

Encyclopedia of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict

Editorial Advisory Board

As'ad Abu Khalil
California State University, Berkeley

Khalil Barhoum
Stanford University

Yoram Meital
Ben-Gurion University

Fouad Moughrabi
University of Tennessee

Richard Norton
Boston University

Stephen Zunes
University of San Francisco

Encyclopedia of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict |

EDITED BY
CHERYL A. RUBENBERG

VOLUMES 1–3

BOULDER
LONDON

Published in the United States of America in 2010 by Lynne Rienner Publishers, Inc.
1800 30th Street, Boulder, Colorado 80301
www.rienner.com and in the United Kingdom by Lynne Rienner Publishers, Inc.

3 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London WC2E 8LU

© 2010 by Lynne Rienner Publishers, Inc. All rights reserved

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict/
edited by Cheryl A. Rubenberg.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

Contents: v. 1. A—H—v. 2. I—Q—v. 3. R—Z—Glossary—Chronology.

ISBN 978-1-58826-686-6 (hardcover: 3 v. set: alk. paper)

1. Arab-Israeli conflict—Encyclopedias. 2. Jewish-Arab relations—History—Encyclopedias. 3. Israel—Politics and government—Encyclopedias. 4. Palestine—Politics and government—1948—Encyclopedias. I. Rubenberg, Cheryl.

DS119.7.E568 2010

956.0403—dc22

2010026515

British Cataloguing in Publication Data

A Cataloguing in Publication record for this book is available from the British Library.

Printed and bound in the United States of America

The paper used in this publication meets the requirements of the American National Standard for Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials Z39.48-1992.

5 4 3 2 1

For Marty

---

CONTENTS

---

List of Maps	ix
Preface	xi
Volume 1 A–H	1
Volume 2 I–Q	583
Volume 3 S–Z	1205
Glossary	1685
Chronology of the Conflict	1693
The Contributors	1749
Index	1755

---

MAPS

---

1	The Allon Plan, July 1967	19
2	UN Partition Plan and Rhodes Armistice	130
3	Territorial Fragmentation of the West Bank	148
4	Northern West Bank, Territorial Fragmentation	149
5	Southern West Bank, Territorial Fragmentation	150
6	Projection of West Bank Permanent Status, Presented by Israel, Camp David, July 2000	157
7	Projection of the Israeli Proposal for Jerusalem's Final Status, Camp David, July 2000	158
8	The West Bank after Israel's Reoccupation, June 2002	159
9	The Barrier, February 2005	166
10	Barrier Wall Surrounding Qalqilya and Environs	167
11	Barrier around Jerusalem	168
12	Barrier around Bethlehem	190
13	E1 Development Plan	342
14	The Gaza Strip before Israel's Unilateral Withdrawal	419
15	Jerusalem and the Corpus Separatum Proposed in UN Resolution 181, 1967	453
16	Partitioned Jerusalem, 1948–1967	454
17	Jerusalem Municipal Boundaries, 1947–2000	455
18	Arab East Jerusalem within "Greater" Jerusalem	456
19	Downtown Hebron Showing Jewish Settlements and Division between PNA-controlled H-1 and Israeli-controlled H-2	524
20	Southern Hebron District: Area of Expulsions	531
21	The Divided City of Hebron Following the Hebron Protocol, 1997	538
22	The Holy Basin of the Old City, 2008	558
23	The First Zionist Colony in Palestine, 1878	590
24	Zionist Colonies in Palestine at the Beginning of the British Mandate, 1920	591
25	Oslo II, Interim Agreement, 1995	608
26	East Jerusalem Closure	736
27	The Johnston Plan	775
28	Jordan Valley, Eastern West Bank, 2005	791
29	Political Map of Lebanon	860
30	The Ma'ale Adumim Settlement Bloc Expanding into Municipal Greater Jerusalem through the E1 Plan and the Road System	896
31	Expanded Metropolitan Jerusalem, 2006	935
32	The Old City of Jerusalem Showing Places of Jewish Takeover	1019

x List of Maps

33	Israeli Settlement “Outposts”	1057
34	Peel Commission Partition Plan, 1937	1152
35	Palestinian Refugees: Area of UNRWA Operations	1237
36	Roadblocks and Checkpoints in the West Bank, 2002	1263
37	Israel’s Road System in the West Bank, 2004	1267
38	East Jerusalem Land Expropriations	1316
39	Israeli Settlement around the Old City of Jerusalem	1318
40	Sykes-Picot Agreement, 1916	1415
41	Map Presented by Israel at Taba, 2001	1428
42	Borders Stipulated in UN Resolution 181 Compared with Israel’s Borders after the 1948 War	1508
43	Israel-Syria: Demilitarized Zones, 1949	1517
44	Zionist Military Operations outside the UN-Proposed Jewish State, April–May 1948	1562
45	Land Ownership in Palestine, 1947, and Palestinian Villages Depopulated in 1948 and 1967 and Razed by Israel	1565
46	The Near East after the 1967 War	1575
47	West Bank Water Sources	1598
48	Surface Water in the West Bank and Surrounding Area	1599
49	Woodhead Partition Plan C, 1938	1628
50	Wye River Memorandum, 1998	1639

---

PREFACE

---

A word about access to the information in this encyclopedia: As is usual, entries are arranged alphabetically. Care has been taken to provide numerous “blind entries” to cover variations of words or phrases (for example, alternate spellings of proper names) for which the reader might be searching. Within the body of the entries, words and phrases presented in SMALL CAPITAL LETTERS indicate full entries that appear in the encyclopedia. Entries also include extensive cross-references, and bibliographic references point to sources for further research. The comprehensive index offers access to the information at the most detailed level.

* * * * *

Acknowledgments

Producing this encyclopedia required the efforts of many people, and I have numerous debts of gratitude. I would first like to thank the members of the Editorial Advisory Board for the project: As’ad AbuKhalil, Khalil Barhoum, Yoram Meital, Fouad Moughrabi, Augustus Richard Norton, and Stephen Zunes. Their assistance in conceptualizing the work and defining what issues and individuals needed to be included was of enormous importance.

I want to immensely thank all of the individuals who wrote entries for this work. All of you are superb scholars and, given your infinite patience with the endless process involved in the project production, fine human beings as well. I am extremely respectful of the integrity, the assiduous research, and the astute analysis that each of you brought to your contributions. You, individually and collectively, are the encyclopedia. I hope all of you will take pride in the final product and feel that your time and work were of value. To those of you whom I nagged when your articles were not on time, I apologize. Many of you wrote exceptionally encouraging, supportive notes, the energy from which sustained me to the end. My only regret is that I have met so few of you—I hope that will be rectified some time in the future.

A special thanks goes to Steve Barr, the production director at Lynne Rienner Publishers. He worked tirelessly on this project. His patience and graciousness when I inundated him with updates, new entries, and changes long after any such additions or changes should have been made are profoundly appreciated. My respect for Steve as a genuine professional is humbling.

Naseer Aruri, a dear friend and a wonderful colleague, was a source of constant support and assistance. His helpfulness and availability went far beyond the call of duty, especially as I sought advice from him seemingly endlessly. In addition to writing several essays, including one on poetry very late in the process, he edited Samih Farsoun’s contribution after Professor Farsoun’s untimely death.

Thanks also go to Chris Toensing and Elaine Hagopian for their early input with regard to writers. Philip Mattar was very obliging, and I profited from his experience of editing an encyyclopedia. He was generous with his time and information. My thanks also go to Uri Davis.

Finally, there is one person without whom there would really not be an encyclopedia, my husband, Marty, a retired physician who worked alongside me during the entire six years. I can hardly find words to express my indebtedness. In addition to continuous emotional support, he read and commented on every piece I wrote, he fixed my computer every time something went wrong (about three times a day), and he produced the maps and tables. I could not have completed this project without his constant help and affectionate sustenance. He is quite simply a prince among men.

* * *

Several of the contributors asked to express acknowledgments as well. Reuven Y. Hazan and Gideon Rahat wish to express their appreciation to the Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for the financial assistance that made their research possible, and particularly to Raymond Cohen, the former director of the institute. They are also indebted to Nir Atmor for his diligent research assistance.

Henriette Dahan Kalev wishes to thank Yniv taz for reading her essay and making helpful comments on it.

Nurith Gertz, George Khleifi, and Meital Alon wish to acknowledge the sponsorship of the Israeli Academy of Science, the Belgian government, the Israeli-Palestinian Science Organization (IPSO), and the Chronicle of Palestinian Cinema.

—Cheryl A. Rubenberg

---

A

---

Aaronsohn, Aaron (1876–1919)

Aaron Aaronsohn was an agronomist and an early Zionist who was born in Romania. At the age of six his parents brought him to Palestine, where his father was one of the founders of the settlement of Zikhron Ya'akov. After studying in FRANCE, Aaronsohn was employed by BARON EDMOND DE ROTHSCHILD as an agronomist at the settlement of Metullah. His extensive explorations in Palestine and neighboring countries led to his discovery, in 1906, of a specimen of wild wheat (Triticum dicocoides) at Rosh Pinah, a finding that made him famous among botanists throughout the world. At the invitation of the US Department of Agriculture, Aaronsohn visited the UNITED STATES in 1909–1910. With the help of influential Jewish leaders and philanthropists, he raised funds for the establishment of an agricultural experiment station at Atlit near HAIFA.

In 1915, with members of his own family and the family of Avshalom Feinberg, Aaronsohn organized NILI, a secret intelligence group with the aim of assisting the British forces under General Edmund Allenby to conquer Palestine, thus helping to realize Zionist aspirations. After moving to Cairo, he assisted British headquarters in planning the campaign for the invasion of Palestine. In 1916 he visited London and circulated a memorandum on the future of Palestine that helped make the idea of a Jewish national home in Palestine part of British policy. In 1917 Aaronsohn worked in conjunction with the ZIONIST COMMISSION in Palestine. In 1918 CHAIM WEIZMANN sent Aaronsohn on a political mission to the United States, during which he learned that the Nili organization had been uncovered by the OTTOMAN authorities and that his sister SARA AARONSOHN had committed suicide. In 1919 he cooperated with the Zionist delegation to the Paris Peace Conference, dealing especially with the issue of the boundaries of a future Jewish homeland. On 15 May 1919, Aaronsohn was killed in an airplane crash over the English Channel.

See also ISRAEL ZANGWILL.

Bibliography

- Aaronson, Aaron. Yoman 1916–1919. (Diary 1916–1919). (Hebrew). Tel Aviv: Karni, 1970.
- Davidson, Gabriel. Aaron Aaronsohn, Agricultural Explorer. London: L. B. Fischer, 1942.
- . Our Jewish Farmers and the Story of the Jewish Agricultural Society. London: L. B. Fischer, 1943.
- Engie, Anita. The Nili Spies. London: Hogarth Press, 1959.
- Livneh, Eliezer. Aaron Aaronson Ha'ish Uzemano (The Man and His Times). (Hebrew). Jerusalem: Mosad Bialik, 1969.

Aaronsohn, Sara (1890–1917)

Sara Aaronsohn was born and died in Zikhron Ya'akov, a town near HAIFA. Sara, her brother AARON, and their friend Avshalom Feinberg formed and directed NILI, a ring of Jewish spies that worked for the British during World War I in their fight against the OTTOMANS. Sara is often called the “heroine of Nili.” According to CHAIM HERZOG, the Aaronsohns were motivated to assist the British after witnessing genocidal acts against the Armenians by the Turks. While living briefly in Constantinople until she returned home to Zikhron Ya'akov to escape an unhappy marriage, Sara observed the atrocities of the Turks and began to sympathize with the enemies of the Ottomans. As an active member of Nili, she oversaw operations of the spy ring and traveled widely through Ottoman territory, collecting information useful to the British and bringing it to their headquarters in EGYPT. In 1917 she returned to Zikhron Ya'akov to continue her activities. That autumn the Turks captured and tortured her for three or four days in her house. Subsequently, she shot and killed herself.

See also CINEMA, ISRAELI

Bibliography

- Engie, Anita. The Nili Spies. London: Hogarth Press, 1959.
- Herzog, Chaim. Heroes of Israel: Profiles of Jewish Courage. New York: Random House Value Publishing, 1990.

Melman, Billie. "The Legend of Sarah: Gender Memory and National Identities (Eretz Yisrael/Israel, 1917–90)." Journal of Israeli History. 21:1–2 (2002).

Abandoned Areas Ordinance, 1948

On 24 June 1948 Israel passed the Law of Abandoned Areas, which defined an "abandoned area" as "any area or place conquered by or surrendered to armed forces or deserted by all or part of its inhabitants, and which has been declared by order to be an abandoned area." All properties within these areas were also declared abandoned, and the government is authorized to dispose of such lands and properties as it sees fit. Additionally, the government can "extend the whole or any part of the existing law to any abandoned area . . . and [carry out] the expropriation and confiscation of movable and immovable property, within any abandoned area." The Abandoned Areas Ordinance was part of a series of laws passed by Israel designed to legalize the usurpation of Palestinian land and property and transfer it to Jews. These laws include, among others, the 1950 ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW and the 1950 DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY (Transfer of Property Law).

See also PALESTINIAN REFUGEE PROPERTY CLAIMS

Bibliography

Abandoned Areas Ordinance. <http://www.geocities.com/savepalestinenow/israelaws/fulltext/abandonedarea.sord.htm>.

COHRE and Badil. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva: Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights, 2005.

Fischbach, Michael R. Records of Dispossession: Palestinian Refugee Property and the Arab-Israeli Conflict. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.

Jiryis, Sabri. "The Legal Structure for the Expropriation and Absorption of Arab Lands in Israel." Journal of Palestine Studies. 2:4 (1973).

Abbas, Mahmud (1935–)

In March 2005, Mahmud Abbas (Abu Mazen) became the second popularly elected president of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). He was one of the founders of FATAH, and he played a key role in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO).

Abbas was born in Safad, and with his family he was dispossessed in 1948, becoming a refugee in SYRIA. He received a B.A. in law in Syria and a Ph.D. in history from MOSCOW Oriental College, writing a dissertation on the history of ZIONISM. Abbas met other Fatah members while he was in Qatar, where he worked as director of personnel in the civil service. He joined the first FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE (Fatah-CC) and has been a member of the PLO's PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC) since 1968. He became a member of the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE (EC) in April 1981 and took over the portfolio of the Occupied Territories after Israel assassinated his colleague KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad).

Abbas has long had a reputation as a "dove" in the PLO. In 1976, together with Israeli general MATTITYAHU PELED, he drafted a declaration on "PRINCIPLES OF PEACE" based on a two-state solution. In 1989 he held secret talks with Israelis through Dutch intermediaries and coordinated the Palestinian negotiation process at the MADRID CONFERENCE in 1991. He was also one of the main Palestinian architects of the secret negotiations that led to the OSLO ACCORDS.

Abbas returned from exile to Palestine in 1995, having chaired the PLO's Negotiation Affairs Department from its founding in 1994 and served as head of PLO international relations. In October 1995, together with Israeli MP YOSHI BEILIN, Abbas drafted the "Framework for the Conclusion of a Final Status Agreement between Israel and the PLO" (better known as the Beilin–Abu Mazen Accord). In January 1996 Abbas headed the Central Election Commission for the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL elections and was himself elected as a representative from Qalqilya. That same year he was appointed secretary-general of the PLO's EC and led the Cairo-based negotiations that resulted in the first GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT.

Three years into the AL-AQSA INTIFADA and under intense US pressure for reforms in the PNA, in March 2003 YASIR ARAFAT created the position of prime minister and appointed Abbas. Arafat, however, refused to surrender authority over the security services, hindering most reform initiatives made by Abbas. Lack of support from the Fatah rank and file, as well as from Israel, also hampered him. Nevertheless, as a result of Abbas's efforts, Palestinian violence declined significantly in the summer of 2003.

Frustrated by the absence of any quid pro quo from Israel and the empty hand Abbas received after visiting the White House, some Palestinian groups began to resume the ARMED STRUGGLE in August. Abbas's lack of control of the security situation became pronounced, and he resigned as prime minister on 6 September 2003, although he remained secretary-general of the PLO EC. When Arafat fell ill in October 2004, Abbas, along with AHMAD QUREI', took control of the PNA and the PLO. After Arafat's death on 11 November 2004, elections brought Mahmud Abbas to the PNA presidency in January 2005. During his presidency Abbas has evinced considerable deference to the United States, as well as a willingness to engage unconditionally with Israeli officials.

Bibliography

Abbas, Mahmud (Abu Mazen). Inaugural Address of Palestinian President Mahmud Abbas. Palestinian Legislative Council, Ramallah. 15 January. Reprint, Washington DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, 2005.

———. Through Secret Channels: The Road to Oslo. London: Ithaca Publishing, 1995.

Aljazeera.com. 2005. "Profile: Mahmoud Abbas." Aljazeera Magazine. 10 January. http://www.aljazeera.com/me.asp?service\_ID=5615.

Isseroff, Ami. "Biography of Mahmoud Abbas." MidEast Web. n.d. <http://www.mideastweb.org/bio-mabbas.htm>. Jewish Virtual Library. Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen).

The American-Israeli Cooperative Enterprise, 2007. Legrain, Jean-François. "Mahmoud Abbas, the Savior?" Le Figaro. 17 January 2005. Reprinted in TruthOut. http://www.truthout.org/docs\_05/011805H.shtml.

PASSIA. Abbas, Mahmud Zeidan (Abu Mazen). Palestinian Personalities. Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs. n.d. http://www.passia.org/palestine\_facts/personalities/alpha\_a.htm.

Sedan, Gil. "If Arafat Leaves, Who'll Succeed Him?" Jewish Telegraphic Agency. 22 February 2002.

Abbas, Muhammad

See ZEIDAN, MUHAMMAD AHMAD FAHD ABBAS

'Abd al-Hadi Family

See AL-HADI FAMILY

'Abd al-Nasir, Jamal

See AL-NASIR, JAMAL 'ABD

'Abd al-Shafi, Haydar

See AL-SHAFI, HAYDAR 'ABD

'Abd Rabbu, Yasir (1944–)

Yasir 'Abd Rabbu, also known as Abu Bashir, is a resistance leader and a politician. He was one of the founders of the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP), one of the most widely supported and influential factions within the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). He later broke with the DFLP and founded the PALESTINIAN DEMOCRATIC UNION (FIDA). 'Abd Rabbu was born in JAFFA, and with his family he was dispossessed in 1948, becoming a refugee in LEBANON. He obtained an M.A. in economics and political science from the American University in Cairo. Originally a member of the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN) and the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), in 1968 'Abd Rabbu, together with NAYIF HAWATIMAH, founded the leftist DFLP. He was deeply committed to popular, grassroots resistance and generally worked closely with YASIR ARAFAT and FATAH, and he took part in the PLO-Jordanian dialogue (1988–1990). He led the PLO's team in the UNITED STATES–PLO DIALOGUE in Tunis. 'Abd Rabbu has served as minister of information (1977–1993) and minister of culture (1977–1990) in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). He has also been on the PLO Executive Committee since 1973.

In the early 1990s, tensions erupted between 'Abd Rabbu and Hawatma over Jordanian-PLO relations and 'Abd Rabbu's support for the peace process; their conflict led to an escalation of violence and a split in the DFLP. Both groups continued to use the name DFLP until 1993, when 'Abd Rabbu's group changed its name to FIDA. 'Abd Rabbu supported the OSLO ACCORDS, and in early 2000 Arafat appointed him to head the PNA's negotiating team for FINAL STATUS TALKS; however, he resigned in May, on learning of secret Palestinian-Israeli negotiations in Sweden authorized by Arafat. In October 2002, when Arafat drafted a new government authority and asked him to join, 'Abd Rabbu did not accept.

During the years since 2000, he has become an internationally visible spokesperson for the Palestinians. Together with former Israeli justice minister YOSSI BEILIN, he developed the Israeli-Palestinian Peace Coalition, also known as the GENEVA ACCORD or the Geneva Initiative, and he has toured the UNITED STATES and Europe to promote his ideas. ‘Abd Rabbu supported implementation of the TENET PLAN and the MITCHELL PLAN.

Bibliography

Brynen, Rex. The Geneva Accord and the Palestinian Refugee Issue. 29 February 2004. http://www.arts.mcgill.ca/mepp/new\_prn/research/papers/geneva\_refugees\_2.pdf.

———. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990. (Especially Chapter 5).

Khalidi, Rashid, and Joe Stork. “The PLO Split: Behind the Fatah Rebellion.” MERIP Reports. No. 119. November–December 1983.

Palestinian History.com. “Yasir ‘Abd Rabbu.” Palestinian Biography. n/d. <http://www.palestinehistory.com/biography/palestine/palbio54.htm>.

Sayigh, Yasid. Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Yasir ‘Abd Rabbu’s Response to Edward Said. Al-Quds al-Arabi. London. Translated and Reprinted. 1990. “Documents and Source Material.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:2 (13 October 1989).

Abdullah Ibn al-Husayn (1882–1951)

See JORDAN

Absentee Landlords

Owing to changes in Ottoman land laws in 1860 and 1861, much of the land of Palestine at the start of the BRITISH MANDATE was in the hands of wealthy families living in Beirut, Damascus, and Cairo. At the same time, a large number of Palestinian peasants had lost the legal right to their land and had become tenant farmers, sharecroppers, and rural wage laborers. One Beirut merchant family, the Sursoqs, bought 230,000 dunum (over 56,000 acres) of the land of seventeen villages. Other Lebanese families with significant holdings in Palestine included the Bustrus, Tuwayni, Farah, and Salaam. Such families were absentee landlords in that they lived outside Palestine, used middlemen to manage their properties, and readily sold Palestinian land to Zionists for hard capital. Many wealthy, large Palestinian land-owning families also sold land to Zionists.

See also ARAB NATIONALISTS’ LAND SALES TO ZIONISTS

Bibliography

Farsoun, Samih K. Palestine and the Palestinians. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1997.

Flapan, Simha. Zionism and the Palestinians. London: Croom and Helm, 1979.

Halbrook, Stephen P. “The Alienation of a Homeland: How Palestine Became Israel.” Journal of Libertarian Studies. 5:4 (1981).

Kanafani, Ghassan. The 1936–39 Revolt in Palestine. New York: Committee for a Democratic Palestine, 1972.

Owen, Roger. “Economic Development in Mandatory Palestine, 1918–1948.” In The Palestinian Economy: Studies in Development under Prolonged Occupation. Edited by G. T. Abed. London: Routledge, 1988.

Siegman, Henry. Council of Foreign Relations. “How Palestinian Property Was Seized.” International Herald Tribune. 27 January 2005.

Stein, Kenneth W. The Land Question in Palestine, 1917–1939, reprint ed. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

Taylor Alan R. Prelude to Israel: An Analysis of Zionist Diplomacy 1897–1947. New York: Philosophical Library, 1955.

Yiftachel, Oren. Ethnocracy: Land and Identity Politics in Israel/Palestine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.

Absentee Property Law

The Law for the Acquisition of Absentee Property, commonly referred to as the Absentee Property Law, was originally one of Israel’s General Laws, adopted by the Knesset (the Israeli parliament) on 14 March 1950. The law decreed that any person who before September 1948 was out of the country in an area under the control of the ARAB LEAGUE Forces, or who had left his or her normal place of residence during the period prescribed in the law, or who was absent from his or her property at any time between 29 November 1947 and 1 September 1949, was an “absentee tenant” and would lose his or her property to the state of Israel. On 19 July 1960 the Absentee Property Law was transformed from a General Law to a BASIC LAW called the “Israel LAND LAW.”

During the fighting in 1947–1948, many Palestinians left their homes and villages voluntarily, some moving only a few hundred yards, others fleeing to nearby countries for temporary safety. Still others were forcibly driven out by Israeli forces. At the war’s end, some 750,000 to 800,000 Palestinians were “absent” from their property, and Israel by this law forbade them from returning to their homes and lands. All that they owned, including livestock, orchards, homes, furniture, jewelry, and bank accounts, became “absentee property.” This property was vested in the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY, who then “sold” it to the Israeli DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY, which in turn sold it to the state or the JEWISH AGENCY or the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF). The state and these NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS then leased it for Jewish-only use and settlement, and immigrant Jews occupied the property of the “absentees.” Palestinians who had fled to a nearby area within Palestine/Israel were designated as PRESENT ABSENTEES; they also lost their land and property under this law.

Absentee property played an enormous role in making Israel a viable state. Estimates of the total amount of “abandoned” lands to which Israel laid claim vary between 4.2 and 5.8 million dunum (between 1 and 1.4 million acres). Of the 370 Jewish settlements founded between 1948 and 1953, 350 were built on absentee property. By 1954 more than a third of Israel’s Jewish population lived in or on absentee property.

See also CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; LAND; PALESTINIAN REFUGEE PROPERTY CLAIMS; STATE LAND; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Absentee Property Law. 1950. <http://domino.un.org/UNISPAL.nsf/0145a8233e14d2b585256cbf005af141/e0b719e95e3b494885256f9a005ab90a!OpenDocument>.
- Boling, Gail J. “Absentee Property Law and Israel’s Confiscation of Palestinian Property: A Violation of United Nations General Assembly Resolution 194 and International Law.” In The Palestine Yearbook of International Law 2000–2001. Edited by Anis F. Kassim. The Hague: Kluwer Law International, 2003.
- COHRE and Badil. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva: Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights, 2005.
- Fischbach, Michael R. Records of Dispossession: Palestinian Refugee Property and the Arab-Israeli Conflict. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Jiryis, Sabri. “The Legal Structure for the Expropriation and Absorption of Arab Lands in Israel.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 2:4 (1973).
- Laws of the State of Israel: Database. “Basic Laws of the State of Israel.” Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, Volume 14. Jerusalem: Government Printer, 1948–1987.
- . “General Laws of the State of Israel.” Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew, Vol. 4. Israel Law Resource Center. Jerusalem: Government Printer, 1948–1987.

Shafir, Gershon. Land, Labor and the Origins of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1882–1914. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.

Abu Ala’a

See QUREI’, AHMAD

Abu al-Abbas/Abul Abbas

See ZEIDAN, MUHAMMAD AHMAD FAHD ABBAS

Abu al-Hawl

See AL-HAMID, HAYIL ‘ABD

Abu Ali Hasan

See SALAMAH, ‘ALI HASAN

Abu Ali Mustafa

See AL-ZABRI, MUSTAFA

Abu al-Lutf

See AL-QADDUMI, FAROUQ

Abu ‘Ammar

See ARAFAT, YASIR

Abu Dis

Abu Dis is a suburb of JERUSALEM situated in the shadow of the Mount of Olives. During peace negotiations throughout the OSLO PROCESS, Palestinian negotiators proposed Abu Dis as the center of a compromise Palestinian capital that would have incorporated parts of East Jerusalem—the part of the city that Israel captured in 1967 and that Palestinians expect to be their future capital. Abu Dis is home to the building slated to hold the future Palestinian parliament and contains many other Palestinian government offices as well as the historic family home of former Palestinian prime minister AHMAD QUREI’. However, the twenty-five-foot-high BARRIER cuts through Abu Dis and severs it in half, separating thousands of Palestinian residents from Jerusalem, which they consider home.

The wall runs through Shayah Street, a road of shops and apartments that marked the once-

© B'Tselem, photo by Lin Chatozin Dovrat, reprinted with permission

The Barrier at Abu Dis

invisible divide between Abu Dis and the Jerusalem neighborhood of RAS AL-AMUD. This has meant that residents who once simply walked across the street to enter Jerusalem must now loop around the MA'ALE ADUMIM SETTLEMENT and that the closest hospitals are in the WEST BANK town of JERICHO, fifteen miles away and beset with CHECKPOINTS. From Israel's perspective, the Barrier seals its claim to all of Jerusalem as one indivisible city under permanent Israeli sovereignty.

In 2006, Irving Moskowitz announced that he had bought land in and around Abu Dis for the construction of another Jewish settlement known as Kedmat Zion.

See also SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; SETTLER VIOLENCE; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

Abdul-Hadi, Mahdi. The Question of Jerusalem. Ramallah: Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs, 2000.

Abudis.net. <http://www.abudis.net/>.

Gresh, Alain. "Colonial Attitudes in Israel: Camp David's Thwarted Peace." Le Monde diplomatique. July 2002.

Halper, Jeff. "The Three Jerusalems and Their Role in the Occupation." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 15 (2002).

Jubeh, Nazmi. "The Ghettoization of Arab Jerusalem." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 16 (2002).

Keller, Adam. "Abu Dis: An Injustice Somewhere Is an Injustice Everywhere." Gush Shalom. 28 August 2004.

Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "PM Barak's Statement at Cabinet Meeting Regarding Abu-Dis." Jerusalem: Ministry of Foreign Affairs. 15 May 2000.

Passia. <http://www.passia.org/jerusalem/meetings/2000/10july/mahdi.html>.

POICA. "Abu Dis: A Palestinian Town Tarded by the Israeli Wall." Applied Research Institute-Jerusalem. 4 February 2004.

Seidman, Danny. Planning for Jerusalem in a Changing Political World. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace. 5 April 2006.

UNRWA. "UNRWA Profile: Abu Dis, East Jerusalem." March 2004. http://72.14.209.104/search?q=cache:0-BCPFTsYVYJ:www.un.org/unrwa/emergency/barrier/profiles/abu\_dis.pdf+Abu+Dis&hl=en&gl=us&ct=clnk&cd=13.

Abu Iyad

See KHALAF, SALAH

Abu Jihad

See AL-WAZIR, KHALIL

Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim (1929–2001)

Ibrahim Abu-Lughod was an educator, institution builder, and activist in both North America and the Middle East. He was born in JAFFA, Palestine, fled during the 1948 WAR, and made his way to the UNITED STATES, where he earned B.A. and M.A. degrees from the University of Illinois and a Ph.D. in political science from Princeton University in 1957. Presaging his lifelong pattern of combining academic and activist pursuits, after receiving his Ph.D. Abu-Lughod spent four years in Cairo directing the social science research department of UNESCO. Upon returning to North America, Abu-Lughod taught at Smith College and McGill University before joining the faculty of Northwestern University in 1967 and serving three years as department chair. In the early 1980s he again worked for UNESCO, developing plans for a Palestine Open University that was to be based in Beirut; this project ended with the 1982 LEBANON WAR. In March 1988 Abu-Lughod and EDWARD SAID met with US secretary of state GEORGE SHULTZ as part of initial US moves toward recognition of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION.

Abu-Lughod wrote or edited numerous books, including Arab Rediscovery of Europe: A Study in Cultural Encounters (1963); The Evolution of the Meaning of Nationalism (1963); The Arab-Israeli Confrontation of June 1967: An Arab Perspective (1970); The Transformation of Palestine (1971); Settler Regimes in Africa and the Arab World: The Illusions of Endurance (1974); Palestinian Rights: Affirmation and Denial (1982); and The Landscape of Palestine: Equivocal Poetry (1999).

Politically engaged his entire life, Abu-Lughod was a passionate supporter of Palestinian democracy and human rights and lent his voice to numerous Palestinian organizations and initiatives around the world. In 1968 he was one of the founders of the Association of Arab-American University Graduates (AAUG) and, with Edward Said, established the AAUG's multidisciplinary journal Arab Studies Quarterly in 1978. Abu-Lughod was also a member of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL between 1977 and 1991. He was critical of the ossification of the Palestinian bureaucracy in the years following the OSLO ACCORDS, however, and was deeply troubled by autocratic elements within the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. Thus, in his later years he chose to act primarily through nongovernmental channels. In 1992 Abu-Lughod retired from Northwestern University and moved to Ramallah, West Bank, where he continued to work on Palestinian educational, social, and cultural development. He taught political science at BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY and for several years served as the institution's vice president, in which capacity he initiated the development of a graduate faculty.

From 1995 to 1997, Abu-Lughod headed the Curriculum Development Center, which had the responsibility of developing an independent Palestinian national curriculum for primary and secondary schools. He then created A. M. QATTAN FOUNDATION for educational research, with the purpose of strengthening education at all levels in Palestine. At his death in 2001, he was also deeply involved in efforts to create a national library and a Museum of the Palestinian Memory that would trace Palestinian lives from prehistory until the present.

—Deborah J. Gerner

Abu Mazen

See ABBAS, MAHMUD

Abu Mazen–Beilin Plan

See GENEVA ACCORD

Abu Musa

See MURAGHA, SA'ID MUSA

Abu Nidal

See AL-BANNA, SABRI KHALIL

Abu Sa'id

See AL-HASAN, KHALID MUHAMMAD

Abu Salih

See SALIH, NIMR

Abu Salma

See AL-KARMI, 'ABD-AL-KARIM

'Abu-Sharar, Majed (1936–1981)

Majed 'Abu-Sharar was a writer, intellectual, and senior leftist FATAH militant. He was born in Dora, HEBRON, where he received his formal education, and then moved to Cairo for university study. He worked as a teacher in JORDAN and SAUDI ARABIA. Although his political activism began in the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD, he evolved to become one of the most influential progressives within Fatah and, together with NIMR SALIH, led the "Soviet Group," those members of Fatah who believed that PLO interests would be best served by an alliance with MOSCOW. 'Abu-Sharar was secretary of the FATAH-REVOLUTIONARY COUNCIL from September 1971 until his death and director of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION'S (PLO) Unified Information Department. In 1973 he was elected to the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE. In March 1974 President NIXON sent General Vernon Walters, then deputy director of the CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY, as his special representative for a secret meeting with two PLO leaders—'Abu-Sharar and KHALID AL-HASAN, who represented, respectively, the "left" and "right" wings of Fatah.

During his lifetime, 'Abu-Sharar published a collection of thirteen short stories and numerous articles and position papers. On 6 October 1981, while attending a writers' conference in Rome, he was assassinated by a bomb in his hotel room, allegedly by Israel's MOSSAD.

Bibliography

- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.
- Said, Edward. The Politics of Dispossession: The Struggle for Palestinian Self-Determination, 1969–1994. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
- Sayigh, Yasid. Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Abu Sharif, Bassam Tawfiq (1946–)

Bassam Abu Sharif, also known as Abu Omar, is a leading Palestinian intellectual and activist. He was born in the Old City of JERUSALEM and grew up under the Jordanian Occupation, which lasted from 1948 until 1967. In 1967 he graduated from the American University in Beirut, where he had been active in the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS. He was a founding member of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), but he was expelled from the faction in 1987 because of his close ties to YASIR ARAFAT. During his ten years with the PFLP, Abu Sharif was deputy editor, then editor, of its magazine, al-Hadaf, and served as the PFLP spokesman. He was also the secretary of the General Union of Palestinian Writers and Journalists. Because Abu Sharif advocated closer cooperation between the PFLP and FATAH, he was removed from the politburo and demoted to running external relations in 1981, when a pro-SYRIA line came to dominate the PFLP. His closer ties to Arafat and his meeting with Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak in 1987 resulted in his expulsion from the PFLP. He then became a special adviser to Arafat, and in this non-partisan role he floated compromise plans (e.g., his 1988 peace initiative articulating the two-state solution that appeared in the New York Times and was rejected by both the UNITED STATES and Israel) that helped prepare Palestinians for the MADRID and OSLO compromises. During the 1980s and 1990s, Abu Sharif articulated a moderate line and played a leading role in PLO peace diplomacy. He rejected political violence and was the main author of Yasir Arafat's statement renouncing TERRORISM and recognizing Israel at the 1988 UN General Assembly meeting in Geneva.

Since the early 1970s, Abu Sharif has been interviewed many times on CNN, ABC, and CBS, as well as European and Middle Eastern news channels. He is still being consulted by heads of state in Europe and the Middle East regarding how best to deal with various situations and Palestinian factions. He is regarded as "the voice of reason" in the Middle East. He still writes articles for the Washington Post and Al Quds as well as several online newspapers.

In July 1972 Abu Sharif was nearly killed, partially blinded, and permanently disfigured by a letter bomb, allegedly sent by MOSSAD. General Zvi Zamir, Mossad director at the time, considered Abu Sharif "one of the biggest and most dangerous hawks" Israel faced. In 1996, Israel allowed Abu Sharif to enter the GAZA STRIP to attend a meeting of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL, which was convened to amend the PALESTINE NATIONAL CHARTER, but he was not permitted to remain. Abu Sharif maintained his role as Arafat's special adviser, though from outside the Occupied Territories, often writing unofficial statements of the Palestinian position until Arafat's death in 2004. He also coauthored a widely read book with an Israeli intelligence officer.

Bibliography

- Abu-Sharif, Bassam, and Uzi Mahnaimi. The Best of Enemies: The Memoirs of Bassam Abu-Sharif and Uzi Mahnaimi. New York: Little, Brown, 1995.
- Cobban, Helena. The Palestine Liberation Organization. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Quandt, William, Fuad Jabber, and Ann Mosely Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Sayigh, Yásid. 1997. Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Abu Za'im

See 'ATALLAH, 'ATALLAH

Achille Lauro

The Achille Lauro, a cruise ship, was hijacked on 7 October 1985 by four members of the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (PLF), who, in the course of attempting to take over the ship, killed an elderly American Jew, Leon Klinghoffer.

The hijacking was in retaliation for the Israel bombing on 1 October of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) headquarters in Tunis, which killed more than seventy individuals. This bombing was revenge for the murder of three Israelis aboard their yacht, anchored in Larnaca, on 25 September, for which the PLO's FORCE 17 took responsibility. Indeed, the 1970s and 1980s witnessed an almost continuous cycle of violence between Israel and various Palestinian factions; Israel's 1982 LEBANON WAR against the Palestinians, capped by the SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE and the expulsion of the PLO, left extreme bitterness among Palestinians, some of whom subsequently took extreme measures in retaliation.

While holding the passengers and crew hostage, the Achille Lauro hijackers directed the vessel to sail to Tartus, SYRIA, and demanded the release of fifty Palestinians then in Israeli prisons. Upon being refused permission to dock at Tartus, the hijackers killed the wheelchair-bound Klinghoffer and threw his body overboard. The ship headed back to Port Said, and after two days of negotiations the hijackers agreed to abandon the liner for safe conduct and were to be flown to Tunisia aboard an Egyptian commercial airliner.

However, the Egyptian plane was intercepted by US Navy fighters on 10 October and directed to land at Naval Air Station Sigonella, a NATO base in Sicily, where the hijackers were arrested by the Italians. The other passengers on the plane (possibly including PLF leader ZEIDAN) were allowed to continue on to their destination, despite protests by the UNITED STATES. EGYPT demanded, but did not receive, an apology from the United States for forcing the airplane off course.

Italy tried and convicted all four hijackers and convicted ZEIDAN (HEAD OF THE ALF) in absentia. Although the PLO was sued for the death of Leon Klinghoffer, the suit was dropped when the PLO paid an undisclosed sum to Klinghoffer's daughters. Nevertheless, the PLO paid an exceedingly high price for this PLF operation. When the PLO and Chairman YASIR ARAFAT declined the US demand that the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE expel Zeidan and publicly condemn the operation, Washington broke off the US-PLO DIALOGUE.

Bibliography

- Cassese, Antonio. Terrorism, Politics, and Law: The Achille Lauro Affair. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press, 1989.
- Rabie, Mohamed. U.S.-PLO Dialogue: Secret Diplomacy and Conflict Resolution. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1995.

Acre

One of the oldest cities in the world, Acre lies on the coast about fourteen miles north of HAIFA and twenty miles south of the present Israeli-Lebanese border. Long considered the "Key to Palestine" because of its commanding position on the shore of the broad coastal plain that joins the inland plain, Acre affords the easiest entrance to the interior of the country. Until the mid-twentieth century, Acre was one of Palestine's two major seaports, and it was a fortified town of considerable political importance throughout Palestinian-Arab history.

Acre's significance as a commercial and political center dates from the fifteenth century BCE, when the city served as a terminus for caravans and provided a vital strategic location for both defenders and potential conquerors. In 636 CE the city came under Arab rule, but in 1104 it fell to the Crusaders. In 1187, Acre was retaken by the Muslim leader SALADIN, but the Crusaders conquered it again, and it became the seat of the Kingdom of Acre established by Richard Lionheart in 1191. In 1291 the Muslim MAMLUKS succeeded in retaking the city.

Under the Arabs, who until the mid-twentieth century were the predominant inhabitants, the city had a strongly fortified port and shipbuilding center. In 1516 the OTTOMANS took administrative control, and by the early eighteenth century the Palestinian city was flourishing. Its trade networks with the increasingly dominant European economy were linked to the export of cotton, of which the leading Palestinian families of Acre held a monopoly. Acre's commercial growth and political power in the region grew during the reign of Ottoman Ahmad al-Jazzar (1775–1804), and the population grew rapidly. At the beginning of the twentieth century, Acre had a population of some 6,420, one-sixth of whom were Christian. By 1944 the population had doubled to approximately 12,300, with the same percentage of Christians.

Acre has a number of notable sites, and its history includes several memorable events, such as that of 4 May 1947, when the IRGUN broke into the Acre citadel prison to release Jewish activists imprisoned by the British. Twenty-seven inmates escaped (twenty from the Irgun and seven from LEHI). UNESCO has designated the old city of Acre as a World Heritage site.

From the beginning of the Zionist project, Jewish settlers fervently “reclaimed” Palestine's coastal land, and by the early 1920s, Acre was surrounded by Zionist colonies and also served as a center of Palestinian opposition to the Zionists and the British. In the UN Partition Resolution (UN RESOLUTION 181), Acre was designated part of the Palestinian state, but the Zionists wanted it, and on 17 May 1948 the HAGANA conquered Acre and expelled all but 3,200 of its Palestinian inhabitants. In addition, Israeli forces depopulated twenty-six of the villages in the District of Acre.

See also WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Benvenisti, Meron. The Crusaders in the Holy Land. New York: Macmillan, 1972.
- . Sacred Landscape: The Buried History of the Holy Land. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.
- Ghanayim, Zuhayr Ghanayim Abd al-Latif. The District of Acre during the Ottoman Tanzimat Period: A.H. 1281–1337/A.D. 1864–1918. Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1999.
- Khalidi, Walid. Before Their Diaspora: A Photographic History of the Palestinians 1876–1948, 3rd ed. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 2004.

Khasawneh, Diala, with Mia Grondahl and Firas Rahhal. Memoirs Engraved in Stone: Palestinian Urban Mansions. Jerusalem/Ramallah: The Institute of Jerusalem Studies and the Centre for Architectural Conservation, 2001.

Makouly, N., and C. N. Johns. Guide to Acre. Jerusalem: Government of Palestine, Department of Antiquities, 1946.

Phillip, Thomas. Acre: The Rise and Fall of a Palestinian City 1730–1831. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.

Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.

Rubin, Morton. The Walls of Acre: Intergroup Relations and Urban Development in Israel. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1974.

Torstick, Rebecca. The Limits of Coexistence: Identity Politics in Israel. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000.

—Betsy Folkins

Adalah

Adalah (Justice), an independent human rights organization registered in Israel, is a nonprofit, nonpartisan legal center that was established in November 1996 to serve Arab citizens of Israel, who number over 1 million people, or close to 20 percent of the population. Adalah works to protect human rights in general and the rights of the Arab minority in particular. Its main goals are to achieve individual and collective rights—LAND, civil, political, cultural, social, economic, religious, women's, and prisoners'—for the Arab minority in Israel. (<http://www.adalah.org/>).

See also ARAB ASSOCIATION FOR HUMAN RIGHTS; ASSOCIATION OF FORTY

Addameer: Prisoners Support and Human Rights Association

Addameer (Conscience) is a Palestinian non-governmental, civil institution that focuses on human rights issues. It was established in Ramallah in 1992 by a group of activists interested in human rights. The center's activities focus on offering support for Palestinian PRISONERS, advocating the rights of political prisoners, and working to end torture through monitoring, legal procedures, and solidarity campaigns. (<http://www.addameer.org/>).

See also PRISONERS AND PRISON CONDITIONS

Aden-Algiers Accord

The Aden-Algiers Accord was signed in July 1984 between two factions within the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO)—the DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE and the mainstream FATAH—after a major and bloody split within the PLO. The agreement called for extensive reform of Palestinian political structures and a different direction in the PLO's foreign policy. Under the accord, YASIR ARAFAT agreed (1) to repudiate his visit to Cairo and to cease contact with EGYPT; (2) to honor a prohibition on a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation to any future peace negotiation; (3) to reject the REAGAN PLAN and Israel's "JORDANIAN OPTION" and improve relations with SYRIA; and (4) to institute mechanisms that would secure the principle of collective leadership and expand the scope of democratic decisionmaking processes and institutions within the PLO. The agreement was never implemented because Arafat chose to pursue a unilateral direction.

See also LEBANON WAR, 1982

Bibliography

- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Hunter, Shireen, ed. The PLO after Tripoli. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, 1984.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Sahliyah, Emile. The PLO after the Lebanon War. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1986.
- Sayigh, Yasid. Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

Administrative Detention

Administrative detention is detention without charge or trial, authorized by administrative order rather than by judicial decree. Administrative detention orders are initially imposed for a six-month period, but an individual may have his/her detention renewed in six-month increments indefinitely. The practice is allowed under INTERNATIONAL LAW, but because of the serious damage to due process rights inherent in this measure and the danger of abuse, international law has placed rigid restrictions on its application. According to Israel, administrative detention is intended to prevent the danger posed to state security.

Within eight days after a detention order is signed, detainees accused of security offenses are brought before a military judge, who reviews the evidence; detainees may not see this evidence. A three-judge panel examines serious charges, and one judge examines lesser charges. Hearings are not open to the public. Once a court order is issued, the detainee is usually granted access to a lawyer, but any meeting must be coordinated two to four days in advance with the Israeli prison authorities, and lawyers are not permitted to see the evidence against their client.

Israeli authorities assert that administrative detention is not arbitrary because the orders are reviewed by judges; however, the term judicial review is misleading in the case of Palestinian detainees. ISRAELI MILITARY COURTS are established by the military commander, and all judges in the military court system are active Israeli army officers.

The military courts have almost always ruled in favor of detention and given the detainee a sentence of six months of imprisonment that can be extended and/or renewed indefinitely. In a few cases, the judge may take into account the period spent by the detainee in custody prior to the issuing of the order, thereby reducing the time still to be spent in detention. According to B'TSELEM, by January 2009, out of 548 administrative detainees, approximately 42 had spent a total of more than two years in prison. Five other detainees have been administratively detained for three to five years. Over the years, the orders governing administrative detention have been repeatedly amended through subsequent military orders to impose harsher procedural rules when deemed appropriate, or to grant Israeli military authorities wider latitude to make use of such orders.

Administrative detainees can appeal their detention order before an appellate judge in an Israeli military court, where a process similar to that of the initial hearing takes place. Such appeals, however, are regularly denied. Although a detainee can appeal to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT, such a review does not include the right to see the evidence on which the detention is based.

As a practice, administrative detention originated in the British DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS of 1945. Although Britain repealed these regulations shortly before the end of the BRITISH

MANDATE, Israel adopted them, first applying them to its Palestinian-Arab citizens until 1965, and then resurrecting them two years later with the 1967 OCCUPATION. In 1970, Israel also enacted its own military orders relating to administrative detention through Article 87 of Military Order No. 378 in the WEST BANK and through an unnumbered order in the GAZA STRIP. These orders stipulate that an Israeli military commander, or anybody to whom he delegates his authority, can order the administrative detention of an individual if “he is a danger to the security of the area.”

Israeli law recognizes that administrative detention is a radical measure that seriously infringes on a detainee’s rights and therefore should only be used in exceptional circumstances. However, in practice, Israel has ignored this principle toward Palestinians in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Several safeguards that exist in Israeli law are absent from the system of administrative detention put in place by Israel in the Occupied Palestinian Territories.

The state does not disclose the evidence for the alleged threat posed by the detained individual, either to the detainee or to his or her attorney. Over the years, Israel has held Palestinians in prolonged detention without trying them and without informing them of the suspicions against them. If Israel has convincing evidence of an individual’s wrongdoing or lawbreaking, it arrests, tries, and convicts that person in a military court.

Prior to the OSLO ACCORDS, Israel considered any expression of Palestinian nationalism a “security offense” subject to administrative detention. Administrative detention has also been the primary method to punish persons for their speech, writings, and alleged associations; to suppress political activities by Palestinians that oppose Israel’s Occupation, including nonviolent activities; and to intimidate human rights defenders.

Within three years after the 1967 WAR, approximately 1,200 Palestinians were incarcerated under administrative detention orders. In the 1980s, Israel’s use of administrative detention decreased significantly. From 1985 to 1987, mounting internal and international pressure resulted in a much smaller number of Palestinians—approximately 316—placed under administrative detention. During the First INTIFADA, Israel was charged with deploying administrative detention as a punitive measure, rather than as a preventive one. Between 1987 and 1992, Israeli authorities had issued more than 14,000 orders of administrative detention to Palestinians in the Occupied Territories.

In 1998 the number of Palestinians held in administrative detention again began to gradually decline. From 1999 to October 2001, the average annual number was less than twenty. Israel steadily increased the use of administrative detention after October 2001. This trend increased during and after OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD in 2002. Following the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000, Israel stepped up its use of administrative detention. According to B’Tselem, the number of detainees increased from 12 by the end of 2000 to 34 by the end of 2001. By late 2004, there were approximately 860 administrative detainees. By the beginning of March 2003, Israel held more than a thousand Palestinians in administrative detention. In 2007, Israel held a monthly average of 830 administrative detainees, which was 100 higher than in 2006.

Israeli authorities have made family visits extremely difficult for Palestinian prisoners, including for child detainees. Defense for Children International (DCI)–Palestine Section estimates that from 2004 to 2007, an average of 27 children per year have served administrative detention sentences. By December 2008, out of approximately 330 children detained by Israel, 6 were held in administrative detention, including two girls. Administrative detention also violates the principle reiterated by Article 37 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, according to which deprivation of liberty of a child should “be used only as a measure of last resort and for the shortest appropriate period of time.” Israel is party to this convention.

Israel states that its practice of administrative detention complies with international legal standards. However, critics respond that by failing to adhere to the restrictions imposed on this practice by international human rights and humanitarian law, Israel has abused its policy of administrative detention of Palestinians. They have also argued that such detention constitutes a serious violation of the rights of administrative detainees—most notably the right to due process or a fair trial.

See also INTERNATIONAL LAW AND UN AUTHORITY; ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES; PRISONERS AND PRISON CONDITIONS

Bibliography

- Addameer. "Administrative Detention." Fact sheet. http://www.addameer.org/detention/admin\_deten.html. Accessed 13 February 2009.
- Amnesty International. "Israel and the Occupied Territories: Mass Detention in Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Conditions." Amnesty International, Report (MDE 15/074/2002), 23 May 2002.
- B'Tselem. "Administrative Detention." Fact sheet. http://www.btselem.org/english/Administrative\_Detention/Index.asp last accessed on 8 February 2009.
- . Detained without Trial: Administrative Detention in the Occupied Territories since the Beginning of the Intifada. Report, October 1992.
- . "Detention of Senior Palestinian Officials: Wrongful Infringement of Fundamental Rights." 1 August 2007.
- "Court Extends Remand of 11 Hamas Officials Jailed in Israel." Ha'aretz. 17 September 2006.
- Dakwar, Jamil. "Administrative Detention: A Lawyer's Testimony." Adalah Law Review. 3 (2002).
- DCI-Palestine Section and Save the Children Sweden. "Child Rights Situation Analysis: Right to Protection in the Occupied Palestinian Territory—2008." 11 February 2009.
- Halabi, Osama. "The Legality of Utilizing Administrative Detention in the Israeli Occupied Territories." Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights. 9:4 (1991). Report Submitted by the Special Rapporteur of the Secretary General on the Situation of Human Rights Defenders Hina Jilani: Mission to Israel and the Occupied Palestinian Territory. E/CN.4/2006/95Add.3. 10 March 2006.
- Al-Salem, Rouba. "Israel's Administration of Justice." In Waiting for Justice. Ramallah: Al-Haq, 2004.

—Rouba Al-Salem

Advisory Council

In October 1920, Great Britain's high commissioner, Sir HERBERT SAMUEL, created the Advisory Council as the first step in his concept of self-government for Palestine. The council was composed in equal parts of official (government) and nominated unofficial members. Of the ten unofficial members, seven were Palestinians—four Muslims and three Christians—and three were Jews. Although the Palestinian members stated that they did not represent the Palestinian population as a whole, they accepted the council because they believed it was temporary. In August 1922 Samuel announced that he intended to replace the Advisory Council with a LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL related to a new constitution for self-government in Palestine. Jewish leaders accepted the proposals, albeit reluctantly, but Palestinian leaders, believing that participation would signify their acceptance of the Mandate's commitment to the BALFOUR DECLARATION, rejected them.

Bibliography

- Hut, Bayan Nuweheid. The Political Leaders and Political Organization in Palestine 1917–48. Arabic. Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1981.
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1922. Lanham, MD: University Press in America, 1983.

Agriculture, Palestinian

See ECONOMY: THE EFFECTS OF OCCUPATION ON THE PALESTINIANS

Agudat Yisrael

The name Agudat Yisrael (Association of Israel) refers to several related organizations; however, here it is examined as an Israeli political party that originated in the Agudat Yisrael Movement in Europe in the early twentieth century. Formally founded in Kattowitz in 1912, it represents ASHKENAZI and HAREDI Judaism and is currently the Hasidic wing of the UNITED TORAH JUDAISM (Yahadut HaTorah) Party, which comprises Agudat Yisrael (representing the Hasidim) and DEGEL HATORAH (representing the Misnagdim "opponents," referring to Ashkenazi religious Jews who opposed the rise and spread of early Hasidic Judaism).

Though the party has elected only a handful of members to the Knesset, it has often played a crucial role—at times holding the balance of power—in coalition governments because of the nature of Israel's system of proportional representation, and it has used its political leverage to integrate the Orthodox religious agenda into Israeli society. Although the party is not a member of the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, it has cooperated with Israel's leadership in matters of IMMIGRATION, SETTLEMENT, and defense and has participated in all Knesset elections since 1948. As such, it has been able to participate in both LIKUD and LABOR-led coalitions. In the past, Agudat Yisrael's positions on Israeli foreign policy generally and the Palestinian question in particular were relatively flexible. In more recent years, however, Agudat Yisrael has become increasingly sympathetic to the SETTLER movement in the Occupied Territories, primarily because a large number of Haredi now populate the settlements. As a consequence, Agudat Yisrael is unwilling to return land to the Palestinians, to cease building settlements in the WEST BANK, or to accept a Palestinian state.

See also DEGEL HATORAH; SETTLEMENTS; UNITED TORAH JUDAISM

Bibliography

Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

Ahdut Ha'avodah

Ahdut Ha'avodah (Unity of Labor) was an early forerunner of the Israeli LABOR PARTY that was started in 1919 by DAVID BEN-GURION (Israel's founder) as a right-wing faction of PO'ALE ZION and affiliated socialist groups. In 1920, Ahdut Ha'avodah established the HISTADRUT, which was the linchpin of Ben-Gurion's organization and of the Yishuv leadership. In 1930, Ahdut Ha'avodah merged with HAPOEL HATZAIR and created MAPAI, also dominated by Ben-Gurion. In 1968, in a merger with several smaller parties, it became the Labor Party.

Bibliography

Aronoff, Myron J. Power and Ritual in the Israel Labor Party: A Study in Political Anthropology, revised, expanded ed. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 1993.

Horowitz, Dan, and Moshe Lissak. Origins of the Israeli Polity: Palestine under the Mandate. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.

Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.

Sternhell, Zeev. The Founding Myths of Israel. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.

Ahdut Ha'avoda-Po'alei Zion

The Ahdut Ha'avoda-Po'alei Zion (Unity of Workers' Labor) was a workers' party established in 1946 following a split in MAPAI (the precursor to the Labor Party). Most of its leaders were members of the United Kibbutz movement. The party merged with MAPAM in 1948 and ran within the framework of that union for the First and Second Knessets. In 1954 it reemerged as an independent party because of ideological differences with Mapam when four Members of the Knesset left the Mapam parliamentary group. The party ran independently for the Third, Fourth, and Fifth Knessets and was a member of all the governments formed in the course of these Knessets. Prior to elections for the Sixth Knesset, Ahdut Ha'avoda-Po'alei Zion merged with RAFI and Mapai, and in 1968 it was among the founders of the Israel LABOR PARTY. Following the 1967 WAR, many of its members, including the party's ideological leader, Yitzhak Tabenkin, supported the idea of a Greater Israel. Another leader, YIGAL ALLON, put forth a plan to retain permanent control of the territories captured in 1967.

See also LABOR PARTY

Bibliography

Avishai, Bernard. The Tragedy of Zionism: Revolution and Democracy in the Land of Israel. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1986.

Gorni, Yosef. Converging Alternatives: The Bund and the Zionist Labor Movement, 1897–1985. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2006.

Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 2nd ed., revised and updated. New York: Knopf, 1996.

Sternhell, Zeev. The Founding Myths of Israel. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.

Aid to Israel

See US AID TO ISRAEL

Airport, Palestinian

See RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT II

Al-Alami Family

The al-Alami family was a prominent Palestinian landowning family that played important civic and religious roles in JERUSALEM and GAZA beginning in the twelfth century. During the Ottoman period and the period of the BRITISH MANDATE, many notable public officials and religious scholars came from this family. Highly respected members from Jerusalem include MUSA AL-ALAMI (?–1881), an OTTOMAN official and mayor of Jerusalem; and Faydi (1865–1924), an Ottoman official, mayor of Jerusalem, and member of the British ADVISORY COUNCIL. Those from Gaza include Yusuf (1897–1939), a businessman and politician during the Mandate; Samih (1921–1997), a physician and one of the founders of the Red Crescent; and Sami (1924–), a businessman, banker, and financial adviser to the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION. The Ottomans appointed the al-Alami family as caretakers of a zawiya (a religious place) on top of the Mount of Olives because a shrine to their ancestor, al-Sheikh Muhammad Ibn Omar al-Alami, who died in 1628 CE, is buried inside it. The zawiya has been renovated and is currently open for prayers and visitors.

Al-Alami, Musa (1897–1984)

A member of a prominent Palestinian landowning family, Musa al-Alami had an early political role in Palestinian affairs. Born in JERUSALEM, he was drafted into the OTTOMAN army in 1917 but, not wishing to serve the Turks, fled undercover to Damascus. During his stay in the Syrian capital, al-Alami became involved with Arab nationalists and was much influenced by their thinking. After studying law at Trinity College in Cambridge, he returned to Palestine in 1922 and worked as a junior legal adviser to the BRITISH MANDATORY administration from 1925 to 1929. His career flourished under the British and in 1932 the British appointed al-Alami private secretary to the HIGH COMMISSIONER. From this position, he attempted to persuade the British to take a more evenhanded approach to Palestinian and Zionist interests in Palestine. As a result, the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION launched a campaign against him, and in 1937 the British acquiesced and demoted him to a government advocate.

In 1934 and again in 1936, DAVID BEN-GURION, then chairman of the JEWISH AGENCY Executive Committee, asked to meet with al-Alami. Ben-Gurion wanted Palestinian support for a Jewish majority and a Jewish state in Palestine. Al-Alami agreed to the meeting because he hoped to convince the Zionists to moderate their goals, accept a canton solution short of statehood, and agree to a ceiling on the Jewish population below 50 percent. Given the conflicting aims of the two men, the talks bore no fruit, and in late 1936, in the context of the ARAB REVOLT, al-Alami circulated a petition among 137 Palestinian officials calling on the British government to accept all the demands made by the general strike, including the temporary suspension of Jewish IMMIGRATION. Although all 137 officials signed the petition, the British rejected it. That and his firing, which soon followed, drove al-Alami into exile from 1937 through 1942, first to Beirut and then to Baghdad. From the DIASPORA, he served as an independent delegate to the LONDON CONFERENCE in 1939 and was the sole Palestinian delegate at the Preparatory Conference for the Establishment of the ARAB LEAGUE, held in Alexandria in September–October 1944. Subsequently, he headed the league-funded Information Office in London. In 1948 al-Alami lost most of his property to the Zionists—including his Jerusalem home.

Bibliography

- Caplan, Neil. Futile Diplomacy. Vol. 2, Arab-Zionist Negotiations and the End of the Mandate. London: Frank Cass, 1986.
- Furlonge, Geoffrey Warren. Palestine Is My Country: The Story of Musa Alami. London: John Murray, 1969.
- Lesch, Ann M. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- . “Musa al-Alami.” In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.

Albright, Madeleine (1937–)

Madeleine Korbel Albright served as US ambassador to the UNITED NATIONS (1993–1996) and later as secretary of state (1996–2001) under the administration of President CLINTON. She was the first woman to hold the nation’s top foreign policy position. A noted political scientist, she served as a professor at Georgetown University’s School of Foreign Service and as a foreign policy adviser to prominent members of the Democratic Party, both before and after her time in government. Born in Czechoslovakia as the daughter of a prominent Czech diplomat, she spent her early years in Prague and London prior to immigrating with her family to the United States in 1948 and becoming a US citizen in 1957. She received her B.A. from Wellesley College and her Ph.D. at Columbia University.

Through the key foreign policy positions Albright held in the immediate aftermath of the Cold War, she played a major role in asserting American unilateralism and weakening the role of the United Nations. This was especially apparent with regard to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, where she was at the forefront of the shift to the right in US foreign policy, supporting the Israeli government's positions regarding the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES during the critical period spanning the signing of the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES and the outbreak of the Second INTIFADA.

Albright claimed—over the objections of the Palestinians and the consensus of international legal scholars—that previous UN resolutions on the outstanding issues of the conflict were rendered moot by the Declaration of Principles, arguing that “resolution language” referring to “FINAL STATUS” issues should be dropped, since these issues were now under negotiations by the parties themselves. These included REFUGEES, SETTLEMENTS, territorial sovereignty, and the status of JERUSALEM. Given the asymmetry of power between the Palestinians and their Israeli occupiers, blocking the United Nations from enforcing international legal standards gave the Israeli government enormous leverage to dramatically expand its illegal settlements in the Occupied Territories and to tighten its control over greater East Jerusalem.

This position was manifested in her actions as secretary of state, when Albright ordered the US representative to veto three UN Security Council resolutions critical of Israeli violations of the Fourth Geneva Conventions in the Occupied West Bank, thereby negating these otherwise unanimously supported resolutions of the fifteen-member body. Albright also put considerable pressure on the UN Secretariat to suppress critical reports regarding certain Israeli actions, such as the April 1996 Israeli attack on a UN base outside Qana, LEBANON, in which over 100 refugees were killed.

A number of key Albright advisers and appointees in the US State Department dealing with Israeli-Palestinian issues came from political circles that were strongly supportive of a number of controversial Israeli policies, such as MARTIN INDYK, who served as her assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs as well as US ambassador to Israel. Under Albright, issues concerning Israeli violations of INTERNATIONAL LAW and the failure to provide a framework for a viable Palestinian state alongside Israel were supplanted by efforts to end Palestinian violence against Israelis as the primary focus of US policy.

Bibliography

Albright, Madeleine K. “Bridges, Bombs, or Bluster?” Foreign Affairs. September–October 2003.

———. Madam Secretary: A Memoir, 2nd ed. New York: HarperCollins, 2006.

———. The Mighty and the Almighty: Reflections on America, God, and World Affairs. New York: HarperCollins, 2006.

Johnson, Chalmers. Blowback: The Costs and Consequences of American Empire, 2nd ed. New York: Owl Books, 2004.

—Stephen Zunes

Algiers Declaration, 1988

See DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, PALESTINIAN

Algiers Summit, 1973

In November 1973, shortly after the OCTOBER WAR, 1973, the ARAB LEAGUE met in Algiers and affirmed the necessity of (1) liberating all the territories, including East JERUSALEM, conquered by Israel in 1967; and (2) restoring the national rights of the Palestinian people according to the decisions of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). Most importantly, the league designated the PLO as the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and effectively stripped JORDAN of the right to speak for the Palestinians. (Jordan's King Husayn refused to accept the draft resolution on the PLO but had little choice, a year later, at the RABAT SUMMIT in 1974, except to defer to the Arab consensus.) It was also decided at Algiers that the oil embargo imposed on the UNITED STATES during the 1973 War should be lifted, giving SAUDI ARABIA a face-saving device in the context of intense US pressure on Riyadh. Finally, a resolution was adopted stating that the US policy of complete alignment with Israel would adversely affect American interests in the region. At the close of the meeting, the leaders issued a statement declaring their willingness to participate in a peace process based on Israeli withdrawal from the territories occupied in 1967 and the achievement of the legitimate rights of the Palestinians. This constituted a clear indication of the Arab regimes' willingness to recognize and accept Israel as a state in the Middle East; however, Israel and the United States completely rejected the Arab League's initiative.

See also ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; ARAB STATE PEACE OVERTURES, 1949–PRESENT; LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC

Bibliography

Barnett, Michael N. Dialogues in Arab Politics. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.

Muasher, Marwan. The Arab Center: The Promise of Modernization. New Haven: CT: Yale University Press, 2008.

Al-Ali, Naji al-Azami (1936/7–1987)

Naji al-Ali was a political cartoonist whose drawings were distinguished by their biting critiques of the Arab regimes, including the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), and their commentaries on the suffering of the Arab people. He was born in Galilee and together with his family was dispossessed in 1948. He grew up in Ayn al-Hilwa refugee camp in LEBANON and published his first drawings in Lebanese newspapers in the early 1970s. Al-Ali moved to KUWAIT in the early 1960s and then returned to Lebanon in 1971, where he served on the editorial board of the prominent Lebanese newspaper al-Safir and contributed cartoons to other prominent Arab newspapers. Fearing for his life, al-Ali left Lebanon again in 1983 and returned to Kuwait; however, under pressure from neighboring SAUDI ARABIA, Kuwait expelled him in 1985. Welcomed nowhere by Arab governments, he moved to London. An assassination attempt on 22 July 1987 led to his death on 30 August of the same year.

Naji al-Ali's cartoons typically contained a character called Hanzala ("bitterness," as in "the bitter truth")—a small, poor boy with his hands behind his back watching in silence the scene unfolding in front of him. Whether the subject was Israeli actions against the Palestinians, the corruption of Arab governments, or the hypocrisy of the world, Hanzala's silence represented the Arab masses and contained an indirect message to rise to the challenge. The murder of Naji al-Ali was intended to strike terror in the hearts of those who opposed the Arab regimes or the PLO leadership. Although several countries accused each other of being responsible for the murder, the truth is that all were pleased with his death. Yet his portrayal of Israeli savagery against the Palestinians and the Lebanese in Lebanon won him several international prizes and made him the most prominent cartoonist in the Arab world. In recognition of his contributions to freedom of expression, al-Ali was posthumously awarded the International Federation of Newspaper Publishers' Golden Pen Award in 1988.

Bibliography

Al-Arian, Laila. "Naji al-Ali's Cartoons Still Relevant Today." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. 1 January 2005.

American Educational Trust. 24:1.

Aliya

Aliya (ascension or going up) is the quasi-biblical term given to Jews as individuals or groups from abroad who immigrate to Palestine or, as Zionists call it, the Land of Israel. Those who "ascend" for this purpose are known as olim. A series of waves of olim provided the population base for the establishment of the state of Israel. The First Aliya, from 1882 to 1903, came mostly from Eastern Europe and included a small contingent from Yemen; in that period 35,000 olim arrived, though over half left. The Second Aliya, from 1904 to 1914, came primarily from Moscow; 40,000 arrived and approximately half left. The Third Aliya, from 1919 to 1923, came mostly from Eastern Europe; approximately 40,000 came and few left. The Fourth Aliya, from 1924 to 1929, was primarily from Poland; approximately 82,000 came and 23,000 left. The Fifth Aliya, from 1929 to 1939, came primarily from GERMANY and Eastern Europe; nearly 250,000 came and approximately 20,000 left. During the years 1944–1948, illegal IMMIGRATION (aliya bet) was the major method of immigration because the British set a quota of 18,000 per year. Some 100,000 aliya bet reached Palestine during 1945–1948, and few left.

