash-Sharif. Such a corridor would give West Bank Muslim and Christian Palestinians access to their holy sites in the Old City without ceding to them any control or sovereignty. Now even that corridor is seriously in question.

The Israeli government is working in close cooperation with the settlers in Ras al-Amud and elsewhere to build a human cordon around Jerusalem's Old City. Government involvement with the settler projects was revealed in a report by the State Attorney's Office reported in Ha'aretz (first reported in the Israeli daily newspaper Yedioth Aharonoth), which concluded that almost every major ministry in the Israeli government assisted in the construction, expansion, and maintenance of illegal settlement outposts around East Jerusalem. The report found that "every echelon, from minister to low-level clerks, ignored settlers' violations of the law . . . bypassing the zoning laws and master plans" and improperly funneling state money to settlement expansions, even after being ordered not to by Israel's attorney general. This is true of both Labor and LIKUD governments.

See also ATERET COHANIM; HOLY BASIN; JERUSALEM; IRVING MOSKOWITZ; SETTLEMENTS (B'TSELEM); SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; SILWAN; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Abu Shamseyeh, Haleem. "Settling the Old City: The Policies of Labor and Likud." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 6 (1999).
- Anderson, John Ward. "Israelis Act to Encircle East Jerusalem: Enclaves in Arab Areas: Illegal Building Projects Seen Intended to Consolidate Control." Washington Post. 7 February 2005.
- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. Ras Al Amoud Neighborhood: A Hot Spot in Occupied East Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem, 2003. http://www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=272.
- Bannoura, Saed. "Right-Wing Israeli Settlers Will Move in to Palestinian Town of Ras al-Amud." International Middle East Center. 28 April 2008.
- Beckerman, Gal. "The Bukharans Are Coming." The Jerusalem Post. 23 February 2006.
- Bedein, David S. "Ras el Amud: Analysis." Jerusalem: Beit Agron International Press Center, 22 September 1997.
- Cheshin, Amir. Municipal Policies in Jerusalem: An Account from Within. Jerusalem: PASSIA, 1998.
- Cockburn, Patrick. "Battle for Jerusalem: Jewish Settlers Seize Palestinian Houses in City of Hate." The Independent (UK). 16 September 1997.
- Dann, Moshe. "Hands off the 'Outposts': In Israel, Biblical Sites Are Bonds of Identity." The Jerusalem Post. 19 December 2005.
- Dumper, Michael. The Politics of Jerusalem since 1967. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Eldar, Akiva. "The Holy Basin: The Very Eye of the Storm." Ha'aretz. 2 April 2009.
- . "Settlers to Move into E. J'lem Police HQ." Ha'aretz. 28 April 2008.
- EU Observer. Israel Actively Pursuing the Illegal Annexation of East Jerusalem. Settlement Report. EUObserver Document. 19:2 (9 March 2009).
- Hampson, Annika. "Neighbor of a Settler." Al-Ahram (Cairo). 632 (3–9 April 2003).
- Hodgkins, Allison B. Israeli Settlement Policy in Jerusalem: Facts on the Ground. Jerusalem: PASSIA, 1998.
- Ir Amim. Israeli Settlement in Palestine Communities in East Jerusalem. Jerusalem. August 2009.
- Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "Ras al-Amud Agreement." Jerusalem: Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 18 September 1997. http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/MFA\_Archive/1996-1997/Ras%20al-Amud%20Agreement.
- Land Research Center. "Ras Al Amoud Neighborhood: A Hot Spot in Occupied East Jerusalem." Jerusalem: Land Research Center, 23 June 2003. http://www.lrcj.org/Departments/Human\_Rights/Cases/2003/June-2003.htm.
- McGreal, Chris. "Sharon Tests Bush, Blair and the Road Map by Letting Families Occupy Contested District." The Guardian. 7 April 2003.
- MidEastWeb. Israeli Camp David II Proposals for Final Settlement. July 2000. <http://www.mideastweb.org/campdavid2.htm>.
- Rapoport, Meron. "Settlers to Get East Jerusalem Police Building in Exchange." Ha'aretz. 26 April 2006.
- Rubinstein, Danny. "Barak Gets Green Light in Ras al-Amud." Ha'aretz. 9 November 1999.
- Schmemmann, Serge. "Plan for Apartment House in East Jerusalem Angers Arabs." New York Times. 26 July 1997.
- Segal, Naomi. "Palestinians Say 'No' to Compromise on Ras al-Amud." Jewish Telegraphic Agency. 26 September 1997.

- Segev, Tom. "The Makings of History/Green Leaf in the Bukharan Quarter." Ha'aretz. 13 November 2008.
- Seidemann, Daniel. State of Affairs: Jerusalem 2008. Political Developments and Changes on the Ground. Jerusalem: Ir Amin, December 2008.
- Selig, Abe. "Ir Amim: Gov't Helping with Plan for Another 750 Jewish Residents in East Jerusalem." Jerusalem Post. 27 August 2009.
- Shragai, Nadav. "Building Begins on New Jewish Homes in E. J'lem's Ras al-Amud Neighborhood." Ha'aretz. 15 January 2008.
- . "Construction to Start in Area Palestinians Want for Corridor." Ha'aretz. 8 January 2008.
- Trounson, Rebecca. "Israel Authorizes Jewish Settlers to Keep Foothold in East Jerusalem." Los Angeles Times. 19 September 1997.

Rashid, Muhammad (1954–)

Muhammad Rashid (Khalid Salam) was a close political and economic adviser to PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman YASIR ARAFAT and, to a considerable extent, controlled the financial affairs of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). Born to an Iraqi Kurdish family, Rashid joined FATAH and the PLO in the late 1970s, and, in the early 1980s, as editor of Sawt al-Bilad, a weekly newsmagazine published in the WEST BANK, he became a close and trusted adviser to Arafat. At the time, Arafat was suspicious of his longtime comrades and was engaged in what many have described as an obsessive drive to control all aspects—especially financial—of the Palestinian movement. Rashid was an ideal ally because, being Kurdish and from IRAQ, he had no inherent clan or other loyalties that could conflict with Arafat's interests. Since Rashid did not hold other loyalties, he could be absolutely loyal to Arafat as his benefactor and mentor. Moreover, once Arafat chose him as his economic adviser and political confidant, Rashid's standing escalated rapidly.

Within a few years, Rashid became the most powerful man in Arafat's entourage. Even before the Palestinian leadership returned from exile in TUNIS to the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, international companies and major contractors made courtesy calls to Arafat, who they thought would soon be head of Palestine. In most meetings, the businesspersons visiting Arafat would request his blessing for their projects and plans, but invariably Arafat and his associates handed over contracts and other business requests to Rashid. It was not long before it became clear to investors, contractors, and other businesspersons that to get the coveted blessing of Arafat for their ideas, projects, or products they needed to convince Rashid. Moreover, to get Rashid on board, an incentive was needed, which meant, in some cases, a considerable share in the new enterprise for Rashid—up to a third or even half in some, or in others a straightforward percentage of the expected profits. Investors were never sure if this share was a tax for the new Palestinian National Authority (PNA) or simply a bribe. In any case, Rashid's signature was needed to complete any major business deal or issue a contract or concession.

The net result of this was that Rashid became the owner, in part or in full, of numerous companies, including advertising, gasoline, communications, cement, and electricity. Of all the enterprises that Rashid was involved in, the most controversial was the JERICHO casino, owned by Austrians, private Israelis, and the PNA. Named the "Oasis," it employed Palestinians but allowed only Israelis and foreigners to gamble. As Israel has no casinos, the enterprise was a major attraction for its citizens, while Islamist Palestinians strenuously objected to the alcohol, scantily clad women, and gambling. Nevertheless, thanks to the extraordinary security provided by the Palestinian security services, the casino was a success until the eruption of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in the fall of 2000. Despite persistent attempts by Palestinians to ascertain who owned the Palestinian shares of the Oasis, no one was able to come up with a clear answer. Many believed that the profits made from the casino and by the many companies established by Rashid went to a slush fund controlled by Arafat.

The escalation of violence in the Intifada and the key role that Palestinian activists played in it resulted in a major setback to newly wealthy individuals like Rashid. Not only were they affected by the collapse of the Palestinian economy, but accusations of corruption against Rashid and others like him became louder and louder, at times repeated publicly in official forums like the Palestinian Legislative Council. Ironically, however, Rashid's demise did not come from his business dealings but from his political activities, specifically his involvement in the siege of BETHLEHEM'S CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY, in which Israel held over 150 Palestinian civilians and armed militants hostage in April–May 2002. While publicly appointed negotiators were trying, to no avail, to reach an agreement with the Israelis, Rashid's use of his Israeli contacts bore fruit. As a result of the settlement brokered by Rashid, thirteen Palestinians who were inside the church were released and deported to a variety of European countries, and another group were deported to the Gaza Strip. Many Palestinians felt that this was a bad compromise that legitimized DEPORTATION. Shortly after it became public that Rashid was behind the controversial Church of Nativity arrangement, his home was attacked. No one was hurt, but the message was clear and, soon thereafter, reportedly after consultation with Arafat, Rashid left Palestine for Cairo, where he is reportedly carrying out financial deals for the Palestinian leadership.

Bibliography

- Abu-Nasr, Donna. "Gazans' Bitterness Grows against Arafat's Elites." New York Times. 10 June 1997.
- Ben Efrat, Roni, Assaf Adiv, and Stephen Langfur. "Something's Rotten in the Nonstate of Palestine: Corruption under Arafat, the Legislators Speak Out." Challenge (Tel Aviv). 45 (1997).
- Bergman, Ronen, and David Ratner. "The Man Who Swallowed Gaza." Ha'aretz Weekend Supplement (Jerusalem). 4 April 1997.
- Glick, Caroline B. "The Peace Profiteers." Jerusalem Post. 13 December 2002.
- Halevi, Ilan. "Self-Government, Democracy, and Mismanagement under the Palestine Authority." Journal of Palestine Studies. 27:3 (1998).
- Hirst, David. "Shameless in Gaza." The Guardian Weekly (London). 27 April 1997.
- Jaradt, Ali. "Corruption Is Obstructing the Development of Our Society." News from Within (Jerusalem). 17:3 (2001).
- Kuttab, Daoud. "Mohammad Rashid: The Ugly Rich Man of Palestine." Arabic Media Internet Network. 12 January 2003. <http://www.daoudkuttab.com/articles/2003/january12.html>.
- LeVine, Mark. Why They Don't Hate Us: Lifting the Veil on the Axis of Evil. Oxford, UK: Oneworld Publications, 2005.
- Roy, Sara. "The Crisis Within: The Struggle for Palestinian Society." Critique: Journal for Critical Studies of the Middle East. 17 (2000).
- Said, Edward. "Are There No Limits to Corruption?" Al-Hayat (Lebanon). 2 July 1997.
- Schwartz, Michael. "The Great Gasoline Scam: Fueling Coexistence." Challenge (Tel Aviv). 53 (1999).
- . "A Secret Account in Tel Aviv Funds Arafat's Oppression." Challenge (Tel Aviv). 43 (1997).

Ratz

Ratz, officially the Movement for Civil Rights and Peace, was a left-wing Israeli political party founded in 1973 by SHULAMIT ALONI and was active until 1997, when it merged with MAPAM and SHINUI to form MERETZ. For the entirety of its existence, Ratz opposed the OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP and called for a peace settlement with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION.

Bibliography

- Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Elazar, Daniel. Israel at the Polls 1999: Israel: The First Hundred Years. London: Routledge, 2001.

Reagan, Ronald Wilson (1911–2004)

Ronald Reagan was an actor, broadcaster, politician, governor of California (1967–1975), and the thirty-third president of the UNITED STATES (1981–1989). Born in Illinois, he attended Eureka College, where he studied economics and sociology. In his early political life, Reagan was a Democrat and a supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt, but by the mid-1950s he had moved far to the right. As president of the Screen Actors Guild (1947–1952 and 1959–1960), he testified before the US House of Representatives Un-American Activities Committee on communist influence in Hollywood. He supported the practice of blacklisting in Hollywood and monitored actors he considered disloyal to the United States, informing on them to the FBI under the code name "Agent T-10." Concluding that the Republican Party was better able to combat communism than was the Democratic Party, Reagan backed the presidential candidacies of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER in 1952 and 1956 and RICHARD NIXON in 1960, 1968, and 1972.

President Reagan had two secretaries of state during his presidency—ALEXANDER HAIG and GEORGE SHULTZ—both of whom were deeply involved in Middle East policymaking. Overwhelmingly preoccupied with the Soviet threat, Reagan viewed the world in terms of black and white, good and evil. He considered groups resisting Israeli OCCUPATION, such as the HIZBULLAH in LEBANON, Palestinians in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP, and left-wing guerrillas fighting US-backed right-wing military dictatorships, to be Soviet pawns and “terrorists.” In fact, the Reagan administration made “international TERRORISM” one of the centerpieces of its foreign policy, and Palestinian “terrorism” was high on the list of offenders.

On the other hand, Israelis fondly remember Reagan as perhaps the most pro-Israel president in US history (although he preceded GEORGE W. BUSH, who undoubtedly holds that distinction). At an emotional level, Reagan related to Israel, though he never visited the Jewish state. Part of this emotional attachment no doubt stemmed from his religious beliefs and part from his Manichaean worldview that placed Israel clearly on the side of good against the “evil empire” of the Soviet Union. In the context of the Cold War, Reagan considered Israel an important STRATEGIC ASSET in fighting communism. More concretely, he was the first US president to declare (on 2 February 1981) that Israeli SETTLEMENTS in the Occupied Territories were “not illegal.”

To the extent that the Reagan administration was concerned with the Middle East, it was worried about the Soviet-Syrian relationship. US officials expressed concern for Israel’s security in the Middle East, which, in effect, legitimized Tel Aviv’s continuous air raids against PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) bases. It also led to a Reagan administration memorandum of understanding, on 30 November 1981, affirming Israel’s position as a strategic asset to US interests. But when, on 7 June 1981, Israel bombed the Osiraq reactor outside Baghdad, IRAQ, Reagan was furious, temporarily suspended the delivery of F-16 jet fighters to Israel, and supported the UN Security Council resolution condemning Israel. On the other hand, the US ambassador to the UNITED NATIONS, Jeanne Kirkpatrick, was one of Israel’s staunchest defenders, and, during her tenure, the United States vetoed more than a dozen other resolutions critical of Israel. However, in December 1981, when Israel annexed the Golan Heights from SYRIA, Reagan suspended the strategic cooperation agreement, which prompted Israel’s Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN to accuse Reagan of treating Israel like a “banana republic.” In both instances, however, the penalties were only temporary.

When the Reagan administration sold weapons—AWACs—to SAUDI ARABIA in 1981, Israel vehemently opposed this deal, and its Washington lobby, the AMERICAN-ISRAEL PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, went into overdrive with the executive and legislative branches in an attempt to impede the sale. Nevertheless, the administration went ahead with the agreement, which in reality did not diminish Israel’s overall military superiority in the Middle East. But that President Reagan prevailed on the sale of AWACs was something of a watershed event because the lobby never mounted a significant challenge to an arms sale again. Still, the AWACs campaign was notable for its nastiness. It was cast as Reagan versus Begin, and the president did not hide his distaste for the Israeli leader.

Haig, Reagan’s first secretary of state, saw the world much as the president did, with an overarching preoccupation with the Soviet Union and the inclination to view all local conflicts as a manifestation of the Soviet threat. In the Middle East this translated into US support for Israel and Soviet support for Syria. In early 1982, Haig gave Israel the green light for its invasion of Lebanon, apparently without informing the president, and Reagan was uncomfortable with the Israeli thrust. He strongly opposed Israel’s drive to occupy Beirut, and senior Reagan officials protested the Israeli siege and aerial bombardment of Lebanon’s capital. Reagan instructed Kirkpatrick to support a 6 June Security Council demand for Israel to withdraw immediately and unconditionally and dispatched his special adviser for the Middle East, Philip Habib, to Lebanon to “stop the hostilities.” However, once the prospect of superpower confrontation was reduced by the 11 June Israeli-Syrian truce, Reagan and his top officials began to champion key Israeli goals—for example, urging that all Syrian and PLO forces leave Lebanon, endorsing the candidacy of Bashir Gemayel for president of Lebanon, and even supporting Israel’s control over a 40-kilometer (about 25-mile) zone north of its border. In the end, Israel suffered no sanctions for its invasion of Lebanon, and US marines participated in the multinational force that supervised the evacuation of the PLO.

On 1 September 1982, the president announced the REAGAN PLAN for Middle East peace. During the LEBANON WAR, unknown to Israel, Reagan had formulated a new diplomatic initiative designed to stimulate peace negotiations, improve Israel-EGYPT relations, and provide impetus for JORDAN to join the peace process. The plan was also aimed at signaling those Arab states that had accepted PLO evacuees from Beirut that the United States was seeking a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict. The Reagan Plan opposed the creation of a Palestinian state, calling instead for Palestinian autonomy in association with Jordan. Reagan said that JERUSALEM should remain undivided but its final status negotiated. He called for a freeze of Jewish settlements but stated that Israel could not be expected to return to the 1967 BORDERS.

Despite interest and positive responses from a number of Arab states and the PLO, Begin flatly rejected the plan, which left the initiative dead in the water. Two weeks later, Israel violated the truce and entered West Beirut, much to the chagrin of Reagan officials, including the president. This was followed by SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE of Palestinians by Lebanese militiamen allied with Israel, who had been let into the camps by Israel. Reagan quickly returned the marines to Beirut in a revived multinational force to ensure Israel's withdrawal and provide belated protection for Palestinian civilians. (Haig abruptly resigned or was asked to resign in 1982 reportedly over policy disagreements.) By the summer of 1983, however, the US forces were no longer playing the role of a neutral peacekeeper, but firing their 16-inch guns into Shi'a and Druze villages in the mountains. The result was a devastating attack in October 1983 on the marine barracks that left some 241 dead. ISLAMIC JIHAD took responsibility for the attack, but it is believed by most analysts that Hizbullah was the power behind the nom de guerre. In February 1984 the United States withdrew from Lebanon completely.

In his opposition to the Soviet Union, President Reagan worked to free SOVIET JEWS and approved the CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY-sponsored rescue, together with Israel, of 500 Ethiopian Jews in Operation Joshua in 1985. Under Reagan, US economic assistance to Israel increased substantially. In 1987, Israel began to receive $3 billion annually in foreign aid and from 1985 on, the aid was in the form of grants. The Reagan administration permitted Israel, at least for a time, to use US funds to develop its own fighter plane, the Lavi. In 1985, Washington also signed the first free trade agreement between the United States and Israel. In fact, during the Reagan administration, a series of memoranda of understanding, signed between US agencies and their Israeli counterparts, promoted cooperation in a wide range of fields, such as EDUCATION, space research, and HEALTH CARE. Reagan was also responsible for helping to reform Israel's economy. In 1985, following a severe economic crisis in Israel that sent inflation rates soaring as high as 445 percent, the United States approved a $1.5 billion emergency assistance package and helped formulate Israel's successful economic stabilization plan.

Reagan's greatest substantive contribution to the US-Israeli relationship was the 1981 institutionalization of STRATEGIC COOPERATION, which created a web of ties between the Pentagon and ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) and led to a progressive strengthening of Israel's military capability. Initially, three joint groups were set up: political-military, economic development, and, in 1986, security assistance planning. By 1987 more than twenty-four military-technological agreements were signed. Reagan designated Israel as a major non-NATO ally, thus codifying its de facto status in the organization and enhancing its ability to sell military equipment to the United States. In addition to the high-level strategic cooperation, Israel provided covert support for Reagan's policies toward IRAN and in Central America. Israel played a key role in providing Iran with arms, though at the same time the United States also sold weapons to Iraq. These arms were paid for by US-diverted proceeds from the sale of weapons to the Contras in Nicaragua, in what became known as the "Iran-Contra affair."

On 11 February 1985 PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT and King Husayn of Jordan put forward a major peace initiative (HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT). The Reagan response was to ignore the substance of the proposal but to reject it on procedure, opposing an international conference because it would involve the Soviets. In addition, the president argued that the PLO still had not fully accepted UN RESOLUTION 242, which called for Israel's withdrawal from the Occupied Territories in exchange for an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Arafat's rejoinder was that the PLO would explicitly accept Resolution 242 when the United States acknowledged the Palestinian right to self-determination.

Subsequently, Secretary of State George Shultz, who had assumed office in 1982 and who was particularly interested in fostering a peace process among Israel, the Arab states, and the Palestinians, together with Assistant Secretary of State Richard Murphy, visited the Middle East and suggested a possible meeting between a US official and a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. A session was scheduled for August, but after Murphy and an “approved” delegation arrived in Amman, Jordan, President Reagan abruptly canceled the meeting, ostensibly because the PLO refused to affirm Resolution 242 prior to the meeting. In so doing, the president sent a strong message that the administration was not interested in negotiations or the plight of the Palestinians.

Thereafter, violence spiraled out of control in the region: Palestinians assassinated three Israelis in Larnaca, Israel bombed the headquarters of the PLO in TUNIS, the ACHILLE LAURO was hijacked by Palestinians, and in December 1987 the First INTIFADA erupted in the West Bank and Gaza. By this time, it was not clear how much Reagan was involved with the details of Middle East policy. In any case, Shultz undertook a major initiative in 1988 known as the Shultz Plan, a proposal for Middle East peace that preoccupied him for a full year. It culminated with the low-level United States–Palestinian Liberation Organization DIALOGUE initiated by Washington in late 1988, which was more about US interests than about Palestinian concerns.

President Reagan still considered Palestinians part of the Cold War empire of “evil.” This was evident in Reagan’s intense interest in the Lebanese-Israeli relationship and in Jordan’s abrogation of the Husayn-Arafat initiative. Only the First Intifada and subsequent explicit shifts in PLO diplomatic positions (undertaken to meet Washington’s dictates) compelled officials in the Reagan administration to reassess the US stand and begin to see the Palestinians as more of an autonomous actor.

See also ALEXANDER HAIG; REAGAN PLAN; GEORGE SHULTZ

Bibliography

- Bard, Mitchell G. “Reagan’s Legacy on Israel.” Israelinsider. 25 June 2004.
- Bell, Coral. The Reagan Paradox: American Foreign Policy in the 1980s. Piscataway, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1990.
- Claire, Rodger. Raid on the Sun: Inside Israel’s Secret Campaign That Denied Saddam the Bomb. New York: Broadway Books, 2005.
- Dershowitz, Toby. The Reagan Administration and Israel. Washington, DC: American Israel Public Affairs Committee, 1987.
- Kuhn, James, and Jim Kuhn. Ronald Reagan in Private: A Memoir of My Years in the White House. New York: Sentinel Publishers, 2004.
- Lesch, Ann M. “The Reagan Administration’s Policy toward the Palestinians.” In U.S. Policy on Palestine

from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Normal, IL: The Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1985.

- Mearsheimer, John J., and Stephen M. Wald. The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2008.
- Murphy, Richard W. “An American Vision of Peace in the Middle East.” Current Policy 1067. Washington, DC: Bureau of Public Affairs, Department of State, 18 April 1988.
- Pasko, Ariel Natan. “Reagan, Begin, and Israel.” Geocities. 7 June 2004. www.opinionet.com/article.php?id=2218.
- Peck, Juliana. Reagan Administration and the Palestine Question: The First Thousand Days. Westport, CT: Boynton/Cook Publishers, 1984.
- Reagan, Ronald. The Reagan Diaries. Edited by Douglas Brinkley. New York: HarperCollins, 2007.
- Rosen, Steven J., ed. The Reagan Administration and Israel. Washington, DC: American Israel Public Affairs Committee, 1987.
- Saunders, Harold H. “American Diplomacy and Arab-Israeli-Palestinian Peace since 1967.” In Security in the Middle East. Edited by Samuel F. Wells and Mark Bruzonsky. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1987.
- Smith, Grant F. Foreign Agents: The American Israel Public Affairs Committee from the 1963 Fulbright Hearings to the 2005 Espionage Scandal. Washington, DC: Institute for Research, 2007.

Reagan Plan, 1982

US president RONALD REAGAN launched a peace initiative on 1 September 1982, following Israel’s war against the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in LEBANON, based on UN RESOLUTION 242 and the 1979 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS. Reagan spoke about the opportunities created by the respite in the Lebanese civil war and the PLO evacuation from Beirut. He noted the homelessness of the Palestinian people and stated, “The question now is how to reconcile Israel’s legitimate security concerns with the legitimate rights of the Palestinians.” By declaring that the United States would “not support the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the WEST BANK and GAZA” and would endorse changes in the 1967 lines to ensure Israel’s security, he sought to reassure Israel. While he reiterated Washington’s ironclad commitment to Israel’s security, Reagan also stated that the UNITED STATES would not support annexation or permanent control by Israel of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and called for an immediate freeze on Jewish SETTLEMENTS.

The Reagan Plan proposed autonomy for the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza during a transitional period of five years, which would begin after the election of a self-governing authority. The purpose of the transition period would be to prove that the Palestinians could run their own affairs and that Palestinian autonomy posed no threat to Israel's security. The final status of the West Bank and Gaza would be decided through negotiations, but the United States strongly preferred that Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza organize in an association with JORDAN, which in Washington's view offered the best chance for a durable, just, and lasting peace. The president further stated that "we remain convinced that JERUSALEM must remain undivided, but its final status should be decided through negotiations."

From the perspective of the Palestinians and Arab states, the plan had several notable omissions: Reagan did not refer to PLO representation in negotiations; it denied the Palestinians self-determination by saying they must join in confederation with Jordan; and it did not speak to the fate of the Palestinian REFUGEES from the wars of 1948 and 1967 living outside the Occupied Territories, to the status of the Golan Heights, or even to the method of negotiation. Reactions to the Reagan Plan were varied. The Israeli government, headed by Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN, flatly and unequivocally rejected it, and, to give more weight to its rejection, Israel announced its intention to immediately establish new settlements in the Occupied Territories. The attitude of the Israeli prime minister was not entirely shared by the Israeli LABOR PARTY, which believed the plan offered a suitable basis for negotiation with Jordan. In fact, the Reagan Plan corresponded in many respects to Labor's political program. Labor was opposed to the establishment of a Palestinian state and insisted on the preservation of Jewish settlements but was willing, in the context of a formal peace treaty, to give Jordan significant portions of the West Bank (subject to the exclusion of such territory as Israel would consider necessary for its security), including the OLD CITY of Jerusalem.

The Arab states demonstrated their interest in the Reagan Plan at the Arab Summit in September when they presented the FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE, which differed little from Reagan's plan except on the issues of the PLO and Palestinian self-determination. The intense negotiations between Jordan and the PLO that culminated in the HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT illustrated the seriousness with which both the PLO and Jordan took the plan. But Israel's rejection of the plan and Reagan's disinclination to involve himself deeply in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict resulted in the Reagan Plan's failure to transform into a coherent diplomatic strategy, and consequently it faded away in a very short time.

Bibliography

- Eldar, Akiva. "A Poor Man's History." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 9 June 2004.
- Lesch, Ann M. "The Reagan Administration's Policy toward the Palestinians." In U.S. Policy on Palestine from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Normal, IL: The Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1985.
- Nakhleh, Khalil. "The Lebanon War and the Occupied Territories." MERIP Reports. 115 (1983). Washington, DC: Middle East Report and Information Project.
- Nakhleh, Khalil, and Clifford A. Wright. "After the Palestine-Israel War: Limits to U.S. and Israeli Policy." Political Science Quarterly. 99:1 (1984).
- Peck, Juliana. Reagan Administration and the Palestine Question: The First Thousand Days. Westport, CT: Boynton/Cook Publishers, 1984.
- Reagan, Ronald. Reagan Plan. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Peace/reaganplan.html.
- Tell, Ahmad. "Reagan Peace Plan." Jerusalemites. 1982. www.jerusalemites.org/facts\_documents/peace/7.htm.

Reform Party

The Reform Party (al-Hizb al-Islah) was formed in August 1935 by Dr. Husayn Fakhri al-Khalidi to strengthen his position after his election as mayor of JERUSALEM in 1934. The Palestinian party's objectives included attaining freedom for Palestine, establishing Palestinian self-government, working for the welfare of farmers and workers, encouraging education, and opposing a Jewish national home in Palestine. Although the Reform Party never had any appreciable influence over public opinion, Khalidi had considerable influence in Jerusalem, and his views were publicly expressed in the local Arab press. A member of the first ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE, he was deported, in 1937, by the BRITISH MANDATE government to the Seychelles for his nationalist activism.

See also DEPORTATION; PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948

Bibliography

- Grossback, Lawrence J., David A. M. Peterson, and James A. Stimson. Mandate Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

Al Hut, Bayan Nuweheid. The Political Leaders and Political Organization in Palestine 1917–48. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1981.

Refugees and the Right of Return

The origins of the Palestinian refugee problem can be found in great power interests in the region following World War II, the massive problem of resettlement of Jewish refugees and displaced persons after the war, and the Zionist plan to create a Jewish homeland in Palestine. Although there is significant historical and social science literature about these three main underlying factors of the Palestinian refugee problem, there is disagreement on what actually caused and has maintained the refugee exodus and long-standing displacement. Commentators disagree primarily about the historical accuracy of the narratives describing the key factors listed above. Zionists provide one historical narrative, while the Palestinians provide another.

Underlying the contentious nature of the Palestinian refugee problem is a lack of clarity about the difference between political positions and legal rights. Commentators dispute whether Palestinians are refugees; whether they have a right to return, and to where; whether they were forcibly expelled or simply left of their own volition; and whether a Palestinian “right to return” is equivalent to a Jewish “right to return” and can or cannot be realized without negating equivalent Jewish rights.

The philosophical/political debate about whether Palestinians are refugees relates directly to the Jewish/Israeli position that such refugee recognition might impute a Palestinian “right” to return that would trump a Jewish right of return to Israel. This argument is described in varying ways: that the Palestinians were historically not a “people” with recognized rights to Palestine; that they were not forced out or expelled by the Israelis, but fled on their own (or in response to orders by Arab leadership to leave); that they lost their land because of a war launched by the Arab states to prevent Israel from becoming a state and Israel was the victor in that war; and that Jews were the native people of Palestine, and historically its rightful owners, and in “returning” to it have redeemed it for the Jewish people. Underlying these arguments is the premise that Israel has the right to maintain a state of exclusively Jewish character, or Jewish majority, and that the Partition Resolution was an affirmation by the international community of the right to a Jewish state.

Each of these arguments is contested by historical and legal research, but the legal/historical conclusions are not as widely known. Some conclusions can be drawn from the weight of legal and historical fact on the issue of whether Jews are a “people” with self-determination rights that exclude or supersede the self-determination rights of Palestinians. Historical and archaeological research has established that Jews were among many peoples populating ancient Palestine, and were even a significant minority population in the first millennium BCE. However, from the seventh century CE onward, Arab descendants of the Canaanites and later-arriving Arab people were the majority population in the area of Palestine when Jewish IMMIGRATION began in the 1880s. At that time, the Arab population of Palestine was 450,000, with about 20,000 Jews. By 1917, Palestinians comprised 90 percent of the population, and by 1947, after significant Jewish immigration, the Arab population numbered approximately 1,200,000, while the Jewish population was around 600,000.