Bibliography

Hadari, Ze'ev Venia. Second Exodus: The Full Story of Jewish Illegal Immigration to Palestine, 1945–1948. London: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1991.

Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "Aliya and Absorption." In History of Israel: Modern History/Zionism: Centenary of Zionism. Jerusalem: Government Printing Office, 2002.

Alliance Israélite Universelle

The Alliance Israélite Universelle is an International Jewish organization, founded by a group of French Jews in Paris in 1860 to protect Jewish rights as citizens and to promote modern educational facilities and professional development among Jews around the world. The stated goals of the alliance were "to work everywhere for the emancipation and moral progress of the Jews; offer effective assistance to Jews suffering from ANTI-SEMITISM and to encourage all publications calculated to promote this aim.”

The Alliance Israélite Universelle remains today one of the principal international organizations in the field of Jewish education and culture. Its objective rests on the diffusion of a type of Judaism that is simultaneously faithful to tradition, tolerant, and open to the modern world. Furthermore, the alliance strives to promote French language and culture abroad.

It acts as a major partner in defending human rights and dialogue between religions. Its work is made up of its network of schools in France and abroad, its schools of continuing studies (Section Normale des Études Juives and the Collège des Études Juives), and its extensive library and publications are of great benefit to those who are in a position to take advantage of them.

Originally the alliance tended to be assimilationist and was not receptive to ZIONISM. That has changed somewhat over the years.

Bibliography

- Alliance Israélite Universelle. Alliance Israélite Universelle, 1st ed. [The Original Founding Document of the First Modern International Jewish Organization]. Paris: Imprimerie de A. Wittersheim, 1860.
- Kedourie, Elie. Arabic Political Memoirs and Other Studies. New York: Routledge, 1974.
- Laskier, Michael M. The Alliance Israélite Universelle and the Jewish Communities of Morocco, 1862–1962. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1983.
- Nadeau, Jean-Benoit, and Julie Barlow. The Story of French. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 2008.

Allon, Yigal (1918–1980)

Yigal Allon was an Israeli military commander and statesman. Born at Kefar Tavor in the Lower Galilee, he graduated in 1937 from the Kaduri Agricultural School of the Hebrew University and later studied at St. Anthony's College, Oxford. Allon was a founding member of Kibbutz Ginosar and was active in underground military operations during 1936–1939, when he served in “special units” of the HAGANA. In 1941 he was among the founders of the PALMAH, the elite commando unit of the Hagana; in 1945 he became its commander. During the 1948 WAR, Allon was commander of the Southern Front, driving the Arab fighters from the whole of the Negev, including Eilat and part of the Sinai Peninsula. He was regarded as the most experienced field commander in the Israel Defense Forces.

After the war, Allon became one of the leaders of the AHDUT HA'AVODA-PO'ALEI ZION political party, and in 1954 he was elected to the Knesset. From 1961 to 1967, Allon served as minister of labor. In 1967 he was a member of the “inner war cabinet” that mapped out the Israeli strategy for the 1967 WAR. In 1968 Allon became deputy prime minister and in the following year also became minister of education and culture. In the YITZHAK RABIN government (1974–1977), Allon served as deputy prime minister. He is remembered for, among other things, the ALLON PLAN, a strategic program for Israel's retention of the WEST BANK, and for abstaining on the vote on the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS with EGYPT. Allon encouraged the GUSH EMUNIM in 1968 to establish a settlement on the outskirts of HEBRON–KIRYAT ARBA.

Bibliography

- Allon, Yigal. The Making of Israel's Army. Bloomington, IN: Universe Books, 1970.
- . My Father's House. New York: W. W. Norton, 1976.
- . Shield of David: The Story of Israel's Armed Forces. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1970.

Allon Plan

The Allon Plan was the political-strategic blueprint that Israeli statesman and military commander YIGAL ALLON formulated in the summer of 1967—immediately after the 1967 WAR—for holding on to the WEST BANK. Although his plan guaranteed secure borders based on firm topographical advantages and strategic depth—two security parameters that eluded Israel during its first two decades—it did not become the government's official plan in the postwar period, although its principles were incorporated into policymaking in all successive governments.

Allon's Strategic Thinking

As a member of Israel's political-security leadership, Allon belonged to a small coterie of senior military officers who realized the importance of developing a political-strategic concept that would orient the state's security thinking. Once it became clear that the highest offices in the military were barred to him, Allon turned to politics and began preparing for senior positions. His formal academic studies at Oxford University, together with his experience as a commanding general in the 1948–1949 operations, which influenced the demarcation of Israel's northern and southern boundaries, helped him develop a lucid, systematic, political-security vision.

Toward the end of the 1948 WAR, Allon perceived Israel's eastern boundaries with JORDAN as unsatisfactory. Therefore, he proposed seizing the West Bank and officially annexing it to Israel, believing that the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) were capable of carrying out such an operation. This "annexation through conquest" concept stemmed from Allon's political belief and party stand that the Jewish people were entitled to the entire area of Greater Israel. For this reason also, he opposed the ARMISTICE AGREEMENT with Jordan, believing that it precluded the permanent determination of defensible borders and strategic depth. Over the years Allon retained his dream of "retro-fitted" borders, declaring as early as 1949 that additional areas of the historic "Land of Israel" would become an inseparable part of the state after another major Israeli-Arab clash.

After the 1948 War, Allon believed that Israel's ability to establish and maintain a defense network for the state's boundaries was woefully limited. In light of the Arabs' rapidly increasing military strength, Israel would have to develop an independent defense system (i.e., one not requiring foreign intervention) capable of resisting any combination of forces aligned against it. In other words, Israel would have to find a viable alternative to its strategic system. He was convinced that in 1948–1949, Israel missed the opportunity to gain the political, security, and economic advantages that a larger chunk of territory would have granted. He also felt that the armistice agreements denied Israel the strategic, operational, and logistical initiative and gave it instead to the Arab states.

By failing to reap the political fruits of the 1949 victory, Allon argued, Israel had allowed a situation to stabilize that left it divided territorially, surrounded by hostile states and bereft of clearly defined borders or strategic depth. He was also concerned that the Arabs would launch a "second round."

Allon assessed EGYPT's offensive concentration in Sinai on 15 May 1967 as the first step toward an actual attack. Egypt's redeployment violated the terms of the armistice agreement signed after the Sinai Campaign in 1956, which committed Egypt to refrain from concentrating military forces in the Sinai Peninsula. Israel could not allow the Arab armies to maintain what Allon believed were their quantitative advantages and operational initiative. Therefore, the IDF had to strike before Egypt completed its deployment. The Egyptians' blockade of the Straits of Tiran and curtailment of Israel's air and maritime freedom in the Red Sea were secondary matters compared to what Allon believed was a tangible threat to Israel's existence.

Map 1. The Allon Plan

Allon claimed that the 1967 WAR was the ultimate expression of his concept of war management, arguing that a preemptive attack was necessary because Israel's vital interests were at risk and its security threatened. The advantages of this move were greater than the price that might have been paid by letting the enemy gain the tactical initiative. Strategically, Allon thought that the concept stood the severest of all tests—Israel's survival. The initiative succeeded primarily because of Israel's superior implementation of its military force. For the first time in its history, Israel gained topographical and geostrategic advantages that also enhanced its status.

Allon Plan in Detail

The 1967 War, more than any other Middle East war, was waged according to Allon's concept of the preemptive counterattack, especially on the Egyptian front. Israel's "lightning" victory over Egypt, Jordan, and Syria left the IDF deployed along the Suez Canal, Jordan River, and Golan Heights. One week after the fighting, the Israeli government, via US diplomatic channels, offered Syria and Egypt the return of the captured lands in exchange for face-to-face negotiations, political recognition, and peace agreements.

As for Jordan, Allon, who was the minister of labor at the time, formulated a different plan during the last days of the war. Brought before the Israeli government for discussion in the second half of July 1967, the plan was not officially adopted out of fear that the national coalition government, which had amalgamated on the eve of the 1967 War, would fall apart. Nevertheless, Allon's formulations became integral to Israel's policies vis-à-vis the West Bank. Submitted on 26 July, the plan called for the following government resolution:

- The Jordan River and the line cutting through the middle of the Dead Sea would constitute Israel's border with Jordan.
- "In order to assure a strong defensive deployment and the strategic integrity of Israel," the following territories would be joined to Israel:
  - A strip along the Jordan Rift Valley from the Beit She'an Valley to the north of the Dead Sea, with the inclusion of minimal Arab population.
  - A strip from north of the Dead Sea road to the north of greater Jerusalem, including Mount Hebron or "at least" the Judean Desert going toward the Negev.

- In the territories to be joined to Israel, new settlements would be established and permanent military bases would be built according to security needs.
- In eastern JERUSALEM, urban neighborhoods populated by Jews would be built, and the Jewish quarter of the old city would be rehabilitated and populated.
- Negotiations would be started with leaders and public figures from the West Bank about the establishment of an autonomous Arab district in areas not included in Israel's territory. The autonomous district would be connected to Israel in a joint economic framework and with a mutual defense treaty.
- The government would design a comprehensive plan for a solution to the problem of Palestinian REFUGEES on the basis of regional cooperation and international aid. "In addition, the government will start to establish a model settlement of refugees in the West Bank or Sinai in order to learn from the experience and demonstrate our good will at the same time."
- The GAZA STRIP would be designated an integral part of Israel after the refugees were rehabilitated elsewhere. Until then, the Gaza Strip would have the status of an occupied area held by a military government.

Analysis of the Allon Plan

From Allon's perspective, the plan constituted a long-term answer to three main issues that had been plaguing Israel since the end of the 1948 War:

1. Topography: It outlined defensible boundaries based on the contours of the land.
2. Demography: It provided a solution to the problem of the Palestinian refugees and at the same time safeguarded the Jewish nature of Israel by granting full autonomy to the inhabitants of the Arab territories.
3. Strategy: It offered a solution to Israel's security problems.

Allon's plan was designed to avert Israel's presence on the West Bank and domination over a large Palestinian population. His retreat from the idea of Greater Israel, which he had previously championed, and which the government's right-wing coalition partners still accepted, reflects the basic change in his worldview at the end of the war.

Nevertheless, the comprehensive plan was an attempt to solve Israel's security and political needs after new conditions had been created on Israel's eastern border. In the short run, the plan called for Israel's total control of the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY by fixing the Jordan River as Israel's eastern border. The plan was divided into two main phases: (1) the establishment of a rural and urban settlement continuum along the length of the Jordan Rift Valley as a security border, and (2) having this continuum serve as a tool in the political struggle to finalize Israel's boundaries. Although the government did not ratify Allon's plan, it agreed de facto to construct security settlements as "influencing factors" that would pressure the "other side" to accept the entire plan at a future date.

In practice, the Allon Plan set up military settlements (NAHAL outposts) and civilian settlements in the Jordan Rift Valley and on the eastern slopes of the Samarian Mountains. Allon was an outspoken proponent of this settlement chain and hoped to "determine facts on the ground" in light of the inaction of the government, which preferred to leave the plan in limbo so that it could adapt it to the changing political reality. Allon felt that the plan remained relevant, but until the LIKUD PARTY ascended to government in May 1977, he saw little progress.

Until 1977, the plan was implemented selectively as the basis of Israel's settlement policy beyond the pre-1967 border. A decade after the plan was first presented to the government, it went through a number of modifications and was brought before international bodies—an indication that Israel was willing to make peace with Jordan. As long as the West Bank remained under Israeli control, however, Jordan's KING HUSAYN completely rejected the proposal. The other Arab countries also refused to consider any form of territorial compromise with Israel.

When Allon's party was relegated to the parliamentary opposition, he added another layer to the plan in November 1978. This was "The Plan for the Jordan's Banks"—an economic plan of considerable political significance but one that also failed to materialize. This scheme envisioned the excavation of a canal from the Mediterranean Sea, through Israel's northern valleys, to the Jordan Rift Valley. The canal would boost the rift's development by serving both Israeli and Jordanian interests. Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN's ardently nationalistic government, however, took no interest in the plan. The new Likud government unconditionally supported the concept of Greater Israel and the establishment of Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the West Bank but intended to keep them permanently rather than merely hold on to them as Allon had conceived.

After the Likud's ascendancy to power, Allon continued to advocate his concept, and, in an unpublished internal document in 1978, he stated: "The geostrategic conditions which have existed in the Middle East since June 1967 permit a solution based upon a fair compromise. This could provide Israel with the minimal defensible boundaries that are indispensable without impairing to any meaningful extent the basic interests of the other side, including those of the Palestinian Arab community. . . . According to the formula for compromise, which I personally advocate, Israel—within the context of peace settlements—would give up the vast majority of the areas which fell into its hands in the 1967 War.

"The Arabs, on the other hand, would have to concede their claim over certain zones which are of vital strategic and security importance to Israel, but only very sparsely populated by Arabs. These territories will provide Israel with that vital element so lacking in the pre-1967 War lines—a defense posture, which would enable the small, standing army units of Israel's defense force to hold back the invading Arab armies until most of the country's reserve citizens could be mobilized. These security zones would thus guarantee enough time to organize and launch the counteroffensive needed to defeat any such aggression. . . .

"Since the West Bank is densely populated by Arabs, the strategic depth and topographical barrier cannot be attained by simply establishing Israel's boundaries along the old Mandatory border—i.e. the Jordan River. Rather, apart from some minor tactical border alterations along the western section of the 'green line,' as for example at Latrun, this same goal can be achieved by the establishment of absolute Israeli control over the strategic zones to the east of the dense Arab population concentrated on the crest of the hills and westward. I am referring to the arid zone that lies between the Jordan River to the east, and the eastern chain of the Samarian and Judean mountains to the west—Mt. Gilboa in the north through the Judean desert, until it joins the Negev desert. The area of this desert zone is only about 700 square miles, and it is almost devoid of population. The Palestinian Arab population of the West Bank would be outside the zone of Israeli sovereignty and revert to Arab rule. Cutting through the Israeli security zone along the Jordan Valley extending from north to south, it would be possible to delineate a corridor running from west to east and placed under Arab sovereignty. This would permit uninterrupted communication along the Jericho-Ramallah axis, between the Arab populated areas of the West and East Banks of the river. In this manner the only realistic solution can be materialized—one that also helps resolve the problem of the Palestinian identity that could then find its expression in a single Jordanian-Palestinian state.

“It would be unimaginable and absolute folly that Jerusalem, Israel’s capital, which was never the capital of any Arab or Muslim state, but was always the capital and center of the Jewish people, should be partitioned, the Holy City and adjacent areas, which are essential for its protection and communications must remain a single, undivided unit under Israeli sovereignty.

“Because of Jerusalem’s universal character, resulting from its holy status in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, as well as its heterogeneous population, a religious solution, not a political one, is called for. A possible solution would be to grant special rights to the representatives of the various faiths over the places holy to them, while the municipal structure of the city might be based upon sub-districts that take ethnic and religious criteria into account.”

Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN, Allon’s deputy during the 1948 War, outlined his view of the future map of Israel to the Knesset in October 1995, which he demarcated according to the principles that Allon had proposed in 1967. Rabin was assassinated before he could complete the task, but in 2005 Prime Minister ARIEL SHARON, after making a conceptual about-face, began to reshape Israel’s borders according to these same principles.

Bibliography

- Allon, Yigal. “Israel: The Case for Defensible Borders.” Foreign Affairs. 55:1 (1976).
- . Nation and Land. Jerusalem: World Labor Zionist Organization, 1972.
- Bar-Or, Amir. “Pre-emptive Counter-Attack and Its Development in Yigal Allon’s Security Thinking.” State, Government and International Relations. 30 (1989–1990).
- Widlanski, Michael, ed. Can Israel Survive a Palestinian State? Jerusalem: Institute for Advanced Strategic and Political Studies, 1999.

—Amir Bar-Or

All Palestine Government

On 22 September 1948, based on an ARAB LEAGUE resolution that was framed primarily to confront JORDAN over its plans to occupy the WEST BANK, the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE declared the establishment of an All Palestine Government (APG) located in the GAZA STRIP and headed by Ahmad Hilmi Abd al-Baqi, former military governor of JERUSALEM. The APG began by issuing passports and seeking international recognition. Two weeks later, on 30 September, it convened the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC). Despite being prohibited from entering any part of Palestine, the former mufti (religious leader) of Jerusalem, AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, was the driving force behind the new government and slipped into Gaza City surreptitiously to attend the PNC meeting. The PNC elected him president of the government and ‘Abd al-Baqi prime minister. A declaration of independence was issued on 1 October 1948, and the congress declared Jerusalem the capital of Palestine, adopted the FLAG of the 1936 ARAB REVOLT as the national symbol, and laid out the institutional structure of the government. In reality, however, the Palestine government had no administration, no money, no army except what remained after Israel’s defeat of the ARAB LIBERATION ARMY, and very little territory.

Initially, under enormous British pressure, no Arab regime recognized the APG, and eight days after al-Hajj Amin’s triumphal entrance into Gaza, the Egyptians unceremoniously deported him to Cairo, where they kept him under close surveillance. ‘Abd al-Baqi and his ministers soon followed al-Hajj Amin into exile. In mid-October, however, Israel broke the second truce in the 1948 WAR with action against EGYPT; this development prompted IRAQ, SYRIA, EGYPT, LEBANON, and SAUDI ARABIA to recognize the APG, though their declarations were no more than empty gestures designed to placate the Arab masses.

Though short-lived and ill-starred, the All Palestine Government retains considerable political relevance because it highlights several of the basic dilemmas still facing Palestinians—especially the question of the Palestinians’ relationships with the Arab states, Israel, and the world powers.

See also ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; ARAB STATE PEACE OVERTURES, 1949–PRESENT; LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC

Bibliography

- Mattar, Philip. The Mufti of Jerusalem: Al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni and the Palestine National Movement. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Muslih, Muhammad. The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Pappe, Ilan. A History of Modern Palestine: One Land, Two Peoples. Cambridge: University of Cambridge Press, 2004.
- Shlaim, Avi. "The Rise and Fall of the All-Palestine Government in Gaza." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:1 (1990).

Aloni, Shulamit (1929–)

Shulamit Aloni is an Israeli lawyer, human rights activist, founder of the Ratz political organization (Movement for Civil Rights and Peace), and former member of the Knesset. She was born in Tel Aviv to parents who had immigrated to Palestine from Poland. Aloni was a member of the HASHOMER HATZAIR (The Young Guard) youth movement and served in the HAGANA. Immediately after the 1948 WAR, she began to work with war refugee children in JAFFA and helped to establish a school for immigrant children in Ramla. Later she taught in Ramat Gan and Tel Aviv while studying at the Law and Economics College attached to the Shevach School, where she qualified as a lawyer. In 1959 she joined the LABOR PARTY, but she left it in 1973 and within forty-eight hours established Ratz. In the next election for the Knesset, the party won three seats.

During the 1970s Aloni was involved in attempts to create dialogue with the Palestinians in order to pave the way to peace. This involvement increased after the start of the LEBANON WAR, when she helped establish the International Center for Peace in the Middle East. In 1984, Ratz's parliamentary representation increased to five seats with members of PEACE NOW, including Ran Cohen from SHELLI, and later Yossi Sarid and Mordechi Virshubsky. In 1991 three parties, Ratz, SHINUI, and MAPAM, united to form MERETZ, which won twelve seats in the 1992 election. Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN appointed Aloni minister of education, but she was forced to resign because of pressure from ultra-Orthodox parties. During these years, a rift developed between Aloni and certain members of the movement under the leadership of Sarid, and in 1996 she retired from politics.

Today Aloni is involved in lecturing on topics related to human rights and peace with the Palestinians. Her political beliefs are reflected in the statement she gave to Attila Somfelve in an interview for Ynet (the website associated with Yedi'ot Aharanot): "Our society is being undermined by gross insensitivity and by adulation of force. I am disturbed by our moral disintegration. I am disturbed by the arrogant and light-hearted way in which we kill and murder Palestinians. I am disturbed that when 400 olive trees were uprooted in the Territories, no one was held to account. I cannot find any peace of mind anymore when I see this Wall [BARRIER] that we are building. We are pillaging the land and destroying the way of life of people who have lived in the same place for centuries . . . I cannot live with the way we continually wail that we are the victim and do not examine our own morality. It's important to realize that appalling as SUICIDE BOMBINGS are, aerial bombardment kills more. While we feel the pain of our 900 dead, we tend to forget that we have murdered 3000 Palestinian civilians. We are the violent ones; we are the cheats. Our very foundations have been undermined by our adulation of force, and all this is called a democracy. There cannot be democracy when we rule over 3 million people who have no voice. We simply have to get out of there. We do not even try to understand that what the Palestinians want is sovereignty and human rights."

Bibliography

- Aloni, Shulamit. "Murder under the Cover of Righteousness: There Is No Fixed Method for Genocide." CounterPunch. 7 March 2003.
- Somfelve, Attila. "Interview: A Remarkable Jewish Woman Speaks Out—Shulamit Aloni." The Handstand. May 2004. www.thehandstand.org/archive/may2004/articles/aloni.htm.

Altalena Affair

The Altalena Affair was a violent confrontation that took place in June 1948 between the newly formed ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) and the IRGUN TZEVA'I LE'UMI (National Military Organization), a paramilitary Jewish group and the armed expression of the ideology of Revisionist Zionism founded by VLADIMIR YEVGENIEVITCH (ZE'EV) JABOTINSKY. The confrontation involved a cargo ship, Altalena, captained by Monroe Fein, which carried weapons and fighters to Palestine for the Irgun.

On 14 May 1948, as the BRITISH MANDATE was coming to an end, Jewish leaders proclaimed the independence of the state of Israel and the establishment of a provisional government and the Israel Defense Forces. The process of absorbing all military organizations into the IDF proved complicated, and several paramilitary groups continued their activities outside the IDF. One of the largest groups, Irgun, planned to ship weapons and fighters to the newly formed state. The plans included a ship purchased by Irgun members abroad, and originally intended to reach Israel on 15 May 1948.

Weapons purchase and organizational matters took longer than the Irgun had expected, while on 1 June, an agreement was signed between the government and the Irgun for the absorption of the Irgun into the IDF. One of the clauses stated that the Irgun had to cease all independent arms acquisition activities. Consequently, the Irgun was required to inform the government about the ship and its sailing schedule.

The Irgun headquarters in Paris did their best to keep the Altalena's preparations for departure a secret, fearing that if the plans were discovered, the IDF might attempt to sabotage the Altalena at sea. But it was difficult to conceal the movement of 1,000 fighters and a large quantity of arms and ammunition. These precautionary measures proved fruitless, and MENAHEM BEGIN, head of the Irgun, decided to postpone the arrival of the ship. However, the ship had already left the day before the cable from Begin arrived.

On 15 June, Begin and his associates held a meeting with government representatives, at which he announced that the ship had sailed without his knowledge and that he wanted to hold consultations on how to proceed. In his diary for 16 June DAVID BEN-GURION, the head of the provisional government, wrote the following about the meeting: "[Government leaders] . . . met yesterday with Begin. Tomorrow or the next day their ship is due to arrive: 4,500 tons, bringing 800–900 men, 5,000 rifles, 250 Bren guns, 5 million bullets, 50 bazookas, 10 Bren carriers. . . . They should not be sent back. They should be disembarked at an unknown shore." Irgun representatives and Ministry of Defense personnel met, and the Irgun proposed directing the Altalena to Tel Aviv beach. Ministry of Defense representatives claimed that the Kfar Vitkin beach was preferable, because it would be easier to evade UN observers. The ship was therefore instructed to make for Kfar Vitkin.

In another meeting, Ben-Gurion agreed to Begin's initial request that 20 percent of the weapons be dispatched to the Irgun's Jerusalem Battalion, which was still fighting independently of the IDF. His second request, however, that the remainder be transferred to the IDF to equip the newly incorporated Irgun battalions, was rejected by the government representatives, who interpreted the request as a demand to reinforce an "army within an army."

The Altalena reached Kfar Vitkin in the late afternoon of Sunday, 20 June. Among the Irgun members waiting on the shore was Menahem Begin, who greeted the arrivals with great emotion. After the passengers had disembarked, members of the fishing village of Mikhmoret helped unload the cargo of military equipment. Concomitantly with the events at Kfar Vitkin, the government had convened in Tel Aviv for its weekly meeting. Ben-Gurion reported on the meetings that had preceded the arrival of the Altalena and was adamant in his demand that Begin surrender all of the weapons: "We must decide whether to hand over power to Begin or to order him to cease his separate activities. If he does not do so, we will open fire! Otherwise, we must decide to disperse our own army." The debate ended in a resolution to empower the army to use force if necessary to overcome the Irgun and to confiscate the ship and its cargo. Implementation of this decision was assigned to the Alexandroni Brigade, commanded by Dan Even (Epstein), which the following day surrounded the Kfar Vitkin area. Dan Even issued an ultimatum to Begin, stating that by order of the chief of the General Staff of the IDF, Irgun was to turn the weapons over to Even, and Begin was to report to the IDF command. If Irgun did not comply he would use all means at his disposal to implement the order. Begin was given ten minutes to respond.

The ultimatum was made, according to Even, "in order not to give the Irgun commander time for lengthy considerations and to gain the advantage of surprise." Begin refused to respond to the ultimatum, and all attempts at mediation failed. A clash was now inevitable. Fighting ensued and there were a number of casualties. In order to prevent further bloodshed, the Kfar Vitkin settlers initiated negotiations between Begin's deputy and Dan Even, which ended in a general cease-fire and the transfer of the weapons on shore to the local IDF commander.

Begin had meanwhile boarded the Altalena, which was headed for Tel Aviv where the Irgun had more supporters. Many Irgun members, who joined the IDF earlier that month, left their bases and concentrated on the Tel Aviv beach. A confrontation between them and the IDF units started. In response, Ben-Gurion ordered YIGAL YADIN (acting chief of staff) to concentrate large forces on the Tel Aviv beach and to take the ship by force. Heavy guns were transferred to the area and at four in the afternoon, Ben-Gurion ordered the shelling of the Altalena. One of the shells hit the ship, which began to burn.

There was danger that the fire would spread to the holds that contained explosives, and Captain Fein ordered all aboard to abandon ship. People jumped into the water, while their comrades on shore set out to meet them on rafts. Begin, who was on deck, agreed to leave the ship only after the last of the wounded had been evacuated. Sixteen Irgun fighters were killed in the confrontation with the army; six were killed in the Kfar Vitkin area and ten on Tel Aviv beach. Three IDF soldiers were killed: two at Kfar Vitkin and one in Tel Aviv.

After the shelling of the Altalena, more than 200 Irgun fighters were arrested on Ben-Gurion's orders. Most of them were released several weeks later, with the exception of five senior commanders who were detained for more than two months. (They were released on 27 August 1948 in response to public pressure.)

Bibliography

- Avnery, Uri. "The Altalena Affair: The Sacred Cannon." Counterpunch. 3 June 2003.
- Morris, Benny. 1948: A History of the First Arab-Israeli War, illustrated ed. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2008.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination. New York: Free Press, 1999.

Alternative Information Center

The Alternative Information Center (AIC) is a Palestinian-Israeli organization that disseminates information, research, and political analysis of Palestinian and Israeli societies as well as of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Founded in 1982, it has offices in JERUSALEM and Beit Sahour, West Bank. AIC promotes cooperation between Palestinians and Israelis based on the values of social justice, solidarity, and community involvement. Its activities and publications offer a critical discussion of the political realities that were created during and since the OSLO ACCORDS and their implementation, with special attention given to democratic struggles, critical perspectives on the nature of the state of Israel, and the authoritarian features of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. The AIC publishes the monthly News from Within and the twice-monthly Settler Violence and Occupation Report. (www.alternativenews.org/).

Amal

Amal (Harakat al-Mahrumin/Movement of the Disinherited) is a Shi'ia political party and militia in LEBANON founded in 1974 by a Lebanese cleric of Iranian descent, Imam Musa al-Sadr, and a member of the Lebanese parliament, Hussein el-Husseini. It sought to improve the under-represented politically and economically disadvantaged majority Shi'ia community in particular, and to achieve social justice for all deprived in Lebanon. For many years it had cordial relations with the Palestinians and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION in Lebanon; however, over time, and as a result of Israel's punishing air attacks on Shi'ia villages in South Lebanon, Amal turned against the Palestinians. Subsequent to the 1982 Lebanon War, Amal, with Syrian backing, attacked the Palestinian refugee camps from April 1985 through April 1987 in what is known as the CAMPS' WAR.

See also CAMPS' WAR, 1985–1987; LEBANON; LEBANON WAR, 1982

Am Echad

Am Echad (One Nation Party) is an Israeli political party generally considered centrist in orientation. It was initially led by Amir Peretz, who later rejoined the LABOR PARTY and was elected its head. Peretz was also head of Israel's HISTADRUT labor federation. Although a small party, Am Echad has articulated a position on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict:

- The issue of a Palestinian state will be determined as part of an overall agreement that would provide Israel with peace and security.
- Support for the promotion of a political and security process that will lead to a peace agreement between the Israeli and Palestinian nations will put an end to the Jewish-Arab conflict and will lead to true peace among all the nations of the region.

- An improved quality of life for Palestinians and cooperation between nations, including support of a balanced economic agreement, will lead to the success of this process.
- The status of JERUSALEM will be determined in future negotiations.
- The status of the SETTLEMENTS in the territories will be determined as a part of an overall agreement that would provide Israel with peace and security.

Bibliography

Margolis, David. "Israeli Political Parties." MyJewish Learning.com. n.d. http://www.myjewishlearning.com/history\_community/Israel/Israeli\_Politics/Israeli\_ElectoralSystem/IsraeliPoliticalParties.htm.

American-Israel Cooperative Enterprise

The American-Israel Cooperative Enterprise (AICE) is a pro-Israel, American Jewish organization. It is a leading provider of information for students and organizations interested in Jewish history, culture, and politics. AICE offers training on how to use this information to increase support for Israel among non-Jews. AICE is committed to encouraging students to be proactive in making the case for Israel and in responding to critics. To provide students with background on current events, it produces one-page "fact sheets" on major issues, such as the Palestinian right of return, the Bush Plan, and the status of JERUSALEM.

AICE and Barad Entertainment have also produced On One Foot: A Middle East Guide for the Perplexed or How to Respond on Your Way to Class, When Your Best Friend Joins an Anti-Israel Protest, a pocket-size, seventy-five-page book that provides responses to the toughest issues students face, along with a brief paragraph on the history of each issue. (<http://israeloncampuscoalition.org/> or <http://www.JewishVirtualLibrary.org>).

See also AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

American-Israel Public Affairs Committee/AIPAC

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

American Jewish Committee

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

American Jewish Congress

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

American Jewish Organizations

The work of pro-Israel groups in the UNITED STATES has been immeasurably important in ensuring US support for Israel. This has been evident in the formulation of government policies and in propagation of pro-Israel sentiments in the MEDIA, on university campuses, and in popular culture. Pro-Israel groups have been highly successful in ensuring that the mass public, as well as the elites, overwhelmingly take Israel's side in its conflict with the Palestinians.

More than 100 organizations, 155 Jewish federations and community relations councils, as well as several thousand synagogues, are engaged to some degree or other in pro-Israel activities. The phenomenon is most obvious in Congress, where Democrats and Republicans routinely approve pro-Israel resolutions often with as many as 400 votes on a measure in the House and close to 100 votes in the Senate. On more than one occasion, Congress has voted to grant more money to Israel than a president has requested. This is generally attributed to the popular public support for Israel, as well as to contributions from pro-Israel funders on whom many members of Congress from both parties have come to depend.

The handful of organizations that represent Palestinian interests have no comparable clout. This is partly a reflection of the fact that, unlike Israel, which has been put forth by its supporters as a STRATEGIC ASSET and a surrogate for US interests in the Middle East, a role that has been strongly challenged by Israel's critics, the Palestinians are viewed as having no useful function in the US grand strategy, and therefore their fate is of little significance to Washington except as rhetoric for interest in a peace process. Whatever policies Israel has chosen to pursue vis-à-vis the Palestinians have generally been accepted by US governing elites. Whatever congressmembers may think, the domestic political price for challenging them and provoking a clash with pro-Israel groups has proven to be too great.

Some pro-Israel support groups work on a single issue, for example, the media or Congress, while other organizations involve themselves in a variety of issues that often overlap, but all are committed with a singularity of purpose to maintaining US support for Israel and whatever policies it pursues.

Political Groups

American-Israel Public Affairs Committee. The most visible pro-Israel group, the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), is a formal lobbying organization that operates in the critical arena of government policymaking and budget allocations. Headquartered in Washington, DC, AIPAC has offices and members across the country, 165 employees, and a $47 million budget. Despite its pro-Israel advocacy, AIPAC is considered a domestic lobbying group and not required to register under the Foreign Agents Registration Act. This allows AIPAC staff to engage in activities forbidden to agents of other governments. The most important of these is the authorization to sit in on congressional committee meetings related to Middle East issues, to consult in drafting pro-Israel legislation, and to meet with Jewish congressional members to plan strategy.

Few AIPAC staffers are registered lobbyists. Most provide research materials, talking points, and speeches for legislators or prepare AIPAC's Near East Report, a biweekly publication, now online, that is considered required reading on Capitol Hill. AIPAC gains additional access to Congress by providing volunteer interns to serve in congressional offices.

At election time, AIPAC mobilizes a disciplined army of volunteer lobbyists across the country and runs regional sessions to train them as donors and workers in the camp of every likely candidate for Congress from both parties. All prospective candidates are asked by AIPAC to make a statement expressing their support for Israel, which AIPAC provides to its members and prospective donors. Each spring, AIPAC holds a conference in Washington that is addressed by the US president, vice president, and/or high-ranking Cabinet members. Approximately half of Congress attends, including the Democratic and Republican leaders in the Senate and House, who pledge their support to Israel and their commitment to maintaining strong US-Israel ties. Names of congressional attendees are publicized by AIPAC to enhance their status among Jewish donors.

Regional AIPAC conferences are held across the country to which local politicians and public officials, including mayors, city council members, school superintendents, and police chiefs, are invited. They are usually addressed by an important member of Congress or a governor from another state, whose presence is reported only to the local Jewish media. Afterward, the local officials are likely to be sent on free trips to Israel by local Jewish community relations councils, federations, or other community organizations, where they meet the prime minister and key Israeli officials, tour Israel and West Bank settlements, and visit the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum. From this group of civil servants invariably emerge new members of Congress already supportive of the Israeli position by the time they reach Washington.

AIPAC is not a PAC (political action committee) and does not contribute directly to political campaigns, although individual members of AIPAC's board do contribute considerable amounts. AIPAC does provide honoraria to speakers at its functions as well as free trips to Israel for congressional members through the American Israel Education Fund, a tax-exempt foundation set up specifically for that purpose. AIPAC staff analyze congressional voting records on legislation relevant to Israel, information that organizations and individuals in the pro-Israel community use to determine where their contributions can be most effective, either directly or through one of several dozen Jewish PACs, some of which are led by AIPAC board members. AIPAC claims it does not endorse candidates, which would violate its legal status, but internal memos indicate that AIPAC has advised PACs where to send their donations. A suit brought against AIPAC in 1989 alleging collusion was unsuccessful. Between 1990 and 2004, the Center for Responsive Politics estimated, pro-Israel PACs gave almost $23 million to candidates and the major political parties, about 70 percent of which went to Democrats.

A hallmark of AIPAC's power is its ability to get an overwhelming number of senators from both parties to sign a letter to a US president to protest White House policies viewed as not in Israel's best interests. Among the most notable was the letter addressed to President GERALD FORD by 76 senators on 21 May 1975 after Ford suspended aid to Israel and threatened to reassess US policy, in the wake of Israel's refusal to participate in the Sinai II Accord in the aftermath of the 1973 War, and after months of intense shuttle diplomacy by

Secretary of State HENRY KISSINGER. As a result of the senators' letter, Ford backed down.

AIPAC had proved its clout with Ford's predecessor, RICHARD NIXON, when it pushed through the Senate the Jackson-Vanick Amendment to the 1972 US trade agreement with the SOVIET UNION, which tied US trade with Moscow to allowing the emigration of SOVIET JEWS. Both Nixon and Kissinger opposed the linkage, which guaranteed a specific annual quota of emigration of Jews and seriously set back the administration's efforts to establish detente with the Soviets. Senator J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.), who opposed the amendment, told CBS's Face the Nation in 1973: "For many years I have felt that the situation in the Middle East was very nearly hopeless. The fundamental problem for us is that we have lost our freedom of action in the Middle East and are committed to policies that promote neither our own national interest nor the cause of peace. AIPAC and its allied organizations have effective working control of the electoral process. They can elect or defeat nearly any congressman or senator that they wish with their money and coordinated organization." AIPAC proved Fulbright's point by successfully targeting him for defeat when he ran for reelection.

AIPAC helped build support for both US wars against Iraq (1991 and 2003). While not taking a formal stand after Iraq invaded KUWAIT and with Congress split down the middle, AIPAC officials worked behind the scenes, lobbying senators sitting on the fence to get the 52–47 vote to go to war.

AIPAC survived an embarrassment in 1992 when David Steiner, then AIPAC president, boasted in a secretly recorded phone conversation that he had made a deal with the first BUSH administration to increase US aid to Israel and that he was negotiating with the incoming CLINTON administration over the appointment of a pro-Israel secretary of state. "We have a dozen people in his [Clinton's] headquarters and they are all going to get big jobs," he said. When the transcript was released, Steiner resigned. Subsequent events, however, proved him right. Madeleine Albright was appointed secretary of state; former AIPAC staffer Australian Martin Indyk was appointed ambassador to Israel, an appointment that required a special act of Congress to expedite his citizenship; and key Cabinet members in the Clinton administration (e.g., DENNIS ROSS, AARON DAVID MILLER, and Sandy Berger) and their staffs turned out to be "warm Jews," a term used in Israel for Jewish Americans who have a strong affinity for Israel.

In 2005, the embarrassment was more serious when the close relationship between AIPAC and the government led to federal indictments of two key AIPAC staff members, Steve Rosen and Keith Weismann, who were fired after being charged with receiving classified information from a high-level Pentagon official and passing it on to Israel. As of 1 March 2009, the case had still not come to trial.

AIPAC has not always been successful on policy promotion either. For example, in 1981 President RONALD REAGAN, considered a good friend of Israel, squeezed through the sale of AWAC intelligence-gathering planes to SAUDI ARABIA over the lobby's objections. But the administration did agree to the concession that the planes would be jointly flown by Americans and Saudis. In any case, AIPAC did not consider the sale a complete loss because it had forced Reagan to personally lobby to win the vote and thus enhanced AIPAC's reputation on Capitol Hill.

In September 1991, AIPAC suffered another setback when President GEORGE H. W. BUSH rejected Israel's demand for $10 billion in US guaranteed loans over a five-year period, when Congress appeared ready to approve the request by a large margin. Fearing that approval of the guarantees would allow Israel to withdraw from the upcoming MADRID CONFERENCE, Bush asked Israeli prime minister YITZHAK SHAMIR to postpone the request for 120 days and made approval conditional on Israel freezing Jewish SETTLEMENTS and agreeing that no Russian immigrants would be allowed to settle in the Occupied Territories. Shamir refused, confident that Congress would prevail in a showdown with the president. On 12 September, with the knowledge that AIPAC had sufficient votes in Congress to override his veto and taking note of the more than a thousand American Jews representing various organizations mobilized by AIPAC who had come to Capitol Hill to express support for the loans, Bush called a press conference and made an extraordinary televised appeal to the US people. Pounding his fist on the lectern, he described Israel's insistence on the guarantees as undermining the forthcoming peace conference and threatened to use his veto power to keep that from happening. Bush told the public: "We are up against some powerful political forces, very strong and effective groups that go up to the Hill. We have only got one lonely little guy down here doing it [but] I am going to fight for what I believe. I believe the American people will be with me.” He also noted that during the current fiscal year, despite its own economic worries, the United States had provided Israel with more than $4 billion worth of aid, “nearly $1,000 for each Israeli man, woman, and child.” Given the overwhelming public support for Bush’s position in polls taken immediately afterward, AIPAC and Israel’s supporters in Congress chose to pull back and defer to the four-month waiting period. In Israel, Bush’s response was seen as a setback for Shamir and in the next election he was replaced by YITZHAK RABIN. With the 1992 elections in sight and losing ground in the polls, Bush then agreed to the loan guarantees with the proviso that the amount of money that Israel spent in the Occupied Territories be deducted from the total.

Yet such AIPAC setbacks pale in comparison to its achievements. AIPAC has been circumspect in targeting presidents at election time who have failed, in its perception, to adequately support Israel, but it has not hesitated to take on members of the House and Senate who have publicly taken an independent position with regard to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. There its victims have come from both parties. Among the more prominent have been Senator Fulbright (D-Ark.), Senator Charles Percy (R-Ill.), Senator Adlai Stevenson, Jr. (D-Ill.), Representative Paul (Pete) McCloskey (R-Calif.), and Representative Paul Findley (R-Ill.), who documented the lobby’s role in his best-selling They Dare to Speak Out. Several other Democrats lost their seats largely due to the lobby’s efforts: Gus Savage (Ill.), Earl Hilliard (Ala.), and Cynthia McKinney (Ga.), all members of the Congressional Black Caucus who had been critical of Israeli policies toward the Palestinians.

A member of Congress who supports Israel may not receive any tangible support from AIPAC but may have the assurance that it will not support an opponent. One who openly criticizes Israel, however, is sure to encounter a rival who will be backed by the lobby. Many members of Congress justify their support for Israel by declaring it to be in America’s “national interest,” but few ever mention their support for Israel in communications to their non-Jewish constituents.

What gives AIPAC such influence? It is a combination of factors, but certainly uppermost are the millions of dollars contributed to political candidates by wealthy Jews and pro-Israel PACs. That funding combined with the organization, sophistication, and political savvy of AIPAC itself in conjunction with the numerous other groups working on Israel’s behalf as well as the fact that pro-Israel Jewish partisans are willing to set aside differences on domestic issues and sometimes over a particular Israeli policy to unite behind Israel with one voice. A 1976 study concluded that the multitiered structural pyramid that links individual Jews in local communities across the country to centralized national foreign policy leadership groups in Washington and New York is the primary organizational factor that can explain the ability of the pro-Israel movement to mobilize rapidly and in a coordinated fashion on a national scale when important foreign policy issues arise. The Internet has enhanced this process.

Political Action Committees. An estimated thirty-six known pro-Israel political action committees contribute money to members of Congress on the basis of their support for Israel. The largest is the National Political Action Committee (NATPAC). Although having no formal connection with AIPAC, NATPAC and other PACs receive information about the positions and votes of Congress members and their challengers on Israel and, it is assumed, advice as to who is most deserving of funds. Unlike other lobby groups, few of these PACs disclose the nature of their fundraising focus; for example, Americans for Better Citizenship, Americans United for Democracy, Desert Caucus, Northern Californians for Good Government, and St. Louisans for Good Government, are all pro-Israel PACs. For this reason, their critics have called them “stealth PACs.”

The number of pro-Israel PACs has varied over the years. In 1988, 78 pro-Israel PACs donated $5.4 million to 477 candidates for Congress, more than any other special interest group. Between 1990 and 2004, pro-Israel groups contributed nearly $57 million to candidates of both parties and in 2006 the figure was $3 million. These figures do not include donations made by individuals outside of the PAC structure.

The second most influential pro-Israel political group is the fifty-two-member Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, or the Presidents Conference. Whereas AIPAC focuses on Congress, the Presidents Conference concentrates on the White House. As its name suggests, this organization is composed of the heads of all the major Jewish groups in the United States and, through its executive director and rotating chair, carries out its responsibilities for liaising with the White House. It was founded during the DWIGHT EISENHOWER presidency at the request of Secretary of State JOHN FOSTER DULLES so that he would have to deal with only one spokesperson representing US Jewry. Subsequent presidents from the organization have had direct access to the US president and top officials in all administrations.

Under President Clinton, Presidents' Conference director Malcolm Hoenlein took credit for what became the Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, the first legislation targeting fund-raising endeavors of Islamic groups in the United States while adding 28 new death penalty crimes to the federal register. The degree of visible public activity by the Presidents Conference depends on who serves as its chair. During the buildup to the GULF WAR, the office was held by Mortimer Zuckerman, owner and publisher of U.S. News and World Report and the (New York) Daily News, who used the editorial space in both publications to lobby for the war, although the Presidents Conference took no official position.

The Presidents Conference issues a free five-day-a-week Daily Alert, prepared by the Israel-based Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, that summarizes and presents links to news stories favorable to Israel from the international, US, and Hebrew press, combined with commentary and pro-Israel talking points on issues related to Israel and the Middle East. It also sponsors America's Voices, a program that enables the nation's talk show hosts to visit Israel and do their broadcasts from there.

State and Local Groups. The national coordinating body for 13 national Jewish agencies and 125 local Jewish community relations councils, which represent the organized American Jewish community at the local level, is the Jewish Council of Public Affairs (JCPA). Pro-Israel resolutions passed at its national meetings are sent to Congress. The community relations councils act as critical sources for grassroots pro-Israel activity, which involves lobbying on Israel's behalf among local and federal politicians as well as through the media.

The component federations of United Jewish Communities (UJC), both a lobbying and philanthropic organization, carry out similar activities at the local level. UJC represents 155 Jewish federations and 400 independent Jewish communities across the United States. As with AIPAC, one of UJC's most important activities is sending delegations of local politicians (mayors, supervisors, city council members, etc.) on free trips to Israel. UJC also acts as the liaison between Israel and the American Jewish community, interfacing with the US government, the JEWISH AGENCY FOR ISRAEL, the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), the business community, the voluntary sector, opinion makers, the media, and the general public.

Four Small Political Organizations. The oldest and at one time the most important pro-Israel organization is the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA). Still influential today, the ZOA has become the voice of the most extreme right-wing elements in Israel, opposing a Palestinian state and, at times, condemning AIPAC and the Israeli government when it perceives it as capitulating to the Palestinians—for example, on the OSLO ACCORDS and ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL WITHDRAWAL FROM GAZA. The ZOA is close to the CHRISTIAN evangelicals who, for religious reasons, have adopted similar pro-Israel positions, a move that gives ZOA greater clout among Republicans with a rightist social agenda. The Wall Street Journal has called the ZOA “the most credible advocate for Israel on the American Jewish scene.”

A smaller organization, Americans for a Safe Israel, lobbies Congress to keep “Judea, Samaria [the West Bank], Gaza and the Golan as integral parts of Israel” and “essential to US security.”

From the other side of the spectrum and generally supporting Israel's Labor Party are Americans for Peace Now (APN) and the Israel Policy Forum (IPF). APN is affiliated with Shalom Achshav (Peace Now) and lobbies for a TWO-STATE SOLUTION. Their support of the US-Israel relationship is as strong as that of the hard-liners, but they are far less effective in getting their message across. Founded in 1993 after the Oslo Accords, the IPF supports Labor's two-state position and likewise has not been very effective.

Media

One of the most important elements in the work of the political organizations are the efforts it expends to ensure that television, radio, newspapers, and other media present Israel and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in a light that is favorable to Israel. A virtual phalanx of groups and individuals lobby the media full-time, pressuring media owners, managers, producers, editors, reporters, and newscasters to take a pro-Israel perspective. This aspect of their work is arguably the most important because consistent pro-Israel government policymaking could not take place in the absence of supportive public opinion. Pro-Israel groups have instituted boycotts of the New York Times, the Washington Post, and the San Francisco Chronicle, all Jewish-owned or -managed papers, yet accused of having a pro-Palestinian and anti-Israel bias.

The most visible and arguably most influential of the pro-Israel lobby's media monitoring agencies is the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA). It was established in the aftermath of Israel's invasion of LEBANON in 1982 to counter negative images of Israel arising from that war. While purportedly "devoted to promoting accurate and balanced coverage of Israel and the Middle East" and fostering "rigorous reporting," CAMERA quickly became a censor of print, radio, and television media that it deemed to have an anti-Israel or pro-Palestinian bias.

On its website CAMERA explains how it works: "CAMERA systematically monitors, documents, reviews and archives Middle East coverage, and staffers directly contact reporters, editors, producers and publishers requesting that they alter what CAMERA believes is distorted or inaccurate coverage, offering them 'factual' information to correct errors. CAMERA members are encouraged to write letters for publication in the print media and to communicate with correspondents, anchors and network officials in the electronic media. CAMERA's combination of rigorous monitoring, research, fact-checking, careful analysis, and grassroots efforts have had a documented impact."

The "documented impact" in one instance involved a public radio station. In 2002, CAMERA went after WBUR, the National Public Radio (NPR) affiliate in Boston where CAMERA maintains its headquarters. Charging that NPR's coverage of the Middle East was tilted against Israel, CAMERA was able to persuade the station's donors and underwriters to withdraw an estimated $1 million in funding.

Another important media-monitoring group is HonestReporting, or Middle East Media Watch, which describes itself as "one of the world's largest media watch groups." Its website heralds its mission: "Israel is in the midst of a battle for public opinion—waged primarily via the media."

HonestReporting was founded in 2000 in response to what it considered anti-Israel reporting during the Second Intifada. Like CAMERA, it "scrutinize(s) the media for examples of anti-Israel bias, and then mobilize[s] subscribers to complain directly to the news agency concerned," providing a how-to guide, contact information, and letter-writing guidelines. With websites in English, Italian, Spanish, and Russian, HonestReporting claims to have 55,000 members around the world.

In June 2002, CNN instituted major editorial changes brought about by an intense lobbying campaign on the part of HonestReporting, which greatly shifted public perception of the Israel-Palestinian conflict in general and the SUICIDE BOMBERS in particular. The group's role was mentioned in the New York Times, and the Jerusalem Post noted that "HonestReporting.com readers sent up to 6,000 e-mails a day to CNN executives, effectively paralyzing their internal e-mail system." Its MediaBackspin.com offers a daily blog on coverage of Middle East issues.

A pro-Israel group that provides translations of articles from Arabic, Farsi, and Hebrew to English-language publications and journalists is the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI). Its objective is to promote the policies of the Israeli government and paint a negative picture of Palestinians, Muslims, Arabs, and Iranians. MEMRI produces sophisticated academic-style translations and research papers on political, ideological, intellectual, social, cultural, and religious trends in the Middle East that are presented in English and also translated into German, Hebrew, Italian, French, Spanish, Turkish, and Russian. Many of the translations have been shown to slant material from the original sources.

During the Second Intifada, the Israeli government took a number of steps to improve its image in the United States, and The Israel Project (TIP) was one result. It was established in 2005 with the task of "educating the press and the public about Israel while promoting security, freedom and peace . . . working in close cooperation with the Israeli government." TIP brings reporters to Israel for briefings with top Israeli officials. Its initial project was "Intellicopter Tours," a guided helicopter ride for more than 100 journalists who reported on the removal of Jewish SETTLERS from Gaza—reporting that emphasized the tragedy of the settlers being forced from their homes. During Israel's bombardment of Gaza at the end of 2008 and the beginning of 2009, when Israel was forbidding foreign as well as Israeli reporters from entering Gaza, TIP provided trips to reporters on the Israeli side of the border where they were able to interview Israelis in towns that had been targeted by Palestinian rockets.

TIP's advisory board, as of January 2009, was composed almost exclusively of members of Congress: Senators Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), Ben Cardin, (D-Md.), Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.), Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), Susan Collins (R-Me.), Judd Gregg, (R-N.H.), Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) and House members Rob Andrews (D-N.J.), Shelley Berkley (D-Nev.), Tom Davis (R-Va.), Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.), Frank Pallone (D-N.J.), Jon Porter (R-Nev.), Jim Saxton (R-N.J.), Brad Sherman (D-Calif.), and Joe Wilson (R-S.C.). The sole member of the board who was not in Congress was actor and film director Ron Silver. Note: Coleman will be removed if he loses his contested reelection bid.

Academia

University campuses in the United States have long been the sites of Israeli-Palestinian conflict, often nearly as intense as the real-life conflict in the Middle East. Professors and students who have participated in divestment or boycott campaigns against Israel or in pro-Palestinian campus activities have been subject to intense pressure from pro-Israel groups, which have countered by conducting forums, bringing in Israeli speakers, sending student delegations to Israel, and attempting to silence professors. More than one professor has been denied tenure or promotion due to pressure from pro-Israeli groups; for example, on 8 June 2007, DePaul University professor Norman Finkelstein was denied tenure; later the same year Columbia University professor Joseph Massad was denied tenure. In February 2009, Bard College fired Joel Kovel, who had for eighteen years held the Alger Hiss Chair of Social Studies. There are other instances, but the fear in academia caused by just these three cases has been enough to suppress open debate by professors across the country.

In 1979 the University Service Department of the now defunct (or transformed) American Zionist Youth Foundation issued Israel on Campus: A Source-book for Activists, which by its second printing in 1982 was 116 pages (school binder size). The book explained "basic" issues from a Zionist perspective, included organizing skills and how to implement "Israel and Zionist programming," and provided an extensive resource directory plus public relations and problem-solving tips. Since then, pro-Israel campus operations have become more extensive. In 2002, in response to the Second Intifada, a network of twenty-eight national Jewish organizations, large and small, and mostly based off-campus, formed the Israel on Campus Coalition (ICC) to work "collaboratively to assist students in fostering support for Israel on the college campus." Its member organizations have led the resistance to efforts by pro-Palestinian campus groups to get their colleges and universities to divest their holdings in Israeli companies and State of Israel Bonds, or to hold Palestine support rallies and invite pro-Palestinian speakers to their campuses.

One of ICC's most active members is AIPAC, which has a long history of campus involvement. In 1979 it formed a Political Leadership Development Program that "educates and trains young leaders in pro-Israel political advocacy." It also enlisted hundreds of college students to collect information on "pro-Palestinian" professors and student organizations. By 1983 the program had attracted more than 5,000 students on 350 campuses in all fifty states. In 1984 the students' findings were published in The AIPAC College Guide: Exposing the Anti-Israel Campaign on Campus, which examined 100 campuses and instructed students on how to counter a "steady diet of anti-Israel vituperation."

Among AIPAC's primary activities in this regard is bringing student body presidents to Washington, where they meet with high-level pro-Israeli lobbyists and American government officials who guide them in responding to pro-Palestinian or anti-Israeli activities on their respective campuses. AIPAC claims to have recruited and trained four student activists on each of sixty campuses in thirty-five states to combat "anti-Israel incidents." According to its website, AIPAC's goal is "nothing short of repositioning the American campus to be a tangible asset to the pro-Israel movement."

The Presidents Conference is also a part of the ICC, and its contribution, in collaboration with the Jewish Council of Public Affairs, was to send, every Sunday, Israel Campus Beat, an e-mail digest of news and opinion about Israel and the Middle East, to “thousands of university students across North America.” After publishing on a regular basis in 2006 and 2007, it came out only once in 2008, but reappeared with a special issue supporting Israel’s war on Gaza in January 2009.

The American Jewish Committee (AJC, discussed in next section) is also a part of ICC and has supported efforts to silence university professors who have been critical of Israel. In the instance of Palestinian professor Sami Al-Arian, AJC mounted a failed effort to have him convicted of being linked to terrorists. In 2002, the AJC succeeded in getting more than 300 college and university presidents to sign a full-page ad in the New York Times “condemning intimidation on campus,” noting in particular “such behavior directed toward Jews and Zionists.” In 2007, in response to a vote by Britain’s New University and College Union to boycott Israeli academic institutions, it produced a similar ad with as many signatures.

The Anti-Defamation League (discussed in the next section) has worked with the AJC and ZOA in lobbying for legislation that would curtail the teaching of professors of Middle East studies who espouse criticism of Israel and US Middle East policy.

ICC member Campus Watch is a project of the Middle East Forum (MEF), both of which are largely the efforts of Daniel Pipes, a pro-Israeli activist. What CAMERA is to the mainstream media, Campus Watch and MEF are to colleges and universities, reviewing and critiquing course syllabi, monitoring what professors say in the classroom, and attempting to alter Middle East studies in North America, “with an aim to improve them.” In September 2002, Campus Watch created an Internet backlash when it posted “dossiers” on eight professors who had been critical of US foreign policy and Israel’s treatment of the Palestinians. In response, more than 100 academics contacted Campus Watch asking to be added to the list. Pipes has since posted more than 140 new names, all identified as supporters of and “apologists for suicide bombings and militant Islam.”

In 2002, following Israel’s attack on Palestinian refugee camps, pro-Israel interests created The David Project (TDP), which became nationally known when it released a video, Columbia Unbecoming, which accused Columbia University of being hostile to Jews and Israel and targeted three professors of Middle Eastern background for dismissal, alleging that the three were biased against Israel and did not present or tolerate dissenting opinions. TDP’s accusations, though disputed by students on the Columbia University campus, were supported by CAMERA. TDP also offers a Campus Fellows program that provides Jewish students with a training seminar so they can respond to “the anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment they meet on campus.”

Other organizations that are part of the ICC annually send hundreds of Jewish students and student leaders to Israel as part of their training to be pro-Israel advocates upon their return. They include Hadassah (see section on “Women’s Groups”), through its Hamagshimim Israel Fellowships; Hasbara Fellowships, which entail working with Israel’s Ministry of Foreign Affairs; Hillel, through Birthright Israel; and the Jewish National Fund (JNF), through its Caravan for Democracy.

The largest Jewish campus organization, with chapters at more than 500 colleges and universities, is Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life. Hillel has focused on countering the on-campus divestment movements and all activities that it deems “anti-Israel.” It also has close ties to the Israeli government. When, in October 2005, the Israeli government decided that its image in the United States could be improved by avoiding references to its conflict with the Palestinians or religious issues, Hillel became part of the program known as “Brand Israel.” Hillel contributed “Israel Starts with I,” which consisted of seven kickoff events at large schools, with Israeli bands and speakers, designed to portray Israel as a place “where there are cool, hip people.”

Another group founded to counter criticism of Israel on college campuses as well as the divestment campaigns targeting Israel in the United States and abroad is Scholars for Peace in the Middle East (SPME), with “well over 600 members, representing 200 campuses worldwide.” SPME’s purpose is to assist faculty in responding to “the ideological distortions, including ANTI-SEMITIC and ANTI-ZIONIST slanders that poison debate and work against peace.” It has worked with other ICC members to have Congress pass legislation that would mandate teaching of Middle East issues from a pro-Israel perspective.

Another organization working against divestment campaigns and the “anti-Israel bias” in the media and on college campuses is Stand With Us (SWU), which was particularly active during Israel's war on Gaza at the end of 2008 and the beginning of 2009. SWU runs four programs:

1. Educational Action for Israel, which develops materials on the Israel-Palestine conflict and trains pro-Israel speakers
2. Call to Action for Israel, an umbrella group "to disseminate and share information" with other Jewish organizations
3. Media Action for Israel, which creates projects for the media to portray Israel in a favorable light
4. Campus Action for Israel, which sees its offices serving as a "hotline" for students, offering them speakers, films, flyers, and information on conferences

Multifunction Organizations

The American Jewish Committee (AJC) was founded in 1906 by German-Jewish immigrants to "strengthen Jews and Jewish life worldwide," and while supporting Jewish settlement in Palestine, it was officially non-Zionist up to the end of World War II. Now actively pro-Zionist, it serves as the foreign policy arm of pro-Israel groups. The AJC publishes articles and pamphlets on issues of concern to Jews and functions as an advocacy organization concerned with anti-Semitism, TERRORISM, "support of Israel's quest for security and peace," Jewish "Peoplehood," and other issues. The object of its foreign activities, according to its website, is "defending the core principles of human rights for all, the protection and well-being of Jewish communities abroad, support for a secure peace between Israel and its neighbors, and the fair treatment of Israel in the international community." Since 2007, it has been the leading public face of American Jewry in advocating a hard line toward IRAN's nuclear program. Although the AJC has been active internationally for many years, it increased its activity in that respect in 2004, when it established the Transatlantic Institute in Brussels, the site of the EUROPEAN UNION and NATO headquarters.

In Geneva, AJC operates UN Watch, which critically monitors the UNITED NATIONS' treatment of Israel. The AJC's consultative status at the UN gives it the right to testify at the organization's official proceedings. AJC staff and lay leaders regularly meet in foreign capitals with senior government officials, high-ranking military officers, and heads of local Jewish communities, while at its New York headquarters it hosts meetings with heads of state, foreign ministers, and military delegations when they visit the United States. As part of its extensive outreach to Latin American countries and to the burgeoning Hispanic community in the US, the AJC established the Latino and Latin American Institute.

The AJC has supplemented AIPAC's work on issues such as Soviet Jewry in the 1970s, opposing the Arab boycott of companies doing business with Israel, and calling for sanctions against Israel's enemies in the Middle East. Domestically, the AJC leads the pro-Israel organizations' opposition to the movement among churches to divest from companies doing business in Israel or the Occupied West Bank that support the Occupation. It continues to lobby ministers in churches that have voted to do so, such as the Presbyterian Church. It has succeeded in thwarting the Episcopalians and Congregationalists who were considering a similar divestment strategy.

Another multifunction pro-Israel organization, the American Jewish Congress, was founded in 1918 and has been primarily concerned with defending against what it perceives to be threats to Jewish interests at home and abroad. This has involved public policy advocacy in the courts, Congress, the executive branch, and local legislatures. Its mission has been (1) the safety and security of Israel and of Jews throughout the world in the face of the threat of worldwide terrorism; (2) protection of Jewish communities in the United States and overseas against the menace of anti-Semitism; and (3) preservation of separation of church and state in the United States. Additionally, the AJC Congress has been "actively engaged in political education and in the recruitment to our ranks of individuals of particular prominence in the political and public policy arenas."

A 16 August 2006 posting on its website entitled "Thanks to All Who Helped with House Passage of the US-Israel Energy Cooperation Act" refers to legislation initially drafted by the AJC Congress, put into legislative form by Representative Brad Sherman (D-Calif.) shepherded through Congress by Representatives John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.), and Sherman; and supported in the Jewish community by NORPAC (a pro-Israel political action committee), AIPAC, and JCPA (Jewish Council for Public Affairs). Originally founded as a liberal counterpoint to the American Jewish Committee, its strength and numbers have been in steady decline in recent years.

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) was founded in 1913 as part of a larger organization of German-Jewish immigrants, B'nai B'rith, specifically to fight anti-Semitism. According to its website, "Where once we protested admissions quotas at leading graduate schools, today we expose Internet sites devoted to Holocaust denial and white-supremacist propaganda. In the past, we challenged the anti-Semitic ranting of demagogues like Father Coughlin; in the present, we are no less vocal in opposition to Louis Farrakhan."

ADL was among the first Jewish organizations to target Israel's critics and "pro-Palestinian" professors and students at the university level. In 1983, the year after Israel invaded Lebanon, it published a booklet that was distributed to its members and the national media containing background information on "pro-Arab sympathizers who are active on college campuses." As an ICC member, the ADL continues to provide pro-Israel training materials to Jewish campus activists.

Maintaining support for Israel within the African-American community has long been a major concern of the pro-Israel establishment; it has been primarily ADL's job to handle this task.

Though the ADL's original mission was to combat anti-Semitism, according to the ADL's website, "soon after its establishment, ADL's mission expanded to include the eradication of bias and discrimination against people of all races and religions." Ironically, this led it to initiate the legal fight to overturn affirmative action legislation, because ADL opposed quotas. This action created friction between the ADL and leading African-American organizations, but not to such a degree as to cause a public rift, in part because, as in the case of the NAACP, black civil rights organizations have been heavily dependent on Jewish philanthropy since its inception.

ADL's concern with deflecting African-American criticism of Israel after the 1967 WAR coincided with the emergence in the US of a militant version of the black liberation struggle that was embodied in the Black Panther Party, the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and the growth of the Nation of Islam (NOI) behind Malcolm X. These groups identified with third-world liberation movements and consequently with the plight of the Palestinians. They declared that the alliance between blacks and Jews from the early days of the civil rights movement was over.

In response, the ADL launched an attack on black professors and in particular on Louis Farrakhan, who had become the leader of the NOI following the death of its founder, Elijah Mohammed. In every city where he has spoken, the ADL and local Jewish leaders have demanded that leading black officials denounce him. In 1992, the ADL issued a 50-page booklet that contained the names and backgrounds of African-American professors and activists whom it classified as "demagogues" and "extremists." It was a roundup of what the ADL described as the "Anti-Semitism of Black Student Groups on Campus." It also contained a section on black newspapers and radio stations that the ADL claimed were anti-Semitic.

The ADL's overly aggressive pursuit of the NOI and Farrakhan caught the attention of the FBI in December 1992 and led to the FBI and the San Francisco Police Department raiding the group's San Francisco office. They uncovered a massive nationwide spying operation that the ADL had been conducting on progressive organizations for at least 25 years in the name of "intelligence gathering." Depositions taken at the time revealed that the ADL had illegally provided nonpublic information to the governments of Israel and South Africa regarding opponents of both regimes. In the computer of the ADL agent arrested by the police were, in addition to files on skinhead and neo-Nazi groups, files on over 12,000 individuals and 600 organizations separated into "Pinko," Arab, and anti-apartheid categories. In the Pinko (i.e., those with liberal or radical views) file were the NAACP and other black, Latino, and Asian political organizations. The ADL agent, who had been paid through a third party for 25 years, admitted he had also been spying on the African National Congress, black African exiles, and anti-apartheid activists for South African intelligence services. Nevertheless, as a result of high-level political pressure, the San Francisco district attorney dropped the case, and the ADL settled two related lawsuits out of court.

The ADL's surveillance activities had no long-term effects on its relation to law enforcement agencies overall, and it still maintains a working relationship with the FBI and local police departments in their investigation of hate crimes and, since 11 September 2001, the pursuit of “the war on terrorism.” To facilitate these interests, the ADL sends delegations of US police chiefs to Israel to study the counterterrorism measures it has employed against the Palestinians. In addition, it has established a Law Enforcement Agency Resource Network (LEARN) that it describes as a “new comprehensive and innovative initiative to assist law enforcement in the battle against extremists.”

The ADL is also active in the public schools through its World of Difference Institute, the program of which includes “workshops and curricular materials for teachers, support staff, classified staff, administrators, and students from grades K–12” and extends through college campuses, the general community, and the workplace. It has expanded the program to Germany, the European Union, Israel, Austria, Japan, and Argentina. In addition, ADL’s Braun Holocaust Institute has introduced an extensive Holocaust education program into the schools.

ADL is assisted in this project by Hadassah, which today operates the ADL-originated Curriculum Watch at the secondary school level, examining “American textbooks to detect inaccuracies and bias as relating to Judaism, the Holocaust, and the history of Israel.” When its Academic Resource Corps detects a problem, it “alerts . . . [its] Academic Advisory Board, made up of university professors with related expertise,” who review the texts “to determine whether they are factual, inclusive, and unbiased in their presentation.”

When the exposure of ADL’s national spying operation forced it to retreat from its aggressive pro-Israel public stance, Hadassah continued implementing Curriculum Watch and took the lead in pressuring the American Library Association to rescind a resolution it had passed in 1991 that criticized Israel’s censorship of Palestinian libraries.