The historical record corroborates certain key facts and events underlying the Palestinian refugee problem. The Zionist program for a “Jewish national home” originated in the first WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS in 1897 in Switzerland, in which THEODOR HERZL argued for a Jewish state in Palestine. By 1901, the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION had established the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND to purchase LAND for Jewish settlers in Palestine as well as in other areas in the Middle East. Herzl and the World Zionist Organization envisioned the Zionist project of “redeeming the land” for Jews as taking land from the Arabs and expelling them from Palestine. The Zionists succeeded in aligning their plan with British interests in the Middle East, and in 1917 the British cabinet endorsed a letter that became known as the BALFOUR DECLARATION. The Balfour Declaration stated that the British government “viewed with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people . . . it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.”

The Zionists interpreted the endorsement of the declaration as a British commitment to the “Jewish people” for the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine. There are serious deficiencies in this interpretation. First, Britain had no legal authority to create any political entity in Palestine that disregarded the rights of the indigenous Palestinian population, a fact recognized in the language of the declaration itself (“viewed with favour the establishment of a Jewish national home . . . nothing shall be done to prejudice the rights of the non-Jewish communities in Palestine”). Second, such an interpretation violated the explicit agreements (HUSAYN-McMAHON) made between the British government and Arab leaders during World War I that guaranteed self-determination and independence of the Arabs in all the regions under authority of the Sharif of Mecca once the war had ended. Third, there was no legal concept of the “Jewish people” as a political entity with recognized rights as separate from the religious or cultural concept of the “Jewish people.” Fourth, the history of the Balfour Declaration reflects that the British government did not believe that the Zionists represented the rights or interests of the “Jewish people,” particularly since ANTI-ZIONISM Jews made it clear to Britain that the Zionist proponents of Balfour did not speak for them. Although the Zionists succeeded in getting Britain to incorporate the Balfour language into its League of Nations Mandate treaty over Palestine, the British Parliament did not pass the Balfour letter as a resolution or endorse it; it was defeated in both houses when put to a vote. The most consistent legal interpretation of the Balfour Declaration with the negotiations, drafting history, and INTERNATIONAL LAW as it existed at the time is that Britain intended to provide a sanctuary for Jews in Palestine without violating the rights of Palestinian Arabs or the rights of Jews in any other country in the world: in other words, establishing for Jews a home in Palestine, but not a Jewish state. This reading remains consistent with later political and legal developments.

Following World War I, the 1922 League of Nations Mandate “entrusted” Palestine and other Arab regions formerly ruled by the OTTOMAN EMPIRE to the British government “until such time as [these communities could] stand alone.” Yet the BRITISH MANDATE for Palestine also incorporated Britain’s commitment as mandatory power to “put into effect” the Balfour Declaration—a “national home for the Jewish people.” The Palestine Mandate granted the Jewish minority in Palestine and nonresident Jews elsewhere in the world full political rights in Palestine, while the majority indigenous Palestinian Arab population was only granted civil and religious rights, thus setting the stage for the claims of a nonindigenous population to displace the indigenous Palestinians through TRANSFER and other means under the guise of legality. The Zionist program was further given ostensible legitimacy by the Partition Resolution. In UN RESOLUTION 181 of 1947, the General Assembly recommended the partition of Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state following Britain’s relinquishment of its responsibilities under the Mandate after World War II. The new “Jewish” state was to be established in 56 percent of historic Palestine to benefit the less than one-third of the population that was Jewish and owned no more than 7 percent of the land of Palestine, while the “Arab” state would give no more than 44 percent of Palestine to the Palestinians, who comprised 95 percent of the indigenous population and owned 93 percent of the land.

As a legal matter, claims based on ancient title do not supersede claims of long possession or otherwise clear title of individual or collective ownership—nor can they, if the ancient claims are based on religion, because legal title to land cannot be based on discriminatory preferences for one religion over another. Thus, if the collective Jewish right to the land of Palestine is based on ancient possession or title, it does not find support in the historical record or under international law. Moreover, Jews may have been a distinct minority in historic Palestine as well as an identifiable group elsewhere in the world, but those facts alone do not confer the right of self-determination in Palestine. There has been no historical or scientific evidence to support a claim that Jews are a homogeneous ethnic group as opposed to a heterogeneous religious group. The UNITED NATIONS has never recognized Jews as a distinct “people” with exclusive rights to self-determination, in Palestine or elsewhere. The UN could not do so, both because the rights of Palestinians to independence and self-determination in Palestine had already been affirmed and because it would violate the fundamental principles of nationality and nondiscrimination in international law to recognize Jewish citizens of almost every country as having a distinct nationality from the states in which they resided. The consequences of such a recognition can be immediately seen as every state in which Jews reside could then denationalize them for possessing another nationality.

In contrast, following World War I, the League of Nations expressly recognized the rights of Palestinians and other Arab peoples to self-determination and established the French and British Mandates as temporary trusteeships until the Mandate communities could be brought to independence. The League of Nations Covenant prohibited new colonization, as did the later charter of the United Nations. The UN Charter, and the International Court of Justice decisions interpreting it, outlawed aggression and required self-determination for the former colonized communities—absolutely prohibiting the taking of any territory by force. Thus, United Nations General Assembly (UNGA) Resolution 181 could not have “given” Palestine to the Jewish people to the exclusion of the self-determination rights of the native Palestinians without violating the League Covenant, the UN Charter, and the weight of international law.

Resolution 181, a nonbinding recommendation by the General Assembly, was a political solution to the British desire to quit its Mandate responsibilities in Palestine in the face of growing civil warfare and Zionist TERRORISM directed at Britain as well as Palestinian Arabs. The resolution recommended the establishment of two states, one Arab and one Jewish, with economic union between them, with the Jewish area comprising 498,000 Jews and 407,700 Arabs and an Arab area of 10,000 Jews and 725,000 Arabs, and an “international zone of JERUSALEM” with 105,000 Arabs and 100,000 Jews. Even in the Jewish area there would be a bare Jewish majority. Aside from the issue of whether the General Assembly had legal authority to recommend partition of territory, let alone to confer title of territory held by people who did not agree to relinquish their land, 181 did not authorize establishment of an exclusive “Jewish state.” Among the most important provisions of 181 were the nondiscrimination provisions, which required each state to treat all of its citizens as equal—that is, discrimination of any kind on the basis of race, religion, or national origin was prohibited. Nor did 181 include any provisions for transfer of population from one area to another. Hence, 181 gave no authority for an exclusive Jewish state, as it could not do so without violating the UN Charter.

The organized Jewish groups declared Israel a state in May 1948 based on that part of 181 recommending a “Jewish state,” but immediately began expelling the non-Jewish population from its self-declared territory, and then commenced expanding into the territory that was to have been the “Arab state.” Following the passage of Resolution 181, even before the declaration of formal hostilities between Israel and the Arab states, armed and well-organized Jewish militias forced approximately one-third of the Palestinian Arab population, or about 200,000 people, out of their towns, cities, and villages. During the war that followed, the disorganized and primarily unarmed Palestinian population was displaced and expelled in huge numbers by Zionist militias through a combination of tactics that included attacks on civilians, massacres, looting, destruction of property, and forced expulsion. Israeli military forces carried out “shoot to kill” policies to prevent refugees from returning to their homes and lands. The Israeli government continued its expulsion policies, both within the cease-fire lines and outside, following the ARMISTICE AGREEMENTS of 1949.

Historical research, and in particular Israeli archival research, has established that the Zionist militias carried out a policy of forced expulsion that resulted in half of Palestinian refugees becoming so prior to the entry of the Arab state forces into the conflict in May 1948. The largest number of refugees fled in April and early May 1948 under “PLAN DALET,” the Zionist military plan to expel as many Palestinian Arabs as possible under the guise of necessity of war. Systematic data gathered by Erskine Childers and others of radio and other broadcasts by Arab leaders during the 1948 WAR established that no calls were made to encourage Palestinian Arabs to leave their homes. The earliest of the massacres documented by the Red Cross was that of the village of DEIR YASSIN in April 1948, in which more than one hundred Palestinian men, women, and children were killed by the militant Zionist groups IRGUN and the STERN GANG, and it set the stage for terrorizing the Palestinian population. Other massacres followed, including nine in October 1948, in which hundreds of Palestinian villagers were killed and thrown in mass graves. As refugees were forcibly expelled or fled their homes, Israeli forces systematically destroyed hundreds of their villages. More than 400 Palestinian villages were depopulated and destroyed, and in several key districts no villages were left intact. An estimated two-thirds of Palestinian homes in Israel were destroyed, and the remaining one-third were taken and occupied by Jews. Although the historical record is overwhelming that the Palestinian refugees were forcibly expelled as part of a systematic plan to transfer as much of the Palestinian population as possible to make room for Jews, the contention that they left on their own has no relevance to their main legal rights as refugees: the right to return, the right to property restitution, and the right of compensation for real or personal property loss.

General Statistics on Palestinian Refugees

There are differing calculations of the numbers of Palestinians who became refugees or internally displaced during the 1948 War, but the best-documented calculations arrive at 750,000–800,000 Palestinian refugees, or about 85 percent of the Palestinian population from what became Israel.

There are three primary groups of Palestinian refugees. The largest group comprises Palestinians displaced from their places of origin due to armed conflict and the 1948 War. This includes refugees who are eligible for assistance from the UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (UNRWA), known as “registered refugees,” and those who were also displaced in 1948 but were either ineligible for UNRWA assistance or did not register with the agency. The second group of refugees—usually termed “displaced persons”—comprises those displaced for the first time from their homes in the territories Israel occupied after the 1967 WAR. The third group includes those who were not refugees from either the 1948 or the 1967 conflict, but who are outside of Palestine and are being denied the right to return due to Israel’s discriminatory residency and expulsion laws.

There are two additional groups of Palestinians in “refugee-like” conditions. The first group comprises internally displaced persons who remained within the “recognized borders” of Israel after they were expelled or forced to flee from their homes during the 1948 conflict, or when their homes were expropriated or demolished. The second group comprises internally displaced persons who suffered similar Israeli actions within the 1967 Occupied Territories.

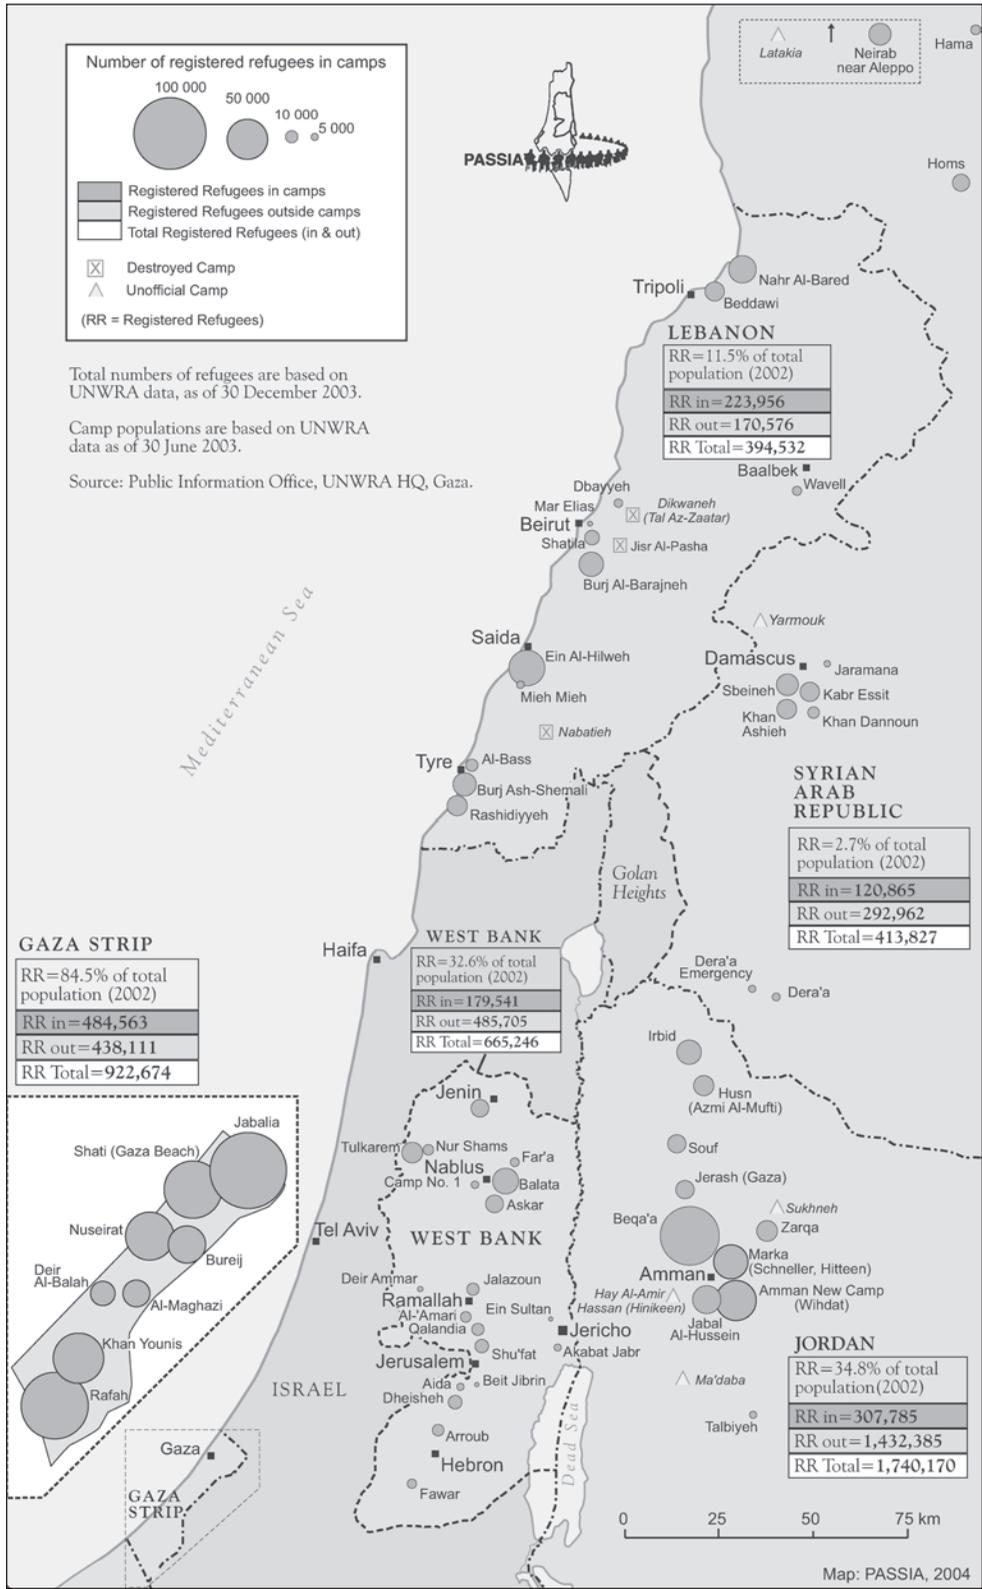

Today, some 7 million persons out of a global population of 10.1 million Palestinians are refugees or internally displaced. The most comprehensive figures appear in the yearly Survey on Palestinian Refugees and Internally Displaced Persons, compiled by BADIL RESOURCE CENTER FOR PALESTINIAN RESIDENCY AND REFUGEE RIGHTS. The most recent Survey (2007) reviews the numbers and locations of Palestinian refugees and displaced persons, relying on and analyzing a wide range of authoritative sources. The Survey concludes that at the beginning of 2007, there were more than 7 million Palestinian refugees and 450,000 internally displaced persons out of the worldwide Palestinian population of 10.1 million. The refugee figure includes approximately 6 million of the original 1948 refugee population, of which over 4.5 million are registered with UNRWA for assistance, and 250,000 to 300,000 refugees from the 1967 conflict.

Approximately 1.3 million Palestinian refugees are residents of fifty-nine official refugee camps scattered throughout the WEST BANK, GAZA STRIP, JORDAN, LEBANON, and SYRIA, established and run by UNRWA. The majority of the camp populations are 1948 refugees and their descendants, while the rest are 1967 refugees and their descendants. UNRWA also operates another dozen “unofficial” camps to house Palestinian refugees who can no longer be accommodated in the existing official camp locations.

UNRWA’s figures give its registered refugee populations as of June 2009 as 1,967,414 in Jordan, 421,993 in Lebanon, 467,417 in Syria, 771,143 in the West Bank, and 1,090,932 in Gaza. However, not all Palestinian refugees live in camps; for example, in Jordan the majority do not live in camps. Conditions for Palestinian refugees in each host state and area vary substantially based on the laws and policies of each country, and change frequently depending on the political climate.

Understanding these categories of refugees requires an explanation of the term “Palestinian refugee.” The issue is a complex one because there is more than one definition. The earliest record of a discussion within the United Nations of how to define “Palestine refugees” appears during the drafting of UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 194. As hundreds of thousands of refugees fled from Palestine in the wake of the Partition Plan, the UN took up the issue of its responsibilities toward them. In passing Resolution 194 of 11 December 1948, the General Assembly established the UNITED NATIONS CONCILIATION COMMISSION FOR PALESTINE (UNCCP) with a very broad mandate to resolve both the conflict and the massive refugee problem; defined the refugees for whom the UNCCP would provide “international protection”; and in 194(III) paragraph 11, set out the required legal formula for resolving the refugee problem.

Map 35. Palestinian Refugees: Area of UNRWA Operations

There is no clear definition of “Palestinian refugee” incorporated in the language of Resolution 194 itself. However, in discussing “Palestine refugees” the UNCCP’s authoritative Analysis of Paragraph 11 of the General Assembly’s Resolution of 11 December 1948 states that “the term ‘refugees’ applies to all persons, Arabs, Jews and others who have been displaced from their homes in Palestine. This would include Arabs in Israel who have been shifted from their normal places of residence. It would also include Jews who had their homes in Arab Palestine, such as the inhabitants of the Jewish quarter of the Old City. It would not include Arabs who have lost their lands but not their houses, such as the inhabitants of Tulkarm.” This was the definition accepted by the drafters of Resolution 194 for purposes of defining the entire group of persons from Palestine who were entitled to the protection of the international community. The UN’s authority was later confined to the Palestinians within this category, as Israel took responsibility for all the Jews in Palestine covered by the definition.

This definition is different from the universally adopted definition of “refugee” that appears in the important international instruments, but is consistent with the general legal understanding that a refugee is an individual meeting certain criteria who lacks the protection of his or her state of nationality or origin. The need for “international protection” arises only when a refugee’s own state no longer provides him or her that protection. This concept also underlies the extension of international protection toward persons who are stateless, that is, persons who are not recognized nationals of any state as a matter of either law or fact, and persons who are internally displaced in situations where the state of origin or nationality fails to provide protection. The UN drafters included in their definition the internally displaced Palestinians who had lost their homes and lands but remained in Israel, recognizing that such individuals, like the “refugees,” were not receiving the protection of the Israeli state.

The definition of “Palestine refugees” for purposes of international protection and UNCCP’s mandate is also different from the definition given to “Palestine refugees” for purposes of UNRWA’s mandate. UNRWA coverage extends to registered Palestine refugees residing in UNRWA’s areas of operation in the occupied Palestinian territory, Lebanon, Jordan, and Syria only. UNRWA has defined a Palestine refugee as any person whose “normal place of residence was Palestine during the period 1 June 1946 to 15 May 1948 and who lost both home and means of livelihood as a result of the 1948 conflict.” Palestine refugees eligible for UNRWA assistance are mainly persons who fulfill the above definition as well as descendants of fathers fulfilling the definition. It should be noted that UNRWA’s definition of refugees is necessarily restricted to those eligible to receive its aid, as the definition explicitly states that the refugee must have lost both home and means of livelihood to be eligible for registration with UNRWA. Thus, for the purposes of repatriation or compensation, as envisaged in UNGA Resolution 194 (III) of December 1948, the term “Palestine refugee” is used with a different, much less restrictive meaning as compared to UNRWA’s need-based definition. As of June 2009, UNRWA lists over 4.7 million as registered Palestinian refugees.

Despite the UN’s sustained involvement, for close to six decades Palestinian refugees have been denied major aspects of international protection and remain today without a durable solution to their condition. The lack of effective international protection toward Palestinians includes two key aspects: the day-to-day physical security and integrity of the person, and the longer-term durable solution to their unique condition as a refugee population. Palestinians as a nationally identifiable population are unique in that they comprise the largest global population of refugees, internally displaced, and stateless persons. Despite fierce contention about whether Palestinians are indeed “refugees,” it remains true that Palestinians comprise one of the largest and longest-standing refugee, or refugee-like, populations in the world—a fair approximation is that two out of five refugees in the world are Palestinian.

Palestinian Refugee Rights under International Law

Immediately after the declaration of the state, Israel adopted measures to prevent return. The measures were incorporated in a plan called “Retroactive Transfer: A Scheme for the Solution of the Arab Question in the State of Israel.” Among the measures recommended and implemented were destruction of Palestinian-Arab population centers, settlement of Jews in Arab towns and villages, and passage of legislation to prevent refugee return. Israel’s Nationality Law of 1952 retroactively repealed Palestinian citizenship as recognized under the British Mandate and provided that every Jewish immigrant was automatically entitled to Israeli nationality, but placed such stringent conditions on the eligibility of Palestinian Arabs for Israeli nationality that few could qualify. Israel also passed a series of laws defining Palestinians who had been forcibly removed from their lands or had fled as “absentees,” defining their lands as “absentee properties,” and then confiscating such “absentee” Palestinian properties. Subsequent Israeli legislation converted vast amounts of confiscated Palestinian properties for the exclusive benefit of Jews and prohibited restitution of such land to Palestinian Arabs in perpetuity. The ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAWS also deprived Palestinians who had remained on their land and become Israeli citizens of possession of their properties through the legal fiction that they were “PRESENT ABSENTEES” and therefore subject to the expropriation laws. Such Palestinians are internally displaced—they are Israeli citizens, but, as non-Jews, they have been moved from their homes and do not have the same rights as Jews to own and possess their land under Israeli law. Through its laws of nationality, citizenship, and land regulation, Israel denationalized the majority of Palestinian Arabs from the nationality of their homeland; permanently expropriated Arab lands, homes, and collective properties; and created an entire population of stateless persons.

While the Palestinian refugee problem is unique in the special responsibility of the UN for creating the refugee flow through passage of the Partition Resolution, some aspects of the problem are not unique to the Palestinian refugee case. Similar situations of conflict-induced mass exodus, widespread violations of human rights, and institutionalized discrimination concerning nationality and property rights are experienced by many refugees around the world and contribute to protracted refugee situations. Elements of the Palestinian refugee problem can be found in numerous mass refugee situations in Africa, Central America, Asia, and Europe. What remains unique about the Palestinian refugee problem are the persistent and severe denial of international protection and the lack of access both to a durable solution and to the mechanisms for implementing a durable solution—minimum protection guarantees that are available over time to other refugee populations in the world. Contributing to the denial of protection to Palestinian refugees is a severe gap in understanding and implementing the key provisions of law applicable to the Palestinian case—a situation now widely known as the Palestinian “protection gap.”

The international instruments protecting the rights of refugees and stateless persons were drafted after World War II, primarily in response to the massive postwar flow of Jewish and other refugees and displaced persons in Europe. In addition to the key instruments—the 1951 Convention on the Status of Refugees and the 1954 Convention on the Status of Stateless Persons—the UN also established several international agencies with particular mandates over refugees and others. The three important agencies relevant here are the UN Conciliation Commission on Palestine (UNCCP), established in December 1948; the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), established in 1949; and the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), established in 1950. The motivation for drafting the Refugee and Stateless Persons conventions and for setting up the UNHCR was to change pre-existing law and practice concerning refugees and others in refugee-like situations in key ways: first by shifting responsibility for mass refugee flows to the entire international community (“burden-sharing”); second by reaching consensus on a new, individualized definition of refugee to replace the prior group or category approach; third by shifting the emphasis from returning refugees to their places of origin to focusing on resettlement in third states; and fourth by restricting the conditions in which persons could be made stateless, and obliging states to grant protection to stateless persons. There was a consensus that three particular groups had to be covered by this new refugee regime, as they were deserving of international protection: refugees, stateless persons, and displaced persons.

The refugee rights Palestinians have under international law relate to whether Palestinians are defined as refugees as a legal matter, a more complex issue than the international definition applied to other refugees under the relevant instruments. The international legal definition of “refugee” is, at its core, a determination about which individuals are unable or unwilling to obtain national protection, and thus deserve the protection of the international community. Under the main international provisions that define refugees and others “deserving of international protection,” Palestinians clearly qualify not only as refugees, but also as internally displaced and stateless persons.

The first relevant instrument is the 1951 Refugee Convention. Article 1A(2) of the 1951 Refugee Convention incorporates an individualized definition of refugee that prohibits a state party from returning or sending any individual to a state where she or he risks persecution for reasons of race, religion, political opinion, nationality, or social group. Article 1D of the Refugee Convention has very different definitional criteria and, although it doesn’t mention any particular group, was meant to apply exclusively to Palestinian refugees. Article 1D states that the Refugee Convention “shall not apply to persons who are at present receiving from organs or agencies of the United Nations other than the UNHCR protection or assistance.” Its second sentence provides: “When such protection or assistance has ceased for any reason, without the position of such persons being definitively settled in accordance with [relevant UN resolutions] these persons shall ipso facto be entitled to the benefits of this Convention.” Article 1D’s two clauses have been subjected to widely divergent interpretations by states, the UN, and experts in the field. The most widely held interpretation is that 1D is an exclusion clause, preventing Palestinians from being recognized as refugees since UNRWA is assumed to be providing them with international protection. The general result is that Palestinians have been denied most of the minimum protection rights guaranteed other recognized refugees under the Refugee Convention.

Two other provisions apply to the status of Palestinians as subjects of international refugee law: Article 1 of the Stateless Persons Convention and paragraph 7(c) of the Statute of the UNHCR. Both incorporate language similar to the first sentence of Article 1D, thereby precluding an extension of UNHCR’s mandate toward Palestinians as refugees, and an application of the benefits of the Stateless Persons Convention. A provision similar to Article 1D also appears in the more recent 1961 Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness. It excludes the protections of that convention vis-à-vis Palestinians as well. The prevalent interpretation of these provisions has had severe consequences for Palestinians seeking benefits as refugees, stateless, and displaced persons worldwide. As a result, Palestinians have been precluded from many of the critical aspects of international protection, both in the day-to-day exercise of their human and civil rights and in their longer-term desire for protection, intervention, and mechanisms for obtaining a durable solution to their condition as refugees and stateless persons.

Significant recent research into the drafting history of these provisions reveals that interpreting these provisions to exclude Palestinians from protection guarantees is an incorrect application of the drafters’ intentions. The travaux préparatoires clarify the ambiguities in Article 1D and the related provisions. The UN delegates drafting these provisions reached an overwhelming consensus that Palestinian refugees deserved, and were in need of, both protection and assistance. The UN discussions reveal a consensus that Palestinians deserved special attention for several critical reasons: their large-scale persecution and expulsion as a people, the complicity of the UN itself in creating the refugee problem, and the consensus already embodied in UN Resolutions that the durable solution for Palestinians was repatriation and not resettlement. In fact, it was recognized that Palestinians as an entire group of people fell into all three categories of main concern to the international community, and thus qualified as an entire group or category of refugees. The purpose behind these provisions was to set up a separate regime to specifically protect Palestinian refugees, and not to dilute the particular responsibility of the UN toward them by incorporating them in the Refugee Convention/UNHCR regime that focused on resettlement. The separate regime was the establishment of two UN agencies: the UNCCP and UNRWA, with complementary mandates to cover the full range of assistance and protection needs for this population. Moreover, since Palestinians as an entire people qualified as refugees in the eyes of the UN, they should not be required to meet the individualized refugee definition found in Article 1A(2) of the Refugee Convention. The language agreed upon in Article 1D was that “such persons shall ipso facto be entitled to the benefits of the Convention,” in other words, the provision does not refer to them as “refugees” under the Article 1A(2) Convention definition and precludes them from the requirement of meeting the individualized fear of persecution definition incorporated in that provision. Article 1D was intended as a contingent inclusion clause that would operate to automatically bring Palestinian refugees as an entire category under the coverage of the Refugee Convention regime should either prong of the special regime—the protection and assistance provided by two agencies—fail for any reason.

Because the majority of Palestinians are considered not to meet the main refugee definition in the convention and are specifically excluded from the mandate of UNHCR by its statute, they are presumed not to be “refugees” for purposes of eligibility for international protection. However, the drafting history of the instruments and the mandates of the agencies relevant to the Palestinians reflect that international protection was of utmost concern to the UN for this population of refugees. The UNCCP, established by UNGA Resolution 194 in December 1948, was entrusted to provide international protection, in particular the implementation of the durable solution mandated within 194 itself. UNRWA, established a year later, was entrusted with providing the day-to-day assistance of food, clothing, and shelter to the refugees pending the resolution of their situation. Of the two, UNCCP was clearly the agency that had the attention of the UN in its efforts to resolve both the refugee problem and the wider Palestinian-Arab-Israeli conflict. The UNCCP had an indefinite mandate, while UNRWA was initially established for only three years. The reasons for the UNCCP losing its role as the instrument of international protection are not entirely clear, but by 1952 the UNCCP had been reduced to no more than a small office to maintain records of Palestinian refugee property holdings. Thus, of the special, dual-agency regime set up to protect and assist Palestinian refugees, only UNRWA remained. Although UNRWA’s valuable services have provided subsistence needs for Palestinian refugees for five decades, it is legally constrained from providing the main international protection guarantees to the refugees that could bring their plight closer to a permanent resolution.

The issue of whether Palestinians are “refugees” as a legal matter is a critical one, as the argument is made that if they are not refugees, they do not have any legal right to “return” to Israel.

Opponents of a Palestinian right to return argue that Palestinians were displaced during a defensive war; that Israel has no obligation to allow them to return since they left voluntarily; that neither international human rights nor humanitarian law incorporates a right of return for war refugees; and that, even if there were such a right, it applies only to the return of individuals and not to mass return. Opponents also argue that Israel, as a successor state, had the right to define its “nationals” to include or exclude any category of people it chose, and since Palestinians became “non-nationals” under Israeli law, they had no right to return there. Opponents further claim that key UN resolutions supposedly grounding a right of return, such as UNGA Resolution 194, are nonbinding; that they do not, in fact, create a right of return; and that, even if they did, they condition it on certain factors that have not been met.

Each of the above positions negating a Palestinian right of return has been countered with significant legal authority, analysis, and state practice, the essence of which can only be summarized here. Beginning with humanitarian law, or the law of armed conflict, concerning the right of war refugees to return after displacement, humanitarian law makes no distinction between forcible and nonforcible displacement in guaranteeing such persons their right to return to their homes. Critical humanitarian law provisions such as Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention and Article 43 of the 1907 Hague Regulations forbid the forcible transfers of individuals or groups of people from territories taken during war, and require their repatriation “back to their homes” as soon as hostilities have ceased. They require the occupier to restore the occupied area to the normal community life existing before the outbreak of conflict. The underlying principle of prohibiting removal of civilians from their homes during conflict and requiring their repatriation immediately after the conflict has ceased is now considered a principle of binding customary humanitarian law.

In addition to humanitarian law, human rights provisions underlying the right of refugees or displaced persons to return to their places of origin are found in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR, Article 13) and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR, Article 12). Other provisions are repeated in many other international and regional human rights instruments, such as the European Convention on Human Rights (Protocol 4, Article 3), the American Convention on Human Rights (Article 22), and the African Charter on Human and People's Rights (Article 12). Although there is much contention about whether these provisions oblige a state party to implement return of someone who is no longer a national of that state, the universal instruments—UDHR and ICCPR—grant a returnee the right to return to his or her precise place of origin regardless of current nationality or citizenship status by deliberately using the phrase “right to return to his own country” instead of the phrase “right to return to the country of his nationality.” Moreover, these instruments make no distinction between individual and mass return, and the drafting history of their provisions does not indicate that the drafters intended the provisions to apply only to individuals seeking to return.