Think Tanks

The importance of think tanks in the policymaking process cannot be overstated. Not only do they produce important policy papers, but they serve as revolving doors for government officials, Israeli as well as American, when they are out of office. Copies of policy papers go directly to members of Congress and frequently serve as the basis for legislation. The Washington Institute for Near East Policy (WINEP) is one of the most influential think tanks. Although it cannot be classified as a specifically Jewish organization, it is decidedly pro-Israel. WINEP was founded in 1985 by Larry Weinberg, a past president of AIPAC, and its first executive director was a British-born Australian Jew, Martin Indyk, who had previously worked in AIPAC’s research department and would later be named ambassador to Israel by President Clinton. The goal of WINEP, Weinberg told friends, was to alter the intellectual atmosphere surrounding Middle East discussions in the Capitol. WINEP has become an omnipresent authority in Washington’s Middle East discussions and on the nation’s TV news programs, and it directly influences critical decisions concerning US foreign policy that affects Israel.

WINEP appears to have been a major source for policy decisions of Presidents George H. W. and George W. Bush as well as for Bill Clinton regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. A long list of WINEP alumni have been appointed to key policymaking positions in the higher echelons of the Executive Branch during their administrations, including the National Security Council, the State Department, and the Pentagon.

A recent addition to pro-Israel think tanks, although it does not identify itself as such, is the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies (FDD). It was founded two days after 9/11 by a group of Jewish philanthropists and policymakers “to support the defense of democratic societies under assault by terrorism and militant Islamism.” Its main goals, however, appear to be building support for Israel and diminishing public outcry against Israeli violence. Among its leading donors are Leonard Abramson of US Healthcare; New York financier Michael Steinhardt; the late Edgar S. Bronfman Sr., patriarch of Seagram’s and president of the World Jewish Congress, along with his brother Charles Bronfman; Lynne Schusterman, widow of Oklahoma oil executive Charles Schusterman and the major funder for the Israel on Campus Coalition; and Bernard Marcus, founder of Home Depot.

As indicated by its website, “FDD spokespersons appear in national, international, and Arabic-language media outlets on average seven times a day, seven days a week to deliver powerful, effective messages about the need to fight terrorism and promote democratic values.” Despite the bipartisan appearance of the prestigious group of former and present government officials and current members of Congress listed on its board of directors and advisory boards, the direction of the organization appears to be determined by the links maintained by its board members with leading pro-Israel and neoconservative think tanks such as WINEP, the American Enterprise Institute (AEI), the Center for Security Policy, and the Project for a New American Century (PNAC).

One of the most important pro-Israel think tanks, especially in regard to US-Israeli military cooperation, is the Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs (JINSA). Since its founding in 1976, it has played a major role in shaping US Middle East policy. JINSA has consistently advocated raising the military budget and curtailing US support for arms control while supporting the most right-wing elements in Israeli politics. A significant number of its members have either served or been appointed to upper-level policymaking positions in the White House, Defense and State Departments, and the CIA, where they have been able to pursue and realize their agenda in tandem with other right-wing Jewish lobbying groups. Identified closely with the neoconservative movement, JINSA board members are represented in significant numbers at leading Washington think tanks such as the American Enterprise Institute, the Hudson Institute, WINEP, and PNAC. On the domestic side, JINSA offers its Law Enforcement Exchange Program, a series of two-day conferences at which Israeli experts are brought to the United States to teach Israel's counterterror techniques to police officers from around the country. Some conferences have attracted as many as 1,400 attendees. Smaller groups are treated to similar training programs in Israel. Unlike WINEP and AEI, JINSA keeps a low public profile.

Labor Unions

In 1983, former AIPAC staff member, now CNN commentator, Wolf Blitzer wrote that it was not surprising that the lobby of the AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington holds a bust of former Israeli prime minister GOLDA MEIR, because "with the exception of the American Jewish community, the American labor movement has been, over the years, the single most important source of support for Israel in the United States."

The Jewish Labor Committee (JLC) has been the official Jewish voice in the labor movement since its 1934 founding in New York in response to the rise of Nazism in Germany. Its strength has been due largely to the presence of Jews among the leadership of many of the major international unions, even when there is no longer a significant Jewish working class.

The JLC's board of directors reflects its power within the union movement despite its relatively small size and the fact that only the public-sector unions today have a sizable number of Jewish members. JLC's board includes Morton Bahr, former president of the Communications Workers of America, who serves as its treasurer; and Andrew Stern, the president of the Service Employees International Union, one of the country's two largest unions. An estimated 1,700 labor unions have invested at least $5 billion of their members' pension funds in Israel bonds.

Longtime AFL-CIO president Lane Kirkland claimed to have attended more Israel Bonds dinners "than any man alive," and his successor, John Sweeney, has made statements indicating he is no less dedicated to supporting Israel. Labor's official position was summarized by AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer Richard Trumka when he called on unionists "to invest in the [Israel] bonds that are such a tangible link between our movement and the continuing struggle to nurture and protect the State of Israel." Given that the labor unions are a major part of the funding base for the Democratic Party, the investment of US labor unions in Israel bonds has a powerful impact on US domestic politics.

Business

The Association of American-Israel Chambers of Commerce (AAICC) comprises eleven regional US-Israel chambers of commerce and state governmental agencies that focus on Israel. AAICC claims to be the only economic development group to promote the interests of the US-Israel business community, "ready to assist its members in capitalizing on Israel's strong scientific and industrial capabilities." A review of the major investments by US corporations in Israel makes it appear that the AAICC has been eminently successful.

A cornerstone of the US-Israel relationship is the State of Israel Bonds Organization. Sales of Israel government bonds run in the tens of billions of dollars and included, through 2004, "more than 1,700 labor unions [pension funds], over 1,800 foundations, and numerous corporations, insurance companies, associations, [at least 20 state] pension funds, universities, and other institutions as well as private investors,” according to Israel’s Ministry of Finance.

Although information about the number of private bondholders is not readily available, it was estimated in 1986 that they included approximately 9,500 pension funds, 3,500 banks, and 500 insurance companies. Through these sales, Israel has, in effect, obliged the bondholders to lobby Congress to make sure that Israel’s economy remains healthy so their investments are not jeopardized. Although the exact figures are not a matter of public record, labor unions are estimated to have invested at least $5 billion of their pension funds in Israel bonds.

Jewish Religious Bodies

The Jewish religious community is an increasingly formidable element of the pro-Israel lobby. The Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism (RAC), which is oriented toward the Democratic Party, has been described as second only to AIPAC for its prowess on Capitol Hill. Its website allows visitors to contact their congressional representatives and offers access to their voting records. RAC’s Advocacy Network and Cell Phone Advocacy Network can notify members of “crucial and pending legislation when their representatives are ‘undecided’ [on a] piece of legislation.” The site provides the daily schedule of committee meetings of the House and Senate and a search engine to locate pending legislation. Since 1977, RAC has held a “flagship public policy conference” in Washington after a new Congress takes office. Attendees receive “high-level briefings on current issues and critical legislation.”

Orthodox Jews received a boost in 1978 when newly elected Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN invited Christian evangelist leader Jerry Falwell to visit Israel. This led to greater support of Israel by the nation’s evangelical movement and increased lobbying by Orthodox Jewry, which found itself in agreement with Israel’s Christian supporters not only on Israeli issues but also on church-state separation, homosexuality, same-sex marriages, and abortion, which it opposes, as well as school vouchers, which it supports. On these positions, the Orthodox view differs sharply from that of secular and Reform Jews.

The lobbying arm of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America is the Orthodox Institute for Public Affairs (IPA), the largest Orthodox Jewish organization, with over 1,000 synagogues. The IPA furnishes Congress with policy briefings and coordinates an annual National Leadership Mission to Washington. Its Summer Internship Program places Orthodox Jewish college students in key governmental offices.

The National Council for Young Israel (NCYI) represents some 150 Orthodox congregations and nearly 25,000 families. At the far right among Jewish religious organizations, it is allied with the ZOA. NCYI lobbies Congress and the Jewish community against any agreement requiring Israel to give up any part of what it considers the Jewish biblical inheritance—Greater Israel, which means all of the West Bank, an undivided Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, and Gaza. The NCYI sends delegations to Congress and floods its representatives with letters and e-mails when the need arises.

Of growing strength is the American Friends of Lubavitch (AFL), the proselytizing sect of Hasidic Jews that established a base in Washington for the Chabad-Lubavitch movement during the Reagan administration. Boasting of “the largest network of Jewish educational and social service institutions in the world,” it has cultivated Washington-based diplomats from the 60 countries where it has taken a foothold. Its website claims that AFL’s Capitol Jewish Forum is the largest Jewish group on Capitol Hill and has enhanced “the identity and sense of community among Jewish Congressional staffers, and members of congress and the administration.”

Women’s Groups

There are a number of Jewish women’s groups in the United States, with the oldest and most active with regard to Israel being Hadassah. It annually holds a “Day on the Hill” that brings Hadassah chapters to Washington to meet members of Congress and receive briefings on issues relating to Israel. Hadassah’s website enables visitors to contact the president and their congressional representatives and to sign up for action alerts. It also runs an “Influentials to Israel” program that encourages elected officials, policymakers, and public opinion leaders to visit Israel.

In 2002, Hadassah and twelve other Jewish women’s groups united under the umbrella of One Voice—Jewish Women for Israel in response to criticism of Israel following its attack on the Palestinian refugee camp in JENIN in April 2002. Two months later and speaking “with a unified pro-Israel voice in the name of one million Jewish women,” One Voice launched its inaugural event, entitled Take Five: Call Congress for Israel. According to its website, thousands of Jewish women called their representatives to thank them for their “support [for] a strong and enduring US-Israel relationship.” Three months later, One Voice organized a similar call-in “to thank President Bush for the strong support the US government had demonstrated for Israel.” One Voice continued to organize annual Take Five call-ins to Congress and the White House through 2006 but it no longer is active.

See also ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT; MEDIA, US; UNITED STATES; US AID TO ISRAEL

Bibliography

- American Friends of Lubavitch. www.afldc.org.
 American-Israel Chambers of Commerce. www.israeltrade.org.
 American-Israel Cooperative Enterprise. www.Israeloncampuscoalition.org/aboutus/members/aice.htm.
 American-Israel Friendship League. www.aifl.org.
 American-Israel Public Affairs Committee. www.aipac.org.
 American Jewish Committee. www.ajc.org.
 American Jewish Congress. www.ajcongress.org.
 American Zionist Movement. www.azm.org.
 Americans for Peace Now. www.peacenow.org.
 Americans for Safe Israel. www.afsi.org.
 America’s Voices for Israel. www.americasvoices.net.
 Anti-Defamation League. www.adl.org.
 ———. Pro-Arab Propaganda in America: Vehicles and Voices: A Handbook. Boston: New England Office, November 1983. <http://www.ameu.org/page.asp?iid=168&aid=212&pg=4>.
 Arens, Moshe. Broken Covenant. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.
 Ball, George W., and Douglas B. The Passionate Attachment. New York: W.W. Norton, 1992.
 Bard, Mitchell. “Back to School on Campus Advocacy.” Forward. 30 May 2003. www.forward.com.
 Bar-Yosef, Avinoam. “Jews Who Run Clinton Court.” Ma’ariv. 2 September 1994.
 Black, Jeff. “Staunch U.S. Ally.” Jerusalem Post. 26 May 1989. www.jpost.co.il.
 Blankfort, Jeffrey. “The Long Arm of Israeli Censorship Reaches Out to Silence the American Library Association.” Middle East Labor Bulletin. Fall 1993.
 Blitzer, Wolf. “Love of Labor: Israel Constant Friend.” Hadassah Magazine. 7 (1983).
 B’nai B’rith. www.bnaibrith.org.
 CAMERA. “Urges Congress Action on NPR Israel Bias.” CAMERA press release. 29 April 1998. www.camera.org.
 Campus Watch. www.campuswatch.org.
 Cattan, Nacha. “Pol’s Bid to Honor Slain Israeli Driving Debate over Transfer.” Forward. 25 January 2002.
 Center for Responsible Politics. www.opensecrets.org/industries.
 “The Complete Unexpurgated AIPAC Tape.” Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. December–January 1992–1993.
 Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish American Organizations. www.conferenceofpresidents.org.
 “Congressmen Honor Rebbe of Lubavitch.” Forward. 29 March 1991.
 Crabtree, Susan. “Ban on Ads Reinstated: District Court Does Soft Money Flip-Flop.” Variety. 19 May 2003. www.variety.com.
 Curtiss, Richard. Stealth PACs: How Israel American Lobby Took Control of U.S. Middle East Policy. Washington, DC: American Educational Trust, 1990.
 David Project, The. www.davidproject.org.
 Donadio, Rachel. “Left and Right Get Wishes in Statement on Israel.” Forward. 22 March 2002.
 Edsall, Thomas B., and Molly Moore. “Pro-Israel Lobby Has Strong Voice.” Washington Post. 5 September 2004.
 Elcott, David. “Divest Anti-Israel Prejudice from Churches.” Forward. 26 August 2005.
 Evanier, David. The Anti-Semitism of Black Demagogues and Extremists. Anti Defamation League Research Report. New York: ADL, 1992.
 Fein, Leonard. “The Fear of Dual Loyalty.” Forward. 19 October 2001.
 Findley, Paul. They Dare to Speak Out. Westport, CT: Lawrence Hill, 1985.
 Foundation for the Defense of Democracy. www.defenddemocracy.org.
 Friedman, Robert. “The Anti-Defamation League Is Spying on You.” The Village Voice. 11 May 1993.
 Ginsberg, Benjamin. Fatal Embrace: Jews and the State. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993.
 Goldberg, J. J. Jewish Power. Reading, MA: Addison Wesley, 1996.
 Green, David. “Zionism vs. Intellectual Freedoms on American College Campuses.” Znet. 15 May 2005. www.zmag.org.
 Guttman, Nathan. “Money Makes the Jewish World Go Around.” Jerusalem Post. 11 November 2005. www.jpost.co.il.
 Hadassah. www.hadassah.org.
 Hasbara Fellowships. www.israelactivism.com.
 Hillel. www.hillel.org.
 Honest Reporting. www.honestreporting.com.
 “In D.C. Political Maelstrom, Chabad Man Makes His Mark.” Jewish Telegraphic Agency. 16 December 2005. www.jta.org.
 Israel Bonds, State of. www.israelbonds.com.
 Israel on Campus Coalition. www.israeloncampuscoalition.org.
 Israel Peace Forum. www.ipforum.org.
 Israel Project, The. www.israelproject.org.
 Issacs, Stephen D. Jews and American Politics. New York: Doubleday, 1974.
 Janssen, Mike. “PR Pro-Israel Critics Punish WBUR.” Current. 3 June 2002. www.current.org.

- Jewish Center for Public Affairs. www.jcpa.org.
- Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs. www.jinsa.org.
- Jewish Labor Committee. www.jewishlabor.org.
- Jewish National Fund. www.jnf.org.
- Jewish Telegraphic Agency. 22 November 2005. www.jta.org.
- Kampeas, Ron. "Effort for Review of Anti-Semitism on Campus Meeting New Resistance." In Israel's Defense Line. Edited by I. L. Kenen. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1981.
- Kampeas, Ron, and Matthew Berger. "IPAC: Staffers Fired Because of Revelations from Spy Probe." Jewish Telegraphic Agency. 20 April 2005. www.jta.org.
- Klinghoffer, David. "Save the Jews . . . from Christians?" National Review Online. 17 November 2005. www.nationalreview.com.
- Kondracke, Morton. "Enemies of Peace." The New Republic. 7 August 1989.
- Lilienthal, Alfred M. The Zionist Connection. New York: Dodd Mead, 1978.
- McCarthy, Daniel. "Most Favored Democracy: The Foundation for the Defense of Democracies Goes on Offense." American Conservative. 17 November 2003. www.amconmag.com.
- McNeil, Kristine. "The War on Academic Freedom." The Nation. 25 November 2002.
- Mearsheimer, John, and Stephen Walt. "The Israel Lobby." London Review of Books. 28:6 (23 March 2006).
- . The Israel Lobby and American Foreign Policy. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2007.
- Middle East Forum. www.meforum.org.
- Middle East Media Research Institute. www.memri.org.
- National Action Committee. www.nacpac.org.
- National Council for Jewish Women. www.ncjw.org.
- National Council of Young Israel. www.youngisrael.org.
- O'Brien, Lee. American Jewish Organizations and Israel. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1986.
- Orthodox Union/Institute for Public Affairs. www.ou.org/public.
- Passner, Deborah. "The Columbia Battleground." CAMERA. 31 March 2005. www.camera.org.
- Petras, James. The Power of Israel in the United States. Atlanta: Clarity, 2006.
- Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism. www.rac.org.
- Rojas, Aurelia. "Settlement Close on Suit in S.F. Spy Scandal." San Francisco Chronicle. 5 September 1996.
- Rosenblatt, Gary. "New Fronts in Campus Wars." N.Y. Jewish Week Online. 11 February 2005.
- Royer, Ismail. "Pro-Democracy's Think Tank Is Front for Israeli Lobby." Antiwar.com. 26 September 2002. www.antiwar.com/orig/royer1.html.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. Israel and the American National Interest. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Scholars for Peace in the Middle East. www.spme.net.
- Sherman, Scott. "The Mideast Comes to Columbia." Nation. 4 April 2005. www.thenation.com.
- Sherne, Gary, and Mike Rosenberg. Israel on the Campus: A Sourcebook for Activists. New York: American Zionist Youth Foundation, 1982.
- Simon Wiesenthal Center. www.wiesenthal.com.
- Smith, Grant F. "America's Defense Line." Institute for Research: Middle East Policy (IRMEP). Washington, DC: IRMEP, 2008.
- . "Declassified Deceptions." IRMEP. Washington, DC, 2007.
- . "Foreign Agents." IRMEP. Washington, DC, 2007.
- Sniegowski, Stephen J. Transparent Cabal. Norfolk, VA: Enigma, 2008.
- Stand With Us. www.standwithus.com.
- Tillman, Seth. The United States in the Middle East: Interests and Obstacles. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982.
- Tivnan, Edward. The Lobby: Jewish Political Power and American Foreign Policy. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.
- Trice, Robert H. "Interest Groups and the Foreign Policy Process: U.S. Policy in the Middle East." International Studies. Series 02-0747, vol. 4. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage Publications, 1976.
- Tugend, Tom. "AIPAC Summit Tackles Iran Nukes, College Strife." Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles. 28 October 2005. www.jewishjournal.com.
- Union for Reform Judaism. www.urj.org.
- Union of Progressive Zionists. www.habonimdror.org/peacepossible.
- United Jewish Communities. www.ujcfedweb.org.
- U.S. Congress. Congressional Record E723. 28 March 1995.
- . Report of House Subcommittee on the Expenditures of the Executive Department. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, October 1947.
- . Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. Activities of Nondiplomatic Representatives of Foreign Principals in the United States. (88th Cong., 1st sess., Part 9, 1339–40). 23 May 1963.
- "U.S. Unions Bankroll Israeli Aggression." Socialist Action. August 2002. www.socialistaction.org/news.
- Washington Institute for Near East Policy (WINEP). www.washingtoninstitute.org.
- Zionist Organization of America (ZOA). www.zoa.org.

—Jeffrey Blankfort

American Media

See MEDIA, US

Amir, Yigal (1970–)

Yigal Amir was a JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST student from Bar-Ilan University who, on 4 November 1995, shot and killed Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN. Amir was from a SEPHARDI Yemenite religious-nationalist family in Tel Aviv, attended HAREDI elementary school, yeshiva for his formal education, and served in the Golani Brigade of the Israel Defense Forces. In October 1993 he began studies in computer technology and theology at the Bar Ilan University in the Negev. Increasingly, he became opposed to the policy of Rabin and organized student demonstrations and trips to HEBRON (home to the most extremist Jewish settlers). With his IDF weapons permit, he bought a Beretta pistol, which he later used to assassinate Rabin. Police had arrested Amir twice during demonstrations prior to Rabin's murder. Amir was a member of a highly secretive, violence-prone group called EYAL (Jewish Fighting Organization). Avishai Raviv, the group's leader, was also charged with involvement in the Rabin assassination. An Israeli court sentenced Amir to life imprisonment for his crime.

Rabin's murder occurred in the context of the OSLO PROCESS, which religious-nationalist settlers strongly opposed. The SETTLERS had mounted a vigorous campaign against Rabin, depicting him as a traitor and a Nazi. They were supported by several prominent rabbis in the UNITED STATES and Israel who made provocative statements and in several cases issued religious edicts providing religious justification for killing Rabin. One of these was Rabbi Abraham Hecht of Brooklyn, who stated in June 1995 that it was permissible according to halakha (Jewish religious law) to kill Rabin because of the alleged danger to other Jews caused by his government's peace policies. How much Amir was influenced by such incitement is difficult to ascertain, but its prevalence is a phenomenon that must be acknowledged.

Bibliography

- Shahak, Israel. Jewish History, Jewish Religion: The Weight of Three Thousand Years. London: Pluto Press, 1994.
- Shahak, Israel, and Norton Mezvinsky. Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel, new ed. London: Pluto Press, 2004.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Amman Agreement, 1985

See HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT

Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, 1945–1946

As British power waned in the post–World War II period and the UNITED STATES under President HARRY TRUMAN began taking an increasing interest in the Palestine question, Truman called for the immediate admission of 100,000 Jewish refugees from the HOLOCAUST. British IMMIGRATION policy had been set in the 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, which outlined a five-year plan for the immigration of 75,000 Jews to Palestine (10,000 per annum and a further 25,000 refugees), but thereafter no further immigration without Palestinian agreement. Responding to President Truman's pleas to admit more Jewish displaced persons to Palestine, British prime minister Clement Attlee proposed a joint commission to study means of resolving the crisis.

Thus, in 1945, the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry Regarding the Problem of European Jewry and Palestine was established. Many Zionists considered the committee to be a stalling tactic on the part of the British, but Truman insisted on limiting the timetable of the committee to four months. The commission, composed of six British and six US delegates, heard testimony from witnesses in Washington, London, Europe, and the Middle East. The committee listened to Palestinians who argued against further Jewish immigration to Palestine and to Zionists who advocated unrestricted Jewish immigration.

The commission issued its report on 1 May 1946 and called for the Mandatory authorities to allow 100,000 Jews to enter the country immediately and to lift restrictions on Jewish LAND purchases. It proposed a BINATIONAL state in Palestine until a UN trusteeship could be implemented.

The US government accepted the commission's recommendations; however, the British did not. Zionist leaders in Palestine, including DAVID BEN-GURION, condemned the report, objecting to a future unified Palestine, and demanded the immediate establishment of a Jewish Commonwealth in Palestine, insisting that the JEWISH AGENCY be given responsibility for Jewish immigration. The Palestinians were equally unhappy with the commission's report and called for the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, an end to Jewish immigration, and a cessation of all land sales to Jews. The US and British governments then established the MORRISON-GRADY Commission to consider plans for the future of Palestine.

Bibliography

Nachmani, A. Great Power Discord in Palestine: The Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry into the Problems of European Jewry and Palestine 1945–46. London: Frank Cass, 1987.

Podet, Allen Howard. “The Success and Failure of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, 1945–46: Last Chance in Palestine.” Jewish Studies. 3 (1987).

Shaw, J. V. W., ed. A Survey of Palestine: Prepared in December, 1945 and January, 1946 for the Information of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, reprint ed. Vol. 1 of 3. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1991.

Bibliography

Amayreh, Khaled. “Little Fanfare on Pullout Day.” Al-Ahram Weekly (Cairo). 405 (26 November–2 December 1998).

Amnesty International. Palestinian Authority: Silencing Dissent. MDE 21/016/2000. 5 September 2000.

Aruri, Naseer H. “The Wye Memorandum: Netanyahu’s Oslo and Unreciprocal Reciprocity.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 28:2 (1999).

“Peace Monitor: 16 November 1998–15 February 1999.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 28:3 (1999).

White House Office of the Press Secretary. “The Wye River Memorandum.” Press release. 28 October 1998. <http://www.clintonfoundation.org/legacy/102898-presidential-memo-on-the-wye-river.htm>.

Anglo-Palestine Bank

See JEWISH COLONIAL TRUST

Anti-Defamation League (ADL)

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

Anti-Incitement Presidential Decree

The Anti-Incitement Decree was an arbitrary order issued by PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) president YASIR ARAFAT that was announced in HEBRON on 19 November 1998 by his adviser Al-Tayeb Abdul-Rahim. The decree was part of Arafat’s compliance with the 23 October WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM concluded between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) under the auspices of US president BILL CLINTON.

The decree specified a number of acts that were henceforth illegal and punishable by law, including racial discrimination and the use of violence and incitement to violence in a manner damaging to Palestinian relationships with foreign countries. The decree also prohibited the formation of illegal associations and incitement to violate agreements signed between the PLO and foreign countries. Although it satisfied part of the demands imposed by Israel and the United States at Wye River, in practice the anti-incitement decree served to heighten the PNA’s repressive practices against those Palestinians who criticized the PNA or Arafat, or otherwise displeased the president.

See also PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY and WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM, 1998

Anti-Semitism

The phenomenon commonly known as anti-Semitism—the hostility toward or discrimination against Jews as a religious or ethnic group—was the principal motivation for the creation of political ZIONISM in 1896 and the establishment of modern Israel. The nature of anti-Semitism and its alleged and real contemporary manifestations continue to play a major role in international relations and Middle Eastern politics to this day.

A Semite is a person descended from a number of ancient peoples from southwestern Asia, which include the Hebrews, Akkadians, Phoenicians, and Arabs and those who speak Semitic languages, such as Hebrew, Arabic, Aramaic, and Amharic. The term anti-Semitism was popularized in the late 1800s by the GERMAN agitator Wilhelm Marr, who aimed to create a pseudo-scientific word to try to convince others that Jews were an inferior race and to provide for a more sophisticated-sounding euphemism to the then more commonly used term Jew-hatred (Juden-hass). Marr helped build an organization, known as the Anti-Semites’ League, that openly advocated discrimination against Jews. Despite the inaccuracy of the term and its origins by anti-Jewish Europeans, the term has been adopted more generally to describe the historical and ongoing phenomenon of discrimination against Jews.

Although anti-Semitic thought and violence have existed since before 135 BCE, several key events gave rise to modern Zionism. One was the Blood Libel, which took place in Damascus in 1840 after an Italian friar, Padre Tommaso, and his servant disappeared. Under the advice of the French consul to the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, Ratti-Menton, Capuchin monks with support from the local Damascus government accused Jews of murdering the men to make Passover matzo. Two men described as bystanders to the alleged murders were tortured until they identified numerous well-known Jews in Damascus as the perpetrators. All of the accused were arrested and tortured. Furthermore, local officials kidnapped the children of the accused, some sixty-three Jewish children in total, and starved them until their parents confessed. Despite being sentenced to death, the remaining accused were freed through international protests led by prominent Jews such as Sir Moses Montefiore of London.

The events in Damascus had a profound effect on SEPHARDIC rabbi Yehuda Alkalai (1798–1878) of Sarajevo, who was one of the founders of modern political Zionist thought. The Damascus Blood Libel convinced Alkalai that Jews needed to have their own land, and the redistribution of the Balkan states based on nationality and ethnic identity led him to promote Jewish nationalism and a Jewish homeland. In 1871, after a major effort to raise financial and public support, Alkalai established a short-lived society for Jewish settlement in Palestine, where he settled in 1874 and died in 1878.

Meanwhile, anti-Jewish sentiment was again on the rise in Europe, particularly in the RUSSIAN Empire. Throughout history, Jews had been massacred and their property destroyed, primarily in the Christian world. Beginning in 1881, following the assassination of Czar Alexander II and the rumors of Jewish conspiracy that surrounded it, pogroms reached a new height of systematic oppression. Pogroms in Kiev, Odessa, and other parts of the Ukraine killed hundreds of Jews and destroyed a great deal of property, and they continued elsewhere in the Russian Empire for decades, resulting in the murder of tens of thousands of Jews and the exile of many more. In reaction to the pogrom campaign, HOVEVEI ZION (Lovers of Zion) groups began forming in 1882, becoming the largest precursor movement to modern political Zionism. Influenced and led by LEON PINSKER, author of Autoemancipation, Hovevei Zion promoted the idea of relocating Jews to Palestine to escape from anti-Semitism.

Perhaps the most significant single anti-Semitic event was the Dreyfus Affair in 1894, in which ALFRED DREYFUS (1859–1935), an assimilated Jew from Alsace and captain in the French army, was wrongfully accused and indicted for supplying information to the German military. In 1895

Dreyfus was tried for high treason, stripped of his rank, and deported to Devil's Island off the coast of Brazil. During the court proceedings many spectators called out "Death to Jews!" and throughout FRANCE anti-Jewish sentiment increased substantially. Despite subsequent evidence implicating another French officer—evidence showing that Dreyfus had been framed—his conviction was initially upheld. The Catholic Church added to the fury with a public accusation that the Dreyfus case was a Jewish conspiracy with the Freemasons to undermine the French army and, in effect, to destroy France.

THEODOR HERZL (1860–1904), founder of the Zionist movement, attended the original Dreyfus trial as a Paris correspondent for the Vienna newspaper Neue Freie Presse. At the time Herzl, a Hungarian-born assimilated Jew whose grandfather was a close friend of Rabbi Alkalai, believed that anti-Jewish sentiment in Europe arose from the inability of Jews to be absorbed by the new "national" cultures. Upon seeing the unfair trial of Dreyfus, Herzl concluded that the safety and longevity of Jews and Judaism depended on the creation of a Jewish state. In 1896, Herzl published Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State), which essentially outlined the creation of Israel. He organized the FIRST ZIONIST CONGRESS in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897 and presided over its next six annual meetings. During this time the JEWISH COLONIAL TRUST and the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND were created, which, with some alterations, still operate today. Until his death in 1904, Herzl campaigned for the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine and laid the groundwork for the creation of Israel in 1948.

In certain respects, it is ironic that it was not until well after the Enlightenment—which for the first time allowed Jews to participate in largely Christian societies and nationalism replaced religious identity as the unifying political force—that Jewish nationalism came into being. However, given that Jews were still perceived as "foreigners" and not true members of the nation, maintaining a strong Jewish identity raised questions regarding their loyalty to their new nation-states. To be treated as equal citizens, Jews had to assimilate, thereby negating many of the cultural and religious aspects of their heritage. Yet even assimilation was no guarantee that they would not become targets of persecution.

Throughout Europe and sometimes elsewhere in previous centuries, the ruling class of a given country would, in return for granting limited religious and cultural autonomy, set up certain individuals from the Jewish community as its visible agents in positions such as tax collectors and moneylenders. When the population would threaten to rise up against the ruling class, the rulers could then blame the Jews, sending the wrath of an exploited people against convenient scapegoats, resulting in the pogroms and other notorious waves of repression that have taken place throughout the Jewish Diaspora.

Zionism was not initially widely accepted in the European Jewish community as the best response to anti-Semitism and had virtually no support outside of Europe. Jews who identified with communist, anarchist, and other left-wing movements argued that anti-Semitism was a direct consequence of class-based societies, which would no longer be an issue once the capitalist system was overthrown. In their view, Zionism, like any form of nationalism, would only serve to divide the working class in its struggle to end all forms of oppression. An Eastern European socialist movement known as the Jewish Labor Bund, which openly embraced a distinct Jewish identity, also opposed Zionism and argued that culture, not a state or a place, should be the unifying element in identifying Jewish people. Emigration to Palestine was seen as escapist, as giving up on working for a more just society in Europe. Additionally, many religious Jews—particularly among the ultra-Orthodox—argued that the return to Zion could take place only with the coming of the Messiah, and that the premature creation of a Jewish nation-state by temporal authorities was apostasy.

When the brief respite from persecution resulting from the Russian Revolution ended with the rise of Stalin, doubts began to emerge about whether socialist revolution was sufficient to end anti-Semitism. The Nazi genocide against Europe's Jews, and the failure of Western democracies to provide refuge for those attempting to flee persecution, reinforced the Zionists' claims that Jews would never be safe without a nation-state of their own.

During the centuries of the Jewish DIASPORA, Jews in the Arab and Islamic world often fared better than their counterparts in Europe. Though generally not treated as equals to Muslims, there were far fewer periods of outright persecution. Spanish Jews joined Spanish Muslims fleeing persecution during the Inquisition by migrating to North Africa and other Muslim-ruled areas. Under Ottoman rule, Jews—along with Christians—were able to establish their own legal system to deal with civil law. However, as Europeans increased their control of North Africa in the nineteenth century, they began to grant citizenship and other special privileges to Jews in an effort to use a divide-and-rule strategy, which led to a rise of popular resentment against the Jewish communities. In addition, growing anger in EGYPT, IRAQ, and the Levant at the failure of British and French colonialists to give them their promised independence led some anticolonial Arab leaders into a tactical alliance with Hitler's GERMANY, with some adopting the anti-Semitic rhetoric of the Nazis. Other nationalist leaders—such as Moroccan sultan Mohammed the Fifth—opposed anti-Semitism, openly resisting efforts by French fascists to deport Moroccan Jews to European concentration camps.

The small Jewish community in Palestine, as in other Arab countries, had historically lived at peace with its Muslim and Christian neighbors. With the influx of European Zionist immigrants early in the twentieth century, however, the situation deteriorated dramatically. Growing intercommunal violence included the 1929 pogrom against HEBRON's Jewish community in which sixty-seven Jews were killed, many of whom were not Zionists but were from old Palestinian Jewish families.

Though the Zionist movement continued to have little support among Jews in Arab and other predominantly Muslim countries, the establishment of Israel by Western powers and the expulsion of the Arab population of Palestine in 1948 led Arab countries to be suspicious toward their Jewish populations. Seeking to demonstrate their nationalist and anticolonial credentials, Arab governments moved to strip hundreds of thousands of Jews of their citizenship and property and, in many cases, engaged in the outright expulsions of their Jewish populations. Though in some instances, most notably in Iraq, Zionists appeared to have deliberately exacerbated the tensions to encourage a massive Jewish migration to Israel, in general the unprecedented rise of anti-Semitism in the Arab and Islamic world was the major factor that led the majority of MIZRAHIM and SEPHARDIM (Jews from outside of Europe) to join the majority of ASHKENAZIM (European Jews) in embracing Zionism.

In 1948, with the creation of the state of Israel, many Zionists hoped that the problem of anti-Semitism had been largely resolved, as Jews suffering from persecution now had a homeland to which they would be welcome. Ironically, however, the rise of Zionism became yet another excuse to question Jewish citizens' loyalty to their country and for anti-Semitic persecution.

Some Western anti-Semites embraced Zionism as a means of addressing the "Jewish problem" by removing large numbers of Jews from Western nations. In more recent years, however, Israel's violations of internationally recognized human rights and legal norms have been used as an excuse for anti-Semites to criticize the world's only Jewish state and, by extension, Jews as a whole. Related to this has been an effort by some to represent Zionism in its worst historical manifestations and, in the process, use anti-Zionism as a cover for anti-Semitism. Although the Zionist movement and the state of Israel are not the cause of modern anti-Semitism, Western-supported Israeli policies have stimulated a growth in anti-Semitic attitudes throughout the world in recent years, particularly in Islamic countries, where anti-Semitism had previously been far less virulent than elsewhere. It should be noted, however, that not all critics of Israeli policies—many of whom are Jews—are anti-Semitic.

Jews, like every other categorization of people, are not monolithic. There are Jews living as citizens of virtually every other country in the world, who—like Christians, Muslims and others—represent a broad spectrum in terms of adherence to certain religious or cultural practices as well as attitudes on questions of political identity, including Zionism. In some Western countries, particularly the UNITED STATES, a rather small group of Zionist Jews have organized politically to pressure their respective governments to support certain controversial Israeli government policies and have sought to influence the public debate. In certain cases, along with the Israeli government, some Zionist groups have sought to manipulate Western guilt over historical anti-Semitism to support Israeli policies that would otherwise be considered unacceptable. Attacks against individuals and organizations raising concerns about specific Israeli government policies as "anti-Semitic" have often put a damper on public discourse regarding Israeli violations of human rights and INTERNATIONAL LAW. Many liberal intellectual and political leaders have been reluctant to criticize Israeli policies for fear they may be accused of anti-Semitism or might inadvertently reinforce anti-Semitic attitudes.

Although mainstream and conservative American Jewish organizations, which make up what has become known as the "Israel Lobby," have certainly played a role in influencing US policy on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, there has emerged an exaggerated view of the power of American Jews in shaping US Middle East policy that in some cases parallels historic anti-Semitism by blaming Jews for unpopular policies considered detrimental to the national interest. Such an inflated view of Jewish political and economic power fails to acknowledge other factors that lead the US government to support Israeli policies and imply that US policy would be significantly more concerned with international law and human rights were it not for the power of predominantly Jewish organizations. This has complicated efforts to successfully challenge US policy in the region in the manner of previous movements opposing similar US policies in Southeast Asia, Latin America, and southern Africa.

Anti-Semitism has been called "a fool's socialism" in that it often takes on populist rhetoric in support of economic justice against capitalist exploitation yet exaggerates the power and influence of a tiny subsegment of the ruling class. In a similar way, ANTI-ZIONISM for some has become "a fool's anti-imperialism" in that the relationship of Israel with the West is depicted as a "tail-wagging-the-dog" situation, a view that ignores the role of powerful Western interests in making possible certain Israeli policies against their Arab neighbors. Furthermore, increasing numbers of nominally anti-imperialist activists are blaming Jews, not just for US policy toward Israel and the Palestinians, but also for US policies toward Iraq, IRAN, Sudan, and the Islamic world in general, ignoring the long-standing US interests in controlling Persian Gulf oil and other economic and strategic interests that predate the establishment of modern Israel. This view perpetuates the function anti-Semitism has played historically in scapegoating Jews as the oppressors, rather than challenging the oppressive system as a whole.

Bibliography

Cockburn, Alexander, and Jeffrey St. Clair, eds. The Politics of Anti-Semitism. Oakland, CA: AK Press, 2003.

- Cook, Jonathan. "The 'New Anti-Semitism' and Nuclear War." Antiwar.com. 25 September 2006.
- HaCohen, Ran. "Letter from Israel: Abusing 'Anti-Semitism.'" Antiwar.com. 29 September 2003.
- Isseroff, Ami. "Biography of Rabbi Judah Alkalai." Zionism and Israel Information Center. 2006. http://www.zionism-israel.com/bio/alkalai\_biography.htm.
- Jewish Voice for Peace. Reframing Anti-Semitism: Alternative Jewish Perspectives. www.jewishvoiceforpeace.org. 2004.
- Klug, Brian. "The Myth of the New Anti-Semitism." The Nation. 2 February 2004.
- Lerner, Michael. The Socialism of Fools: Anti-Semitism on the Left. Oakland, CA: Tikkun, 1992.
- Rodinson, Maxime. Cult, Ghetto, and State: The Persistence of the Jewish Question. London: Al Saqi Books, 1983.

—Stephen Zunes

Anti-Zionism

Palestinian-Arab resistance to Zionism, arguably the most significant form of contemporary anti-Zionism, derives from the reality of the dispossession and oppression created by Israel, far more than it does from the theoretical rejections of Zionism as an ideology per se.

While throughout the last century writers from dissimilar political and ideological backgrounds have debated—often heatedly—the ills and merits of Zionism, Palestinian Arabs, the primary victims of Zionism, have had to reckon with its concrete manifestations.

But Palestinians, far from being mere victims, have also played an active and crucial role at certain stages in determining the limits and setting the tone of international opposition to Zionism, beginning with the intensification of the Zionist conquest of Palestine in the early twentieth century until this time. During the height of Palestinian nationalism, from the late 1960s to the end of the 1980s, the Palestinian struggle for freedom and equality inspired and animated a worldwide movement, including principled solidarity groups in the West that opposed Zionism as a form of settler-colonialism, often in the same breath with the condemnation of South African apartheid. When, however, the Palestinian leadership finally accommodated itself, or attempted to, with a reformed brand of Zionism that tentatively recognized part of what until then had been termed the "inalienable rights" of the Palestinian people, the coherence and drive of the anti-Zionist movement subsided. Simultaneously, a vast wave of diplomatic openings for Israel occurred, including recognition not of its existence, which should be intuitive, but of its right to exist as a Jewish state. The difference between the two could not be greater: the former is an act of acknowledging a political reality; the latter amounts, in effect if not by intention, to an acceptance of the main tenet of ZIONISM.

With that, and because of several other concurrent global factors, not least of which is the rise to power in the UNITED STATES of the CHRISTIAN Right and the NEOCONSERVATIVES—decisively Zionist allies—anti-Zionism has ebbed to its lowest point in decades. In the West, it is considered an inappropriate, even offensive, term often equated with ANTI-SEMITISM; thus, few serious discussions of the ideology and its reality ever occur.

The greatest triumph of Zionism, a political movement that primarily aimed at the "ingathering" of the world's Jews to a safe haven of their own, is the establishment and development of a strong, prosperous Jewish state in Palestine as a "national Jewish home." Whether or not Jews constitute a nation, and if they do, whether they have a right to establish their nation-state by alienating a land uninterruptedly inhabited for centuries by another nation and dominating this indigenous nation, have been thematic questions raised by the various schools of anti-Zionism throughout most of the history of the Zionist movement. But insofar as anti-Zionism remains a political position, it is Israel's exclusivist character and inequitable policies, more than anything else, that animate it. The contemporary manifestations of political Zionism, which in turn fuel the main anti-Zionist currents in many parts of the world, include Israel's military OCCUPATION of the Palestinian territories conquered in 1967, its denial of the internationally recognized rights of repatriation and reparations to Palestinian REFUGEES, and its less exposed but increasingly acknowledged system of "legalized discrimination" against its own PALESTINIAN CITIZENS.

Evolution of Anti-Zionism

If this is the case now, it was not so in the formative stage of Zionism, when the fiercest opposition came from within the Jewish communities in Europe and only later in the Arab/Muslim countries. In fact, anti-Zionism has hardly ever been a monolithic concept or a unified movement with a set agenda. The nature and political programs within the host of anti-Zionist tendencies have varied from one context to the other and have evolved with time.

Chronologically, the main historic periods that witnessed significant changes affecting anti-Zionist discourse and actions can be divided into four stages: (1) the pre-Holocaust era (1881–1945); (2) the post-Holocaust period (1945–1967), including the establishment of the state of Israel and the 1967 WAR; (3) the period of heightened Palestinian national resistance (1967–1991), which coincided with the end of the Cold War and the final disintegration of the SOVIET UNION; and (4) the emergence of a unipolar world (1991–present) wherein the United States emerged as the sole hegemonic superpower.

Geographically, major opposition to Zionism flourished in roughly four distinct regions: (1) Western Europe and the United States (predominantly among Jews); (2) Eastern Europe (under socialist rule); (3) the Arab/Muslim world (including Palestinians and MIZRAHI, or Arab Jews); and (4) what some now term the Global South. Each of these can be further subdivided into categories of motivating ideologies or convictions: religious, socialist, liberal-democratic/humanist, and nationalist brands of anti-Zionism. It is also important to note that some of these tendencies coexisted in the same geographic unit and/or in the same period.

Pre-Holocaust Anti-Zionism (1881–1945)

In this period, from the modern resurgence of anti-Semitism in Europe through the adoption of the earliest Zionist program by the First Zionist Congress in BASEL, Switzerland, in 1897, until the eve of the Nazi HOLOCAUST, firm majorities of Jews all over the world stood in opposition to Zionism, on both religious and secular grounds. Despite their relentless advocacy and mobilization efforts, Zionist leaders failed for decades to win over a majority of Jews in any Western country, even in Germany under Nazi rule. The WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION'S (WZO) program called first and foremost for the establishment of a national home for "the Jewish People," a euphemism for the "Jewish nation" invented by Zionists to allow flexible religious and cultural interpretations of the advocated entity. It thereby improved its chances of acceptance by the largely assimilated Western Jews who refused any hint of dual national allegiances.

The second point of the Basel Program espoused the "binding together of the whole of Jewry" toward the first aim. The two fundamental premises of Zionism, as expressed by the movement's founder, THEODOR HERZL, were that Jews throughout the world constituted one distinct nation and that anti-Semitism was an ahistoric, eternal, and incurable phenomenon of an immutable essence. Herzl's principal conclusion was that Jewish assimilation among Gentiles was impossible. These ideas were partially inspired by what was then known, particularly in GERMANY, as romantic nationalism, which emphasized the concepts of the chosen (Aryan) race, fatherland, and blood bonds, and which were abhorred by social democrats and liberals alike.

Almost immediately after Zionist emissaries began advocating among European Jews for their colonial project, as they openly termed it at the time, Jewish anti-Zionism was born. The majority of European Jews rejected Zionism on principle, though from two different—not always mutually exclusive—perspectives: religious and social-democratic (with a distinctly Marxist branch). Only in the most underdeveloped regions of Europe, particularly in feudal Poland and czarist Russia, was there a noteworthy audience for Zionism. Polish Jews were frequent victims of rampant ANTI-SEMITIC attacks, evoked—according to the late Israeli academic and human rights advocate, ISRAEL SHAHAK—mainly but not exclusively by the role that Jews were compelled to play on behalf of the powerful and largely autonomous Christian nobility in oppressing the peasantry. Employed as tax collectors, bailiffs of manors, or lessees of feudal estates, Jews were often seen by the impoverished, enserfed peasants as their immediate exploiters, and they suffered the brunt of peasant revolts. Even then, support for Zionism was initially minimal, though later it grew quite strong.

From a religious perspective, almost all the Orthodox rabbis in Europe as well as in the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, including Palestine, held that the "return to Zion" cited in the Bible could only be implemented in accordance with God's will, and only after God had ascertained the Jews' fulfillment of their covenant obligations. They considered heretical the attempt by the secular Zionists to arrogate God's power in setting the timetable and modalities of this return without meeting divine conditions. In that sense, the Orthodox can be regarded as politically anti-Zionist, despite their adherence to what may be called “religious Zionism.” Examples of this faith-based opposition to Zionism ranged from the ancient Jewish community in Mesopotamia (Iraq) to the largest Orthodox communities in Eastern and Western Europe alike, as well as in the United States.

In a variant to this religious perspective, the US Reform Judaism movement, in its famed Pittsburgh Platform of 1885, rejected Zionism because Jews, from its viewpoint, were no longer a nation but a religious community and therefore did not aspire to “return” to Palestine. Later, in their Columbus Platform of 1937, influenced by the unfolding Nazi persecution of Jews, Reform leaders adopted some basic tenets of Zionism, effectively repudiating their initial stance. Nevertheless, most Jews in the United States identified themselves as “non-Zionists,” a term coined by CHAIM WEIZMANN to attract wavering Jews to at least the cultural and religious aspects of Zionism.

Socialist Jewish antagonism to Zionism, on the other hand, was mainly, but not solely, articulated by radical Jewish leftist intellectuals, whose representation in the leadership of European socialist parties was disproportionately high. Among the most prominent of them were Karl Kautsky, Otto Bauer, and Rosa Luxemburg in Germany; Abram Leon in Belgium; and Leon Trotsky and the leaders of the Bund (General Jewish Labor Union) in Poland and Russia. To socialists, Jews were people of a shared faith—Judaism; they lacked common territory, language, and culture, all of which were necessary conditions for the formation of a nation. Throughout the Jewish DIASPORA, after the Roman Empire exiled the Jews from Palestine, by some controversial accounts, the only constant element in Jewish history, social democrats argued, was the Jewish religion and certain “ethnic” attributes associated with it.

Moreover, the “Jewish problem,” from this perspective, had resulted from the relations of production in feudal or precapitalist society wherein Jews were relegated to defined roles, in particular to usury. In European societies, affected classes with their associated traditional religious values had conveniently scapegoated the Jews, who were considered “foreign” elements. These social classes overlooked the differences among Jewish intellectuals, musicians, craftsmen, beggars, and usurers, lumping them all together as a race that is different, even inferior. The advent of capitalism, which caused an upheaval in feudal modes and relations of production and a general breakup of the old society, obviated the traditional socio-economic roles and demeaned the status previously occupied by European Jews. In the advancing capitalist economy, together with the Enlightenment, Jews were free to assume any social or professional role they chose and were no longer considered foreigners but rather equal citizens of the new states.

The alternative, progressive solution to the “problem,” advocated by socialists, was the complete assimilation of the Jews in the societies where they lived. That, however, required first and foremost what Karl Marx called the “political emancipation” of those societies and eventually their “human emancipation” whereby religion and its “chains” would eventually disappear. In light of this analysis, socialists regarded Zionism as a reactionary movement that strove to turn the wheels of history backward by stirring up the spirit of the ghetto and by advocating Jewish separation and isolation instead of integration based on equal civil and political rights. Assimilation and equality were, after all, key objectives of the Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah), a renaissance movement that began in Germany and Austria around 1780.

After the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, communists adopted a strong position against Zionism, branding it a tool of imperial powers that sought to divide the Jewish proletariat from the rest and to hold back the development of its class consciousness. According to Lenin, Jews in prerevolution Russia formed a “caste,” not a nation, because of their socioeconomic role and the anti-Semitic antagonism toward them. His absolute rejection of Jewish nationalism notwithstanding, Lenin, and later Stalin, in effect recognized the Jews of Russia as a national group similar to the Ukrainians, Uzbeks, and Armenians, giving them the right to their own schools and autonomous courts and encouraging them to use Yiddish (despite the fact that Yiddish was only spoken by a minority of Russian Jews, being primarily a German-Jewish linguistic form). Some historians saw this Soviet treatment of Jews as undoing a long process of assimilation that had almost succeeded in ending the “Jewish question” in Russia after the revolution. The Bund, which was the main representative of Russian, Lithuanian, and Polish Jewish workers, also condemned Zionism without reservation and systematically advocated assimilation; at the same time, however, it demanded special national privileges for Jews per se, making some Marxists accuse them of falling under the influence of Zionists.

Another factor that alienated progressives and liberals alike, whether Jews or not, from the Zionist movement was its ties with the Italian Fascists and later its collaboration for many years with the Nazis—for example, in the famous transfer (HA'AVARA) agreement with Hitler, effectively subverting the trade boycott called in the West against the Germans. In fact, leading Zionist ideologists saw Nazi anti-Semitism as a blessing that finally encouraged German and other Jews to adopt Zionism and immigrate to Palestine.

To safeguard their crucial agreement and to ensure Hitler's cooperation in inducing Jewish immigration to Palestine and nowhere else, Zionists—with a few significant exceptions—never posed an effective challenge to the Nazis in consecutive conferences, and they also persistently prevented the escalation of anti-Nazi struggles waged by others in the United States and Europe. To them, the obsession with building a Jewish state came first and foremost: rights and liberties of Jews in Germany and other countries occupied by the Nazis were of secondary value. Labor Zionists, including some of Zionism's most prominent political and intellectual leaders, did not fare any better in this regard than their more extreme rivals in the Revisionist movement, which, ironically, attacked the agreement with the Nazis as treason, despite its own previous dealings with Fascists and Nazis.

With the sharp increase in hostility to and persecution of the Jews in Germany and countries that fell under its influence, anti-Zionist convictions quickly eroded and increasing numbers of Jewish immigrants fled to Palestine. In the same period, however, the influence of Zionism on Jews of Arab and Islamic countries remained marginal and stayed so until after the creation of Israel. In the Ottoman Empire, Jews were treated considerably better and in a more egalitarian way than in Christian Europe. Throughout Arab-Islamic history, Jews were never expelled or massacred and, with rare exceptions, were never subjected to sustained mass persecution as they were in Christian Europe. Their life, however, was not idyllic. Like Christian Arabs, they were considered dhimmi, which entailed status discrimination in certain respects, such as in holding public office and taxation. Nevertheless, Jews under Arab-Islamic rule played an important role in commerce, translation, and administration, among other valued professions, directly contributing to the thriving economy and culture of the state. In the absence of anti-Semitism, Zionism found no fertile ground for support among the ancient Jewish communities of the Levant.

A peculiar feature of anti-Zionist discourse in this period was the conspicuous marginalization or altogether dismissal of the wishes and aspirations of the prime victims of Zionism, the Palestinian-Arabs. Although Zionists first tried to portray Palestine as a “land without a people,” they knew quite well and many of them openly admitted that Palestine had been inhabited by Arabs for many centuries. AHAD HA'AM, a historic leader of “Cultural Zionism,” was appalled at his fellow Zionists' lack of any consideration for the established presence of an indigenous population in Palestine. Other Zionist leaders, from VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY to DAVID BEN-GURION, recognized this presence but were clear about what was necessary to “redeem” the land of Palestine and make room for Jewish IMMIGRATION from Europe: dispossessing the Palestinians by enticing or forcing them off their LANDS. Still, the Palestinian dimension remained relatively obscured from public discussion in the West about Zionism. Most Zionist and anti-Zionist writers in this period may be accused of what some progressive Jewish writers termed Judeo-centrism, or focusing solely on what is best for the Jews, ignoring the fact that the Zionist conquest was not occurring in a vacuum or on some uninhabited island.

Mahatma Gandhi, the leader of Indian self-determination, was an exception to this tendency. Despite being repeatedly lobbied by renowned Zionist intellectuals and politicians to take a positive stance on Zionism, Gandhi stuck to his principled rejection of Zionist claims, expressing the views of many non-European intellectuals at the time. In a famous editorial in the Harijan weekly on 11 November 1938, he proclaimed, “Palestine belongs to the Arabs in the same sense that England belongs to the English or France to the French. It is wrong and inhuman to impose the Jews on the Arabs. . . . Surely it would be a crime against humanity to reduce the proud Arabs so that Palestine can be restored to the Jews partly or wholly as their national home.”

In Palestine, which until 1917 was part of the Ottoman Empire before falling under British rule, the general Arab population did not initially object to Jewish immigration. There are indicators that some privileged Palestinians even welcomed this influx of skilled and well-to-do Europeans who brought with them jobs and relative prosperity at a time of dire economic difficulties. In 1919, for example, the Palestinian delegation to the General Syrian Congress referred to the Palestinian Jews as “fellow citizens” who should continue to enjoy the same rights and bear the same responsibilities as Christian and Muslim Palestinians. Only when Jewish immigration to Palestine and Zionist activities in the country acquired the form of colonial conquest, with generous support from the British colonial authorities, did Palestinians begin to actively resist. This resistance peaked in the great ARAB REVOLT of 1936, which started with a spontaneous general strike that lasted for six months and quickly grew to engulf all sectors of Palestinian society. This revolt was as much against British policies as against Zionist land acquisition efforts that pushed peasants off their lands.

Throughout their resistance, Palestinians, significantly, called for a halt to the massive entry of new Jewish immigrants from Europe, not for the expulsion of Jews already in Palestine. The only significant exception to this was the main Palestinian leader at the time, the mufti (religious leader) of JERUSALEM, al-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, who first sought the help of the Italian Fascists to counter British colonial rule, and, when that effort failed, initiated an alliance with Hitler, Britain’s arch-enemy. Al-Husayni represented the reactionary and feudal sectors of Palestinian society and kept the Palestinian masses at arm’s length for fear they would eventually oust him and choose a more representative leadership instead. His support for Hitler’s massacre of the Jews remains a blight on the history of the Palestinian national movement.

Post-Holocaust Anti-Zionism (1945–1967)

When the horrors of the Nazi annihilation of many Jewish communities in Europe became known, and particularly after the proclamation of the establishment of the state of Israel on 14 May 1948, profound sentiments of solidarity with the new Jewish state, coupled with guilt for not having done enough to prevent the Holocaust, proliferated among Jews everywhere. Concerted Zionist propaganda and public pressure after the Holocaust succeeded in convincing most Jews—and Westerners in general—that Israel was indeed the home of all Jews, that anti-Semitism was an eternal phenomenon that cannot be explained historically or socio-economically, and that Zionism was the true expression of Jewish nationalism. Another element of the Zionist public relations offensive was the concealment of the well-planned Zionist campaign of TRANSFER, or forcible displacement, which dispossessed and exiled more than 750,000 Palestinians, giving the impression to international public opinion that Palestinians abandoned their lands and took flight because Arab leaders instructed them to do so, a Zionist myth later discredited. It was a self-fulfilling prophecy of sorts.

After 1948, the United States quickly reversed its previous position—which favored a unified Palestine with representation for all—and recognized Israel, gradually becoming its new benefactor, replacing the historic role of Britain. The US government, because of its interests in the Arab world, was also keen to be perceived as protecting the rights of the Palestinian REFUGEES. It played a key role in passing UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 194, which called upon Israel to repatriate and compensate the Palestine refugees. Concurrently, most of the anti-Zionist groups in the United States, including the Reform movement, switched positions and supported Israel. For fear of accusations of “dual loyalty,” some still kept a distance from the Zionist claim that Jews everywhere formed a separate nation. Some prominent anti-Zionist rabbis, however, formed the American Committee for Judaism in 1943, which remained true to the earlier principles of Reform Judaism, rejecting the main premises of Zionism, while at the same time accepting the need for absorbing the Jewish refugees in what became Israel. Even to the Reform Jews, the Palestinian plight was a secondary issue in this period.

The Soviet Union and its Eastern European allies immediately recognized Israel, shattering the hopes of many Arab communists. Western European countries followed suit, while newly independent Arab states were too weak to have any influence on the world stage. Anti-Zionism as an organized movement was in tatters.

In spite of all the fervent, almost unqualified backing that Israel received from most Western Jews, this support was mostly political and financial. A fundamental principle of Zionism, ALIYA (the immigration of Jews to Palestine), failed to gain many adherents. And given the tragic depletion of the number of European Jews as a result of the Holocaust, the Zionist movement was compelled to look elsewhere for new immigrants. It was only then that the ASHKENAZI (i.e., European Jews) Zionists turned to the MIZRAHIM, or Jews of the Arab countries, for new immigrants.

Arab Jews—a term that was commonly used until then—were divided into a minority who aspired to immigrate to Israel and a majority who felt they belonged in their Arab countries and wished to remain there. Opposition to Zionism was the norm among Arab Jews, but several factors played into the hands of Israel in turning this around. Zionist propaganda and agitation—violent at times—among Arab Jews was one of them. In IRAQ, where the Jewish community had lived and prospered for more than two millennia—from Babylonian times—and formed an integral part of the Arab nation, anti-Semitism was almost unheard of, the Farhud of May 1941 being a tragic exception. In that incident, Zionist agents resorted to terror, planting bombs that targeted Jews and leading many to believe that the Iraqi government was behind the bombings. Like other unelected regimes that ruled most of the Arab countries then, the British-installed government of Iraq was no different in kowtowing to Zionist interests.

Another element that worked in the Zionists' favor was that Arab state regimes were concerned about deflecting the massive waves of popular anger at their humiliating defeat in the "War of Palestine," the 1948 WAR, and at their lack of legitimacy, having been installed by Europeans. Thus, many of these authoritarian Arab rulers encouraged popular anti-Jewish sentiments and launched official campaigns to persecute, harass, or even purge their respective Jewish communities. Exasperated by the extent of Jewish solidarity with Israel, many Arabs began viewing with suspicion their fellow Jewish citizens, eventually accusing them of complicity with the Zionists. The line between anti-Zionism and anti-Jewish feelings thus became blurred, and most Arab Jews immigrated to Israel, leaving behind their heritage and often their precious belongings.

In Israel, the Ashkenazi elite discriminated against Arab Jews, forcing them to identify themselves as either Arab or Jew. Their leading intellectuals have claimed that they were the "other victims" of Zionism. Becoming Israeli meant abandoning Arabism. The widespread prejudice by the Ashkenazi elite, who dominated the LABOR PARTY and every other institution in Israel, against early generations (some argue that even the current generation) of Mizrahi Jews resulted in their becoming ardent supporters of the opposition—the right-wing LIKUD and other parties. At the same time, most Mizrahi Jews developed a deep abhorrence of everything Arab—including the Palestinians. Some Mizrahi intellectuals perceived this as an expression of cultural "self-hatred."

In the West, support for Israel mushroomed while anti-Zionism lost even more ground. The Zionist movement succeeded in forging an image of Israel as an essentially Western, enlightened, and modern country in the midst of a sea of "Oriental backwardness." The iconic Israeli KIBBUTZ, for instance, was presented as an embodiment of social progress and egalitarianism, ignoring the fact that these settlements were often built on the sites of depopulated and bulldozed Palestinian villages and did not allow any Arabs to join, on principle. The fact that Israel had no constitution to protect the rights of its citizens and that three of its BASIC LAWS institutionalized and legalized widespread discrimination against the indigenous Palestinians—now citizens of Israel—was cloaked from world attention. Israel comprised two distinct statuses: citizenship (izrachut) and nationality (le'um), each entailing different rights and responsibilities. Every Jew in the world was considered a national, and upon his or her "return" to Israel, he or she became a citizen automatically. The native Palestinians, on the other hand, were only citizens and could never become nationals in the exclusive home of the "Jewish nation." Prominent Jews in the West often criticized Zionist practices and political parties. In a letter to the New York Times, on 4 December 1948, a group of Jewish intellectuals, including Hannah Arendt, Albert Einstein, and Sidney Hook, attacked MENAHEM BEGIN and his HERUT PARTY, comparing them to "the Nazi and Fascist parties." A few Jewish writers even questioned whether a BINATIONAL state would have been preferable to an exclusively Jewish state.

Ultra-Orthodox Jewish sects, such as NETUREI KARTA and Satmar, maintained their opposition to Zionism as blasphemous and refused to recognize Israel. Members of Neturei Karta regarded themselves as Palestinian Jews who, like their fellow Muslim and Christian Palestinians, were under Zionist OCCUPATION.

Toward the end of this stage, and after a long hiatus in the Palestinian national movement, the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) was established in 1964 in JERUSALEM, supported by the pan-Arab leader of EGYPT, JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR, and espousing a nationalist program to "liberate Palestine" from the "Zionist enemy." This ushered in a new phase in the Palestinian, Arab, and indeed international struggle against Zionism.

Heightened Palestinian Resistance to Zionism (1967–1991)

The most consequential event at the beginning of this stage was Israel's Occupation of the WEST BANK, including East Jerusalem, and the GAZA STRIP, unifying the last parts of Mandate Palestine under its control. This swift and decisive victory of Israel over almost the entire Arab nation, however, proved to be a mixed blessing for Zionism. By reuniting its Palestinian citizens with Palestinians who came under its Occupation, Israel unwittingly resurrected the former's long-suppressed national identity. It also erased in a short period its previous image as a bastion of enlightenment, replacing it with that of a "white" colonial power oppressing a "brown" native population, thereby inviting the wrath of the majority of the countries of the South, themselves former European colonies. Furthermore, the 1967 WAR proved to Palestinians as well as Arabs in general the utter inability of the Arab state system to defend itself, let alone liberate Palestine. This gave impetus to the eventual recognition of the PLO by the Arab governments as the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinians, which in turn led to the organization's establishment of diplomatic ties with more countries than Israel had at the time.

The PLO's resolutely anti-Zionist political program initially envisioned a democratic, secular state in historic Palestine, where Muslims, Christians, and Jews would enjoy equal citizenship. Later the PLO's leadership gradually abandoned the unitary state solution, opting instead for a TWO-STATE SOLUTION, which was almost universally supported. Despite its shortcomings, particularly its inability to recognize the national attributes that evolved among Israeli Jews, the PLO's political platform exposed the basic discriminatory nature of Zionism. This boosted the PLO's diplomatic efforts in isolating Israel, whose own organic partnership with the United States, coupled with its alliance with South African apartheid and several right-wing dictatorships in Latin America and elsewhere, further diminished its standing in the international community. This struggle against Zionism culminated in UN General Assembly Resolution 3379, on 10 November 1975, condemning Zionism as a form of racism. For the first time in its history, Zionism was attacked not for its effects on world Jewry but for the concrete ramifications of its "colonial project," as Herzl and his followers called it, on the ground. Without the support of the Soviet Union, this resolution would have never seen the light.

Though incensed by the UN denunciation of Zionism, many in the West began to question Israeli policies in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT). Unlike in the South, solidarity in the West did not translate into anti-Zionism as such for several reasons, including the prevalent feeling of guilt over the West's complicity or paralysis vis-à-vis the Holocaust and the immense power of the Zionist lobby in the United States and several other countries. Being against Israel's policies did not necessarily entail being anti-Zionist, and it certainly did not mean being anti-Semitic, despite strenuous Zionist efforts to tie them all together. The tactic of equating criticism of Israel or anti-Zionism with anti-Semitism became ubiquitous and indiscriminant, mainly as a tool to stifle such criticism. Still, new movements in solidarity with the Palestinian people sprung up in most Western countries, including the United States, presenting a challenge to the hitherto unchecked influence of the Zionist movement.

In this period, EGYPT's 1979 peace treaty with Israel was the most outstanding diplomatic achievement for Israel and the Zionist movement. It helped Israel break its isolation and drove a wedge in several international groupings where Egypt had played a major role, including the ARAB LEAGUE, the Non-Aligned Movement, and the Organization of African Unity. This opening did not last long. With the onset of the Palestinian INTIFADA in December 1987, Israel's harsh suppression of this popular, mostly nonviolent revolt cost it substantial support in the West and elsewhere. It became less taboo on campuses in the West, for instance, to criticize not just Israeli policies but the Zionist foundation of these policies.

Simultaneously, and under strong influence from Arab leaders acting on behalf of the United States, the PLO's leadership embarked on a new approach of "reconciliation" that explicitly recognized Israel's right to exist in return for an independent Palestinian state on the 1967 Occupied Territory and the recognition of the rights of Palestinian refugees as stated in UN RESOLUTION 194. The PLO believed that by endorsing this compromise solution it would win recognition from the United States, by then the only major power with any influence over Israel. This new process reached its peak with the MADRID CONFERENCE, convened on 30 October 1991, when Palestinian leaders from the OPT—acting on behalf of the PLO—were allowed to join with JORDAN in peace negotiations between Arab states and Israel. The PLO at the same time opened a secret, direct channel of negotiations with Israel in Oslo, Norway. As a result of the OSLO PROCESS, beginning with the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES, the Intifada began to lose direction and wane.

Although the PLO believed that it had made a historic breakthrough by gaining official recognition from Israel, and by extension the United States, it underestimated the irreparable damage caused by its own recognition of Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. For the first time since the beginning of Zionist colonization of Palestine at the end of the nineteenth century, the official Palestinian leadership, for all intents and purposes, accepted one of the basic tenets of Zionism: its right to establish an exclusivist Jewish state in Mandate Palestine. This turning point in the Palestinian national movement's position on Zionism diluted the very definition of anti-Zionism and effectively aborted that aspect of its struggle against Israel. The rapid transformations in international geopolitics in the late 1980s, particularly the beginning of the disintegration of the Soviet Union, led to a sharp increase in US power and an unprecedented propensity to project that power on the world stage. A new era was born with the final collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991.

Unipolar World (1991–present)

Israel and the Zionist movement did not wait long after the removal of the Soviet factor from the political equation to seek some sizable dividends. Through intense lobbying, they convinced the US government to demand the repeal of the UN's "Zionism is racism" resolution. On 16 December 1991, their wish came true. The General Assembly passed Resolution 4686, negating its 1975 declaration and removing a major obstacle on the course of Zionist and Israeli rehabilitation in the international community. In 1993, Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles, or what became known as the OSLO ACCORDS, engendering a new atmosphere of optimism and reconciliation. Soon after, Israel embarked on its most ambitious public relations and diplomacy campaign in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and the Arab world, establishing diplomatic ties and opening badly needed markets for its growing industries. Former sworn enemies suddenly warmed up to Israel, importing billions of dollars' worth of military hardware and other goods from it, while gaining the eagerly sought-after "most favored nation" status in trade with the United States. TURKEY, Jordan, CHINA, India, and Pakistan, to name a few, wooed Israel as if the road to Congress passed through Tel Aviv.

Anti-Zionism, again, became an "unacceptable" concept that could not be used in public discourse for fear of alienating Israel, which now translated into angering the United States and inviting its inevitable punishment. After the inauguration of GEORGE W. BUSH and the rise to power of his NEOCONSERVATIVE associates (some of whom were previously close advisers to the right-wing Israeli leader BENJAMIN NETANYAHU), Zionist influence in the White House matched its decades-old, almost unparalleled influence on Capitol Hill. This created a new political reality whereby Israel attained unprecedented weight in shaping US foreign policy, particularly in the Middle East.

Israel enjoyed a decade of political and diplomatic triumphs that translated into rapid economic growth and a sharp increase in Jewish IMMIGRATION, particularly from the splinter republics of the former Soviet Union. The Zionist movement was at its historic peak by any standard.

After years of relative quiet, under the illusion of the peace process, paralleled by an enormous growth of Jewish SETTLEMENTS in Gaza and the West Bank, particularly in and around Arab East Jerusalem, the second Palestinian Intifada, the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, broke out in September 2000. The uprising put a damper on Israel's golden decade and reopened long-forgotten questions about whether a just peace could be achieved with a state characterized by exclusivity, ethnocentricity, and expansionism.

In its attempt to crush the Intifada, Israel implemented a policy that flouted INTERNATIONAL LAW and amounted to "war crimes," as declared by Amnesty International and several other respected international human rights organizations. With this as a background, the UN World Conference against Racism in Durban in 2001 revived the 1975 debate on Zionism, though it failed to adopt a specific resolution because of threats from the United States. The Nongovernmental Organizations Forum at that same conference did, however, condemn Zionism as a form of racism and apartheid, while also condemning all other forms of racism, including anti-Semitism. A few years later, the International Court of Justice at the Hague, in a famous Advisory Opinion on 9 July 2004, condemned as illegal Israel's Wall ("Separation BARRIER") and the colonies built on occupied Palestinian land. The already cold peace with Egypt and Jordan became even colder. The Israeli economy stagnated for a while and is undergoing an aggressive process of privatization that threatens to destabilize the taken-for-granted benefits of the welfare state. Jewish emigration again exceeded immigration. Suddenly, mainstream churches, academic associations, and trade unions in Europe and the United States began calling for diverse forms of boycott, divestment, or sanctions, or "BDS," against Israel, similar in nature to those applied to South Africa in the apartheid era.

Ironically, at its historic zenith, Zionism's "crisis" jumped to the top of the agenda. POST-ZIONISM emerged as a possible answer to the movement's loss of its raison d'être. The unitary, non-Zionist state solution has returned to the agenda, at least in small academic and intellectual circles, Palestinian and Israeli alike. New anti-Zionist Jewish movements have begun to spread in the West. After a century of almost uninterrupted success, Zionism today finds itself faced with some of the most basic dilemmas that have accompanied it since its birth. Its fundamental claim of the right of Jews to have an exclusivist, ethnocentric state, whose very definition excludes its indigenous citizens, and whose laws discriminate against non-Jews, is again being called into question. This is particularly so in developed countries where Jews were at the forefront of the fight for civil rights, democracy, equality before the law, and separation between church and state.

This era also poses important questions to the anti-Zionist movements, particularly the Palestinian-Arab national movement. What does anti-Zionism mean today? Does defining Israel as a Zionist, settler-colonial state necessitate a decolonization process that undoes everything that resulted from the Zionist conquest? What about the acquired and internationally recognized rights of Israeli Jews? Can they be reconciled with the UN-sanctioned rights of the indigenous people of Palestine to self-determination in accordance with international law? Can Israel avoid being anachronistic and become a true democracy for all its citizens without shedding its colonial nature and abandoning Zionism? Can the anti-Zionist movement maintain a coherent and unwavering position of rejecting anti-Semitism together with all other forms of racism? Without addressing these and similar questions with moral consistency and political prudence, the anti-Zionist movement cannot hope to pose a serious challenge to Zionism in today's world.

In 1967 I. F. Stone summed up the dilemma of Zionism, which remains relevant to this day: "For Israel is creating a kind of moral schizophrenia in world Jewry. In the outside world, the welfare of Jewry depends on the maintenance of secular, non-racial, pluralistic societies. In Israel, Jewry finds itself defending a society in which mixed marriages cannot be legalized, in which non-Jews have a lesser status than Jews, and in which the ideal is racist and exclusivist."

Bibliography

- Alloush, Naji. Marxism and the Jewish Question. Translated from the Arabic by Muhammad Abu Nasr. <http://www.freearabvoice.org/books/marxismAndJewishQuestion/Lenin.htm>.
- Anti-Defamation League. U.N. World Conference against Racism—The Draft Declaration: Unfair Charges of Racism Against Israel. 2001. <http://www.adl.org/durban/draft.asp>.
- Arendt, Hannah. Eichmann in Jerusalem. New York: Viking Press, 1963.
- Avnery, Uri. Dunam after Dunam: Visions of Peace with Justice in Israel/Palestine. 2005. <http://www.vopj.org/issues71.htm>.
- Ben-Dor, Oren. "The Root Causes of Tragedy: The Ethical and Legal Challenges Facing Palestine." Counter-Punch. 2005. <http://www.counterpunch.org/bendor12152005.html>.
- Berger, Elmer. Judaism or Jewish Nationalism. New York: Bookman Associates, 1957.
- Brenner, Lenni. 1983. Zionism in the Age of the Dictators: A Reappraisal. Reds—Die Roten. 1983. www.marxists.de/middleast/brenner.
- , ed. 51 Documents: Zionist Collaboration with the Nazis. Fort Lee, NJ: Barricade Books, 2002.
- Corrigan, Edward. "Jewish Criticism of Zionism." Middle East Policy Council Journal. 35 (Winter 1990–1991). www.mepec.org/journal/9012\_corrigan.asp.

- Finkelstein, Norman. Image and Reality of the Israel-Palestine Conflict. New York: Verso, 2003.
- Fried, Erich. "A Jew to Zionist Fighters." Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust, 1988. <http://codoh.com/zionweb/ziondark/zionopp05.html>.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel Migdal. The Palestinian People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Kushner, Tony, and Alisa Solomon, eds. Wrestling with Zion: Progressive American-Jewish Responses to the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. New York: Grove Press, 2003.
- Lenin, V. I. "Critical Remarks on the National Question." In Collected Works, 4th English ed. 20:17–51. 1964. www.marx2mao.com/Lenin/CRNQ13.html.
- Leon, Abram. The Jewish Question—A Marxist Interpretation (1946). Reds—Die Roten. www.marxists.de/religion/leon.
- Marx, Karl. On the Jewish Question (1884). Marxists Internet Archive. www.marxists.org/archive/marx/works/1844/jewish-question.
- Montague, Edwin. Memorandum on the Anti-Semitism of the Present Government (1917). Department of Computer Science, University College Cork. <http://cosmos.ucc.ie/cs1064/jabowen/IPSC/php/art.php?next=true&aid=5337>.
- Naturei Karta. "Why Do You Violate G'd's Order? It Will Not Succeed." Advertisement. New York Times. 18 May 1993. <http://codoh.com/zionweb/ziondark/zionopp06.html>.
- NGO Forum. U.N. World Conference against Racism—NGO Forum Declaration. Internet Centre Anti Racism Europe, 2001. www.icare.to/wcar/iscfollowup.html.
- Pappe, Ilan. A History of Modern Palestine: One Land, Two Peoples. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Ramakrishnan, A. K. Mahatma Gandhi Rejected Zionism. The Wisdom Fund, 2001. www.twf.org/News/Y2001/0815-GandhiZionism.html.
- Rodinson, Maxime. Cult, Ghetto, and State: The Persistence of the Jewish Question. London: Al Saqi Books, 1983.
- Said, Edward. The Question of Palestine. New York: Times Books, 1980.
- Shahak, Israel. Jewish History, Jewish Religion: The Weight of Three Thousand Years. London: Pluto Press, 2002.
- Shatz, Adam, ed. Prophets Outcast: A Century of Dissident Jewish Writing about Zionism and Israel. New York: Nation Books, 2004.
- Shohat, Ella. Reflections by an Arab Jew. www.bintjbeil.com/E/occupation/arab\_jew.html.
- . Rupture and Return: A Mizrahi Perspective on the Zionist Discourse. MIT Center for International Studies. <http://web.mit.edu/cis/www/mitejmes/issues/200105/shohat.htm>.
- Stone, I. F. "For a New Approach to the Israeli-Arab Conflict." New York Review of Books. 3 August 1967.
- Tekiner, Roselle, Samir Abed-Rabbo, and Norton Mezvinsky, eds. Anti-Zionism: Analytical Reflections. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1989.
- Wise, Tim. Reflections on Zionism from a Dissident Jew. Media Monitors Network, 2001. www.mediamonitors.net/timwise1.html.

—Omar Barghouti

Antonius, George (1893–1941)

George Antonius was an Arab educator and politician during the BRITISH MANDATE. Born in Cairo, he was a Greek-Orthodox Christian of Lebanese parentage. After graduating from Cambridge University in 1914, he worked for a period as deputy press censor in Alexandria during World War I. Antonius came to Palestine in 1921 and began a civil service career working for the British in their education department and secretariat. In 1930 he resigned from the British Executive in protest over British policy toward the Palestinians.

In 1934 and again in 1936, Antonius met with DAVID BEN-GURION and other Zionist leaders in unsuccessful attempts to persuade them to moderate their objectives in Palestine. For a period, Antonius advocated a Jewish canton within a Palestine state, which would subsequently federate with other Arab states; however, by 1938 he had abandoned the idea as impractical. In 1936 he worked with MUSA AL-ALAMI in circulating the June petition signed by major Arab leaders that supported the general strike.

In 1938 Antonius began work as Middle Eastern associate of C. R. Crane's Institute of Current World Affairs (New York) and wrote The Arab Awakening, an analysis of Arab nationalism beginning in the Ottoman era that depicts the treachery of Britain and FRANCE in denying the Arab world self-determination after World War II, as Great Britain had promised in the Husayn-McMahon Correspondence. The book is a classic and still read today. Antonius appeared before the PEEL COMMISSION (1936–1937) and participated in the Palestinian delegation to the LONDON CONFERENCE in 1939. He remained in London after the conference ended and helped to persuade British officials to include in the 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER the provision that, after five years, Palestinians would have a say in Jewish IMMIGRATION as well as a qualified promise of Palestinian independence after ten years. The ARAB HIGHER COM-MITTEE rejected the white paper, as did the Zionists, yet Antonius continued to promote Arab-British cooperation. He believed firmly that if the Jewish community in Palestine lost its special privileges, Jews and Palestinians could live together as equal citizens.

Bibliography

- Antonius, George. The Arab Awakening. Lebanon: Khayats, 1938.
- Boyle, Susan Silsby. Betrayal of Palestine: The Story of George Antonius. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2001.
- Lesch, Ann M. "George Antonius." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1997.
- Silsby, Susan P. "George Antonius: The Formative Years." Journal of Palestine Studies. 15:4 (1986): 81–98.

Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem

The Applied Research Institute–Jerusalem (ARIJ) was established in Jerusalem in 1990 as a nonprofit Palestinian organization dedicated to promoting sustainable development in the Occupied Palestinian Territories and to increasing the self-reliance of the Palestinian people through greater control over their natural resources. The institute works specifically to augment the local stock of scientific and technical knowledge and to devise efficient methods of resource utilization and conservation, improved practices, and appropriate technology. To address problems of sustainable development and conservation of the environment that had been disregarded under the OCCUPATION, ARIJ maintains a Water Research Unit, a Rain Fed Farming Unit, an Environmental Research Unit, a Land Use Unit, and an Environmental Resource Planning and Assessment Unit.

ARIJ's website has a section called Eye-On-Palestine that monitors and assesses the magnitude of environmental degradation caused by politically induced changes to Palestine's LAND and natural resources. It presents a summary of individual and collective political activities, such as expansion and growth of Israeli SETTLEMENTS, land expropriation and closures, uprooting of trees, Israeli stone quarrying, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and sewage disposal from Israeli settlements. ARIJ also publishes a Monthly Report on the Israeli Colonization Activities in the West Bank. (www.arij.org).

Al-Aqsa Intifada

The al-Aqsa Intifada began on 29 September 2000 in spontaneous demonstrations against the Israeli OCCUPATION and continues at this writing in 2009. It is an explosion of anger and frustration at the collapse of the OSLO PROCESS, the continuing Occupation, rapid Israeli SETTLEMENT expansion, and the increasingly grave economic situation the Palestinians were experiencing during 1994–2000. It was triggered by Israeli right-wing opposition party leader ARIEL SHARON's visit to the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF on the TEMPLE MOUNT in Jerusalem, the third holiest site in Islam, with a LIKUD PARTY delegation and surrounded by hundreds of Israeli riot police.

Between 29 September 2000 and 26 December 2008, the Israeli human rights organization B'TSELEM reported total fatalities: 4,908 Palestinians killed, of whom approximately 60 to 70 percent were civilians, and about 31,000 Palestinians wounded (injuries according to the Palestinian Center for Human Rights—PCHR). Some 1,062 Israelis were killed, of whom 335 were members of the security forces and 727 were civilians. According to the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs (IMFA), during the period 2001 through 2007, of the 1062 fatalities there were 554 from 140 SUICIDE BOMBINGS. The IMFA also reported that during this same period 8,341 Israelis were wounded (5,676 civilians and 2,665 security force members).

Additionally, during the Israeli offensive in Gaza, Operation Cast Lead, from 27 December 2008 to 18 January 2009, PCHR reports a further 1,417 Palestinian fatalities, including 926 civilians, 236 fighters, and 255 police officers. The Palestinian Ministry of Health reported a total of 5,303 injuries, including 1,606 children and 828 women. Israel stated that 10 IDF soldiers were killed and 336 wounded. Out of the fatalities, 5 were killed engaging Hamas combatants, 4 were killed by friendly fire, and 1 was killed when Hamas rockets hit a military base inside Israel. Israel further reported that there were three civilian casualties and 182 injured, civilians and soldiers.

According to Likud spokesman Ofir Akounis, the purpose of Sharon's 2000 appearance at the Muslim holy site was to "show that under a Likud government [the Temple Mount] will remain under Israeli sovereignty,” which is to say that all the holy sites and Palestinian neighborhoods of East Jerusalem would remain under Israeli sovereignty, dashing Palestinian expectations that East Jerusalem would be the capital of their independent state. Even without Akounis’s clarification, the Palestinians well understood Sharon’s symbolic visit, which had been approved by LABOR PARTY prime minister EHUD BARAK. Almost immediately, spontaneous Palestinian protests erupted everywhere and Israel responded with what B’Tselem described as “excessive force.” In the first five days after Sharon’s visit, Israeli security forces killed 47 Palestinians and wounded 1,885, while 5 Israelis were killed by Palestinians.

Beginning on 1 October 2000 and continuing for several days, Israeli-Arabs held a general strike and a series of demonstrations across northern Israel in support of Palestinian demonstrators in the Occupied Territories. This resulted in the deaths of 13 Arab-Israeli citizens of Israel and injuries to many more. The government appointed the Or Commission to investigate the police’s use of force but its findings, which were published in September 2003, were inconclusive in ascertaining responsibility.

This was the second Palestinian uprising against Israeli Occupation. The First Intifada (1987–1990) too was fundamentally a protest against the Occupation, but it was overwhelmingly powered by nonviolent civil disobedience. It was triggered on 8 December 1987, when an Israeli army tank transporter ran into a group of Palestinians from Jabalya refugee camp in the GAZA STRIP, killing four and injuring seven. Protests spread quickly and widely across the Occupied Territories. Over the course of the First Intifada, B’Tselem reports that from 9 December 1987 through 30 December 1990, 782 Palestinians (mainly civilians) were killed by Israeli forces and settlers, while 65 Israelis (civilians and military) were killed by Palestinians.

Both Intifadas reflect the aspirations of an entire population for freedom and independence and a response to decades of Occupation, which have entailed arrests, DEPORTATIONS, killings, destruction of the national economy, usurpation of WATER RESOURCES, destruction of agricultural land in the Gaza Strip, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, continuous confiscation of LAND and SETTLEMENT expansion, nonenforcement of the law against vigilante settlers, TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS, mass arrests and ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, severe restrictions on Palestinians’ FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT, collective punishment, CURFEWS, SIEGE, and more recently, CHECKPOINTS, ROADBLOCKS, and the separation BARRIER that is being constructed mostly on the Palestinian side of the Green Line.

Roots of the Uprising

Three years after the first Intifada was suppressed, PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman YASIR ARAFAT and Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN shook hands on the White House lawn on 13 September 1993 over the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP), the first agreement between Israel and the Palestinians and the first in what came to be known as the OSLO ACCORDS. Suddenly the majority of Palestinians, at least those in the Occupied Territories, were infused with hope that their long-desired freedom in a sovereign state of their own was soon to be realized.

Under the Oslo Accords, Israel committed to the phased withdrawal of its forces from parts of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, and affirmed the Palestinian right to self-determination within those areas through the creation of a PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). For its part, the PLO formally recognized Israel’s right to exist and committed to taking responsibility for internal security in population centers in the areas evacuated by Israel. Palestinian self-rule was to last for a five-year interim period during which a permanent agreement would be negotiated, starting no later than the beginning of the third year of the interim period, or May 1996, and concluded by the end of the interim period, or May 1999. The last agreement would include the resolution of FINAL STATUS issues, including JERUSALEM, Palestinian REFUGEES, BORDERS, settlements, security arrangements, and relations with neighboring states. None of these dates were met and Israel did not fulfill its commitments to redeploy from areas agreed upon in the various accords signed between 1993 and 2000, claiming that the PNA did not fulfill its security requirements.

In 1995, SHIMON PERES became prime minister after Rabin was assassinated. In the 1996 elections, Israelis chose a right-wing coalition led by the Likud candidate, BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, who was opposed to Oslo from its outset. He was followed in 1999 by Labor Party leader Ehud Barak and in 2001 by right-wing Likudist Ariel Sharon.

While Rabin and Peres had limited, though not ceased, settlement construction at the request of the UNITED STATES, Netanyahu rapidly increased construction and put forward plans for an entirely new settler neighborhood, HAR HOMA, in East Jerusalem. At the same time, Israel built an elaborate system of bypass ROADS throughout the West Bank to connect the settlers to Israel, which entailed slicing up the area into inaccessible cantons for the Palestinians.

According to Peace Now, from 1993 to 2000 the settler population (excluding East Jerusalem) grew from 116,300 to 198,300; there were 21,999 new housing starts and 39 new outposts, and Peace Now researcher Dror Etkes notes, "In reality, outposts are new settlements." PNA leaders argued that this continued construction was contrary to the spirit of the DOP, prejudiced the outcome of final status negotiations, and undermined confidence in Barak's desire for peace.

Other promises, as well, of the Oslo process did not evolve as Palestinians expected. For instance, Israel continuously decreased the number of Palestinian workers permitted to enter Israel, setting off an economic free fall. No longer could Palestinians move freely among Israel, East Jerusalem, the WEST BANK, and GAZA due to an increasingly restrictive PERMIT system, in conjunction with a checkpoint regime that sliced the West Bank into ever smaller noncontiguous units and affected the ability of every Palestinian to move about normally. Life in general became more difficult for the Palestinians even as the PNA and Israel concluded agreement after agreement in the Oslo process.

From 11 to 25 July 2000, US president BILL CLINTON convened the CAMP DAVID Summit, at Barak's behest and despite PNA president Arafat's objections that the process had not come far enough to approach final status issues. Barak approached the final status negotiations with little regard for Palestinian views. A day before departing for Camp David, Barak emphasized that Israel would leave the West Bank and Gaza and return to the 4 June 1967 lines, that Israel would retain sovereignty over a united Jerusalem, that most of the Jewish settlers in Judea and Samaria (the West Bank) would remain there in settlement blocs under Israeli sovereignty, and that Israel would not take upon itself any moral, legal, or financial responsibility for the Palestinian refugee problem. At the summit he put forward BARAK'S GENEROUS OFFER in a take-it-or-leave-it framework. No Palestinian leader could possibly have accepted the terms Barak presented; the summit fell apart, and Israel and the United States blamed Arafat.

Palestinians felt that they had been misled and were going to achieve none of their interests or rights. Increasingly, they understood that the peace process had been designed according to a US-backed Israeli vision, which implied the exclusive implementation of Israeli terms. The results of seven years of the Oslo Process and all the agreements concluded therein were viewed as little more than devices intended to neutralize the rights of the Palestinian people. The significance of these conditions for Palestinians cannot be overstated and especially the main "facts" on the ground: the settlements and the growing network of Israeli highways. The settlements are aimed at extending Israel's sovereignty over as much of the West Bank as possible, preferably over all of it, and defeating Palestinian aspirations for freedom and independence. Any realistic discourse focused on the creation of a Palestinian state with the coexistence of Israeli settlements and bypass roads would imply a state without sovereignty. This has always been a main cause of conflict and confrontation.

The refugee problem is another basic issue at the heart of the Palestinian cause. Refugees were created as a direct result of the Zionist project in Palestine. So as to ensure a viable Jewish state it was necessary to reduce significantly the Palestinian population, which was a majority at the outset of the Zionist movement and remained so in 1948. To this end numerous tactics were employed, and, at the end of the 1948 WAR, 750,000 to 800,000 Palestinians had lost their homes and land and were transformed into refugees. During the 1967 WAR, another 250,000 refugees were added to this number. Today there are approximately 4 million refugees—the original refugees and their offspring—living in LEBANON, SYRIA, JORDAN, the West Bank, and Gaza, mostly in squalid camps, and elsewhere. A lasting solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict cannot be attained without addressing the needs of the refugees.

These are the facts and the foundation upon which the al-Aqsa Intifada erupted and continues. One of the most dangerous aspects for the Palestinians of the Oslo Process and the al-Aqsa Intifada has been Israel's success, abetted by Western governing and MEDIA elites, in portraying Israel and the Palestinians as "equal" partners. But the vast disparities and asymmetries in power and resources, which existed between the two at the outset of the Oslo process, go a long way toward explaining its failure and are visibly reflected in the weapons differentials in the Second Intifada.

Violence as Defining Characteristic

Two kinds of military logic have combined to perpetuate the al-Aqsa Intifada and make violence its defining attribute. The first is the logic of tit-for-tat, by which every Israeli attack is a response to some earlier Palestinian attack, which in itself came to avenge martyrs fallen in a previous Israeli response. Second is the logic of escalation, which means that all responses have to be more dramatic or deadly than the attacks that triggered them, supposedly to put an end to the violence, but in fact pushing back the threshold of the acceptable.

The violence of the Second Intifada is reflected in the previously noted statistics on fatalities. The transformation of the Intifada from spontaneous protests occurred when Palestinian demonstrations moved to well-defined points of friction—usually the borders between Palestinian and Israeli-controlled areas. There Palestinians were faced by Israeli troops using military tactics and weapons rather than civilian law enforcement principles and methods of crowd control. As Israel increasingly mobilized military resources in its attempt to crush the uprising, Palestinian tactics also shifted to guerrilla-type actions and suicide bombings inside the Green Line, further altering the nature of the confrontation.

In a comprehensive report prepared by B'Tselem covering the period from 29 September until 2 December 2000, the Israeli human rights organization reported that “since the beginning of these events . . . 264 people were killed in the Occupied Territories, and over 10,000 were injured.” The total figures are broken down as follows:

- 204 Palestinian civilians were killed by IDF forces, of them 73 minors aged 17 and under.
- 24 members of the Palestinian security forces were killed by IDF forces.
- 4 foreign nationals were killed by IDF forces.
- 3 Palestinian civilians (at least) were killed by Israeli settlers.
- 13 Israeli civilians were killed by Palestinian civilians.

- 11 members of the Israeli security forces were killed by Palestinian civilians.
- 5 members of the Israeli security forces were killed by members of the Palestinian security forces.

B'Tselem continues with an analysis of these data. Among its conclusions: “Israel uses excessive and disproportionate force in dispersing demonstrations of unarmed Palestinians. Israel did not develop nonlethal methods to disperse demonstrations or train its soldiers to confront such demonstrations. This in spite of the fact that Israel was prepared for the events of the past few weeks. As a result, soldiers only had at their disposal rubber-coated metal bullets and live ammunition, which caused many Palestinian casualties, and many injuries to medical teams and journalists. Over the past few weeks there have been many incidents of settler attacks on Palestinians. In some of these incidents, IDF soldiers were present but did nothing to protect Palestinians, as they are obliged to do as the occupying force. This phenomenon is not new, and B'Tselem has warned in the past that Israeli authorities do not take sufficient measures to end this phenomenon. The Palestinian Authority does not make serious efforts to prevent children from participating in demonstrations, in spite of the grave danger. The Palestinian Authority does almost nothing to prevent Palestinians from attacking Israeli civilians. The establishment of settlements is a violation of international law and therefore illegal; however, this does not justify attacks on settlers or on settlements. Intentional attacks on civilians are absolutely prohibited, regardless of the circumstances. The Palestinian Authority does not prevent armed Palestinians from shooting from within populated areas, thereby exposing its civilian population to the IDF's response. Both Israel and the Palestinian Authority prevent journalists from freely covering the events, thereby restricting freedom of speech. This is done in various ways, including physical attacks and property damage.”

Military Weapons and Tactics

During the Intifada, Palestinian militant groups have waged a high-intensity campaign of guerrilla warfare and suicide bombings against Israeli targets. For the Israeli public, the suicide bombings were harmful physically and psychologically because of their randomness and the death toll. Palestinian military equipment consists mostly of imported light arms and homemade weapons, such as hand grenades and explosive belts, assault rifles, and the Qassam rockets. The rockets are crude, often made from old pipes, and largely ineffectual. The first homemade Qassam rocket was fired across the Israeli border in October 2001. It was not until June 2004 that Israel suffered its first fatality, and, since then, 23 Israelis have been killed by Hamas rocket fire. In the latter years of the Intifada, Palestinians also increased the use of remote-controlled landmines and car bombings.

At the same time, Israel has had complete ground and air superiority. In its tactics—the use of utmost force as quickly as possible in order to crush Palestinian resistance—Israel uses the following: heavily armored Caterpillar D9 bulldozers; AH-64 Apache helicopters used as platforms for shooting guided missiles; heavily armored equipment such as the Merkava tank and various military aircraft, including F-16s, drone aircraft, and helicopter gunships; sniper towers that were used extensively in the Gaza Strip before ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT and then were increasingly employed in the West Bank; prolonged incursions and redeployment into PNA-controlled areas; unwilling Palestinian human shields; mass arrests and detentions; the Barrier wall inside West Bank territory; the imposition of a tightened siege on the Occupied Territories; and destruction of homes and civilian property, plus the destruction of almost all PNA facilities.

The Israeli policies considered the most harmful—physically and psychologically—to the Palestinians are the following.

Targeted Assassinations. From 28 September 2000 to 30 December 2008, Israel carried out 233 targeted assassinations against Palestinians, plus 386 Palestinian civilians were killed as “collateral damage” in the course of the assassinations. No other Israeli policy generates as much rage as these assassinations, which impel revenge, usually in the form of suicide bombs. The assassinations were initially said by Israel to be carried out only if it were necessary to “stop a terrorist cell on its way to commit an attack” (so-called ticking bombs). On 3 July 2001, new guidelines were issued by the Israeli kitchen cabinet to allow the killings of “known terrorists,” even if they were not on the verge of committing a major attack. Israel has applied this term generously to most Palestinians fighting the Occupation regardless of the target or the means used.

The Israeli policy of assassinations has contributed significantly to the escalation of violence. Since the inception of the policy, Palestinian factions have justified most attacks against Israeli targets—from shooting incidents to suicide bombings—as retaliation for an assassination. In 2000 there were nine targeted assassinations—four FATAH members, three HAMAS members, and two from ISLAMIC JIHAD. In 2001 there were 27 assassinations—14 from Hamas, 7 from Fatah, 5 from Islamic Jihad, and the head of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, Abu Ali Mustapha. In 2002 there were 79 targeted assassinations. The means of killing ranged from missiles fired from helicopters to car bombs, shootings by soldiers, bombs in telephones, ground-to-ground antitank missiles, and many others. On 22 March 2004 Israel assassinated the sixty-seven-year-old, blind, crippled spiritual leader of Hamas, SHEIKH AHMAD YASIN, with hellfire missiles as he was being wheeled out of a mosque after morning prayers. One month later his successor, physician ABD AL-AZIZ RANTISI, was assassinated on 17 April. A December 2001 opinion poll conducted by the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center revealed that Palestinians consider the policy of assassination to be the most harmful aspect of the al-Aqsa Intifada.

Incursions into Area A. Area A, according to the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT between Israel and the PLO, is supposed to be under exclusive Palestinian control. On 1 April 2001, an Israeli squad entered Area A in the West Bank to arrest six Palestinians suspected of participation in terrorist attacks on settlers near Ramallah. The PNA issued a warning that Israel had “crossed a red line” by conducting a raid inside Area A. Yet, on 11 April 2001, Israeli tanks and bulldozers conducted a far deeper and larger incursion into Area A, in Gaza in the Khan Yunis refugee camp, leaving two Palestinians dead and destroying as many as 25 homes. On 16 April 2001, Israeli troops entered Beit Hanoun in the Gaza Strip, which they occupied for 24 hours, withdrawing only after a massive international outcry and heavy US pressure. Such incursions subsequently occurred regularly throughout Gaza as well as in the West Bank cities of JENIN, HEBRON, BETHLEHEM, Beit Jala, NABLUS, Ramallah, Tulkarm, and JERICHO, plus in their surrounding refugee camps. In the longest incursion in 2001, the Israeli army entered Beit Jala, a town on the West Bank opposite Bethlehem, on 28 August 2001 and remained for 48 hours. From 11 to 15 September 2001, the West Bank city of Jenin was surrounded by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF), conducting repeated raids inside the city during these four days.

In 2002 the incursions were far longer and far more deadly. They began with OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS on 21 January and lasting until 15 March 2002, followed by OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD, which lasted for six weeks from 29 March to 10 May 2002. This was followed by OPERATION DETERMINED PATH, which began on 22 June and lasted approximately three months; and Operation Protective Wall, which somewhat overlapped the two and involved Israel's decision to construct the separation Barrier.

The year 2002 also saw a thirty-nine-day stand-off from 2 April to 10 May 2002 between the IDF and Palestinians after Israel seized the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, in which 150 Palestinians, including both civilians and militants, had sought refuge. When it ended, thirteen militants were deported. Throughout the year, Israel continued full-scale invasions of Palestinian cities and reoccupied all of Area A. Among their incursions, they invaded Ramallah, leveled the Jenin refugee camp, destroyed the Old City of Nablus, imposed long curfews, and attacked human rights organizations and journalists. They also invaded Arafat's compound, eventually destroying four of the five buildings and leaving Arafat and a few of his aides confined to the second floor of the remaining building.

There were major incursions both in the West Bank and Gaza during the subsequent years, notably OPERATION RAINBOW in May 2004 in Gaza; Operation Days of Penitence in September 2004, also in Gaza; Operation Hot Winter from 25 February to 1 March 2007 in Nablus; 3–6 January 2008 in Nablus, an extension of Hot Winter; Operation Warm Winter from 27 February to 3 March 2008 in Gaza; and many other operations, named and unnamed. However, until OPERATION CAST LEAD in Gaza, which started on 27 December 2008 and ended on 18 January 2009, none were as destructive to life and property as those in 2002.

Use of Fighter Jets. On 19 May 2001, following a Palestinian suicide bombing that took the lives of five Israelis in front of a shopping mall in Netanya, Israel responded by using F-16 fighter jets to fire missiles at Palestinian security headquarters in Nablus, West Bank. The attack left at least nine Palestinians dead. The use of such powerful US-made weaponry was widely criticized both in Israel and abroad. Israel nevertheless sent its F-16s back into action both in mock attacks terrorizing the population and in actual strikes. On 10 August 2001, for example, F-16 jets bombarded the headquarters of the Palestinian civilian police in Nablus, killing nine following a suicide attack in Jerusalem that killed five. On 26 August 2001, F-15 and F-16 jets attacked and destroyed Palestinian security installations in the West Bank and Gaza, especially the headquarters of the Palestinian police in Gaza City. In Operation Cast Lead, F-16s and other major aircraft played a significant role in the nature of the ordinance they dropped.

Tank Fire. On 21 October 2000, tanks were used for the first time as a warning to the residents of Beit Jala, from which shots had been fired at the Israeli settlement of Gilo. The use by the Israeli army of such heavy weaponry against the Palestinian population signaled a new escalation in the conflict. This first tank shot was fired in an open area, causing no injuries or material damage. From then on, the use of tanks against civilian buildings, infrastructure, and so forth has been an almost daily occurrence.

Holding the PNA Responsible. On 10 August 2001, in response to a suicide bombing by Hamas in Jerusalem that killed fifteen, Israeli troops seized nine buildings belonging to the PNA in East Jerusalem and its outskirts, most notably the Palestinian governor's compound in ABU DIS and the ORIENT HOUSE. The attack on PNA compounds started in 2000 when, on 12 October, Israeli helicopters shelled a PNA infrastructure in retaliation for the lynching of two reserve soldiers by a Palestinian mob in Ramallah. Israel maintained that the PNA, and in particular President Yasir Arafat, was orchestrating the Intifada and was therefore responsible for every Palestinian action against Israeli targets, even when such attacks could not be directly linked to it. Whereas, at first, the Tanzim was the favored target of such strikes, retaliatory actions were soon also directed at FORCE 17, the National Security Service, the Civil Police, the Naval Police, and the General Intelligence. Yet such measures weakened the PNA both materially and politically, thereby decreasing further its ability to prevent attacks by Hamas or Islamic Jihad. In early December 2001, Israel placed Yasir Arafat under house arrest in his Ramallah headquarters, where he remained, except for a few "passes," until his death on 11 November 2004. During that time, Israel repeatedly bombed the headquarters until little was left except the one room in which Arafat lived. Still, Israel charged him directly responsible for every Palestinian action.

Administrative Detention. ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION involves incarceration without charge or due process in facilities run by the Israel Prison Service and the IDF. According to B'Tselem "conservative estimates" of the extent of this practice from 13 September 1993 through December 2008, "Israel has administratively detained some one thousand Palestinians for periods ranging from six months to five and a half years."

There is considerable range in the number of detainees being held at any one time. According to B'Tselem, the lowest number of persons under administrative detention was 13 in April 2001 and the highest was 1,127 in March 2003. During the al-Aqsa Intifada, administrative detention increased significantly. As of December 2008, some 540 Palestinians were under administrative detention. These figures do not include the thousands of Palestinians charged, tried, and convicted during the Intifada. B'Tselem reports that at the end of 2008, "About 7,900 Palestinians were held in Israel . . . the vast majority in facilities of the Israel Prisons Service, and a small number in IDF facilities. The figures are provided by the government authorities."

House Demolitions. The Israeli Committee on House Demolitions reports that between September 2000 and February 2009 the Israeli authorities demolished 10,111 Palestinian homes. Israel cites three main reasons for such demolitions:

1. Punitive demolitions: Houses demolished as punishment for the actions of people associated with the houses. "This policy was suspended by the IDF in February, 2005 after it reached the conclusion that rather than deterring attacks, punitive demolitions only enflame the people and lead to more attacks." The practice was resumed on 19 January 2009. Punitive demolitions account for only 8.5 percent of all defined demolitions.

2. Administrative demolitions: These are houses demolished for lack of a building permit. This happens mainly in Area C and in East Jerusalem, both under exclusive Israeli authority, though prior to the existence of Areas A, B, and C it occurred in other areas as well. "It is important to point out that in almost all cases, Palestinians have no choice but to build 'illegally' as permits will not be granted. It is also the case that in Area B, if a house is in close proximity to a military base or a road used by the military or settlers, it may also face administrative demolition." This type of demolition accounts for approximately 27 percent of defined demolitions.

3. Land-clearing operations/military demolitions: Houses demolished by the IDF in the course of military operations for the purpose of clearing off a piece of land (for whatever reason), achieving a military goal, or killing wanted persons as part of Israel's policy of extrajudicial executions. Military demolitions account for about 65.5 percent of defined demolitions.

Checkpoints. As of 15 November 2008, the Israeli army had sixty-three permanent security checkpoints inside the West Bank, eighteen of them in the city of Hebron. Forty-nine are regularly staffed, some around the clock, some only during the day, and some only a few hours a day. The IDF also operates forty permanent, staffed, around-the-clock checkpoints that are the last control points between the West Bank and Israeli sovereign territory. Most of these checkpoints are located inside the West Bank, up to several kilometers from the Green Line.

In addition, according to the UN Office for Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, there was an average of eighty-nine flying checkpoints in the West Bank each week between September 2007 and the end of April 2008. Flying checkpoints are like regular checkpoints but are mobile, meaning they can pop up unannounced anywhere at any time. Soldiers block a road, and demand to see the papers and personal effects of anyone wanting to pass. The IDF believes this is a good way to catch militants. In comparison to the period above, the weekly average between January and August 2007 was sixty-six. As of July 2008, there were 66 gates in the separation Barrier, itself a product of the Intifada, only half of which are open to Palestinian use, and only if they have permits. The gates available for Palestinian use are open only part of the day.

Other Physical Obstructions. In addition to staffed checkpoints, the IDF has erected hundreds of physical obstructions (dirt piles, concrete blocks, boulders, trenches, fences, and iron gates) to block access to main roads and channel Palestinian traffic to staffed checkpoints. In recent years, the number of these obstructions has gradually risen. The average monthly total of physical obstructions for 2008 (January to September) was 537. In 2007, the monthly average was 459; in 2006 the monthly average was 445; and in 2005, 410. Unlike at staffed checkpoints, security forces are not present at the obstruction to exercise discretion, even in emergency cases, on whether to permit passage.

Curfews. Throughout the al-Aqsa Intifada and prior to it, the IDF has routinely imposed curfews on villages, refugee camps, and cities in the West Bank. It has done so during all military operations and at times as punishment. Following stone throwing in a village, for instance, the army sometimes imposes a curfew on all or part of the village for a few hours or even a few days. Hundreds of thousands of Palestinians have been imprisoned in their homes for months, except for short breaks during which the IDF allows them to go out to purchase basic necessities.

During Operation Defensive Shield, which lasted six weeks, the army imposed a curfew on most residents of the West Bank. In some areas, this curfew continued even after the operation ended. In Operation Determined Path, which lasted several months, the army reentered the West Bank and reinstated a curfew on all Palestinian cities except Jericho, as well as on many West Bank towns and villages. In the initial weeks of the operation, almost 2 million Palestinians were under curfew. About two months after the operation began, the army gradually lifted the curfew on the towns and villages, but continued it on the major cities for many more months. Nablus, from which several militant groups launched attacks, for example, was kept under curfew for over 100 consecutive days.

Nonviolent Resistance

Some of the Palestinian reaction to Israeli policy in the West Bank and Gaza Strip has consisted of nonviolent protest. Groups such as the Palestinian Centre for Rapprochement between People, which works out of Beit Sahour, a town near Bethlehem, formally encourages and organizes nonviolent resistance. Other groups, such as the International Solidarity Movement, advocate and practice nonviolent resistance. Some of these activities are done in cooperation with international organizations and Israelis, such as the weekly protests against the Barrier carried out in villages such as Bi'lin, Biddu, and Budrus in the West Bank. This model of resistance has spread to other villages, such as Beit Sira, Hebron, Saffa, and Ni'lein, also in the West Bank. Even during the May 2002

Israeli reinvasion of Jenin and Nablus, "A Call for a Non-violent Resistance Strategy in Palestine" was issued by two Palestinian Christian organizations.

Nonviolent tactics have at times been met with Israeli military force. For example, Amnesty International notes that "10-year-old Walid Naji Abu Qamar, 11-year-old Mubarak Salim al-Hashash and 13-year-old Mahmoud Tariq Mansour were among eight unarmed demonstrators killed in the early afternoon of 19 May 2004 in Rafah, in the Gaza Strip, when the Israeli army opened fire on a non-violent demonstration with tank shells and a missile launched from a helicopter gunship. Dozens of other unarmed demonstrators were wounded in the attack." According to Israeli army and government officials, the tanks shelled a nearby empty building and a helicopter fired a missile in a nearby open space in order to deter the demonstrators from proceeding toward Israeli army positions.

The International Solidarity Movement (ISM) is a nongovernmental organization that calls on civilians from around the world to participate in acts of nonviolent, civil protests against the Israeli military in the West Bank and previously in the Gaza Strip. The ISM was founded in 2001 by Palestinian and Israeli activists, later joined by British and American volunteers, but it has faced several serious reprisals:

1. On 22 November 2002, Caoimhe Butterly, an Irish ISM volunteer, was shot and seriously injured by IDF in Jenin.
2. On 16 March 2003, Rachel Corrie, a US ISM volunteer, was killed while trying to protect a Palestinian home from demolition. She was run over by an IDF armored bulldozer.
3. On 5 April 2003, British ISM volunteer Brian Avery was shot in the face by machine gun fire from an IDF armored personnel carrier while he was in the street escorting Palestinian medical personnel.
4. On 11 April 2003, British ISM volunteer Thomas Hurndall was left clinically brain-dead after he was shot in the head by an IDF soldier. Initially the soldier claimed the shooting occurred during an armed firefight between Israeli soldiers and Palestinian militants. Later he admitted firing a shot near him, as a deterrent, that had unintentionally hit him. Hurndall died on 13 January 2004.

In Israel, nonviolent protest took another form. More than a hundred members of Israel's army reserves released a signed statement on 1 February 2002, saying they would henceforth refuse to serve in the West Bank and Gaza. In their statement, the soldiers said, "The price of Occupation is the loss of the Israel Defense Forces' semblance of humanity and the corruption of all of Israeli society. . . . We will no longer fight beyond the Green Line with the aim of dominating, expelling, starving, and humiliating an entire people." According to the war resisters' group YESH G'VUL (There Is a Limit), approximately 400 Israelis refused to serve in the Occupied Territories. While most have been quietly released from duty, some forty faced disciplinary hearings and detentions.

Journalists and the Intifada

Journalists have faced difficulties from the outset of the al-Aqsa Intifada. The International Press Institute (IPI) states that "between the outbreak of the second Intifada on 28 September 2000 and the end of 2004, journalists have featured heavily among the victims. . . . MEDIA workers and media outlets have repeatedly been targeted and attacked by Israeli soldiers, police, officials, settlers and civilians, as well as by Palestinian police, officials, militants and civilians."

The IPI detailed 562 press freedom violations during the first four years of the Palestinian Uprising (2000–2004), stating, "At least 478 press freedom violations were carried out by the Israeli state, including the government, the judiciary, and even the legislators. Sixteen violations were committed by Israeli settlers and civilians. Three were perpetrated jointly by Israeli soldiers and settlers. As a result, at least 497 abuses, or 88.4 percent of all violations, were perpetrated by Israelis. Another 29 violations were carried out by the Palestinian authorities plus 15 by Palestinian militants, 7 by Palestinian civilians, and one jointly by the Palestinian authorities and civilians." During this period twelve journalists were killed and scores injured, some for life.

Of the 562 violations, 213 violations involved "shootings, shelling, bombings, and missile attacks, 204 were carried out by Israelis, four by Palestinians, and five by unknown perpetrators." Journalists and media workers were targeted and injured with missiles, live ammunition, shelling, shrapnel, ricochets, and rubber-coated steel bullets, and harassed and physically assaulted in other ways. (Rubber-coated steel bullets are supposedly used by the Israeli army mainly against stone-throwers. Unlike rubber bullets, they are sometimes lethal.)

In all but a handful of cases, the perpetrators have gone unpunished. No one has been prosecuted for any of the journalist killings or severe injuries. This, according to IPI, has encouraged a climate of impunity in which Israeli soldiers, police officers, and settlers, as well as Palestinian police and militants, are given implicit, or even explicit, authority to commit press freedom violations. There were nine attacks on Palestinian media outlets targeted for destruction by the Israeli army. Another seven such attacks may have been for the same purpose.

Israel and Journalists. While the IPI's report ended with 2004, the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) has reported on more recent events. For example according to Reuters, on 16 April 2008, cameraman Fadel Shana, twenty-three, was killed and soundman Wafa Abu Mizyed, also in his twenties, was severely wounded after the crew stopped their car and began filming Israeli military forces located several hundred meters away. Shana was filming the tank when it apparently fired on the Reuters TV crew. CPJ stated, "We are asking the Israeli authorities to publicly commit to carrying out an exhaustive investigation. . . . [But] Previous investigations into journalist deaths at the hands of the IDF have been marred by a lack of transparency and accountability." Robert Mahoney, director of CPJ, stated: "In the Gaza Strip, anyone with a camera is fair game. That's the inescapable conclusion from the Israeli army's investigation into why one of its tank crews fired at least two shells at a Reuters television journalist openly filming them from a mile away."

Journalists working in the Palestinian territories said the Israeli military's apparent disregard for the safety of the press hurt their ability to work. Reporters covering peaceful demonstrations over Israel's construction of the Barrier in the West Bank found themselves particularly at risk. According to Reuters deputy bureau chief Julian Rake on 18 April 2008, "in the West Bank town of Bilein, Reuters photographer Amar Awad was struck by a rubber bullet fired by a border officer standing just 100 meters away. A demonstration set for later that day had not yet begun when Awad was shot; the cameraman was wearing a flak jacket identifying him as press." Steve Gutkin, chairman of the Foreign Press Association, commented that "many journalists say that authorities at Bil'in have targeted the press with rubber bullets, stun grenades, and tear gas to inhibit coverage and stop protesters from seeking media attention." IDF spokesmen have told CPJ that it is not their policy to target journalists.

Palestinian journalists are harassed at Israeli border crossings and checkpoints, local journalists said. In one widely reported case, award-winning journalist Mohammed Omer was hospitalized after an interrogation at the Allenby Crossing between Jordan and the West Bank. Omer was returning to his home in the Gaza Strip after collecting the Martha Gellhorn Prize in London in recognition of his reporting for the US-based magazine Washington Report on Middle East Affairs and the Rome-based news agency Inter Press Service. "Men he identified as agents of SHIN BET, the domestic intelligence service, interrogated him, stripped him naked at gunpoint, and humiliated him, Omer told CPJ. The journalist said agents dragged him across the floor and stepped on his neck while he was on the ground. He was eventually placed in an ambulance and brought to Jericho Hospital in the West Bank, where he was treated for broken ribs and psychological distress."

In a written statement to CPJ, the Israeli government said Omer was not subjected to abuse and that his belongings were searched because of suspicions "that he had been in contact with hostile elements." The statement acknowledged that Omer received medical care after the incident but cast doubt on the severity of his injuries.

The Israeli military was holding one journalist in prison on 1 December 2008, when CPJ conducted its annual census of imprisoned journalists. On 15 July 2008, Israeli military forces arrested Ibrahim Hamad, a soundman for the Gaza-based Ramattan news agency, in a 4 A.M. raid on his home in the Kalandia refugee camp near Ramallah in the West Bank, relatives and station staff told CPJ. The reason for his arrest was unclear. Authorities held Hamad in "administrative detention" without disclosing any charges against him.

Some foreign correspondents describe an increasingly dismissive IDF attitude toward journalist safety in the West Bank and Gaza. An IDF spokesman issued a statement on 7 May 2008 that it "wishes to emphasize that it does not take any responsibility for the presence of foreign journalists in operational or combat zones in Judea, Samaria [the West Bank] and the Gaza Strip."

"Any journalist who enters these areas is acting under his own will and responsibility," the statement said. "Their will be no coordination of press movement and activity in the areas of IDF operations."

The statement, journalists told CPJ, was released after an incident in which an ABC News crew in Gaza was alarmed by a circling Israeli Apache helicopter. The crew called the IDF and asked that the command be informed that journalists were in the vicinity. An IDF media officer dismissed their request, the journalists said.

The Palestinians and Journalists. After Hamas consolidated its power in Gaza in June 2007, journalists reported continued harassment and censorship by Hamas officials in Gaza and by officials with the Fatah-led Palestinian National Authority in the West Bank. Several journalists working for news outlets based in the West Bank and Gaza said they chose their words carefully in writing about human rights abuses and politics because they feared reprisals.

In 2008, violent clashes between the Palestinian factions, including a bomb blast that killed six on a Gaza beach in July, initiated waves of arrests of Fatah and Hamas supporters in both places. Journalists were among those swept up in the arrests and held for weeks or months. At least three were being held by Hamas security agents in Gaza when CPJ conducted its annual census of imprisoned journalists.

Fatah maintained its distribution ban on Gaza-based publications Al-Risala and Falastin, local journalists told CPJ. The government halted their distribution in the West Bank in June 2007, accusing the two newspapers of favoring Hamas. The Hamas-led government in the Gaza Strip was similarly intolerant of media perceived to have pro-Fatah bias. In July, Hamas banned distribution of three newspapers, Al-Hayat al-Jadida, Al-Ayyam, and Al-Quds, local journalists and human rights activists said.

Palestinian journalists working for international news agencies were also targeted amid violence between Fatah and Hamas. On 26 July 2008, Hamas security agents arrested a camera operator for the German broadcaster ARD TV at his home in Tel Al-Hawa. The arrest of Sawah Abu Seif followed an explosion in southwest Gaza that Hamas blamed on Fatah. AP reported that Abu Seif had not filmed the explosion or its aftermath, but was picked up in a roundup of Palestinians with suspected links to Fatah. Abu Seif was held for five days and abused by security agents, ARD bureau chief Richard Schneider told CPJ. The agents interrogated him about his work and confiscated his laptop computer and cell phone, but did not charge him with any crime.

In the 27 December 2008–18 January 2009 assault on Gaza, Israel prohibited all journalists, photographers, filmmakers, and other media from entering Gaza.

Israeli Attacks on Medical Personnel and Ambulances

Throughout the al-Aqsa Intifada, medical personnel, ambulances, and patients have been victimized. Ambulances have been shot at, seized, and often destroyed. Doctors and other medical personnel have been shot and injured or killed. Patients have not received the care they need. The checkpoint and roadblock system by its very nature deters the free movement of ambulances attempting to get to patients or trying to ferry them to a hospital. Ambulances, like all vehicles, must stand in line, submit to searches and questions, and may or may not be allowed to pass.

In 2003 B'Tselem reported: "Palestinian ambulance teams never know if they will be able to reach the hospital. . . . Palestinian Red Crescent ambulances are able to reach the place where the sick or wounded are located only thirty percent of the time. In seventy percent of the cases, the sick or wounded must get to a location accessible to the ambulance on their own. . . . The physical roadblocks erected to maintain the siege—concrete blocks, trenches, and dirt piles—block timely access to villages and sometimes prevent access altogether. Soldiers are not stationed at these roadblocks, whose presence would enable Palestinians to explain the urgency involved. The only option available to ambulance teams is to travel along winding, rundown roads, which results in the sick people being unnecessarily shaken, loss of time in reaching the destination, and abnormal wear-and-tear to the vehicle. In some places, the medical teams must assist the sick in crossing the physical roadblocks using wheelchairs or stretchers."

During Operation Cast Lead, thirteen Palestine Red Crescent Society ambulances were damaged. Of these, four were completely destroyed. Amnesty International reported in January 2009 that "emergency medical rescue workers, including doctors, paramedics and ambulance drivers, repeatedly came under fire from Israeli forces while they were carrying out their duties. At least seven were killed and more than 20 were injured while they were transporting or attempting to collect the wounded and the dead." Such attacks on medical personnel have been standard throughout the Intifada. Israel has also targeted UN RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY (UNRWA) facilities, especially in Gaza, in one instance bombing the largest food storage facility, ruining the food as well as the building.

International Peace Efforts during the al-Aqsa Intifada

There was a dearth of international efforts to bring about a halt to the al-Aqsa Intifada, and those that were attempted were deeply flawed and ultimately failed. This was largely because the United States is the only country with the power, prestige, and resources to effectively alter the status quo, but the administration of George W. Bush was so closely aligned with Ariel Sharon's right-wing Likud government that no matter what Israel did (e.g., reneging on formal agreements with the PLO, expanding settlements, carrying out targeted assassinations, using American-made F-16s to bomb civilians), Bush, parroting Sharon, defended and justified it as being within Israel's "security needs." Indeed, the United States undermined, by commission or omission, every initiative that emerged.

UN Security Council Resolutions and the United States. Between 2001 and 2006, the United States vetoed nine Security Council Resolutions attempting to bring some conclusion to the conflict:

1. 27 March 2001: Called for a United Nations Observer Force in the West Bank, Gaza.
2. 14 December 2001: Condemned all acts of terror, demanded an end to the violence, and called for the establishment of a monitoring mechanism to bring in observers.
3. 19 December 2002: On the killing by Israeli forces of several UN employees and the destruction of the World Food Program warehouse.
4. 16 September 2003: Demanded that Israel halt threats to expel Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat.
5. 14 October 2003: Sought to bar Israel from extending Barrier wall.
6. 25 March 2004: Condemned Israel for assassinating Ahmed Yasin.

7. 10 May 2004: Called for Israel to halt Gaza operation.
8. 13 July 2006: Called for Israel to halt Gaza operation.
9. 11 November 2006: Called for Israel to halt Gaza operation.

Additionally, the United States was able to scuttle numerous draft resolutions critical of Israel or supportive of the Palestinians even before they moved to a vote. In the General Assembly there have been scores of occasions where the United States was the only country besides Israel (sometimes joined by a few small third world states dependent on US aid) to vote against otherwise unanimous resolutions.

On several occasions, however, the United States voted in the affirmative on a Security Council resolution, including UNSC Resolution 1397 (12 March 2002), in which for the first time a resolution refers to a Palestinian state to exist side by side with Israel. The council also passed Resolutions 1402 (30 March 2002) and 1403 (4 April 2002) without a US veto, both of which call for Israel to withdraw from Palestinian cities “without delay.”

US Diplomacy and Other Peace Initiatives. In 2001, President Bill Clinton convened a summit in SHARM al-SHAYKH and persuaded the Israelis and Palestinians to agree to an American fact-finding mission concerning the causes of the Intifada. GEORGE J. MITCHELL, former member and majority leader for the US Senate, was appointed chair of a US commission to investigate the causes of the violence and to make recommendations. The Mitchell Commission Report, released in April 2001, called for an immediate cease-fire, a freeze on Jewish settlements, and a more determined action against violence by the PNA. Nevertheless, Israeli settlement building escalated, there was no cease-fire, and the Palestinians continued their resistance.

In June 2001, President Bush dispatched CIA director GEORGE TENET after both sides approved his “work plan” or blueprint for a “cessation of hostilities.” Nothing came of the Tenet Plan and in December 2001, Secretary of State Colin Powell appointed retired Marine Corps general Anthony Zinni as his special envoy to the region. Zinni’s mission was simply to bring about a cessation of hostilities; he had no mandate to attempt a settlement of the issues.

In March 2002, Saudi crown prince Abdullah drew up a comprehensive peace plan to settle all the outstanding issues in the Arab-Israeli conflict. Known as the ARAB PEACE INITIATIVE, it was endorsed by the entire ARAB LEAGUE, including the PNA. The rest of the world applauded the plan; Israel denounced it and the United States ignored it.

In 2003, the EUROPEAN UNION (EU), RUSSIA, the UN, and the United States (together known as the QUARTET) developed a plan, named the ROAD MAP for Peace. It was designed to be implanted in three phases: to end “violence and terrorism,” to reach a “final and comprehensive” settlement to the conflict by 2005, and to create an independent and democratic Palestinian state to live side by side with Israel. The United States, however, demanded that INTERNATIONAL LAW and UN Security Council resolutions not be major components of the Road Map, thus limiting from the outset its chances of producing a just peace and effectively marginalizing the United Nations. Palestinians accepted it immediately; Israel accepted it several months later, but subject to fourteen conditions that gutted its intent.

One of the provisions of the Road Map was for President Arafat to “reform” PNA governance, beginning with the appointment of a prime minister. Arafat complied, appointing Mahmud Abbas (Abu Mazen) to the position. Similar to the fate of other initiatives, the Road Map quietly disappeared.

At the Aqaba Summit, held on 4 June 2003 among US president Bush, Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, and Palestinian prime minister Abu Mazen, Sharon committed to the formation of a Palestinian state and to removing “unauthorized OUTPOSTS” in the Occupied Territories. However, according to the Fourth Geneva Convention, all settlements imposed by an occupying power are illegal. Furthermore, of the very few outposts that were actually removed, most were uninhabited—“dummy” outposts erected by the settler movement to use as a tool for negotiations or public relations. Israel has historically used the removal of “unauthorized” settlements to legitimize other settlements in a “trade-off” with settler groups.

In December 2003 an unofficial draft peace agreement (the GENEVA ACCORD) was signed by leading Israeli and Palestinian political figures, which started from where the two sides had left off when Israel, backed by the United States, suspended negotiations in February 2001. The plan received little to no attention from the Israeli and US governments.

Consequences of al-Aqsa Intifada

Israeli military incursions in the West Bank were at their most intense in 2002, followed by periods of relative calm and violent conflict—both in the West Bank and Gaza. Beginning in June 2007, after Hamas defeated Fatah in the latter's bid for power in Gaza, there was ever-increasing violence throughout the Occupied Territories. For instance, in November 2007 the IDF carried out 786 raids in the West Bank to search for Palestinian militants, especially those associated with Hamas; public and private properties were damaged; curfews were reimposed; and countless civilians were terrorized by armed soldiers and dogs. In the West Bank, Nablus was particularly affected: on 17 October 2007 the Israeli army raided the city in an operation named Hot Winter and indiscriminately fired tank shells. Nablus has been one of the most active sites of resistance to the Occupation, and as a result it was one of the hardest-hit cities/areas by Israel during the Intifada. Gaza too suffered intensely through the years, subject to a total embargo and several brutal invasions, including Operation Summer Rains and Operation Autumn Clouds in 2006 and Operation Cast Lead in December 2008 and January 2009.

The humanitarian situation in Gaza is catastrophic, although Gaza was near ruin even before Operation Cast Lead, because of the embargo Israel had imposed. In both the West Bank and Gaza, poverty and unemployment are at their highest levels ever; health and education have been undermined by military incursions, the Barrier, and checkpoints; and the social fabric of society is rapidly unraveling. The situation deteriorated throughout the uprising, but especially after 2006, when Hamas won the January PALESTINIAN NATIONAL COUNCIL elections, causing even European donor money to dry up.

The loss of lives, limbs, and material assets does not begin to reveal the devastation this conflict wrought in the Occupied Territories. While the suicide bombings and the Qassam rockets were experienced inside Israel, the Intifada was overwhelmingly waged on Palestinian territory, and there, unimaginable desolation and deprivation prevail. The construction of the Barrier, the expansion of settlements, the restrictions on freedom of movement, house demolitions, and military incursions have had a disastrous impact on the economy, health, education, and family life; the essence of the social fabric; and a decreasing standard of living for Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza.

The economy, precarious before the Intifada, was ruined by Israeli incursions and security measures—the checkpoints, closures, and others. Farmers, workers, merchants, and businesspeople are unable to reach their places of employment or to sell their goods and services. Often businesses have been bombed with the same consequence. Losing their income, Palestinians are unable to purchase goods and services, generating a further decline in production and employment. A few individuals retained a work permit to enter Israel during the al-Aqsa Intifada, but they were often prevented by the closure from reaching their workplace. The United Nations Special Coordinator (UNSCO) commented in 2002: “Even if the siege was lifted now and the Intifada stopped instantly, the Palestinian economy would take years to recover.” Six years later the situation had only worsened.

Settlement Expansion, 2000–2008. According to the Foundation for Middle East Peace, in 2008 the settler population in the West Bank and East Jerusalem stood at 479,500, up from 370,548 in 2000. This figure is based on two components: According to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS), in 2008, 285,800 settlers were living in the West Bank, excluding East Jerusalem, up from 198,300 in 2000—the start of the al-Aqsa Intifada. The settler population in East Jerusalem at the end of 2008 was estimated at 193,700, up from 172,248 in 2000. In HEBRON, to take a dramatic case, 600 Jewish settlers live in the midst of 160,000 Palestinians but control 20 percent of the city, including the holy sites sacred to both Muslims and Jews. Peace Now reports that there were 18,361 housing starts between 2000 and 2008, and 105 new outposts.

On 2 March 2009 the Israeli government announced plans to build more than 73,300 new housing units in the West Bank, of which 5,722 will be in East Jerusalem. Peace Now estimates that if all of the units are built, it will mean a 100 percent increase in the total number of Israeli settlers. The Peace Now report estimates that some settlements, including the two largest, Ariel and Ma'aleh Adumim, would double in size.

In a startling statistic, Peace Now reveals that 80.25 percent of the settlements and outposts sit (fully or partially) on private Palestinian land.

The separation Barrier consumes 8.6 percent of West Bank land and encompasses forty-nine settlements.

Since 1996, no government has officially decided upon the establishment of a new settlement on the West Bank. In order to continue to occupy additional land in the West Bank, the settlement leadership, with the close assistance of very senior elements within the government, decided to establish OUTPOSTS, intent on creating faits accomplis in the field and taking control of new areas. Most of the outposts have been established at key points in the midst of Palestinian population centers and deep into the West Bank, thereby attempting to create territorial continuity between the existing settlements and breaking up the contiguity existing between the Palestinian townships. Thus, the settlers, with government backing, are trying to thwart the possibility of the existence of a contiguous Palestinian state on the West Bank.

At the end of 2008, the West Bank (not including East Jerusalem) contained 121 settlements that the Interior Ministry recognized as “communities,” even though some of them contain stretches of land on which the built-up area is not contiguous. There are an additional 100+ unrecognized settlements, referred to in the MEDIA as outposts, which Peace Now says “are usually smaller than the recognized settlements, but are settlements nevertheless.” In East Jerusalem there are twelve other large settlements built on land confiscated from Palestinians, annexed by Israel in 1967, and made part of Jerusalem. Additionally, in what Israel has termed “the Holy Basin”—the area surrounding the Old City—there are Jewish settlements in all the Palestinian neighborhoods, including Sheikh Jarrah, A-Tur, Ras al-Amud, Abu Dis, Silwan, and Abu Tor.

The Palestinian Grassroots Anti-Apartheid Wall Campaign reported in March 2009 that some 2,000 Palestinians are set to be displaced in East Jerusalem. “Demolition campaigns have increased tremendously in Jerusalem, and the Occupation municipality in Jerusalem has decided to demolish 88 houses in a Silwan neighborhood, housing 1500 people, and 55 houses around Ras Shahada in Shufat refugee camp, from which 500 people will be expelled.” Jerusalem already is cut off from the rest of the West Bank, and Palestinian residents are slowly being forced into shrinking cantons. The attempt to transfer the soon-to-be-displaced residents of Silwan and Shufat to Beit Hanina and other areas is emblematic of a policy centered on controlling and destroying the Palestinian presence in the city.

Objectives of the Parties to the Intifada. The objectives of the Palestinians were discussed at the outset—an end to the Occupation and the creation of independent sovereign states in the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem. But what of Israel’s objectives?

Israel frames all its actions—expanding settlements, house demolitions, targeted assassinations, and so on—in terms of its “security” requirements. Historically, war has played an integral part in maintaining the political cohesion of Israel, a deeply divided society—religious versus nonreligious, ASHKENAZI versus oriental/SEPHARDI, MILITARISM versus civil society, and so on. Domestic conflicts of such fundamental character in Israel have been subsumed under the higher cause of “survival,” “eternal victimization,” and a carefully crafted HOLOCAUST “memory”—that is, the experience of the Holocaust was mobilized and legitimized to justify all of Israel’s offensive military operations and wars, making the case that Israel’s survival was always at stake. Security is the catchword for these constructs.

As long as the state faced credible enemies on the outside, consensus could reign within. And Israel was able to exploit the threat further by becoming, during the 1960s, a staunch US ally against the Arab nationalist regimes. This was both a material and ideological prop: Israel became a massive recipient of US aid, while enjoying the prestige of a partnership with the world’s foremost power. The Zionist project was sustained through these various mechanisms despite the fact that its initial impetus, European ANTI-SEMITISM, was by now irrelevant to the vast majority of Jews.

But the Palestinians were an “enemy” of a different sort. By their very existence and presence they challenged the legitimacy the state of Israel created over Palestine. From 1948 to 1993, Israel denied the existence of the Palestinians as a people despite Israel’s policy of Occupation. Once the Oslo process began, Israel’s strategy was “containment,” convincing and then compelling Palestinians to accept that not even their most minimal demands will be met, whether through negotiations or violence. Regardless of who has been prime minister during this period—Rabin, Peres, Netanyahu, Barak, Sharon, or Olmert—Israel’s negotiating strategy and final positions have changed little.

There is no dispute that Israel has the right to self-defense when threatened, and, arguably, suicide bombs and Qassam rockets are a threat to Israeli citizens. Yet the extraordinarily disproportionate response Israel has inflicted on the Palestinians—all the Palestinians—suggests that this was not merely a response to a security threat, but an attempt to break the will of the Palestinians once and for all. This was Israel's objective in the 1982 LEBANON WAR, and it failed. It seems unlikely that it will be successful in this round either. Moreover, a fundamental question is this: if Israel had approached the Oslo process with fairness, equity, and justice and the Palestinians had gained at least some of their goals, would there even have been a Second Intifada?

Thus, it is likely that the conflict will continue to cycle between periods of violence and negotiation while Israel strengthens its "facts on the ground" and Palestinians search for new strategies to prevent Israel's red lines from becoming their realities.

See also INTIFADAS: FIRST AND SECOND COMPARED; JERUSALEM; OCCUPATION; OPERATION CAST LEAD; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS; OPERATION RAINBOW; SETTLEMENTS

Bibliography

- Abu Sittah, Dr. Ghassan, and Dr. Swee Ang. "The Wounds of Gaza." Lancet Global Health Network (London). 2 February 2009.
- Amnesty International. "Attacks on Ambulance Workers." LiveWire. London: AI, n/d. <http://livewire.amnesty.org/2009/01/28/attacks-on-ambulance-workers/>.
- . Israel and the Occupied Territories: Shielded from Scrutiny: IDF Violations in Jenin and Nablus. MDE 15/143/2002. London: AI, 4 November 2002.
- . Israel/Occupied Territories: End Collective Punishment of Palestinians in Occupied Territories. MDE 15/121/2002. London: AI, 22 July 2002.
- . No Security without Human Rights. Special report. London: AI, 3 June 2002.
- Ashkar, Antigona. Means of Expulsion: Violence, Harassment and Lawlessness against Palestinians in the Southern Hebron Hills. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), July 2005.
- Associated Press. "APTIN's Cameraman Killed in West Bank City of Nablus." Associated Press Television News. 20 April 2003.
- . "Israelis Invade Gaza Refugee Camp." AP. 12 March 2002.