These provisions are consistent with the requirements of another area of law relevant to this question: the law of state succession. A core principle of this law is that “the population follows the change of sovereignty in matters of nationality.” Thus, the new state must grant nationality to all of the original inhabitants of the territory. This principle has been codified in many treaties and legal decisions. It also appears in the UN’s authoritative International Law Commission Articles on Nationality and State Succession. Although a state has almost unfettered discretion in defining its citizens and nationals, it cannot violate certain recognized principles of international law, such as arbitrarily excluding the original inhabitants of the territory it acquires or defining its citizens/nationals on a discriminatory basis. The principle of nondiscrimination is a fundamental one, found throughout human rights law. Article 5(d) of the Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) specifically requires states “to prohibit . . . discrimination in all its forms and guarantee the right of everyone, without distinction as to race, color, or national or ethnic origin . . . the enjoyment of rights (including) the right to leave any country, including one’s own and to return to one’s country.” Israel is a party to all the universal rights instruments referenced here—the Fourth Geneva Convention, the ICCPR, and CERD—and the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT has ruled that the 1907 Hague Regulations are binding on Israel. Moreover, Israel has made no reservations limiting the application of these instruments on the issue of Palestinian right of return. Thus, Israel’s massive denationalization of Palestinian Arabs on the basis of their national/ethnic origin was prohibited, and under these principles, is an ongoing violation of international law until today.

The debate about whether any UN resolutions support a Palestinian right of return is misleading in that it positions United Nations Security Council (UNSC) resolutions against United Nations General Assembly (UNGA) resolutions. It is argued that the latter are nonbinding and that the former do not incorporate any clear statement affirming such a right. This debate also misconstrues the scope of UN resolutions, both on a refugee right of return in general and on Palestinian refugee right of return in particular. There are hundreds of both UNGA and UNSC resolutions dating back more than fifty years that affirm and reaffirm the right of return for refugees to their homes in every part of the world. The drafting history of UNGA Resolution 194, embodying the right of return for Palestinian refugees, makes quite clear that the drafters, particularly UN mediator COUNT FOLKE BERNADOTTE, understood that the right of return was already a principle of customary law by 1948. Quite aside from the depth and breadth of evidence available through general and particular UN resolutions that there is a refugee right to return that all states must implement, state practice makes such a rule abundantly clear. In every part of the globe, the right of refugees to return to their homes and lands of origin is incorporated in peace treaties, implemented individually or through mass repatriation, and recognized by all states. In fact, the right of refugees to return is one of the most, if not the most, widely implemented and recognized right that exists in refugee law. Taking only one decade as an example, in the 1990s an estimated 12 million refugees repatriated to every region in the world. In contrast, only approximately 1.3 million refugees were resettled during that decade. UNHCR itself calculates that today only one-half of 1 percent of the world’s refugees are resettled, while the overwhelming majority are repatriated or return post-conflict. This is so despite over fifty years of practice under the Refugee and Stateless Persons conventions, with their emphasis on resettlement. Based on state and international practice alone, it is evident that under international law, refugee return is the rule and that the nonrecognition of Palestinian refugees’ right to return is an aberration.

UNGA Resolution 194 is the earliest resolution on Palestinian refugee return, and its language must be understood in light of the state of international law existing at the time and the clarifications made by the UN drafters. The resolution embodies a three-pronged solution in hierarchical order: return, restitution of properties, and compensation. Paragraph 11 of that resolution states that “the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and . . . compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss or damage to property which, under the principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible. . . . [The UN] instructs the Conciliation Commission to facilitate the repatriation, resettlement and economic and social rehabilitation of the refugees and the payment of compensation.” This language meant the Palestinian refugees must be permitted to return if they so chose, a point that has become clear from the intentions of the UN mediator who drafted it, as well as in the discussions by the UN delegates when 194 was passed. The principles of restitution and compensation of property were understood in the language referring to “under principles of international law or equity.” The law of reparations at the time was already grounded in customary law, treaties, and a seminal decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ) dating to the interwar period. In the Chorzow Factory (Indemnity) case of 1928, the PCIJ established the principle that restitution was the required remedy for unlawful property-taking, and only if restitution were impossible—strictly construed—should compensation be paid for property loss. The paragraph 11 formula set out both restitution and compensation under prevailing law (“loss of or damage to property which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible”). The Chorzow Factory decision made clear that reparations for property takings must, first and foremost, undo the effect of the violation, a formulation understood and incorporated in Bernadotte’s formulation of Resolution 194. Paragraph 11 also makes return, restitution, and compensation equally enforceable, according to the refugee’s own choice.

This understanding of 194 is the most consistent with refugee law principles in general, as recognized and implemented by states and international organs. UNHCR implements three forms of durable solution for refugees: return to place of origin, host country absorption, and third-state resettlement. As indicated above, return is the preferred solution for the overwhelming majority of refugees. However, UNHCR’s implementation of any of the durable solutions is driven by the principle of refugee choice. The notion of international burden-sharing for refugees is meant to create meaningful and reasonable choice for refugees among safe and voluntary return, absorption, and resettlement—to the extent the latter two options are available in any particular refugee crisis. At the same time, of the three solutions, only return is an absolute obligation on states since no states are required to absorb or resettle a refugee, despite the provisions in the Refugee Convention encouraging them to do so. However, every state is required to permit its refugees to return home. In most instances of mass refugee flows since the 1970s, all three options have been available to a greater or lesser degree, and resolutions of mass refugee flows have been most successful when all three choices have been meaningful ones for the refugees themselves. For the issue of Palestinian refugee return, all of these principles have become even stronger since 1948, when Resolution 194 was passed, in that implementation and codification of return, restitution, and compensation have become more widespread. Until recently, the UN General Assembly also reaffirmed Resolution 194 itself on a yearly basis.

Consequences of the Protection Gap to Palestinian Refugees

The overall lack of a recognized legal status directly contributes to the deplorable conditions in which the majority of Palestinian refugees find themselves. Although conditions on identifiable criteria do vary significantly country by country, Palestinians worldwide are, in important ways, measurably worse off on the whole than their fellow non-Palestinian refugees or stateless persons in similar circumstances. Conceptually and legally, conditions of Palestinian refugees affect the two main aspects of protection: their day-to-day physical security and human needs, and their prospects for the realization and implementation of durable solutions for ending their refugee and stateless status. These two main aspects are further differentiated in two main global regions: the Arab states, where the majority of Palestinian refugees are located, and the non-Arab world.

Physical security, human dignity, and basic needs of Palestinian refugees within the Arab world vary significantly from state to state. In the Arab regions where UNRWA operates—the West Bank and Gaza, Syria, Lebanon, and Jordan—refugees registered with the agency obtain benefits for basic survival needs. To provide assistance to the refugees, UNRWA administers refugee camp housing, allots food and clothing rations, establishes and runs primary schools, and operates medical facilities within its mandate. Other rights and benefits outside UNRWA's mandate that are within the realm of "international protection" are left to the discretion of the host state, as neither UNHCR nor any other international agency has the authority to provide such protection to Palestinians within the Arab world. Thus, no state or agency has the authority to intervene to protect the refugees' physical security, or to guarantee (or prevent violations of) their core human rights, despite UNRWA's many services that have aimed over the decades to narrow the protection gap.

The ongoing reality for Palestinian refugees is one of extreme vulnerability, particularly in the Arab world. Most states in the ARAB LEAGUE are not signatories to the international instruments guaranteeing the rights of refugees and stateless persons. Thus, the most important document in this regard is the 1965 Casablanca Protocol of the League of Arab States, which requires the Arab state signatories to guarantee to Palestinians in their territories the same treatment in employment, freedom of movement between Arab states, granting and renewing travel documents, freedom of residence, and rights to leave and return as they give their own nationals. In comparison to provisions of the international instruments, such as the Refugee Convention, the Casablanca Protocol provides more guarantees in a number of ways. Nevertheless, the degree to which Arab states have complied with these obligations has depended on the political environment affecting attitudes toward Palestinians in their territories, rather than on compliance with treaty standards. In general terms, most Palestinians in Arab states are treated like foreigners in that they are unable to obtain permanent residence status or security of residence, even if they marry citizens of the country or have children born in that Arab state. Movement between Arab states is extremely restricted because of lack of travel and residency documents. Employment is restricted in many states, as is housing, access to education beyond primary school, and family reunification. Using these criteria, Palestinians in Lebanon face the worst conditions. They are restricted to living in overcrowded, substandard, unsanitary, and often dangerous refugee camps. They are denied the right to work in over seventy professions and are also denied the rights to quality education and family reunification. Palestinians in Syria, on the other hand, enjoy quite favorable conditions in terms of day-to-day rights. Although they are not eligible for Syrian citizenship, they receive most of the same residency, social, education, employment, and civil rights as Syrian citizens.

Lack of residency rights or security of residence in most of the Arab states where Palestinians reside has had devastating consequences for the refugee/stateless populations. Without security of residence, Palestinians have been subjected to repeated expulsion and dispossession for decades, a situation that continues today. Aside from the expulsions from historic Palestine/Israel and the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES that began in 1948 and continue today, almost every decade has brought mass expulsion of Palestinians from one Arab state or another. For example, in the 1950s, Palestinian workers were expelled from the Gulf states; in the 1970s hundreds of Palestinians were expelled from Jordan in the wake of conflict and the "BLACK SEPTEMBER" massacre. Other forcible displacements were the more than 100,000 Palestinians who were forced out of Lebanon during the civil war between 1976 and 1991, more than 400,000 Palestinians who were expelled from KUWAIT during the 1900–1991 GULF WAR, and the thousands of Palestinians forced out of Libya in 1995. Most recently, several thousand Palestinians have been displaced or expelled from IRAQ since the second US war on Iraq began in 2003. Palestinian refugee families have suffered multiple displacements within the Arab world due to lack of access to security of residence, a recognized nationality, or citizenship.

In the non-Arab world, where over 500,000 Palestinian refugees reside, their physical and human condition is directly related to the host state's interpretation of the relevant provisions of the refugee and stateless persons instruments discussed above. UNHCR has recently formalized its position that in the non-Arab world it may exercise its protection mandate toward Palestinians, depending on the attitude of the host state. Most states in the Western world are signatories of the Refugee Convention, one of the two Stateless Persons conventions, or some combination of these. Nevertheless, most states do not apply Article 1D at all, misinterpret it as an exclusion clause toward Palestinians, or apply the individualized refugee definition of Article 1A(2). Generally, the result is that Palestinians are not recognized either as refugees or stateless persons in the majority of cases in the Western world and reside in a precarious status where they are also vulnerable to multiple displacements due to their “non-returnability.” Since Palestinians are unable to regularize their status, they are subjected to prolonged detention in many cases because there is no state of nationality or habitual residence to which they can be returned. Nor do states provide them residence in fulfillment of the obligations to reduce statelessness. For example, states frequently identify Palestinians as of “unknown origin,” or “unclear nationality,” rather than as stateless or Palestinian refugees. Using these definitions allows such states to avoid applying the provisions of the stateless and refugee conventions to Palestinians in their territories.

The legal protection gap for Palestinians is even more acute in terms of the ultimate resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem, a resolution that requires guarantees for and mechanisms to implement durable solutions. Since the provisions of the major instruments that guarantee rights to refugees and stateless persons are perceived as excluding Palestinians, they are left outside the norms and mechanisms by which other refugees can realize return, absorption in other states, restitution of properties, compensation, and other rights. UNHCR is the primary agency with the international mandate to work toward realization and implementation of these rights for other refugees and stateless persons. It does not, with few exceptions, exercise these rights for Palestinians. Most importantly, it does not play the key role of intervention with the state primarily responsible for causing Palestinians to be refugees and stateless persons—Israel—in seeking implementation of the solution preferred by the refugees, that of repatriation/return to place of origin. In the Palestinian case, UNHCR has been absent from the key role it plays in other mass refugee situations, that of developing the framework for a durable solution based on refugee choice as part of peace negotiations and postconflict resolution. UNRWA, having no protection mandate, has been excluded from such a role with the effect that the key international mechanisms for implementing refugee return and related rights have been unavailable for Palestinians.

Lack of Durable Solutions in Israeli-Palestinian Agreements

From the perspective of international engagement with durable solutions, there has been almost no reference to fundamental legal principles in the Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations. From the earliest various peace negotiations and agreements between the Israelis and Palestinians to the most recent, the core international legal principles governing refugee rights summarized above have been singularly absent.

There is widespread consensus on the core applicable legal principles to durable solutions for refugees. They are the right to return to one’s home and place of origin in safety, the right to voluntarily choose among available resettlement options, the right to full restitution of property left behind, and the right to compensation for loss or damage to refugee property. For Palestinian refugees, these rights have been reaffirmed at least yearly by the UN General Assembly since their incorporation in UNGA Resolution 194 (III) of December 1948. These individual refugee rights of return, restitution, and compensation have been widely implemented by state practice concerning other refugee populations since they were outlined for the Palestinians in 194. Peace agreements in the former Yugoslav states of Kosovo, Croatia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina recognize and implement refugee return and property restitution. The same is true for peace agreements concerning Georgia; Tajikistan; the multi-state CIREFCA agreement of Central America involving Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, and Mexico; and many African countries, such as Sierra Leone, Rwanda, Burundi, Mozambique, and Liberia. In Macedonia, Kosovo, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Burundi, Guatemala, and Liberia, negotiated agreements specifically require that refugees and displaced persons be permitted to return to their homes or former places of residence. These and other agreements recognize and implement property restitution, including those for Bosnia, Kosovo, Cambodia, Guatemala, Mozambique, Rwanda, Croatia, Burundi, and Georgia. The most detailed return and property restitution agreement for refugees and other returnees can be found in Annex VII of the Dayton Accords of 1995, in which the return of all property is a core requirement. Implementation of Dayton is particularly interesting because, to date, no compensation has been paid for property because all refugee property has been order restituted, with a primary focus on accommodating secondary occupants in other places rather than frustrating restitution to the original owners.

In contrast to the plethora of peace agreements requiring implementation of core refugee rights, the various agreements in the Israel-Palestine situation, from Oslo to the ROAD MAP, omit any references to Palestinian or to international human rights law in general, or replace the understood international framework with a political framework that distorts the legal requirements themselves. A very general review of the incorporation of international law on individual refugee rights through the main negotiation processes is discussed here.

The Oslo Agreements. The set of negotiated agreements under the "OSLO PROCESS" include the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES, the 1994 GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT, and the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT between Israel and the PLO. In all of these instruments, there are extremely limited references to human rights in general. The 1993 Declaration of Principles (DOP), the initial framework agreement between the parties, states that its purpose is to recognize mutual legitimate and political rights to achieve a "just, lasting and comprehensive peace settlement and historic reconciliation through the agreed political process." There is no explanation of what will define the "legitimate rights" involved, or reference to any of the key instruments or customary law on refugee rights. The 1994 Gaza-Jericho Agreement refers generally to "accepted human rights norms" as governing the "powers and responsibilities" of the parties, but without any specification of what norms or rights apply, and without reference to treaties or UN Charter obligations. Of note in the 1995 Interim Agreement, there is a reference to "rights," but the only legal rights specified are those concerning government and absentee property acquired by Israelis in the Occupied Territories. This provision requires Palestinians to respect these rights; however, no parallel rights are recognized for Palestinian refugee or absentee property acquired by Israel or any other individual Palestinian rights. Both the Interim Agreement and the 1998 WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM imply that internationally accepted norms are subject to the agreements themselves, rather than, as international law requires, the other way around.

Concerning key refugee rights, the Oslo Process postponed discussion of the refugee issue until the final stage, which, to date, has never materialized. Thus, the main rights discussed above were not referenced at all. However, the lack of commitment to an international legal framework as the reference for negotiations is a main factor in the failure of the entire Oslo enterprise.

Taba. The January 2001 TABA TALKS between the PLO and Israel resulted in two separate draft proposals published by the parties. The proposals, one by the Palestinians and one by the Israelis, reflect much deeper discussion of the Palestinian refugee issue than in prior negotiations, but also reflect two dramatically different approaches to refugee rights and legal principles.

The Palestinian proposal reflects a sophisticated understanding of the international law of Palestinian refugee rights, incorporating the consensus legal framework, a refugee definition, mechanisms and modalities for implementing durable solutions for the refugees, and an "end of claims" clause. The Palestinian proposal is consistent with the framework and principles underlying UNGA Resolution 194, international law, and practice on refugee rights. It focuses on the voluntary choice of the refugee to decide to return to home or land within 1948 Israeli borders or to choose from available resettlement options. The Palestinian proposal discusses Israel's moral and legal responsibility for forced displacement and dispossession of Palestinian refugees in 1948 and for preventing their return.

The Israeli proposal, called a "private non-paper draft," responded to the Palestinian proposal and includes the Israeli narrative of the Palestinian refugee issue, a framework for solution and mechanism for implementation, modalities for compensation and rehabilitation, a special clause related to Jewish refugees, and an "end of claims" clause. It does not have a refugee definition. The Israeli response is, in essence, a political framework, inconsistent with UNGA Resolution 194, in that, although it lists five options for a solution, the solution is driven by Israel's concern for preservation of an institutionalized Jewish-privileged state, including Jewish control of land, rather than implementation of individual refugee choice to return and obtain restitution of Palestinian property. The five options set out in the Israeli proposal are a limited number of refugees “returning” to Israel, a land swap, resettlement primarily in a Palestinian state, rehabilitation in Arab host countries, and some resettlement in third states. The Israeli proposal does not acknowledge direct Israeli responsibility for the refugee issue or for implementing durable solutions, but states that Israel has indirect responsibility along with “all those parties directly or indirectly responsible.”

The Geneva Initiative. The Geneva Initiative, a private, nongovernmental initiative made public in October 2003, is also inconsistent with the international law framework. The key UN resolutions referenced in Geneva are UNSC Resolutions 242 and 338. In Article 7 of Geneva, the main provision on refugees, the drafters state that “the parties recognize that UNGAR 194, UNSC Res. 242 and the Arab Peace Initiative concerning the rights of the Palestinian refugees represent the basis for resolving the refugee issue, and agree that these rights are fulfilled according to Article 7 of this Agreement.” In other words, 194, 242, and 338 mean what the drafters interpret them to mean, rather than what international legal consensus and state practice require.

Like the Israeli response to Taba, Article 7 of Geneva presents a number of options for the refugees. They include “return” to “the state of Palestine,” areas in Israel to be transferred to Palestine in a land swap, third-country resettlement, and limited “return” to Israel in a total number that Israel agrees to accept. Israel’s acceptance of limited refugee return, moreover, would be part of a formula in which the largest proportion will be required to be resettled in third states and absorbed in Arab host states. Although the provision states that the solution process for refugees shall be driven by a free and informed choice, the real choice of return at refugee discretion is not part of the formula. Property compensation is discussed, and a mechanism for compensation through an international commission is described. Israel would agree to a single “lump sum” contribution to an international fund, which would be the total accepted Israeli liability for the Palestinian refugee problem. Property of Israeli settlers left in the Occupied Territories would be used to offset Israeli payments to this fund. Israel would also contribute to a “refugeehood” fund to be distributed to refugee communities for development, but the details of this fund have not been made public.

The Road Map. In contrast to Taba and the Geneva Initiative, the latest intergovernmental proposal, the QUARTET’S Performance-Based ROAD MAP, issued in April 2003, does not refer to international law on individual refugee rights or to any outside framework at all. Its sole focus is whatever the parties agree upon. The Road Map, like the Oslo Process, refers to the refugees as part of the third and final phase, when the parties are to “reach final and comprehensive permanent status agreement that ends the Israel-Palestinian conflict in 2005, through a settlement negotiated between the parties based on UNSCR 242, 338, and 1397, that ends the Occupation that began in 1967, and includes an agreed, just, fair, and realistic solution to the refugee issue.” The three Security Council resolutions referenced do not address any of the individual refugee rights at all. The language of 242, “affirming the necessity for achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem,” is simply recalled in 338 and 1397. Although there is an argument that this language, by implication, must refer back to 194 because that is the international consensus for the resolution of the refugee problem, and this may have been the PLO’s assumption, it is clearly not Israel’s assumption or intention. The absence of any reference to 194 appears quite deliberate.

These three resolutions—242 (1967), 338 (1973), and 1397 (2002)—set out a solution based on “land for peace.” The exchange of most Palestinian land for peace for Israel is considered the basis of the two-state solution incorporated into 1397 as “a vision of a region where two States, Israel and Palestine, live side by side within secure and recognized borders.” This formula, however, leaves out the individual rights of Palestinians as refugees to return, restitution, and compensation, and appears to incorporate a trade-off between the “right” to a state and individual rights. All of the negotiation processes thus far have been based on the formula of two ethnonational states in the mandate Palestine area. Under such a plan, the refugees would be resettled in a future state of Palestine in the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem. Thus, the settlement of the refugee question would be based on some notion of humanitarian/political considerations, not legal principles. There is no explicit reference to rights of Palestinian refugees and displaced persons to return to their homes or to housing and property restitution as understood under international law.

Bibliography

- Akram, Susan M., and Terry Rempel. "Recommendations for Durable Solutions for Palestinian Refugees: A Challenge to the Oslo Framework." Palestine Yearbook of International Law. 11 (2000–2001).
- Alpher, Joseph, and Khalil Shikaki. The Palestinian Refugee Problem and the Right of Return. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, 1998.
- BADIL Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Closing Protection Gaps: Handbook on Protection of Palestinian Refugees in States Signatories to the 1951 Convention. Bethlehem, Palestine: BADIL, 2005.
- . Survey of Palestinian Refugees and Internally Displaced Persons 2006–2007. Bethlehem, Palestine: BADIL, 2007.
- Bali, Asli U. "International Law and Rights-Based Remedies in the Israel-Palestine Conflict: Settlements." Hastings International and Comparative Law Review. 28:3 (2005).
- Barkan, Elazar. "The Mirage of Rights—Response." Hastings International and Comparative Law Review. 28:3 (2005).
- Bassiouni, M. Cherif. Documents on the Arab-Israeli Conflict: The Palestinians and the Israeli-Palestinian Peace Process. Ardsley, NY: Transnational Publishers, 2005.
- Bell, Christine. Peace Agreements and Human Rights. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Benvenisti, Eyal, and Eyal Zamir. "Private Claims to Property Rights in the Future Israeli-Palestinian Settlement." American Journal of International Law. 89:2 (1995).
- Boling, Gail J. The 1948 Palestinian Refugees and the Individual Right of Return. Bethlehem, Palestine: BADIL Resource Center for Residency and Refugee Rights, 2001.
- Cassese, Antonio. Self-Determination of Peoples: A Legal Reappraisal. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Fischbach, Michael R. Records of Dispossession. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon Books, 1987.
- Forman, Jeremy, and Alexandre Kedar. "From Arab Land to 'Israel Lands': The Legal Dispossession of the Palestinians Displaced by Israel in the Wake of 1948." Environment and Planning D: Society and Space. 22:6 (2004).
- Hadawi, Sami. Bitter Harvest: A Modern History of Palestine. New York: Olive Branch Press, 1991.
- Harel, Alon. "Whose Home Is It? Reflections on the Palestinians' Interest in Return." Theoretical Inquiries in Law. 5:2 (2004).
- Hodgkins, Allison Beth. "Beyond Two States: Alternative Visions of Self-Determination for the People of Palestine." Fletcher Forum of World Affairs. 28:2 (2004).
- Ibish, Hussein, and Ali Abunimah. "The Palestinians' Right of Return." Human Rights Brief. 8:2 (2001).
- Kalman, Matthew. "The Palestinian Right of Return in International Law—The Israeli Perspective." NEXUS. 8 (2003).
- Knudsen, Are. "Islamism in the Diaspora: Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon." Journal of Refugee Studies. 18:2 (2005).
- Korobkin, Russell, and Jonathan Zasloff. "Roadblocks to the Road Map: A Negotiation Theory Perspective on the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict after Yasser Arafat." Yale Journal of International Law. 30:1 (2005).
- Kramer, Tanya. "The Controversy of a Palestinian 'Right of Return' to Israel." Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law. 18:3 (2001).
- Kretzmer, David. The Occupation of Justice: The Supreme Court of Israel and the Occupied Territories. Albany: SUNY Press, 2002.
- Lawand, Kathleen. "The Right of Return of Palestinians in International Law." International Journal of Refugee Law. 8:4 (1996).
- Leckie, Scott, ed. Housing, Land, and Property Restitution Rights of Refugees and Displaced Persons. Cambridge, UK, and New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007.
- , ed. Returning Home: Housing and Property Restitution Rights of Refugees and Displaced Persons. Ardsley, NY: Transnational Publishers, 2003.
- Lesch, Ann M., and Ian S. Lustick. Exile and Return: Predicaments of Palestinians and Jews. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Lozowick, Yaacov. Right to Exist: A Moral Defense of Israel's Wars. New York: Bantam Dell Publishing Group, 2003.
- Mallison, W. Thomas. "The Zionist-Israeli Juridical Claims to Constitute 'The Jewish People' Nationality Entity and to Confer Membership in It: Appraisal in International Law." George Washington Law Review. 32:5 (1964).
- Mallison, W. Thomas, and Sally V. Mallison. An International Law Analysis of the Major United Nations Resolutions Concerning the Palestine Question. UN Doc. ST/SG/SER.F/4. New York: United Nations, 1979.
- . "The Juridical Bases for Palestinian Self-Determination." Palestine Yearbook of International Law. 1 (1984).
- . The Palestine Problem in International Law and World Order. Burnt Mill, UK: Longman, 1986.
- Masalha, Nur. A Land without a People: Israel, Transfer and the Palestinians. London: Faber and Faber, 1997.
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–1949. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- . Israel's Border Wars, 1949–1956. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1993.
- Quigley, John. The Case for Palestine: An International Law Perspective. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2005.
- . "Displaced Palestinians and a Right to Return." Harvard International Law Journal. 39:1 (1998).
- . "Repatriation of Displaced Palestinians as a Legal Right." NEXUS. 8 (2003).

- Raday, Frances. "Self-Determination and Minority Rights." Fordham International Law Journal. 26:3 (2003).
- Radley, Kurt Rene. "The Palestinian Refugees: The Right to Return in International Law." American Journal of International Law. 72:3 (1978).
- Richmond, Oliver P. Peace in International Relations. New York: Routledge Press, 2008.
- Rosand, Eric. "The Right to Return under International Law Following Mass Dislocation: The Bosnia Precedent?" Michigan Journal of International Law. 19:4 (1998).
- Saban, Ilan. "Minority Rights in Deeply Divided Societies: A Framework for Analysis and the Case of the Arab-Palestinian Minority in Israel." New York University Journal of International Law and Politics. 36:4 (2004).
- Said, Wadie. "The Palestinians in Lebanon: The Rights of the Victims of the Palestinian-Israeli Peace Process." Columbia Human Rights Law Review. 30:2 (1999).
- Saideman, Lewis. "Do Palestinian Refugees Have a Right of Return to Israel? An Examination of the Scope and Limitations on the Right of Return." Virginia Journal of International Law. 44:3 (2004).
- Singer, Joel. "No Palestinian 'Return' to Israel." Human Rights Brief. 8:2 (2001).
- Takkenberg, Lex. The Status of Palestinian Refugees in International Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine. "Analysis of Paragraph 11 of the General Assembly's Resolution of 11 December 1948." UN Doc. W/45. New York. 15 May 1950.
- Wan, Albert K. "Israel's Conflicted Existence as a Jewish Democratic State: Striking the Proper Balance under the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law." Brooklyn Journal of International Law. 29:3 (2004).
- Weiner, Justus R. "Human Rights in Limbo during the Interim Period of the Israeli-Palestinian Peace Process: Review, Analysis and Implications." New York University Journal of International Law and Politics. 27:4 (1995).
- Zedalis, Rex J. "Right to Return: A Closer Look." Georgetown Immigration Law Journal. 6:3 (1992).
- Zell, Marc, and Sonia Shnyder. "Palestinian Right of Return or Strategic Weapon? A Historical, Legal, and Moral-Political Analysis." NEXUS. 8 (2003).

—Susan M. Akram

Refuseniks

See BREAKING THE SILENCE; CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; COURAGE TO REFUSE; ISRAELI MILITARISM; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT; NEW PROFILE; PILOTS' LETTER; REFUSER SOLIDARITY NETWORK; SHMINISTIM; YESH G'VUL

Refusenik Watch

Refusenik Watch is a continuously updated list of Israeli CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS, refuseniks, high school refusers, and others who refuse Israeli military service. As of December 2004, at least 1,686 individuals had refused to serve in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Some had been imprisoned for obeying their conscience, totaling at least 11,851 days in military jails as of the end of 2004. Moreover, activists have documented interviews with seventy-seven prisoners of conscience who refused to serve the OCCUPATION without signing any of the formal "pledges," such as the COURAGE TO REFUSE—COMBATANTS' LETTER. The numbers are based on a comprehensive refusenik list that Oz Shelach compiles regularly from the lists published online by YESH G'VUL, the SHMINISTIM, Courage to Refuse, and the PILOTS' LETTER, as well as from information supplied by NEW PROFILE. The list is kept open as evidence of the accuracy of the Refusenik Watch banners that publicly displayed the changing numbers of refuseniks. Because three of the groups do not do endorsements in English, the list is currently available in Hebrew only. (http:// oznik.com/web\_masters.html)

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; ISRAELI MILITARISM; individual groups listed under REFUSENIKS

Refuser Solidarity Network

Refuser Solidarity Network (RSN) was formed in April 2002 to provide support for the growing Refuser Movement in Israel, made up of those who refuse to serve in the military in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. The initial impetus for the establishment of the RSN was the publication in January 2002 of the COMBATANTS' LETTER by a group of over fifty reserve officers, which later became COURAGE TO REFUSE (Ometz Le'sarev). The overall objective of the RSN is to support all Israelis who refuse to serve the OCCUPATION, all reservists who refuse to serve in the Occupied Territories, and all men and women conscripts who refuse to serve in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES as part of their opposition to Occupation. RSN works to build support for and visibility of the refusers and their movement because it believes that these voices are crucial to convincing Israelis that a new course must be chosen if there is to be lasting peace between Israelis and Palestinians. (<http://www.refusersolidarity.net>)

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; ISRAELI MILITARISM; individual groups listed under REFUSENIKS

Rejection Front

See PALESTINE REJECTION FRONT

Religious and Ethnic Communities in Pre-1948 Palestine

The divisions in ethnicity and religion in pre-1948 Palestine served Ottoman, British, and Zionist strategies of domination. To begin with, the Ottoman caliphate favored Sunni Muslims, especially those of Ottoman Turkish ethnic background. Non-Muslims were constituted as religio-ethnic communities (ahl al-dhimma, protected, tribute-paying peoples) whose representatives to Istanbul were the chief religious figures of the respective faiths, for example, patriarchs and rabbis. The British, in turn, adapted the Ottoman practice, maintaining Christians and Jews as separate groups while reducing the Arab Sunni Muslim majority to the level of a religious community alongside the others. After 1948, the state of Israel continued this system by constituting Palestinians administratively not as a national community in their own right but rather as disparate non-Jewish religious and ethnic minorities.