- Avnery, Uri. "The Real Aim of Sharon's 'Operation Defensive Shield.'" Spotlight. 27 April 2002.
- BADIL. Israel's War on the Refugee Camps and the Palestinian People. Bethlehem: BADIL Resource Center, 7 March 2002.
- Baroud, Ramzy, Kathleen Christison, Bill Christison, and Jennifer Loewenstein. The Second Palestinian Intifada: A Chronicle of a People's Struggle. London: Pluto Press, 2006.
- Ben-Israel, Isaac. "The Crisis in the Oslo Process through the Prism of Israeli Deterrence." Strategic Assessment. 5:2 (2002).
- Ben-Shalom, Uzi, Zeev Lehrer, and Eyal Ben-Ari. "A Field Study on Combat Units in the Al-Aqsa Intifada." Armed Forces & Society. 32:1 (2005).
- Bethlehem University. "Bethlehem University under Attack." Press release. Bethlehem: Bethlehem University, 10 March 2002.
- Booman, Steven D. "Israel Uses a Horrific 'New Weapon' in Gaza?" Alternet. 22 January 2009.
- B'Tselem. Absolute Prohibition: The Torture and Ill-Treatment of Palestinian Detainees. Joint Report with HaMoked (Center for the Defense of the Individual). Jerusalem: B'Tselem, May 2007.
- . The Gaza Strip: One Big Prison. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, May 2007.
- . Ghost Town: Israel's Separation Policy and Forced Eviction of Palestinians from the Center of Hebron. Joint report with the Association for Civil Rights in Israel. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, May 2007.
- . Ground to a Halt: Denial of Palestinians' Freedom of Movement in the West Bank. Comprehensive report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, July 2007.
- . Impeding Medical Treatment and Firing at Ambulances by IDF Soldiers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, March 2002.
- . Statistics on administrative detention. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, n.d.
- . A Wall in Jerusalem: Obstacles to Human Rights in the Holy City. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, Summer 2006.
- Carey, Roane, ed. The New Intifada: Resisting Israel's Apartheid. New York: Verso, 2001.
- Collins, John. Occupied by Memory: The Intifada Generation and the Palestinian State of Emergency. New York: New York University Press, 2004.
- Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ). Annual Report: Attacks on the Press in 2008: Israel and the Occupied Palestinian Territory. New York: CPJ, 2008.
- . "Attacks on the Press 2007: Israel and the Occupied Palestinian Territory." New York: CPJ, 5 February 2008.
- . "Cameraman Shot Dead While Filming Israeli Tank." New York: CPJ, 16 April 2008.
- Cook, Catherine. "Barrier: Israel's Wall Not Really about Security." Middle East Report. (MERIP). August 2003.
- Daraghme, Mohammed. "AP Cameraman Shot and Killed by Israeli Troops." Associated Press. 19 April 2003.

- Defense for Children International/Palestine Section. "CRC Anniversary Attests to Child Rights Deterioration in the Occupied Palestinian Territories." DCI/PS, Geneva. 20 November 2008.
- Defense UpDate. "IAF Pursue Subterranean Targets with Earth Penetrators, Bunker Busters." Defense UpDate. February 2009. http://defense-update.com/newscast/1208/analysis/301208\_earth\_penetrating\_weapons.html.
- Dudai, Ron. Free Rein: Vigilante Settlers and Israel's Non-Enforcement of the Law. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, October 2001.
- . No Way Out: Medical Implications of Israel's Siege Policy. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, June 2001.
- . Tacit Consent: Israeli Policy on Law Enforcement toward Settlers in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, March 2001.
- . Trigger Happy: Unjustified Shooting and Violation of the Open-Fire Regulations during the al-Aqsa Intifada. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, March 2002.
- Dugard, John. Human Rights Situation in Palestine and Other Occupied Arab Territories: Report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Palestinian territories occupied since 1967. A/HRC/7/17. New York: UN General Assembly, 21 January 2008.
- Eid, Bassam. "One Year Al-Aqsa Intifada." The Palestinian Human Rights Monitor. Ramallah: The Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group, November 2001.
- Falk, Richard. "International Law and the al-Aqsa Intifada." Middle East Report. 217 (Winter 2000).
- Foster, Douglas. "Interview with CPJ reporters: What are working conditions like right now for journalists covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict?" Frontline/World Web. 31 March 2003.
- Foundation for Middle East. "FMEP Settlement Report: Statistics, Tables, Maps, and More on Settlements." Washington D.C. <http://www.fmep.org/>.
- Friedman, Lara. With Daniel Seideman. The Battle for Jerusalem's Old City and Holy Basin. New York: Americans for Peace Now, May 2006.
- Frykberg, Mel. "Palestinian Deaths Double since Annapolis." Middle East Times. 16 January 2008.
- Goldenberg, Suzanne. "A Long, Hot Wait Fuels Palestinian Anger." The Guardian (London). 12 March 2002.
- . "Mass Arrests Create New Foes for Israel." The Guardian (London). 16 March 2002.
- Gordon, Neve. Israel's Occupation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2008.
- Gresh, Alain, and Dominique Vidal. The New A-Z of the Middle East. London: I. B. Tauris, 2004.
- Gush Shalom. Tulkarm Today. Jerusalem: Gush Shalom, 9 March 2002.
- Ha'aretz. "IDF Tank Fire Hits Bethlehem Church, Damages Virgin Mary." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem daily). 14 March 2002.
- Hamzeh, Muna, and Todd May. Operation Defensive Shield: Witnesses to Israeli War Crimes. London: Pluto Press, 2003.
- Hanieh, Adam. "West Bank Curfews: Politics by Other Means." Middle East Report (MERIP). 24 July 2002.
- Al-Haq. Al-Haq Calls for an End to Arbitrary Arrest and for Humane Treatment of the Detainees. Ramallah, West Bank: al-Haq, Law in the Service of Man 14 March 2002.
- Hass, Amira. "UNRWA: Israeli Raids Have Damaged 1,620 Refugee Homes." Ha'aretz. 11 March 2002.
- . "Where Have All the Young Men Gone?" Ha'aretz. 4 March 2002.
- Hedges, Chris. "With Gaza, Journalists Fail Again." Truthdig. 26 January 2009. www.truthdig.com/report/item/20090126\_with\_gaza\_journalists\_fail\_again.
- Institute for Applied Research—Jerusalem. Devastation of Bethlehem District: An Act of Israeli Vandalism. Jerusalem: ARIJ, March 2002.
- . The Refugees of Rafah . . . the Refugee Trip Is Repeated. Jerusalem: ARIJ, January 2002.
- International Federation of Journalists. "IFJ Condemns Israeli Settlers' Attack on Palestinian Journalists." Brussels: IFJ. 22 October 2008.
- Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions. "Statistics on House Demolitions (1967–2009)." Jerusalem, ICAHD. March 2009. <http://www.icahd.org/eng/docs/ICAHD%20house%20demolition%20statistics.pdf>.
- Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. <http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA>.
- The Israel Project. Statistics on Palestinian Terrorism from the West Bank and Gaza. Jerusalem and Washington DC: The Israel Project. http://www.theisraelproject.org/site/c.hsJPK0PIjPH/b.3820025/k.EFFE/Statistics\_on\_Palestinian\_Terrorism\_from\_the\_West\_Bank\_and\_Gaza.htm.
- Jaeger, David A., Esteban F. Klor, Sami H. Miaari, and M. Daniele Paserman. "The Struggle for Palestinian Hearts and Minds: Violence and Public Opinion in the Second Intifada." Social Science Research Network. IZA Working Paper No. 3439. November 2008.
- Jawad, Dr. Saleh Abdul. "The Israeli Assassination Policy in the Aqsa Intifada." Jerusalem Media and Communications Center. Ramallah, West Bank, December 2001.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Behind The Barrier: Human Rights Violations as a Result of Israel's Separation Barrier. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, April 2003.
- . Civilians under Siege: Restrictions on Freedom of Movement as Collective Punishment. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, January 2001.
- . Excessive Force: Human Rights Violations during IDF Actions in Area A: Beit Jala, 6 May 2001; Beit Rima, 24 October 2001; Bethlehem Area, 19–28 October 2001. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- . Forbidden Roads: The Discriminatory West Bank Road Regime. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, August 2004.

- . Nu'man, East Jerusalem: Life under the Threat of Expulsion. Status report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, September 2003.
- . The Separation Barrier: Position Paper. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, September 2002.
- Lein, Yehezkel, and Alon Cohen-Lifshitz. Under the Guise of Security: Routing the Separation Barrier to Enable the Expansion of Israeli Settlements in the West Bank. B'Tselem with the Center for Planning Rights, December 2005.
- Lein, Yehezkel, and Darryl Li. Act of Vengeance: Israel's Bombing of the Gaza Power Plant and Its Effects. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, September 2006.
- Lendman, Stephen. "Remember Gaza: One of History's Terror Bombing Victims." Countercurrents.org. 14 January 2009. www.countercurrents.org.
- LeVine, Mark. "The End of the Sharon Era, Time for a New Beginning?" In Informed Comment: Thoughts on the Middle East, History and Religion. Edited by Juan Cole. 6 January 2006. <http://www.juancole.com/2006/01/guest-editorial-end-of-sharon-era-end.html>.
- Levy, Gideon. "Bulldozing Rafah: A Crime against the Innocent." Ha'aretz. 17 January 2002.
- . "In the Name of Us All." Ha'aretz. 17 March 2002.
- . "Unconditional Surrender." Ha'aretz. 13 March 2002.
- Löwstedt, Anthony. Israel/Palestine: Press Freedom Violations in Israel and Palestine from 29 September 2000 to 28 September 2004. Vienna: International Press Institute, September 2004.
- Mahoney, Robert. Deputy Director Committee to Protect Journalists. "Israeli Army Decision Endangers Journalists in Gaza." Committee to Protect Journalists. n.d. <http://www.cpj.org/blog/2008/08/in-the-gaza-strip.php>
- McGreal, Chris. "Israelis Pull Out but Leave Trail of Devastation." The Guardian (London). 1 July 2003.
- Nusseibeh, Sari, and Edy Kaufman. "The Al-Aqsa Intifada: Reflections on a Turning Point." Palestine-Israel Journal. 7:3 (2000).
- Palestine Media Center. Bloody Friday Forever Engraved in Collective Palestinian Memory. Ramallah, West Bank: PMC. 9 March 2002.
- Palestinian Center for Human Rights. Weekly Report: On Israeli Human Rights Violations in the Occupied Territories, March 07–13. Gaza: PCHR. 14 March 2002.
- Palestinian Center for Human Rights, Gaza. <http://www.pchrgaza.org/>.
- Palestinian Grassroots Anti-Apartheid Wall Campaign. "2,000 Palestinians to Be Displaced, 73,000 Settlement Units Planned." 9 March 2009. <http://stopthewall.org/latestnews/1883.shtml>.
- Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group (PHRMG). "List of Assassinated Palestinians 2000–April 2003." Ramallah, West Bank: PHRMG. n.d. http://www.phrmg.org/aqsa/list\_of\_assassination\_english.htm.
- . "One Year under Siege: One Year Al-Aqsa Intifada: Fact Sheets and Figures." The Palestinian Human Rights Monitor. Ramallah, West Bank: PHRMG, 2001. www.phrmg.org/monitor2001/oct2001-under\_siege.htm.
- Palestinian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. <http://www.mofa.gov.ps/arabic/index.php>.
- Palestine Monitor*. "Palestinian Medical Relief Ambulance Staff and Patient Detained by the Israeli Occupying Forces." Ramallah, West Bank. 9 September 2003.
- Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment. "Another Extra-Judicial Killing in Ramallah." Jerusalem: LAW: Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment. 6 March 2002.
- . Extra-Judicial Execution in Jenin. Jerusalem: LAW. 7 March 2002.
- Peace Now. "Settlements, Outposts, Housing-Starts, and More." Jerusalem. <http://www.peacenow.org.il/Site/en/homepage.asp>.
- Pearlman, Wendy. Occupied Voices: Stories of Everyday Life from the Second Intifada. New York: Nation Books, 2003.
- Peri, Yoram. Israeli Military and Israel's Palestinian Policy: From Oslo to the Al Aqsa Intifada. Darby, PA: Diane Publishing Co., 2003.
- Popular Committee Against Siege. "Report on the Drastic Consequences of Gaza Siege." Gaza Strip: PCAS, October 2008.
- Qusini, Abed, and Amy Goodman. "They Say Always: 'No Immunity for Palestinian Journalists.'" Democracy Now. 21 April 2003.
- Rabbani, Mouin. "Sharon's Journey of Colors." MERIP Press Information Note 85. 15 March 2002.
- Reporters Without Borders. "Operation Cast Lead: News Control as a Military Objective." Paris: RWB. 3 November 2006.
- . "Palestinian Journalist Covering Gaza Incursion Shot in Back by Israeli Troops." Paris: RWB. 15 February 2009.
- Salem, Neveen. "Israel Intentionally Targets Journalists Covering Palestinian Resistance." IslamOnline. 20 July 2001. www.islamonline.net.
- Save the Children Alliance. "A Month on from Gaza Ceasefire up to 100,000 People Remain Homeless." London: Save the Children Alliance. 16 February 2009.
- Schiff, Zeev. "The House Demolitions." New York Times. 15 January 2002.
- Shnayderman, Ronen. Take No Prisoners: The Fatal Shooting of Palestinians by Israeli Security Forces during "Arrest Operations". Jerusalem: B'Tselem, May 2005.
- . Through No Fault of Their Own: Punitive House Demolitions during the Al-Aqsa Intifada. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, November 2004.

- Stein, Yael. Abuse of Palestinians at the Sarra Checkpoint, Nablus District 27-31. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, December 2003.
- . Events on the Temple Mount—29 September 2000. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, October 2000.
- . Forbidden Families: Family Unification and Child Registration in East Jerusalem. B'Tselem with HaMoked, January 2004.
- . Human Shield: Use of Palestinian Civilians as Human Shields in Violation of High Court of Justice Order. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, November 2002.
- . Illusions of Restraint: Human Rights Violations during the Events in the Occupied Territories, 29 September–2 December 2000. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, December 2000.
- . In Broad Daylight: Abuse of Palestinian by IDF Soldiers on July 23, 2001. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2001.
- . Policy of Destruction: House Demolitions and Destruction of Agricultural Land in the Gaza Strip. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, February 2002.
- . Soldiers' Abuse of Palestinians: in Hebron, 3 December 2002. Case study. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, December 2002.
- . Standard Routine: Beatings and Abuse of Palestinians by Israeli Security Forces during the Al-Aqsa Intifada. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, May 2001.
- . Standing Idly By: Non-enforcement of the Law on Settlers, Hebron 26–28 July 2002. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, August 2002.
- . Torture of Palestinian Minors in the Gush Etzion Police Station. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, July 2001.
- Swisa, Shlomi. Harm to Medical Personnel: The Delay, Abuse and Humiliation of Medical Personnel by the Israeli Security Forces. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, December 2003.
- . Hebron, Area H-2: Settlements Cause Mass Departure of Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, August 2003.
- . Lethal Curfew: The Use of Live Ammunition to Enforce Curfew. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, October 2002.
- . Not All It Seems: Preventing Palestinians Access to Their Lands West of the Separation Barrier in the Tulkarm-Qalqiliya Area. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, June 2004.
- Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees and Physicians for Human Rights, Israel. Joint Appeal. Ramallah, West Bank: UPMRC, and Jaffa-Tel Aviv, Israel: PHRI. 12 March 2002.
- United Nations. Report of the Secretary-General Prepared Pursuant to General Assembly Resolution ES-10/10. Illegal Israeli Actions in Occupied East Jerusalem and the Rest of the Occupied Palestinian Territory. New York: Office of the Secretariat, 2002.
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. Field Update on Gaza from the Humanitarian Coordinator. Geneva: OCHA. 24–26 January 2009.
- . Thousands of Gazans Remain Homeless. Geneva: OCHA. 21 February 2009.
- Warschawski, Michael. "Al-Aqsa Intifada Enters Sixth Year." Alternative Information Center, Jerusalem and Bethlehem. 29 September 2005.
- White, Ben. "Israel Wanted a Humanitarian Crisis: Targeting Civilians Was a Deliberate Part of This Bid to Humiliate Hamas and the Palestinians, and Pulverise Gaza into Chaos." The Guardian (London). 20 January 2009.
- . "The Real Israel-Palestine Story Is in the West Bank." The Guardian (London). 20 February 2009.

Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades

The al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, about whom factual information is sketchy, is a collection of an unknown number of small cells of armed Palestinians that emerged shortly after the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. It was neither officially recognized nor openly backed by either YASIR ARAFAT or FATAH, nor by MAHMUD ABBAS, though Brigades members tend to come from the ranks of Fatah, and there have been allegations that Fatah funds the Brigades. The Brigades was formed in October 2000 in the Balata refugee camp adjacent to NABLUS (in the WEST BANK) by activists from the Fatah "young guard," who were frustrated at the methods used by the Fatah mainstream to fight the Israelis. Their objective was to attack Israeli targets with the aim of driving the Israeli military and SETTLERS from the West Bank, GAZA STRIP, and East JERUSALEM and establishing a Palestinian state.

Despite the religious connotations of the Brigades' name, its members are secular nationalists, and, unlike HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD, they do not seek to establish an Islamic state. Some have argued that their military tactics are in part inspired by the success of Hizbullah in driving Israel out of southern LEBANON, but they do not share Hizbullah's ideology.

The Brigades' founders were Yasir Badawi and Nasser Awais, charismatic men about thirty years of age who wanted to form "a very strong, fearless group" and who became the Brigades' leaders. Much of the Brigades' support comes from refugee camps around Ramallah and Nablus in the West Bank.

Initially, most of the Brigades' attacks were directed at Israeli soldiers and settlers in the West Bank and Gaza; however, early in 2002, the strategy changed to include SUICIDE BOMBINGS inside

Israel's 1967 borders. Some have suggested that this change was intended to increase the popularity of Fatah over the Islamist groups whose suicide attacks had won them extensive support among the Palestinian public. But it has also been suggested that the change was prompted by Israel's assassination in January 2002 of Raed Karmi, one of the Brigades' leaders.

Marwan al-Barghuthi, claimed by the Brigades as its leader, but who denies any affiliation with them, was arrested by Israel and sentenced to five life terms in prison. Nasser Awais was arrested in April 2002 and is being held in isolation in the Beer Saba' prison. Newsday quoted Nasser's brother, Yasir Awais, as saying: "The al-Aqsa Brigades were not formed by a leadership decision and will not be disbanded by their decision. . . . The Brigades were created by the people, created from the womb of the Intifada, nourished and cherished by the people, and it will die only when the OCCUPATION vanishes."

Bibliography

- Backgrounder. "Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Palestinian Nationalists." Council on Foreign Relations. 31 October 2005.
- BBC News. "Profile: Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades." 1 July 2003. http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/middle\_east/1760492.stm.
- Biedermann, Ferry. "Secular and Deadly: The Rise of the Martyrs Brigades." Salon.com. 19 March 2002.
- Browns, John. "Interview with Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade Jenin Leader: Zacharia Zubeidi: The Marked Man." The Independent (UK). 28 May 2004.
- Halevi, Lt. Col. Jonathan D. The Palestinian Rebellion in Fatah: Foreshadowing the Politics of the Post-Arafat Era. Jerusalem Issue Brief 3:30. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, 2004.
- Hass, Amira. "Al-Aqsa Brigade Gunmen and Thanks to the IDF." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 28 July 2004.
- Moore, Molly. "Al-Aqsa Brigades Leader Hunted by Israelis: Refuge Is Prison for Hunted Palestinian." Washington Post. 23 August 2004.
- . "Al-Aqsa Brigades Torch Offices of Arafat's Cronies in Jenin." Washington Post. 1 August 2004.
- Podur, Justin. "Interview with Nasser Aweis Beer Saba' Prison." The Killing Train. 13 February 2005. www.killingtrain.com/archives/000371.html.

Al-Aqsa Mosque

The al-Aqsa Mosque (or al-Masjid al-Aqsa) is part of the complex of Muslim religious buildings (including the DOME OF THE ROCK) in JERUSALEM on the site known as AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF (the Noble Sanctuary), or Majed Mount to Muslims, and the Har Ha-Bayit, or TEMPLE MOUNT, to Jews. Since the early days of the BRITISH MANDATE, the mosque and the surrounding monuments and buildings on al-Haram ash-Sharif have been sites of almost continuous violence between Israelis and Palestinians.

According to Islamic law, the mosque, together with the whole area of al-Haram ash-Sharif, is sacred and inviolable and is the third holiest site in Islam (after Mecca and Medina). It is also the largest mosque in Jerusalem, capable of holding some 5,000 worshippers in and around the structure. Israeli prohibitions on Palestinian worship here have been a source of great bitterness. After 1967, Israel regulated who may pray at the mosque according to age, gender, and place of residence, excluding most Muslims from Israel and the Occupied Territories. Part of the mosque's surrounding wall (Buraq Wall) is the WESTERN WALL, venerated by Jews, and this too has been a source of conflict since the days of the Mandate.

Additionally, Muslims have accused Israel of weakening the walls of the mosque during archaeological excavations that began in 1967 and continue today. In response to concerns about the structure's stability, the Islamic Waqf Foundation is carrying out renovations, but these are fraught with Israeli-imposed complications. It was ARIEL SHARON's provocative visit, backed by hundreds of soldiers, to al-Haram ash-Sharif in 2000 that sparked the Second, or AL-AQSA, INTIFADA, named after the mosque.

In February 2007, major demonstrations ensued after Israel began digging up the stone ramp that formerly provided access to the Moughrabi Gate, which is normally used by non-Muslims to enter the compound and has been controlled by the Israeli authorities since the 1967 WAR. In the three previous years, an increasing number of Jews had been entering the site to pray, causing tensions with the Muslims. The work is the first stage of a plan to build a new raised walkway, which will replace the wooden walkway that was erected three years ago after a storm damaged the original ramp.

At the same time, archaeologists began conducting a "salvage dig," which Muslim authorities claim, together with other already existing digs around the compound, is threatening the foundations of the al-Aqsa Mosque. King Abdullah of JORDAN, who has custodianship of the Muslim shrines, has described the work as a “blatant violation” and a “dangerous escalation. . . . These measures will only create an atmosphere that will not at all help in the success of efforts being undertaken to restore the peace process,” he said.

Some European diplomats have suggested that the perceived threat from excavations may be a lesser factor in the protests than a fear that the new walkway will give easier access to Israeli forces and Jewish worshippers to the compound.

The name al-Aqsa Mosque translates as “the farthest mosque” and is derived from a quranic verse that describes a miraculous journey the Prophet Muhammad took in 621 CE in a single night on a winged steed, Buraq, from a sacred mosque (in Mecca) to the farthest mosque (al-Masjid al-Aqsa). From a large rock there (now covered by the Dome of the Rock), Muhammad again mounted the Buraq and briefly ascended to heaven, accompanied by the archangel Gabriel, and spent time visiting heaven and receiving the Islamic prayers before returning to his home on earth to communicate the prayers to the faithful.

Caliph ‘Umar, the second successor to the Prophet Muhammad, conquered Jerusalem in 637 CE and constructed the original al-Aqsa Mosque. In 709–715 the Umayyad caliph al-Walid rebuilt al-Aqsa Mosque, distinguishing it with a silver dome. Earthquakes in 1927 and 1936 severely damaged the mosque and necessitated its almost complete rebuilding. In the process, ancient sections of the original mosque were brought to light. Analysis of wooden beams and panels removed from the building during the renovations demonstrated that they were made from cedar from Lebanon and Cyprus. Radiocarbon dating indicated a range of ages, but some of the wooden beams were as old as the ninth century BCE, showing that some of the wood had been salvaged from older buildings.

See also DOME OF THE ROCK; AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF; HASMONEAN TUNNEL; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Abu-Amr, Ziad. “The Significance of Jerusalem: A Muslim Perspective.” Palestine-Israel Journal of Politics, Economics and Culture. 2:2 (1995).
- Amayreh, Khalid. “Gazans Barred from al-Aqsa Mosque.” alJazeera.net. 14 October 2005.

- Gorenberg, Gershom. “The Struggle for the Temple Mount.” Middle East Forum. 2 May 2001.
- Halsell, Grace. “Militant Coalition of Christian Fundamentalist and Jewish Orthodox Cults Plots Destruction of Al Aqsa Mosque.” Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. March 2000.
- Macintyre, Donald. “Violent Clashes at Temple Mount over Renovations.” The Independent (UK). 10 February 2007.
- Paz, Reuven. The Threat of Jewish Terrorism in Israel. Institute for Counter Terrorism. www.ict.org.il/articles/articledet.cfm?articleid=45.
- Rubinstein, Danny. “Holy Deadlock.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 8 October 2002.
- Shalem, Yisrael. Jerusalem: Life through the Ages in a Holy City. Ingeborg Rennert Center for Jerusalem Studies. Ramat-Gan, Israel: Bar-Ilan University, 1997.
- Shragai, Nadav. “Higher Than the Al-Aqsa Mosque.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 6 November 2006.
- Zaatar, Mohammed. “Anger Sweeps Palestinian Camps over Al-Aqsa Threat.” Daily Star (Beirut). 11 April 2005.

Arab Agency

In October 1923, the Cabinet Committee on Palestine, meeting in London, conceived the idea of an Arab Agency, supposedly comparable to the JEWISH AGENCY, whereby the Palestinian community could represent itself to the Mandatory authorities. The HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR PALESTINE would appoint the Arab Agency’s members, and they would advise the commissioner on social and cultural matters relating only to the Palestinian community. This meant they could not discuss matters pertaining to Jewish IMMIGRATION OF LAND purchase; moreover, the proposed Arab Agency would have far less institutional autonomy than the Jewish Agency, which was an independent body created by Article 4 of the Palestine Mandate. Palestinian leaders believed that accepting an Arab Agency would signify acceptance of the Mandate and its commitment to ZIONISM through the incorporation of the BALFOUR DECLARATION. For all these reasons, Arab leaders declined to accept the proposed Arab Agency.

Bibliography

- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Monroe, Elizabeth. Britain’s Moment in the Middle East, 1914–1956. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1963.

Arab Association for Human Rights

The Arab Association for Human Rights (HRA) was established in NAZARETH in 1988 and was registered in 1990 as a nonprofit organization in Israel. Its mandate is the protection and promotion of international human rights standards for the Palestinian Arabs in Israel. By the mid-1990s, HRA had formalized its goals with its first three-year plan, dividing its activities into three major fields: human rights education, women's rights, and international advocacy. By 2005 the three fields were the core of HRA's activities, supported by the newly established Research and Reporting Unit. (www.arabhra.org).

See also ADALAH; ASSOCIATION OF FORTY

Arab Congresses

The Palestine-Arab Congresses, a manifestation of nationalist sentiment in Palestine during the BRITISH MANDATE, were countrywide events initially organized by the JERUSALEM and JAFFA MUSLIM-CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS (MCAs) to formulate a united policy in the face of British and Zionist objectives. There were seven congresses in all.

The first congress, in 1919, attempted to formulate a position paper to be presented at the Paris Peace Conference; however, the participants were split on several major issues. They agreed only on rejecting the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine, and on accepting British assistance so long as it did not compromise Palestinian independence. The second conference, in 1920, was called to protest the British Mandate and its inclusion of the Balfour Declaration; however, British authorities refused to permit the conference from taking place. Even though the congress was not held, Palestinians still designate it as the second. The third congress, held in HAIFA in December 1920, was more united than the first and called for the establishment of a "national government responsible to a representative assembly." It elected a Jerusalem-based executive committee, known as the ARAB EXECUTIVE, to run the daily activities of the Palestine National Movement.

The fourth congress met in Jerusalem in 1921 and selected a delegation to travel to London and argue against implementation of the Balfour Declaration and Jewish IMMIGRATION. MUSA AL-HUSAYNI led the delegation, which spent eleven fruitless months in Britain. The fifth congress, which was held in 1922 in NABLUS (in the WEST BANK) after the London failure, agreed to boycott the Legislative Council and to establish a permanent London information office. The sixth congress was held in Jaffa in 1923 and passed two strongly worded resolutions boycotting the British-proposed Legislative Council (and rejecting the Anglo-Hijazi Treaty). The seventh congress, convened in 1928, five years after the sixth, met in Jerusalem and passed several resolutions condemning British policy in Palestine and calling for the establishment of a representative government.

Bibliography

- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1922. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.
- Muslih, Muhammad. "Arab Congresses." In The Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- . The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.

Arab Democratic Party

The Arab Democratic Party (ADP, Hezb al-Democracy al-Arabi/Miflaga Democratit A-ravit) is an Israeli-Arab party founded in 1988 by Abd al-Daroushe, a former LABOR PARTY Knesset member. The party was created against the backdrop of the First INTIFADA, which called for Israeli recognition of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, establishment of a Palestinian state, and equality for Israeli Arabs. In the elections for the Twelfth and Thirteenth Knessets, the ADP ran independently; for the Fourteenth Knesset (1996) it ran on a joint slate with the UNITED ARAB LIST; and in the fifteenth (1999) and sixteenth (2003) elections, it merged with the United Arab List.

Bibliography

- Ghanem, As'ad. The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel, 1948–2000: A Political Study. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.

Rouhana, Nadim. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities and Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Zureik, Elia. The Palestinians in Israel: A Study in Internal Colonialism. Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1979.

Arab Executive

The Arab Executive led the Palestine national struggle from 1920 to 1934, with its most active period being from 1920 to 1923. It was initially composed of individuals selected at the third ARAB CONGRESS in HAIFA in December 1920, which also elected the chairman—MUSA KAZIM AL-HUSAYNI—who held the position through 1934. The Arab Executive was originally made up of nine individuals and expanded, in 1928, to forty-eight persons, including both Muslims and Christians. Throughout its fourteen-year history, it continuously met with British officials, sent delegates abroad to promote the Palestinian cause, and petitioned the British to end their support for ZIONISM, end Jewish IMMIGRATION, and allow the formation of a representative national government.

The British never acknowledged the Arab Executive as the official representative of the Palestinians and never wavered in its rejection of the group's petitions. Although the executive experienced several internal crises and factionalism, it provided an overall organizational structure for the Palestinians to express their grievances. Its methods were consistently nonviolent, but Britain's persistent refusal to recognize the executive or to support any of its nationalist objectives led the Palestinians to view it as ineffective. By the early 1930s, Palestinians began to call for demonstrations, strikes, tax withholding, and more militant action generally. In this context, in 1933 the executive endorsed public demonstrations. Al-Husayni died in 1934, and the Arab Executive was superseded by the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE in 1936.

Bibliography

Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.

McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1922. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.

Muslih, Muhammad. The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.

Porath, Yehoshua. The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1997.

Arab Higher Committee

The Arab Higher Committee (AHC, al-Lajna al-Arabiyya al-Uliyya) was formed in April 1936 in the context of a general strike by Palestinians and violence throughout Palestine between Arabs and Jews. AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, president of the SUPREME MUSLIM COUNCIL, became AHC president. After its formation, the AHC assumed loose coordination of the general strike, which included various angry Palestinian groups such as local nationalist committees, labor societies, Muslim and Christian sports clubs, Boy Scouts, the JAFFA boatmen's association, women's committees, and the six leading political parties of the time (the ARAB PARTY, the ISTIQLAL PARTY, the NATIONAL BLOC PARTY, the NATIONAL DEFENSE PARTY, the REFORM PARTY, and the Youth Congress).

By October 1936, harsh British measures against Palestinian militants and the intervention of several Arab monarchs led the AHC to call off the strike, believing that the Palestinians could instead present their demands to a British royal commission. Representatives from the AHC testified before the PEEL COMMISSION but rejected its June 1937 recommendations, which included the partition of Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state and the extension of Emir Abdullah of Transjordan's control over the Palestinian areas.

Palestinian anger was reignited by the report, and by September 1937 violence had spread throughout Palestine—the so-called ARAB REVOLT. In October, Britain banned the AHC and arrested and exiled to the Seychelles four of its members, while al-Husayni and the others escaped to surrounding Arab countries. Rather than quelling the nationalist movement, the arrests and DEPORTATIONS catalyzed the local people. Violence intensified in the towns and countryside. From exile, members of the AHC attempted to reconstitute the AHC and to supply military equipment and funds for the mujahidin (fighters). By 1939, the British were outlawing all manifestations of Palestinian nationalism, prohibiting political parties, arresting thousands, deporting activists, demolishing houses, and using other measures such as CURFEWS. In 1945 the ARAB LEAGUE revived the AHC, which was soon dominated by the HUSAYNIS, but the British did not allow al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni to return to Palestine, and the AHC soon became irrelevant to Palestinian politics.

See also ARAB REVOLT, 1936–1939

Bibliography

- Jureidini, Paul, and William E. Huzen. The Palestinian Movement in Politics. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1976.
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1929. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.
- Muslih, Muhammad. The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1997.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Arab League

See LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES

Arab Liberation Army

The Arab Liberation Army (ALA), or the Army of Salvation (Jaysh al-Inqadh), was a 10,000-volunteer force of Arab soldiers and officers who came together to support the Palestinians in response to a call from the LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES after the passage of UN RESOLUTION 181 in 1947, which called for a partition of Palestine into Jewish and Arab states. It was nominally led by FAWZI AL-QAWUQJI, who in 1936 had recruited several hundred Arab volunteers to support the ARAB REVOLT and was appointed by the Arab League to gather volunteers from throughout the Arab world. However, only 4,600 of those who joined ever crossed into Palestine, and the units who did enter were concentrated in the northern and central regions of the country. There was little, if any, cohesion among the Arab fighters and no coordination between ALA troops and the local Palestinian forces known as the HOLY WAR ARMY or Army of the Holy Struggle (Jaysh al-Jihad al-Muqaddas), led by ABD AL-QADIR AL-HUSAYNI. With a few exceptions, the ALA was never particularly effective and was overshadowed by the regular Arab state armies that entered Palestine in 1948.

See also WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon, 1987.

- Pappe, Ilan. Britain and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1948–1951. London: Macmillan, 1988.
- Sayigh, Yasid. Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- . The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Arab Liberation Front

The Arab Liberation Front (ALF, or Jabhat al-Tahrir al-‘Arabiyya) was established in 1969 by Iraqi BA’ATHIST Party officials as a means for IRAQ to influence Palestinian politics and to counter the influence of SYRIA exercised through SA’IQA, a pro-Syrian faction within the PLO. ALF joined the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), but it opposed the idea of a separate Palestinian identity, promoting instead a pan-Arabist ideology. Although it was a guerrilla organization, it was less active than Sa’iqa. Because of its close association with Iraq, ALF had almost no support among grassroots Palestinians. It was led by a series of relatively unknown individuals, all of whom were tied to Iraq and followed Iraq’s line in Arab politics. Until the US war in Iraq in 2003, ALF had an office in Ramallah through which Baghdad provided money to the families of Palestinians killed or wounded in the AL-AQSA INTIFADA—by some estimates as much as $35 million.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestine Liberation Organization. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.
- Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center. How Saddam Hussein’s Régime Transferred Funds from Iraq to the West Bank and Gaza Strip to Encourage Palestinian Terrorism. Jerusalem: Center for Special Studies, August 2005.
- Quandt, William, Fuad Jabber, and Ann Mosely Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.

Arab Movement for Change

The Arab Movement for Change (AMC) was formed in Israel in 1996 by Dr. Ahmed Tibi (who had served as a personal adviser to YASIR ARAFAT), with the objective of creating a united party for all Palestinian citizens. Israeli opposition to Tibi and to the party required the AMC to make seven attempts before it received registration as a legitimate political party. Just before the 1996 elections, the AMC withdrew from the campaign and instead formed a coalition with HADASH. In the 1999 elections, the AMC joined BALAD but split afterwards back into two parties, each with one seat.

The AMC's platform focuses on democratization in Israel and equality and civil rights in Israel and all Arab communities in the Middle East. PRISONERS are also high on the AMC's agenda. In November 2005, Tibi held a press conference to denounce Israel for defying INTERNATIONAL LAW, as stated in the Fourth Geneva Convention Article 77, by keeping Palestinian prisoners from the GAZA STRIP imprisoned after the end of the OCCUPATION. "Article 77 . . . stipulates that the end of military rule in an area obligates the occupying party to transfer all prisoners to the liberated area," said Tibi. "However, the Israeli prosecutor general insists that these prisoners from Gaza remain in prison on claims that violence is still ongoing in this liberated area," he said. The AMC submitted a legal appeal to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT for the release of Gaza Strip prisoners. As of this writing, Israel has not responded to Tibi's petition.

Bibliography

Ghanem, As'ad. The Palestinian Arab Minority in Israel, 1948–2000: A Political Study. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.

Arab Nationalist Movement

See MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS

Arab Nationalists' Land Sales to Zionists

During the 1920s, a number of prominent Palestinian nationalist leaders sold significant tracts of land to the Zionists. Apparently capitalists before nationalists, these included MUSA KAZIM AL-HUSAYNI, AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, Jamal Husayni, AWNI 'ABD AL-HADI (whose sale to JOSHUA HANKIN in Wadi Hawarat involved evicting tenant farmers), Ragheb al-Nashashibi, MUSA AL-ALAMI (on whose land the Zionists established Kibbutz Tirat), the al-Shawa family of Gaza, the DAJANI FAMILY of Jerusalem, and the mayors of JAFFA and GAZA.

In addition, civic leaders, political activists, religious figures, businessmen, and other notables—both Muslim and Christian—sold land to the Zionists. By 1942 the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND had purchased from Arabs land totaling close to 1 million dunum (250,000 acres), on which some 230 settlements were constructed and 5 million trees were planted. A considerable part of this 250,000 acres was bought from rich landowners, although not all of them were Palestinian. Despite the land sales by Palestinian landowners, as well as those by ABSENTEE LANDLORDS, at the time of the Partition Resolution in November 1947, the Zionists had managed to purchase only 7 percent of the land in Palestine.

Bibliography

- Eilat, Eliahu. "Conversations with Musa Alami." Yahadut Zemananu. 2 (1985).
- Khalidi, Rashid. "Review of Kenneth Stein's The Land Question in Palestine, 1917–1939." Journal of Palestine Studies. 17:1 (1987).
- Ruedy, John. "The Dynamics of Land Alienation." In Transformation of Palestine. Edited by Ibrahim Abu Lughod. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1971.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.
- Stein, Kenneth W. The Land Question in Palestine, 1917–1939, reprint ed. Durham: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

Arab-Palestine Communist Party

The Arab-Palestine Communist Party (or the Palestine Communist Party) was formed in the early 1920s by Jewish and Palestinian communists. It was never very effective in mobilizing mass action, partly because, on one side, Zionists opposed it, and on the other, both the bourgeois landowners and the Islamic leaders objected to it. Within the party, tensions between the Jews and Palestinians grew, and in 1948 it split into the Palestine Communist Party (a primarily Arab party), later becoming the PALESTINIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY, and the mostly Jewish Israeli Communist Party, or MAKI.

See also COMMUNISTS IN ISRAEL

Bibliography

Budeiri, Musa. The Palestine Communist Party, 1919–1948: Arab and Jew in the Struggle for Internationalism. London: Ithaca, 1979.

Arab-Palestinian-Israeli Conflict

1. April 1920. Demonstrations in JERUSALEM were among protests by Palestinians that year against Zionist immigration and colonization. (See AL-NABI MUSA DEMONSTRATIONS)
2. 1929. Disturbances between Palestinians and Jews over the Western Wall involving Jerusalem, Safed, and Hebron. (See WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES)
3. 1936–1939. General strike and mass Palestinian uprising against Zionist immigration and colonization. (See ARAB REVOLT)
4. 1948. War (See WAR, 1948; REFUGEES)
5. 1948–1967. Infiltration and massive retaliation. (See QIBYA; INFILTRATION AND RETALIATION)
6. 1956. Invasion of Egypt—Sinai Suez War. (See Glossary)
7. 1967. War against Egypt, Jordan, and Syria. (See WAR, 1967)
8. Post-1967. Occupation (See ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM; LAND; OCCUPATION; SETTLEMENTS; WATER; and other specific topics)
9. 1967–1970. War of Attrition between Israel and Egypt. (See ROGERS PLAN)
10. 1967–1982. Raids and massive retaliation.
11. 1971–1973. Palestinian-Israeli “Shadow War.” (See BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION)
12. 1973. War between Israel and Egypt and Syria. (See Glossary)
13. 1978. Israel’s invasion of Lebanon. (See OPERATION LITANI)
14. 1979. Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty. (See CAMP DAVID ACCORDS)
15. 1982. Israel’s invasion of Lebanon. (See LEBANON; LEBANON WAR; OPERATION BIG PINES; SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE)
16. 1983–2000. Israeli and HIZBULLAH conflict in Lebanon (indirectly against Syria).
17. 1987–1993. Intifada. (See INTIFADA)
18. 1991. Gulf Crisis. (See GULF WAR)
19. 1992. Madrid Conference. (See MADRID CONFERENCE)
20. 1993. Oslo. (See BARAK’S GENEROUS OFFER; DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES; OSLO ACCORDS for specific agreements; OSLO PROCESS for context and discussion of seven-year process)
21. 1994. Jordan-Israel peace treaty. (See JORDAN)
22. 2000. AL-AQSA INTIFADA. (See FIELD OF THORNS PLAN; INTIFADA; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION RAINBOW)

23. Post-Oslo era. (See ISRAEL’S UNILATERAL DIS-ENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA; MECCA AGREEMENT)

Arab Party

The Arab Party (al-Majlisiyyun or Councilists) stood in opposition to the Mandate, Jewish IMMIGRATION, and LAND sales. It was established by the AL-HUSAYNI FAMILY in 1935 to counter the al-Mu’aridun (Opposition Party) or NATIONAL DEFENSE PARTY formed by the NASHASHIBI FAMILY in 1934. The titular head of the party was Jamal al-Husayni, cousin and intimate aid of al-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, the preeminent leader of the Palestinian community. After the 1936 ARAB REVOLT, Britain suppressed all Arab political activity and outlawed the Arab Party and other Palestinian parties. Nevertheless, family factionalism, manifested in five clan-based parties by that time, was one of the weaknesses in the Palestinian struggle over Palestine.

Bibliography

Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.

Arab Peace Initiative, 2002 and 2007

On 28 March 2002, the LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES drafted a declaration for peace, partially based on a proposal by SAUDI ARABIA’S Crown Prince Abdullah. In the declaration, made at a summit held in Beirut, LEBANON, the Arab states agreed to make peace with and recognize Israel if Israel withdrew from the Occupied Territories and accepted an independent Palestinian state with East JERUSALEM as its capital and a “just solution to the Palestinian REFUGEE problem.” Israel and the UNITED STATES dismissed the initiative out of hand. Following is an excerpt: “Emanating from the conviction of the Arab countries that a military solution to the conflict will not achieve peace or provide security for the parties, the council:

“(1) Requests Israel to reconsider its policies and declare that a just peace is its strategic option as well.

“Further calls upon Israel to affirm:

“(2) Full Israeli withdrawal from all the territories occupied since 1967, including the Syrian Golan Heights, to the June 4, 1967 lines as well as the remaining occupied Lebanese territories in the south of Lebanon. (3) Achievement of a just solution to the Palestinian refugee problem to be agreed upon in accordance with U.N. General Assembly Resolution 194. (4) The acceptance of the establishment of a sovereign independent Palestinian state on the Palestinian territories occupied since June 4, 1967 in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with East Jerusalem as its capital.

“Consequently, the Arab countries affirm the following: (1) Consider the Arab-Israeli conflict ended, and enter into a peace agreement with Israel, and provide security for all the states of the region. (2) Establish normal relations with Israel in the context of this comprehensive peace. (3) Assures the rejection of all forms of Palestinian patriation which conflict with the special circumstances of the Arab host countries. (4) Calls upon the government of Israel and all Israelis to accept this initiative in order to safeguard the prospects for peace and stop the further shedding of blood, enabling the Arab countries and Israel to live in peace and good neighborliness and provide future generations with security, stability, and prosperity. (5) Invites the international community and all countries and organizations to support this initiative. (6) Requests the chairman of the summit to form a special committee composed of some of its concerned member states and the secretary general of the League of Arab States to pursue the necessary contacts to gain support for this initiative at all levels, particularly from the United Nations, the Security Council, the United States of America, the Russian Federation, the Muslim states and the European Union.”

On 28 March 2007 the Arab League Summit met in Riyadh and reiterated its 2002 peace initiative. This came subsequent to the MECCA AGREEMENT and the formation by Palestinian factions of a National Unity Government. Israel, as it had in 2002, rejected the Arab peace proposals.

See also LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES

Bibliography

- League of Arab States. “Text of the Arab Peace Initiative of March 27, 2002.” http://blog.onevoicemovement.org/one\_voice/2006/05/text\_of\_the\_ara.html (One Voice Movement, accessed 26 May 2006).
 “Riyadh Declaration, 29 March 2007.” Historical Documents. Electronic Intifada 2007. <http://electronicintifada.net/bytopic/historicaldocuments/669.shtml>.

“Text of the Arab Peace Initiative of March 27, 2002.” One Voice Movement. 26 May 2006. http://blog.onevoicemovement.org/one\_voice/2006/05/text\_of\_the\_ara.html.

Arab Revolt, 1936–1939

In April 1936, Palestinian Arabs launched a general strike against the British Occupation and Zionist settlement of Palestine. The strike lasted six months and eventually evolved into an armed insurgency, known as the Great Arab Revolt of 1936–1939. Prior to 1948, it was the most important movement of anticolonial and ANTI-ZIONIST resistance mounted by the Palestinians.

The revolt was ignited by SHAYKH ‘IZZ AL-DIN AL-QASSAM, a radical Islamic preacher of Syrian origin who was based in HAIFA. Qassam, who for several years had been secretly organizing cells of fighters in Haifa and in the surrounding villages, attempted to launch an armed rebellion in November 1935, only to be discovered by British forces and killed, along with three of his men. Qassam’s martyrdom electrified the Palestinian populace and intensified the prevailing atmosphere of crisis. A few months later, on 13 April 1935, two Jews were murdered by Arab insurgents—possibly Qassamites. This event inaugurated a series of reprisals and counterreprisals between the Palestinian and Jewish communities, and the British government eventually declared a state of emergency. In response, Palestinian activists formed “national committees” that declared a general strike in Arab cities and towns. The Palestinian national leadership, mostly composed of ruling families known as “notables,” attempted to maintain control of this largely spontaneous popular movement that had emerged from below. On 25 April, Palestinian political parties met and formed the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE (AHC) to coordinate the strike.

Headed by the grand mufti, al-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, the AHC included both notables and middle-class nationalists. The AHC proceeded to articulate the strike’s demands: that Great Britain put an end to Jewish IMMIGRATION to Palestine, halt LAND sales to Jews, and grant Palestine its independence.

The general strike itself was mainly an urban affair, both a commercial and a labor strike. But opposition in the Palestinian countryside grew as well, as bands of peasant guerrillas, for the most part operating independently of the AHC, began to launch attacks against British forces, chiefly in the central highlands and the hills of Galilee. The guerrillas' effectiveness increased when FAWZI AL-QAWUQJI, a pan-Arab nationalist of Syrian origin, entered Palestine and declared himself commander-in-chief of the armed revolt. A combination of tough British countermeasures against the revolt and the pressures exerted on the AHC by the Arab kings (of IRAQ, Transjordan, and SAUDI ARABIA) caused the leadership to call off the strike and the insurgency on 10 October 1936. It was understood, however, that the kings would then intercede with the British government and develop new proposals for the Palestine situation.

Britain sent to Palestine a Royal Commission of Inquiry, known as the PEEL COMMISSION, and, in July 1937, it issued a report that recommended the partition of Palestine into Arab and Jewish states. The report outraged Arab opinion, particularly because the plan called for the overwhelmingly Arab Galilee to be included in the proposed Jewish state. In September, Arab militants responded by assassinating the Galilee district commissioner, Lewis Andrews. The British in turn banned the AHC and arrested or DEPORTED hundreds of Palestinian leaders and activists. Others, like the mufti who decamped for Lebanon, escaped into exile. In the fall of 1937, the peasant guerrillas relaunched the armed revolt. After the urban-based national leadership, both notables and middle-class activists, was eliminated from the scene by the British, the helm of the insurgency was seized by the rebel bands that operated for the most part in the countryside.

The armed insurrection reached its high point in the summer and fall of 1938. Guerrillas gained effective control of the highlands and most of the Palestinian urban centers, including, for a time, Haifa, JAFFA, and the Old City of JERUSALEM. At this point, peasant insurgents imposed a kind of lower-class revenge on Palestine's urban elites. Rebel commanders declared a moratorium on debts, banned electricity use, canceled rents on departments, and enforced traditional and "national" dress codes, which compelled urban notables to take off the tarbush and put on the kufiya.

The rebels also imposed large "contributions" on wealthy Palestinians and, in a number of instances, brutalized those considered insufficiently nationalistic and imprisoned or assassinated many suspected of being traitors. In response, wealthy Palestinians fled the country in droves.

The military successes of the rebels were short-lived, however, as the British launched a counteroffensive, increasing their ground forces to 20,000 and deploying RAF aircraft, superior firepower, and classic anti-insurgency tactics, such as the incarceration of hundreds of suspects in concentration camps, HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, and retaliatory massacres. The British made use of the services of armed Zionist auxiliaries as well as groups of Palestinian counterrevolutionaries known as "peace bands," both of which received British military and financial support and training.

In addition to the military efforts to crush the rebellion, the British launched a parallel diplomatic offensive. In February 1939, the government brought Palestinian Arab and Zionist delegates to London for separate but inconclusive talks. In May 1939 the government issued the MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, which represented a partial concession to the Arab rebellion. It declared Britain's opposition to Palestine becoming a Jewish state, proposed strict regulations on land sales to Jews, proposed a limit on Jewish immigration of 75,000 over the next five years, and stated that an independent Palestinian state would be established over the next ten years. Although the AHC and the rebel leadership publicly rejected the white paper, the disposition of the Palestinian populace was somewhat more favorable.

Britain's diplomatic maneuvers and fierce military efforts, combined with serious mistakes made by the rebels (abuses and brutalities inflicted on Palestinian civilians, especially the wealthy, as well as a failure to create a centralized and disciplined leadership), led to the ultimate collapse of the revolt in September 1939, when war broke out between Britain and GERMANY.

The 1936–1939 revolt ultimately inflicted great losses on the Palestinian community, with an estimated 5,000 Palestinians (civilians and fighters) killed. The national leadership, most of its members imprisoned, deported, or in voluntary exile, was rendered weak and ineffective, while the most effective guerrilla commanders either were killed in battle or took refuge outside the country. The rank-and-file fighters suffered heavy casualties, and those who survived were effectively disarmed and disorganized. Thus, although the Great Revolt did seriously challenge British control over Palestine, its ultimate defeat left the Palestinian Arabs severely weakened and unable to mount an effective challenge in 1947 when war broke out with the Jewish community. The failure of the 1936–1939 rebellion and its drastic and debilitating effects on the Palestinian Arab community are often given as one of the chief reasons for the Palestinian defeat called the Nakba, or catastrophe, of 1948.

Despite the fact that the 1936–1939 revolt was ultimately unsuccessful and despite the mistakes and failures of the armed guerrillas, it nonetheless continues to serve as a key historical symbol for Palestinian resistance. The revolt was frequently cited as an inspirational model by the armed Palestinian resistance movement launched in the mid-1960s. It was also frequently invoked by activists of the First INTIFADA (1987–1990). The most enduring figure associated with the revolt, however, was al-Qassam. Although Qassam fell in battle a few months prior to the 1936 strike, his name is indelibly associated with the rebellion, both because he played a key role in triggering and inspiring it and because his men were leading commanders of the armed guerrilla forces. Qassam's name and the memory of the revolt live on today especially (for better or worse) in the form of the AL-QASSAM BRIGADES (the name of the armed forces of HAMAS) and the QASSAM ROCKETS, intermittently fired by Islamist militants from the GAZA STRIP at communities inside Israel since 2001.

Bibliography

- Israeli Army. The Great Arab Revolt in Palestine 1936–1939: An Official Israeli Account. Vol. 2, Part 6, Sefer Toldot ha-Haganah (The History of the Hagana). Translated from the Hebrew into Arabic by Ahmad Khalifeh. Revised by Samir Jabbour. Beirut: Institute for Palestinian Studies, 1989 [1964].
- Jureidini, Paul, and William E. Huzen. The Palestinian Movement in Politics. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1976.
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Muslih, Muhammad. The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1977.
- Swedenburg, Ted. Memories of Revolt: The 1936–39 Rebellion and the Palestinian National Past. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1995. Reprinted with a new afterword, Fayetteville: University of Arkansas, 2003.

—Ted Swedenburg

Arab State Peace Overtures, 1949–Present

The commonly accepted view for decades in the UNITED STATES and Europe was that Israel consistently reached out to Arab states with peace overtures only to face rejection each time. But recent research, primarily in Israeli government archives, refutes that interpretation and demonstrates that Arab states have frequently been willing to engage in peace talks and that, more often than not, Israel has been the stumbling block.

The First Period

The earliest direct negotiations held between Israel and any Arab government took place at Rhodes in 1949, at the conclusion of the first Arab-Israeli war. Under the auspices of the UNITED NATIONS, Israel negotiated directly with four separate Arab states: EGYPT, LEBANON, JORDAN, and SYRIA. Thus, a precedent was set early on for the two sides talking face-to-face. In each case, these negotiations resulted in an armistice, not a peace treaty, with the widely held belief that formal treaties would soon follow.

That hope proved to be unfounded. The two most contentious issues were BORDERS and REFUGEES. In the 1948 WAR, Israel significantly expanded its borders beyond the 1947 UN partition lines and was unwilling to surrender any territory. Moreover, it also refused to accept the return of any of the roughly 750,000 Palestinian refugees who had fled during the fighting. When Syrian leader Husni al-Za'im tried in 1949 to turn the armistice into a formal treaty and proposed a personal meeting between himself and Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION, he was flatly rejected. Ben-Gurion was in no hurry to make peace, believing that time—for acquisition of additional territory—was on Israel's side.

While the armistice negotiations were concluding, the United Nations brought the sides together under the auspices of the newly created PALESTINE CONCILIATION COMMISSION (PCC) at Lausanne, Switzerland. This time, the Arab states formed one delegation, which insisted on a return to the 1947 borders and Israeli responsibility for the refugee problem. They were considerably less flexible than the individual states had been at Rhodes, and Israel rejected both demands, although it did offer to take back 100,000 Palestinians. The talks broke down in September 1949.

That same year, Israel renewed bilateral discussions with King Abdullah of Jordan, who had held earlier meetings before the war with Zionist representatives in a joint plan to thwart the creation of a Palestinian state. Negotiations dragged on for two years, but the king was under enormous pressure not to make a separate peace absent major concessions, which Ben-Gurion was unwilling to grant. In July 1951, Abdullah was assassinated at the AL-AQSA MOSQUE, which brought the talks to an end, although they were later resumed by his grandson, King Husayn. They continued sporadically until Israel and Jordan signed a peace treaty in 1994.

The Arab States and Israel, 1953–1985

In 1953, Syria once again showed a willingness to negotiate with Israel. The two sides met from January to May to discuss WATER rights and control of demilitarized zones, but Israel was unwilling to compromise on key points, and the talks eventually terminated.

By 1954 JAMAL ‘ABD AL-NASIR had emerged as the leader of Egypt and began contacts with MOSHE SHARETT, who had temporarily replaced Ben-Gurion as prime minister. The LAVON AFFAIR, in which Israeli agents set off bombs at British and US targets in Cairo, hoping to blame Egypt, severely undermined the contacts. Egyptian sources quickly caught the agents, and the plot was exposed. Despite that provocation, Nasir was still willing to talk, but when Egypt found the agents guilty and gave two of them a death sentence, Sharett called off all contacts. Then, when Israel conducted a raid on Gaza in early 1955, killing thirty-seven Egyptians, Nasir began to shift from a policy of seeking cooperation to one of confrontation. This began the chain of events that led up to the Suez Crisis a year later.

The 1956 Suez Crisis poisoned relations between Israel and Egypt for many years, and the situation was made worse by the 1967 WAR in which Israel captured the Sinai, the Golan Heights, the WEST BANK, GAZA, and East JERUSALEM. It was not until Nasir’s death in 1970, which brought Anwar Sadat to Egypt’s presidency, that a new initiative came about. In 1971, Sadat suggested that Israel withdraw some 25 miles (40 kilometers) from the Suez Canal to allow Egypt to reopen it. With the United States as mediator, discussions went back and forth for a year, but GOLDA MEIR, who had become Israeli prime minister in 1969, feared that any partial pullback would lead to demands for a return to the 1967 borders. Her refusal to commit to the proposal caused Sadat to abandon it, and instead he began to prepare to win back the Sinai by other means; these efforts led to the 1973 War.

Following that war, in which Egypt restored its national pride by performing well on the battlefield, the United States brokered two interim agreements that brought a partial Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai. But Sadat grew impatient with the lack of progress, and in 1977 he embarked on what became the most famous Arab peace initiative. In November he announced that he was willing to go to Israel in the interests of peace, a declaration that stunned the world. The newly installed LIKUD government under MENAHEM BEGIN promptly issued him an invitation, and less than two weeks later Sadat flew to Israel and addressed the Knesset with the goal of negotiating peace between the two countries. For the first time the whole world saw an Arab leader openly dealing with Israel.

But these talks too quickly bogged down. Egypt wanted a complete withdrawal from Sinai and a settlement of the Palestinian problem, while Israel desired full peace and diplomatic relations but no change in the Palestinian situation. With talks at an impasse, President JIMMY CARTER invited both sides to a summit at Camp David in September 1978. After two weeks of intense negotiations, the two sides signed the famous CAMP DAVID ACCORDS. With great fanfare, Carter announced that for the first time an Arab country and Israel were making peace. Left unstated was the fact that the initiative had come from the Arab side, as it had numerous times before. But the formal treaty took another six months before it was implemented, and in the end Sadat essentially sold out the Palestinian cause for Egypt’s benefit. Israel returned the Sinai, albeit in several stages, and full diplomatic relations between the two countries were established.

The treaty was extremely unpopular in Egypt and in the wider Arab world. The ARAB LEAGUE expelled Egypt for having made a separate peace with Israel, excluding Syria, and ignoring the Palestinian question. The Egyptian president’s domestic support steadily eroded, and in 1981, Sadat was assassinated while reviewing a military parade.

Nevertheless, a precedent of Arab state recognition of Israel had been set. The next Arab initiative came from an unexpected source—SAUDI ARABIA. In August 1981, Crown Prince (later King) Fahd announced a proposal known as the FAHD PLAN. Its eight points included calling for Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 borders, dismantling of all Jewish SETTLEMENTS, establishment of a Palestinian state, and recognition of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). Although these were all common Arab demands, what was new was a “guarantee of peace among all states in the region,” which by clear implication included Israel. Most observers saw the plan as a breakthrough, but the United States was dismissive of it, and the Israeli government completely rejected it, calling it a propaganda ploy. The Likud, ideologically committed to retaining the West Bank and Gaza as part of the Greater Land of Israel, had no intention of considering any peace proposal that required it to give up those territories.

Nevertheless, a revised Arab plan reemerged a year later in the midst of Israel’s LEBANON WAR. After US president RONALD REAGAN put forth the REAGAN PLAN calling for the handover of the West Bank to Jordan, the Arab League held a summit in Fez, Morocco. Arab leaders reiterated most of the points from the Fahd Plan, which meant they continued to support recognition of the PLO, ignored the “Jordanian option” for the territories, and implicitly accepted Israel’s right to live in peace. The FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE was adopted unanimously, meaning that countries such as Saudi Arabia and Syria for the first time recognized Israel’s right to exist. Although the Reagan administration welcomed the plan as a step forward, it was not prepared to recognize the PLO or agree to a Palestinian state. Israel once again rejected it out of hand. Thus another Arab peace initiative fell by the wayside.

By the mid-1980s, the political situation in Israel had changed somewhat. The 1984 elections brought a national unity coalition between the LIKUD and LABOR Parties, with the unusual stipulation that Labor leader SHIMON PERES and new Likud head YITZHAK SHAMIR would rotate as prime minister. Peres assumed the premiership for the first two years and was eager to revive the Jordanian option. He found a willing partner in King Husayn, who had maintained contact with previous Labor leaders since his accession to the throne in 1953. The two began meeting in 1985, but Husayn had to work around the problem that the Arab League (at Rabat in 1974) had designated the PLO as the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinians. He did this by getting YASIR ARAFAT to agree to allow Israeli-Jordanian negotiations.

After two years of secret talks, Peres and Husayn signed the LONDON AGREEMENT, which set up an international conference as a “fig leaf” for Husayn, with most work conducted in bilateral meetings between Israel and a Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. Neither side set preconditions. Unfortunately, by this time Peres had rotated to foreign minister and was replaced by Shamir, who was even more uncompromising than his predecessor Begin and viewed any international conference as an excuse to put pressure on Israel. Consequently, he vetoed the London Agreement, and negotiations between Israel and Jordan were suspended until Labor returned to power in the early 1990s.

Madrid and the Oslo Process

The next set of Arab-Israeli negotiations took place at the MADRID CONFERENCE, which began in 1991. By this time, a number of circumstances had changed. First, the INTIFADA, begun in 1987, had made a solution of the Palestinian problem much more urgent. Second, the end of the GULF WAR gave the United States the political capital to push for an overall solution in the Middle East. Invitations went out from Washington and were accepted by Syria, Lebanon, and Jordan (whose delegation was to include non-PLO Palestinians). Only Israel was reluctant, once again fearing pressure to compromise. However, economic threats from the GEORGE H. W. BUSH administration persuaded him to participate.

The Madrid Conference led to a series of bilateral negotiations, most of which were held in Washington. In all of these talks, Israel refused to accept the principle of exchanging land for peace, arguing that it had fulfilled the terms of UN RESOLUTION 242 when it returned the Sinai. As a result, talks with Syria, Lebanon, and Jordan ended in deadlock. The only positive aspect was the fact that, for the first time, Israeli officials held talks with Palestinian representatives who, although not officially belonging to the PLO, closely coordinated their actions with Arafat. But these talks brought no results either.

The 1992 elections in Israel removed Shamir from office and brought in a Labor-led coalition with YITZHAK RABIN as prime minister and Peres as foreign minister. Their government took a more conciliatory approach to negotiations, and, within a year and a half, it had signed the OSLO ACCORDS with the PLO. This agreement opened the door for King Husayn, who had long wanted peace with Israel but could not give the appearance of betraying the Palestinians. Now he was able to negotiate openly, and when the Israelis offered to give Jordan a special role as protector of the al-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, the Islamic holy site known as TEMPLE MOUNT to the Jews, a major hurdle was overcome. The treaty, Israel's second with an Arab state, was signed just thirteen months after Oslo. For Husayn, it was the culmination of forty years of seeking peace with Israel.

Rabin now attempted to deal with Syria's president, Hafez al-Assad, who had been in power since 1970. Assad's main goal was the recovery of the Golan Heights, lost in the 1967 War. In the Madrid talks, Shamir's refusal to consider that possibility had resulted in deadlock. Now Rabin requested US help in restarting the dialogue, and the Syrian leader signaled his consent.

Both sides accepted the "land for peace" formula, but there were numerous areas of disagreement: the final border (the 1923 or 1967 line), the depth of the peace, the timetable for withdrawal, and Israel's desire for early warning stations on the Golan. Neither side demonstrated much flexibility, and talks stalled in the months before Rabin's assassination (November 1995). Negotiations resumed with his successor, Peres, under US supervision, but in early 1996 they failed once again. A few months later, Peres was defeated at the polls by the Likud's BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, who, like Shamir, refused to consider trading land for peace. With no prospect of getting the Golan back, Assad canceled negotiations.

But talks resumed in 1999 after Labor's EHUD BARAK ousted Netanyahu in elections that summer. US president BILL CLINTON became personally involved, often sitting in at sessions held at Shepherdstown, West Virginia, but negotiations once again broke down in early 2000 over Israel's insistence on retaining Shebaa Farms (a small area of land located on the border between Lebanon and the Israeli-controlled part of the Golan Heights). Clinton made a personal appeal to Assad when they met in Geneva, but he was rebuffed, and there was no movement on that front again until 2007.

Post-Oslo Peace Initiatives

After the breakdown of the OSLO PROCESS at CAMP DAVID II talks and the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000, the overall situation deteriorated rapidly. In early 2001, Barak was replaced as prime minister by hard-liner ARIEL SHARON, and violence between Israelis and Palestinians escalated alarmingly. In this situation, Saudi crown prince (now King) Abdullah in early 2002 made a bold offer. In an interview with New York Times columnist Tom Friedman, he proposed that all Arab states agree to full normalization of relations with Israel if Israel would withdraw to the 1967 borders. The UNITED STATES, the UNITED NATIONS, and the EUROPEAN UNION all supported Abdullah's proposal. More importantly, in March the Arab League gave its backing, once again leaving the ball in Israel's hands. However, at that time Sharon was in the midst of a violent war to reoccupy all major Palestinian cities and gave the proposal no consideration. Also, Sharon opposed any return to the 1967 borders, and the Arab League's proposal was quietly buried.

After Sharon was incapacitated by a stroke, his deputy, Ehud Olmert, replaced him in 2006. In spring 2008, Olmert announced that new indirect negotiations with Syria had been going on for about a year, with Turkey as the mediator. But later that same year, the negotiations were suspended due to Olmert's announcement of his resignation, which was caused by his persistent legal problems.

Bibliography

- Abu Odeh, Adnan. Jordanians, Palestinians and the Hashemite Kingdom in the Middle East Peace Process. Washington, DC: US Institute of Peace, 1999.
- Caplan, Neil. Futile Diplomacy. Vol. 3, The United Nations, the Great Powers and Middle East Peacemaking 1948–1954. London: Frank Cass, 1997.
- Morris, Benny. Israel's Border Wars 1949–56. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1993.
- Pappe, Ilan. Britain and the Arab-Israeli Conflict 1948–1951. Basingstoke, UK: St. Antony's Press, 1988.
- Rabil, Robert. Embattled Neighbors: Syria, Israel, and Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Rabinovich, Itamar. The Road Not Taken: Early Arab-Israeli Negotiations. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Said, Edward. The End of the Peace Process: Oslo and After. New York: Pantheon Books, 2000.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: Penguin Press, 2000.
- Stein, Kenneth. Heroic Diplomacy: Sadat, Kissinger, Carter, Begin and the Quest for Arab-Israeli Peace. New York: Routledge Press, 1999.

—John J. McTague

Arab States: Inter-Arab Politics

In the post-World War II period, interrelations among the Arab states have been largely driven by disunity, rivalry, competition, and conflict. The main objective for each state has been regime survival, which has meant pursuing policies to shore up domestic legitimacy, to extend regional influence, and sometimes to expand territory. The clash of interests among the Arab regimes adversely affected the Palestinians in their conflict with ZIONISM and Israel, and was a contributing factor in the 1948 loss of Palestine.

In the 1948 WAR, King Farouk of EGYPT was reluctant to enter the conflict against the Zionists. Together with most other Arab states, Farouk was more worried about King Abdullah of Transjordan's (JORDAN after 1950) expansionist ambitions vis-à-vis Palestine, and to lesser extent Syria, than about the Zionist movement. SYRIA too was concerned about Abdullah's schemes, and its president, Shukri al-Quwatli, proposed through the ARAB LEAGUE the formation of the ARAB LIBERATION ARMY (ALA) to fight in Palestine, leaving the Syrian army to guard the homeland against possible Transjordan encroachment. The ALA, however, fought poorly and did little to assist the Palestinians.

When the Arab armies (Egypt, Transjordan, Syria, LEBANON, and IRAQ) did enter Palestine on 15 May 1948, they sent only a total of 25,000 troops, 10,000 fewer than Israel fielded, and this disparity only grew wider as the war went on. By December the number of Israeli troops stood at 96,441, in a 2-to-1 ratio with the combined Arab forces. This troop imbalance (combined with an asymmetry in the quality and quantity of weapons) was one of the decisive factors in the Arab defeat. There was also a complete lack of coordination among the Arab armies; Israeli leaders were well aware of this situation and exploited it to the fullest. Significant also is the fact that no Arab army, including the ALA, attempted to engage Israel on territory that the UN Partition Resolution had assigned to the Jewish state. Finally, the Arabs were constrained by the special relationship King Abdullah had with the Zionists. At the war's end, the Arab states were totally defeated, demoralized, and disorganized. Palestine was lost, more than 750,000 of its people had become REFUGEES, and these dispossessed were massed within the borders of neighboring countries.