In the Survey of Palestine and the subsequent Supplement, two documents compiled from 1945 to 1947 for the ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY and the UNITED NATIONS SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PALESTINE, respectively, BRITISH MANDATE statisticians identified two ethnicities—Arab and Jew—and three main religions—CHRISTIANITY, Islam, and Judaism. They also briefly described the smaller Druze, Baha'i, Mutawali, and SAMARITAN communities, referred to as “other religions” in the report’s statistics. Table 6, drawn from the Survey (Volume I: 141), summarizes the census data for the “settled population” from 1922 to 1944. Between those years, the Jewish community increased by more than sixfold, while all other groups roughly doubled in number. Waves of Jewish emigration from Europe largely accounted for this difference.

Sunni Muslim Community

The Sunni Muslim community in Mandate Palestine included urban, rural, and nomadic-pastoralist groups. The urban milieu differentiated further among the older landowning notables (al-a'yan); the younger, university-educated sons of the a'yan; small shop owners; and landless rural laborers drawn to industrial cities like HAIFA. Despite these cleavages, institutions such as the awqaf (religious endowments administration) and the nascent Palestinian nationalist movement that built on these structures fostered a degree of integration among Sunnis.

Following the Ottoman land reforms of 1858, the notables came to dominate the awqaf as well as the city councils, especially in JERUSALEM. In 1921, a SUPREME MUSLIM COUNCIL (SMC) was created “for the control and management of Muslim Awqaf and Shari'a affairs in Palestine,” headed by the mufti (advisory scholar of Shari'a law) of Jerusalem. A year later AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, a young, rising figure from an important landowning family in Jerusalem, was selected by the British to be mufti and president of the SMC. Husayni transformed the SMC into a patronage machine through which he dominated the emerging Palestinian nationalist movement. The SMC functioned as a parallel government to the Mandate by building mosques, community centers, and landmarks such as the National Palace Hotel; appointing its own officials; and advocating for the Palestinian cause among Arab and Muslim leaders abroad. The dominance of the notables, however, was never completely stable. A series of peasant uprisings, culminating in the 1936–1939 ARAB REVOLT, took aim against the urban landowning families, who were blamed for selling

Table 6 Census Data for Settled Muslims, Jews, Christians, and Other Religious and Ethnic Communities in British Mandate Palestine

Census Date	Muslims	Jews	Christians	Others
1922	486,177	83,790	71,464	7,617
1935	770,135	355,157	105,236	11,031
1944	994,724	528,702	135,547	14,098 village lands to the Zionists and collaborating with the British as much as against the British authorities and Zionist settlers.

Jewish Community

The pre-1948 Yishuv, or Jewish community, was composed of two main ethnic groups: European ASHKENAZI immigrants (the vast majority) and Middle Eastern MIZRAHI and SEPHARDI Jews (most of whom had lived in Palestine for centuries). Until after the First and Second ALIYAS (IMMIGRATIONS) of 1881–1903 and 1904–1914, respectively, the Mizrahi and Sephardi Jews were the majority. Concentrated in towns, primarily Jerusalem, SAFED, TIBERIAS, and HEBRON, they based their communities on Halacha (religious law), rabbinic authority, and the pursuit of trades, small business, and some agriculture. Although rooted in religio-ethnic communal structures, the early Yishuv, especially the Mizrahim and Sephardim, interacted with the surrounding Arab Muslim society and received recognition from the Ottoman authorities. Indeed, the Mizrahim and Sephardim were Ottoman subjects, represented in Istanbul by their hakham bashi (chief rabbi).

The Zionist movement, and the waves of immigration to Palestine it promoted, shifted the demographic balance toward the Ashkenazim. In so doing, it reoriented the Yishuv away from its traditional religious ethos toward a secular-nationalist and European orientation focused intently, despite internal splits, on the single objective of building a Jewish state. ZIONISM transformed the status of the Mizrahim and Sephardim, subordinating them to Ashkenazi dominance, and introduced changes in intercommunal relations. Yishuv leaders, such as DAVID BEN-GURION and the General Federation of Hebrew Workers (the HISTADRUT), emphasized the importance of “Hebrew labor” and insisted on creating agricultural communes and industries that employed Jewish workers to the exclusion of the increasingly landless fellahin (the Arab peasantry). This ethnic-cultural exclusivity resulted in the expanding Yishuv becoming a target of resentment among the fellahin. Moreover, the Yishuv created a Jewish-only educational system during the 1920s–1930s, as well as a public health structure based on the Histadrut Sick Fund and the Hadasah Organization. The Zionists also revived Hebrew, making it the standard language of school instruction. Rabbinic institutions were no longer the central organizing structures of communal life, although they retained control over marriage and divorce through a Rabbinic Council.

Christian Community

The pre-1948 Christian community was predominantly urban and middle-class and divided primarily along confessional lines. According to the 1922 census, the largest group was the GREEK ORTHODOX, comprising 33,369 members, or 45.7 percent of all Christians. The Patriarchate of Jerusalem was the dominant institution, although important lay organizations had started to emerge in the 1800s. The Patriarchate was overseen by the Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulcher, a Greek monastic order that concerned itself mostly with maintaining its grip on Christian pilgrimage sites. Members of the brotherhood are the administrative officers of the Patriarchate, and the Metropolitans, Archbishops, Bishops, Archimandrites, Hieromonks (monks who are also priests but from the local Palestinian Orthodox community, not Greece), Hierodeacons (monks who have been ordained a deacon also from the local Palestinian flock), and Monks (also local) of the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. In the late 1800s, the Arab laity and local monks began to agitate for local control, staging a series of uprisings. In these agitations, the lay leadership allied itself with Palestinian nationalist institutions such as the MUSLIM-CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS, first established in JAFFA in 1918, and the Supreme Muslim Council. The conflict between the Greek hierarchy and the local Palestinian priests and monks continues through the present.

The second largest Christian group, comprising 14,245 members in 1922, was the Roman Catholic, or al-Latin. The Franciscans, as well as a host of other monastic orders and the Latin Patriarchate, were the institutional mainstays, developing an extensive network of charitable societies and educational institutions at every level by the end of the Mandate. The third largest Christian community—12,645 members according to the 1931 census—was the Greek Catholic (al-malākiyya). Formed during the 1724 Greek Orthodox schism in SYRIA and LEBANON, this group possessed strong local control over its hierarchy, with Palestinians serving as its priests and bishops. Greek Catholic bishops became active in the pan-Arab and Palestinian nationalist movements and later supported PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) activism. The remaining Christian groups included the Armenian Orthodox, Syrian Orthodox, Chaldean Orthodox, Ethiopian Orthodox, and Coptic Orthodox. Each of these churches had a “Uniate” analogue—that is, a splinter movement that aligned with Roman Catholicism. There were, in addition, several Protestant denominations with roots in nineteenth- and early twentieth-century Western missionary activity.

Other Groups

Several other smaller communities existed alongside the Sunni Muslim, Jewish, and Christian groups. Among these was the Baha’i, numbering 400 in 1945–1946. An offshoot of Iranian Shi’a Islam, Baha’i appeared in the Haifa-ACRE region after the Ottomans deported a segment of the movement to the area in the late 1860s. Another small group, adhering to what it considered the purist form of Judaism as practiced in Old Testament times, was the Samaritans, comprising just 267 individuals in the NABLUS and Jaffa areas in 1945–1946. Yet a third group was the Mutawali, adherents of Twelver Shi’ism, based mostly in southern Lebanon and Syria. In 1945–1946, the Mutawali in Palestine numbered 4,600 members in the Acre and Safed areas. A fourth group, the Circassians (Sunni Muslims originally from the northwest Caucasus), had settled in two villages in the Galilee region. This segment of the Sunni community dispersed to various parts of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE in the 1860s after Russia forcibly annexed the Caucasus region.

The most significant of the smaller groups, numbering about 13,000 in 1945–1946, was the Muwahhidun (Unitarians), known commonly as the Duruz, or Druze. Originating as an offshoot of eleventh-century Fatimid Isma’ilism (“Sevener” Shi’a) in EGYPT, the Druze eventually became situated mainly in Lebanon and Syria, but several thousand relocated to northern Palestine following the 1860 clashes with Lebanese Maronite Christians. The community became endogamous and adopted a distinction between al-juhhal (the “ignorant,” i.e., uninitiated members of the community) and al-’uqqal (the “knowing” or “wise,” i.e., the elders privy to the secret teachings, councils, and rituals). The heads of the ’uqqal were known as shaykhs and one of these shaykhs served as the Druze representative to the Mandate under the designation of chief qadi, or judge. During the pre-1948 period, the Druze leadership pragmatically alternated among alliances with Arab nationalists, the British, and finally the Zionists.

Since the establishment of the state of Israel, the demographic and political status of the various religious and ethnic groups has continued to evolve in different directions. After 1948, to ensure Jewish demographic and political dominance, Israel created a Ministry of Religious Affairs that perpetuated the Mandate’s categorization of individuals according to religio-ethnic identity (Jews, Muslims, Druze, Christians, etc.). After 1967, PLO nationalism countered the Zionist stress on religio-ethnic solidarities by developing a multi-confessional outlook that construed the different religious groups, including those Jews who predated the arrival of the European-Ashkenazi settlers, as tributaries of the Arab-Palestinian national collective. During the 1980s, a new generation of young lay leaders among the “1948 Arabs” (those Palestinians who had remained in what became Israel) challenged the traditional elites, who had the support of the Israeli state. Their efforts across the sectarian divides served to revitalize not only an activist religious consciousness but also conceptions of solidarity that went beyond narrow religio-communal lines. Since the 1980s the PLO’s multiconfessional orientation has lost its hegemonic status among Palestinians and now contends with deeply rooted and institutionally diversified Islamist movements that seek to revitalize a Shari’a-based Muslim Palestine. Caught between a resurgent Islamism and a powerful Jewish-identified Israel, some West Bank and Gaza Christians, whose number continues to rapidly decline as entire families leave for Europe and the Americas, have retreated into their communal enclaves.

See also DEMOGRAPHY; PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948

Bibliography

- Abu-Manneh, Butrus. “The Husaynis: The Rise of a Notable Family in 18th Century Palestine.” In Palestine in the Late Ottoman Period: Political, Social, and Economic Transformation. Edited by David Kushner. London: Brill Academic Publishers, 1997.
- Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry. A Survey of Palestine: Prepared in December 1945 and January 1946 for the Information of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, Vols. 1 and 2. Reprinted in full with permission from Her Majesty’s Stationery Office, London, UK. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1991.
- Bein, Alex. The Return to the Soil: A History of Jewish Settlement in Israel. Jerusalem: Youth and Hechalutz

- Department of the Zionist Organization. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1952.
- Ben-Dor, Gabriel. The Druzes in Israel: A Political Study, Political Innovation and Integration in a Middle-Eastern Minority. Jerusalem: Magnes Press, Hebrew University, 1979.
- Ben-Sasson, H. H., ed. A History of the Jewish People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1969, 1976.
- Canaan, Tawfiq. Mohammedan Saints and Sanctuaries in Palestine. London: Luzac, 1927.
- Colbi, Saul. A History of the Christian Presence in the Holy Land. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1988.
- Commins, David Dean. Islamic Reform: Politics and Social Change in Late Ottoman Syria. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Courbage, Youssef, and Philippe Fargues. Christians and Jews under Islam. Translated by Judy Mabro. London: I. B. Tauris, 1998.
- Cragg, Kenneth. The Arab Christian: A History in the Middle East. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1991.
- Eisenstadt, Stuart N. Israeli Society. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1967.
- . Jewish Civilization: The Jewish Historical Experience in a Comparative Perspective. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Ende, W. "Mutawali." The Encyclopedia of Islam, CD-ROM ed. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 2004.
- Firro, Kais M. The Druzes in the Jewish State: A Brief History. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1999.
- Gharizi, Wafiq. Ma'anatu al-muwahhidin al-duruz fi al-aradi al-muhtalla. Beirut: Dar al-Kitab, 1984.
- Haddad, Robert M. Syrian Christians in Muslim Society: An Interpretation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1970.
- Hajjar, Joseph. Les Chrétiens Uniates du Porche-Orient. Damascus, Syria: Dar Tlass, 1995.
- Hodgson, Marshall G. S., M. C. Sehabeddin Tekindaq, and M. Tayyib Gokbilgin. "Duruz." The Encyclopedia of Islam, CD-ROM ed. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill, 2004.
- Hourani, Albert. Minorities in the Arab World. London: Oxford University Press, 1947.
- . "Ottoman Reform and the Politics of Notables." In Beginnings of Modernization in the Middle East: The Nineteenth Century. Edited by William R. Polk and Richard L. Chambers. University of Chicago: Chicago Press, 1968.
- Inalcik, Halil. "CERKES (Ottoman Period)." The Encyclopedia of Islam, CD-ROM ed. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 2004.
- Institute of Middle Eastern Studies at Haifa University. "The Druzes in Israel." Symposium held at Haifa University, May 2, 1982. Occasional Papers on the Middle East (New Series) No. 6. Haifa, Israel: Institute of Middle Eastern Studies at Haifa University, 1984.
- Jaimmoukha, Amjad. The Circassians: A Handbook. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Khalidi, Rashid. Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. Palestinians: The Making of a People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Kuperschmidt, Uri M. The Supreme Muslim Council: Islam under the British Mandate for Palestine. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1987.
- Lesch, Ann Mosely. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a National Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Levy, Avigdor, ed. The Jews of the Ottoman Empire. Princeton, NJ: Darwin Press, 1994.
- Lybarger, Loren D. "For Church or Nation? Islamism, Secular-Nationalism, and the Transformation of Christian Identities in Palestine." Journal of the American Academy of Religion. 75:4 (December 2007).
- Masters, Bruce. Christians and Jews in the Ottoman Arab World: The Roots of Sectarianism. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Mattar, Phillip. The Mufti of Jerusalem: Al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni and the Palestinian National Movement. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Muslih, Muhammad Y. The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Nasrallah, Illiyas. Azmatun fi intizari al-hall: Al-masa' alatu al-'arabiyyatu al-urthudhuksiyya—Tarikh wa haqa'iq. Jerusalem: Al-Lajnah al-Tanfidihiya lil-mu'Tamar al-'Arabi al-Urthudhuksi, 2000.
- Nosedá, S. Noja. "Al-Samira." The Encyclopedia of Islam, CD-ROM ed. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004.
- O'Mahony, Anthony, ed. The Christian Communities of Jerusalem and the Holy Land. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 2003.
- Pappé, Ilan. A History of Modern Palestine: One Land, Two Peoples. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Parson, Laila. The Druze between Palestine and Israel, 1947–1949. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian-Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- . The Emergence of the Palestinian-Arab National Movement, 1929–1939. London: Frank Cass, 1977.
- Sabella, Bernard. "Religious and Ethnic Minorities." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Schliefer, Abdullah. "Izz al-Din al-Qassam: Preacher and Mujahid." In Struggle and Survival in the Modern Middle East. Edited by Edmund Burke III. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Shaw, Stanford Jay. "Some Aspects of the Aims and Achievements of the Nineteenth-Century Ottoman Reformers." In Beginnings of Modernization in the Middle East: The Nineteenth Century. Edited by William R. Polk and Richard L. Chambers. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1968.

- Slutsky, Yehuda. "History of the State of Israel and Its Antecedents: 1880–1948." Encyclopedia Judaica, CD-ROM ed. New York: Judaica Multimedia, 1997.
- Sweedenburg, Ted. Memories of Revolt: The 1936–1939 Rebellion and the Palestinian National Past, reprint. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1998.
- . "The Role of the Palestinian Peasantry in the Great Revolt (1936–1939)." In Islam, Politics, and Social Movements. Edited by Edmund Burke III and Ira M. Lapidus. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.
- Tamari, Salim. "Society." Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Tsimhoni, Daphne. Christian Communities in Jerusalem and the West Bank since 1948: An Historical, Social, and Political Study. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1993.
- . "The Status of the Arab Christians under the British Mandate in Palestine." Middle Eastern Studies. 20:4 (1984).
- United Nations Special Committee on Palestine. Supplement to the Survey of Palestine: Notes Compiled for the Information of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine, June 1947, reprinted in full with permission from Her Majesty's Stationery Office, London, UK. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1991.
- Wagner, Donald E. Dying in a Land of Promise: Palestine and Palestinian Christianity from Pentecost to 2000. London: Melisende, 2001.
- Zuhayr, 'Abd al-Latif Ghanayim, and Muhammad 'Abd al-Karim Muhafiza, eds. Filastin fi nihayati al-'asri al-'uthmani min khilal al-rihlati al-latti qama biha Muhammad Rafiq al-Tamimi wa Muhammad Bahjat al-Katib: Tahta 'anwani wilayati bayrut. Amman, Jordan: Al-Sharikah al-Jadidah lil-Tiba'ah wa al-Tajlid, 2000.
- Zureik, Elias. The Palestinians in Israel: A Study in Internal Colonialism. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1979.

—Loren D. Lybarger

Religious Zionism

See ZIONISM

Restrictions on Movement I

Israel uses a variety of measures to restrict Palestinian freedom of movement. The ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES claim that the restrictions on movement imposed on Palestinians are intended to ensure the free movement of Jews in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and protect the security of all Israelis, but the practical result is complete control over the lives of ordinary Palestinians and a practice of inequality forbidden in international law.

The measures include CLOSURE, SIEGE, CURFEW, CHECKPOINTS, the BARRIER, the PERMIT system, and ROADBLOCKS, among others. Some of them have been utilized since the beginning of the OCCUPATION in 1967; others were instituted in 1991 and tightened in 2000. Virtually all remain in effect as of 2009. Indeed, the restrictions on movement that Israel has imposed since the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA are unprecedented in the history of the Israeli Occupation—in their scope and duration and in the severity of damage they cause to the 3.75 million Palestinians. International human rights law requires Israel to respect the right of residents of the Occupied Territories to move about freely in the Occupied Territory. This right is recognized in Article 13 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in Article 12 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and others.

Freedom of movement is also important because it is a prerequisite to the exercise of other rights, such as those set forth in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, among them the right to work, the right to an adequate standard of living, the right to HEALTH CARE, the right to EDUCATION, and the right to protection of family life. Moreover, human rights organizations maintain that Israel's policy involves overt discrimination based on national origin in that the restrictions apply only to Palestinians. Jewish residents of the Occupied Territories are permitted to enter and leave the settlements without restriction.

Summary of Restrictions

Because each of the restrictions has an independent entry, they will not be more fully elaborated here, but in a January 2007, Ha'aretz (the pre-eminent Israeli daily), correspondent Amira Hass provided the following summary of the restrictions on freedom of movement for Palestinians.

Ongoing Prohibitions

- Palestinians are forbidden to enter East Jerusalem.
- Palestinians from the GAZA STRIP are forbidden to stay in the WEST BANK.
- West Bank Palestinians are forbidden to enter the Gaza Strip through the ERETZ CROSSING.
- Palestinians are forbidden to enter the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY.
- Palestinians are forbidden to enter villages, lands, towns, and neighborhoods along the "seam line" between the separation Barrier and the Green Line (some 10 percent of the West Bank).

- Palestinians who are not residents of Beit Furik and Beit Dajan in the NABLUS area and Ramadin, south of HEBRON, are forbidden entry to these villages.
- Palestinians are forbidden to enter the Jewish SETTLEMENTS area (even if their lands are inside the areas claimed by settlers but not built up or near the actual settlement).
- Palestinians are forbidden to enter Nablus in a vehicle.
- Palestinian residents of JERUSALEM are forbidden to enter Area A (Palestinian towns under control of the PNA in the West Bank).
- Gaza Strip residents are forbidden to enter the West Bank via the Allenby Crossing.
- Palestinians are forbidden to travel abroad via Ben Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv.
- Children under age sixteen are forbidden to leave Nablus without an original birth certificate and parental escort.
- Palestinians with permits to enter Israel are forbidden to enter through the crossings used by Israelis and tourists.
- Gaza residents are forbidden to establish residency in the West Bank.
- West Bank residents are forbidden to establish residency in the Jordan Valley, seam line communities, or the villages of Beit Furik and Beit Dajan.
- Palestinians are forbidden to transfer merchandise and cargo through internal West Bank checkpoints.

Periodic Prohibitions

- Residents of certain parts of the West Bank are forbidden to travel to the rest of the West Bank.
- People of a certain age group—mainly men from the ages of sixteen to thirty, thirty-five, or forty—are forbidden to leave the areas where they reside (usually Nablus and other cities in the northern West Bank).
- Private cars may not pass the Swahara–ABU DIS checkpoint (which separates the northern and southern West Bank). (This restriction was canceled for the first time, in mid-December 2006 under the easing of restrictions.)

Travel Permits Required

- Magnetic cards (intended for entrance to Israel but ease the passage through checkpoints within the West Bank).

- Work permits for Israel (for which the employer applies from the civil administration offices).
- Permits for medical treatment in Israeli and Palestinian hospitals in East Jerusalem (require applicants to produce an invitation from the hospital, their complete medical background, and proof that the treatment they are seeking cannot be provided in the Occupied Territories).
- Travel permits are required to pass through Jordan Valley checkpoints.
- Merchants must obtain permits to transfer goods.
- Permits are required to farm along the seam line (require a form from the land registry office, a title deed, and proof of first-degree relations to the registered property owner).
- Entry permits for the seam line (for relatives, medical teams, construction workers, etc., and require those with permits to enter and leave via the same crossing).
- Permits to pass from Gaza through Israel to the West Bank.
- Birth certificates for children under sixteen.
- Resident identity cards for those who live in seam line enclaves.

Checkpoints and Barriers

- Seventy-five manned checkpoints in the West Bank (as of January 2007).
- On average 150 mobile (“flying”) checkpoints each week (as of September 2006).
- Nearly 500 obstacles/roadblocks placed between roads and villages, including concrete cubes, earth ramparts, eighty-eight iron gates, and 45 miles (74 kilometers) of fence along main roads.
- Eighty-three iron gates along the separation Barrier, which divide lands from their owners. Only twenty-five of the gates open occasionally; fifty-eight are closed permanently.

Main Roads Closed to Palestinians—Officially or in Practice

- Road 90 (the Jordan Valley thoroughfare).
- Road 60 in the north (from the Shavei Shomron military base, west of Nablus and northward).
- Road 585: along the settlements Hermesh and Dotan.
- Road 557: west from the Taibeh–Tul Karm junction (the Green Line) to Anabta (excluding the residents of Shufa), and east from south of Nablus (the Hawara checkpoint) to the settlement Elon Moreh.

- Road 505: from Zatarra (Nablus junction) to Ma'ale Efraim.
- Road 5: from the Barkan junction to the Green Line.
- Road 446: from Dir Balut junction to Road 5 (by the settlements Alei Zahav and Peduel).
- Roads 445 and 463: around the settlements Talmon, Dolev, and Nahliel.
- Road 443: from Maccabim-Reut to Givat Ze'ev.
- Streets in the Old City of Hebron.
- Road 60: from the settlement of Otniel southward.
- Road 317: around the SOUTH HEBRON MOUNTAIN settlements.

Travel Time before 2000 versus Today

- Tul Karm–Nablus: from half an hour, at the most, to at least an hour.
- Tul Karm–Ramallah: from less than one hour to two hours.
- Beit Ur al-Fawqa–Ramallah: from ten to forty-five minutes.
- Katana/Beit Anan–Ramallah: from fifteen to sixty-ninety minutes.
- Bir Naballah–Jerusalem: from seven minutes to one hour.
- Katana-Jerusalem: from five minutes to “Nobody goes to Jerusalem anymore.”

See also BANTUSTANS; BARRIER; CHECKPOINTS; CLOSED MILITARY ZONES; CLOSURE; CURFEW; PERMITS; RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT II: AIRPORT, SEAPORT, AND BARRIER; ROADBLOCKS; ROAD SYSTEM IN THE WEST BANK; SIEGE

Bibliography

- B'Tselem. 1987–1997: A Decade of Human Rights Violations. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1998.
- . Divide and Rule: Prohibition on Passage between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. 1998. www.btselem.org/English/Publications/Summaries/199805\_Divide\_And\_Rule.asp.
- . Ground to a Halt: Freedom of Movement in the West Bank—Comprehensive Report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2007.
- . Oslo: Before and After: The Status of Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1999.
- . Restrictions on Movement. 2004. www.btselem.org/english/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Index.asp.

———. Violations of Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. Biannual Report, 1992–1993. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1994.

———. Without Borders: Human Rights Violations under Closure. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 1996.

Hass, Amira. “Impossible Travel.” Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 19 January 2007.

Restrictions on Movement II: Airport, Seaport, and Barrier

Among the many contentious issues that consumed Israeli-Palestinian talks after the ceremonial signing of the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES between Israeli and PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) leaders on 13 September 1993 was freedom of movement for Palestinians within and outside the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Predictably, this matter was and remains critical for Palestinians who have been subject to Israeli military restrictions, CHECKPOINTS, control over border crossings, and other prohibitions on movement.

The physical confinement of the Palestinian population goes back decades, most markedly to June 1967, when Israel's military rule expanded to include East JERUSALEM, the WEST BANK, and the GAZA STRIP. After the outcome of the 1967 WAR, Israeli restrictions on freedom of movement were most visible at border crossings in Gaza and the West Bank, chiefly those bordering EGYPT and JORDAN, respectively. The Israeli takeover of the BORDERS and the concomitant restrictions on movement resulted in a serious interruption to the flow of labor abroad and the capital remittances it engendered. Before the border restrictions, much of the income generated by tens of thousands of Palestinians abroad found its way back to the economically stagnant Occupied Territories, thus helping struggling families cope with poverty and the near-total absence of a meaningful economic INFRASTRUCTURE. Additionally, both Egypt and Jordan had been used as starting points for Palestinian professionals and laborers seeking employment in the oil-rich Arab Gulf States.

Confined to the Occupied Territories and subjected to the economic reality therein, Palestinians found themselves turning to Israel for financial relief. The relatively vibrant Israeli economy and its constant need for manual labor were the only respite Palestinians could find, and tens of thousands were quickly transformed into a pool of cheap labor for Israel's economy. For Palestinians, this relationship signaled the commencement of a historic period of severe economic dependency, which for decades made Palestinian economic growth entirely dependent on Israel's interests. It is against this backdrop that ordinary Palestinians welcomed the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS in 1993, perceiving the framework for future negotiations as an opportunity to shake off their reliance on Israel, be rid of Israel's restrictions, enjoy freedom of movement within and without the Occupied Territories, and develop their ECONOMY without foreign constraints. It was also assumed that Palestinians would soon have control over their own border crossings. Palestinian officials fueled this optimism by speaking repeatedly about a Palestinian-controlled seaport, an airport, and a safe passage to link the West Bank and Gaza, all of which they claimed were promised under the provisions of Oslo and would be implemented at later stages.

The WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM, signed on 23 October 1998 under US auspices, specifically promised the opening of the Gaza airport and safe passage. The airport was built with funding from Japan, Egypt, SAUDI ARABIA, Spain, and GERMANY. It was designed by Moroccan engineers at a total cost of $86 million. Finally, on 27 November 1998, the Palestinian airport was officially opened. Most Palestinians celebrated their airport as a symbol of sovereignty and nationhood, as well as a first step toward the attainment of their long-sought independence. However, although the airport bore Palestinian signs and symbols and was to operate "jointly," according to the Oslo Accords and Wye Memorandum, it operated under strict Israeli control with Israeli personnel, who made the final determination about who would be granted or barred entry.

Less than two years later, in response to the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, Israel closed the Gaza airport, with the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES ordering the nearly 450 staff to evacuate at gunpoint. In the early months of 2001, in another strong message to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), Israeli tanks and bulldozers destroyed the airport's runway and control tower. Following ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in August 2005, the PNA sought to rebuild the airport (at an estimated cost of $26 million). Although in principle agreeing to the Palestinian request, Israel nevertheless expected to retain control over the facility for "security reasons." In late 2009, negotiations are still in progress, while the airport, now named YASIR ARAFAT International Airport, is half destroyed and abandoned.

In September 1999, the SHARM AL-SHAYKH MEMORANDUM stipulated the need to open a Gaza seaport for exclusive Palestinian use. "The Israeli side agrees that the Palestinian side shall commence construction works in and related to the Gaza seaport on October 1, 1999," the agreement read in part. However, the construction of the port did not begin until July 2000, only to be halted by Israel in October of the same year after the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada. Frequent Israeli raids on Gaza and on the partially completed port facilities, as well as Israel's refusal to facilitate construction, sent the project back to the drawing board. When the Israeli Knesset voted to approve Israel's disengagement plan, it required Israel to retain control over Palestinian territorial waters and provide WATER to Gaza. According to Israeli sources, US secretary of state CONDOLEEZZA RICE brokered a deal with Israeli officials in November 2005 to allow Palestinians in the region to work on rebuilding the seaport. Israel's war with HAMAS in Gaza, however, has prevented any construction.

The issue of safe passage, a core aspect of Palestinian national aspirations, was aimed at facilitating movement of persons and goods between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, free from Israeli interference. Safe passage was a topic of prime importance in the early rounds of Oslo negotiations. Moreover, under the Oslo, Wye River, and Sharm al-Shaykh agreements, Israel specifically accepted two routes of safe passage that would enable Palestinians to move freely between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. Sharm al-Shaykh promised 1 October 1999 as a date for the operation of the southern route, although the northern route was deferred to a later date.

According to the agreement, Palestinians wishing to travel or transport goods between the West Bank and Gaza would be required to apply to the PNA for a permit, which in turn would apply to Israel for a selected number of applicants. Those individuals who passed the Israeli security check would be allowed to use the routes for a single round-trip during fixed daytime hours and for specific periods, but if they wanted to use the passage again, they would have to reapply using the same procedures. The southern route of the safe passage was eventually opened on 25 October 1999, but Israel closed it a year later, again in response to the al-Aqsa Intifada. The northern route, scheduled for opening on 5 February 2000, was delayed indefinitely.

See also RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT I

Bibliography

- Bahal, Aniruddha. "Freedom of Movement to and from Gaza Strip." IndiaInfo.com. February 2005. <http://news.indiainfo.com/columns/bahal/050205israel-gaza-strip.html>.
- Baroud, Ramzy. "Real Disengagement Plan Now at Work." Baltimore Chronicle. 5 October 2005. <http://baltimorechronicle.com/2005/100505Baroud.shtml>.
- Buttu, Diana. "Israel's Unilateral Disengagement and the Future of Gaza Strip: A Working Paper by the Palestinian Authority Technical Team." ZNet. 5 September 2005. www.zmag.org/content/showarticle.cfm?ItemID=8670.
- Epps, Daniel. "Safe Passage Is Vital to Success of Palestinian Economy." Daily Star (Lebanon). 29 July 2005.
- Israel, State of, and Palestine Liberation Organization. Text of the Sharm el-Sheikh Memorandum on Implementation Timeline of Outstanding Commitments of Agreements Signed and the Resumption of Permanent Status Negotiations, 4 September 1999. U.S. Department of State. www.state.gov/p/nea/rls/22696.htm.
- Israel, State of, and Palestinian National Authority. The Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip: Safe Passage Agreement. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsources/Peace/iaannex1.html.
- Jerusalem Fund. "Timeline for Oslo Negotiations (1991–2002)." Palestine Center. www.palestinecenter.org/cpap/timelines/timelineslo.html.
- Johnston, Alan. "Years of Delay at Gaza Airport." BBC News. 15 April 2005. http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/middle\_east/4449461.stm.
- Text of the Wye River Memorandum. ArabicNews.com. 24 October 1998. www.arabicnews.com/ansub/Daily/Day/981024/1998102453.html.

—Ramzy Baroud

Returnees

The Returnees, also called the Tunisians, the Oslo elite, or the OLD GUARD, are Palestinians who lived in TUNIS with YASIR ARAFAT in the last PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION headquarters in exile, after its 1982 expulsion from LEBANON, and who returned with Arafat to the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES during the OSLO ACCORDS period (1993–2000). Estimates of their number vary widely, from 10,000 to 40,000 to 100,000. Most worked in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) as bureaucrats who ran the PNA or were former guerrillas who dominated Arafat's enormous security apparatus.

Charges of corruption and indifference to the suffering of the Palestinian people were directed against the returnees, especially in the GAZA STRIP. As foreign aid flowed to the PNA and nongovernmental organizations, many of the returnees used their outsized salaries, often supplemented with graft, to construct ostentatious new homes and frequent the new discos and restaurants that sprang up in Gaza City, Ramallah, and elsewhere. This extravagance and their disdain for local norms bred resentment among local Palestinians, many of whom had seen their standard of living decline precipitously after the Oslo Accords. Returnees were accused of using legal loopholes that they helped create in the economic agreements with Israel to personally profit from Palestinian autonomy. Although not all returnees were corrupt and amoral, perceived differences between locals and returnees help fuel political opposition to the PNA.

It was mainly in Gaza that the returnees took root, with their array of ministries, authorities, and special agencies, police stations and sentry posts, choice rooftop apartments, villas, and places of entertainment. Within a short time, most Gazans came to feel that the returnees were as alien and as unfit to rule as those (Turks, British, Egyptians, and Israelis) who came before them. Moreover, because they were actually Palestinian and came as liberators, the disappointment was even worse. Especially in Gaza, the poorest of Palestinian communities, the returnees took at least as much as they brought. Part of the problem was that Arafat promised the Gazans on his return that he would turn Gaza into a "new Singapore" and that the Palestinian executives who made their fortunes building the Arab oil states would now invest in the homeland. Three years later, however, there was precious little investment in the Strip. Not only were businessmen deterred by Israeli restrictions—CLOSURE, PERMITS, and so forth—but the extensive corruption in the PNA also made investment highly risky. Some have speculated that Arafat did not really want the PALESTINIAN DIASPORA investors, because they could have undermined his control, which he had achieved through a combination of police surveillance and financial power. He preferred "donor money" from Western institutions that presented far less of a challenge to his power. Thus, instead of any kind of independent, wealth-producing capitalism, Arafat and his coterie of unofficial economic advisers threw up a ramshackle, nepotistic edifice of monopoly, racketeering, and extortion that enriched them as it further impoverished society at large. As Gaza's economy went from bad to worse, the returnees received the blame.

See also OLD GUARD; PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY; TUNIS

Bibliography

- Chabin, Michele. "An Uneasy Homecoming." Jerusalem Post. 21 July 1998.
- Hirst, David. "Shameless in Gaza." The Guardian Weekly. 27 April 1997.
- Sayre, Ward, and Jennifer Olmsted. "Economics of Palestinian Return Migration." Middle East Report. 212 (Fall 1999).
- Schultz, Michael, ed. Democratization and Civil Society in the Middle East: Case Studies of the Palestinian Self-Rule Areas and Iraqi Kurdistan. Göteborg, Sweden: Center for Middle East Studies, Göteborg University, 2006.
- Shiblak, Abbas, ed. Reintegration of the Palestinian Returnees. Monograph # 6. Bethlehem: Shaml Publication, 1997.

Revisionist Zionism

See ZIONISM

Rice, Condoleezza (1954–)

Condoleezza Rice became the sixty-sixth US secretary of state, on 28 January 2005 in the second term of President GEORGE W. BUSH, thus becoming the first black female secretary of state. During the first Bush term, she served as assistant to the president for national security affairs, or national security adviser. She received her Ph.D. from the Graduate School of International Studies at the University of Denver in 1981 and was a professor of political science at Stanford University, where she served for six years as provost (1993–1999). Rice was a member of multiple boards of directors, including the Chevron Corporation, the Charles Schwab Corporation, the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation, and the International Advisory Council of J. P. Morgan.

Rice was a consistent supporter of Israel and defended Israel's right to protect itself in the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In a 2003 interview with the Israeli newspaper Yediot Aharonot, Rice, then national security adviser, talked about her feelings toward the state: "I first visited Israel in 2000. I already then felt that I am returning home despite the fact that this was a place I never visited. I have a deep affinity with Israel. I have always admired the history of the State of Israel and the hardness and determination of the people that founded it. . . . Israel was a state who in the beginning was not given a chance to survive, she survived mainly because of the hardness of the Israelis and their readiness to sacrifice their lives for the state."

As national security adviser, Rice was a key player in promoting the 2003 ROAD MAP step-by-step peace plan, which includes the establishment of a Palestinian state. On 29 August 2006, she stated that the region "should be a Middle East in which there is a Palestinian state in which Palestinians can have their own aspirations met, one that is not corrupt, one that is democratic, [and] one in which there is only one authority." During her tenure as secretary of state, she continued to promote the Road Map even when Bush backed away from it.

On 9 February 2007, Rice met with leaders from the major American Jewish organizations and assured the participants that the UNITED STATES would not pressure Israel and would not come up with its own suggestions for resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict once the Road Map negotiations began. She said her goal involved "providing the Palestinians with a 'political horizon,'" eliminating misunderstanding between Palestinians and Israelis, and improving the atmosphere between them. According to several participants, Rice stressed the need to show the Palestinians that the key to achieving an independent state was in the hands of PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) president MAHMUD ABBAS, not HAMAS, the militant Islamic organization.

Rice made more than twenty trips to the Middle East. Although the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was not the central focus of each trip, the secretary could not avoid the issue in most Arab capitals. In her July 2005 trip, Rice traveled to Arab capitals to advocate and gain support for ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA and four small WEST BANK SETTLEMENTS in the context of its larger CONVERGENCE PLAN. Skeptical Arab leaders were not particularly receptive to the idea of Israel unilaterally determining its final BORDERS and excluding the Palestinians, among whom Israel claimed to have no partner with which to negotiate. The secretary returned to the region in November to negotiate the opening of Gaza's border crossings to facilitate the movement of Palestinian goods and people. She found the Israelis disinclined to make other than cosmetic concessions, but on 15 November 2005, Rice presided over an accord between Israel and the PNA called the "Agreement on Movement and Access Principles for Rafah Crossing," which involved, among other things, agreed principles for the operation of RAFAH CROSSING "to promote economic development" and to "improve the humanitarian situation on the ground." Rice declared that "the agreement is meant to give the Palestinian people freedom to move, trade, live normal lives. . . . For the first time since 1967, Palestinians will gain control over entry and exit from their territory." Israel violated the agreement almost immediately by closing Rafah for lengthy periods and was not criticized by Rice or anyone else in the US administration. The January 2006 electoral victory by Hamas in the Palestinian Legislative Council led Rice to mount an international campaign to garner global support for a total economic boycott of the PNA. The embargo that ensued left the overwhelming majority of Palestinians unemployed and existing below the poverty line. At the time, Rice chided Hamas, "You cannot have one foot in politics and the other foot in terror."

Rice's next occasion for a Middle East visit came in July 2006 in the context of Israel's wars in LEBANON in retaliation for the 12 July kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers by HIZBULLAH, and in Gaza (OPERATION SUMMER RAINS) for the capture of an Israeli soldier and the killing of two others by Hamas. On the Lebanon War, the US administration's position was a strong endorsement of Israel's actions, rushing delivery of precision-guided bombs and strenuous efforts at the UNITED NATIONS to prevent a cease-fire resolution until Israel had achieved a decisive military victory. In her visit to the region on 24 July, spending a few hours in Beirut and several days in Israel until 27 July, Rice described the destruction of Lebanon as "the birth pangs of a new Middle East." On 11 August, the United Nations passed a cease-fire resolution (UN Resolution 1701), which led to a 14 August cessation of hostilities, although Israel continued some operations through September. Rice, reflecting the administration's position, expressed strong support for the war in Gaza.

Secretary Rice returned to the Middle East in October 2006, a trip that noticeably demonstrated the linkage between IRAQ and Palestine. Though Rice's objective was to garner Arab support for the US war in Iraq, when she visited Jeddah, SAUDI ARABIA, she was confronted with the insistence that she explain what her plans were for solving the Palestinian issue. She replied that she planned to meet with PNA president Mahmud Abbas and discuss the following areas: "More funds to alleviate the humanitarian crisis, security sector reform, and more access between Gaza and Israel, and Gaza, the West Bank, and abroad." Saudi foreign minister Saud al-Faisal replied that the ARAB LEAGUE was holding funds for the Palestinians but had not been able to get them through, an issue he urged her to "resolve as quickly as possible." He told her that reduced donor aid and Israel's suspension of transfers of Palestinian tax revenues, among other problems, were shrinking the Palestinian economy to levels not seen in a generation. The foreign minister further pointed out that a real solution to the Palestinian economic crisis would require sovereign Palestinian control over resources, trade, and development—effectively, an end to Israel's OCCUPATION. As for "security sector reform," a euphemism for strengthening the forces that report to Abbas as opposed to those of Hamas's interior minister Sa'd Siyyam, it was pointed out that this would only exacerbate the already brewing factional conflict and potentially lead to civil war. The interior minister explained to Secretary Rice that Hamas is a deeply rooted social and political movement and that Abbas had rightly sought diplomatic ways to mediate differences. If Rice really wanted to support Abbas, she should accept the compromise language Abbas had been able to secure from Hamas, which is willing to let him lead political negotiations and to play a smaller part in a unity government. With regard to movement between and within the Occupied Territories, al-Faisal noted that the "Rafah Arrangements," supposedly to give Gazans access to the outside world through the Rafah Crossing, were a dead letter. There is no evidence that Rice incorporated any of Saudi Arabia's advice or suggestions.

Rice's January 2007 Middle East trip was a mission to promote Bush's new plan for a surge in troops in Iraq and to inform regional leaders about the upcoming trilateral meeting among the United States, Israel, and the PNA. Jordanian analyst Labib Kamhawi expressed the strong doubts many Arab leaders had regarding Bush's plan and noted that they had a difficult time throwing support behind it "when there has been a total failure in Iraq and the Palestinian territories with no attempt to soften the anger that is seething in the Arab and Muslim countries." Arab leaders have been unambiguous that, in exchange for their support on Iraq, the United States must show more commitment to solving the Israeli-Palestinian question and that the Arab world expects more than press conferences and promises. At the outset of this trip, Secretary Rice admitted that she had no new plans or proposals for peace. However, the February 2007 trilateral meeting was undoubtedly conceived as a means of responding to Arab state demands.

As Rice prepared for the late February Israeli-Palestinian-US meeting, she said that Israel and the Palestinians could pick any agenda they wanted for a preliminary peacemaking summit with the United States, but that it was too early to tackle the toughest issues. "We're not yet at the point where I think we can determine what we would do about formal negotiations, when and if they can occur," she stated. "It's really a time to try to get the parties into more of a confidence-building phase and we'll see what comes after that." Rice further said that she hoped to discuss more than the outlines or borders of an eventual Palestinian state. "There's always been a lot of concern about what the borders of the state would be, but there wasn't much attention given to its internal composition, its democratic processes, its institutions." She also expressed her hope that the trilateral meeting would be part of a wider effort to support Abbas in his fight with Hamas. Rice further stated that the dormant Road Map, though now "something of an obstacle in restarting talks between the two sides," would remain the frame of reference. "Everybody understands the obligations in it, but we'd gotten to a place that it was stalled because if they weren't making progress on the first phase of the road map, then you couldn't talk about the end of the road map and what might lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state."

In a brief statement delivered after the February meeting, Rice said the three participants "affirmed our commitment to a TWO-STATE SOLUTION, agreed that a Palestinian state cannot be born of violence and terror, and reiterated our acceptance of previous agreements and obligations," including the Road Map to peace. She said that Israeli prime minister EHUD OLMERT and Abbas had discussed how to move forward on mutual obligations aimed at implementing the first phase of the Road Map.

Subsequent visits to the region (September 2007, November 2007, January 2008, March 2008 (two trips), April 2008, May 2008 (two trips), June 2008, July 2008, August 2008, September 2008, and November 2008) and the 2007 Annapolis Conference, at which a two-state solution was articulated as a mutually agreed-upon outline for addressing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, led to statements of commitment and agreement, but very little tangible progress toward peace in the region. Condoleezza Rice was an activist secretary of state on Middle East issues, but neither she nor President Bush had any real commitment to resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in a just and comprehensive manner. Both were overtly pro-Israel and appeared to care little about the welfare or rights of the Palestinians.

See also: OPERATION SUMMER RAINS; RAFAH CROSSING

Bibliography

- Adler, Katya. "Rice Offers No Mid-East Breakthrough." BBC News. 15 January 2007.
- Benn, Aluf. "As Rice Arrives in the Region, Israel and PA Far from Peace Accord." Ha'aretz. 25 August 2008.
- Christian Science Monitor*, ed. "An Israeli-Palestinian Peace . . . by Inches." 15 February 2007.
- Cloud, David S., and Helene Cooper. "U.S. Speeds Up Bomb Delivery for the Israelis." New York Times. 22 July 2006.
- CNN. "U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Friday in Lebanon Placed a Wreath." CNN News. 22 July 2005.
- Gearan, Anne. "Rice Set for Israeli-Palestinian Talks." Associated Press. 18 January 2007.
- Guttman, Nathan. "Rice Briefs Jewish Groups as Palestinians Make Deal." The Forward. 9 February 2007.
- Ha'aretz*. "Condoleezza Rice, Republican: The Israel Factor." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 23 October 2006.
- Hijab, Nadia. "The Rice Agenda and the Real Agenda for the Palestinians." Policy Note 8. Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 4 October 2006.
- Issacharoff, Avi, and Yoav Stern. "Rice Calls for an End to Fighting in PA during Middle East Tour." Ha'aretz. 10 March 2006.
- Kessler, Glenn. "Asking the Right Questions." Washington Post. 16 January 2007.
- Leyne, Jon. "Iran behind Rice's Mid-East Tour." BBC News. 6 October 2006.

- Nazemroaya, Mahdi Darius. "Plans for Redrawing the Middle East: The Project for a 'New Middle East.'" Global Research. 18 November 2006.
- Nimmo, Kurt. "The Hardness of Condoleezza Rice: Huckstress of Israeli Myths." Counterpunch. 27 May 2003.
- Rice, Condoleezza. Remarks at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee's (AIPAC) Annual Policy Conference. Washington, DC: US Department of State, 23 May 2005.
- Shanker, Thom, and Greg Myre. "Rice in Israel, Backs Mideast Moderates, but Offers No Plan." New York Times. 14 January 2007.
- Shelby, David. Rice Seeks to Rally Moderate Forces in Middle East: Secretary Says Bush Administration Remains Committed to Promoting Democracy. Washington, DC: US Information Office, 3 October 2006.
- White House Office of the Press Secretary. "Dr. Rice Addresses War on Terror: Remarks by National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice." Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace, 19 August 2004.
- Winslow, Philip C. Victory for US Is to See You Suffer: In the West Bank with the Palestinians and the Israelis. Boston: Beacon Press, 2007.
- Wright, Robin. "Arab States Press Rice for U.S. Leadership." Washington Post. 5 October 2006.
- . "Rice Meets with Saudi King on Trip to Rally Arab Allies." Washington Post. 3 October 2006.
- Wright, Robin, and Scott Wilson. "Rice Negotiates Deal to Open Gaza Crossings." Washington Post. 16 November 2005.

Right of Return Law

Israel's DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE of 14 May 1948 embodied the right of return: "The State of Israel will be open for Jewish IMMIGRATION and for the ingathering of the exiles." On 5 July 1950, this right was codified into a BASIC LAW. The law was amended in 1970, to grant the right to immigrate to Israel to non-Jews who are either children or grandchildren of a Jew, the spouse of a Jew, or the spouse of a child or grandchild of a Jew. The amendment was intended to accept families, mainly from the former SOVIET UNION, where mixed marriages were abundant and where individuals and family members not considered Jews under the traditional definition nevertheless wanted to come to Israel.

The Law of Return has been the subject of much controversy since it is an exclusive Jewish right and excludes Palestinian REFUGEES who wish to return home to their native land. In theory, the Israeli law does not categorically exclude non-Jews from immigrating to Israel. Any person who wishes to settle in Israel may do so, at least hypothetically. In practice, Israel has prevented Palestinians from returning to their homeland. Persons who are permitted to "return" must meet the requirements set forth in the Law of Entry to Israel (1952) and the Law of Citizenship (1952), regarding naturalization.

See also REFUGEES AND THE RIGHT OF RETURN

Bibliography

- Law of Return. Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. 5 July. http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/MFAArchive/1950\_1959/Law%20of%20Return%205710-1950.

Roadblocks

Roadblocks are permanent or mobile physical impediments used by Israel to block movement by Palestinians in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Some are constructed and others improvised; they can be cement towers, revolving gates, manned CHECKPOINTS or ROADS closed off by heavy cement blocks, earth mounds, trenches, or observation towers. Although a few are border checkpoints located between Israel and the Occupied Territories, most are within the WEST BANK, where fundamentally the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) obstruct the passage of Palestinians from one place to another, in the stated interest of security. Internal roadblocks are one element in the increasingly sophisticated lockdown that disrupts all aspects of Palestinian life in the West Bank, which is being carved up into separate geographical entities with travel between them becoming more difficult, often requiring a PERMIT. In addition to the permit system, checkpoints, the BARRIER wall, and other aspects of Israel's matrix of control, they impede access to schools and universities, medical care, commerce, social life, and so forth. In 2005 there were 376 internal roadblocks, and by August 2006 there were 550 (some analysts put the number at over 700), of which 60 were permanent roadblocks, that is, checkpoints manned by IDF soldiers or Border Police.

Israeli analyst Meron Benvenisti considers Israel's disdain for the Palestinians and its "arrogant use of a mentality of submissiveness" as being reflected not only by the roadblocks themselves but by the checking procedures that occur there, "which are conducted without any sensitivity to the dignity and needs of the Palestinians, who are expected to wait in line in silence or else

- Permanent check point
- Road block
- Major road
- Secondary road
- Tertiary road
- Palestinian built up areas
- Israeli built up areas
- ▭ West Bank border

Data sources:
 Base map data from MOPIC, July 2002
 Road block and checkpoint data from ARIJ, undated
 Roadblock data downloaded and reproduced from the home page of The Palestine Red Crescent Society for improved printing purposes.
http://www.palestinercs.org/reference\_maps.htm

Cartography and data compilation by:
 Humanitarian Information Center, oPt,
 28 August 2002.

HIC oPt
 Home page: www.reliefweb.net/hic-opt
 E-mail: hic9.opt@wavenet.unog.ch
 Phone/Fax: +972 (0)2 589 0459

The designations employed and the presentation of material on this map do not imply the expression of any opinion whatsoever on the part of the Secretariat of the United Nations concerning the legal status of any country, territory, city or area or of its authorities, or concerning the delimitation of its frontiers or boundaries.

oPt - HIC

Map 36. Roadblock and Checkpoints in the West Bank, 2002

be ‘punished.’” Thus, rather than Israeli authorities dictating the lives of the Palestinians on a daily basis in their towns and their villages, they impose an “indirect regime of imprisonment” on them by fencing them off and interfering with their daily routines. Here, says Benvenisti, “the ruler does not encroach on their space, but they are forced to plead with him in the temples of the OCCUPATION, the roadblocks; and as long as they surrender to the rules imposed on them, the occupier knows his status is secure.”

Benvenisti further described the roadblocks as performing three major roles in the hegemonic system of Israeli control: symbolic, geostrategic, and sociopolitical. The hundreds of permanent and mobile roadblocks “are all designed for one purpose: to show who has the power to control the lives of the Palestinians. . . . This domination is implemented for the most part without any need for force, by exploiting the fear of the Palestinians.” The geostrategic function of the roadblocks resides in the fact that they “institutionalize the expropriation of the physical space and the public INFRASTRUCTURE of the West Bank and their transference to the exclusive use of the Israelis. The map of the hundreds of roadblocks erected in Palestinian populated areas outlines the physical division of the West Bank into areas west of the Barrier that have been annexed de facto, and the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY that has been cut off from its surroundings, and [the] 10 Palestinian enclaves from Jenin in the North to Mt. Hebron in the South.” Last, in the sociopolitical role the roadblocks play, the Palestinian community is being fragmented into weak and impoverished subcommunities where centers are disconnected from peripheries, urban centers are eroding and rural areas are becoming poorer, families are separated, and medical treatment is denied along with access to higher education. “This division is imposed in the hopes that the political and social SIEGE will result in demographic distress and perhaps to emigration,” Benvenisti states.

In late December 2006, Israeli prime minister EHUD OLMERT offered to remove twenty-seven roadblocks as a gesture of support for Palestinian president MAHMUD ABBAS in his struggle against HAMAS. Olmert’s cabinet also agreed to make improvements at the KARNI CROSSING between Israel and the Gaza Strip to speed the flow of goods and to ease travel restrictions on senior Palestinian officials and medical crews. There was considerable skepticism concerning the prime minister’s real intentions (a week earlier he announced construction of a new settlement in the Jordan Valley), or even if this small gesture would be implemented.

As of mid-2009, Israel had not improved access at Karni or in any other way eased the restrictions on the movement of goods and persons.

See also KARNI CROSSING; OCCUPATION; PERMITS

Bibliography

- Associated Press. “Roadblocks up by 40% in West Bank.” The Guardian (London). 12 October 2006.
- Benvenisti, Meron. “The Temples of the Occupation.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 28 December 2006.
- B’Tselem. Information on Checkpoints and Roadblocks: Permanent Internal Checkpoints. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, n.d. http://www.btselem.org/english/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Statistics.asp.
- Frykberg, Mel. “Mideast: Roadblocks Cripple West Bank Economy.” Inter-Press Service News Agency. 22 July 2008. <http://ipsnews.net/news.asp?idnews=43268>.
- HaCohen, Ran. “The Quiet Occupation. Part I.” Antiwar.com. 15 June 2005. www.antiwar.com/hacohen/?articleid=6303.
- . “The Quiet Occupation. Part II.” Antiwar.com. 26 October 2006. antiwar.com/hacohen/?articleid=7762.
- Hass, Amira. “One Nurse for 4,700 People and the Doctor Faces a Roadblock.” Ha’aretz. 3 February 2004.
- MachsomWatch. Annual Report: Checkpoints. 2004. www.machsomwatch.org/eng/homePageEng.asp?link=homePage&lang=eng.

Road Map

The Road Map, released on 30 April 2003, was a multistage plan to reinvigorate the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and was drawn up and sponsored by the QUARTET, composed of the UNITED STATES, the EUROPEAN UNION, RUSSIA, and the UNITED NATIONS. The four parties presented the plan to the Palestinians and Israelis as “a performance-based and goal-driven road map, with clear phases, timelines, target dates and benchmarks aiming at progress through reciprocal steps by the two parties in the political, security, economic, humanitarian and institution-building fields, under the auspices of the Quartet.” The Road Map displayed a renewed international engagement with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the wake of the US-led invasion of IRAQ in 2003. However, Israeli and Palestinian reservations about the details of the plan, the inherent difficulty of achieving the plan’s benchmarks, and a lack of international, especially US, follow-up led to the voiding of the plan's timeline and its marginalization as an all but rhetorical guide for peacemaking.

The plan set out three stages to move from the stalemate present at its announcement to a final resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The first stage, to take place by May 2003, sought to end Israeli-Palestinian violence; the second stage, set from June 2003 until December 2003, was intended to initiate a period of transition in which a Palestinian state with provisional BORDERS would be established; and the third phase, to take place by 2005, was to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict through a permanent final-status agreement.

The first phase called upon Palestinians to "immediately undertake an unconditional cessation of violence . . . accompanied by supportive measures undertaken by Israel" based on the Tenet Plan of 2001. Thus, the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) should "undertake visible efforts on the ground to arrest, disrupt, and restrain individuals and groups conducting and planning violent attacks on Israelis anywhere." The Palestinians were also to begin institutional reforms within the PNA to produce a draft constitution for Palestinian statehood and to empower the prime minister with executive authority. Reform was also to extend to ministers, an independent electoral commission, the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, and the judicial branch. In return for these Palestinian actions, Israel was to take "no actions undermining trust." Most significantly, Israel was to freeze all SETTLEMENT activity and to dismantle settlement OUTPOSTS erected after March 2001. Israel was also urged to take "measures to improve the humanitarian situation" in the Occupied Territories and to support and facilitate the reform of Palestinian institutions. With improved security performance, Israel was to withdraw the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES progressively until "the two sides restore the status quo that existed prior to 28 September 2000," that is, before Israel reoccupied the territory returned to the Palestinians during the OSLO PROCESS.

In the second phase of transition, efforts were to be "focused on the option of creating an independent Palestinian state with provisional borders and attributes of sovereignty, based on the new constitution, as a way station to a permanent status settlement." This goal could be achieved "when the Palestinian people have a leadership acting decisively against terror, willing and able to build a practicing democracy based on tolerance and liberty. With such a leadership, reformed civil institutions and security structures, the Palestinians will have the active support of the Quartet and the broader international community in establishing an independent, viable, state." Moreover, this phase of the Road Map called for the Quartet to convene an international conference to support the founding of the Palestinian state (with provisional borders), to renew the Syrian-Israeli and Lebanese-Israeli tracks of the peace process, and to revive multilateral negotiations toward a comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

The third phase sought the "consolidation of reform and stabilization of Palestinian institutions, sustained, effective Palestinian security performance, and Israeli-Palestinian negotiations aimed at a permanent status agreement in 2005." These objectives were to be achieved through a second international conference, which was to reach a "final and comprehensive permanent status agreement that ends the Israel-Palestinian conflict in 2005." This would be implemented "through a settlement negotiated between the parties based on [UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS] 242, 338, and 1397 that ends the OCCUPATION that began in 1967. [It would] include an agreed, just, fair, and realistic solution to the REFUGEE issue; and a negotiated resolution on the status of JERUSALEM that takes into account the political and religious concerns of both sides, and protects the religious interests of Jews, Christians, and Muslims worldwide. [It would] fulfill the vision of two states, Israel and a sovereign, independent, democratic and viable Palestine, living side-by-side in peace and security." Moreover, Arab states would accept full and normal relations with Israel in the context of a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace.

Although the Road Map had multilateral authorship and responsibility, it was also a symbol of the renewed engagement of US president GEORGE W. BUSH in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Until 11 September 2001, President Bush refrained from high-level actions aimed at abating the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. In a June 2002 speech, however, Bush set out his vision for reenergizing the peace process that was distinctly at odds with the Road Map. Although Bush gave explicit US support for an independent Palestinian state, he also called for the removal of YASIR ARAFAT from the leadership of the PNA. However, the implementation of Bush's speech waited until after the invasion of Iraq under US leadership in March 2003. Moreover, the Road Map, as the formalization of this policy, was partly the result of pressure on Bush by British prime minister Tony Blair, who sought to lend credibility to the Iraq war effort by showing greater international engagement in Israeli-Palestinian affairs.

Because the Palestinian leadership preferred the Road Map to the vision outlined in Bush's 2002 speech, it accepted the terms of the Road Map despite reservations about the plan's emphasis on Palestinian responsibilities for meeting the Road Map's goals and about the deepened institutional reforms, which were seen as undermining Arafat's power. In contrast, the Israeli government did not fully accept the Road Map in its stated form. Instead, Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON expressed reservations on fourteen points that he insisted did not fit with the objectives expressed by Bush in his June 2002 speech. Moreover, many critics questioned the Road Map's gradual timetable in light of the failures of the OSLO ACCORDS, between the PLO and Israel, in meeting deadlines and phased objectives. In addition, critics pointed out that, although the Road Map called on the Quartet to monitor and encourage progress, the Israeli government expected the United States to be the only external party involved. Thus, many questioned the will of the Bush administration to promote the implementation of the Road Map, given the close ties between the US president and the Israeli premier.

The plan set out its benchmarks with the assumption that "as a performance-based plan, progress will require and depend upon the good faith efforts of the parties, and their compliance with each of the obligations. . . . Non-compliance with obligations will impede progress." In response to external calls for reform, the PNA created the office of Palestinian prime minister in March 2003, and MAHMUD ABBAS was appointed to that position by Arafat. However, the Road Map was not able to overcome the inertia of Israeli-Palestinian violence or to motivate extensive international—especially US—involvement in peacemaking. While the first cease-fire was declared in July 2003, it and many others were broken. Sharon saw any violent act by Palestinians against Israelis as a reason to halt the peace process, which gave even the smallest Palestinian faction a veto over the progress of the Road Map. Moreover, Israel refused to freeze settlement activity. Thus, the progress of the Road Map was impeded.

The Road Map, however, remained a rhetorical touchstone for Israelis, Palestinians, and interested external actors. With the death of Arafat in November 2004, many called for a resumption of the Road Map and viewed ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in August 2005 as a step in the return to the map's stages, a position endorsed by Sharon himself, despite the fact that a Gaza withdrawal was not cited in the Road Map's provisions. Despite the plan's lack of success, the Road Map remained the Bush administration's central contribution, or lack thereof, to resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

See also FINAL STATUS TALKS; LEBANON; QUARTET; SYRIA; GEORGE TENET

Bibliography

- Beilin, Yossi. "Sharon Was Insincere from the Start." Jerusalem Post. 11 September 2004.
- Benvenisti, Meron. "Road Map to Perpetuating the Status Quo." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 19 June 2003.
- Cook, Jonathan. "Whose Security? Security and the Roadmap." Al-Ahram (Cairo). 16 June 2003.
- Hanieh, Adam, and Catherine Cook. "A Road Map to the Oslo Cul-de-Sac." Middle East Report Online. 15 May 2003. <http://www.merip.org/mero>.
- International Crisis Group. Middle East Report 14: A Middle East Roadmap to Where? 2 May 2003. www.crisisgroup.org/library/documents/report\_archive/A400962\_02052003.pdf.
- Khalidi, Ahmad Samih. "This Is a Roadmap to Nowhere." The Guardian (London). 19 March 2003.
- Morris, Harvey. "Israeli Reservations on Peace Plan Unveiled." Financial Times (London). 27 May 2003.
- Reinhart, Tanya. The Roadmap to Nowhere: Israel/Palestine since 2003. London: Verso, 2003.
- Shragai, Nadav. "Rightists Planning Campaign to Push Road Map off Course." Ha'aretz. 13 May 2003.
- US Department of State. A Performance-Based Roadmap to a Permanent Two-State Solution to the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. 2003. www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2003/20062.htm.
- Viorst, Milton. "The Road Map to Nowhere." Washington Quarterly. 26:3 (2003).

—Russell E. Lucas

Road System in the West Bank

Beginning in the 1970s with the birth and emboldening of the Jewish SETTLEMENTS movement, Israel has gradually created a new transportation grid in the WEST BANK. The purpose of much of the new road system is to connect Israeli settlements to each other and to the Israeli transportation grid inside the Green Line while bypassing Palestinian towns and villages. Thus, many of these roads are referred to as bypass roads, which cater to the Israeli settlers who, even before the outbreak of the INTIFADA, wanted to be able to commute to Israel and throughout the West Bank easily and safely.