In the aftermath of the ARMISTICE AGREEMENTS, truces that brought the 1948 WAR to an end, it is likely that most, if not all, Arab regimes would have concluded peace treaties with Israel if the refugee question could have been resolved. For example, Syria offered to take 100,000 refugees, but Israel's refusal to permit the return of any of the refugees precluded any settlement. On the other hand, although there appeared to be a condition of stasis throughout the Arab world, a number of emerging movements were about to pose unprecedented challenges to the old order.

The first shock came in 1952 when the Egyptian "Free Officers" staged a coup that deposed King Farouk and brought to power the pan-Arab nationalist JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR. "Nasirism" soon became a regionwide movement with branches in most states, creating significant instability (and concomitant repression) within a number of Arab countries. After 'Abd al-Nasir consolidated his power, Egypt became a strong, if constrained, supporter of the Palestinians.

Prior to the Egyptian coup, the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN), with its origins in student politics at the American University of Beirut (AUB), had emerged in the late 1940s. Palestinian Christian GEORGE HABASH and Syrian Muslim Hani al-Hindi were among its most important leaders. In the mid-1950s, the Arab Nationalist Movement (ANM) joined a larger student group led by AUB professor Constantine Zureik, whose thinking helped clarify the group's ideology. Revolutionary and pan-Arabist, it emphasized the formation of a nationally aware intellectual elite that would play a vanguard role in a revolution of Arab consciousness, leading to Arab unity and social progress. Ideologically, it was committed to Arab socialism and secularism. Its Arab nationalism meant an uncompromising hostility to Western imperialism in general and toward Israel in particular. Initially, the ANM viewed Palestinian nationalism as parochial.

The group formed branches in various Arab states, and in 1958 it formally adopted the name Movement of Arab Nationalists. Subsequently, political divergence arose within the movement as many, especially in Syria and Iraq, became close to local Nasirite movements, while a more radical element moved toward Marxism. Nevertheless, the MAN challenged the Arab regimes in a variety of ways, and although the movement never took power in any state, it did give rise to one of the most important Palestinian organizations, the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), and its various progeny. Whatever else, the MAN was an additional ingredient in the chaotic cauldron of Arab politics.

This same period saw the crystallization of another pan-Arab nationalist movement—BA'ATHISM (Renaissance). In 1945, Syrian Christian Michel Aflaq and Muslim Salah al Din Bitar founded the Ba'ath Party. A secular, socialist, and pan-Arab party, it threatened Arab regimes that had leanings toward Islam and/or monarchy. The motto of the party was unity, freedom, socialism (wahda, hurriya, ishtirakiya). Unity refers to Arab unity; freedom is from foreign control and interference; and socialism refers to what has been termed “Arab socialism” rather than Marxism.

The Ba'ath functioned as a pan-Arab party with branches in various Arab countries but became strongest in Syria and Iraq, coming to power in both in 1963. (The Ba'ath Party came to power in Syria on 8 March 1963 and has held a monopoly on political power since later that year. The Ba'athists ruled Iraq briefly in 1963, and then from July 1968 until 2003.) However, in 1966 the Syrian and Iraqi parties split into two intensely rival organizations. Both Ba'ath parties retained the same name and maintained parallel structures in the Arab world, but Iraq and Syria remained enemies until the end. Each state competed for influence in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), created factions within the organization that functioned to support their state interests, and generally acted as a force militating against Palestinian unity and objectives.

With all these nationalist movements organizing and proselytizing, it is not surprising that, in the aftermath of the 1956 Suez War, there was a huge upsurge in Arab nationalism throughout the Arab world, as well as intense conflict among the regimes and the various pan-Arab movements. Inter-Arab conflict was fueled by yet another momentous event: the 1958 union between Syria and Egypt (the United Arab Republic), which had the potential to radically alter the balance of power in the region. However, because it dissolved in 1961, that threat never came to fruition. But Egypt's 'Abd al-Nasir was so intent on extending his influence that he committed a huge part of his military to fight alongside the Republicans in Yemen's bloody civil war. It was a decision that incurred the wrath of SAUDI ARABIA and the Gulf states, including KUWAIT (and the UNITED STATES), and left Egypt in a greatly weakened position in 1967, unable to defend itself from Israel's preemptive strike.

Ba'athist Syria resented Egypt's growing influence and set out to counter it. In 1963, Syria assumed a leadership role in mobilizing Arab opposition to Israel's planned diversion of water from Lake Tiberias. But the Egyptian-Syrian competition had negative consequences throughout the Arab world and negated any possibility for concrete action on either the water or the Palestinian issue—despite all the Arab nationalist rhetoric to the contrary.

The 1967 WAR was a watershed in Arab politics. No Arab state wanted to go to war with Israel, but the leaders became prisoners of their own oratory. Years of bravado and hostile speechifying finally brought them face-to-face with reality; in a mere six days Israel utterly defeated three major Arab states: Syria, Egypt, and Jordan. Of the war's multiple consequences, perhaps the most significant outcome was the emergence of the Palestinian resistance movement. Its impact on inter-Arab politics was profound, and no state was exempt from its effects. Yet, in one way or another, the Palestine question had impinged on the politics of every state since 1948.

Inter-Arab Rivalry and the Palestinians

After the 1948 War, Transjordan's control of the West Bank greatly concerned Egypt, which feared that King Abdullah would eclipse Egyptian influence in the Arab east. Damascus, too, worried that Transjordan was conspiring to add Syria (and Lebanon) to its dominion. In fact, the 1949 coup in Syria was in part a result of Hashemite meddling. Consequently, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria, and Lebanon joined together to block further Jordanian expansionism (in alliance with Iraq, another Hashemite monarchy). Egypt permitted, for a few weeks, the establishment of an ALL PALESTINE GOVERNMENT in GAZA headed by AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, the former mufti (religious leader) of Jerusalem. However, Egyptian officials deposed him and held him under virtual house arrest in Cairo. King Abdullah countered by uniting the WEST BANK and Transjordan in 1948, formally annexing the West Bank in 1950, and establishing the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. After signing the ARMISTICE AGREEMENTS, the Arab states did not recognize Israel and further insisted on the Palestinian refugees' return to their homes. Abdullah was the only Arab ruler to negotiate, albeit secretly, with Israel to consolidate his territorial gains through a peace treaty. Although Husni al-Za'im, the Syrian leader, indicated his willingness to do so, DAVID BEN-GURION refused to negotiate toward a peace treaty. The Jordanian-Israeli negotiations failed, however, after the Arabs found out about them, and in 1951 a Palestinian assassinated Abdullah. Jordan's annexation of the West Bank and Egypt's control of Gaza foiled the Palestinians' desire to establish their own sovereignty on what was left of Palestine.

Inter-Arab rivalry preoccupied 'Abd al-Nasir after 1952. Although he did not seek a confrontation with Israel, he was compelled to defend Egypt against the 1956 Israeli, British, and French invasion (the Suez War). Because of his commitments in Yemen after the 1961 Republican coup, 'Abd al-Nasir tried to avoid conflict with Israel over its plan to divert water from Lake Tiberias. At the same time, Egyptian relations with Saudi Arabia and Jordan, both supporters of the ousted Yemeni imam, were extremely tense. But the conflict over water, especially between Syria and Israel, and Syrian agitation to confront the planned diversion, compelled 'Abd al-Nasir to call for an Arab summit meeting in Cairo in January 1964. He hoped that this action would not provoke Israel and would placate Syria. In response to Israel's massive diversion project, which took water from Jordanian and Syrian sources to irrigate the Negev (the National Water Carrier), the summit decided to divert the tributaries of the River Jordan that were on Arab lands north of Lake Tiberias. Israel, however, bombed the Arab installations. At 'Abd al-Nasir's urging, the summit also established the PLO, which the Egyptian leader intended to control and to use as an instrument of Egyptian diplomacy in inter-Arab politics. Jordan initially forbade the PLO from operating in its territory lest it challenge Jordan's authority over the West Bank and its self-appointed role as spokesman for the Palestinians. Syria, too, opposed the PLO, regarding it as inadequate to the task of liberating Palestine.

The failure of the Arab states to implement any policies or take any actions on behalf of the Palestinians led a group of young, professional Palestinians, most working in the Gulf States, to take matters into their own hands. In 1958 they formed the Palestine National Liberation Movement (FATAH), and in 1965 they carried out their first guerrilla operation against Israel. Ba'athist Syria supported Fatah and believed that if Syria and Fatah cooperated, they could polarize the situation between the Arab states and Israel. Nevertheless, 'Abd al-Nasir was able to maintain the course of action approved by the 1964 Arab summit, wherein Egypt controlled the PLO, until a 1966 coup in Syria brought to power an even more radical wing of Ba'athists. The Nur ed-Din al-Atasi government continued to allow Fatah to use Syria as a base and, unlike the previous regime, at times permitted it to attack Israel across the Syrian border.

Inter-Arab divisions resulted in yet another calamity for the Palestinians (and the Arabs). In the June 1967 WAR with Israel, Jordan lost the West Bank, Egypt the Sinai and Gaza, and Syria the Golan Heights, while more Palestinians became refugees. The 1967 War, however, changed the Arab states' position. With so much Arab land now in Israel's hands, Arab leaders felt compelled to reevaluate their relationship with the PLO and the various resistance groups, including Fatah.

The bankruptcy of the Arab regimes and the rise of the resistance movement as an alternative, especially after 1969, when the resistance came to dominate the PLO (evidenced in the assumption of the chairmanship by YASIR ARAFAT), spawned a host of new alliances in the Arab world. 'Abd al-Nasir, though no longer in control of the new PLO, as he was with the original, concluded that he could use the Palestinian militants in his plans to recover lost Egyptian territories. Additionally, 'Abd al-Nasir wanted a second front against Israel to take some pressure off Egypt in its WAR OF ATTRITION against Israel. When clashes between the Lebanese army and the Palestinian guerrillas intensified after Israel's 1968 raid on Beirut's International Airport, in which it destroyed thirteen civilian aircraft on the ground, 'Abd al-Nasir was instrumental in crafting the 3 November 1969 CAIRO AGREEMENT, which allowed the PLO to operate from Lebanon, provided it did not interfere in Lebanese affairs.

By then, the PLO presence in Jordan was significant, and despite reservations, King Husayn supported it, for to do otherwise would have put the conservative monarchy outside the then-Arab consensus. Although 'Abd al-Nasir supported the resistance activities in Jordan, he was also looking for a way to negotiate with Israel to recover lost Egyptian territories. King Husayn believed that he could recover the West Bank through negotiations with Israel, but the PLO was interested in the liberation of Palestine, not in having the West Bank returned to Jordan. In other words, the Arab states were planning to use the Palestinian movement, though still in its infancy, to serve their own interests.

On 9 December 1969, US secretary of state WILLIAM ROGERS announced his peace plan, based on UN RESOLUTION 242, which called on Israel to withdraw (with minor modifications) from the territories occupied in the 1967 War. Egypt and Jordan accepted the plan, but Israel rejected it. So did the PLO because the plan said nothing about Palestinian national interests (i.e., an independent state) or the repatriation of the refugees. By then the PLO had begun to undermine the legitimacy of King Husayn's regime, and he was keen to get it out of Jordan. Several hijacking operations by the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE provided the excuse, and in September 1970, King Husayn unleashed his army against the PLO. To help the Palestinians, the Syrian president sent an armored division; however, it was overrun by Jordanian forces when Hafez al-Asad, commander of the Syrian air force, decided to withhold promised air cover. Many thousands of lives were lost, but Jordan succeeded in driving the PLO from its borders, and it was forced to regroup in Lebanon. In fact, King Husayn had tacit support from all the Arab regimes and explicit support from Egypt for his actions in the BLACK SEPTEMBER disaster.

In November 1970, Hafez al-Assad took power in Syria and sought to improve relations with Jordan, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia. He immediately denied the PLO use of Syrian territory to attack Israel and appeared to be moving toward a negotiated settlement with Israel to recover lost territory. He too wanted to control the PLO to serve Syria's interests. Assad did the same as the earlier Ba'athist regime: he mobilized SA'IQA, a Syrian-created and -controlled guerrilla group within the PLO, to influence PLO policy and activities on the ground, primarily in Lebanon, and manipulated control of arms shipments to several Palestinian guerrilla organizations within the PLO.

Having lost hope in the possibility of ending the "no-war, no-peace" limbo merely through negotiations, Egypt and Syria jointly launched a limited war in October 1973 to regain the territories they lost in 1967. Israel once again defeated the Arab states and occupied more territory of each than it held before the hostilities began. In the war's aftermath, Egypt, now ruled by Anwar al-Sadat, played an extremely deceptive game with Syria and concluded a separate peace with Israel.

Between 1970 and 1974, the PLO came under increasing pressure to abandon its objective of a democratic, secular state in all of Palestine and accept Israel as a Zionist, Jewish state. Thus, at the twelfth PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC) in June 1974, the PLO issued a political communiqué that called for the establishment of "a Palestinian national authority in any Palestinian areas liberated from Israeli control." This was the first formulation of the idea of an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel. Having accepted the Arab consensus on this issue, at the October 1974 Rabat Arab Summit, the Arab states formalized an agreement made at a November 1973 meeting that recognized the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. At first Jordan refused to sign the agreement, but in 1974, King Husayn came under intense pressure from key Arab states, and he had no choice but to relinquish Jordan's claim to the West Bank in favor of the PLO. The significance of Rabat was that no settlement concerning the Occupied Territories could be achieved without the PLO as a direct party to the negotiations.

Because Egypt needed the PLO as a cover for the land-for-peace negotiations it anticipated with Israel, Cairo played a major role in the Arab diplomacy that resulted in Yasir Arafat's invitation to address the UN General Assembly on 13 November 1974. On 10 November 1975, the General Assembly adopted Resolution 3237, conferring on the PLO the status of observer-member in the assembly and in other international organizations.

The Lebanese civil war that began in April 1975 made control of the PLO by either Syria or Egypt a difficult task, partly because the divisions among the Arab states precluded a unified strategy and because the PLO was by then a significant player in the region with overwhelming popular support among the Arab masses. No one contemplated that Syria would turn against the PLO and especially its former Lebanese allies. But as the war dragged on, it became apparent that the Lebanese National Movement (LNM), with which the Palestinians had sided, was poised to defeat the Lebanese right-wing forces. Syria feared that Israel would enter the fray on the side of the Lebanese right wing, and not wanting another confrontation with the Jewish state, Damascus turned on its traditional allies and sided with the Lebanese rightists to defeat the LNM/PLO. Syria was also concerned that the PLO was becoming a force that it could no longer control and that could work against its regional influence, making its defeat of the Palestinians even more satisfying. When the Lebanese civil war concluded, Syria signed an agreement with Arafat on 26 July 1976 that seemed to protect PLO interests, but neither Arafat nor the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE trusted Hafez al-Asad.

On 15 March 1978, Israel invaded the south of Lebanon and set up a sphere of influence in the border area, installing a cashiered Lebanese army colonel, Saad Haddad, as its surrogate. Haddad's assignment was to prevent Palestinian guerrilla incursions into Israel.

In November 1977, abandoning his Arab allies and negating the Arab consensus for an international conference, Egypt's Sadat seized the initiative for peace with Israel in a dramatic gesture—a visit to JERUSALEM and an address to the Knesset. In 1979 he signed two agreements with Israel, known as the Camp David Accords. They were, however, two separate, unrelated agreements. The first was ostensibly for a comprehensive peace in the Middle East involving Israel, Egypt, Jordan, and Palestinian representatives. Supposedly, the West Bank and Gaza would gain autonomy within a relationship with Jordan. The second accord was the framework for a bilateral peace treaty between Egypt and Israel, formally signed on 29 March 1979. However, since there was no linkage between the two agreements, nothing bound Israel to honor the first, and Tel Aviv did not respect any aspect of it, including granting autonomy to the West Bank and Gaza.

The PLO opposed the Camp David peace accords because it could not accept Egypt negotiating for Palestinian “self-government” without consulting the PLO and because the accord on autonomy fell far short of statehood. The danger, as the PLO saw it, was the establishment of a precedent for other states to negotiate on behalf of the Palestinians without the PLO, thus obviating the Rabat consensus that recognized the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. Equally important, as a result of the Camp David Accords Egypt was neutralized in the Arab-Israeli conflict and isolated in the Arab world.

The next setback for the PLO was Israel's 1982 LEBANON WAR. During the three-month siege of Beirut, no Arab state provided assistance to the Palestinians. Palestinian forces were forced to withdraw from Lebanon, a move that met with Syrian approval because Damascus had been attempting to weaken the PLO there. Subsequently, Syrian president Asad backed a Fatah rebellion that opposed Arafat's diplomatic maneuvers to reach a settlement with Israel in conjunction with Jordan. The SABRA AND SHATILA massacres, in addition to all their other losses, left the Palestinians utterly demoralized. The Arab states did not enter the scene again until after US president RONALD REAGAN announced a peace plan on 1 September 1982 that explicitly ruled out a Palestinian state and seemed intended to capitalize on the PLO's weakness by positing a negotiating process centered on Jordan. Meeting shortly thereafter in Fez, Morocco, Arab leaders and the PLO crafted and promoted a peace plan of their own. The FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE (based on the earlier FAHD PLAN of 1981) called for the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the Occupied Territories and security guarantees for “all states in the region”—an implicit reference to Israel.

In November 1983, Egyptian diplomatic intervention secured a safe passage for Arafat from Tripoli, Lebanon, giving rise to the Palestinian leader's visit to Cairo en route to Tunis. This decision, however, incurred the wrath of the other Arab states that were maintaining a boycott against Egypt for the Camp David “sellout.” It also deepened an already serious rift over strategy and tactics within the PLO.

Arafat convened the seventeenth PNC in Amman, Jordan, in November 1984. With the exception of Fatah, most of the other resistance organizations chose not to attend. In 1985 Arafat made a formal pronouncement in Egypt known as the “Cairo Declaration” in which he stated the PLO's condemnation of “all guerilla operations outside [Palestine] and all forms of TERRORISM.” In February 1985, Arafat signed an accord with King Husayn of Jordan in which the concept of an independent Palestinian state was reduced to the notion of a “homeland” and self-government to a “confederation” with Jordan. The agreement also contained the idea of a joint Jordanian-PLO negotiating team, which in effect compromised the status of the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people. Six Palestinian factions within the PLO immediately denounced Arafat's decision, saying the accord would "liquidate the Palestine cause," and a month later they came together in the PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT under Syrian sponsorship. In February 1986, the resolutions of the Amman PNC and the HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT were abrogated.

After the dissolution of the agreement with the PLO, King Husayn met with Israeli prime minister SHIMON PERES in Paris while simultaneously initiating a rapprochement with Syria to protect himself in the event of a peace deal with Israel. Meanwhile, Asad maintained pressure on the PLO by continuing to support the PLO dissidents, which included the Fatah rebels, Sa'iqa, and the PFLP. Asad also wanted to disperse or exile the pro-Arafat fighters who returned to the Palestinian refugee camps around Beirut. To this end he unleashed the Lebanese Shi'a AMAL militia and Shi'a units of the Lebanese army against the camps. Despite the killing of hundreds of civilians, the "CAMPS' WAR" served to unite the Palestinians, and Syria found itself increasingly isolated.

In April 1987, when the eighteenth session of the PNC convened, the various resistance groups were reunited. The PLO restated the objective of national self-determination in an independent state in part of Palestine. The emphasis on diplomacy was also reiterated with the PLO call for an international conference under the auspices of the UN Security Council, as the means to facilitate a solution to the question of Palestine. During this session, the PLO Executive Committee declared the Jordanian-PLO agreement "null and void." Thereafter, Arafat sought by all diplomatic means to make the PLO a full partner in a political settlement.

In March 1988, four months into the First INTIFADA, Arafat again publicly called for an international peace conference to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict with full, independent PLO participation. He declared that the PLO accepted "all UN resolutions on Palestine," including 242 and 338; referred to the 1984 PNC resolution calling for "land in exchange for peace"; and concluded with the statement "With whom am I going to make peace at an international conference? With my enemies? With the Israeli government?" However, he quickly reversed his position after the Intifada's leadership condemned the lack of US support for Palestinian self-determination and denounced the Arab states for being excessively deferential to Washington. The Arab regimes were worried that the Intifada might spread to their countries.

Arafat continued his diplomatic initiative with a speech at the 13 December 1988 UN General Assembly meeting in Geneva, calling upon Israel to negotiate with the PLO. At a press conference the following day, he stated that he recognized Israel's right to exist and again renounced all forms of terrorism. Shortly thereafter, Arafat's much-sought official meeting with the United States came to fruition—the UNITED STATES-PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION DIALOGUE, which commenced in December 1988 in Tunis. Nothing came of the dialogue, and eighteen months later the United States canceled it.

Egypt had been playing an important behind-the-scenes role in encouraging Arafat to make the concessions the United States was demanding; however, Arafat began to perceive President Husni Mubarak as so obsequious to Washington that he felt the need to balance the PLO-Egypt-US triangle. Syria was out of the question, given its actions in the post-1982 War period. On the other hand, Iraq was deeply committed to the Palestinian cause, having provided large sums of money to the PLO and strong diplomatic support.

Historically, Ba'athist Iraq had supported the PLO and Yasir Arafat, although Iraqi leader Saddam Husayn also attempted to manipulate Palestinian politics to serve Baghdad's interests through the Iraqi-sponsored ARAB LIBERATION FRONT (ALF) and by other means. For years, inter-Arab politics had compelled Arafat to compromise Palestinian interests; now Saddam Husayn wanted to use the PLO to support him against Arab Gulf states. The Iraqi president backed the PLO in its quest to reach a settlement without interference from Arab states, and, in a February 1990 speech at the Arab Co-operation Council held in Amman, he was highly critical of the United States and Israel. After Husayn's speech, Arafat and the Palestinian masses believed that the Iraqi leader had a plan that might compel the United States to take the PLO more seriously. In this regional atmosphere, an abortive attack on Israel's Nizanim beach in Tel Aviv in May 1990 by the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (PLF), to avenge the murder of seven Palestinian workers earlier in the month, was said by some to have had Iraqi sponsorship. An Iraqi role in the operation is, however, highly unlikely. The foiled attack garnered much criticism from around the globe, including the Arab world, and when it was followed by the ACHILLE LAURO affair, also a PLF operation, combined with Yasir Arafat's failure to condemn it, the United States broke off its dialogue with the PLO.

In any case, the strength of the financial and diplomatic assistance provided by Saddam Husayn, plus the enormous mass support in the Occupied Territories for the Iraqi president, led the PLO to side with Iraq when it invaded Kuwait. An alignment with Baghdad in the GULF WAR may have seemed a logical decision to Arafat at the time, but it turned out to be disastrous for the PLO. After the war's end, Kuwait expelled at least 450,000 Palestinians, and Arafat and the PLO were at their lowest point, with catastrophic consequences for the Palestinian cause. First, the PLO had to submit to the terms of the MADRID CONFERENCE, from which it was excluded, and Israel would vet those "non-PLO Palestinians" who could attend.

One could count Madrid as a "procedural" defeat because no Arab state realized any of its interests at the conference. Far more serious was the weakened PLO, already in a vastly asymmetric power relationship with Israel, signing in 1993 the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES and embarking on the OSLO PROCESS on terms that were so disadvantageous as to make its demise inevitable. Yet, in the aftermath of the Gulf War, so isolated was the PLO among the Arab states and internationally, and in turn so weakened as an actor, that Arafat apparently concluded that the Oslo agreement was the most that he could get, even though it left the Palestinians without even bargaining power.

After the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS, the Arab states used the PLO's acquiescence to Israel to further their own interests. Jordan signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1994. Syria engaged in an on-again, off-again negotiating process with Israel, anxious to conclude a peace treaty and willing to make numerous concessions that ultimately came to naught, though not for lack of Syrian flexibility. And Egyptian president Mubarak worked closely with US president BILL CLINTON to fulfill Shimon Peres's dream of an economically integrated region.

The Arab states eagerly participated in a regional economic project that Israel hoped would lead to the development of the Middle East economies through economic cooperation and in turn politically integrate Israel in the region. The US Foreign Relations Committee and the World Economic Forum sponsored the first Middle East and North Africa (MENA) Economic Summit in November 1994 in Casablanca. As one analyst noted, "Representatives of 64 countries took part and it represented a considerable breakthrough for the regional integration of Israel."

Participants in the summit stressed the need to strengthen cooperation among governments and business communities. The declaration signed in Casablanca underlined the importance of solid economic growth and palpable improvement of the life and security of peoples in the region. The Arab states agreed to take measures to lift the direct embargo against Israel, and all the participants agreed on the creation of a Middle East and North Africa Development Bank and a regional Chamber of Commerce.

The second MENA summit took place in Amman in October 1995. As a supplement to the institutions proposed in Casablanca, it was decided to set up a regional permanent economic organization-secretariat. The second MENA summit took place in the same friendly Arab-Israeli atmosphere as the first.

The third MENA meeting was held in Cairo in November 1996. Because of the slowing of the peace process after the election of BENJAMIN NETANYAHU and the halting of the Oslo Process, it was downgraded from being a summit to just a conference, and Israel was no longer the focal point of this event. The "Cairo Declaration" adopted in the conference underlined the idea that regional development had to be linked to the realization of peace. The United States announced that the Middle East and North Africa Development Bank would become operative by the end of 1997.

Despite considerable pressures from the United States, most Arab countries did not take part in the fourth MENA conference, which was held in Doha, Qatar, in November 1997. Because most of the Arab states had linked their presence in the conference to the progress made in the Palestinian-Israeli peace negotiations, Algeria, Bahrain, Egypt, Lebanon, Morocco, the Palestinian National Authority, Saudi Arabia, Syria, and the United Arab Emirates boycotted the event. The Arab participation was limited to Djibouti, Jordan, Kuwait, Mauritania, Oman, Qatar, Tunisia, and Yemen. Not invited were Iraq, Libya, Somalia, and Sudan. No progress was made on the implementation of the development bank, or on the promotion of Arab-Israeli direct economic and trade cooperation.

See also ARAB STATE PEACE OVERTURES, 1949–PRESENT; LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC; and individual countries: EGYPT, FRANCE, IRAQ, JORDAN, KUWAIT, LEBANON, SAUDI ARABIA, SYRIA

Bibliography

Abed-Rabbo, Samir, and Doris Safie, eds. The Palestinian Uprising. Belmont, MA: Arab-American University Graduates Press, 1990.

Aburish, Said K. Nasser: The Last Arab. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2004.

Ajami, Fouad. The Arab Predicament: Arab Political Thought and Practice since 1967, 2nd ed. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Aoudé, Ibrahim G. "The Palestinian Liberation Movement and US Empire." In Burning Issues in World Politics: Cyprus, Iraq and Palestine. Edited by Jacqueline Ismael and Mehmet Tahiroglu. Gazimagusa, Northern Cyprus: Eastern Mediterranean University Press, 2004.

———. "The US Role in the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict." Peace and Policy. 9 (2004).

Barnett, Michael N. Dialogues in Arab Politics. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.

Brand, Laurie. Jordan's Inter-Arab Relations. New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.

Cattan, Henry. The Palestine Question. London: Saqi Books, 2000.

European Union. MENA Summits and Conferences. European Institute for Research on Mediterranean and Euro-Arab Cooperation with the support of the European Commission. April 2003. www.medea.be/index.html?page=0&lang=en&doc=258.

Hinnebusch, Raymond, and Anoushiravan Ehteshami, eds. The Foreign Policy of Middle East States. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2002.

Jabber, Paul. The Palestinian Resistance and Inter-Arab Politics. Santa Monica, CA: Rand Corporation, 1971.

Jung, Dietrich, ed. The Middle East and Palestine: Global Politics and Regional Conflict. Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.

Kerr, Malcolm H. The Arab Cold War: Gamal 'Abd Al-Nasir and His Rivals, 1958–1970, 3rd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Khalidi, Rashid, Lisa Anderson, Muhammad Muslih, and Reeva Simon. The Origins of Arab Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.

Kirisci, Kemal. The PLO and World Politics: A Study of Mobilization of Support for the Palestinian Cause. London: Frances Pinter, 1986.

Lesch, David W. The Middle East and the United States: A Historical and Political Assessment. Cambridge, MA: Westview Press, 2003.

Maddy-Weitzman, Bruce. The Crystallization of the Arab State System: Inter-Arab Politics, 1945–1954.

Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1992.

Odeh, B. J. Lebanon: Dynamics of Conflict. London: Zed Press, 1985.

Quandt, William B. Peace Process: American Diplomacy and the Arab-Israeli Conflict since 1967. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2001.

Quandt, William B., Fuad Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.

Rabinovich, Itamar. The Politics of Fragmentation and Anticipation: Inter-Arab Relations in the Early 1980s. Tel Aviv: Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies, 1984.

Rubenberg, Cheryl A. "Conflict and Contradictions in the Relations between the Arab States and the Palestine National Movement." In Palestine: Continuing Dispossession. Edited by Glenn E. Perry. Belmont, MA: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1986.

Seale, Patrick. Asad of Syria: The Struggle for the Middle East, reprint ed. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

Sheehan, Edward R. F. The Arabs, Israelis and Kissinger: A Secret History of American Diplomacy in the Middle East. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1976.

Shlaim, Avi. The Politics of Partition: King Abdullah, the Zionists, and Palestine 1921–1951. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Smith, Charles D. Palestine and the Arab-Israeli Conflict: A History with Documents. New York: Palgrave, 2001.

Walker, Tony, and Andrew Gower. Arafat: The Biography. London: Virgin Books, 2003.

—Ibrahim G. Aoudé

Arab Studies Society

The Arab Studies Society (Jammayat el-Derasat el-Arabia), established in 1980 by Faysal al-Husayni, is a nongovernmental organization founded as a research and documentation center to record the historical, cultural, and political history of the Palestinians. Located in ORIENT HOUSE in East JERUSALEM, it consists of a library that holds some 14,000 books, documents, a press and personalities archive, and a photo and tape department. The facilities at the Arab Studies Society were open to the public until the beginning of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, when Israel closed it down. Funded by the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), it was considered the center of PLO influence in Jerusalem, which made it a flashpoint of tension throughout the 1990s because of repeated Israeli closures. (www.orienthouse.org/arabstudies).

Arab Thought Forum

The Arab Thought Forum (ATF, al Multaqa, or “meeting place”), founded in 1977 in East JERUSALEM by Palestinian professionals and intellectuals, is one of the oldest and most venerable Palestinian think tanks. Its independent and unaffiliated status allows the ATF to broach a broad range of subjects from varying perspectives related to the Palestinian situation. The ATF attempts to identify the critical issues facing the Palestinians and engages in research, analysis, and public debate to influence social, economic, and political developments. Beginning with the OSLO PROCESS, it has focused on three main areas: (1) the future of Jerusalem, (2) democratic processes and nation building, and (3) promoting development awareness. (www.multaqa.org).

Arab Uprising, 1929

See WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES

Arab World and Palestine

See individual countries: EGYPT, IRAQ, JORDAN, KUWAIT, LEBANON, SAUDI ARABIA, SYRIA

Arafat, Yasir (Mohammed Abdel Rahman Abdel Raouf Arafat al-Qudwa al-Husayn) (1929–2004)

Yasir Arafat (Abu Ammar, or father of Ammar) was the founder and head of FATAH, chairman of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), president of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), and the single most important figure in the Palestinian nationalist struggle.

Arafat was born in Cairo and spent some of his childhood years in JERUSALEM. His father, Abd al Ra’uf, was a wholesale merchant who hailed from the Qudwa hamula of Gaza and Khan Yunis, a distant and minor clan in the AL-HUSAYNI FAMILY. His mother, Zahwa, came from the family of Abu al Sa’id, a distinguished hamula that claimed direct descent from the Prophet Muhammad. During the 1948 WAR, Arafat fought in GAZA with the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD, after which he fled to EGYPT. Politically, Arafat was sympathetic to the Brotherhood, and his roots are found therein.

While in Egypt, Arafat was active in the Palestinian Students Union (PSU), a body set up in the early 1950s by Palestinian students residing in that country. The PSU brought together Palestinian students of various political persuasions, including Muslim Brothers, BA’ATHISTS, communists, and independents. In 1952 Arafat was elected president of the PSU on a platform of Palestinian identity and self-reliance. Through the PSU and his other activities in student politics, Arafat met KHALIL AL-WAZIR, SALAH KHALAF, and FAROUQ AL-QADDUMI, political colleagues with whom he later founded Fatah and who constituted its core leadership. Arafat’s approach, even at this early stage and with so many pan-Arabist trends vying for support, was governed by his preference for independent Palestinian political and military action.

In early 1957, Arafat left Egypt after receiving an engineering degree from Cairo University and moved to KUWAIT in search of work. His first job was as an engineer for the Kuwaiti Public Works Department, and later he became owner of a profitable construction and contracting company. For nearly eight years Arafat remained in Kuwait, where, together with his Palestinian friends from Egypt, he organized Fatah, mobilizing Palestinian recruits and exercising leadership over the emerging underground network. He was never an advocate of overturning the existing Arab political order; rather, he sought independence from the Arab regimes for Palestinian political and military activity. By 1959, Fatah was producing an underground monthly Palestinian publication called Filastinuna: Nida al-Hayat (Our Palestine: The Call to Life), which helped win recruits for Fatah. Arafat also relied on support from Algeria and CHINA and on loyal colleagues, primarily Khalil al-Wazir.

Fatah organized itself in the winter of 1963 when the first FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE was formed. At the time, Arafat was only one of ten in the collective leadership and was in the minority with regard to tactics. Whereas he advocated immediate ARMED STRUGGLE against Israel, most of the others did not think the time was right. When, however, in 1964 Egyptian president JAMAL ‘ABD AL-NASIR catalyzed the formation of the PLO at an Arab summit conference, the dynamics within Fatah changed. Arafat was able to persuade his colleagues that the only way to keep Fatah alive and to demonstrate that the Palestinians could play a real role in decisions related to their future was to embark on armed struggle without delay. In January 1965, Fatah launched its first raid into Israel. The operation was carried out under the name AL-‘ASIFA (the Tempest), the title of the military arm of Fatah. The raid was unsuccessful, but Arafat trumpeted it loudly and used it to raise money for Fatah and to recruit new members.

The reaction of key Arab governments to Fatah's raids was hostile because they feared Israeli reprisals and opposed Palestinian action that was not under their control. Thus, the skeptics inside Fatah attempted to persuade Arafat to cease operations, but he would not agree, and the Central Committee suspended his membership in Fatah and cut his access to funds. With the help of HANI AL-HASAN, who collected funds from Palestinian student organizations in West GERMANY and elsewhere, Arafat overcame his financial problems and thus kept the military option alive.

Arafat also needed an Arab state that would allow him to mount operations against Israel from its territory. His only realistic option was SYRIA. In the summer of 1966, Hafez al-Asad, then acting defense minister, agreed to permit Fatah to undertake cross-frontier forays, although with the caveat that the guerrillas had to accept whatever limitations Syria imposed. Arafat refused to abide by Syria's restraints, and in retaliation Asad imprisoned him for over a month in the summer of 1966. This episode marked the beginning of an intense personal enmity between Arafat and Asad.

Rise to Power

The period following the 1967 WAR saw the emergence of Arafat as the leader of the Palestinian national movement. The defeat and discrediting of the Arab regimes after the crushing blow delivered by Israel provided the opportunity for Arafat to implement his policies and led to a new wave of recruits. Arafat's strategy, summed up in the slogan "Revolution until Victory," did not, however, reflect an organized movement with an ideology aimed at changing the socioeconomic order but rather one dedicated to armed struggle until the total liberation of Palestine was achieved. But Arafat's militant policy immediately put him on a collision course with the governments of JORDAN and LEBANON. Initially, he focused on the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel in June 1967, moving secretly to the WEST BANK to determine whether conditions were ripe for the kind of guerrilla activities he had in mind. One of the first steps he took was to set up an organizational base in the old quarter of NABLUS, a West Bank town with a long history of nationalist struggle. But his attempts to organize a popular armed revolution failed because the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories were not ready for such a revolution. Additionally, the Israeli military government took extreme measures against suspected Fatah guerrillas and their sympathizers, including HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, imposing CURFEWS, and in many instances torturing them. Thus, by the early part of 1968, Arafat was compelled to flee the West Bank and turn east to JORDAN, where he began establishing operational bases for recruiting guerrillas and mounting hit-and-run raids against Israel.

In Jordan, Arafat focused on recruitment in the refugee camps, and by 1970 there were between 30,000 and 50,000 guerrillas in Jordan, most of whom were Fatah loyalists and therefore under the command of Arafat. One event in particular gave Arafat an opportunity to win large numbers of recruits. The 21 March 1968 battle in AL-KARAMA and the myths surrounding it proved a great enhancement to the guerrilla image. In the spring of 1968, the Central Council named Arafat as Fatah's spokesman. In recognition of Arafat's new authority, Jamal 'Abd al-Nasir included him as part of an Egyptian delegation that visited Moscow in the summer of 1968.

Fatah's soaring popularity provided other benefits for Arafat. Significantly, at the February 1969 session of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC), Fatah and other Palestinian guerrilla groups used their new power and prestige to oust the old-guard politicians, and Arafat was elected chairman of the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, the supreme decisionmaking body in the PLO. As a result, the PLO was then under the control of the guerrilla organizations and under the leadership of Arafat.

In regard to PLO politics, Arafat's major challenge was to unite the diverse guerrilla groups under the PLO's umbrella, which he did by creating a broad front that incorporated the competing ideologies and organizations. As a result of Arafat's leadership, by the late 1960s, though he was never able to unite all the Palestinian groups, the PLO was a broad coalition of forces that acted as one body. His leadership was characterized by charisma, well-honed bargaining skills, and the judicious use of carrots and sticks—all in the service of maintaining consensus and unity in the organization.

Arafat convinced the PNC to adopt the core principle of Fatah: namely, the belief that the Palestinians had to articulate their own vision of their political future and remain independent of the Arab regimes. Another key ingredient of the PLO strategy was to knit together DIASPORA Palestinians and mobilize them behind the struggle for national independence.

In 1970 Arafat attempted to prevent a military confrontation between the Palestinian guerrillas and the Jordanian regime; however, the activities of some groups, especially GEORGE HABASH'S POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), eventually led to Jordan's expulsion of the PLO. Arafat was not entirely free of responsibility, because he gave explicit approval to spectacular demonstrations in Amman, Jordan, to protest the Egyptian and Jordanian acceptance of US secretary of state WILLIAM ROGERS'S 1970 peace plan, which called for the implementation of UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242 of November 1967. The combined actions of the resistance groups threatened the Hashemite monarchy, and, in a bloody civil war known as BLACK SEPTEMBER, the Palestinians were defeated. Arafat was forced to flee Jordan disguised in a Kuwaiti robe given to him by the crown prince of KUWAIT.

The Palestinian guerrillas who survived the Black September conflict left Jordan for Jabal al Shaykh (Mount Hermon) in Syria and from there went to LEBANON. Arafat's legitimacy after the Jordanian disaster was in question, and he was not beyond playing the TERRORISM card to increase his stature. The most striking example of the terror weapon was Arafat's tolerance for or endorsement of the sensational terrorist activities of the BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION, a Fatah offshoot.

Arafat remained in Lebanon between 1970 and 1982, where he organized Arab and international support for the PLO. In October 1974, the Rabat Arab Summit of Arab heads of state recognized the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. In November of the same year, the UN General Assembly granted the PLO observer status, and it later became a member of the nonaligned movement and of the Conference of Islamic States. By the end of the 1970s, more than 100 countries worldwide recognized the PLO as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, with Arafat always playing the leading role in its diplomatic activities. While in Beirut, Arafat continuously consulted with his two senior colleagues, Salah Khalaf (Abu Iyad) and Khalil al-Wazir (Abu Jihad), but regardless of the issue or the argument, Arafat always had the final say. During the years in Lebanon, Arafat mastered the art of consensus building, but he also tolerated corruption and selected advisers on the basis of loyalty rather than merit. Over the years, patronage and tolerance of corruption proved to be among Arafat's principal instruments of political control and co-optation.

From Armed Struggle to Diplomacy

In the first decade of the post-1967 War era, Arafat made two of the most important decisions of his life—decisions that represented the first phase of an evolution toward pragmatism in his attitude toward Israel. One was his endorsement in mid-1968 of the idea of a secular democratic state in Palestine in which all citizens—Jewish, Christian, and Muslim—would live together on the principles of nonsectarian democracy, equality, and mutual respect. The second decision was his adoption of a policy of “stages” (marhaliyya): establishing a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza as an interim solution pending the realization of the PLO objective of creating a secular democratic state. Although the policy of stages, first introduced in the twelfth PNC of June 1974, was typically ambiguous with respect to ultimate PLO goals, it represented the first phase in the movement away from the earlier “Revolution until Victory” strategy to one that employed diplomatic as well as military means to achieve less ambitious goals. To show his readiness for a negotiated settlement, in the autumn of 1973 Arafat sent signals both to the UNITED STATES and to Israel through two senior aides, Dr. SA'ID HAMAMI, the PLO representative in London, and Dr. ISAM SARTAWI, a leading Palestinian activist. These signals, however, did not bring about a change in the position of the US or Israeli governments, both of which continued to reject the idea of dealing with the PLO.

Arafat's moderation put him at odds with a number of radical Palestinian organizations, particularly George Habash's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP). In the mid-1970s, Habash spearheaded the formation of the REJECTION FRONT to challenge Arafat's policy of accommodation with Israel. Arafat prevailed, primarily because of his charisma and the dominance of Fatah within the PLO. By the end of the 1970s, the Rejection Front was in disarray, divided by internal differences and by external Arab states who favored Arafat's preference for a diplomatic settlement.

In the Lebanese Quagmire

The civil war that engulfed Lebanon in 1975 was perhaps Arafat's greatest challenge in the second half of the 1970s. Arafat found himself caught between the pressures of moderate Palestinians who wanted him to take a neutral stand and radical Palestinians who wanted Fatah to intervene in the internecine conflict. In the end, Arafat threw his weight behind the Lebanese Muslim and leftist alliance, thus shifting the balance in favor of the leftist forces in Lebanon. As a result, Syria, which traditionally had backed Fatah and the Lebanese left, intervened in Lebanon in the summer of 1976, launching an offensive against the Palestinian-leftist alliance, partly to prevent it from toppling the existing Lebanese regime and thus giving Israel a pretext for intervention but partly also to control the PLO and the Lebanese left. In June 1976, during the Palestinian-Syrian confrontation, right-wing Lebanese militias unleashed a massive assault against the Palestinian refugee camps at TAL AL ZA'TAR and Jisr al-Basha. After a brutal siege that lasted for nearly two months and resulted in the killing of at least 1,500 camp residents, Tal al Za'tar fell, with the Syrian army sitting idle on the hilltops surrounding it. In these circumstances, Arafat's forces could do little to save the camp, which became a symbol of horror visited on Palestinian refugees in Lebanon. By October 1976, Arafat's military encounter with the Syrian forces in Lebanon ended through the efforts of Arab summits held in Riyadh and Cairo aimed explicitly at terminating the Lebanese civil war.

Despite the disastrous experience in the civil war, Arafat was not deterred from his goal of consolidating the PLO's institutional presence in Lebanon. Under his leadership, the PLO created a highly developed infrastructure that incorporated social, educational, economic, and informational institutions responsible for dealing with the daily concerns of the Palestinian people in exile. Arafat was also instrumental in transforming the PLO fighters into a standing army outfitted with heavy weapons provided by the SOVIET UNION and the Eastern European bloc, as well as by Egypt, Syria, and a number of other Arab countries. Arafat also continued his pursuit of a diplomatic settlement with Israel. He welcomed Soviet president Leonid Brezhnev's peace proposal of February 1981, which called for a comprehensive peace, a Palestinian state, and security guarantees for all states in the region, including Israel. Arafat also welcomed the August 1981 peace plan of Saudi crown prince FAHD (later King Fahd), who proposed an eight-point peace plan that called for the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza and implicitly recognized Israel within its pre-1967 borders.

The event that created the greatest dilemma for Arafat and the PLO was the 1978 CAMP DAVID agreement, which culminated in the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty of 1979. Arafat and the PLO strongly opposed the treaty because its only reference to the Palestinians was in a separate and unbinding document that called for limited autonomy for the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, and also because it removed Egypt from the Arab confrontation front, weakening the Palestinians by shifting the balance of power more heavily in favor of Israel. Indeed, the treaty made it possible for Israel to invade Lebanon in 1982 without concern about rear-guard action by Egypt, and the invasion resulted in the destruction of the entire PLO infrastructure in the country.

At the height of the LEBANON WAR, Arafat led the defense of Beirut during an Israeli siege of eighty-eight days. Throughout the siege, Arafat gathered about himself the secretaries-general of the non-Fatah guerrilla groups to help him make critical decisions, including the most painful and difficult one of August 1982: to evacuate Beirut. Arafat and his Palestinian colleagues felt they had no alternative but to leave the Lebanese capital. The resources at their disposal were no match for those of the Israeli military. Thus, by 1 September 1982, Arafat had led the evacuation of some 10,000 Palestinian fighters from Beirut to Yemen, Sudan, and elsewhere in the Arab world. Arafat himself went to Tunis, where he set up new headquarters with other senior Fatah officials.

Aftermath of the Lebanon War

After the Lebanon War, Arafat experienced several conflicts, some internal to the PLO and another specifically with Syria. Arafat was critical of what he and other senior PLO officials considered insufficient Syrian participation in the Lebanon battles. As Syria moved to capitalize on the dissension within PLO ranks, Arafat attempted to counter Damascus's influence and maintain the PLO's independence by improving the organization's relations with Egypt, Jordan, and SAUDI ARABIA. These initiatives in turn provoked fears in Damascus that it might be left out of future diplomatic steps. Many pro-Syrian PLO leaders, including NIMR SALIH, a cofounder of Fatah and a member of its Central Committee, expressed similar concerns, arguing that Arafat might strike a deal with Israel in cooperation with Jordan, a country whose government the Syrians distrusted.

Against this background and with Syrian backing, FATAH dissidents in Lebanon in May 1983 rebelled against Arafat, accusing him of failing to make the necessary military preparations during the Israeli invasion and subsequently appointing incompetent cronies to high-level military positions. One month later, the Syrian government expelled Arafat from Damascus. This stiffened Arafat's resolve to assert PLO independence vis-à-vis Syria and to discredit the pro-Syrian dissidents who had rebelled against him. In December 1983, after regrouping his supporters in Lebanon, Arafat traveled in disguise to Tripoli, Lebanon, via Cyprus, but he was outgunned by the Fatah dissidents who enjoyed Syrian support, and he left Tripoli defeated and humiliated in December 1983.

In the aftermath of these events, Arafat revised his diplomatic strategy in the hope of achieving a breakthrough with Israel. The essence of the new strategy was rapprochement with Egypt and Jordan, a diplomatic process that intensified the animosity between Arafat and Syrian president Hafiz al-Asad and between Fatah and leftist factions within the PLO. On his forced departure from Tripoli, Arafat stopped in Egypt, where he met with Egyptian president Husni Mubarak. This was Arafat's first visit there since 1977, when Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat had embarked on peace with Israel. But, from Arafat's perspective, the rapprochement made sense. Egypt had supported Arafat during 1982 and 1983, and, strategically, the initiative toward Egypt was consistent with Arafat's desire to formulate a common peace strategy with Jordan's King Husayn, a strategy aimed at reaching a peaceful settlement with Israel.

The Jordanian component of Arafat's new strategy was part of his effort to move the PLO toward greater pragmatism, a path that had begun with his acceptance of the September 1982 FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE. In part, the strategy was intended as a concession to both Israel and the United States, given King Husayn's acceptability to the two governments as a negotiating partner. In line with his efforts to strengthen ties with Jordan, Arafat focused on achieving the sanction of popular legitimacy for a new relationship with King Husayn. Toward that end, Arafat attempted to work within the framework of the PNC, holding the November 1984 seventeenth session in Amman. In this session, attended almost exclusively by Fatah loyalists, the PNC called for an independent Palestinian state in confederation with Jordan, a proposal denounced by virtually every other Palestinian faction. Moreover, although initially promising, the Jordanian dimension did not yield the desired result; in February 1986, King Husayn abrogated the 1985 AMMAN AGREEMENT, which had called for a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation in peace talks.

Arafat's new political direction was unacceptable to most groups within the PLO. The Fatah rebels and several small factions formed the NATIONAL ALLIANCE, while the PFLP and NAYIF HAWATIMA'S DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (DFLP) coalesced in the DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE, both of which openly challenged Arafat. A relationship with Egypt, which was unacceptable because of Cairo's treaty with Israel, and reconciliation with Jordan were unthinkable given the memories of Black September.

Polarization of Palestinians

A major consequence, then, of the 1982 Lebanon War was the polarization of Palestinian politics. On one side stood Arafat and the core group in the Fatah Central Committee; on the other stood the anti-Arafat Fatah rebels and their supporters from other Palestinian groups backed by Syria. Indeed, a new anti-Arafat coalition emerged on 25 March 1985 when former PNC speaker Khalid al-Fahum announced from Damascus the formation of the PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT (PNSF), which included the National Alliance, the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT, and PFLP. In its founding statement, the PNSF condemned the Amman Agreement and called for "action to topple the trend of deviation and relinquishment" within the PLO.

Nevertheless, at the same time, the seeds of reconciliation were being sown. Arafat's initial response to the rebellion in PLO ranks was to attempt to use his enormous and exclusive financial control to bring fractious groups back to the fold. For a time, he abandoned the principle of consensus in favor of majority rule, and he began the process of concentrating decisionmaking powers in his hands alone. More important, however, were the events on the ground that ultimately led the factions to return to the unity and independence of the PLO umbrella. For one, the Syrian-sponsored Amal (a political party and militia) "CAMPS' WAR" between 1985 and 1987, which claimed more than 2,500 lives, forged a practical unity among Fatah, the DFLP, and PFLP in defending the Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon and made a vital psychological contribution toward the reunification of the PLO. Both the DFLP and PFLP criticized Syrian policy for sponsoring Amal, and, as the Palestinian civil war in Lebanon deteriorated, these and other groups became disillusioned with Syria's part in the killing.

Israel provided another impetus for reunification. In the Occupied Territories, social and political conditions deteriorated through the 1980s. The introduction by Israel of what it termed an "iron fist" policy in August 1985; the growth of Palestinian protests; and the acceleration of arrests, detentions, DEPORTATION, use of lethal force, and other Israeli countermeasures over the next two years underlined the practical need for overall Palestinian political unity.

After Jordan suspended the Amman Agreement and indirectly called on Palestinians to produce an alternative political leadership, Jordan encouraged another rebellion against Arafat's leadership from within Fatah, this time by former head of Fatah military intelligence Colonel 'ATTALLAH 'ATTALLAH. King Husayn also made revisions in the structure of the Jordanian parliament (increasing the number of West Bank seats) and to Jordan's electoral law. When Fatah criticized these moves as contrary to the PLO's status as sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, Jordan closed all Fatah offices in the country and deported a number of cadres (including Khalil al-Wazir).

By the fall of 1986, such developments, coupled with external mediation, led to active discussions between the major Palestinian groups on convening a new session of the PNC. In March, Fatah, the PFLP, DFLP, PALESTINE COMMUNIST PARTY (for the first time permitted to join the PLO), and ARAB LIBERATION FRONT agreed in Tunis to convene a meeting of the PNC the following month. On 20 April 1987, the eighteenth session of the Palestine National Council opened in Algiers with the participation of all groups except SA'IQA, the PALESTINE POPULAR STRUGGLE FRONT, and the PFLP GENERAL COMMAND. Political differences remained, but Arafat pulled the factions together behind a political platform that explicitly adopted the TWO-STATE SOLUTION and negotiations as the means to achieve it, thus laying the foundation for the international diplomacy he pursued over the next six years, culminating in the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

After he was forced to leave Beirut, Arafat's operational base was TUNIS. Most importantly, however, in the post-Lebanon era Arafat gradually shifted his focus from DIASPORA Palestinians, whose main aspiration was to return to those parts of Palestine that had been seized by Israel in 1948, to Gaza and West Bank Palestinians, whose overriding priority was ending the Israeli OCCUPATION and establishing a ministate in the Occupied Territories. His new strategy thus put him on the defensive vis-à-vis Diaspora Palestinians, but it had broad support among the Palestinians living in Gaza and the West Bank.

Despite the many conflicts after 1982, several factors sustained Arafat, enabling him to stay at the helm as the symbol of Palestinian nationalism. The Palestinians needed a leader, and Arafat's charisma, revolutionary past, and tactical skills helped him maintain his primacy within the PLO leadership. Besides evading the long arm of the Israeli MOSSAD and other hostile intelligence services, Arafat survived an Israeli air raid on the PLO headquarters in Tunis in October 1985 and a plane crash in the Libyan desert in April 1992.

Change in Strategy

The INTIFADA, which broke out in December 1987, changed the political equation again and catapulted Arafat to the forefront of regional and international politics. Consequently, Arafat followed a two-pronged strategy. On the one hand, he moved to assume ownership by the PLO of the Intifada. In this context, Israel assassinated Arafat's closest associate, Khalil al-Wazir, in his Tunisian home on 16 April 1988. The PLO outside the West Bank and Gaza provided the strategic framework for the resistance in the Occupied Territories, while grassroots activists in the territories coordinated the day-to-day activities of the uprising. These activists, represented by the United National Leadership of the Uprising, accepted Arafat's leadership but often preferred operational independence. On the other hand, Arafat adopted a more moderate political program as outlined at the eighteenth PNC, hoping to set the stage for a dialogue with the United States as a means to negotiate with Israel.

In this regard, a number of steps stand out as significant aspects of Arafat's strategy. In November 1988, he mobilized all the resources at his disposal to convince the nineteenth PNC, still united, to adopt the PALESTINIAN DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. Together with the political program that accompanied it, the declaration explicitly spelled out the principle of Palestinian statehood, whose source of legitimacy was the UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY PARTITION RESOLUTION 181 (II) OF 1947. This principle, as understood by Arafat in 1988, implied a peaceful settlement with an Israel contained within its pre-1967 borders and a Palestinian state alongside it. On 13 December 1988, the UN General Assembly convened a special session in Geneva to hear Arafat's address after the US State Department had refused him a visa the previous month and thus prevented him from addressing the General Assembly at the UN headquarters in New York.

The day after his speech in Geneva, Arafat stated more explicitly his acceptance of UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242 and reaffirmed his renunciation of TERRORISM and his acceptance of the right of Israel to exist. On the same day, the US government authorized the opening of a "substantive dialogue" with the PLO, which turned out to be rather insubstantive but nevertheless fulfilled one of Arafat's long-held objectives. By the end of the 1980s, Arafat's leadership of the PLO was reconsolidated. His acceptance of a Palestinian state alongside Israel, not as a transitional stage but as a final goal, was now explicit and complete. The "Revolution until Victory" slogan was a thing of the past.

But Arafat's renewed prestige soon dissipated. When Iraq seized KUWAIT on 2 August 1990, Arafat supported Iraq, which led to his and the PLO's isolation in Arab and international politics, loss of financial support, the dispossession of virtually the entire Palestinian community in Kuwait—some 400,000 persons—and ultimately the fiasco of Oslo for Arafat. Although there were reasons for Arafat's decision on Iraq, this was a test of leadership that he failed.

Peace Process

When the October 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE began under the administration of US president GEORGE H. W. BUSH, Arafat's and the PLO's ability to influence events was at its nadir. The PLO was excluded from the conference, and Palestinian participants were vetted by Israeli prime minister YITZHAK SHAMIR, who stipulated that delegates could only come from the West Bank and Gaza—not from Jerusalem and not from the Diaspora—and could not have any affiliation with the PLO, and then could only appear in a joint delegation with Jordan. Nevertheless, Arafat attempted to micromanage from his headquarters in Tunis the delegates' negotiations with Israel.

When secret Israeli-PLO talks commenced in NORWAY in 1993, Arafat directed the Palestinian team that conducted the negotiations. The DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP), the foundation of the OSLO ACCORDS, was approved by Arafat and consummated on the White House lawn when he shook hands with Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN. Portrayed by some as a watershed and an unprecedented breakthrough in the history of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and conceived at the nadir of Arafat's and the PLO's power, the Oslo Accords contained the seeds of the destruction of any hope for Palestinian self-determination in a viable, independent Palestinian state on the West Bank and Gaza with East Jerusalem as its capital. Had Arafat been less anxious to redeem himself, he might have sought expert examination of the document before signing on. What is more, the DOP in effect negated the right of return for the REFUGEES, the very fodder of all Arafat's previous canons. Indeed, the Diaspora was sacrificed on the altar of Arafat's return to Palestine.

Palestinian National Authority

The final phase of Yasir Arafat's leadership of Palestinian politics was as president of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, to which he was elected by hopeful residents of the Occupied Territories. The PNA institutions that Arafat helped create were dominated by his trusted followers. Arafat continued to put a particularly high premium on political loyalty, and the echelons from among whom he filled senior PNA positions were largely Fatah people loyal to him. Loyalty also determined the selection process. Thus the best qualified and most capable Palestinians did not reach the top political and administrative posts. Moreover, many of Arafat's appointees were corrupt. Additionally, to an unprecedented degree, Arafat concentrated power in his own hands, and he used various methods of political and economic control as well as outright repression of dissent to maintain a tight grip on every aspect of PNA affairs. Further, Arafat tolerated corrupt practices and human rights violations in the areas that came under his control. As a result, the question of political reform became a top priority for Palestinian intellectuals and political activists in the Occupied Territories.

In the latter part of the 1990s, the dream of creating an independent Palestinian state was still far from being realized. The status of Palestinian refugees was clearly not going to be resolved in a manner favorable to the refugees. The Palestinian economy deteriorated precipitously during the Oslo years, primarily as a result of Israeli-imposed CLOSURE of the West Bank and Gaza, but Arafat, bound by the Oslo Accords, was impotent to help his people. Worse, Israeli SETTLEMENTS IN THE WEST BANK were expanding. Perhaps Arafat's single most important act of leadership in the context of Oslo was his refusal to capitulate to President Clinton and Prime Minister EHUD BARAK at the July 2000 CAMP DAVID SUMMIT. BARAK'S GENEROUS OFFER would have sealed the fate of the Palestinians, banished them from international concern, and left unfulfilled even their most minimal objectives.

By March 2002, the OSLO PROCESS was finished, Israel had reoccupied the West Bank and Gaza, and Arafat was under virtual house arrest at his compound in Ramallah, which was almost totally destroyed and encircled by Israeli forces. Israeli security sources claimed that Palestinians who carried out suicide attacks were hiding in Arafat's compound, and the Israeli army periodically cut off water and electricity to the compound. In September 2002, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 1435, in which it demanded that Israel immediately cease measures in and around Ramallah, "including the destruction of Palestinian civilian and security infrastructure." Yet, as of late 2004, Arafat continued to be under total lockdown by the Israeli military.

On 24 June 2002, US president GEORGE W. BUSH declared that peace between the Palestinians and the Israelis required a new and different Palestinian leadership, and absent that, the United States would not support the establishment of a Palestinian state. Bush called on the Palestinian people to elect "new leaders who are not compromised by terror" and to build democratic institutions capable of reaching new security arrangements with their neighbors. On 30 June 2002, US secretary of state COLIN POWELL said on ABC's This Week that the US government did not think that Arafat could use his leadership position and his moral authority to end terror and implement the reform measures outlined in the Bush speech.

On several occasions, Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON recommended to his security cabinet that Arafat be expelled, and several highly placed Israeli officials called for his assassination. To pursue its stated policy of marginalizing and ultimately replacing Arafat, the Bush administration sent Assistant Secretary of State William Burns to Europe as well as to Arab countries. One of the principal stated aims of Burns's visits was to convince US allies in Europe and the Arab world to find a way that would allow the Palestinian people to replace Arafat and reform their political and economic institutions.

Like Israel, the Bush administration continued to blame Arafat for the failure of Camp David (11–14 July 2000), the AL-AQSA INTIFADA (28 September 2000), and the US-sponsored efforts to stop the violence between Israelis and Palestinians, including the GEORGE J. MITCHELL plan (30 April 2001), the GEORGE TENET plan (13 June 2001), and the ROAD MAP (30 April 2003).

On 15 April 2004, President Bush gave a major speech that tilted far in the direction of Ariel Sharon's policies, which the Sharon government, not unreasonably, felt gave it a "green light" to do what it wished regarding Arafat and the Palestinians, including the ASSASSINATION of Palestinian leaders. Arafat now found himself under intense pressure from several directions. Besides the US and Israeli efforts to render him irrelevant, there was intense Palestinian pressure for political and economic reform and for an end to cronyism, nepotism, and corruption. Even Fatah, Arafat's traditional power base, was now split, and new Fatah factions were challenging Arafat and the OLD GUARD for control of the movement. These included a group led by MUHAMMAD DAHLAN, a security chief who wielded a relatively significant degree of power in Gaza and viewed himself as a legitimate successor of Arafat. Another group consisted of the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, originally organized by Arafat but now operating independently and unwilling to submit to Arafat's control. Mainstream Fatah was also becoming problematic for Arafat. As a consequence of Oslo, it had lost a substantial degree of its power, and its influence over Palestinian society and politics was significantly decreased. Thus individuals and small cliques were taking it upon themselves to establish power bases and initiate action. Finally, Arafat had to contend with HAMAS; although Hamas did not publicly challenge Arafat's authority, its campaign of SUICIDE BOMBINGS gave Sharon and the Bush administration a credible pretext that enabled them to put the blame for the suicide attacks on Arafat himself.

Totally isolated and neutralized by a hostile Israel and an antagonistic US administration, there was little prospect for Arafat to regain the international credentials and the mandate that had enabled him to be, for roughly seven years, a quasi-partner in the peace process. Indeed, Arafat's political future as well as his ability to fulfill the national demands of the Palestinians seemed to lie less in his hands than in the hands of much more powerful players in Washington and Tel Aviv.

Yasir Arafat died on 11 November 2004 at the age of seventy-five. Though in his final days he was taken to a Paris hospital for treatment, the cause of his death has never been identified. Many speculate that he was poisoned, but to date no proof has emerged.

It is difficult to sum up the life of such a man. It was filled with contrasts: from a man in a military cell in Kuwait advocating armed resistance to a diplomat at the United Nations who was respected on the international scene; from a long and bitter war with Israel to sharing of the Nobel Peace Prize with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister SHIMON PERES; from marriage to the Palestine cause to marriage in 1991 to Suha al-Tawil (1963–), an urbane Christian Palestinian woman who was almost thirty-five years his junior and with whom he had a daughter, Zahwa, in 1995. It is still possible to ask, "Who was Yasir Arafat?" He was a Palestinian patriot in an age of pan-Arabism; a dreamer who wanted to liberate all of Palestine when the Arab states, whose support he needed, were looking for ways to reach a compromise settlement with Israel; a pragmatist in a period during which the forces of radicalism were on the rise; and an auto-crat in a society with democratic aspirations. This, however, does not begin to scratch the surface.

Arafat's greatest personal success was catalyzing the reemergence of Palestinian nationalism and leading the nationalist movement for some thirty-five years. Indeed, Yasir Arafat was the symbol of Palestinian nationalism, and no one else ever came near that status. That he was ultimately unsuccessful is due more to the nature and power of his enemy and its backer than to his own personal failings.

In conclusion, Hussein Agha and Robert Malley, two renowned historians and diplomats, had the following to say about Arafat in May 2007: "Yasir Arafat took it [the Palestinian National Movement] over and molded it in his image over four decades ago. . . . Arafat achieved what, before him, was the stuff of unachievable dreams and after him, has become the object of wistful nostalgia: the identification of man and nation; the transcendence of party politics; and the expression of a tacit, unspoken consensus.

"Competing organizations, leftist and Islamist in particular, challenged him. He faced opposition and dissent within his own Fatah. One after another, Arab countries sought to bend the nationalist movement to their will. But by dint of hard work, personal charisma, and political acumen, and assisted in no small measure by the steady accumulation and astute use of arms and funds, Arafat managed to control Fatah, co-opt the leftists, keep the Islamists at bay and the Arab states at arm's length.

"Arafat never bothered with a detailed program. He trusted his instincts and inclinations, that disputed and contested as they were, . . . became those of the national movement as a whole. As both leader of the national movement and father of the political compromise, he could straddle two seemingly incompatible worlds, that of the revolutionary and that of the statesman, and embody both steadfast commitment to the original struggle of 1948 and pragmatic acceptance of a two state solution. On core issues, what he did mattered far more than what he said. Accused of indecisiveness and passivity, Arafat acted resolutely when he believed it necessary and when he saw fit."

Bibliography

Abu Iyad, with Eric Rouleau. My Home My Land. New York: Times Books, 1981.

- Agha, Hussein, and Robert Malley. "Camp David: The Tragedy of Errors." The New York Review of Books. 48:13 (9 August 2001).
- . "The Road from Mecca." The New York Review of Books. 54:8 (10 May 2007).
- Brand, Laurie A. Palestinians in the Arab World: Institution Building and the Search for State. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Growers, Andrew, and Tony Walker. Behind the Myth: Yasir Arafat and the Palestinian Revolution. London: Corgi Books, 1990.
- Hart, Alan. Arafat: A Political Biography. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- . Arafat: Terrorist or Peacemaker? Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984.
- Hirst, David. The Gun and the Olive Branch. London: Faber and Faber, 1977.
- Kelman, Herbert. "Talk to Arafat." Foreign Policy. 49 (Winter 1982–1983).
- Khalidi, Rashid. Under Siege: P.L.O. Decision Making during the 1982 War. New York: Columbia University Press, 1986.
- Khalidi, Walid. Conflict and Violence in Lebanon: Confrontation in the Middle East. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1979.
- Kiernan, Thomas. Arafat: The Man and the Myth. New York: W. W. Norton, 1976.
- Lesch, Ann Moseley. Political Perceptions of the Palestinians on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Washington, DC: Middle East Institute, 1980.
- Makovsky, David. Making Peace with the PLO: The Rabin Government's Road to the Oslo Accord. Washington, DC: Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1996.
- Mattar, Philip. "The PLO and the Gulf Crisis." Middle East Journal. 48:1 (1994).
- Muslih, Muhammad. Toward Coexistence: An Analysis of the Resolutions of the Palestine National Council. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1990.
- Ross, Dennis. "Taking Stock: The Bush Administration and the Roadmap to Peace." National Interest. Fall 2003.
- Ross, Dennis, and Gidi Grinstein. "Camp David: An Exchange." The New York Review of Books. 48:14 (20 September 2001).
- Rubin, Barry M., and Judith Colp Rubin. Yasir Arafat: A Political Biography. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Rubinstein, Danny. The Mystery of Arafat. South Royalton, VT: Steerforth Press, 1995.
- Sayigh, Rosemary. Too Many Enemies: The Palestinian Experience in Lebanon. London: Zed Books, 1994.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

- Wallach, Janet, and John Wallach. Arafat: In the Eyes of the Beholder. New York: Lyle Stuart, 1990.
- Ya'ari, Ehud. Strike Terror: The Story of Fatah. New York: Sabra, 1970.

—Muhammad Muslih

Archaeology

Archaeology is not merely a decorative thread in the pattern of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict; it has contributed significantly to that pattern and in the process has itself been patterned by the conflict. As throughout Asia and Africa, archaeology in Palestine originated with the spread of European influence into the OTTOMAN EMPIRE. In the nineteenth century, archaeology was done by Europeans, enabled by European officials (frequently archaeologist and political official were one and the same), and the results were published and displayed for European readers and viewers.