The roads are also a way of making settlements more attractive to prospective residents. In the Israeli Settlement Master Plan for 1983–1986, the chapter discussing roads states, “The road is the factor that motivates settlement in areas where settlement is important, and its advancement will lead to development and demand.” According to the plan, one of the primary objectives determining the routes of the roads was to “bypass the Arab population centers,” and accordingly Israel built dozens of new roads in the West Bank during the 1980s. Significantly, the road system also forms a clear axis of Israeli control throughout the West Bank. The settlement master plan also expressly states that one of the primary considerations in choosing a site to establish settlements is to limit construction in Palestinian villages. For example, in its discussion of the mountain ridge area, the plan states that it “holds most of the Arab population in the urban and rural communities. . . . Jewish settlement along this route (Route 60) will create a psychological wedge regarding the mountain ridge, and also will likely reduce the uncontrolled spread of Arab settlement.”

Map 37. Israel's Road System in the West Bank, 2004

© Stopthewall.org, reprinted with permission.

The Israeli human rights group B’TSELEM estimates that in the West Bank there are seventeen routes on which Palestinian vehicles are completely prohibited, comprising about 75 miles (124 kilometers); ten routes on which Palestinian travel is partially prohibited (Palestinians need special movement PERMITS), comprising about 150 miles (244 kilometers); and fourteen routes on which Palestinian travel is restricted (Palestinian access only allowed through an ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES checkpoint), comprising about 225 miles (364 kilometers).

When Israel first began building roads in the West Bank, around the same time as the first settlements were established in the 1970s, in many instances the location of the settlements required new routes over difficult topographic terrain. This Israeli policy led, among other things, to extensive ENVIRONMENTAL DEGRADATION of the West Bank. Moreover, as B’Tselem notes, the construction far exceeded the transportation needs resulting from the increase in population and economy of the area, in the interest of attracting more settlers.

Ironically, road construction in the West Bank accelerated in tandem with progress in the peace process. Beginning in 1993 with the signing of the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, and in the framework of the redeployment of Israel Defense Forces (IDF) in the West Bank, the bypass road system gained significant momentum. By 1995, new road construction reached a peak, with Israel undertaking the construction of more than 60 miles (100 kilometers) of roads in the area. Israel’s post-OSLO ACCORDS ROAD MAP of 2003 involved the construction of an extensive system of bypass roads intended to meet four key needs as defined by the Ministry of Defense: (1) permit Israelis to travel without passing through Palestinian population centers; (2) permit Israelis to travel across the Green Line by the shortest route; (3) maintain “an internal fabric of life” within the Israeli settlement blocs; and (4) ensure that Palestinian traffic did not pass through the settlements.

Following the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000, settlers suffered repeated attacks from Palestinians on existing roads, and construction of bypass roads again accelerated when Israel issued military orders for a new wave of LAND requisitions. Israel seized private Palestinian lands to construct new bypass roads and to replace old roads and bypass roads that were allegedly no longer safe. By May 2002, eight new bypass roads were in various phases of construction, at a total cost of NIS 228 million (around $47 million). In 2006, Israel continued to build bypass roads throughout the West Bank. According to PEACE NOW’s research (including aerial and ground surveys), projects at the time included construction of a new JERUSALEM-Nokedim road (bypassing BETHLEHEM from the southeast) and construction to upgrade Highway No. 5 (the Trans-Samaria Highway) and Highway No. 1 (the MA’ALE ADUMIM-JERICHO road). In addition, the Nili-Ofarim bypass (west of Ramallah) had been recently completed and opened to traffic.

Most of the bypass roads are planned, built, and paid for by the government of Israel, but, in some cases, the settlers have planned and illegally built roads by diverting public funds allocated for other purposes. According to the State Comptroller, in most cases in which IDF officials realized that road work was being done without approval, the army obtained requisition orders to legalize retroactively the injury to private Palestinian property. In one case (the Wallerstein road linking the Beit El and Dolev settlements), part of the road built by the settlers ran through Area B, in which, according to the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT, Israel was not entitled to seize private Palestinian property for that purpose. Although the necessary requisition orders were not issued and no order was given for the IDF to take control of the land, the IDF did not stop construction work on the road by settlers. Building new roads on the initiative of settlers without approval from the relevant authorities has become common because of the many illegal OUTPOSTS erected in the West Bank since the end of the 1990s.

There are no exact figures regarding how many kilometers of bypass roads exist in the West Bank, but, taken together, the bypass roads form a modern transportation system, in places constituting major multilane interstate highways. The roads are generally wide (with significant buffer zones along the sides) and well constructed (with banked turns, clearly marked lanes, and modern on-ramps and off-ramps). The bypass system features roads and tunnels that cut through (rather than being routed around) large hills (especially in the area south of Jerusalem). Roads are well lit and include amenities such as modern signage in Hebrew and English (often indicating information only for settlements and locations inside Israel with no indication that the driver is in the Occupied Territories), covered bus stops (for settlers and soldiers), and, in some cases, sidewalks. Travel on the bypass roads is extremely efficient and easy, in part because they are usually free of traffic, reflecting the fact that even after thirty-plus years of settlement, there are still relatively few Israelis living in the West Bank.

Since the roads are planned according to the interests of the settlers, with little or no recourse for Palestinian landowners, it is not unusual to find one that cuts through the middle of a mature olive grove or a cultivated field. Indeed, in addition to their role in connecting settlements, bypass roads often block the development of the Palestinian communities in the West Bank, creating BORDERS and barriers between communities and routes that in the past were connected. With only a few exceptions, the transportation grid that existed in the West Bank when Israel took control of the area in 1967 involved routes that had existed for centuries and remain today as the roads that Palestinians use. These routes reflect the social and economic behavior of the local population—connecting people with markets, villages, and larger population centers. As with other systems developed in areas inhabited before the advent of modern machinery, they tend to reflect the topography of the area, coexisting with rather than conquering the landscape—for example, skirting a hill rather than going through it. Although a small part of Israel's limited investment in West Bank INFRASTRUCTURE since 1967 included upgrading existing Palestinian roads, overall the investment has gone to creating the alternative transportation grid that does not reflect Palestinians' social and economic needs.

Bypass roads are constructed chiefly on confiscated privately owned Palestinian land. In order to build on this land, the Israeli government uses two main methods: requisitioning the land for military use or expropriating the land for public use. Both are illegal under INTERNATIONAL LAW. In September 1996, Palestinians petitioned the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT to prevent the IDF from seizing over 1,000 acres (4,386 dunums) of their private land for road construction. The court rejected the petition, as it consistently has, accepting the state's argument that the construction of the roads was needed for "absolute security needs."

Prior to the outbreak of the violence of the al-Aqsa Intifada in September 2000, Palestinians could, with the requisite permits, use most of the bypass roads. Palestinians made use of the bypass roads wherever it made sense to do so—for example, traveling from Jerusalem to HEBRON. However, the roads' utility to the Palestinians was often limited by, for example, the absence of on- and off-ramps serving many Palestinian locales and by other Israeli restrictions; for instance, a Palestinian from Ramallah could not take the direct route to Bethlehem because the road passes through Jerusalem and Palestinians are prohibited from entering Jerusalem. After the outbreak of violence in September 2000, Israel drastically reduced Palestinian access to all roads in the West Bank, including bypass roads. According to the Israeli human rights group B'Tselem, an arbitrary (and unwritten) system of road controls has come into being that restricts Palestinian access on certain roads. On some roads, Palestinians are forbidden (sometimes referred to as "sterile" routes), and on others Palestinian travel is prohibited unless the driver possesses a special permit (called a Special Movement Permit at Internal Checkpoints in Judea and Samaria, which is difficult to obtain). On restricted-use roads, Palestinian vehicles are not prohibited, but access is controlled by Israeli CHECKPOINTS (permanent on some routes and periodic, or "flying checkpoints," on others). Palestinians traveling on roads that are forbidden or for which they do not have proper permits risk fines, imprisonment, and confiscation of their vehicle. The only roads on which Palestinian travel is generally unrestricted are those within the built-up area of a Palestinian village or town.

In some instances, Palestinians are not allowed to cross bypass roads by car, which restricts Palestinians from reaching other roads. In these cases, Palestinians can travel along the road until they reach a forbidden road, where they get out of the car, cross the forbidden road by foot, and get into another vehicle. For example, in the area between JENIN and the villages situated to its east runs a “forbidden” road that links the settlements Ganim and Kadim to Israel. As a result, residents of Jalbun, Faqqu’a, and Deir Abu Da’if cannot make the journey to or from Jenin in one vehicle.

In late October 2005, Ha’aretz, the preeminent Israeli daily, reported that the ARIEL SHARON government had implemented a strict prohibition on travel by private Palestinian cars as “part of the plan [a contingency plan for separating all Palestinian traffic] as an immediate response to TERRORISM.”

See also INFRASTRUCTURE IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES; OLIVE TREE UPROOTING; ROAD MAP

Bibliography

- Associated Press. “Israel Planning Segregated West Bank Roads for Palestinians, Israeli Settlers.” Israelinsider. 19 October 2005.
- Etkes, Dror, and Lara Friedman. Bypass Roads in the West Bank. Jerusalem: Peace Now, and New York: Americans for Peace Now, 2005. www.peacenow.org.il/site/en/peace.asp?pi=62&docid=1422.
- Koury, Stephanie. “West Bank Road vs. Peace.” Washington Post. 19 November 2005.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Forbidden Roads: The Discriminatory West Bank Road Regime. Jerusalem: B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2004. www.btselem.org/English/Publications/Summaries/200408\_Forbidden\_Roads.asp.
- . Land Grab: Israel’s Settlement Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, 2002. www.btselem.org/English/Publications/Summaries/200205\_Land\_Grab.asp.
- Levy, Gideon. “Enough Palestinian Cars.” Ha’aretz. 23 October 2005.
- McGreal, Chris. “Israel Accused of ‘Road Apartheid’ in West Bank.” The Guardian (London). 20 October 2005.
- Ministry of Agriculture and the Settlement Division of the World Zionist Organization. Master Plan for Settlement for Judea and Samaria: Development Plan for the Region for 1983–1986. Jerusalem: World Zionist Organization, 1983.

Robinson, Mary (1944–)

Mary Robinson was president of Ireland and the UNITED NATIONS High Commissioner for Human Rights. As commissioner, Robinson headed two missions to the Occupied Territories—in November 2000 and April 2002. The missions were based on the “grave concern” of the member states of the Human Rights Commission about reports of “serious, widespread and flagrant violations” of human rights in the territories. Robinson’s reports were critical of Israel’s policies and practices, and consequently she came under enormous pressure from the UNITED STATES, to the extent that Washington was able to engineer the nonrenewal of her position when her term ended.

After her first trip to the Occupied Territories as high commissioner in 2000, Robinson detailed her findings in a comprehensive report. She pointed to a range of Israeli abuses, including excessive use of force, RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, and the impact of the conflict on children, and said that “the bleak human rights situation in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES” warranted urgent international attention. She called for an international monitoring presence to be deployed in the territories and for the states that are high-contracting parties to the Geneva Conventions to take action “to reduce the terrible violence.”

At the behest of the October 2000 special session, the United Nations established a commission of inquiry composed of three independent experts to investigate human rights and humanitarian law violations in the territories. In its report to the Commission on Human Rights (CHR) in March, the group said that the “IDF, assisted by settlers on occasion,” was responsible for most violations, but noted that Palestinians had also committed violations, either under the authority of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY or acting individually. It too called for an “adequate and effective international presence” to be established “to monitor and regularly report on” continuing violations. EUROPEAN UNION ambassadors in Israel jointly confirmed that “the issues and findings” in the report “truly reflected facts on the ground” and said the European Union would fully endorse its recommendations. The subsequent CHR Resolution 2001/7, while condemning and deploring the Israeli human rights violations identified in the inquiry’s report, omitted reference to Palestinian violations. Politics then intervened, and although the resolution was adopted by the CHR in April, the United States and Guatemala voted against it, and twenty-two states, including the European Union countries, abstained.

Earlier, the UN Security Council informally considered draft proposals to establish a UN military and police observer force in the Occupied Territories but did not proceed to a vote when the United States indicated that it would exercise its veto. In March 2001, the United States did veto a draft Security Council resolution calling for the secretary-general to consult with the parties to the conflict and recommend “an appropriate mechanism to protect Palestinian civilians, including through the establishment of a UN observer force.” Explaining the veto, chief US delegate James Cunningham said the resolution prescribed a role for the secretary-general that was not realistic, given Israel’s staunch opposition to a UN observer role.

After her 2002 visit to the Occupied Territories (following OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS and OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD), Robinson authored and presented to the Geneva-based UN Commission on Human Rights a second report on the situation in the Occupied Territories, which included the following points: “It is indisputable that there has been extensive loss of life on the Palestinian as well as the Israeli side. Recent SUICIDE BOMBINGS by Palestinians had killed 62 people and injured 363, while the Palestine Red Crescent Society reported that Israeli troops had killed 217 Palestinians and wounded 498 from 29 March to 21 April. These figures will still require confirmation since there has not been access to all areas.”

Citing information from the UN RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (UNRWA), the high commissioner said, “The [ISRAEL] DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) caused extensive damage to hundreds of private homes. UNRWA estimates that in the JENIN refugee camp 800 dwellings have been destroyed and many more damaged leaving 4,000 to 5,000 people homeless.” Robinson pointed to reports by the human rights group B’Tselem, saying that “while the number of Palestinians under arrest or in detention remains uncertain, over 2,500 persons were being held.” The report documented widespread concern over the lack of access to medical assistance in the Occupied Territories as well as obstacles to humanitarian deliveries there. It also examined Israel’s denial of the accusations. Robinson concluded that “the [Israeli] military operation must be brought to an end. Equally, all attacks against Israeli civilians must end.” She also emphasized the need for “accountability on all sides for what has happened,” warning that a failure to investigate widespread allegations of serious human rights abuses “risks undermining the integrity of the international human rights system.” She offered her office’s assistance in facilitating a dialogue between the two sides aimed at enhancing mutual understanding.

After leaving her post as UN high commissioner, Robinson gave an interview to Salon magazine. She said that the GEORGE W. BUSH administration’s strong lobbying and pressure not to extend her term were a consequence of three main factors: her defense of the Durban Conference Against Racism, which the United States and Israel walked out of; her reports to the United Nations on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict; and her condemnation of the US treatment of prisoners in Camp X-ray at Cuba’s Guantánamo Bay. As part of its campaign against Robinson, the United States put out the word in the corridors of power in Washington and New York’s UN headquarters that Robinson was “difficult to work with” and “extremely biased.” Robinson defended her principles, saying that she had spoken fairly about abuses of human rights by both Israel and the Palestinian National Authority, although “I came to understand that in Washington, criticizing Israel damned me.”

She said her main commitment was “to the integrity of the human rights agenda and shaping it so it’s not politicized. I applied that faithfully to addressing the problems both in the Occupied Palestinian Territory and in Israel and I have mentally, emotionally and intellectually, tried to be bound by it. . . . I have condemned unequivocally suicide bombing, and reiterated the need for human security in Israel for political debate. . . . [D]rive-by shootings and suicide bombing [are] of course appalling and cannot be condemned strongly enough, certainly not justified by any cause—but the Israeli responses are also excessive.” She said she found it “disheartening that there is not more understanding here [in the United States] of the appalling suffering of the Palestinian population, nor appreciation that this is not going to lead to a secure future. It’s going to lead to greater hatred and desperation, and to further suicide bombings.”

See also OCCUPATION; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS

Bibliography

- Capdevila, Gustavo. "Robinson to Head UN Fact-Finding Mission." Inter Press Service. 6 April 2002.
- Fahim, Kareem. "A Conversation with the UN's High Commissioner for Human Rights: The Education of Mary Robinson." The Village Voice. 24–30 April 2002.
- Human Rights Watch. Human Rights Watch World Report: Middle East and North Africa. New York: HRW, 2002.
- Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights. Mary Robinson, United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (1997–2002): Biographical Note. New York: OHCHR, n.d. www.unhchr.ch/html/hchr/unhc.htm.
- Robinson, Mary. A Voice for Human Rights. Edited by Kevin Boyle. Foreword by Kofi Annan. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- United Nations. "Expresses Deep Concern over Deteriorating Situation." Press release. UN News Service. 27 November 2000.
- . "Israel/Palestinian Authority: Robinson Issues Report on Human Rights Situation in Occupied Territory." Press release. UN News Service. 24 April 2002.
- Williams, Ian. "The Salon Interview: Mary Robinson." Salon.com. 26 July 2002. www.salon.com/people/interview/2002/07/26/mary\_robinson

Roed-Larsen, Terje (1947–)

Terje Roed-Larsen is a Norwegian diplomat and sociologist who played an important role in 1992–1993 as a secret, back-channel facilitator for the pre-OSLO ACCORDS negotiations between the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and Israel. In 1999 Roed-Larsen was appointed as UN secretary-general Kofi Annan's personal representative to the PLO and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP. He was also the UN's official coordinator for peace negotiations in the Middle East, including managing relations with LEBANON and SYRIA.

In 1981 Roed-Larsen founded and directed FAFO (Fagbevegelsens Forsknings Organisasjon, the Institute for Applied Social Science). It was through his work with FAFO in the West Bank and Gaza that Roed-Larsen became involved in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and partly the reason he was asked to act as an intermediary in the secret negotiations between Israel and the PLO. His wife, Mona Juul, a Norwegian diplomat, facilitated high-level contacts with the Norwegian foreign minister, JOHAN JUERGEN HOLST, who was also instrumental in facilitating the OSLO ACCORDS, and his deputy, Jan Egeland.

In December 1992, Israeli academic and historian Yair Hirschfeld met secretly in London with AHMAD QUREI', a trusted lieutenant of YASIR ARAFAT, and decided to accept Roed-Larsen's invitation to negotiations in Oslo. Thereafter, under the protection of Norwegian intelligence, Israeli and Palestinian delegations were spirited in and out of Norway. The Norwegians nurtured trust and camaraderie through relaxed hospitality at Larsen's home during at least fourteen secret sessions. Higher-level officials from both sides eventually joined the secret talks, and in August 1993 the negotiators initialed an accord, the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES, in Oslo that was signed at the White House the following month.

Roed-Larsen also served from June 1994 until October 1996 as the first special coordinator in the Israeli-Occupied Palestinian sector under UN secretary-general Boutros Boutros-Ghali. In 2004 Roed-Larsen left the position of special coordinator for peace negotiations in the Middle East to become president of the International Peace Academy, a New York-based think tank, and was also designated as UN special representative for the implementation of Security Council Resolution 1559, calling for Syrian political and military withdrawal from Lebanon. At the time of the Israeli withdrawal from the occupied Lebanese territories in the summer of 2000, Roed-Larsen represented the United Nations in delineating the blue line that divided the Lebanese borders from those of Israel.

Roed-Larsen retains a link with Norway as the cochairman of the group of nations that contribute economically to the PNA.

See also JOHAN JUERGEN HOLST; SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES

Bibliography

- Dale, Geir. Facilitating Oslo: How the Oslo Accord's "Secret Channel" Opened, Then Closed. Oslo: Centre for Conflict Management, 2004.
- Zartman, I. William, and Victor A. Kremenyuk. Peace versus Justice: Negotiating Forward- and Backward-Looking Outcomes. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2005.

Rogers, William Pierce (1913–2001)

William P. Rogers was a lawyer, US government official, and secretary of state from 1969 to 1973 under President RICHARD NIXON. From 1947 to 1950, he served as chief counsel to two Senate investigating committees before becoming, in 1953, deputy attorney general under President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER. He lobbied vigorously for passage of the 1957 Civil Rights Act, and later, as attorney general from 1957 to 1961, Rogers set up the civil rights division of the US Justice Department.

When Nixon appointed Rogers secretary of state in 1969, he instructed him to find a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Rogers had a different perspective on the Middle East than the president and his national security adviser, HENRY KISSINGER, who viewed the Arab-Israeli conflict through the prism of Cold War competition with the SOVIET UNION. Rogers, on the other hand, had a strong sense of the local and regional dynamics at work in the conflict and believed a resolution was possible through the intervention of the world's great powers.

Rogers undertook several initiatives to solve the conflict, the most important being his 1969 ROGERS PLAN. In 1970 he arranged a cease-fire between Israel and EGYPT in the WAR OF ATTRITION, but Israel opposed each of Rogers's efforts. It turned out that Rogers was not the only actor making Middle East policy in the Nixon administration. Although Nixon had supposedly prohibited Kissinger from involving himself in the region, he was very shortly meddling and undermining every Rogers initiative. Indeed, a battle occurred between the two: while Rogers attempted to broker a solution, Kissinger made every effort to thwart it. Whereas the State Department believed that the key problem was Israeli intransigence, Kissinger believed the Israeli victory in the 1967 WAR was a glorious defeat of the Soviets and considered Israel a STRATEGIC ASSET to US Middle East interests.

In 1973 Rogers resigned and retired to the private sector. In 1986 he returned to public life one last time when he headed the special presidential commission set up to investigate the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger.

See also ROGERS PLAN

Rogers Plan, 1969

US secretary of state WILLIAM P. ROGERS announced his plan for Middle East peace on 9 December 1969. Rooted in UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242, it called for Arab leaders to agree to peace and for Israel to withdraw from Arab territory occupied during the 1967 WAR. In addition to Israel's unwillingness to withdraw from the territories it occupied in 1967, there was an intensifying WAR OF ATTRITION between Israel and EGYPT that portended a conflict among the world's great powers. Appointed by the UNITED NATIONS to work with Israel and the Arab states to try to implement UNSC Resolution 242, Dr. Gunnar Jarring had failed in his mediation. In response, Rogers arranged "Two Power Talks" (the UNITED STATES and the SOVIET UNION) and "Four Power Talks" (the United States, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, and FRANCE), authorized by President Richard Nixon, both of which lasted for eight months and came to naught. Israel rejected all the proposals put forward by these parties.

Further, by the summer of 1969, Israel had escalated the War of Attrition, flying across the Sinai to bomb and strafe Egyptian forts and artillery emplacements. Then Tel Aviv undertook a series of "deep penetration raids" far inside Egypt, some missions involving the bombardment of civilian suburbs in Cairo. The Soviet Union became more deeply involved, resupplying destroyed military equipment, including planes, and constructing a missile defense system for Egypt. In this context, Secretary Rogers decided to make his ideas on a Middle East settlement official and outlined a proposal for conflict resolution. This was in actuality Rogers Plan A, since a second plan, detailed in the spring of 1970 by the secretary, came to be known as Rogers Plan B. The first is the most well-known.

In introducing his plan, Rogers stated, "When this administration took office, one of our first actions in foreign affairs was to examine carefully the entire situation in the Middle East. It was obvious that a continuation of the unresolved conflict there would be extremely dangerous; that the parties to the conflict alone would not be able to overcome their legacy of suspicion to achieve a political settlement; and that international efforts were needed to help support process. The United States decided it had a responsibility to play a direct role in seeking a solution.

"Our policy is and will continue to be a balanced one. We have friendly ties with both Arabs and Israelis. To call for Israeli withdrawal as envisaged in the UN Resolution without achieving an agreement on peace would be partisan towards the Arabs. To call on the Arabs to accept peace without Israeli withdrawal would be partisan towards Israel. Therefore, our policy is to encourage the Arabs to accept a permanent peace based on a binding agreement and to urge the Israelis to withdraw from occupied territory when their territorial integrity is assured as envisaged by the Security Council Resolution [242].”

Rogers Plan A listed four basic principles that he considered essential for securing peace in the Middle East.

1. An agreement among outside powers could not be a substitute for an agreement among the parties themselves.
2. A durable peace must meet the legitimate concerns of all sides.
3. The framework for a negotiated settlement must be in accordance with the entire text of Resolution 242.
4. There must not be a protracted period of no war/no peace, since recurrent violence and spreading chaos would serve the interests of no nation in or out of the Middle East.

Rogers also endorsed demilitarized zones and related security arrangements, averred that any changes in preexisting boundaries should not reflect the weight of conquest, and stated that JERUSALEM should be a unified city under international trusteeship.

Although the Rogers Plan did not recognize any Palestinian national or political rights, it did refer to the centrality of the refugee problem and the need to take into account the desires and aspirations of the REFUGEES themselves. According to Rogers, “There can be no lasting peace without a just settlement of the problem of those Palestinians whom the wars of 1948 and 1967 made homeless. This human dimension of the Arab-Israeli conflict has been of special concern to the United States for over 20 years. During this period, the United States has contributed about 500 million dollars for the support and education of the Palestine refugees. We are prepared to contribute generously, along with others, to solve this problem. We believe its just settlement must take into account the desires and aspirations of the refugees and the legitimate concerns of the Governments in the area. The problem posed by the refugees will become increasingly serious if their future is not resolved. There is a new consciousness among the young Palestinians who have grown up since 1948, which needs to be channeled away from bitterness and frustration towards hope and justice.”

JORDAN forthrightly accepted the Rogers Plan, Egypt indicated a willingness to accept it but asked for certain clarifications, and Israel rejected it out of hand. Prime Minister GOLDA MEIR described the Rogers Plan as a disaster for Israel, saying, “It would be irresponsible for any Israeli government to support such a plan.” The following months saw the effect on the US government of Israel’s will and its ability to torpedo the Rogers Plan in combination with National Security Adviser Henry Kissinger’s machinations to ensure that it failed. Together they succeeded, and the plan was consigned to history.

Bibliography

- Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Israel Rejects the Rogers Plan—Cabinet Statement—22 December 1969. Vols. 1–2, 1947–1974. Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1969.
- Kissinger, Henry. The White House Years. New York: Little, Brown, 1979.
- Nixon, Richard. RN: The Memoirs of Richard Nixon, reprint. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1990.
- Rogers, William P. A Lasting Peace in the Middle East: An American View. Address by Secretary of State William P. Rogers. Department of State Publication 8507. Near and Middle East Series 79, released January 1970. Office of Media Services, Bureau of Public Affairs. Washington, DC: US Government Printing Office, 1970.
- . The Rogers Plan. http://en.wikisource.org/wiki/Rogers\_Plan.

Ross, Dennis (1949–)

Dennis Ross is a controversial US diplomat with close ties to Israel and a history of pushing hard-line policies toward IRAN. He served as director of the State Department’s Policy Planning Office during the GEORGE H. W. BUSH administration, the Special Middle East Coordinator under President BILL CLINTON, and as a special adviser for the Persian Gulf and Southwest Asia (which includes Iran) to Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. In the summer of 1993 President Clinton named Ross Special Middle East Envoy, as which he helped facilitate the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT between Israel and the PLO, brokered the HEBRON PROTOCOL in 1997, and facilitated the Israel-Jordan peace treaty. For more than twelve years (1989–2001), Ross played a leading role in shaping US policy on Middle East peace and in dealing directly with the parties in negotiations. He left public service in 2001 and became a director and Ziegler Distinguished Fellow at the pro-Israel think tank WASHINGTON INSTITUTE FOR NEAR EAST POLICY and chairman of the JERUSALEM-based Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.

Ross has also been a prolific author. His publications include Acting with Caution: Middle East Policy Planning in the Second Reagan Administration (Policy Papers #1, Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1985); Reforming the Palestinian Authority: Requirements for Change (Policy Focus #43, Washington Institute for Near East Policy, August 2002); The Missing Peace: The Inside Story of the Fight for Middle East Peace (Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2004); and Myths, Illusions, and Peace: Finding a New Direction for America in the Middle East (Viking, 2009).

Bibliography

Finkelstein, Norman G. "The Camp David II Negotiations: How Dennis Ross Proved the Palestinians Aborted the Peace Process." Journal of Palestine Studies. 36:2 (2007).

Rothschild, Baron Edmond James de (1845–1934)

Baron Edmond Rothschild was a member of the French branch of the Rothschild banking dynasty, though he himself did not pursue banking. He was a collector of fine art, a philanthropist, and a deeply committed Zionist. Rothschild grew up in Paris in the world of the Second Republic and the Second Empire and was a soldier (Garde Nationale) in the first Franco-Prussian war. In 1882 Rothschild cut back on his purchases of art and began to buy LAND in Palestine.

He first became interested in establishing Jewish colonies in Palestine in 1882 on learning of the work being done there by the HOVEVEI ZION movement. When he became aware of the young colonies' need for funds, in particular at Rishon le-Zion, he immediately donated 30,000 francs (around $6,000 at the time) to save the latter. In 1883 he purchased land for the founding of a new settlement, Ekron (later renamed Mazkeret Batya) and also funded Rosh Pina and Zikhron Ya'akov, both founded by Hovevei Zion groups. Eventually, he became known as Ha-Nadiv ha-Yadu'a (the well-known benefactor) and the father of the pre-state Jewish Yishuv. After World War I, he joined the political activity of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION by aiding CHAIM WEIZMANN and NAHUM SOKOLOV.

Although Rothschild was a leading proponent of the Zionist movement and the establishment of a Jewish homeland, in the 1890s he clashed with THEODOR HERZL, the founder of the Zionist movement, on the interpretation of political ZIONISM. He had a similar disagreement with AHAD HA'AM and members of the Hovevei Zion. The result was Rothschild's creation of the JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION and the establishment of twelve settlements under its auspices. Eventually, he articulated an alternative policy to that of the Zionists, promoting industrialization and respect for the Arabs. In 1924 he established the PALESTINE JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION, which acquired more than 125,000 acres (506 square kilometers) of land and set up business ventures.

Rothschild also helped found Israel's wine industry by planting vineyards in the Palestine settlements of Russian Jews who fled pogroms in the 1880s. It is estimated that Rothschild spent over $50 million in supporting settlements in Palestine, where he also financed development of an electric generating station. Although he developed and supported thirty colonies in Palestine and made countless trips to Palestine, his home remained in Paris. During World War I, Rothschild used his international influence to secure FRANCE's agreement to the British BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine, and later to ensure the award of the Mandate for Palestine to the British. The Balfour Declaration (from Sir Arthur James Balfour) was addressed to Baron Lionel Walter Rothschild, who was Edmond's British cousin, the Second Baron Rothschild.

After his death, Israel honored the contributions of Edmond Rothschild. In April 1954, his remains and those of his wife were removed from the French cemetery, where they had been buried twenty years earlier, and transported to Israel aboard a naval frigate. A state funeral was held with former prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION giving the eulogy, following which Rothschild and his wife were reinterred in Ramat Hanadiv Memorial Gardens. In a memorial to Rothschild's Jewish philanthropy, his son bequeathed the funds to construct the building for the Knesset. Israel's 1982 Independence Day coin is dedicated to the memory of Rothschild and marks the centenary of his first projects in Israel.

Bibliography

Agnon, S. Y. Only Yesterday. Translated by Barbara Harshav. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2002.

Blumberg, Arnold. The History of Israel. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1998.

Mendes-Flohr, Paul, and Jehuda Reinharz, eds. The Jew in the Modern World: A Documentary History, 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Morris, Benny. Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881–2001. New York: Vintage, 2001.

Royal Commission

See PEEL COMMISSION

Ruppin, Arthur (1876–1943)

Arthur Ruppin was a sociologist and Zionist settlement leader. He was known as “the father of Zionist settlement” and “the father of Jewish sociology”—titles that reflect his two convergent careers.

Born in GERMANY to a once-affluent family, Ruppin earned a doctorate in law and economics and worked for several years in the judicial system. He also was director of Berlin’s Bureau for Jewish Statistics and DEMOGRAPHY from 1902 to 1907. In 1907 the JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL sent Ruppin to Palestine to assess the possibilities for Zionist settlement. One year later, in 1908, Ruppin immigrated to Palestine, settling in JAFFA. He was appointed director of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION’S PALESTINE LAND DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION, which was responsible for acquiring LAND and establishing Jewish settlements all over the country. In 1925 Ruppin became head of the Zionists’ Land Settlement Department. From this point on, Ruppin labored tirelessly for Jewish settlement. He believed that ZIONISM’S most immediate need was to amass land and, through a variety of urban and rural communities, systematically settle the country as the means of establishing a state. Ruppin’s efforts affirmed the importance of Jewish labor and Jewish settlements and offered official support to the new immigrants.

Ruppin’s interest was in land throughout the country, and he was instrumental in obtaining financial assistance for Ahuzat Bayit (later Tel Aviv), as well as in acquiring land on Mount Carmel, in the Jezreel Valley, and in JERUSALEM. He also promoted a variety of settlement possibilities, including the KIBBUTZ, agricultural farms, and cooperatives. It is in these activities that Ruppin’s background in demography and sociology helped map out the settlement of the pre-state Jewish Yishuv. Although initially a supporter of BRIT SHALOM, which called for a binational state in Palestine, he rejected the idea following the WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES of 1929, insisting thereafter on the need for a single Jewish state. In Ruppin’s opinion, the only practical way to realize this goal rested on the successful acquisition and settlement of land and, after 1929, on TRANSFER of the Palestinians. Ruppin is quoted by Israeli historian Tom Segev in One Palestine, Complete, in a discussion with colleagues: “I do not believe in the transfer of an individual. I believe in the transfer of entire villages.” As early as 1913, Ruppin told a colleague, as reported in Benny Morris’s Righteous Victims, “Land is the most necessary thing for establishing roots in Palestine. Since there are hardly any more arable unsettled lands . . . we are bound in each case . . . to remove the peasants who cultivate the land.” Ruppin, of course, was only one among the majority of Yishuv leaders who advocated transfer.

In 1926 Ruppin joined the faculty of Hebrew University while continuing his work in settling Jewish immigrants, including both the German wave and the Yemenites. He died in Jerusalem.

See also BINATIONALISM; PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948

Bibliography

Bein, Alex, ed. Arthur Ruppin: Memoirs, Diaries, Letters. London: Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1971.

Marcus, Amy Dockser. Jerusalem 1913: The Origins of the Arab-Israeli Conflict. New York: Viking, 2007.

Masalha, Nur. Expulsion of the Palestinians: The Concept of “Transfer” in Zionist Political Thought, 1882–1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.

Morris, Benny. Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881–2001. New York: Vintage, 2001.

Ruppin, Arthur. Agricultural Colonization of the Zionist Organization in Palestine. New York: Hyperion Press, 1975.

———. The Jew in the Modern World: A Documentary History, 2nd ed. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1995.

———. “The Picture in 1907: Address to the Jewish Colonization Society of Vienna, Feb 27, 1908.” Zionism and the History of Israel Online. 2005. www.zionismontheweb.org/Rupin1907.htm.

———. Three Decades of Palestine: Speeches and Papers on the Upbuilding of the Jewish National Home, reprint. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1975.

Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate, 2nd reprint ed. New York: Owl Books, 2001.

Russia

See MOSCOW

Russian Federation

See MOSCOW

---

S

---

Sabeel

Sabeel (The Way) is a nonviolent organization that promotes Palestinian liberation theology in an ecumenical grassroots movement that is based on Christian biblical interpretation. It was founded in 1989 by an ecumenical ad hoc committee of ten Palestinian clergy and lay theologians who wanted to explore ways to foster liberating interpretations of the Bible among the poor and oppressed Palestinian Christians. Sabeel encourages women, men, and youth to discern God's message as their faith connects with the hard realities of their daily life: one of poverty, OCCUPATION, violence, discrimination, and human rights violations. In the context of these difficulties, Sabeel searches for ways to strengthen the faith of Palestinian Christians in Palestine and to promote nonviolent direct action. The Sabeel Liberation Theology Center is located in JERUSALEM, with a branch in NAZARETH. (www.sabeel.org).

See also CHRISTIANITY

Sabra and Shatila Massacre, 1982

On 16–18 September 1982, Lebanese PHALANGE militias massacred Palestinian REFUGEES in the Sabra and Shatila Palestinian refugee camps in the suburbs of Beirut. The Israeli-supported militias were under the direct command of Elie Hobeika and under the observation of Israeli forces then in occupation of Beirut.

On 1 September the evacuation of PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) fighters driven from Beirut by Israel was completed. Two days later, in a clear breach of the cease-fire agreement arranged by US envoy Philip Habib, Israeli forces entered and occupied the city, deploying troops around the refugee camps. The next day, ARIEL SHARON, Israeli defense minister at the time, claimed that 2,000 PLO fighters had remained in Beirut and were hiding in the camps, although Palestinians and Lebanese groups allied with the PLO strongly disputed this allegation. The supervising forces, including the UNITED STATES, did not demand that Israel withdraw, despite the fact that the United States had given written guarantees that it would ensure the protection of the Palestinian civilians of West Beirut after the departure of the PLO. Israel's entry into Beirut also violated its agreements with Muslim forces in Beirut and with SYRIA.

Israeli prime minister MENAHEM BEGIN justified the Israeli occupation of Beirut as “necessary to prevent acts of revenge by the Christians against the Palestinians” and to “maintain order and stability.” However, several days later, Sharon told the Knesset, “Our entry into West Beirut was in order to make war against the INFRASTRUCTURE left by the terrorists.” Once in occupation of the city, the Israeli army then disarmed, as far as they were able, anti-Israeli militias (Sunni, Shi'a, and Druze) and civilians in West Beirut, while leaving the Christian Phalangist militias fully armed.

On 12 September Begin summoned Bashir Gemayel, newly elected president of LEBANON and a close Israeli ally, to Nahariya in northern Israel and strongly urged him to sign a peace treaty with Israel. He also demanded Gemayel's acceptance of a permanent Israeli military presence in southern Lebanon under the control of Major SAAD HADDAD (another Lebanese ally of Israel) and action from Gemayel to attack the Palestinian fighters allegedly hiding in the refugee camps, including Sabra and Shatila. Forced to balance the interests of many competing factions within Lebanon and personally offended by what he considered Begin's high-handed attitude toward him, Gemayel refused Israel's demands to sign a peace treaty or to authorize operations in the refugee camps. On 14 September Gemayel was assassinated in a massive explosion that demolished his headquarters. Palestinian and Muslim leaders denied any responsibility, although Sharon blamed the assassination on Palestinians, which inflamed the existing animosity of the Phalangists toward Palestinians.

Sharon then invited Lebanese Phalangist militia units, trained and equipped by Israel, to enter the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps to “clean out the terrorists.” His instructions to the Phalangists emphasized that the Israeli military was in command of all the forces in the area. Under the Israeli plan, Israeli soldiers would control the perimeters of the refugee camps and provide logistical support while the Phalangists would enter the camps, find the PLO fighters, and hand them over to Israeli forces. By the evening of 15 September, the Israeli military had completely surrounded and sealed off the camps and set up observation posts on the roofs of nearby tall buildings. The next day Israel announced that it controlled all key points in Beirut. Throughout the day, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) met with top Phalangist leaders to arrange the details of the operation. For the next two nights, from nightfall until late into the night, the Israeli military fired illuminating flares above the camps to assist the militia. At 6:00 P.M. on the evening of 16 September 1982, a unit of 150 Phalangists led by Elie Hobeika, including, according to Saad Haddad, some SOUTH LEBANON ARMY fighters, entered the camps. The militiamen were armed with guns, knives, and hatchets, and, for the next thirty-six to forty-eight hours, the Phalangists massacred the inhabitants of the refugee camps while the Israeli military guarded the exits and continued to provide illumination flares. At 8:00 P.M., a Phalangist officer reported 300 killings, including civilians, to the Israeli command post, and further reports of killings followed through the night. Some of the reports were forwarded to the Israeli government in JERUSALEM and were seen by a number of Israel’s senior officials.

At one point, a militiaman’s radioed question to Hobeika about what to do with the women and children in the refugee camp was overheard by an Israeli officer, who heard Hobeika reply. “This is the last time you’re going to ask me a question like that; you know exactly what to do.” In the background, Phalangist troops were reportedly heard laughing. The Israeli officer reported this to his superior, General Amos Yaron, who warned Hobeika against hurting civilians but took no further action. The Kahan Commission, which later investigated the massacres, cited Lieutenant Avi Grabowsky as having witnessed the murder of five women and children. He told his battalion commander, who replied, “We know, it’s not to our liking, and don’t interfere.” A Visnews cameraman filmed Israeli soldiers around the camps turning back refugees attempting to flee the massacre. Throughout the massacre, Phalangist militia regularly returned to Israeli units for food, water, and ammunition. The Israeli chief of staff and the Phalangist staff held a meeting later in the afternoon. According to the Kahan Commission’s report, the chief of staff concluded that the Phalange should “continue action, mopping up the empty camps south of the Fakhani neighborhood until tomorrow at 5:00 a.m., at which time they must stop their action due to American pressure.” He claimed that he had “no feeling that something irregular had occurred or was about to occur in the camps.” At this meeting, he also agreed to provide the militia with a tractor, supposedly to demolish buildings.

On Friday, 17 September, while the camps still were sealed, a few independent observers managed to enter. Among them were a Norwegian journalist and a Norwegian diplomat, Ane-Karine Arvesen, who observed Phalangists during their cleanup operations, “removing dead bodies from destroyed houses in the Shatila camp.” The Phalangists did not exit the camps at 5:00 A.M. on Saturday as ordered but forced the remaining survivors to march out of the camps, randomly killing individuals, and sending others to the stadium for interrogations—this went on for the entire day. The militia finally left the camps at 8:00 A.M. on 18 September. The first foreign journalists allowed into the camps at 9:00 A.M. found hundreds of bodies scattered about the camp, many of them mutilated. The first official news of the massacre was broadcast around noon and provoked outrage around the world. On 16 December 1982, the UNITED NATIONS General Assembly condemned the massacre and declared it an act of genocide. No PLO fighters were handed over to Israeli forces, and no weapons were found in the camps. Documents presented in the 2001 Belgian war crimes lawsuit against Sharon allegedly show that the claim about the presence of the PLO fighters in the camps was a cover story prepared by Israel. However, the case was dismissed in 2002, and no documents from the suit were made public.

The exact numbers of victims of the massacre are hard to pin down because of the chaotic conditions during and after the massacre, burials, and initial victim counting by several international agencies, as well as by the fact that it is a politically sensitive issue, even to the present day. The number of civilian deaths ranges from the Kahan Commission’s estimate of 460; to IDF figures of 700 to 800; to 1,300 by a Lebanese analyst; and, finally, to Robert Fisk, one of the first journalists to visit the scene, who quotes unnamed Phalangist officers as saying that 2,000 died.

On 28 September the Israeli government established a commission of inquiry led by former ISRAELI SUPREME COURT justice Yitzhak Kahan. The report stated that there was no evidence that Israeli units took direct part in the massacre and that it was the "direct responsibility of Phalangists." It did, however, regard Israel as bearing "indirect responsibility." The KAHAN COMMISSION REPORT provides some answers to what happened, although other inquiries are often at odds with major findings of the report. Critics of the Kahan Report pointed to the fact that Israel was investigating itself and argued that the report amounted to a whitewash. For instance, Shimon Lehrer, in the Israeli newspaper Ha'ikar Hehaser, demonstrated that Kahan's conclusions were untenable and argued that the defense minister and chief of staff should have faced twenty-year jail sentences for premeditated murder under Israeli law. Some commentators, such as Fisk, suggested that Israel could have prevented the massacre, while others refuted that there were any PLO members in the camps. On 14 February 1983, Der Spiegel (the German magazine) carried an interview with one of the Phalangists who participated in the massacre and said that Israeli soldiers fought along with the Phalangists and shelled the camp.

In 2005, Lebanese film directors made a documentary about Sabra and Shatila, and, for the first time, it told the story of the slaughter through the voices of the killers. In Massaker, six former Christian Phalange militiamen tell of their training by Israeli allies and recount the events of 16–18 September 1982. The ninety-minute documentary includes militiamen boasting about their killing skills with AK-47 assault rifles and butchers' knives. One of the most controversial revelations in the film is the alleged extent of Israeli involvement in the preparation and execution of the operation, down to providing body bags before the killings began. "You'll be needing these," one of the militiamen is told by an Israeli officer.

See also KAHAN COMMISSION REPORT; LEBANON WAR; ARIEL SHARON

Bibliography

ABC News. "Close Up: Beirut Massacres." 7 January 1983.

- BBC World News*. "The Accused." Transcript. BBC-1 17 June 2001.
- Campagna, Joel. "The Usual Suspects." World Press Review. 49:4 (2002).
- Castle, Stephen. "Atrocity Survivors Ask Belgian Court to Indict Sharon." Palestine Media Watch. 19 June 2001.
- Claremont Research and Publications. The Beirut Massacre: Press Profile. New York: Claremont Research and Publications, 1984.
- Genet, Jean. "Four Hours in Shatila." Journal of Palestine Studies. 12:3 (1983).
- Gilmore, Inigo. "Massaker." The Observer (UK). 30 October 2005.
- Hamdan, Amal. "Remembering Sabra and Shatila." Al Jazeera. 16 September 2003.
- al-Hout, Bayan Nuwayhed. Sabra and Shatila: September 1982. London: Pluto Press, 2004.
- Israel, Government of. Kahan Commission Report. Jerusalem. 1982.
- Jansen, Michael. The Battle of Beirut: Why Israel Invaded Lebanon. London: Zed Books, 1982.
- Kapeliouk, Amnon. Sabra & Shatila: Inquiry into a Massacre. Translated and edited by Khalil Jehshan. Paris: Seuil, 1982.
- Lamb, Franklyn P., ed. Israel's War in Lebanon: Eyewitness Chronicles of the Invasion and Occupation. Boston: South End Press, 1984.
- Mason, Barnaby. "Analysis: 'War Crimes' on the West Bank." BBC World News. 17 April 2002.
- Schiff, Ze'ev, and Ehud Ya'ari. Israel's Lebanon War. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984.
- Al-Shaikh, Zakaria. "Sabra and Shatila 1982: Resisting the Massacre." Journal of Palestine Studies. 14 (Autumn 1984).
- Shaoul, Jean. "Sharon's War Crimes in Lebanon: The Record." World Socialist. 25 February 2002. <http://www.wsws.org>.
- Tolworthy, Chris. "Sabra and Shatila Massacres—Why Do We Ignore Them?" Global Issues. March 2002.
- United Nations General Assembly, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. The Situation in the Middle East. 37/123. 16 December 1982.

Safed

Safed is a picturesque town in the hills of eastern Galilee and historically the most important town in the northern region of Palestine. At an elevation of 2,790 feet (850 meters), Safed is Israel's highest town and probably its coldest. Safad did not become an important center of Jewish life until the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. It is not mentioned in the Torah. In 1948, Zionist militia forced most of the town's Arab residents to flee, and today it is largely Jewish. Founded in the second century during Roman times, Safed has a strategic and economic significance that resulted from its location along crucial trade and communications lines between SYRIA and EGYPT. Safed came under Muslim rule in the seventh century, was conquered by the Crusaders, was retaken by the Muslim dynasties in the late thirteenth century, fell to the OTTOMAN EMPIRE under Selim I, and was conquered by Napoleon Bonaparte for a short time. After 1918, Great Britain was the dominant power.

In addition to Muslims and probably some Christians, Safed had a small Jewish community, which grew considerably after 1492 and the expulsion of the Jews from Spain. Many prominent rabbis found their way to Safed, which became a center of Jewish mysticism, known as Kabbalah. The influx of SEPHARDI Jews made Safed a center for Jewish learning as well as a regional center for Arab merchants throughout the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Economic activity centered on trade, the production of wool and cotton textiles, and, because of its summer climate, tourism. A plague in 1742 followed by an earthquake in 1769 led to a drastic decline in the Jewish community in Safed, leaving only seven families at its nadir. Although the Arab community suffered from these disasters as well, it gradually reconstituted itself, and, from then until 1948, Safed was an overwhelmingly Arab town. During the nineteenth century, Safed was again struck with earthquakes and plagues, as well as by one incident of intercommunal violence. With the coming of ZIONISM in the twentieth century, there were occasional periods of tension in Safed, but overall Arab-Jewish relations were cordial. However, during the 1929 WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES, which began in JERUSALEM and escalated into serious violence in HEBRON, Safed did not escape the hostilities. In the western district of the town, where most Jews lived, eighteen were killed and the area was sacked.

In 1948, Safad had a population of some 13,300, including 2,000 Jews. The city was home to eight mosques, according to the UN CONCILIATION COMMISSION FOR PALESTINE, all of which were destroyed in the war. The Arab Association for Human Rights (AAHR) reported in December 2004 that some 250 non-Jewish places of worship had been destroyed during or since the 1948 WAR, or had been made inaccessible to Arab Israelis.

Between 30 April and 10 May 1948, some 10,000 of Safed's Palestinian residents fled as a result of Operation Yiftah by the elite Zionist fighting force PALMAH. A soldier who took part in the conquest of Safed wrote of his experience: "One of the Palmah commanders, YIGAL ALLON, convinced us that winning Safed was the key to conquering the rest of the Galilee, and we became determined to do so. We first tried to storm the Citadel at the top of the mountain, but we were totally unsuccessful. We also attacked the Police station—the building is still riddled with bullet holes to this day. But then one rainy night we made overwhelmingly effective use of our Davidka mortars which had always seemed to cause much more noise than actual damage. This time, however, it served to shock the Arab fighters immensely. When dawn broke on 10 May, the Palmah lifted the siege. We had forced the Arabs to flee from Safed and we celebrated our control of the town." After the war, Israel built the Davidka Monument in the central area of the city to commemorate the dispossession of Safed's Palestinians.

Most of the refugees who fled from Safed went to Beirut or Damascus. One of the more well-known is MAHMUD ABBAS, who was elected president of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY in 2006. In 2008 the population of Safed was about 32,000, with almost no Palestinians living in this once overwhelmingly Arab town.

See also PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Abbassi, Mustapha. Safad during the British Mandate Period, 1917–1948: A Social and Political Study. Beirut, Lebanon: The Institute for Palestine Studies; and Ramallah: Muwatin—The Palestinian Institute for the Study of Democracy and Institute of Jerusalem Studies, 2005.
- Fischbach, Michael R. "Safed." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- "Safed: A Battle of Living History." World Trek. 15 January 2000. www.worldtrek.org/odyssey/mideast/011500/011500kevsafed.html.
- Sailhan, Michel. "New Palestinian Leader Still Persona Non-Grata in Home Town: Inhabitants Remain Suspicious of Former Resistance Leader." Agence France Presse. 14 January 2005. www.dailystar.com.lb.

Safe Passage

See RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT II

Safiyya, Afif (1950–)

Afif Safiyya is a Palestinian academic and diplomat. Born in JERUSALEM to a Roman Catholic family, he studied in FRANCE and Belgium, receiving an M.A. from the Institute of National Politics in Paris. Safiyya was a visiting scholar at Harvard University from 1985 to 1987 and was the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) representative to the Netherlands from 1987 to 1990. From 1990 to 2005, he served as the PLO general delegate to the United Kingdom and to the Holy See. In October 2005, Safiyya became the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY'S ambassador to the UNITED STATES. Four years later, disillusioned by the hostility and ostracism of official Washington, he requested a transfer and was named the PNA's ambassador to the SOVIET UNION. However, on 25 March 2009, PNA president MAHMUD ABBAS arbitrarily fired Safiyya for attending a rally, organized by Hamas, in Moscow in support of the Palestinians under siege during Israel's OPERATION CAST LEAD.

The report of Safiyya's attendance was written by a so-called security adviser, dispatched to the PNA embassy in Moscow without Safiyya's knowledge, apparently to monitor the ambassador. The PNA's security experts are trained and funded by the United States and EUROPEAN UNION countries. Safiyya, in dismay, explained that he had not attended the rally as a supporter of the Hamas movement, but in his capacity as PNA ambassador to Russia, tasked with promoting the Palestinian cause abroad. In the speech he presented during the rally, Safiyya praised the resilience of the people of the GAZA STRIP in their resistance against the Israeli OCCUPATION.

Ha'aretz, the Jerusalem newspaper, wrote of him: "Afif Safiyya is considered the most articulate Palestinian diplomat in Europe, and possibly the world. The most experienced speakers the foreign ministry can muster have been sent to face off against him in international conferences and on BBC talk shows and they have run into difficulty opposite the Jerusalem-born Palestinian with the rich vocabulary and smooth delivery."

When Pope John Paul II visited the Holy Land in 2000, many criticized him for not addressing the issue of sovereignty over the holy city of Jerusalem. Safiyya, on the other hand, said that he was not disappointed because the VATICAN had signed a document with the PLO regarding Jerusalem in February and thus had probably decided it did not need to say anything more on the matter. Safiyya added that Palestinians should also take heart from the pope's visit to the al-Dheisheh refugee camp near BETHLEHEM, which is home to 10,000 Palestinian REFUGEES. There, the pope called on political leaders in the Middle East and the international community to work toward a solution to the Palestinian refugee problem, saying that the refugees had an "inalienable right" to justice. Through such actions, Safiyya said, the pope had clearly demonstrated the Vatican's support for the Palestinians' right to live in their own independent homeland.

Bibliography

- Eldar, Akiva. "Safiyya: The Palestinian Diplomat." Ha'aretz. 22 July 2002.
- "Israelis and Palestinians Pay Tribute to Pope's Pilgrimage to Holy Land." Christianity Today Magazine: Ecumenical News International. 27 March 2000.
- Kattan, Victor. "Palestinian Delegate to the UK and the Holy See: An Interview with Afif Safieh." CounterPunch. 24 September 2004.

Said, Edward W. (1933–2003)

Edward Said, a Palestinian American, was one of the twentieth century's greatest thinkers, a unique individual who has left an indelible legacy in numerous fields and across many disciplines. He was an internationally renowned literary and cultural critic, a philosopher of history, an accomplished pianist, a music critic, a Middle East specialist, a political theorist, a political activist, and a most deeply humane voice of conscience. His career combined distinguished academic achievements with passionate political interventions on behalf of the Palestinian and Arab peoples.

Born in JERUSALEM, Said, together with his family, was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and settled in Cairo. He came to the UNITED STATES in 1951 to attend college, receiving a B.A. from Princeton and a Ph.D. in comparative literature from Harvard. Said began his academic career as an assistant professor at Columbia University, where he taught English and comparative literature until his death. In 1990 he was appointed university professor, the highest academic rank bestowed by the institution. Said authored more than a dozen books and over 250 articles and presented at least fifty endowed lectures. His writings appeared in twenty-six languages in the most prestigious and widely read periodicals, newspapers, and scholarly journals. In addition to his career at Columbia, Said was a visiting professor at Yale, Harvard, and Johns Hopkins, as well as a fellow at numerous centers of learning and advanced studies around the world. He was general editor of a book series at Harvard University Press titled Convergences: Inventories of the Present. He also wrote a regular music column for the Nation and a regular column for Al-Ahram in Cairo.

Together with a few colleagues, Said was responsible for creating the basis for postcolonial studies as a new discipline. He provided the linguistic and methodological tools to facilitate an understanding of the nature of imperialism and its impact on colonial societies. His articulation of the relationship between culture and power marks another of his major contributions to knowledge. In both Orientalism (1978) and Culture and Imperialism (1993), he demonstrated how the concept of empire was ever present in the literary works of the age, but that a falsely claimed “knowledge” of the “orient” created a perspective that enabled the West to exercise power over the East, spreading its hegemony in ways that distorted and fragmented the political development of colonial societies. Indeed, perhaps Said’s most important intellectual contribution was Orientalism, which analyzed the set of racist ideas that the West has used to characterize and dominate the Middle East and Asia since the nineteenth century.

Another of Said’s intellectual contributions was demonstrating how embedded the justification for empire building was in the Western cultural imagination and how even today the imperial legacy colors relations at all levels between the West and the formerly colonized world. He posited that all cultures are interdependent; thus the West and its former subjects must recognize that the true human community is global. Said’s stature as one of the world’s leading literary theorists is based on works such as Joseph Conrad and the Fiction of Autobiography (1966) and The World, the Text, and the Critic (1993). In them he demonstrated that literature can only be understood in its historical and social context.

Despite Said’s stature in the scholarly world—the New York Times once described him as “one of the most influential literary and cultural critics in the world”—he did not detach himself from the reality of politics, especially Palestinian politics.

Said served for many years on the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) parliament-in-exile, and he advocated for the Palestinian cause in every possible way, such as by actively participating in the Arab American Association of University Professors as well as in conferences and meetings on the Palestinian issue. His The Question of Palestine (1979) remains the best introduction to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict available.

Said’s message was universal, and he typically spoke with empathy for Jewish suffering and Palestinian misery at the same time. Like Gandhi, his opposition to the ZIONISM project and his adherence to the “requirements of justice” did not stand in contradiction to an expressed sympathy for “the life long persecution of the Jews.” The reality of Said’s universal humanism was underscored by his friendship with the distinguished pianist and chief conductor for life of the Staatskapelle Berlin, Israeli-Argentinean Daniel Barenboim. Together, in 1988, Barenboim and Said organized and institutionalized the training of young Arab and Israeli musicians, and their East-West Divan Workshop continues to retain its musical vibrancy, as well as being a living testament to a joint struggle for equality as the alternative to apartheid and perpetual conflict.

Despite Said’s lifelong commitment to the Palestinian cause, when PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT opted for the open-ended OSLO ACCORDS and abandoned the Palestinian consensus, Said publicly broke with him, resigned from the PNC, and directed his scathing critiques at the accords and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY that they created. With the death of the TWO-STATE SOLUTION, Said began to realize that the Oslo Accords’ architects had inadvertently set the stage for a single nonsectarian state in all of Palestine. From that moment onward, he became a principal voice for a pluralist existence in historic Palestine, for a single, secular, democratic republic based on justice and equality for both Jews and Arabs. Said’s long battle against leukemia never dulled his analytic prowess or productivity, nor did it deter him from writing, traveling, and contributing. His commitment to the universal values that govern just societies has been the hallmark of his scholarship and activism. Said never succumbed to accommodation with those in power but remained true to his ideals and principles.

Bibliography

- Said, Edward W. Blaming the Victims. London: Verso, 1988.
- . Culture and Imperialism. New York: Alfred Knopf, 1993.
- . End of the Peace Process: Oslo and After. New York: Pantheon, 2000.
- . Orientalism. New York: Pantheon, 1978.
- . Peace and Its Discontents: Essays on Palestine in the Middle East Peace Process. New York: Vintage, 1995.
- . Power, Politics, and Culture. London: Bloomsbury Publishing, 2004.
- . The World, the Text and the Critic. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.

—Naseer H. Aruri

Sa'iqa

Sa'iqa (Thunderbolt, Vanguard of Popular Liberation War Organization) was a Syrian-controlled, Palestinian guerrilla force established in 1968, mostly by Syrian BA'ATHIST officers and officials, and represented one aspect of SYRIA's attempt to influence Palestinian politics. Subsequently, it merged with a small group, the Palestine Popular Liberation Front, to form the secular, leftist Palestinian nationalist VANGUARDS OF THE POPULAR LIBERATION WAR Organization. Syria required all Sa'iqa members to undergo military training and encouraged them to serve in guerrilla bases. Sa'iqa had seats on the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL and initially worked closely with FATAH as well as hosting units of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY—though under Syrian control. However, it fought alongside Syria in the Lebanese civil war and against the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION. Moreover, in the 1983 Palestinian civil war, Sa'iqa again fought against Fatah. Nevertheless, it remained nominally part of the PLO and was considered a pragmatic, or nonideological, group, though it remained under Syrian sponsorship. It never had many supporters, and none in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. The group has played no role in Palestinian politics since the OSLO ACCORDS of 1993.

See also SYRIA

Bibliography

- Ma'oz, Moshe, and Avner Yaniv, eds. Syria under Asad: Domestic Constraints and Regional Risks. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1986.

Muslih, Muhammad. "Syria." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.

Sayigh, Yasid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

Seale, Patrick. Asad: The Struggle for the Middle East. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.

Al-Sakakini, Khalil (1878–1953)

Khalil al-Sakakini was a Palestinian essayist and innovative educator, perhaps the most important Palestinian intellectual of his time, who was responsible for the introduction of a new curriculum and teaching methodology in Palestine education. Born in JERUSALEM to a Greek Orthodox family, he was educated in missionary schools, including the Greek Orthodox School, the Christian Mission Society College, and the Zion English College, where he studied literature. As a young man, al-Sakakini went to the UNITED STATES to seek his fortune, but was disappointed with the opportunities available to him. During his nine-month stay in the United States, he translated and wrote for Arabic literary magazines on the East Coast and did translations for Professor Richard Gottheil at Columbia University. He supported himself by teaching Arabic and working in a Maine factory and as a street vendor. Upon his return to Palestine in 1908, he worked as a journalist for the Jerusalem newspaper Al Asmai' and taught Arabic at the renowned Jerusalem Salahiyya School, as well as to expatriates at the American Colony. In 1909 he founded the Dusturiyya School, which became known for its humane, tolerant, imaginative, democratic, broad-minded, and mind-broadening educational doctrines and for its advocacy of Arab nationalism. He pioneered a system at Dusturiyya that he was to use later: there were no grades, prizes, or punishments for students, and there was an emphasis on music, education, and athletics. This was the first school in Palestine to admit pupils regardless of sect, religion, or ethnic background.

Sakakini led a movement to reform and Arabize what he saw as a corrupt GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH of Jerusalem and wrote a pamphlet in 1913 titled "The Orthodox Renaissance in Palestine," which led to his excommunication. Ottoman authorities arrested him in 1917 and jailed him in Damascus for sheltering a Jewish-

Polish immigrant who was (unbeknownst to al-Sakakini) a US spy. After his release in late 1918, Sakakini went to work for the British Educational Authority of Palestine in Jerusalem and was appointed head of the Jerusalem Teachers' College. He went on to become inspector of education for Palestine, a post he held for twelve years, until his resignation in protest of the British appointment of the Jewish HERBERT SAMUEL as high commissioner in Palestine. At the same time, he wrote political commentaries for the newspapers al Muqataf, al Hilal, and al Siyassa al Usbu'iyya; composed a number of patriotic poems; and spoke at political rallies. In 1925 Sakakini founded the Wataniyya School; in 1926 he worked as a school principal in Cairo; and when he returned he became an education inspector. This allowed him to bring his educational philosophy to rural villages. In 1938 he founded the an-Nahda College in Jerusalem.

In May 1934 Sakakini began to invest much of his time, resources, and energy in building a new home in the Katamon neighborhood of Jerusalem. The project took three years to complete.

Sakakini joined the ranks of the ARAB REVOLT (1936–1939) against the British Occupation and Zionist settlement of Palestine, and he wrote its anthem. During the 1948 WAR, shells fell near his home every night, and his family was in constant danger. This, combined with the psychological shock of the recent massacre by Zionist militias at the Arab village of DEIR YASSIN (an hour's walk from his home), motivated Sakakini to flee his beloved home and city with his family and become a REFUGEE in EGYPT. Katamon later became part of West Jerusalem and his house was confiscated and given to a Jewish immigrant family. Sakakini's wife, Sultana, died in October 1939, and he lived in consummate grief ever after, writing a number of poems eulogizing her.

Throughout his life Sakakini embraced European culture and consistently expressed humanistic ideas. His business card read: "Khalil Sakakini: human being, God willing." At the same time, he defined himself first and foremost as an Arab, and he is hailed as one of the founding fathers of Arab nationalism in the region. He was an advocate of pan-Arabism and envisaged Palestine united with Syria. He saw ZIONISM as a great threat and believed that the Jewish right to the LAND had expired while the Arab right was "a living one."