Thus from the outset, archaeology was a subset of imperialism, linked to the politics of power. As a component of cultural imperialism, archaeology has shared in the cycle of conflict running from the age of empire through the wars of independence to the assertion of cultural self-sufficiency and local, non-European identity. The role of archaeology changed with the political fortunes of Palestine, through the late Ottoman era to the BRITISH MANDATE, Israeli independence, Jordanian and Egyptian control of the WEST BANK and GAZA, the Israeli OCCUPATION, and the post-Oslo Palestinian National Authority. During this same time the theory and practice of archaeology changed dramatically worldwide as the discipline matured. However, what sites were studied, what and how one dug, and what was saved and displayed were all distinctively shaped by the circumstances of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Thus the history of archaeology in Palestine can be traced through local labels—imperial, biblical, Israeli, Syro-Palestinian, and Palestinian—as well as through the theoretical cycle of international academic archaeology.

Late Ottoman Era, 1830–1921

Holy Land Travelers and Their Art. Archaeology in Palestine began with the "rediscovery" of the Holy Land by European travelers in the nineteenth century as Europe extended its influence into the Ottoman Empire. These travelers came with the blessings of their governments and depicted Palestine's Christian historical sites for believers back home.

Among the most impressive and popular are the lithographs of David Roberts, produced from sketches made during an extensive tour of the Holy Land in 1838–1839. His art portrayed a landscape of exotic antiquities, always framed by colorfully dressed native Arabs lounging languidly at the ruins. In his travel diary he described the locations he visited in terms of biblical toponyms, with scarcely any reference to the modern geographic, cultural, and social contexts of the sites he was sketching. The result, amplified by his romantic style, is a dream world of a timeless biblical and exotic past disconnected from the present. The living people of the nineteenth century are virtually never mentioned in the diary. In his artistic vision of Palestine they exist only as props in his “biblical” landscapes.

Similarly, Christian missionaries' reports on the colorful costumes of Palestinian villagers served mainly to help congregations back home visualize how the contemporaries of Moses and Jesus might have looked. Serious ethnological study of Palestinian culture did not begin until the Mandate era. However even foundational research like Hilma Granqvist's 1920s study of wedding customs in a Palestinian village was done then in the context of biblical archaeology, for the express purpose of learning about the women of the Old Testament.

This incipient biblical archaeology was closely linked to imperial designs. An example is Lieutenant William Francis Lynch's 1848 expedition to the Jordan River and the Dead Sea, which was authorized by US president James Polk. Lynch's goals were simultaneously a scientific exploration of the biblical landscape, imperial US naval exercises down the Jordan and across the Dead Sea, and an economic expansion of US cotton markets. The Palestinians inhabiting the land were portrayed as uncouth barbarians. Lynch's publication of his exotic biblical-imperial adventure became as popular in the United States as Roberts's art was in Europe.

This linkage of biblical heritage and imperial destiny became universal in the West, as Dutch theologian Abraham Kuyper's 1905–1906 visit to the Holy Land illustrates. He noted that “the landscape, now in ruined ugliness and awaiting development by European Jewish and Christian colonists, is nevertheless testimony to its Bible-era splendor, only a dim reflection of God's spiritual promises and deeds.” In the bright light of God's holiness that is manifested in biblical texts, the actual history of the people of Palestine becomes insignificant to Kuyper. He contrasts the present natives—without gumption and guilty of the ruin of the land—with the energetic population of biblical Israel that, with God's blessing, made Palestine a paradise of fertility.

Early Archaeology in Palestine. In the late nineteenth century, Western archaeological societies began working in the area, among them the British Palestine Exploration Fund (PEF) in 1865 and the American Palestine Exploration Society in 1870 (the forerunner of the American Schools of Oriental Research founded in 1900). The foundational work of the PEF can serve as a model for their activities.

After a meticulous archaeological cartography and survey (1872–1878), in 1890 the PEF initiated scientific field excavations at Tell el-Hesi/Lachish, where Sir Flinders Petrie pioneered the ceramic typology of Palestine. The surveyors, Claude Conder and Herbert Kitchener, produced The Survey of Western Palestine, and their maps played key roles in the British defeat of the Ottoman imperial armies of the Levant and served to establish the Palestine Mandate boundary in 1921.

Conder and Kitchener's comprehensive survey described functioning settlements under “Topography,” listing the settlements as containing this many stone houses and that many mud ones. When available, population statistics were given in terms of religious affiliation (Muslim, Druze, Christian, or Jewish) rather than as Palestinian or Arab, even though the surveyors called the map region “Palestine” and the people spoke Arabic. Under “Ancient sites” and “Archaeology,” mostly pre-Islamic sites were subdivided as “Biblical” and “Non-biblical,” with an obvious focus on biblical topography.

As was true everywhere, military engineers engaged in meticulous mapping to serve the political and cultural purposes of the empire. In this case, these explorations were not “discovery” but “recovery”—the detailed restoration in maps of the biblical landscape already known in other ways among English Christians. From the outset archaeology relegated Palestine's Arab population to historical, cultural, and political oblivion. As the land was abstracted in art and maps, so its population was removed from reality. The peasants became rustic fossils, exemplars but not inheritors of biblical culture, a people without a history of their own but caught between other histories: that of the biblical past and that of the Christian imperial present. As Nadia Abu el-Haj has explained it, archaeology created the impression that the real knowledge of Palestine, recovered by the “science” of archaeology, lay buried below the surface. Though this landscape was still called “Palestine,” in the archaeological imagination it was not the land of the living Palestinians but of past biblical and non-biblical peoples. This stereotype had a long life.

Period of the British Mandate, 1921–1947

Biblical Archaeology. During the Palestine Mandate under British political oversight, biblical archaeology flourished under the auspices of various foreign institutes but was largely influenced by the activities of the American Schools of Oriental Research (ASOR) and the brilliant scholarship of W. F. Albright. From 1928 to 1936 Albright excavated a number of Palestinian tells (mounds composed of the remains of successive settlements), such as Tell Beit Mirsim southwest of HEBRON, to delineate the history of the biblical Israelites from that of the ancient Canaanites. Using rigorous analysis he refined the typology of pottery so that it was presumed possible to identify sites as Israelite based on the presence of “Israelite” pottery in the strata. This served to confirm “scientifically” the “essential historicity” of Israel that Christians had previously accepted on faith from the Bible.

In his own era Albright oversaw and encouraged the excavation of major sites, including Tell el-Ful (Gibeah) and Tell Balatah (Shechem/Nablus), which became benchmarks in the superimposition of a biblical landscape on the map of Palestine. Over two generations of scholars—Americans beginning with Nelson Glueck and Israelis beginning with Eliezer Sukenik—followed his lead, which became known as the Albright School. There was scarcely a Palestinian among them.

Considering the entire geographic sphere of southwest Asia as the realm of “biblical” archaeology, Albright published a comprehensive synthesis, From the Stone Age to Christianity, in 1940. In a classic orientalist vein, he saw as the engine of history an “organismic” evolution from “undifferentiated to differentiated cultures” in a series of stages culminating in the “Progressive World Sweep of the West.” According to Albright’s perspective, the biblical stage, that is, the archaeological distinctiveness and cultural superiority of the Israelites, provided an unflinching rationale for the defeat and extermination of the Canaanites—an archaeologically demonstrated survival of the fittest. The book undoubtedly helped enshrine the centrality of ancient Israel’s history among Western secular Christian and Judaic intellectuals. It has also fed anti-Palestinian biases in the dominant Western evaluation, which saw their “failure” against the Israeli armies as analogous to that of the ancient Canaanites.

Local Archaeology. The articles of the British Mandate of Palestine in 1921 stipulated and defined British authority over the antiquities of Palestine. Although the British civil administration ensured equal representation of Jews and Palestinians in its new Department of Antiquities and set up the British School of Archaeology in JERUSALEM for creating a pool of experienced local archaeologists, in over twenty-five years of Mandate rule no formal training was given to Palestinian Arabs. This left them completely unprepared for the development of a local Palestinian archaeology at the end of the Mandate.

On the other hand, when the League of Nations awarded Palestine to Britain in 1921, the Jewish Palestine Exploration Society (JPES), founded in 1914, was ready to begin its own program of excavations. In 1928 Eliezer Sukenik, trained and educated under the patronage of Albright and ASOR, became the first head of the Department of Archaeology at Hebrew University. Thus, the JEWISH AGENCY had a structure and a functioning archaeology program in place when the British left in 1948.

Ironically, the original Zionist movement ignored archaeology, preferring a more nationalist-secular identification of a modern Jewish state rather than the biblical archaeology mode of Western Christians. That attitude began to change during the Mandate for three reasons. First, Albright’s research-based scheme of cultural evolution was not narrowly sectarian and could lend itself to a more secular-nationalist belief structure. Second, as the new Jewish immigrants settled into their agricultural labors, their own identity with the land, merely abstract in earlier ZIONISM, became tangible. Third, JPES programs brought together these first two factors in its excavations—for example, the discovery of Byzantine-era synagogues and the Hebraization/Judaization of place-names, which were used in preparation of a Hebrew map of the land. Thus the Land of Palestine, or the Holy Land, became Eretz Yisrael in the minds of the Jewish settlers, and the results of biblical archaeology were borrowed for the construction of modern Israel's national epic.

Israeli Statehood and Israeli, Jordanian, and Egyptian Authority over the Antiquities of Palestine, 1947–1967

The Destroyed Villages. After the expulsion and flight of some 750,000 Palestinians in the 1948 WAR, approximately 400 vacated villages and towns, mostly in the coastal plain and the Galilee, were destroyed by Israel. Since the 1980s these ruins, often the top stratum in a deep cultural sequence of habitation, have been the subject of an archaeological study and mapping project by Palestinian geographers and the Documentation Center of Birzeit University.

Though some villages have disappeared completely under plowed soil and others have Israeli SETTLEMENTS built over them, many remain as robbed-out ruins in overgrown wooded areas; the quadrated-limestone wall-faces were quarried for reuse in neighboring Israeli settlements. Some, like the former Palestinian village of 'Amwas (ancient Emmaus), have been recycled into parks for Israeli picnickers. 'Amwas was transformed into Canada Park—in honor of the Canadian donors—by planting over the site with pine trees and placing picnic tables at the old village spring. Although nothing in the park signage indicates that it was once 'Amwas, the retainer walls used to groom the slopes are made of the limestone masonry that once served as faces for the village house-walls and originally adorned the Roman and Byzantine-era buildings of the ancient town of Emmaus. In season, ripe clusters of grapes protrude from the pines, and Sabr cacti poke through the needle-covered ground, a living stratum of 'Amwas's agricultural life.

Creating the Map of Israel. To create an official national map, Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION appointed cartography committees in 1949 to produce names for all map locations and features. From the outset it was understood that the landscape would be labeled with Hebrew names only, which would recall or emulate the biblical toponymy as much as possible. The basic data available were the old PEF cartography of Conder and Kitchener, which had been made for the express purpose of recording the archaeological landscape of Palestine. Already used for British field strategy in World War I, this map now became a nation-building instrument.

The process of replacing the Arab names, described by both MERON BENVENISTI and Nadia Abu el-Haj, was done according to several criteria: biblical names where sites could be identified with the biblical text, translation of Arab names into Hebrew, reproduction of the sounds of the Arab name in Hebrew, and commemoration of a modern event or person. Much of this was arbitrary, even for the selection of biblical site names, because in most instances the archaeological information for ancient site names was—and still is—insufficient or absent. Though the resulting map has the ring of biblical geography, it is actually misleading, especially to Jewish and Christian Holy Land pilgrims from overseas.

The erasure of the traditional Arab names from the maps not only destroyed their potential archaeological value but also the memory of Palestinian-Arab connections with the land. Although the naming committees discussed the implications of that, they saw the landscape of the new Israel as directly connected to that of ancient Israel and therefore considered the Arab names irrelevant. Besides, most sites under discussion were now empty of Arabs because of the dispossession of some 750,000 Palestinians in 1948. In the north and west of the country, this entailed mostly the destroyed villages. In the south, however—the Negev and Arabah—the mostly BEDOUIN Arab population was seen in the popular settler anthropology of the time not merely as disconnected from the land by its nomadic culture but as having rejected the land by not settling on it as agriculturalists.

Archaeology and Nationalism. After independence, the nation of newcomers still in search of symbols latched onto archaeology with such passion that it became the national pastime for several decades. Israeli archaeologists of this period became national heroes, with academic careers embedded in national politics, their exploits emulated as a national sport, and the sites they excavated enshrined in the national identity. Thus archaeology matured at one level as an academic discipline in the Israeli universities but at another level as the shaper of the modern Israeli national myth in which the epic events of biblical antiquity became reflexive symbols of the formative events of the new country.

The career of YIGAL YADIN exemplifies this process. His archaeology was driven by a brilliant sense of history, faith in the historicity of biblical events, meticulous field discipline, a flair for dramatic press releases, dynamic public lectures, and scintillating publications assured and confident of his conclusions. This brilliant career in archaeology also contained periods of military command and government service as deputy prime minister, as Israel moved from war to war. The intertwining of these two careers helped blur the distinction between antiquity and the present in the formation of Israelis' national self-identity.

The excavations he conducted all focused on the history of ancient Israel and early Judaism and emulated the legacy of biblical archaeology. For Yadin and his contemporaries, archaeology was the study of the sites of conquest and First and Second Israelite Temples. Rather than being Arab sites, Hazor gave proof of the historicity of Joshua's defeat of the Canaanites and Megiddo reflected Solomon's glory. In 1960, upon his team's discovery of the famous Bar Kokhba correspondence in the Cave of Letters, he announced his find as a cache of letters written by "the last president of Israel eighteen hundred years ago," with the current president of Israel in the audience.

This flair for implanting archaeology into the national psyche peaked with the excavations of the Herodian palace-fortress of Masada. As Silberman put it in a masterly biography of Yadin, "The drama of the Masada excavations and the virtuoso brilliance with which Yadin conveyed the discoveries to the public made the project as much an exercise in patriotic inspiration as in scientific research." Yadin did not doubt that the excavations demonstrated the famous suicidal last stand of the Jewish rebels against Rome as told by the historian Josephus. Silberman ended his popular book on Masada with the statement that Israeli soldiers swear to their service that Masada will never fall again, with the oath "Four thousand years of your own history looks down on you!"

At the 1957 annual convention of the Israel Exploration Society, 1,500 persons showed up to hear Yadin lecture on the historical veracity of the fall of Hazor to Joshua's Israelite army. Other Israeli academics challenged him and in the end have carried the day, but to the lay members of the society, the school teachers, and young people who volunteered on his projects he was a hero, and Israeli archaeology had become civic religion. To US Christians it reinforced the belief that the founding of the modern state of Israel was a fulfillment of God's promises and strengthened their unreserved siding with Israel in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Palestinian Archaeology Subsumed under Jordan and Egypt. During the 1948–1967 armistice years, antiquities in the West Bank and Gaza were managed by the Departments of Antiquity in JORDAN and EGYPT, respectively. One might have expected that a viable Palestinian archaeology—the study of the material cultural heritage of the current Palestinian population—could now flourish in areas under direct Arab control (rather than British or Jewish). That did not happen for two reasons.

First, in the nineteenth century, the central preoccupation of Western archaeological inquiry into the biblical landscape was engaged under the rubric "Archaeology of Palestine." This master story evolved into the "Archaeology of Israel," which in the fervor of nation building became "Israeli archaeology." Both Israeli and international archaeologists (working in Israel and Jordan, including the West Bank) were so caught up in these two master stories involving the histories of Palestine from the Bronze Age to Byzantine period that they failed to pay attention to later Islamic and Palestinian material remains. Such a critical mass of scholarly energy was spent on specific archaeological problems of the Bronze and Iron Ages (for example, determining the historicity of the Exodus and the Conquest and dating the Davidic and Israelite monarchies) that little mental space was left for anything else. At scholarly conferences such biblical issues were popular and relevant, while topics in later archaeological periods were not.

Second, the management of Palestinian antiquities in the West Bank and Gaza was not administered by Palestinians themselves but by Jordanian and Egyptian bureaucracies that gave priority to archaeology on the East Bank and in the Nile Valley. Jordan especially was preoccupied with management of its very large and complex archaeological heritage in the transition from British tutelage to independent administration. Besides, Jordan inherited the larger responsibility of overseeing and maintaining the historic Islamic sites of the West Bank, especially the AL-HARAM ASH-

SHARIF (the Noble Sanctuary to Muslims and the Har Ha-Bayit or Temple Mount to Jews) in Jerusalem, a challenge at once archaeological, religious, and political. Under Jordanian administration Western archaeologists undertook major projects in the West Bank under the auspices of foreign institutes such as ASOR (Tell Ti'inih/Ta'anach and Tell Balatah/Shechem), the British School (Tell Sultan/JERICHO), and the École Biblique (Qumran) in Jerusalem in the intellectual atmosphere described.

Kathleen Kenyon's excavations at Tel Sultan/Jericho in the 1950s, famous for their refinement of stratigraphic excavation methods, had two direct impacts on the relationship of archaeology to modern cultural issues. Her discovery of neolithic Jericho contributed to the broadening of archaeologists' intellectual horizons beyond Israelite history and back to the Stone Age, and the demonstrated absence of Joshua's notorious walls challenged archaeology's role in the affirmation of literal readings of the Bible and contradicted Yadin's interpretation of Hazor's destruction.

The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls in 1946 and the subsequent excavation of the Qumran Caves by the École Biblique in 1949 triggered perhaps the most famous and most important instance of the influence of archaeology on nationalism. Father Roland de Vaux's interpretations of the site as a monastic sectarian Judaic scroll-writing community served to bolster the Israeli national epic. And Yadin's role in the black-market acquisition of major Dead Sea Scrolls for Israel is a major factor contributing to his aura of archaeological heroism.

Archaeology in and under Occupation, 1967–2005

The Occupation of East Jerusalem after June 1967 provided access to a host of sites of great religious and sentimental value to Israel. In traditional archaeology this involved efforts to recover the environs of the Old City, for example, the "City of David" and the "Pool of Siloam" (at SILWAN). But archaeology took a backseat to nationalism and religion in the destruction of the Arab Moroccan Quarter in order to create a prayer area at the WESTERN WALL and in the clearing and opening of an ancient sewage tunnel as a tourist passage connecting to the north side of the al-Haram ash-Sharif in 1996. This competition for sacred architecture is a major dimension of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, in which the role of sacred architecture as part of the arsenal for national legitimacy has been as basic to historic conflicts over Jerusalem as bedrock is to landscape. Israel also immediately took over the Palestine Archaeological Museum—The Rockefeller Museum—and moved the Dead Sea Scrolls to the Shrine of the Book at the Israel Museum in West Jerusalem, which had been inaugurated in 1965.

With the Occupation of the West Bank, the traditional geography of the biblical monarchies was now accessible to Israeli archaeologists. Although excavation of sites under Occupation was in violation of the Geneva Convention, Israeli archaeologists Israel Finkelstein and Adam Zertal took the opportunity to do major surveys of the "hill country," the West Bank north of Jerusalem. Though Finkelstein's methods were more technically correct, Adam Zertal walked the land with Hebrew Bible in hand. As Palestinian archaeologists later discovered in their own survey of Wadi el-Far'a, he overlooked numerous Islamic (non-biblical) sites. These two projects were representative of the intense Israeli survey and excavation archaeology in the West Bank and Gaza until the OSLO ACCORDS.

Palestinian Archaeology. After the Israeli Occupation of the West Bank, foreign archaeologists based in East Jerusalem were cut off from projects east of the Jordan River and were forced to move their operating base to Amman, Jordan. This resulted in the opening of several archaeological institutes in Amman, such as the American Center of Oriental Research (ACOR). As foreigners shifted their energies to Jordan and continued working in Israel, virtually no foreign-organized archaeology was done in the West Bank and Gaza. This left a vacuum that was filled by the beginnings of the modern archeology of Palestine and helped develop a Palestinian archaeology as a means of recovering self-identity in the Palestinian material heritage.

Though Palestinians themselves have become the major players, much credit for the initiative goes to the accomplishments of US archaeologist Albert Glock, whose story is both heroic and tragic. A seminary graduate who began fieldwork at Tell Balatah and Tell Ti'inih in the Albright tradition, he became aware after the 1967 WAR of the lack of connection between the research goals of traditional excavations of tell sites in Israel/Palestine and the material and cultural heritage of the living people of Palestine. So while other foreigners shifted to projects elsewhere, Glock stayed to adapt his research goals to the recovery of Palestine's history, that is, to initiate a distinctly Palestinian archaeology. To achieve this he joined the faculty of BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY to teach archaeology in 1976 and was the driving force behind Birzeit's founding of the Palestinian Institute of Archaeology in 1986.

Although Glock continued to apply the rigorous methods of his Albright background, he reversed the traditional chronological sequencing by working backward from the present to maintain the immediacy of the connection between the living and the material past. Thus he took his students back to Ti'inich, not to resume work on Iron and Bronze Age strata of the tell, but to perform a detailed ethnographic survey in the adjacent Palestinian village and work from there back to the late Ottoman era represented by recently abandoned village houses. His death in 1992 by gunshot in the yard of a student's family—a murder that remains unsolved—put a tragic end to this passionate project, but his legacy lives in his own achievements and in the ongoing work of his students and in other major work on the Palestinian cultural heritage, for example Palestinian textiles and embroidery.

Oslo Accords and After. The Oslo Accords of 1993/1995 included provisions for Palestinian administration of antiquities and an Israeli turnover of sites, artifacts, and records. Though the first produced the Palestinian Department of Antiquities and Cultural Heritage within the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY's new Ministry of Tourism in 1994, the second was not fully achieved.

The Palestinian Department of Antiquities was given the mandate of developing a list of 50 major archaeological sites under its jurisdiction for archaeological management and site development planning. Under the able leadership of archaeologists Hamdan Taha as director general in Ramallah and Mu'in Sadeq as director of the Gaza office, the department has been able to muster international financial and intellectual support and in 2005 published an inventory of 20 Palestinian national heritage sites in cooperation with UNESCO (UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization). Strikingly, the inventory is described as "sites of potential universal value in Palestine" rather than as sites of only Palestinian heritage. The list includes sites such as Qumran, which are especially precious to the Israeli/Jewish cultural heritage.

The difficulty with turnover is illustrated by the status of the Dead Sea Scrolls. Although the Palestinians claim the right to the scrolls by virtue of their discovery within the West Bank, the Israelis have remodeled the Shrine of the Book to showcase them. A contentious atmosphere developed from the outset: The Israeli Antiquities Authority conducted Operation Scroll in 1993, a hasty scramble to discover any additional scroll materials before implementation of the Oslo Accords could occur. The Palestinians considered this plundering of archaeological areas under their jurisdiction, while Israelis argued it was retrieval of artifacts belonging to Israel by virtue of their heritage value.

Palestinian archaeology has also flourished in the private sector. Good archaeology programs, including field schools, are now available at major Palestinian universities and are training a new generation of Palestinian archaeologists who complete their graduate work in Western universities. A geography program at Birzeit, chaired by Professor Kamal Abdulfattah, has given graduates a familiarity with archaeological sites in their own landscapes, that is, the village environments of their childhoods. Immense efforts are also under way to record and preserve the traditional architecture of Palestinian town and country. RIWAQ, Centre for Architectural Conservation, in Ramallah, for example, produces publications and does restoration work. All of these activities constitute a Palestinian archaeology in service of preserving and developing Palestinian heritage and identity.

As is true in Israel, the urgency of archaeological work in Palestine is driven by the rapid destruction of the traditional landscape. The main causes are the domestic housing boom serving the rapid population growth among the indigenous Palestinians and the immigrating Israeli SETTLERS, which has cities like Ramallah and SETTLEMENTS like MA'ALE ADUMIM exploding across the landscape. Additionally, the massive destruction inflicted by Israel during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA has had devastating consequences for Palestinian archaeology. For example, some specific remains, such as the Byzantine ruins of St. Barbara at Aboud, were blown up in 2002 in individual acts of violence. The construction of the BARRIER (Al-Jidar in Arabic) around the West Bank, in addition, involves the systematic destruction of huge acreeges. Archaeologist Jamal Barghout, in a statistical survey using GIS analysis, estimated that 596 archaeological sites are located within 200 meters of the Barrier that presumably have been destroyed in the clearing of this 450-mile long strip of land.

Present and Future. As world archaeology became more theoretically disciplined, the archaeology of Palestine and Israel has conformed, albeit reluctantly. Although yet far from institutionalized, the situation is starting to change, as Israeli archaeologists such as Israel Finkelstein and historians such as Keith Whitelam (of the Copenhagen School) have used reinterpretations of archaeological and textual evidence to counter the traditional hegemonic stories. Increasingly archaeologists now recognize their field with broader terms like “Syro-Palestinian” in place of “biblical” archaeology. And ASOR changed the title of its popular journal, Biblical Archaeologist, to Near Eastern Archaeology in 1998 to reflect the broader foci of its articles, which now range from the Stone Age to late Arabic and Islamic cultures of the region, including MAMLUK and Ottoman Palestine.

Because the new interpretations challenge myths of the Israeli national epic, archaeology has lost popularity in the Israeli streets, though it flourishes in academia and continues to inspire tourism. In a sense, Palestinian archaeologists were fortunate to begin later and have been able to move directly into the international pool of archaeological academic theory. It is increasingly possible for Israeli and Palestinian archaeologists to come together on the level of theory. While Palestinians in the tradition of Glock deal with Bible-era layers seriously when they occur, Israeli archaeologists have also become serious about the Late Ottoman and Palestinian strata. Thus, an Israeli ceramist like Miriam Avissar and a Palestinian ceramist like Hamed Salem, both specialists in Ottoman pottery, can share and abet each other’s research on this academic level.

Could archaeologists add their diverse Palestinian and Israeli voices to a common archaeological project? Sandra Scham and Adel Yahya recently led a series of workshops to discuss the possibilities for such an approach. They agreed that “how Israelis and Palestinians can deal with their intertwined and largely violent histories” can come “only through adopting a common narrative and understanding.” Given that this still requires too huge a “leap of faith and imagination,” they set a more realistic goal for their joint efforts: “to move toward a reflexive reconciliation, it is necessary to acknowledge the imperfections of our own narratives without fully rejecting them.”

See also CHRISTIANITY

Bibliography

- Abdulfattah, Kamal, and Wolf Dieter Hütteroth. Historical Geography of Palestine, Transjordan and Southern Syria in the Late 16th Century. Erlangen: Friinkische Geographische Gesellschaft, 1977.
- Abu el-Haj, Nadia. Facts on the Ground: Archaeological Practice and Territorial Self-Fashioning in Israeli Society. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.
- Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim, Roger Heacock, and Khaled Nashef. The Landscape of Palestine: Equivocal Poetry. Bir Zeit: Birzeit University Publications, 1999.
- Albright, William Foxwell. From the Stone Age to Christianity. New York: Doubleday Anchor Books, 1957.
- Amiry, Suad. Throne Village Architecture: Palestinian Rural Mansions in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries (Arabic with summary in English). Ramallah: RIWAQ, Centre for Architectural Conservation, 2003.
- Anfinsat, Nils. “A Passion for Cultural Difference: Archaeology and Ethnicity of the Southern Levant.” Norwegian Archaeological Review. 36:1 (2003).
- Avissar, Miriam. Tel Yoqne’am: Excavations on the Acropolis. Jerusalem: Israeli Antiquities Authority, 2005.
- Barghout, Jamal. “The Effect of the Separation Wall on the Antiquities of Palestine.” Unpublished paper. Ramallah: PICLS, 2004.
- Benvenisti, Meron. Sacred Landscape: The Buried History of the Holy Land since 1948. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2000.
- Conder, C. R., and H. H. Kitchener. The Survey of Western Palestine, 1881. Vols. 1–3. Reprint, Jerusalem: Kedem Publishing, 1970.
- Department of Antiquities and Cultural Heritage. Inventory of Cultural and Natural Heritage Sites of Potential Outstanding Universal Value in Palestine. Ramallah: Ministry of Tourism and Antiquities, Palestine National Authority, 2005.
- Elon, Amos. The Israelis: Founders and Sons. New York: Penguin Books, 1981.
- Finkelstein, Israel, and Neil A. Silberman. The Bible Unearthed: Archaeology’s New Vision of Ancient Israel and the Origin of Its Sacred Texts. New York: Free Press, 2001.
- . David and Solomon: In Search of the Bible’s Sacred Kings and the Roots of the Western Tradition. New York: Free Press, 2006.
- Fox, Edward. Sacred Geography: A Tale of Murder and Archaeology in the Holy Land. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2001.
- Granqvist, Hilma. Marriage Conditions in a Palestinian Village, 2 vols. Helsingfors: Akademische Buchhand-

- lung, Reprint. New York: AMS Press, 1975 (1931, 1935).
- Hoppe, Leslie J. "Archaeology and Politics in Palestine." The Link. 20:1 (1987).
- Kanafani, Ghassan. Palestine's Children: Returning to Haifa and Other Stories. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2000.
- Kapitan, Tomis, ed. Archaeology, History and Culture in Palestine and the Near East: Essays in Memory of Albert E. Glock. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1999.
- Khalidi, Rashid. Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Khalidi, Walid. All That Remains: The Palestinian Villages Occupied and Depopulated by Israel in 1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.
- King, Philip J. American Archaeology in the Middle East. Philadelphia: American Schools of Oriental Research, 1983.
- Kuyper, Abraham. Om de Oude Wereldzee (Around the Mediterranean). (Dutch). Amsterdam: Van Holkema and Warendorf, 1907.
- Magness, Jodi. The Archaeology of Qumran and the Dead Sea Scrolls. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2002.
- Marcus, Amy Dockser. The View from Nebo: How Archaeology Is Rewriting the Bible and Reshaping the Middle East. Boston: Back Bay Books, 2000.
- Monk, Daniel Bertrand. An Aesthetic Occupation: The Immediacy of Architecture and the Palestinian Conflict. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Prior, Michael. The Bible and Colonialism: A Moral Critique. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Press, 1997.
- Roberts, David R. A. The Holy Land: 123 Colored Facsimile Lithographs and the Journal from His Visit to the Holy Land. New York: Wellfleet Books, 1982.
- Rook, Robert E. The 150th Anniversary of the United States' Expedition to Explore the Dead Sea and the Jordan River. Amman, Jordan: American Center of Oriental Research, 1998.
- Said, Edward W. Culture and Imperialism. New York: Vintage Books, 1994.
- . "Permission to Narrate." In The Politics of Dispossession. New York: Pantheon Books, 1984.
- Scham, Sandra Arnold, and Adel Yahya. "Heritage and Reconciliation." Journal of Social Archaeology. 3:3 (2003).
- Segal, Rafi, and Eyal Weizman. A Civilian Occupation: The Politics of Israeli Architecture. Tel Aviv, London, and New York: Babel and Verso, 2003.
- Shamir, Israel. "St Barbara of Aboud." In The Writings of Israel Shamir. 2002. http://www.israelshamir.net/English/St.Barbara\_Aboud.htm.
- Silberman, Neil Asher. Between Past and Present: Archaeology, Ideology and Nationalism in the Modern Middle East. New York: Henry Holt, 1989.
- . Digging for God and Country: Exploration, Archaeology and the Secret Struggle for the Holy Land, 1799–1917. New York: Knopf, 1982.
- . A Prophet from amongst You: The Life of Yigal Yadin: Soldier, Scholar, and Mythmaker of Modern Israel. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley Publishing, 1993.
- Silberman, Neil Asher, and David Small. The Archaeology of Israel: Constructing the Past and Interpreting the Present. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997.
- Walker, Bethany J. "Militarization to Nomadization: The Middle and Late Islamic Periods." Near Eastern Archaeology. 62:4 (1999).
- Whitelam, Keith W. The Invention of Ancient Israel: The Silencing of Palestinian History. New York: Routledge, 1996.

—Bert de Vries

Al-Ard

Al-Ard (The Land) was an Arab nationalist political movement that emerged among Palestinian Israelis in the 1950s. It was a pan-Arab nationalist movement founded by young Israeli-Arab intellectuals who were inspired by the ideology of JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR of EGYPT. The movement eschewed traditional Arab politics and the COMMUNIST Party in favor of more authentically nationalist politics. It advocated a novel idea: to oppose the Jewish state by legitimate democratic means in general and via the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT in particular. The group gradually transformed itself from a movement to a political body, and later a party that ran for seats in the Knesset. The Knesset banned it in a law that was upheld by the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court panel, litigating the petition filed by al-Ard following the decision to ban the movement from the Knesset, handed down a historic ruling: "No free regime will assist or recognize a movement that is seeking to undermine the very same regime." After the Supreme Court upheld the Knesset's action, al-Ard declined precipitously. This and similar court decisions have narrowed the venues for legitimate expressions of Palestinian identity or opportunities for redress of Arab grievances under the military administration. It was not until over a decade later that an Arab party emerged. Such measures continue to be implemented today against similarly nationalist Israeli-Arab groups.

See also LAND DAY; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Bibliography

- G., Juliette and Shihad. "Yom al-Ard in Bethlehem." Occupied Palestine: Live from Palestine. Reprinted in Electronic Intifada. 31 March 2005.
- MIFTA. "March 30th: Youm al-Ard (Land Day)." The Palestinian Initiative for the Promotion of Global Dialogue and Democracy. 30 March 2007. <http://inpursuitofjustice.wordpress.com/2007/03/30/youm-al-ard-land-day/>.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Sahliyeh, Emile. In Search of Leadership: West Bank Politics since 1967. Washington, DC: The Brookings Institution, 1988.
- Saleh, Abdul Jawad. "The Palestinian Non-Violent Resistance Movement." Alternative Palestinian Agenda. Madison: University of Wisconsin, 2002. <http://www.ap-agenda.org/11-02/asaleh.htm>.

Areas A, B, C

See INTERIM AGREEMENT

Arlozorov, Haim Victor (1899–1933)

Haim Arlozorov was a leading member of the Yishuv, especially in the HISTADRUT and LABOR parties. He was born in Romny, Ukraine, and moved at a young age with his family to Prussia (GERMANY), where he obtained elementary, secondary, and university education. He immigrated to Palestine in 1921, returned to Germany briefly to complete his academic studies, and settled permanently in Palestine in 1924. In Germany in 1918 he cofounded HAPOEL HATZAIR (the Young Worker), a group active in Palestine from 1905 to 1930. In 1920 he was among the founders of the Histadrut (a labor federation), and subsequently became one of its leaders. Later he became a prominent leader in MAPAI (Israel Workers' Party), which subsequently joined two small parties to become the Labor Party. Because of his activism and fervent devotion to the cause, Arlozorov was considered one of the most promising young members of the Zionist movement. In 1926 he was elected a member of the VA'AD LE'UMI (the National Council of the Jewish community in Eretz Yisrael) and elected to the Yishuv's delegation to the League of Nations. Toward the end of 1927 he traveled to the UNITED STATES as a member of CHAIM WEIZMANN's delegation to expand the JEWISH AGENCY.

In 1932, Yishuv leaders sent Arlozorov to Germany as the representative of the labor movement. There he negotiated with the Nazi authorities an agreement known as the HA'AVARA (Transfer), which enabled German Jews to transfer part of their assets to Palestine and to IMMIGRATE to Palestine. In 1935 the WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS officially approved the agreement, which established a major set of economic and political relations between Nazi Germany and the Zionist leadership in the Yishuv at a time when anti-Fascist forces were attempting to organize a boycott against Germany.

On his return, Arlozorov found the Zionist community rent by ideological controversies and violent clashes between Revisionists and the Labor movement. When he was assassinated on a Tel Aviv beach in June 1933, Labor leaders assumed that Revisionist extremists related to VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY had perpetrated the murder, and three members of the Revisionist party in Palestine were arrested: Tzvi Rosenblatt, Abraham Stavsky, and Abba Akhimeir. The first two were unknown outside Revisionist circles, but Stavsky was tried, convicted, and condemned to death for Arlozorov's murder. Stavsky appealed, however, and the conviction was overturned. Arlozorov's killer or killers have never been indicted, and the case remains officially unsolved. Nevertheless it stands as a symbol of the extreme hostility between the two main camps in Zionism during that period of the BRITISH MANDATE.

See also ZIONISM

Bibliography

- Avineri, Shlomo. Arlosoroff. London: Peter Halban, 1989.
- Berman, Aaron. Nazism, the Jews, and American Zionism, 1933–1948. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1990.
- Black, Edwin. The Transfer Agreement: The Dramatic Story of the Pact between the Third Reich and Jewish Palestine, updated ed. Brookline, MA: Brookline Books, 1999.
- Brenner, Lenni. 51 Documents: Zionist Collaboration with the Nazis. New York: Barricade Books, 2002.
- Finkelstein, Chaim. Haynt: A Tsaytung bay Yidn, 1908–1939 (Today: A Jewish Newspaper, 1908–1939). World Federation of Polish Jews: Warsaw, 1940. See especially Chapter 5, "Haynt and the Substantive Debates in the Jewish World between the Two World Wars."
- Maoz, Asher. "Historical Adjudication: Courts of Law, Commissions of Inquiry, and 'Historical Truth.'" Law and History Review. 18 (2000).

Polkehn, Klaus. "The Secret Contacts: Zionism and Nazi Germany, 1933–1941." Journal of Palestine Studies. 5:3–4 (1976).

Sheffer, Gabriel. "Hayim Victor Arlosoroff." In New Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel. Edited by Geoffrey Wigoder. Madison, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1994.

Armed Struggle, Palestinian

Palestinian Arabs since the early twentieth century have frequently engaged in various forms of armed resistance: first in opposition to British colonial occupation and a growing, privileged Zionist movement; and later in response to the formation of the state of Israel, the expulsion of some 750,000 Palestinians from their homeland, and the continuing Israeli OCCUPATION of Palestinian land. Particularly since the 1960s the Palestinian movement has advocated armed struggle, taking its inspiration from other armed national liberation struggles, such as those in Algeria and Vietnam. Compared to these movements, however, the Palestinian struggle has failed to achieve its goals, establishing neither a unified state in the whole of historic Palestine nor even a genuinely autonomous Palestinian "mini-state" in coexistence with Israel.

This failure has led even supporters of Palestinian self-determination to critically reexamine the history of Palestinian armed struggle, raising questions about its justification, its efficacy, and its relation to broader political strategies. In his monumental and authoritative study Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993, Yezid Sayigh argues that "the armed struggle provided the political impulse and organizational dynamic in the evolution of Palestinian national identity and the formation of para-state institutions." But Sayigh also documents the weaknesses of Palestinian military strategy since the 1960s and concludes that the Palestinian movement "lacked the single-minded determination to take the practice of armed struggle to the elevated position it occupied in formal doctrine and to develop its organization in a manner commensurate with the task." It is debatable, however, whether greater determination could by itself have overcome the weaknesses in the military strategy. Indeed, Sayigh himself argues that while armed resistance was a legitimate part of the Palestinian struggle, military failures flowed from serious weaknesses in the political orientation and strategy of the Palestinian leadership, although how best to characterize these weaknesses remains a matter of controversy.

Before 1948: The Early Period of Struggle

Following the BALFOUR DECLARATION of 1917 and the start of the BRITISH MANDATE in Palestine after World War I, the influx of Zionist settlers into the region increased sharply, as did their land purchases. In 1918, there were 56,000 Jews and some 1 million Palestinians. Over the next seven years, well over 70,000 new Jewish immigrants arrived. In 1920, to cite one example, Zionists purchased 60,000 dunum (23 square miles, 60 square kilometers) of land in the Jezreel Valley from the Sursuk family, a Beirut ABSENTEE LANDLORD, and hundreds of peasant families were evicted from twenty-two villages in the valley. The IMMIGRATION/LAND threat was intensified by the policy of constructing a separate Jewish economy, which resulted in large-scale Palestinian unemployment.

As tensions grew, British administrators played Zionists and Arabs against each other, while favoring the former, including paying Jewish workers higher wages than Arabs. In early 1921, riots spontaneously broke out in JAFFA that left thirteen Jews dead, but for most of the decade the Palestinian response to colonial occupation and ZIONISM was dominated by the ARAB EXECUTIVE. Appointed by merchants and landowners at the Palestine Arab Congress in 1920, the Executive adopted the legal strategy of petitioning the British authorities. For their part, the British promoted the most politically conservative elements of Palestinian society to positions of leadership, who could be relied on to channel Palestinian discontent in an anti-Jewish direction. The most notable of these was the landowner and right-wing nationalist AL-HAJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, who was appointed mufti (religious leader) of Jerusalem by the British in 1921, despite his losing the election for the position.

By the end of the decade, nearly 2,000 Palestinian farmers had been evicted from their land, and the British directed 90 percent of their economic assistance to Jewish settlers. In August 1929, following a provocative Zionist demonstration at the WESTERN WALL in JERUSALEM—a sacred site for both Jews and Muslims—new rioting broke out in which nearly 250 Jews and Arabs died. The riots—sometimes called the al-Buraq Rebellion or WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES—were brutally suppressed by the British army, but they represented a militant shift in Palestinian opposition to ZIONISM and a rejection by many Palestinians of the Arab Executive's weak response to both the British occupation and continuing Zionist settlement.

Over the next few years, more radical currents emerged, including guerrilla cells in which middle-class intellectuals and peasants prepared for armed struggle against the British. The first of these, the Green Hand Gang, was formed in October 1929 under the leadership of Ahmed Tafish, who mounted an operation during the same month against the Jewish Quarter in SAFED, but it was poorly organized and was soon crushed by the British military. In general the British responded to Palestinian demonstrations with an iron fist. During a one-day strike in 1933, for example, British troops opened fire on a crowd of Palestinians in JAFFA, killing twenty-seven.

Meanwhile Zionist immigration continued to surge, and Zionist groups began to arm themselves and undertake aggressive actions against the Palestinians. In early 1935, Zionist parties smuggled a large quantity of arms from Belgium to the Jaffa port. In October 1935, after the weapon shipment was discovered, Palestinians responded with a general strike. By this time the global economic depression had reached Palestine. The Palestinian ECONOMY was hit hard. Businesses closed, unemployment surged, and more Palestinian farmers were evicted from their land—about 20,000 families by 1936. In these circumstances, the mood of militancy and rebellion intensified.

In November 1935, Syrian shaykh 'IZZ AL-DIN AL-QASSAM and a small group of followers known as the Ikhwan al-Qassam (the Qassam Brotherhood) issued a call from the Galilee hills for armed revolt against British rule. Qassam had gained experience fighting FRANCE in SYRIA in the years after World War I, and his group professed Islamic ideals. The Ikhwan al-Qassam was better organized than the Green Hand, but only a week after their call was issued, Qassam was killed by a British patrol. Nevertheless, Qassamite guerrilla groups continued their armed raids on Zionist settlements.

As tensions continued to mount, with the British consistently favoring the Zionists, Palestinian workers in Jaffa launched a general strike against British rule in April 1936, which quickly spread to every other major city and received strong support from almost every sector of Palestinian society. In the absence of an alternative national organization, the Arab Executive—now re-formed as the ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE—assumed leadership of the ARAB REVOLT, which it viewed as a way of pressuring the British to allow it a role in government rather than an all-out fight for independence. The British authorities responded with repressive measures, shooting demonstrators, arresting strike leaders, imposing harsh collective punishments, and dynamiting entire villages and sections of cities. But the repression failed to crush the strike, and hundreds joined guerrilla groups that hid in the mountains and carried out attacks on British targets. By June the British HIGH COMMISSIONER warned that the region was in a “state of incipient revolution.” In July Britain declared martial law and sent troop reinforcements from home. Zionists gave the Mandate government their full support, organizing squads that attacked Palestinian villages under British direction and taking Palestinian jobs in many sectors.

As the strike continued, the members of the Arab Higher Committee grew increasingly nervous that, if not ended, it could lead to a full-scale revolution that would threaten their own privileged positions. By August as many as 5,000 guerrillas (including some from SYRIA and IRAQ) were carrying out regular attacks. At the same time, the British asked the client monarchs of Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950) and Iraq, Abdullah and Ghazi, respectively, to use their influence to end the strike. During an extended period of negotiations, the Higher Committee used its authority to wind the strike down, and it finally ended in October with the Palestinian demands—an end to Jewish immigration and land sales, and Palestinian independence with an Arab majority—unmet.

Following the strike's defeat, Britain's PEEL COMMISSION report proposed a split of the region into Jewish and Palestinian states and a population transfer, with the Palestinian area absorbed by Transjordan. Palestinians rejected this scheme, and later in 1937, guerrilla warfare resumed. The British arrested Palestinian leaders and deported many of the Higher Committee's members, further inflaming the situation. Rebellion spread around the country, and the British once again responded harshly. Zionist militias, working closely with the British, played a crucial role in finally crushing the rebellion. By the middle of 1938, several thousand Palestinian militants were dead, outgunned by the much better equipped British and Zionist forces. Thereafter Palestinian leaders were killed or exiled to the Seychelles. Without a coherent political organization and with the Palestinian economy in ruins, the uprising petered out, and by 1939 the British had regained control.

Later that year, mindful of the need to win Arab support in the event of a world war, the British issued the MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, which proposed a limit to Jewish immigration and possible Palestinian independence in ten years. This diplomatic gambit satisfied no one, however. Palestinians rejected the vague promises, and Zionists regarded them as a betrayal. With the outbreak of World War II, the British strengthened Zionist militias, while the Palestinians had been disarmed and were without effective political leadership.

By the end of the war, Britain's role in the Middle East was beginning to fade. In 1947 the recently formed UN issued a plan for partitioning Palestine into separate Jewish and Arab states, but the plan never materialized.

1948–1967

In April 1948, Zionist forces executed the DALET PLAN, a series of military attacks against the Arab population designed to expel as many as possible, to increase the area controlled by the proposed Jewish state, and to destroy the possibility of a Palestinian Arab state. A Palestinian militia of about 5,000, the Jaysh al-Jihad al-Muqaddes (Sacred War, Vanguard of the Holy War), organized by ABD AL-QADIR AL-HUSAYNI, was poorly armed, hopelessly outnumbered, and completely ineffective in the face of Zionist attacks. Another small Arab army, the Jaysh al-Inqadh (Army of Salvation or ARAB LIBERATION ARMY), created by volunteers from several Arab states and led by FAWZI AL-QAWUQJI, was about half Palestinian and was equally poorly armed and ineffective. Zionist terror attacks, such as the massacre of well over 100 people at the village of DAYR YASIN, were one factor, by creating mass panic, that gave rise to some Palestinians taking flight. The majority were driven from their homes by Zionist military forces, ultimately resulting in 750,000 dispossessed Palestinians, a disaster that came to be known as the Nakba (Catastrophe). Only after this ethnic cleansing had begun and British troops had withdrawn were five Arab state armies mobilized with combined forces of some 40,000 men (including the Arab Liberation Army troops), but this was largely an effort by the Arab states to mollify their own populations rather than to mount a serious military threat. The Arab states did nothing to reverse the expulsion of Palestinians, and by the end of the 1948 WAR the Zionists were in control of 78 percent of historic Palestine.

In the years immediately after the Nakba, Palestinians lacked coherent political formations that could group together a dispersed population under one leadership. Displaced, divided, and weakened, Palestinians faced tremendous obstacles in attempting to knit together organizations and forces that could speak for Palestinian interests. Instead some Palestinians found that they could join the armed forces of host countries in which they found themselves exiled. REFUGEES in Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and Iraq joined the national militias of those countries in search of employment and in the hopes that Arab rhetorical attacks on Israel would change into armed confrontations.

For instance, the ARMISTICE AGREEMENT in Egypt prevented the forward deployment of Egyptian troops in Egyptian-administered GAZA. Thus Cairo recruited Palestinians to police the border with Israel as the Palestine Border Police, later the Palestine Border Guards. However, Egyptian leader JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR was keen to avoid any conflict with Israel, and he prohibited both political and armed activity from Gaza. This policy changed, however, following Israel's two massive raids against Egypt in 1954 and 1955, and the LAVON AFFAIR in 1954, in which Israeli agents planted bombs in US facilities hoping the United States would think Egyptians responsible and reduce their relations with Cairo. In response, in 1955 Nasir permitted the Palestinians to create an armed group, the fida'iyyun (men of sacrifice), who began launching armed raids into Israel in April. In December, following a major Israeli operation that took over the al-Awja demilitarized zone, Egypt transformed the fida'iyyun into a formal military unit, the 141 Battalion, whose strength may have been as great as 1,000, and guerrilla activity rose sharply. Israel in turn used these guerrilla raids as one pretext for its invasion of Egypt in October 1956, and when Israel finally withdrew from Gaza in March 1967, some 1,200 Palestinians were dead. There is no doubt that the Palestinians wanted to fight Israel, but it is also clear that Nasir, as did all the Arab leaders, restrained or facilitated Palestinian armed activity when it suited Egypt's interests.

During the Israeli Occupation of Gaza, several hundred fida'iyyun and border guards fled to the WEST BANK, and this, together with the loss of practically all the fighters in Gaza, left little armed resistance to the Israeli Occupation. Egypt also faced a political dilemma in its policy of arming Palestinians at the border: failure to arm them provoked demonstrations and domestic destabilization, while arming them increased the risk of Israeli reprisal. After the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza in 1957, Egypt pursued two tactics: the Palestine Border Guards brigades were dissolved and reconstituted as the Palestinian 107th Brigade, which was first moved to Cairo and then to the east side of the Suez Canal, well away from the border with Israel. The fida'iyyun were allowed to return to Gaza, and the 141 Battalion was transformed into a police unit, but the Egyptian state kept a tight rein on them and prohibited armed activities. Nasir also pursued a political line, proposing the establishment of a formal Palestinian entity, which became the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in 1964, while famously asserting that he had no plans for the liberation of Palestine.

Palestinians were also organized into formal sections of the Syrian army, such as the 68th Reconnaissance Battalion, composed of some 600 Palestinian commandos at its peak (though the officers remained Syrian). Ordered not to confront Israel by the Syrian government, the 68th Battalion was used by Damascus to carry out missions against LEBANON, Jordan, and Iraq instead. Competition between Nasir and Abdul Karim Qasim's BA'ATH Party in Iraq led Qasim to take advantage of Egyptian vacillation on the Palestine question by forming the Palestine Liberation Regiment (Fawj al-Tahrir al-Filastini) under Iraqi officers in 1959. The regiment was disbanded soon after its creation, however, when Qasim was overthrown in 1963.

Nasir responded to the initial formation of the regiment by sending the 20th Battalion of the Palestine Border Guards, now renamed the Palestinian Army, back to Gaza and approving the formation of the Popular Resistance, a militia force that recruited some 2,500 Palestinians. The collapse in 1961 of the United Arab Republic (UAR) and the new balance of power among the Arab states pushed the Palestinian question to the rear. The experience inside the armed forces of Arab host countries exposed the limits of relying on Arab states to lead the fight against Israel. Palestinians had fought loyally in several units and had carried out several missions, but these were more often related to inter-Arab rivalries than to the cause of Palestinian liberation, with the result that the fortunes of Palestinian nationalism were tied to internal Arab struggles for power.

Arab governments' support for Palestinian liberation, moreover, turned out to be PROPAGANDA and purely rhetorical, as the fate of the various Palestinian military units in Iraq, Syria, and Egypt demonstrated. Palestinian activists concluded that they would need an autonomous political leadership and independent military resources to advance the struggle for liberation, and in this context new clandestine guerrilla organizations began to assert themselves.

There were two significant underground formations in the 1950s. The first was the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS (MAN), which in the 1960s would parent the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP) and the Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PDFLP). (The PDFLP shortened its name to the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—DFLP—in 1974.) The MAN coalesced in 1951 around a group of students at the American University in Beirut led by GEORGE HABASH and Hani al-Hindi. Habash and Hindi had first been members of both Kata'ib al-Fida' al-'Arabi (Battalions of Arab Sacrifice), which was committed to preventing Arab collusion with Israel and had been involved in the launching of several attacks on targets in Lebanon and Syria but was later disbanded, al-'Urwa al-Wuthqa (The Firmest Bond), an intellectual group at the American University. When the MAN was formed, it was committed to the liberation of Palestine but also believed that this would be impossible without freeing Arab countries from "Western imperialism." WADI' HADDAD, a leading figure in the MAN (and later military commander of the PFLP), is quoted as having said, "The road to Tel Aviv passes through Damascus, Beirut, Baghdad, Amman, and Cairo." To help achieve the goal of liberating the Arab states from imperialism and colonialism, they formed the Committee for Resistance to Peace with Israel, which helped them recruit members to clandestine cells in the refugee camps. The MAN remained small through much of the 1950s, but with the success of Nasir's Free Officers Movement in Egypt in 1952, the MAN was able to grow and expand in Syria, Iraq, Egypt, and Jordan.

To achieve their objectives, the MAN began organizing but became involved in Arab politics, mostly as arms of Egyptian and Syrian foreign policy. Their allegiance to Egypt, however, had seriously negative consequences, and when the Ba'ath took power in Syria (1961) and Iraq (1963), the MAN was effectively banned in those countries. Its growth in the early 1960s, largely fueled by enthusiasm for its support of Nasir, led to internal debates. Arab unity did not seem to lead organically to Palestinian liberation, even more so when Arab unity threatened to unravel at every turn. Also, allegiance to Egypt made confrontations with Israel difficult, as Egypt would not risk provoking Israel until it had decisive military superiority. The debates eventually led to the formation of a separate Palestinian arm of the MAN—the PFLP.

The second important clandestine formation was FATAH (Harakat al-Tahrir al-Watani al-Filastini), whose members were united by their common involvement with or support of the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD and their common experiences in Gaza. The enthusiasm of the Muslim Brotherhood in responding to Israeli raids led to their complete suppression by Nasir, which, combined with the defeat of Egypt in the 1956 War, led many of these Palestinians—including YASIR ARAFAT, KHALIL AL-WAZIR, and KAMAL 'UDWAN—to conclude that an independent Palestinian political organization was necessary. In 1958 Arafat and Wazir were joined by supporters in KUWAIT, where they penned two important documents—Haykal al-Bina' al-Thawri (Structure of Revolutionary Construction) and Bayan al-Haraka (The Movement's Manifesto)—and founded Fatah. Soon thereafter, they began publication of their journal Nida' al-Hayat—Filastinuna (The Call of Life—Our Palestine), whose circulation in the Arab world helped knit together a wide range of supporters. The simplicity of its slogans—relentless armed struggle against Israel, rejection of deals with Israel, distrust of Arab regimes, and Palestinian self-determination—attracted many. And the success of anticolonial revolutions in Africa and Southeast Asia made Fatah's call for armed struggle seem all the more urgent and effective. Most importantly, Fatah grew in direct relation to the failure of Arab regimes to provide meaningful solutions for Palestinian liberation. Its calls for "Palestine First" made it an attractive base for organizing armed struggle.

The establishment in 1964 of the Palestine Liberation Organization, initially a tool of Egypt in Arab politics, and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY (PLA), whose three battalions were under the control and direction of the Arab states, precipitated moves by Fatah to launch the armed struggle sooner than it had anticipated, especially since the leaders feared that Arab regimes were attempting to contain Palestinian national aspirations. Filastinuna remarked in July of 1964 that "the Palestinian people are more convinced today than ever that the armed Palestinian revolution is the only solution to regain its stolen homeland." But Fatah was hardly prepared for armed struggle at this point, and it lacked members in countries bordering Israel. Its most important base was Syria, where Arafat recruited veteran infiltrators and soldiers. They launched their attacks under the name AL-'ASIFA (The Storm) to avoid punitive measures against Fatah. The first effort was aborted when Jordanian border forces intercepted the guerrilla team. The second attempt, detonating an explosive in a water canal on 1 January 1965, was touted as a success (although Israel claimed it failed to go off) and would subsequently be celebrated as the beginning of the renewed Palestinian armed struggle. It would also lead to immediate conflict with the MAN, who saw these attacks as threats to Nasir's foreign policy and direct competition with its ability to recruit new members.

Although Fatah announced its guerrilla operations with great enthusiasm, its results were less tangible. Its capabilities for attacks were limited, and its poor organization left it vulnerable to repression by Arab police forces. But the popular enthusiasm for Fatah also brought it into conflict with states that could not allow escalation of tensions with Israel and that had promoted the PLO as a way to avoid armed conflict over Palestine. Additionally, it opened a rift with the MAN. Although Fatah believed that it could use guerrilla struggle to force the hand of reluctant Arab armies to engage with Israel, the MAN felt that an independent Palestinian military organization would simply provide cover for Arab reluctance to liberate Palestine. But after the MAN suffered setbacks in Jordan and Egypt, where members were rounded up and political changes altered its access to official power, it eventually moved toward the Fatah position. The MAN managed its first independent military operation in October 1966 from south Lebanon, leading to severe Israeli reprisal. Continued attacks launched from Jordan between December and June brought the MAN into direct conflict with the Jordanian border forces. Fatah raids also escalated during this period from Lebanon, Jordan, and Syria. Both groups rode the rising tide of Palestinian support for the guerrilla struggle and by 1967 were boasting of the operations' successes, just when their hopes were dealt a devastating blow by Israel.

The Struggle, 1967–1972

Six days into the 1967 WAR, Israel summarily defeated the armed forces of Egypt, Syria, and Jordan and occupied large sections of the territories of each. The speed of Israel's victory and the utter failure of Arab armies to mount a serious challenge changed the entire dynamics of politics in the Middle East. First, it solidified Israel's importance to the US Cold War strategy in the region: finding an ally against growing SOVIET influence among Arab states, the United States increased arms sales to Israel and lifted its requirement that Israel sign the nuclear nonproliferation treaty. Second, it changed the expectations of the Palestinian guerrillas vis-à-vis their Arab patrons. Nasir and King Husayn of Jordan came to the conclusion that "Israel is here to stay," and this proved to be a problem for Palestinian groups that had based their nationalist aspirations on the actions of Arab states. The pattern of conflict and negotiation over the next three years would solidify the centrality of the peace process over armed confrontation in Arab-Israeli relations. Palestinian guerrilla groups, in response, moved explicitly toward a Palestinian, as opposed to an Arab, nationalism and began to organize, at least initially, independently of Arab patronage. The new goal was the establishment of a Palestinian "revolutionary authority" in the West Bank and Gaza to continue operations against Israel. Even as Palestinian attitudes toward Arab states cooled, Syria, Egypt, and Iraq still initially relied on Palestinian guerrillas to deflect attention from their own rearmament plans and provided the guerrillas with arms and sanctuary.

Immediately after the 1967 War both Fatah and the MAN hoped to continue independent military operations against Israel and to launch efforts that they hoped would turn into a popular uprising for national liberation. Fatah made preparations for continuing its operations inside the newly Occupied Territories by stepping up training operations at its camp in Hama, Syria, from which it sent reinforcements to the West Bank. The MAN leadership moved cautiously along a path of military preparation, arguing that the Palestinians were not yet ready for conflict with Israel. Nasir reassured them privately that Egypt was preparing for a second round of war with Israel, so the MAN began to build up its base in Jordan to prepare for the coming conflict. In 1967 the MAN and Fatah began a series of discussions to coordinate military operations against Israel. The two organizations made agreements to delay the start of combat operations, but Fatah broke off talks and began its combat operations in August, timing them to start with the Khartoum Summit of the Arab heads of state. Fatah was also encouraged by its growing numbers of recruits, as well as by arms supplies it received from external sources, and began to organize its recruits into armed cells and roving guerrilla bands. Its hope was to launch combat operations and find large popular support on the model of events in 1936–1939, but its poor organization, lack of internal security, and the strength of Israeli retaliation made failure inevitable. Despite a spectacular bombing of an Israeli oil refinery at Eilat in January, by early 1968, Fatah's operations were in shambles.

The MAN, which had stayed out of Fatah's combat operations, now found its hand forced when Fatah announced its second round of combat operations. The organization had been losing recruits as its policy of slow preparation frustrated newer members, while Egypt was increasingly impressed by Fatah's efforts. In 1967 the MAN began discussions about a united front with the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (PLF) and Abtal al-Awda (Heroes of Return). The new group announced its unity with a raid on the Ben Gurion International Airport, which, although a failure, inaugurated the PFLP. Israel stepped up its repression of MAN activists, and, by January 1968 the Israelis had captured large sections of the MAN membership. On balance, the hopes of launching a mass armed uprising against Israel were dashed by the end of 1967.

Armed struggle did, however, change the relationship of the various guerrilla groups with their host Arab states. Their successes allowed them both to carve out spaces for themselves inside these states (most successfully in Jordan where guerrillas found that Jordanian troops tolerated or cooperated with them) and to achieve political legitimacy for their efforts. But as the guerrilla forces grew in confidence and strength, the policy of Arab states toward them changed as well. In 1968, as the number of armed fighters from Fatah and the PFLP increased in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, Israel began launching attacks against Palestinian bases and struck the refugee camp of Karamah in Jordan. When the Jordanian authorities demanded Palestinian disarmament, there was an outcry among the Jordanian population, on which guerrillas were able to capitalize and build their forces. In the first three months of 1968, the guerrilla groups launched seventy-eight attacks against Israel.

In response Israel began a large search-and-destroy mission against guerrilla bases in and around Karamah. Fatah and the PLF/PLA prepared to fight against Israel alongside the Jordanian army, arguing that an act of steadfastness was necessary to raise Arab and Palestinian confidence. The PFLP, believing this an act of adventurism for which the guerrillas were unprepared, withdrew its members. When Israel attacked Karamah on 21 March, Fatah and the Jordanian First Infantry Division fought and inflicted several harsh blows on Israel, but Israel decidedly defeated the Arab fighters. When the fighting ended, the guerrillas paraded burned-out Israeli tanks and armor through the streets of Amman, and the reputation of the Palestinian guerrillas soared. Karamah took on mythological symbolism, viewed as demonstrating the Palestinian willingness to fight and challenge the seeming invincibility of Israel. As a consequence, the guerrilla movement, especially Fatah, gained new popularity among both the Arab masses and with certain Arab states (in particular Egypt). This led to rapidly expanding membership, including exponential growth within Jordan and combat bases near the Israeli border—a development the Jordanian authorities were powerless to stop. But as the guerrilla influence extended into the civilian population of Jordan, especially in the major cities, the Jordanian regime began to perceive it as a threat.

Parallel developments in Syria also expanded the network of Palestinian guerrillas there. In its attempt to offset the growing influence of Fatah, which Egypt favored, Syria's ruling Ba'ath Party launched its own group, the Vanguard of Popular Liberation War Organization, which merged with the Palestine Popular Liberation Front (PPLF) to form the Vanguard of Popular Liberation War Organization—Thunderbolt Forces, commonly known as SA'IQA. With official support, Sa'iqa grew rapidly, claiming over 1,000 members by 1969. Fatah tried to maintain good working relations with the Syrian government, but as its raids against Israel intensified, tensions between Syria and Fatah increased. In June 1969, Fatah operatives in Syria were warned not to provoke Israel, even inside the Occupied Territories, or risk being eliminated by the Syrian government.

In Lebanon the guerrilla movement grew as well, aided in part by a crisis in the Lebanese government, as well as by the declining economy, both of which allowed the guerrilla groups to expand their influence among the political left. Fatah was able to develop an extensive network in the refugee camps in southern Lebanon, and in April 1969, after the Lebanese authorities shut down a Fatah office in al-Khiyam, the Lebanese opposition parties announced a general strike in support of the guerrillas. A Lebanese crackdown against the protesters fueled resentment; in response, the ranks of the guerrilla organizations grew even more, and Fatah brought in reinforcements. As Egyptian and Syrian threats of military action against Israel increased, Israel's warnings to Lebanon to keep the guerrillas in check prompted the Lebanese authorities to attack the guerrilla bases inside the refugee camps. These attacks triggered nationwide protests and reprisals from neighboring Arab regimes that broke off relations with Lebanon until it accepted a cease-fire with the Palestinian guerrillas. In the Egyptian-mediated CAIRO AGREEMENT, the PLO agreed to maintain internal discipline of the Palestinians in Lebanon in exchange for the right to govern the refugee camps. The new freedom that the guerrillas acquired in Lebanon allowed them to recruit not only Palestinians but members of the Lebanese AMAL Shi'a population as well—a group that later brutally turned against them in the CAMPS' WAR.

Despite their growing numbers, the Palestinian guerrillas were still hardly successful against Israel. The number of raids and attacks increased dramatically from 1968 to 1970, but Israeli countermeasures proved effective as well. By 1969, Israeli prisons held some 2,800 guerrillas, and Israeli troops claimed some 1,828 guerrilla lives. There were also few territorial gains in the Occupied Territories for the guerrilla groups. These military difficulties as well as the large influx of recruits led to open debates inside the guerrilla movement about strategies for Palestinian liberation and to rampant inflation of the successes of rather small operations and skirmishes. There were also difficulties in connecting the movement for liberation, which overwhelmingly existed outside of Israel and the Occupied Territories, with the Palestinians living inside those lands. And, as they faced these setbacks, some Palestinian guerrilla groups, most notably the PFLP, moved in the direction of attacks on civilian Israeli targets and international TERRORISM. On 23 July 1968 two members of the PFLP hijacked an El Al passenger flight, and between December 1968 and September 1969, the PFLP claimed credit for attacks on Israeli businesses and aircraft in Athens, Zurich, London, Brussels, and Bonn. Although some Palestinians agreed with such tactics, others were openly critical, such as the DFLP secretary-general NAYIF HAWATIMAH, who argued that such action “creates MEDIA sensation that replaces individual terrorism for mass action and so causes fundamental harm to the resistance movement.”

Throughout the 1970s, Egypt had encouraged the guerrilla forces in Jordan to expand their operations and take advantage of the weakness of the Jordanian state. But Nasir’s acceptance of the US-sponsored peace initiative and cease-fire in the summer of 1970 changed Cairo’s decisionmaking. Subsequently the guerrilla forces engaged in open debates about whether the time was right to topple the Jordanian monarchy or if the balance of power had shifted, and the monarchy was prepared to destroy the guerrillas. The PFLP and the DFLP were convinced that confrontation with Jordan was necessary and began raising the slogan “All Power to the Resistance” in the streets, while Fatah was more hesitant about the prospects for victory. Talks among Fatah, the PFLP, the DFLP, and others were cut short when the PFLP hijacked three international airliners on 6 September and diverted them to airstrips in the Jordanian desert. Immediately, small-scale clashes erupted between the Jordanian army and the PFLP throughout Jordan. By mid-September Palestinian fidai’iyyun had captured several strategic locations inside Jordan, including the oil refinery at Zarqa.

The guerrillas began a campaign of mass action against the monarchy, calling for civil disobedience and a general strike. In response, King Husayn named a military government in Jordan and gave wide powers to the armed forces to suppress the guerrillas. Although the Jordanian army blocked an Iraqi force from providing aid to the guerrillas, the Syrian government sent more than a hundred tanks marked as units of the PLA to assist the guerrillas, even though the refusal of the head of the Syrian air force, Hafez al-Asad, to provide the requisite air cover left the tanks vulnerable. Israel and the United States threatened action against the MOSCOW-backed Syrians, but in the absence of air cover Jordanian air strikes easily repelled the tank force. By 25 September the guerrillas were in defensive positions throughout Jordan, and with no reinforcements on the horizon from Arab regimes, they were forced to accept a cease-fire on 27 September. During ten days of fighting several thousand Palestinians were killed, and the events came to be known as BLACK SEPTEMBER.