He supported the Arab resistance during the Arab Revolt, although he was also concerned about the rebellion's violence. He wrote: "I feel the pain of the troubles, whether they fall on Arabs or on the English or on the Jews. For that reason you will sometimes find me on the side of the Arabs, at other times on the side of the English, and still other times on the side of the Jews. And if there were animals who suffered from even a faint whiff of these troubles, I would sometimes be on the side of the animals."

Khalil Sakakini left twelve publications in his name, including educational works; poetry collections; literary, ethical, and political essays; and a journal. He published more than a dozen books of essays, including Mutala'at fi al-Lughawa al-Adab (Readings in Language and Literature, 1925) and the two-volume work Ma Tayassar (What's Available, 1943–1946). His most endearing writings, however, are his letters to his son, Sari, when the latter was in college; these are collected in Sari (1935). His book on the death of his wife, Li-Dhikraki (In Memory of You, 1940), and his own highly revealing memoir, Kadha Ana, Ya Duniya (Such Am I, Oh World, 1955), were published posthumously by his daughters. Over seven books and essays have been published about Sakakini, and a street and school in Jerusalem, the Jazzar's mosque library in ACRE, and a Cairo street have been named after him. His papers are now at the Hebrew University. In Ramallah, the Khalil Sakakini Cultural Centre Foundation, founded in 1996, is dedicated to the promotion of arts and culture in Palestine.

See also OTTOMAN EMPIRE; PALESTINIAN IDENTITY; PALESTINIAN SOCIETY, PRE-1948

Bibliography

- Baransi, Salih. "Oral History: The Story of a Palestinian under Occupation." Journal of Palestine Studies. 11:1 (1981).
- Davis, Rochelle. "Commemorating Education: Recollections of the Arab College in Jerusalem, 1918–1948." Comparative Studies of South Asia, Africa and the Middle East. 23:1–2 (2003).
- Al-Sakakini, Khalil. "Diary Excerpts: Who Will Listen to Me Now?" Al-Ahram (Cairo). n.d. http://weekly.ahram.org.eg/1998/1948/369\_skn.htm.
- . "Khalil al-Sakakini's Ottoman Prison Diaries (1917–1918)." Jerusalem Quarterly. July 2004. http://www.jerusalemquarterly.org/images/ArticlesPdf/20\_khalil%20sakakeni.pdf.

Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.

Saladin/Salah al-Din (ca. 1138–1193)

Saladin, or Salah al-Din Yusuf ibn Ayyub, was a Kurdish Muslim who became the sultan of EGYPT and SYRIA. He led the Muslims against the Franks and other European Crusaders and eventually recaptured Palestine from the Crusader Kingdom of JERUSALEM after his victory in the Battle of Hattin. As such, he is a revered figure in Kurdish, Arab, Persian, Turkish, and Muslim culture. His chivalrous behavior was noted by Christian chroniclers, and despite being the nemesis of the Crusaders, he won the respect of many of them, including Richard the Lionheart. At the height of his power, Saladin ruled over Egypt, Syria, IRAQ, the Hejaz (western Arabia), and Yemen. In 1171, he proclaimed himself Sultan of Egypt after dissolving the Shi'a Fatimid Caliphate and subsequently established the Ayyubid Sunni Muslim dynasty that was centered in Cairo and Damascus and ruled much of the Middle East, including North Africa, during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries CE. Its power was gradually sapped by the Mongols, and in 1342 the last Ayyubid ruler was deposed. During their relatively short-lived tenure, the Ayyubids ushered in an era of economic prosperity in the lands they ruled, and the facilities and patronage they provided led to a resurgence in intellectual activity in the Islamic world. This period was also marked by an Ayyubid process of vigorously strengthening Sunni Muslim dominance in the region by constructing numerous madrasas (Islamic schools) in their major cities.

Bibliography

- Gibb, Sir Hamilton. The Life of Saladin, 2nd ed. London: Saqi Books, 2006.
- Lane-Poole, Stanley. Saladin: All-Powerful Sultan and the Uniter of Islam. London: Cooper Square Press, 2002.

Salamah, 'Ali Hasan (1940–1979)

'Ali Hasan Salamah (Abu Ali Hasan), called the "Red Prince" for his flamboyant, Western lifestyle, was the chief of operations for the Palestinian BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION, which was responsible for the massacre of Israeli athletes at the MUNICH OLYMPICS in 1972 and other attacks. A confidant of PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman YASIR ARAFAT, Salamah was a commander of FORCE 17 (Arafat's personal security force) and the PLO/FATAH's intermediary with the UNITED STATES in Beirut from 1970 until his death at the hands of Israeli agents. As such, he personally provided protection to US diplomats, CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY (CIA) agents, and others.

Salamah was born in Qula near LYDDA, where his wealthy, businessman father, Shaykh Hassan Salamah, had fought the Zionists, first as a member of ABD AL-QADIR AL-HUSAYNI's Jihad al-Muqaddas (HOLY WAR ARMY) in 1934; then as commander during the 1936–1939 ARAB REVOLT in the Lydda district; and, in 1938, as regional commander of the bureau of the Arab Revolt in Palestine. During the 1948 WAR, the elder Salamah was leader of a resistance group acting in the Lydda-RAMLA area of the country and was killed by Israeli snipers in Ras al-Ein (Ramla) in June 1948. 'Ali Hasan was educated in GERMANY, where he spent considerable time. Although he always felt that he had to live up to his father's heroism, he was a playboy who liked fancy clothes, cars, parties, and women. Shortly before his death, he married a former Miss Universe, a Lebanese Christian named Georgina Rizak.

In 1968 Arafat sent Salamah to EGYPT for training in Fatah commando operations and intelligence work, and later he became head of Fatah security agencies. In 1971, after losing his seat on the Fatah Revolutionary Council due to intelligence failures, he spectacularly rehabilitated himself by masterminding the assassination of Jordanian prime minister Wasfi Tal on 28 November. He then set about recruiting cadres for his cause, and quickly followed the Tal operation by wounding the Jordanian ambassador to London in an attack on 15 December. On 8 February Black September bombed a Dutch gas company and a German electronics company that were accused of cooperating with Israel. Salamah organized numerous other attacks, including the 1972 hijacking of Sabena flight 572 to Tel Aviv and the killing of twenty-seven tourists at Israel's Lod airport. But after the Munich Olympics massacre, in which fifteen people were killed, including nine Israeli athletes, he was the first of those involved to renounce international TERRORISM.

As head of Force 17, Salamah was Arafat's contact with the US Embassy in Beirut and with the CIA. During Arafat's persistent efforts to open a dialogue with the United States and in the context of the chaos in West Beirut after civil war erupted in 1975, Fatah assumed responsibility for the protection of US diplomats. Salamah's men guarded Americans and other foreigners as the US Sixth Fleet evacuated them from a West Beirut seaside swimming club on 20 June 1976. Not long before Salamah's death, a grateful CIA agent took him to Florida's Walt Disney World, a place he had always wanted to visit. This uniquely American gesture compounded Arafat's bitterness and sense of betrayal when Israel killed Salamah.

David Ignatius reported in the Wall Street Journal that Salamah was "a backdoor channel between the US and the PLO" and that he furnished senior US diplomats, including Secretary of State HENRY KISSINGER, with tips about assassinations planned by radical Palestinian and other terrorist groups. Salamah is believed to have supplied similar information to security organizations in West Germany, Italy, and Japan to demonstrate that Fatah had gone out of the terror business and become a valid diplomatic interlocutor.

In his memoirs, Kissinger reveals that Arafat initiated an attempt at dialogue in the aftermath of the 1973 Middle East war. Kissinger's secret envoy, Vernon Walters, met with an unnamed Arafat confidant—almost certainly Salamah—in Rabat, Morocco, on 3 November "to gain time and to prevent radical assaults on the early peace process." "Afterwards," Kissinger continues, "attacks on Americans—at least by Arafat's faction of the PLO—ceased." Kissinger made a point of having key Arabs and Israelis briefed on the clandestine PLO encounter. In the ensuing peace talks in 1974 and 1975, Israel extracted a pledge from the United States not to negotiate with the PLO until the PLO recognized Israel's right to exist, and PLO-US contacts ceased.

It is reasonable to assume that Israel was unhappy about this back channel. When Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN came to power in 1977, President JIMMY CARTER was already on record as favoring "a homeland provided for the Palestinian refugees who have suffered for many, many years." Moreover, Carter had outraged Israelis by meeting with Syrian president Hafiz al-Asad on the eve of the election that brought Begin to office. The MOSSAD, Israel's intelligence agency, had supposedly ended its TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS campaign against Black September terrorists in 1973 after a botched operation in which Israeli agents were arrested in Lillehammer, NORWAY, for killing an innocent Moroccan waiter whom they mistook for Salamah. However, the Begin government revived plans to assassinate Salamah, and he was blown up in his car as it passed a booby-trapped parked Volkswagen in West Beirut on 22 January 1979. Israel said it was a revenge killing, but it is more likely that the Salamah killing was intended to disrupt Fatah's fitful secret dialogue with the United States.

Bibliography

- Bar Zohar, Michael, and Eitan Haber. The Quest for the Red Prince: Israel's Relentless Manhunt for One of the World's Deadliest and Most Wanted Arab Terrorists. Guilford, CT: Lyons Press, 2002.
- Cooley, John K. Black September Green March: The Story of the Palestinian Arabs. London: Frank Cass, 1973.
- Hunter, Thomas B. "Wrath of God: The Israeli Response to the 1972 Munich Olympic Massacre." Journal of Counterterrorism and Security International. 7:4 (2001).
- Jonas, George. Vengeance: The True Story of an Israeli Counter-Terrorist Team. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984.
- Kissinger, Henry A. The White House Years. New York: Little, Brown, 1979.
- . Years of Upheaval. New York: Little, Brown, 1982.
- Markham, James M. "Life and Death of a Terrorist." Review of The Quest for the Red Prince: Israel's Relentless Manhunt for One of the World's Deadliest and Most Wanted Arab Terrorists, by Michael Bar Zohar and Eitan Haber. New York Times. 16 October 1997.
- Ostrovsky, Victor. The Other Side of Deception: A Rogue Agent Exposes the Mossad's Secret Agenda. New York: HarperCollins, 1994.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Institute for Palestine Studies Series. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Tinnin, David B. The Hit Team. New York: Little, Brown, 1976.

Salih, Nimr (ca. 1928–1991)

Nimr Salih (Abu Salih) was a leading FATAH party leftist. Born in LYDDA, Salih was dispossessed with his family in the 1948 WAR, becoming a REFUGEE. For a time, he was the head of political guidance within the Fatah general command. PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman YASIR

ARAFAT later appointed Salih head of the Fatah militia in JORDAN, where he began to form a power base of his own. Although the top echelons of the PLO warned him in 1968 not to sow dissent within Jordan, they subsequently dismissed him because Jordan perceived Salih as a subversive.

In September 1971 Salih was elected to the Fatah Central Committee, and he assumed overall responsibility for SYRIA and LEBANON after the death of Walid Nimr. Although he was initially in general alignment with Arafat's policies, he began to work with leftist figures within Fatah to form a new independent faction. In October 1973, Salih argued for a role for the SOVIET UNION in the Palestinian struggle and became the leader of the "Soviet group," forming an alliance with KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad). He supported an anti-Syria position and spoke out against the Palestinian attack on Maronite strongholds in early 1976 in the Lebanese civil war. He also backed Soviet intervention in Afghanistan in 1979, causing a rift between the PLO and SAUDI ARABIA.

Salih condemned the FAHD PLAN and REAGAN for peace and denounced Arafat in November 1982 for supporting the FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE and for his cooperation with Jordan in general. Following the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon, Abu Salih was one of the prominent Fatah dissidents in the PLO split and civil war, joining the rebel faction known as the NATIONAL ALLIANCE. As a result, Arafat froze his membership in the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE in January 1983 and dropped him from the Fatah slate for the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL. In June 1984, Syria placed Abu Salih under house arrest, where he died of a heart attack in September 1991.

Bibliography

- Jureidini, Paul, and William E. Huzen. The Palestinian Movement in Politics. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1976.
- Quandt, William B., Faud Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Resistance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Sayigh, Yasid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

Salomon, Gershon (ca. 1928–)

Gershon Salomon is the founder and leader of the Temple Mount Faithful and the Land of Israel Faithful Movement, Israeli groups seeking to build the Third Temple on the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF/TEMPLE MOUNT). Born in JERUSALEM, a tenth-generation Jewish Jerusalemite, he fought in every Israeli war since 1948 and was among those who captured the al-Haram ash-Sharif/Temple Mount area during the 1967 WAR. Salomon believes that MOSHE DAYAN, then Israeli defense minister, made a wrong decision in 1967 by giving control of the Temple Mount to the Muslim authorities of Jerusalem and considers it a tragedy that Muslims have control over the al-Haram ash-Sharif. Salomon plans that the Temple Mount Faithful will reverse this situation, expel the Muslims, destroy the DOME OF THE ROCK and AL-AQSA MOSQUE, and rebuild the Third Temple, a re-creation of the biblical Temple of Solomon, in their stead.

During a battle with the Syrians in 1958, Salomon was wounded when an Israeli tank accidentally ran over him and broke his spine. While lying near death on the battlefield, Salomon claims that God told him "he was not yet finished with him," which Salomon understood as a divine call to consecrate himself to building the Third Temple as soon as possible, because the Messiah would come in this generation. By approximately 1985, the Temple Mount Faithful had few followers in Israel, but after Salomon made connections with end-time churches in the UNITED STATES, televangelist Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network and a host of other Christian dispensationalist groups have promoted Salomon and provided the cash for his project.

When he is not devoting himself to the Temple Mount Faithful, Salomon conducts research on the history of the national movement of the Kurdish people and lectures on Middle Eastern studies. He is an officer in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF).

See also THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Gorenberg, Gershom. The End of Days: Fundamentalism and the Struggle for the Temple Mount. New York: Free Press, 2000.
- Hagee, John. The Battle for Jerusalem. Nashville, TN: Thomas Nelson Publishers, 2003.
- Stern, Jessica. Terror in the Name of God: Why Religious Militants Kill, reprint ed. New York: HarperPerennial, 2004.

Samaria

Samaria, the Hebrew word for the northern area of Palestine/Israel, is mainly used in modern times by Jewish religious fundamentalists and secular ultra-nationalists in Israel in a conscious attempt to reassociate the region with biblical times and thus emphasize Israel's relationship with and right to the area. This area is more widely known (together with Judea) as the WEST BANK.

See also JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM; JUDEA; WEST BANK

Samaritans

The Samaritans are a small ethnoreligious group who believe they are descendants of the original Israelites and that everything that evolved in Judaism after the Babylonian exile is heresy. The Samaritans broke with the Jewish majority in the sixth century BCE. They do not recognize Jews outside their own community as authentic Jews. They are strict adherents of the Torah, whose ancient scrolls form the center of their lives, and they scrupulously follow its laws. They accept only the Law of Moses (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy) as authoritative and have a slightly different version of these books than is found in the Torah. They do not recognize the prophets and their writings as divinely inspired. Based on the Samaritan Pentateuch, Samaritans claim that their worship is the true religion of the ancient Israelites, predating the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem. Samaritans believe that the Temple of Yahweh is not on Mount Zion in Jerusalem, but on Mount Gerizim in NABLUS.

As of 1 November 2007, there were 712 Samaritans, half of whom reside in the Israeli settlement of Har Brakha on Mount Gerizim in Nablus, which is sacred to them, and the rest in the city of Holon, just outside Tel Aviv. There are also four Samaritan families residing in Binyamina, Giv'at Ada, Matan, and Ashdod.

Until the 1980s most of the Samaritans resided in the Samaritan town of Nablus below Mount Gerizim. Since then, many have relocated to the settlement on the mountain itself, according to Israel because of the First INTIFADA. Yet relations between the Palestinians of Nablus and the Samaritans have traditionally been quite cordial, and it seems unlikely that any Palestinian would harm them. The PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY granted them passports and designated one seat on the Palestinian Legislative Council for Samaritans. As a small community physically divided between neighbors in a hostile region, Samaritans have been hesitant to overtly take sides in the Arab-Israel conflict, fearing that doing so could lead to negative repercussions; however, Samaritans who live in Holon tend to be more politically aligned with Israel and have to some extent assimilated to the surrounding culture, including speaking modern Hebrew. Samaritans who are Israeli citizens are drafted into the military, along with the Jewish citizens of Israel. Samaritans who continue to live on Mount Gerizim speak Arabic and tend to be quietly sympathetic to the Palestinians. For liturgical purposes, all Samaritans speak Samaritan Hebrew, also known as ancient Hebrew, and Aramaic.

Bibliography

- Anderson, Robert T., and Terry Giles. The Keepers: An Introduction to the History and Culture of the Samaritans. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 2002.
- . Tradition Kept: The Literature of the Samaritans. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 2005.
- Bowman, John, ed. and trans. Samaritan Documents Relating to Their History, Religion and Life. London: Pickwick Publications, 1977.
- Crocker, David W. The Samaritan Way. Atlanta: Chalice Press, 2008.
- Hjelm, Ingrid. Samaritans and Early Judaism: A Literary Analysis. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000.
- Montgomery, James Alan. The Samaritans—The Earliest Jewish Sect: Their History, Theology and Literature. Whitefish, MT: Kessinger Publishing, 2008 [1907].
- Price, Richard. Samaritan. New York: Vintage, 2004.
- Rees, Matt Beynon. The Samaritan's Secret. New York: Soho Press, 2009.
- Stone, Deborah. The Samaritan's Dilemma: Should Government Help Your Neighbor? New York: Nation Books, 2008.

Samuel, Herbert Louis (1870–1963)

Herbert Louis Samuel, the First Viscount Samuel of Mount Carmel and of Toxteth, was a British philosopher and statesman. He was involved in the Zionist politics that resulted in the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine, and was the first high commissioner of the BRITISH MANDATE of Palestine, serving from 1920 to 1925. As such, Samuel was the first Jew to govern Palestine in 2,000 years.

Born in Liverpool and raised in London, he studied at University College in Hampstead and Balliol College, Oxford. By the age of eighteen, Samuel had become an active liberal. In 1902 he entered Parliament as a Liberal Party member and in 1906 held his first junior ministerial office at the Home Office. In 1910 Prime Minister Herbert Henry Asquith appointed Samuel to the cabinet and later as home secretary. During World War I, Samuel began to take part in Zionist activities and became close friends with CHAIM WEIZMANN, leader of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION.

Lloyd George, the British statesman who had been retained as legal counsel by the Zionists some years before, assured Samuel that "he was very keen to see a Jewish state established in Palestine." After discussions with Weizmann and Lloyd George, Samuel produced a Zionist memorandum on Palestine, in January 1915, that contained arguments in favor of combining British annexation of Palestine with British support for Zionist aspirations and ended with objections to any other solution for Palestine. In this memorandum, which Samuel circulated to his colleagues in the cabinet, he proposed that a British protectorate be established in Palestine that would allow for increased Jewish settlement and, in time, a considerable degree of autonomy for the future Jewish majority. Samuel believed that a Jewish center would flourish spiritually and intellectually, resulting in the character improvement of Jews all over the world. Prime Minister Asquith, however, was not interested in pursuing such an option, and no action was taken at the time. Yet significant work had been accomplished, and it was largely because of Samuel's efforts that the Balfour Declaration was later written.

It is not known if the cabinet formally considered Samuel's memorandum, but Asquith wrote in his diary on 13 March 1915 of Samuel's "dithyrambic memorandum," of which Lloyd George was "the only other partisan." Certainly, at this time, Zionist claims and aspirations were secondary to British policy toward Russia and the Arabs. In February 1916 Samuel approached British diplomat Mark Sykes, who knew Samuel to be sympathetic to the ideas of THEODOR HERZL for a Jewish state in Palestine, with a plan. The plan put forward by Samuel was in the form of a memorandum, which Sykes thought prudent to commit to memory and destroy, likely believing it to be politically sensitive. Commenting on it, Sykes wrote to Samuel suggesting that if Belgium, rather than Britain, should assume the administration of Palestine, it might be more acceptable to FRANCE as an alternative to the international administration that Samuel wanted and the Zionists did not. Referring to boundaries marked on a map attached to the memorandum, he wrote, "By excluding HEBRON and the East of JORDAN [from the Palestine Mandate], there is less to discuss with the Moslems, as the Mosque of Omar then becomes the only matter of vital importance to discuss with them, and further does away with any contact with the BEDOUIN, who never cross the river except on business."

On the same day, Samuel developed the Zionist position more fully in a conversation with the foreign secretary, Sir Edward Grey. He spoke of Zionist aspirations for the establishment in Palestine of a Jewish state and of the importance of its geographical position to the British Empire. Such a state, he said, "could not be large enough to defend itself," and it would therefore be essential that it be, by constitution, neutral. Grey asked whether SYRIA as a whole must necessarily go with Palestine, and Samuel replied that this was not only unnecessary but also inadvisable, since it would bring in a large and unassimilable Arab population. "It would," he said, "be a great advantage if the remainder of Syria were annexed by France, as it would be far better for the state to have a European power as a neighbor than the Turk."

An informal committee of Zionists, with Mark Sykes representing the British government, met on 7 February 1917 at the house of Moses Gaster, the chief rabbi of the SEPHARDIC congregations in England. Gaster stressed Zionist support for British strategic interests in Palestine, which were to be an integral part of any agreement among Zionist leaders in Britain. As these interests might be considered paramount to British statesmen, support for Zionist aims in Palestine, Gaster said, was fully justified. ZIONISM was irrevocably opposed to any internationalization proposals, even a joint Anglo-French dominion, believing that its best chance for success was through a British-only mandate for Palestine. Herbert Samuel followed with an expression of hope that Jews in Palestine would receive full national status that would be shared by Jews in the DIASPORA. The question of conflict of nationality (with the Arabs of Palestine) was not mentioned, and a succeeding speaker, Harry Sacher, suggested that the sharing should not involve the political implications of citizenship. Weizmann spoke of the necessity for unrestricted IMMIGRATION.

Sykes outlined the obstacles: the inevitable Russian objections to any imperialist ventures, the opposition of the Arabs, and strongly pressed French claims to all of Syria, including Palestine. The meeting ended with a summary of Zionist objectives: international recognition of a Jewish right to Palestine, juridical nationhood for the Jewish community in Palestine, the creation of a Jewish chartered company in Palestine with rights to acquire LAND, a union and one administration for Palestine, and extraterritorial status for the HOLY SITES.

When the Liberal Party split into Asquith and Lloyd George factions in 1916, Samuel sided with Asquith and was thus left out of the cabinet when Lloyd George became prime minister. During the course of World War I, Britain conquered Palestine in 1917 and in the election of 1918, Samuel lost his seat and became a candidate to represent British interests in the new territory. Once the British Mandate was granted by the League of Nations, he was appointed to the position of high commissioner of Palestine in 1920.

As high commissioner, Samuel was at pains to demonstrate his neutrality and attempted to mediate between Zionist and Arab interests, acting to slow Jewish immigration and win the confidence of the Arab population. Islamic custom at the time was that the chief Islamic spiritual leader, the grand mufti of Jerusalem, was chosen by the temporal ruler, the Ottoman sultan in Constantinople, from a group of clerics who were nominated by the indigenous clerics. After the British conquered Palestine, this led to the bizarre situation in which a Jew, Herbert Samuel, was to appoint the Islamic leader, in this case AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, who later proved a thorn in the side of the British administration in Palestine. During Samuel's time as high commissioner (1920–1925), the Jewish population doubled, Jewish settlement grew, local councils were organized, and the Hebrew language was recognized as one of the three official languages of the country. However, the leaders of the Jewish Yishuv were disappointed by Samuel's efforts to "appease" Arab interests.

After returning to England, Samuel's interest in the development of the Zionist project remained vital. He was a supporter of the Hebrew University and a member of its board of governors. He fought against the 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER because of its attempt to rein in Zionism, as well as against Britain's attempt to balance its policy in Palestine after World War II.

See also BRITISH MANDATE; OTTOMAN EMPIRE

Bibliography

- Asquith, Hebert. Memories and Reflections. London: Cassell, 1928.
- Halpern, Ben. The Ideal of a Jewish State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1969.
- Hanna, Paul L. British Policy in Palestine. Washington, DC: American Council on Public Affairs, 1942.
- Hecht, Ben. Perfidy. New York: Julian Messner, 1961.
- Huneidi, Sarah. A Broken Trust: Sir Herbert Samuel and the Palestinians. London: I. B. Tauris, 2001.
- Jewish Virtual Library: A Division of the American-Israeli Cooperative Enterprise. "Samuel, Herbert Louis." <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/biography/samuel.html>.
- John, Robert. "Behind the Balfour Declaration: Britain's Great War Pledge to Lord Rothschild." Journal of Historical Review. 6:4 (1985).
- Jones, A. Philip. Britain and Palestine, 1914–1948: Archival Sources for the History of the British Mandate. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Joseph, Bemard. British Rule in Palestine. Washington, DC: Public Affairs Press, 1948.
- Kedourie, Elie. England and the Middle East: The Destruction of the Ottoman Empire, 1914–1921. London: Bowes and Bowes, 1956.
- Lewisohn, Ludwig. Theodor Herzl. New York: World Press, 1955.
- Lipsky, Louis. A Gallery of Zionist Profiles. New York: Farrar, Straus and Cudahy, 1956.
- Lowenthal, Marvin, ed. The Diaries of Theodor Herzl. New York: Grosset and Dunlap, 1962.
- Monroe, Elizabeth. Britain's Moment in the Middle East, 1914–1971. London: Chatto and Windus, 1981.
- Samuel, Herbert, Viscount. Memoirs. London: Cresset Press, 1945.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2000.
- Sidebotham, Herbert. British Policy and the Palestine Mandate. London: Benn, 1929.
- Stein, Leonard. The Balfour Declaration. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1916.
- . Zionism. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubauer and Co., 1932.
- Weizmann, Chaim. Trial and Error: The Autobiography of Chaim Weizmann, reprint ed. Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing, 1972.

San Remo Conference, 1920

The San Remo Conference of the post–World War I Allied Supreme Council determined the allocation of Class "A" League of Nations mandates for administration of the former Ottoman-ruled lands of the Middle East by the victorious powers. The decisions of the conference, held 19–26 April 1920 in San Remo, Italy, mainly confirmed those of the First Conference of London (February 1920). Britain received a mandate for Palestine and IRAQ, while FRANCE gained control of SYRIA, including present-day LEBANON. The boundaries of these territories were left unspecified, to “be determined by the Principal Allied Powers,” and were not completely finalized until four years later. To enforce its mandate, France shortly thereafter intervened militarily in Syria to depose the nationalist Arab government that King Faysal had established in Damascus.

The conference reaffirmed the terms of the Anglo-French SYKES-PICOT AGREEMENT of 16 May 1916 for the region’s partition and the BALFOUR DECLARATION of 2 November 1917, in which the British government favored the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine. The conference’s decisions were contained in the stillborn Treaty of Sèvres (Section VII, Article 94-97). Because TURKEY rejected this treaty, the conference’s decisions were only finally confirmed by the Council of the League of Nations on 24 July 1922 and the 1924 Treaty of Lausanne.

See also BRITISH MANDATE; OTTOMAN EMPIRE

Sartawi, Isam (1935–1983)

Isam Sartawi was a Palestinian resistance figure and an early peace activist who met with progressive Israelis beginning in the 1970s. Born in ACRE, Palestine, he was dispossessed in the 1948 WAR and fled to Baghdad as a REFUGEE. After he earned a B.A. from Baghdad University, he began the study of medicine and developed an interest in cardiology. He then came to the UNITED STATES, where he obtained an M.D. After he left the United States, Sartawi turned his interests toward politics in 1967 and formed the Action Organization for the Liberation of Palestine (AOLP) in Baghdad, with the goal of providing medical support to Arab fighters. A year later, the AOLP merged with YASIR ARAFAT’s FATAH organization, but Sartawi separated from Fatah in November 1968 after an argument with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman during a PLO meeting. In 1968 Sartawi was one of the founders of the Palestine Red Crescent Society.

The AOLP received support from Iraqi troops in JORDAN partly as a result of Sartawi’s prior residence in Baghdad and the good relationship he had with Iraqi leaders. Iraqi troops provided protection for the AOLP’s training camp; however, in July 1971 the AOLP rejoined Arafat’s Fatah and thus stopped getting support from IRAQ. After Sartawi’s reincorporation into Fatah, he became a special adviser to Arafat on US and European affairs and was charged with developing contacts with moderate Israelis. In 1976–1977 Sartawi began clandestinely meeting with progressive Israelis, first with Arie Eliav and other members of the ISRAELI COUNCIL ON ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN PEACE (ICIPP). In 1979 Sartawi and Eliav received the Austrian Kreisky Prize for their efforts in exploring a peaceful end to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Later Sartawi met with URI AVNERI and MATTIYAHU PELED—also from the ICIPP. At PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL meetings Sartawi was frequently criticized for his meetings with Israelis, and he repeatedly attempted to resign, although Arafat always refused to accept his letters of resignation. Sartawi later criticized Arafat for not defending him publicly.

Sartawi was shot and killed in Portugal at a meeting of the Socialist International, probably by the hard-line FATAH REVOLUTIONARY COUNCIL organization, led by SABRI AL-BANNA (Abu Nidal).

Bibliography

- Avneri, Uri. My Friend, the Enemy. Westport, CT: Lawrence Hill and Co., 1987.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Norton, Augustus, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.

Sasson Report, 2005

The Sasson Report is an official Israeli government report, commissioned by Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON, under pressure from US president GEORGE W. BUSH, and written by the former head of the State Prosecution Criminal Department Talia Sasson. It was published on 8 March 2005 and focuses on the revelation that since 1994, Israeli government bodies had been secretly diverting millions of dollars to build WEST BANK OUTPOSTS that are illegal under Israeli law. According to Sasson, “The outposts are mostly established by bypassing procedure and violating the law, displaying false pretense towards some of the State authorities, and enjoying the cooperation of other authorities in harsh violation of the law.”

The report found widespread complicity and collusion among government officials in successive Israeli governments—LABOR PARTY and LIKUD—to spend state money to build the illegal outposts. It details how officials in various government ministries and the Settlement Division of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION (WZO) have cooperated to implement and finance the colonies with millions of dollars. Sasson termed the spending a “blatant violation of the law” and said that “drastic steps” were needed to rectify the situation, also acknowledging, however, that “the process of outpost expansion is profoundly under way.” Significantly, as the outposts steadily become permanent communities, taking up ever wider swaths of the West Bank that Palestinians envision as the heartland of their future state, the prospects for any peaceful resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict correspondingly decrease.

The term “outpost,” actually a type of SETTLEMENT, refers to any area (usually a hilltop) with a number of structures that are totally separated from the closest permanent settlement. The distance between an outpost and a permanent settlement can be a few hundred meters, although the majority of outposts tend to be located a number of kilometers away. Typically, small groups of settlers—often young men (the “hilltop youth”)—undertake the initiative to establish an outpost, assuming, correctly, that once they are in place the government will provide the necessary support. The plan for all outposts is to become de facto settlements in their own right. The purpose of these new outposts is to minimize the existing open space between permanent settlements by creating large settlement blocs encompassing more land in the West Bank. Each outpost collects its own taxes, has its own secretariat and absorption committees, and so on. The outposts typically contain small clusters of trailers or other buildings to give settlers and the Israeli soldiers who protect them a foothold for expanding into actual settlements. Indeed, some outposts grow within a few years into full-scale settlements with hundreds of residents.