The Jordanian civil war had several consequences for the armed struggle. First, many of the smaller commando groups disappeared entirely, their members either dispersed or absorbed into Fatah. Second, new power struggles emerged inside of the main Palestinian organizations over strategies and responsibilities for the setbacks. Third, the Jordanian regime became convinced of the need to expel the guerrillas. In the months after the civil war, Amman began a systematic campaign of emptying town after town of guerrilla fighters. The PFLP reacted by calling for a Palestinian national authority in Jordan and for the toppling of the monarchy. King Husayn responded by announcing that he had uncovered secret fidai’iyyun plans to assassinate important Jordanian figures. The Jordanian army moved in and surrounded the fidai’iyyun in the Ajlun-Jarash areas and arrested over 2,000. Certain leaders were able to escape to Lebanon, Syria, and Iraq, but the armed struggle was essentially finished in Jordan.

This expulsion permanently altered the course of the Palestinian armed struggle, as substantially weakened Palestinian groups now had to negotiate with their host countries and accept their discipline, including no military attacks against Israel from their territories. The setbacks also fractured the main political organizations; the PFLP split and Fatah lost many of its members. In many ways, the movement was forced to confront the contradictory and competing logic of armed struggle that relied on Arab states; as long as Palestinians were tied to Arab host countries, they could only achieve limited military and political successes.

A New Era of Struggle, 1973–1982

In October 1973, Egypt began a major assault on the SINAI while Syrian troops crossed into the Golan Heights—territories that Israel had occupied since the 1967 WAR. After fierce fighting, the United States pressured Israel into accepting a UN-sponsored cease-fire, which called for negotiations to settle disputed issues. Palestinian organizations had hoped that the battles would lead to a broader struggle against Zionism, but Egypt, Syria, and the Arab states that supported them had more limited aims.

In the months that followed, sharp debates broke out among the various Palestinian resistance organizations. There was unanimity in rejecting Jordan's claim to the West Bank and Gaza, and in supporting the PLO as the "sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people." But Fatah and the DFLP also wanted the PLO to support the creation of a Palestinian "national authority" on any territory liberated from Israeli Occupation. Critics of this strategy, including the PFLP, argued that the imperial powers would permit such an authority only if the PLO recognized Israel and abandoned its goal of a democratic, secular state in the whole of historic Palestine and only if it governed a weak, demilitarized state. In response, supporters of a national authority claimed that it would be a step toward liberating all of Palestine once established.

There was also disagreement about whether the PLO should attend the GENEVA CONFERENCE, where a settlement of the 1973 War was to be negotiated. The PFLP headed a "Rejection Front" opposed to the conference. Fatah's leaders responded that if the PFLP and others refused to attend a conference to which they had not yet been invited, it would make it easier for Jordan or other Arab states to claim to represent the Palestinians. Yasir Arafat wrote to HENRY KISSINGER, the US secretary of state, asking to attend the conference, but Kissinger refused. In June 1974, the twelfth meeting of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL endorsed Fatah's position and issued a ten-point program that called for establishing a "fighting national authority" while reaffirming the goal of liberating all of historic Palestine. Despite the rhetoric, the PLO's willingness to accept a Palestinian "mini-state" in the West Bank and Gaza marked a significant retreat, which was not supported by most Palestinians living outside the Occupied Territories. Many also believed that the PLO was being maneuvered into a drawn-out diplomatic process that would ultimately lead nowhere and that would weaken the liberation movement.

At the Rabat Summit in October 1974, Arab leaders were presented with a manifesto supporting the PLO that was signed by 180 prominent Palestinians from the Occupied Territories. In response, the Arab leaders declared the PLO to be the sole representative of the Palestinian people. The following month Arafat addressed the UN General Assembly, which voted overwhelmingly to support Palestinian self-determination and to grant the PLO observer status. Only the United States, Israel, Bolivia, and the Dominican Republic voted against the resolution. The PALESTINE NATIONAL FRONT, established in the Occupied Territories in 1973, organized ten days of strikes and demonstrations in the West Bank in support of the UN decision. The PLO had achieved the international recognition that it wanted, but in the process had tied itself even more closely to the Arab states, which placed their own interests above the goal of Palestinian liberation.

In 1975 armed conflict between the PLO and its enemies broke out again, this time in Lebanon, which had become the main fida'iyyun base after Jordan expelled the PLO. As in Jordan, Fatah's leaders advocated noninterference in Lebanon's domestic affairs, even though the presence of thousands of Palestinian resistance fighters inevitably had a radicalizing effect on Lebanese politics. In April the right-wing Phalangists killed twenty-six Palestinians in an attack on a bus. Fatah refused to respond, but the PFLP and DFLP retaliated in alliance with the Lebanese National Movement (LNM), a coalition of leftist groups that represented the country's lower classes. The attacks and counterattacks quickly escalated into full-scale war across the country, and by the end of the year, Beirut was devastated and divided. The LNM and the Palestinians controlled west Beirut, the rightists controlled the eastern part of the city, and each side controlled different parts of the rest of the country. In January 1976, rightist forces began attacking the Palestinian refugee camps that lay between east Beirut and the rightists' mountain bases.

Fatah, which had previously held back, now threw all its forces into the struggle, and within a few months the left had taken control of 80 percent of the country. In response, Israel began blockading Lebanese ports and increased its aid to the rightists, while the United States sent a small fleet of ships and 1,700 marines to patrol the Lebanese coast. But the leftist forces continued to advance.

In late May, just when victory seemed close, Syrian president Asad sent 40,000 troops into Lebanon, with approval from the US government. Although his stated goal was to be a peacekeeper, Asad's real goal was to prevent the development of a radical Lebanon, to control the Palestinian movement, and to prevent an Israeli intervention on behalf of its rightist Phalangist allies. When the Syrian troops encountered fierce resistance from the Palestinians and LNM forces, Syria began shelling Palestinian refugee camps and supporting rightist attacks on the camps. Fatah was also forced to join the fighting in defense of the camps. In August the Phalangists massacred over 2,000 Palestinian refugees after a long siege of the Tal al Za'tar camp. Eventually the other Arab states intervened politically to end the war. But Syrian troops continued to occupy much of the country, and although the PLO remained armed, it found itself confined to small pockets of territory.

The Lebanese civil war left the PLO weakened. The Arab states each cultivated their own factions within the organization, which they manipulated for their own purposes. Although Palestinian groups continued to launch guerrilla raids against Israel, the leadership had no clear long-term strategy to achieve its goals. Indeed, it was not clear what those goals were. As Sayigh notes, "The Palestinian community no longer knew whether total liberation was still a goal, and if so, whether it was to be achieved through protracted warfare or by stages in which peaceful and violent means would be used alternately. Furthermore, there was great ambivalence concerning the 'phasal' strategy. Were phasal objectives indeed transitional? Would they entail direct negotiations and recognition of Israel? Would they be achieved through international intervention, or did they require some supporting pressure from Palestinian military action?"

The PLO lacked the military strength to force Israel to relinquish control of the Occupied Territories, while diplomatic efforts led nowhere. By this time it was clear that US policy in the region was to exclude the Palestinians from any negotiated settlement. In September 1975, while civil war was raging in Lebanon, Washington persuaded Egypt and Israel to sign the Sinai Accords, which called for Israel to return part of the Sinai in exchange for a nonaggression pledge from Egypt. The United States handsomely rewarded both countries and privately assured Israel that it would not be pressured into negotiating with Syria or the PLO. Israel's separate peace deal with Egypt was finalized at CAMP DAVID in 1979. With Egypt neutralized and Arab unity permanently undermined, Israel was free to escalate its military attacks on the Palestinian movement.

In June 1982, with the full support of the US government, the Israelis launched a full-scale invasion of Lebanon, killing 20,000 people and laying siege to Beirut. According to the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz, the strategic goal of the LEBANON WAR was "the physical annihilation of the PLO." It was also to fulfill Israel's objective of eliminating Palestinian nationalism in the Occupied Territories as a first step in its annexation. Palestinian forces held out in Beirut for two months, with no support from any Arab country. Between 10,000 and 12,000 PLO members were forced to evacuate by sea. The PLO relocated its headquarters to Tunis, while Palestinian fighters scattered to eight Arab countries. As soon as the PLO's armed units left, Israel allowed its right-wing Phalangist allies to enter the SABRA AND SHATILA refugee camps, where they proceeded to massacre over 3,000 Palestinian civilians.

The End of the Armed Struggle, 1983–1993

As a consequence of the Lebanon War, Palestinian guerrillas were sent to isolated camps, and the armed struggle of the previous two decades was, for the time being at least, effectively ended. Having been driven first from Jordan and then from Lebanon, the PLO found itself enormously weakened and more than ever under the control of the Arab states. This was emphasized in 1983 when a pro-Syrian faction of Fatah led by Abu Musa (SA'ID MUSA MURAGHA) split from the organization to form FATAH UPRISING. With Syrian support, including direct assistance from the Syrian army, Fatah Uprising eventually drove pro-Arafat forces out of Lebanon. The PFLP and DFLP, although sharing many of Abu Musa's criticisms of Fatah, were neutral in the conflict but moved their headquarters to Damascus shortly afterward, where they too became effectively pro-Syrian.

Some of the PLO's fighters did manage to return to Lebanon, but their main role was a purely defensive one of resisting attacks on the refugee camps by the Lebanese army (controlled by the country's right-wing Christian minority), the Israeli-backed Phalangist militias, and the Syrian-backed Shi'a militia, Amal. In 1985, 200 Palestinian youths in Shatila fought off thousands of Amal militia members, and by 1986 Fatah had a significant presence only in the isolated Ain al-Hilweh camp near Sidon.

By the mid-1980s the Palestinian liberation struggle in general, and the PLO in particular, seemed a spent force. Even financial assistance from Arab states began to dry up, and at the November 1987 ARAB LEAGUE summit, the Palestinian question received only minor attention.

The situation turned around dramatically the following month with the spontaneous beginning of a new uprising, or INTIFADA, in the Occupied Territories. In the preceding months, Israel had increased its repression in Gaza in an attempt to end a series of protests. On 8 December an Israeli military vehicle killed four Gazan workers. This proved to be the tipping point, and their funerals turned into mass demonstrations. Protests rapidly spread throughout Gaza and to the West Bank, involving most of the Palestinian population. There were also important demonstrations by Palestinian Arabs living in Israel itself. Although the protesters in the territories were poorly equipped, often with no more than stones and Molotov cocktails, they set up barricades and fought running battles with Israeli troops. Nonviolent tactics in this revolt included local Palestinian administrators and police resigning their positions, people refusing to pay taxes, a sustained boycott of Israeli goods, and businesses shutting their doors in opposition to the Occupation. The Israeli government responded with violence—Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN told Israeli soldiers to “break the bones” of the demonstrators—but was unable to stop the movement. Ordinary Palestinians facing poverty and political repression had reached their breaking point, and there was a mood of defiance and self-confidence that the Israelis were unable to breach.

As demonstrations continued throughout 1988, trade unions and other community organizations were revitalized. Local organizing committees produced daily leaflets and directives to coordinate activity. Within a few months, leading members of Fatah in the Occupied Territories, who were in close contact with the PLO leadership in Tunis, formed a Unified National Leadership of the Uprising (UNLU) composed of all the political factions. Israel responded with more violence, CURFEWS, collective punishments, and mass detentions. By the end of 1988, at least 30,000 Palestinians had been arrested and many others killed by Israeli troops. By July of the following year, the Palestinian death toll had reached 600, but the protests did not stop.

The Intifada was enormously successful in returning the Palestinian question to the top of the international political agenda, creating a new sense of unity among the Palestinians themselves, and exposing the colonial nature of Israel's Occupation. But over the longer run, the Intifada also revealed the structural limits of a movement based only on the Palestinian community. In particular, Palestinian workers were relatively marginal to the Israeli economy and could cause only temporary disruptions by going on strike. By the middle of 1989, the uprising had cost the Israeli economy $650 million in lost export earnings and added over $525 million to Israel's military budget, but with $3 billion in US aid coming into the country each year, Israel could absorb these costs.

The Intifada returned the PLO to the center of Arab politics. Members of Fatah and, to a lesser extent, the PFLP, DFLP, and Communist Party led the UNLU. Islamic groups such as the newly formed HAMAS (the Islamic Resistance Movement) and ISLAMIC JIHAD also participated in Intifada-related activities. Arafat took the opportunity to complete the transition that he had begun in 1974, and at the end of 1988 the PLO leadership unilaterally declared a Palestinian state in the Occupied Territories, simultaneously accepting Israel's legitimacy and its right to exist. Western governments applauded the announcement, and the United States instituted low-level talks with officials in Tunis.

Washington's willingness to open negotiations with the PLO, however, primarily reflected its concern that the Intifada was becoming a destabilizing factor in the wider Middle East and thus a potential threat to the continued smooth flow of oil from the region. Within a few days of the uprising's start, there was a huge solidarity rally in Lebanon. Demonstrations in Jordan and Bahrain were prevented only by arresting Palestinian activists. Conversely, the Syrian government organized its own solidarity demonstration at the end of December, and in February the Algerian government did the same. Additionally, there were clashes between the authorities and supporters of the Intifada in Tunisia, Iraq, Morocco, Egypt, Jordan, and KUWAIT. The Arab governments gave verbal and sometimes financial support to the uprising, but they were terrified that solidarity demonstrations would turn into mass rebellions against their own regimes. This is precisely what had already begun to happen in Egypt, where demonstrations led by students and workers denounced the Mubarak government's subservience to the West and turned into running battles with the police. Such developments also made the PLO leadership uncomfortable because of its close ties with the Arab regimes. Arafat even went to Kuwait to warn Palestinian activists there not to do anything that the monarchy might find threatening.

In October 1988 the unrest spread to Algeria, where privatization and austerity programs had led to rising prices and shortages of basic goods. There were strikes, demonstrations, and riots around the country in which the youth modeled itself on the Palestinian resistance in the Occupied Territories. Worried by these developments, and concerned that one or more of its regional allies could be vulnerable, the US government agreed to talks with the PLO, on the condition that it first recognize Israel and renounce "TERRORISM"—in other words, abandon the armed struggle.

The diplomatic process did not stop the Intifada, which continued throughout 1989 and into 1990. At this point, however, events in the Occupied Territories were eclipsed by the crisis caused by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and the subsequent US-led GULF WAR. The PLO, which for strategic reasons supported Iraq, paid a heavy price with hundreds of thousands of Palestinians workers expelled from the Gulf States, the loss of most of its financial support from the Arab states, and seemingly irreparable damage to its credibility and legitimacy. This was the background and context of the MADRID CONFERENCE convened by the United States shortly after the war, which in turn led to the secretly negotiated OSLO ACCORDS, signed in September 1993. In exchange for PLO recognition of Israel's right to exist and its abandonment of "terrorism," Israel recognized the PLO as the representative of the Palestinians and granted municipal powers to a newly constituted PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in Gaza and a handful of West Bank towns. The Israeli Occupation and SETTLEMENT of the territories continued, while the status of JERUSALEM and the situation of the Palestinian refugees were left to future negotiations. It was a humiliating agreement for the PLO. The Palestinian American intellectual EDWARD SAID commented at the time, "The PLO has transformed itself from a national liberation movement into a kind of small-town government, with the same handful of people in command."

Post-1993

Although the organized armed struggle against Israel was quieted by the hopes that Oslo might offer a real chance for an acceptable negotiated settlement, some organizations continued to advocate for and recruit members on the basis of continued armed struggle. Hamas, for instance, rejected the OSLO PROCESS and recruited heavily during the 1990s through both its political and social service programs. Its evolving political platform addressed all the concessions negotiated by Fatah during the 1993 Oslo Process with respect to Palestinian national rights: the right of return of Palestinian refugees, Jerusalem as the capital of a Palestinian state, and the unity of the Palestinian people.

In the mid-1990s, Hamas gained notoriety for its strategy of SUICIDE BOMBINGS against Israeli military and civilian targets. YAHYA AYYASH, "the engineer," provided the technical means for Hamas to carry out its strategy of using individual terrorists who could more easily infiltrate the Green Line (Israel's 1948 border) and get through the military CHECKPOINTS. Hamas's first suicide bombing took place on 4 April 1994, inside the Israeli city of Hadera, following the February 1994 HEBRON MASSACRE, when the American-Israeli settler BARUCH GOLDSTEIN murdered twenty-nine Muslims at prayer in AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE. Hamas and ISLAMIC JIHAD began discussions in the 1990s about limited cooperation on specific military acts and about their common rejection of the negotiations with Israel. Other organizations—primarily those of the secular left—failed to grow substantially because they vacillated on the legitimacy and effectiveness of the peace process. The dwindling numbers of the secular left also hindered its attempts at organizing effective armed or political struggle.

Partly in response to the growing popularity of the Islamic groups and partly because of growing conflict between secular nationalists and the Islamists, lower-ranking Fatah officials established their own military force—the TANZIM (The Organization)—inside the Occupied Territories in 1995. The formation of Tanzim reflected growing discomfort with the PNA's trajectory; its increasing cooperation with Israel began to open a rift inside Fatah between the leadership's course of negotiations and the rank and file's opposition to compromise with Israel. The Tanzim's leadership was drawn primarily from the local Fatah leaders of the 1987 Intifada, and its members have a reputation of being courageous street fighters and defenders of Palestinians against the Israeli forces. Tanzim members fought alongside PNA police forces in the armed uprising of September 1996, after the Israeli government opened the HASMONEAN TUNNEL under the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF (the Noble Sanctuary to Muslims and the TEMPLE MOUNT to Jews) in the Old City of Jerusalem, ostensibly for tourism purposes.

The emergence of the Tanzim was also a response to the declining fortunes of the PLO and Fatah. A large part of Arafat's motivation in accepting the Oslo blueprint had been the crumbling PLO operation in Tunis, the lack of any meaningful political or economic resources from Arab countries, and growing dissatisfaction with the PLO among Palestinians. The peace process offered Arafat and the PLO the opportunity to reassert their relevance, legitimacy, and authority; to shore up the organization's infrastructure; and to take on a more central role in the Occupied Territories. Oslo transformed the PLO and Fatah into governing and policing bodies rather than umbrella organizations of the resistance to Occupation. The PNA, largely composed of members of OLD GUARD Fatah, became primarily a police force guaranteeing Israel's "security," and in the process assumed responsibility for rounding up Palestinians involved in armed struggle. This role, in particular, brought Fatah into open conflict with opposition groups, including members of its own ranks, and was significant in catalyzing the Tanzim.

On 29 September 2000, following the failure of talks between Israeli prime minister EHUD BARAK and Arafat, LIKUD PARTY leader ARIEL SHARON made a provocative visit to the al-Haram ash-Sharif, the third holiest site in Islam, with more than 1,000 armed Israeli police. The event set off waves of protests and demonstrations, soon dubbed the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, an uprising that reflected increasing Palestinian frustration and despair with the peace process, their plunge into economic disintegration, the massive expansion of the SETTLEMENT project, and Israel's increasingly severe RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT. The uprising was similar to the First Intifada in some ways—pitched street battles, large organized demonstrations, and harsh responses from the Israeli armed forces. But in other ways the Second Intifada differed from the First in that both Israeli and Palestinian forces had more substantial firepower; the political forces on both sides had shifted considerably as a consequence of the peace process; and Palestinians on both sides of the Green Line were far more active in the uprising. After Israeli forces killed many unarmed protesters in the Occupied Territories, Palestinians engaged in hundreds of battles against the Israeli forces.

Palestinians had clearly drawn inspiration from the armed resistance that drove Israel out of Lebanon in May 2000. The Lebanese HIZBULLAH movement led a guerrilla resistance to Israel and the mercenary South Lebanon Army (SLA) in the Israeli-occupied security zone inside Lebanese territory. In May, Barak ordered an Israeli withdrawal with the aim of handing over the region to the SLA. But Hizbullah-led resistance turned the withdrawal into a rout, and the SLA collapsed within days. Hizbullah's armed resistance showed that Israel could be beaten militarily, and when Israel and Hizbullah had another battle in July–August 2006, Israel lost.

In many ways, the outcome of the Second Intifada was similar to that of the First, as the balance of military power had not decisively shifted in favor of the Palestinians. As long as the military conflict remained contained to the Occupied Territories, Israel retained a superior position. It possessed a large arsenal of fighter planes and helicopter gunships, and it demonstrated its superiority repeatedly with deadly incursions into Palestinian towns such as Rafah, NABLUS, JENIN, and Ramallah, where Israeli forces held Yasir Arafat captive in his compound from December 2001 until his death in November 2004. The superior firepower of Israel was also demonstrated in the disproportionate casualty rates of Palestinians as compared with Israelis and the large number of Palestinian men detained in Israeli prisons. Although Palestinians were able to launch some effective raids on military outposts and Israeli settlements, the changing landscape of the Occupied Territories made fighting against the Israeli armed forces difficult. Palestinians did receive some support from neighboring Arab countries, but it paled in comparison to the prior financial patronage, and countries like Jordan and Egypt faced internal crises in response to the Intifada that tied their hands. Still, the failures of the Intifada were the consequence of political missteps as much as military ones. Despite the growing protests in neighboring Arab states for Palestinian liberation and support for the armed struggle, the PLO and Fatah did not call for military support for the Palestinian cause. A confident movement of Egyptians and Jordanians against their states and allied with the Palestinians might have provided much-needed resources and solidarity and could have widened the offensive against Israel.

A split developed in Fatah, which widened even more with the death of Arafat, between the “old guard,” represented by MAHMUD ABBAS, and a younger, more militant wing, represented by, among others, the imprisoned MARWAN AL-BARGHUTHI. The success of Abbas over Barghuthi in the post-Arafat presidential elections signaled the victory of a wealthier, landed Palestinian elite, opposed to armed struggle with Israel and willing to reach territorial compromises far short of the original PLO and Fatah demands. Outside the PLO, the Islamists had gained much credibility for their willingness to confront Israel and their refusal to compromise on territorial concessions. As a consequence, Hamas won a decisive majority in the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL in early 2006 but soon incurred international isolation. In many ways, however, the victory of Hamas confirmed one of the central dynamics of the movement for Palestinian liberation: armed struggle was not ancillary or extraneous but a key determinant of the political fortune of Palestinian national aspiration.

The Intifada was still in progress in January 2009. B’Tselem statistics for deaths from 28 September 2000 to 31 November 2008 included 5,431 Palestinian fatalities and 580 Israeli fatalities. Hamas engaged in relentless, if ineffective, resistance with its Qassam rockets. But in the end its efforts only brought Israel’s wrath on Gaza in the form of Israel’s Operation Cast Lead from 27 November 2008 to 18 January 2009, in which 1,314 Palestinians and 14 Israelis were killed.

Conclusion

The failure of the Palestinian movement to achieve its main goals and the current impotent condition of that movement raise the question of whether the path of armed struggle was strategically wise. Following the September 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States, the US and Israeli governments have attempted to portray Palestinian armed struggle as morally unjustifiable terrorism. In response, a number of points can be made. First, the intransigence and brutality of the British colonial regime, Zionist settlers, and, finally, the state of Israel made it highly unlikely that any form of nonviolent resistance could have been effective. Following the pattern of many other third-world liberation movements, Palestinians turned to armed resistance after attempts at unarmed resistance (most notably the 1936 general strike) had been crushed. Second, the right to forcibly resist military Occupation and illegitimate authority is widely recognized. Palestinian resistance to British colonialism in the 1930s, and to Israeli Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip after 1967, is a relatively uncontroversial example of exercising this right. Finally, although armed struggle has failed to achieve a Palestinian state or the return of refugees, it has played a key role in achieving two more immediate goals. The persistence of the Palestinian struggle restored a sense of national identity to Palestinians and compelled the international community to recognize their plight.

Although the Palestinian armed struggle has often been compared to liberation struggles in such countries as Algeria and Vietnam, there are also important differences. In classic guerrilla warfare, the aim is not to defeat the enemy militarily but to raise the political costs (in terms of human and economic losses) to a level that the enemy is no longer willing to bear. But a variety of factors made this classic strategy unlikely to succeed in the case of Israel. First, as Sayigh points out, most Israelis, unlike French settlers in Algeria in the early 1960s, have no “mother country” to which they can return, making them more willing to accept a heavy burden of costs. Second, the large economic subsidy that Israel receives from the United States has made it much easier for Israel to bear the material costs of the conflict. Third, Palestinians are much more peripheral to the Israeli economy than, for example, blacks were to the economy of South Africa under apartheid, making it difficult to combine armed struggle with effective economic pressure through boycotts, strikes, and other forms of industrial action.

Fatah adopted the strategy of attempting to persuade or cajole the leaders of Arab countries to take up the Palestinian cause, either through military confrontation with Israel or, after 1973, through diplomatic pressure on Israel to agree to a Palestinian mini-state. In part because of this strategy and in part because it was being funded by Arab regimes, Fatah refused to interfere in the internal affairs of the Arab states, even though many had large Palestinian populations and Palestinian activists were sometimes the victims of repression by Arab governments. Fatah stayed with this strategy in Jordan to an extent, but the organization became caught up in antiregime politics, and King Husayn felt as threatened by Fatah as it did by the PFLP. This led to the PLO's defeat in Jordan in 1970 and later, as a result of a similar situation, to its 1982 defeat in Lebanon. By 1988, the PLO under Fatah's leadership had eschewed the toppling of Arab governments and armed struggle; had accepted the partition of Palestine and the existence of Israel; and had embraced the idea of a Palestinian mini-state.

Fatah's strategy was criticized by both the PFLP and the DFLP in the late 1960s. The PFLP argued that the Palestinian struggle was part of an international fight against imperialism and that Palestinian liberation was linked to the overthrow of Arab regimes that were supported by the imperialist countries. Rejecting Fatah's nonintervention principle, the PFLP supported the struggle of Arab workers and peasants against their own governments. But the PFLP's tactics—in particular its reliance on airline hijackings to draw attention to Palestinian demands in the late 1960s and early 1970s—offered no concrete way to build a wider anti-imperialist movement in the Arab world. Furthermore, because it regarded some Arab regimes, such as Syria and Iraq, as anti-imperialist and progressive, it allied itself with them despite their policies of domestic repression and was soon being manipulated by such regimes for their own purposes. By the 1980s the PFLP had followed Fatah in accepting the idea of a Palestinian state in the Occupied Territories. The DFLP initially rejected the latter's distinction between reactionary and progressive Arab regimes and argued for an orientation to the Arab working class. Following the Palestinian defeat in Jordan, however, the DFLP moderated its views and came to accept much of Fatah's political program.

Disillusionment with this program and with the repression, corruption, and impotence of the Palestinian National Authority set up by the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS led to increased support for Hamas and other Islamic political groups. Armed attacks on Israeli targets by Hamas and Islamic Jihad have proved popular because of increasing Palestinian frustration with perceived Israeli intransigence, but they offer no more chance of defeating Israel than the use of similar tactics by secular groups—in fact, less so since guerrilla resistance has been replaced by individual acts of violence. Even before its election victory in early 2006, Hamas had in practice accepted most of Fatah's concessions—de facto recognition of Israel, the Palestinian mini-state framework, and suspension of armed attacks. Despite this, Israel, backed by the United States, sought to undermine the new government by withholding tax revenues that it collected on behalf of the Palestinian Authority, resulting in a humanitarian crisis in Gaza, open conflict between Hamas and Fatah, renewed attacks on Israel by Palestinian militants, and regular military incursions by Israel into Gaza (from which it had withdrawn in 2005), culminating in a full-scale Israeli invasion in December 2008.

The resulting crisis in the Palestinian struggle and the growing belief that a Palestinian mini-state can never be viable are leading to renewed debate about the strategy for Palestinian liberation. Some are once again linking the Palestinian struggle with a broader fight against imperialism, which would connect mass struggle against the Israeli occupation of Palestine, the US occupation of Iraq, and repressive Arab regimes with the aim of transforming the entire Middle East and establishing a democratic, secular state in the whole of historic Palestine. Armed actions might play a role in such a struggle, but they would be subordinated to the broader political strategy of a regional Intifada connecting the Palestinian cause to the fight for liberation across the Middle East and beyond. During both the 1987 Intifada and the 2000 AL-AQSA INTIFADA, mass demonstrations by Palestinians—including attacks on Israeli military targets and armed Israeli settlers—led to solidarity actions and antigovernment protests in many other Arab countries. Whether the revival of such movements in the future might become the basis for genuine Palestinian liberation remains, of course, to be seen.

See also ARAB PEACE INITIATIVE, 2002 AND 2007; ARAB REVOLT; ARAB STATE PEACE OVERTURES, 1949–PRESENT; ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; BRITISH MANDATE IN PALESTINE; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Omar, Mostafa. "The Palestinian National Liberation Movement: A Socialist Analysis." In The Struggle for Palestine. Edited by Lance Selfa. Chicago: Haymarket Books, 2002.
- O'Neill, Bard E. Armed Struggle in Palestine: A Political-Military Analysis. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1978.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- . "Palestinian Armed Struggle: Means and Ends." Journal of Palestine Studies. 16:1 (1986).
- Sharabi, Hisham. Palestine Guerrillas: Their Credibility and Effectiveness. Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1970.

—Philip Gasper and Snehal Shingavi

Armistice Agreements, 1949

In 1949 four armistice agreements were negotiated under UN auspices and signed at Rhodes, Greece, between Israel and its neighbors—EGYPT, JORDAN, LEBANON, and SYRIA. The accords, which excluded Palestinian participation, were designed to end the 1948 WAR and established the "Green Line" between Israel and the WEST BANK, then under Jordanian rule. The map illustrates the difference between the boundaries set by the UN Partition Resolution (181) in 1947 and those that emerged as a result of the 1948 War.

The armistice agreements were intended as temporary, to be replaced by permanent peace treaties; however, no peace treaties were signed until decades later.

The agreements left some 78 percent of Mandatory Palestine in Israeli hands. The remaining areas of Palestine—the Gaza Strip and West Bank—were occupied by Egypt and Jordan, respectively, until 1967. Except for the accord with Lebanon, the armistice agreements were clear that they were not creating permanent or de jure borders. The Egyptian-Israeli agreement stated that "the Armistice Demarcation Line is not to be construed in any sense as a political or territorial boundary, and is delineated without prejudice to rights, claims and positions of either Party to the Armistice as regards ultimate settlement of the Palestine question."

The Jordanian-Israeli agreement also stated that "no provision of this Agreement shall in any way prejudice the rights, claims, and positions of either Party hereto in the peaceful settlement of the Palestine questions, the provisions of this Agreement being dictated exclusively by military considerations" (Art. II.2), and that "the Armistice Demarcation Lines defined in articles V and VI of this Agreement are agreed upon by the Parties without prejudice to future territorial settlements or boundary lines or to claims of either Party relating thereto" (Art. VI.9).

Egypt

The main points of the agreement between Israel and Egypt, signed on 24 February, were the following:

- The armistice line was drawn along the international border (dating back to 1906) for the most part, except near the Mediterranean Sea where Egypt remained in control of a strip of land along the coast, which became known as the GAZA STRIP.
- The Egyptian forces besieged in the Faluja Pocket were allowed to return to Egypt with their weapons, and the area was handed over to Israel.
- A zone on both sides of the border near 'Uja al-Hafeer/Nitzana was demilitarized and became the seat of the bilateral armistice committee.

Lebanon

The main points of the Israeli agreement with Lebanon, signed on 23 March, were the following:

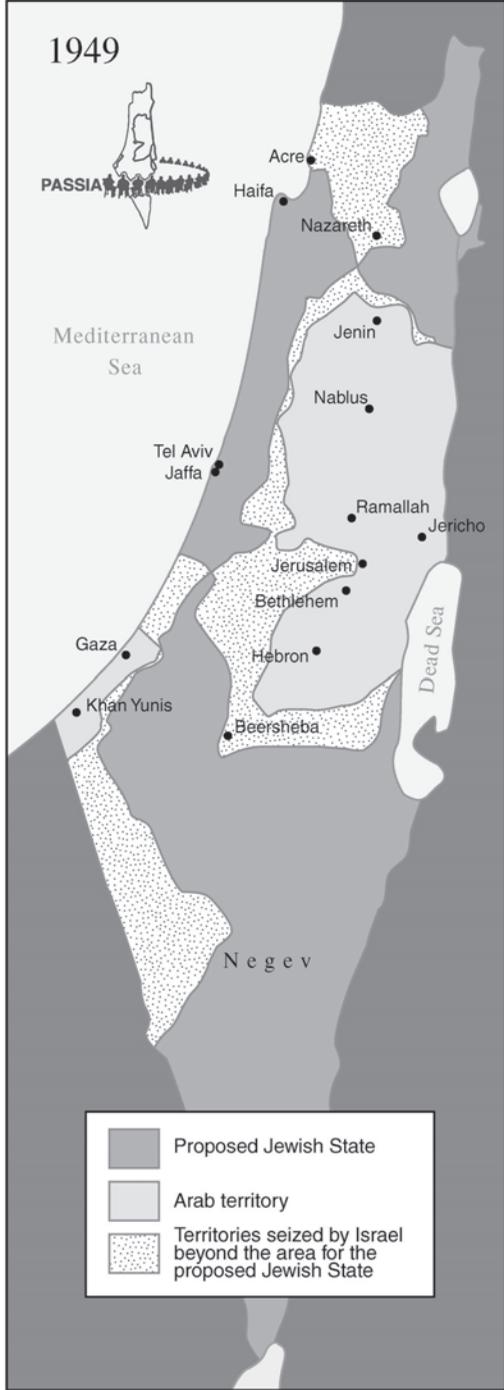

- The armistice line (the "Blue Line") was drawn along the international border.
- Unlike the agreements with the other states, there was no clause disclaiming this line as an international border, and it was thereafter treated as it had been previously, as a de jure international border.
- Israel withdrew its forces from thirteen villages in Lebanese territory, which it occupied during the war.

Jordan

The main points of the Israel-Jordan agreement, signed on 3 April, were the following:

United Nations Partition Plan
UN Resolution 181

Rhodes Armistice Line

© Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA), reprinted with permission.

Map 2. UN Partition Plan and Rhodes Armistice

- Jordanian forces remained in most positions held by them in the West Bank, particularly East JERUSALEM, which included the Old City.
- Jordan withdrew its forces from their front posts overlooking the Plain of Sharon. In return, Israel agreed to allow Jordanian forces to control positions in the West Bank previously held by Iraqi forces.
- A special committee was formed to plan for the safe movement of traffic between Jerusalem and the Mount Scopus campus of Hebrew University, along the Latrun-Jerusalem Highway, free access to holy places, and other matters.

Syria

After the Israeli-Syrian agreement was signed on 20 July, Syria withdrew its forces from most of the territories it controlled west of the international border, which became demilitarized zones.

Others

Iraq, whose forces took an active part in the war (although it has no common border with Israel), withdrew from the region in March 1949. Because the front occupied by Iraqi forces was covered by the armistice between Israel and Jordan, there was no separate agreement with Iraq.

A Mixed Armistice Commission was formed to deal with each case of violation of an armistice line. After investigating complaints by either party, it made regular reports to the UN Security Council. In the years following the signing of the agreements, all of the parties were condemned many times for violations. Egypt, for example, kept a large military force in the demilitarized 'Uja al-Hafeer area. Israel, on its side, reinforced the Mount Scopus enclave (which was supposed to be demilitarized) with armed soldiers disguised as policemen. Israel also sent soldiers into Jordanian territory on numerous occasions to conduct massive retaliatory raids for incursions by Palestinian infiltrators. Additionally, Israel continuously penetrated the demilitarized zone along the Syrian border, and Syrian forces launched numerous artillery attacks against Israeli forces and settlements in the demilitarized zone adjacent to the Golan Heights.

Bibliography

Israeli-Egyptian General Armistice Agreement. 24 February 1949. Avalon Project at Yale Law School. <http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/mideast/arm01.htm>.

Israeli-Syrian General Armistice Agreement. 20 July 1949. Avalon Project at Yale Law School. <http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/mideast/arm04.htm>.

Israel-Jordan General Armistice Agreement. 3 April 1949. Jerusalem Archives. <http://www.jerusalem-archives.org/docs/d-9.html>.

Israel-Lebanon Armistice Agreement. 23 March 1949. Jewish Virtual Library. <http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/History/islebarm.html>.

Morris, Benny. Israel's Border Wars, 1949–1956: Arab Infiltration, Israeli Retaliation, and the Countdown to the Suez War, rev. ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Van Horn, Maj. Gen. Carl. Soldiering for Peace. New York: McKay, 1967.

'Asfur, Hasan

Hasan 'Asfur was secretary to the Palestinian negotiating team that concluded the initial OSLO negotiations for Israel's withdrawal from the GAZA STRIP and West Bank. He was elected to the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (PLC) as an independent from Khan Yunis. In August 1998 'Asfur became minister without portfolio of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) and then minister of nongovernmental organization (NGO) affairs, but in June 1999 he was forced out of the Cabinet. In the two months prior to the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT in 2000, 'Asfur participated in secret negotiations with ABU ALA'A and the Israelis Shlomo Ben-Ami and Gilad Sher in what was known as "the Swedish Channel," but he later became a bitter critic of the Palestinian negotiating strategy. He was a leading figure in the PALESTINE PEOPLE'S PARTY (Communist Party).

As minister of NGO affairs 'Asfur carried out YASIR ARAFAT's objective of making the NGOs subordinate to the will and the interests of Arafat and the PNA leadership. This undercut the democratic process and adversely affected the work of the PLC.

In March 2003 'Asfur joined with Gaza security chief MUHAMMAD DAHLAN, SAEB EREKAT, MUHAMMAD RASHID, and NABIL SHA'TH in what came to be called the "GANG OF FIVE." In effect, they assumed control of and ran the PNA from March to May 2002. They wanted a return to the OSLO format of direct negotiations with Israel, an end to the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, especially armed attacks, and a restructuring of the PNA's security apparatus into a single organization headed by Dahlan and supported by the US CIA but also by the intelligence agencies of EGYPT, JORDAN, and SAUDI ARABIA. In May 2002 'Asfur was attacked and seriously wounded, requiring hospitalization, by suspected supporters of JIBRIL RAJUB.

Bibliography

Agha, Hussein, et al. Track-II Diplomacy: Lessons from the Middle East. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2004.
'Asfur, Hasan. "Reaping Strategic Mistakes." Interviewed on Palestinian-Israeli Crossfire on "Negotiating Strategies." 17 June 2002. www.bitterlemons.org.
Rothstein, Robert L., Moshe Maoz, and Khalil Shikaki. The Israeli-Palestinian Peace Process: Oslo and the Lessons of Failure. Brighton, UK, and Portland, OR: Sussex Academic Press, 2002.

Ashkenazi

The term Ashkenazi refers to Jews whose origins lie in Europe, as compared to MIZRAHI, whose origins are in the Arab world, Africa, and elsewhere. Ashkenazi Jews formulated and implemented ZIONISM, as well as all the institutions of the Yishuv. In the state of Israel, the Ashkenazi and the Mizrahi have formed distinct cultural entities with differing socioeconomic status. The Ashkenazi continue to dominate all elite sectors of Israeli society, while the overwhelming number of the impoverished are Mizrahim or SEPHARDIM. Both the LABOR PARTY and the LIKUD remain predominantly though not exclusively Ashkenazi.

Bibliography

Ben-Rafael, Eliezer, and Stephen Sharot. Ethnicity, Religion and Class in Israeli Society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
Goldscheider, Calvin. Israel's Changing Society: Population, Ethnicity, and Development. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2002.

Ashrawi, Hanan Mikha'il (1946–)

An educator, academic, and longtime Palestinian political activist, Hanan Ashrawi has been an articulate spokesperson for the Palestinian cause throughout Europe and America. Born in Nablus when the WEST BANK was under Jordanian OCCUPATION, Ashrawi moved frequently with her family during her childhood. From Nablus her family settled in TIBERIAS until 1948, and then settled in Ramallah, West Bank.

In 1967 Ashrawi received her B.A. and M.A. in literature from the Department of English at the American University of Beirut. After the 1967

WAR, Israel labeled all Palestinian residents who were not in the country "absentees" with no legal status or right to return home, making Ashrawi unable to return to Palestine. Thus she moved to the UNITED STATES and earned a Ph.D. in medieval and comparative literature from the University of Virginia.

When Dr. Ashrawi was able to return to her homeland in 1973, she established the Department of English at Birzeit University and served as chairperson of that department from 1973 to 1978 and again from 1981 to 1984. From 1986 to 1990, she served the university as dean of the faculty of arts, after which she remained a faculty member at Birzeit until 1995. During this time she authored several books, short stories, poems, and articles.

Ashrawi's political career began at American University, where she was actively involved in student politics. While studying in the United States she became active in the women's movement. During her time at Birzeit, she was in the heart of the Palestinian struggle for independence and frequently led her students in demonstrations. Ashrawi was arrested several times and more than once carried wounded students in her car through CHECKPOINTS, tear gas, and bullets to take them to the hospital. As the university experienced intermittent CLOSURES by the Israeli military, Ashrawi participated in the founding of the Birzeit University Legal Aid Committee/Human Rights Action project and held classes in her home or at a local hostel.

In 1988 Ashrawi was invited to appear on ABC's Nightline as part of a three-hour discussion between Palestinians and Israelis. Her fluent English and clarity of argument put her in demand with other broadcasters. She was successful in presenting the Palestinian cause in a sympathetic light, humanizing the Palestinians' plight, and giving them a voice that appealed to the world. In 1988 she joined the INTIFADA Political Committee, serving on its diplomatic committee until 1993. Additionally, from 1991 to 1993 she served as official spokesperson for the Palestinian delegation to the MADRID CONFERENCE and as a member of the leadership/guidance and executive committees of the delegation.

With the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS in 1993, Ashrawi founded the Preparatory Committee of the PALESTINIAN INDEPENDENT COMMISSION FOR CITIZENS' RIGHTS in Jerusalem and was a member until 1995. From 1996 through 1998 she served as minister of higher education and research in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY and became a member of the PALESTINE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

In 1998, however, Ashrawi resigned from the government in protest over corruption and against Arafat's handling of the peace talks. At the same time she founded MIFTAH—the PALESTINIAN INITIATIVE FOR THE PROMOTION OF GLOBAL DIALOGUE AND DEMOCRACY, whose goal is respect for human rights, democracy, and peace.

Ashrawi is a member of the Independent International Commission on Kosovo and of numerous international advisory boards, including the Council on Foreign Relations, the World Bank Middle East and North Africa Region (MENA), and the UN Research Institute for Social Development (UNRISD).

Bibliography

- Anonymous. "Hanan Ashrawi." Current Biography. 3 (1992).
- Ashrawi, Hanan. This Side of Peace: A Personal Account. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.
- . "Where We Went Wrong: A Palestinian's Soul Search." Progressive. 66:2 (2002).
- Bouvard, Marguerite Guzmán. "Hanan Mikhail Ashrawi." In Women Reshaping Human Rights. Wilmington, DE: Scholarly Resources, 1996.
- Shlaim, Avi. "Woman of the Year." New York Review of Books. 6:8 (1995).
- Victor, Barbara. A Voice of Reason: Hanan Ashrawi and Peace in the Middle East. San Diego: Harcourt Brace, 1994.

Al-'Asifa

FATAH's armed forces, al-'Asifa (The Storm), started out as a group of student activists from which Fatah and YASIR ARAFAT drew for their early military operations. In 1965 Arafat wanted to strengthen the morale of Fatah cadres and expand their influence while avoiding the wrath of Arab governments. His policy was that Fatah would endorse the ARMED STRUGGLE if al-'Asifa succeeded. If al-'Asifa failed, then al-'Asifa would take responsibility for the failure and not Fatah. The initial group consisted of only twenty-six fighters who were poorly armed. Even though al-'Asifa's early raids were utter failures, Arafat proceeded to make outsized claims of success. He predicted that money would begin to flow once they started to kill, no matter how small their actual effect. On this he was right. Still, Fatah did not take credit for the organization until al-'Asifa had carried out fifteen operations. By 1968 al-

'Asifa had become known as the armed wing of Fatah and was subsumed under the Fatah General Command, headed by KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad) and Arafat. In March 1990 al-'Asifa was dissolved within Force 17, the "Presidential Guard" that was recruited from the PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.
- Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.
- Quandt, William, Faud Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for a State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

Assassination

See TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS

Association for Civil Rights in Israel

The Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI) was founded in 1972 as a nonpolitical and independent body, with the goal of protecting human and civil rights in Israel and in the Occupied Territories under Israeli control. Today ACRI is one of Israel's leading human rights organizations. It works with policymakers, advancing legislation and encouraging them to change policy, and seeks legal precedents through the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT (www.acri.org.il/english-acri/engine/index.asp).

Association of Forty

The Association of Forty (Association for the Recognition of the Arab Unrecognized Villages in Israel) is a grassroots nongovernmental organization in Israel, committed to the promotion of social justice in the Palestinian sector of Israel and to gaining recognition for the UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES in this sector. The Association of Forty was formally established in 1988 in the unrecognized village of Ein-Hod by the local committee of the village, the inhabitants of other unrecognized villages, and Palestinian and Jewish volunteers from all over Israel. Among the association's goals are to obtain official recognition for all the unrecognized villages and improve living conditions, to provide a legal structure through which the village inhabitants can pursue their rights, and to claim full rights and equality for the Arab citizens of Israel.

The association's Law Center provides legal advice to village residents about Israeli policies of demolishing houses and confiscating lands. Additionally the association attempts to strengthen the residents' resolve to remain in their villages by initiating projects within these villages, such as paving roads; improving existing roads; helping residents to connect their villages to networks of water, electricity, and telephones; establishing kindergartens and clinics for mother and child care; and obtaining educational noncurricular activities for schoolchildren. (www.assoc40.org/index\_main.html).

See also ADALAH; ARAB ASSOCIATION FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Atara L' Yoshna

Founded in 1979, Atara L' Yoshna (the crown to its original form) is also known as the Society for the Renewal of Jewish Settlement throughout the Old City of JERUSALEM. Its main goal is to increase the Jewish presence in the Old City, especially near the TEMPLE MOUNT, the site of an ancient Jewish temple and now a complex of Muslim religious buildings known as AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, by purchasing property for Jewish SETTLEMENT in the Muslim and Christian quarters. As such it is involved with the THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT and also maintains a Study and Tourist Center near the WESTERN WALL.

Atara L' Yoshna is considered a settler "front organization," in that once a Palestinian property in Jerusalem's Old City has been identified by a settler group for takeover, Atara L' Yoshna assumes responsibility for the property's acquisition and restoration. Other, more recently established groups—for example, EVAN ROSH COMPANY and Mordot Moria—are engaged in similar work, but less is known about them, and Atara L' Yoshna remains the most important. Although the organization is registered as a non-profit, it has been directly involved in taking over Palestinian homes, evicting the residents, and squatting until government recognition is forthcoming. It is also active in real estate deals for the settler groups in the Old City in close association with ATERET COHANIM, Yeshiva Torat Cohanim, and the Young Israel Movement.

Atara L' Yoshna's efforts to locate Palestinian property are assisted by the fact that most of the properties targeted by settler groups are under the trusteeship of the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY or the Israel Lands Administration. The cooperation between Atara L' Yoshna and these two government departments is quite close, to the extent that the Israel Lands Administration has given Atara L' Yoshna formal recognition for its work. In fact Atara L' Yoshna acts as an unofficial arm of the Lands Administration and also receives substantial financing from the Israeli government. Analysts investigating the group believe that by 1999 Atara L' Yoshna had received $1.8 million from various ministries in the government.

See also SETTLEMENTS, FINANCING OF; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Dixon, John. "Jerusalem Today: The Dialectics of Power and Resistance." Jerusalem Journal. Jerusalem Quarterly File. 3 (1999).
- Dumper, Michael. The Politics of Sacred Space: The Old City of Jerusalem in the Middle East Conflict. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2002.
- Friedman, Robert I. "And Darkness Covered the Land." The Nation. 24 (December 2001).
- . "The Priestly Crown." APF Reporter. 10:3 (1987).
- Gorenberg, Gershon. The End of Days: Fundamentalism and the Struggle for the Temple Mount, new ed. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Levy, Gideon. "The High Priests of Calamity." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 1 June 1998.
- Schwartz, Michael. "Collusion in Jerusalem: How the Government and the Settlers Conspire to Take Over Houses and Land." Challenge (Israel). 50 (1998).

Ateret Cohanim

Ateret Cohanim (Crown of the Priests, or Priestly Crown) is both a yeshiva (religious school) and an extremist settler association whose objective is to force out Palestinians from the Old City of JERUSALEM and Judaize the city. Mattityahu Hacohen founded the group in 1978, and Ateret Cohanim acquired its first Palestinian property in the Muslim Quarter that year.

The GUSH EMUNIM considers Ateret Cohanim a “special” yeshiva, and many of its sons study there. Students learn the ancient priestly texts in anticipation of the coming of the Hebrew Messiah and the rebuilding of the Second Temple on TEMPLE MOUNT (the Islamic holy site AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF).

In the mid-1980s Ateret Cohanim began to receive considerable government financial and logistical support from both the Ministry of Religion, which provided the group with $250,000, and the Housing Ministry, which gave it $40,000. At the same time, the state-owned JEWISH QUARTER DEVELOPMENT COMPANY transferred $1.7 million to Ateret Cohanim and several other Jerusalem settler groups. Since then, various ministries in the Israeli government have given Ateret Cohanim hundreds of thousands of dollars for its settlement and religious activities. Hacohen himself became a regular fixture in the halls of the Knesset, where he lobbied for Jewish settlement in the Old City and forged particularly close relationships with ARIEL SHARON and his chief aide, Rafi Eitan, who were in charge of the WEST BANK SETTLEMENT program at the time.

The state of Israel and Ateret Cohanim have cooperated in other ways. Both have worked together to identify “ABSENTEE PROPERTY” in the city, after which representatives of the Mordot Moria and EVAN ROSH companies, set up by the settlers, register the properties with the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY, which in turn “sells” it to Ateret Cohanim and other groups.

Additionally, during the 1980s Hacohen organized a group of American Jewish supporters who founded the JERUSALEM RECLAMATION PROJECT, an arm of Ateret Cohanim, to raise money for property acquisitions in the Muslim Quarter. Shortly thereafter evangelical Christian groups in the United States and Europe began financing the activities of Ateret Cohanim and similar groups. The evangelicals and the Jewish settlers have parallel interests. For the Christian fundamentalists, rebuilding the Jewish temple on Haram al-Sharif is a key element in the divine plan for the tribulation, the rapture, and the final triumphant return of Christ. For Jewish fundamentalists, rebuilding the temple will bring the Jewish Messiah. In 1982 Ateret Cohanim students began to tunnel under the Temple Mount in search of a chamber where King Solomon is believed to have hidden many of the gold vessels used in the First Temple. Palestinian guards at the DOME OF THE ROCK heard the digging, and, in the ensuing melee, Israeli police had the tunnel sealed. Yeshiva students have, on several occasions, thrown feces at Palestinians and have harassed and humiliated them in numerous other ways.

With some exceptions, both Jewish and Christian money from abroad is funneled to Ateret Cohanim through the Jerusalem Reclamation Project. For example, at one 1997 fund-raising dinner in New York, the Reclamation Project raised $375,000 for the work of Ateret Cohanim. Some wealthy Jewish individuals outside of Israel, such as Morton Freiman and Irving Moskowitz, finance Ateret Cohanim directly.

By 1987 Ateret Cohanim owned more than seventy buildings in the Muslim Quarter worth an estimated $10 million. The properties include their yeshiva, the building that houses Yeshiva Shuvu Banim, several dormitories, a museum, and about fifty apartment units. Ateret Cohanim officials estimated that the cost to purchase the rest of the buildings in the Muslim Quarter would be $100 million, with another $100 million needed for renovations.

Because both JORDAN and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION have made it a capital crime to sell property to Jews, Ateret Cohanim uses a variety of methods to “reclaim” Jerusalem property. Sometimes it uses Christian Arab middlemen to purchase property in the Muslim Quarter to disguise the fact that the buyers are Jews. Rabbi Shlomo Aviner stated publicly that “we will settle more and more of our Holy City, until all of it is ours.” Because the settler groups will not be able to acquire all the houses in the city, the rabbi said they will make Palestinian residents’ lives so bitter that the latter will eventually flee the city.

Ateret Cohanim activities in the 1990s and beyond have mainly centered on acquiring Palestinian land and houses for Jewish settlements in both the Christian and Muslim quarters of Jerusalem—both inside and outside the Old City. Its property-owning arm, ATARA L’ YOSHNA, plays a significant role in all these activities. The 1990 takeover of St. John’s Hospice in the Christian Quarter brought considerable attention to Ateret Cohanim, and with almost every property “reclaimed” by the group, there has been overt conflict. In the 1990s Ateret Cohanim was involved in evicting Palestinians from their homes in SILWAN, below the southern wall of the Old City, and it is also active in acquiring homes and land in RAS AL-AMUD, where it has constructed a Jewish neighborhood (Ma'aleh Ha'Zeitim) in the midst of Palestinian residents. It is estimated that by 2006 Ateret Cohanim had acquired more than 1,100 properties in the Old City. (www.ateret.org.il).

See also AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF; JERUSALEM; KLUGMAN REPORT; SETTLEMENTS (B'TSELEM); SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Broder, Jonathan. "Armchair Warriors for Zion?" Salon, News Real. 1997. www.salon.com/news/1997/10/16news.html.
- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Dixon, John. "Jerusalem Today: The Dialectics of Power and Resistance." Jerusalem Journal. Jerusalem Quarterly File. 3 (1999).
- Dumper, Michael. The Politics of Sacred Space: The Old City of Jerusalem in the Middle East Conflict. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2002.
- Friedman, Robert I. "And Darkness Covered the Land." The Nation. 24 December 2001.
- . "The Priestly Crown." APF Reporter. 10:3 (1987). <http://www.aliciapatterson.org/APF1003/Friedman/Friedman.html>.
- Gorenberg, Gershon. "The Disengagement from Mes-sianism." Jerusalem Report. 2 May 2005.
- . The End of Days: Fundamentalism and the Struggle for the Temple Mount, new ed. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Halsell, Grace. Prophecy and Politics: The Secret Alliance between Israel and the U.S. Christian Right, rev. ed. Westport, CT: Lawrence Hill, 1989.
- Hampson, Annika. "Ethnic Cleansing in Jerusalem." al-Ahram (Egypt). 12–18 June 2003.
- Levy, Gideon. "The High Priests of Calamity." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 1 June 1998.
- Schwartz, Michael. "Collusion in Jerusalem: How the Government and the Settlers Conspire to Take Over Houses and Land." Challenge (Israel). 50 (1998).

'Attallah, 'Attallah

'Attallah 'Attallah (Abu Za'im) was a dissident FATAH military leader. Born in HEBRON under the Jordanian OCCUPATION, he served in the Jordanian army and was based in Amman until 1968, when he was dismissed. In the spring of 1971, 'Attallah was recruited by FATAH and given command of Fatah forces in South LEBANON. In July 1971 YASIR ARAFAT charged 'Attallah with implementing the new policy of tajyish (turning guerrilla forces into a conventional army). However 'Attallah proved to be personally ambitious, first engaging in rivalry with Walid Nimr, which resulted in competing deployments of forces, then creating his own battalion, known as Shuhada' Aylul (Martyrs of September). In spite of these actions, in early 1972 Arafat appointed him as head of central operations in Lebanon and then as head of Fatah military intelligence.

In 1983 'Attallah was sacked from the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE for his support of the FATAH UPRISING. In 1986, Jordan's KING HUSAYN turned over the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) offices and funds in Jordan to Attallah and encouraged him to launch a "corrective movement" within Fatah. On 8 April 1986, with Jordanian support and the king's public call for "new leadership," Attallah convened a conference that "elected" him as caretaker chairman of the PLO. Attallah also played a key role in Jordan's attempts to win back the support of WEST BANK leaders. He was successful to an extent in the latter; nevertheless, by early 1987 the majority of his supporters had returned to the PLO. Jordan did not investigate an attempt to assassinate him that year.

Bibliography

- Frankel, Norman. "Abu Za'im—Alternative to Yasir Arafat?" Terrorism. 11:2 (1988).
- Al-Sabi, al-Yawm. "Israel Opens Arms to 'Atallah 'Attallah and Sa'dallah." Journal of Palestine Studies. 16:3 (1987).

A Tur

A Tur is a Palestinian neighborhood within the municipal borders of JERUSALEM that has been a target of Jewish settlers, subjected to SETTLER VIOLENCE, and negatively affected by the BARRIER (separation wall). It is one victim of Israel's objective of completing the Judaization of all Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty. The experience of A Tur is similar to that of SILWAN, RAS AL-AMUD, 'Anata, ABU DIS, and other Palestinian areas of the city. A Tur has been the site of extensive HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, LAND confiscation, and a great deal of violence. In April 2003 a plot by Jewish settlers from Bat Ayin settlement to attack a Palestinian girls' school and adjacent Mukassad Hospital in A Tur was foiled by Israeli police officers. The settlers had planned to detonate explosives in the morning, when students would be congregating in the schoolyard before class. Both this and a 5 March plot in the same year particularly frightened residents because of their intent to inflict TERROR on a mass scale by targeting a particularly vulnerable group of soft targets—in this case students.

See also JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Chesin, Amir, Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Eldar, Akiva. "Suffering? The Fabric of Life Is Not Torn." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 28 October 2003.
- Klein, Menachem. "Apartheid." Jerusalemites. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Forum. 20 November 2003.
- Levitt, Matthew, and Julie Sawyer. "The Threat of Jewish Terror in Israel and the West Bank." Peace-watch. 470 (2004).
- Liss, Jonathan, and Amit Ben-Aroya. "Two Jewish Settlers Caught Planting Bomb near East J'lem Arab Hospital." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 5 October 2002.

Avnery, Uri (1923–)

Uri Avnery (originally Helmut Ostermann) is a leading peace activist, journalist and writer, former Knesset member, and founder of GUSH SHALOM. He was born in Beckum, Westphalia (GERMANY), and with his family immigrated to Palestine in 1933. Just before turning fifteen, Avnery joined the underground IRGUN TZEVA'İ LE'UMI and served for three years. He left the Irgun in protest against its anti-Arab and reactionary social attitudes and its TERRORIST methods. Later he explained his attitude in a booklet entitled Terrorism, the Infantile Disease of the Hebrew Revolution (1945).

Because of his once-wealthy family's extreme poverty in Palestine, Avnery left school at the age of fourteen and earned his living at many jobs until he turned to journalism as his profession in 1947. After some years of sporadic political activity, in 1946 Avnery founded the Eretz Yisrael Hatz'ira (Young Palestine Movement), also known as the Bama'avak (Struggle Group) after the name of its publication, which he edited. This group created an unprecedented uproar because of its contention that the Jewish community in Palestine constitutes a "new Hebrew nation" within the Jewish people and that this nation is part of Asia and the natural ally of the Arab nation. In September 1947 Avnery published a booklet entitled War or Peace in the Semitic Region, which called for a radically new approach to Israel's place in the region. He envisioned an alliance of the Hebrew and Arab national movements to liberate the common "Semitic Region" (a term coined by Avnery to avoid the colonialist term "Middle East") from imperialism and colonialism, and to create a Semitic community and common market as a part of the emerging third world.

During the 1948 WAR, Avnery joined the army (Giv'ati brigade) and later volunteered for "Samson's Foxes," a commando unit on the Egyptian front, which soon became legendary. During the last days of the fighting he was severely wounded, and after several months of convalescence was discharged in the summer of 1949 with the rank of squad leader. Throughout the war, Avnery reported on his experiences as a combat soldier who took part in nearly all the major battles on the JERUSALEM and southern fronts. These reports, which appeared in the Ha'aretz evening paper, were published after the war as a book, Bisdoth Pleshet (1948, In the Fields of the Philistines), which became an overnight best seller and is still generally recognized as the outstanding book of that war. Ten editions were published in quick succession and several more subsequently. (A new edition was published in April 1998.) However, Avnery's follow-up book, The Other Side of the Coin, which described the dark side of the war, including its atrocities and the expulsion of the Palestinians, was boycotted.

In 1949 the editor of Ha'aretz invited Avnery to join his staff as a writer of editorials; however, after one year Avnery quit, protesting that he was not allowed to express his opinions, especially concerning the mass expropriation of Palestinian LANDS by the government. Thus, in April 1950 he bought a moribund magazine and turned it into a unique Israeli institution: Haolam Hazeh was a combination of a mass-circulation weekly news-magazine and a mouthpiece of aggressive political opposition to the establishment, with exposés of political and economic corruption and proposals for a radically different national policy.

Because of its untiring opposition to the official "consensus" on nearly all issues, for forty years Haolam Hazeh attracted an unusually large amount of both admiration and hatred. At the base of the controversy was Avnery's unflinching opposition to the nationalistic, militaristic, theocratic “Jewish” state created by DAVID BEN-GURION, and Avnery’s advocacy of a modern, liberal state belonging to all its citizens irrespective of ethnic, national, or religious roots. Haolam Hazeh fought for separation between state and religion, equality between Jews of European and oriental descent, adoption of a written constitution, and the rights of the Arab minority, women, and others. It was the first to uncover the facts of the LAVON AFFAIR (concerning an Israeli sabotage action against the UNITED STATES IN EGYPT) as well as scores of corruption affairs. From the early 1950s, Haolam Hazeh resolutely advocated the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel and support for the Arab struggles for independence (in Egypt, Algeria, IRAQ, etc.).

Perhaps the most important battle won by Avnery was the gradual change in Israeli national consciousness from denying the existence of the Palestinian people to their general recognition, which made the OSLO ACCORDS possible. But his enemies were legion, and Avnery paid a high price for his principles. The chief of the secret service in the 1950s later testified that David Ben-Gurion and his political establishment considered Avnery and Haolam Hazeh as “Public Enemy Number 1.” There were countless attacks on Haolam Hazeh, which were often violent. Its editorial offices and printing facilities were bombed several times and employees wounded. In 1953, after he criticized the QIBYA massacre, Avnery was ambushed and both his hands were broken. In 1972, the offices of Haolam Hazeh and its invaluable archives were completely destroyed by arson. In 1975 Avnery was the victim of an assassination attempt and sustained severe knife wounds. Throughout this time, all branches of the government and army maintained a total economic boycott against the paper.

In 1965 the government enacted a special press law aimed mainly against “that certain magazine” (as Haolam Hazeh was called by Ben-Gurion). This provided the final push for Avnery to enter politics. He created a new party based on the principles advocated by Haolam Hazeh. Initially the party was named after the magazine (New Force Movement), and it came into being on the eve of the 1965 elections. It surprised the establishment by winning a seat in the Knesset. In the 1969 elections it gained two seats. During his first eight years in the Knesset, even his enemies described Avnery as one of Israel’s foremost parliamentarians.

On the fifth day of the 1967 WAR, Avnery addressed an open letter to Prime Minister LEVI ESHKOL, calling upon him to make a dramatic gesture and offer the Palestinian people the opportunity to create an independent state of Palestine on the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP, recently occupied by the Israeli army. This idea, which Avnery had advocated since 1948 and which he outlined in a detailed plan in 1957, became his central focus after 1967 and the subject of hundreds of his speeches and initiatives in the Knesset, where he was for years the lone voice for this solution.

To further this idea, in 1967 he wrote a book analyzing the conflict. It was published in 1968 (in English as Israel without Zionists and in Hebrew as The Seventh Day War) and translated into many languages. His proposal in 1970 for a TWO-STATE SOLUTION was attacked by the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), but by 1974 the PLO’s political line was beginning to change, and Avnery established contact with senior PLO officials. At the start, these contacts were secret, but Avnery reported on them to then prime minister YITZHAK RABIN. YASIR ARAFAT delegated SA’ID HAMAMI, the PLO representative in London, to conduct the meetings with Avnery. ABU NIDAL, who violently opposed any contacts with Israel, murdered Hamami in 1978. In the summer of 1975 Avnery established the ISRAELI COUNCIL ON ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN PEACE, which officially opened in December, to take over the still-secret dialogue, which was by this time conducted for the PLO by ISAM SARTAWI (also later assassinated by Abu Nidal). The story of this dialogue forms the subject of Avnery’s book My Friend, the Enemy, also translated into several languages.

The contacts assumed a new dimension during the 1982 LEBANON WAR, when Avnery crossed the lines at the height of the Battle of Beirut and publicly met with Yasir Arafat, with whom he would meet many times thereafter. Avnery created a sensation by this act, and several Israeli Cabinet ministers called for his indictment for high treason.

In 1977 Avnery’s party joined with several other peace groups in forming a new party, SHELLI, which won two seats in the elections that year. Avnery returned to the Knesset in 1979, but gave up his seat in 1981 to make a place for an Arab colleague. He served as chairman of the party executive and upon its split became chairman of the newly formed Jewish-Arab PROGRESSIVE LIST FOR PEACE, which won two seats in 1984. However, Avnery did not again run for the Knesset and in 1988 left party politics for good. Because of mounting financial difficulties, he had to give up Haolam Hazeh, having been its publisher and editor-in-chief since its inception. Soon thereafter the magazine folded.

At the end of 1992, when Rabin expelled 415 Palestinians, Avnery, together with a group of Jewish and Arab Israelis, put up a protest tent opposite the prime minister's office and stayed there for forty-five days and nights. In 1993 Avnery supported the Oslo Accords but soon became frustrated with many of the Israeli government's acts and omissions, which he believed were undermining any prospect for peace, and called for the creation of a strong extraparliamentary citizens' movement to push the government in a different direction. This led to the creation of GUSH SHALOM (the Peace Bloc), which has since become the leading voice in Israel calling for the creation of the state of Palestine in all the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Gush Shalom also demands the release of all Palestinian PRISONERS, the dismantling of all SETTLEMENTS, and the recognition of JERUSALEM as the joint capital of both states. Since its establishment, Gush Shalom has organized hundreds of demonstrations, mostly together with Palestinian activists, and numerous other political actions, including an ongoing boycott of the products of the settlements and the creation of the manifesto "Our Jerusalem," signed by 750 prominent Israelis and the Palestinian leadership. This manifesto, written by Avnery, calls for the recognition of Jerusalem as the joint capital of the two states: Israel and Palestine.

In May 1995, on the first day of his return to GAZA, Arafat publicly embraced Avnery, put him next to him on the tribune, and called him "my friend." The city of Osnabrueck awarded Avnery the Erich Maria Remarque Peace Prize in 1995. At the awards ceremony, both the Israeli and Palestinian ambassadors were present. Since then, he has been awarded the Aachen Peace Prize (GERMANY), the Kreisky Prize for Human Rights (Austria), and the Lower Saxony State Prize (Germany) as outstanding publicist (awarded personally by Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder).

Bibliography

Avnery, Uri. Ezer Weizman: The Peacemaker. London: Church Peace Union, 1979.

———. Israel without Zionists: A Plea for Peace in the Middle East. New York: Macmillan, 1968.

———. My Friend, the Enemy. London: L. Hill, 1986.

Avram Avinu Settlement

Avram Avinu was among the first Israeli settlements in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES after Israel conquered the areas in 1967. In the heart of Palestinian HEBRON, it has been a flashpoint of conflict since it was established. Hebron is the only WEST BANK city where Israeli settlements are located within Palestinian urban areas. In 2005, approximately 450 Jewish settlers lived in a cluster of buildings in downtown Hebron.

Avram Avinu has its origins in 1968, when a group of Israeli Jews, pretending to be tourists, celebrated Passover at the Park Hotel in downtown Hebron under the guidance of fundamentalist RABBI MOSHE LEVINGER, with plans to establish a permanent Jewish presence there. When Passover ended they refused to leave, calling themselves GUSH EMUNIM (Bloc of the Faithful). Only one descendant of the Jewish families living in Hebron in 1929 supported the establishment of this new fundamentalist settlement, which was distinct from the original Jewish presence in Hebron. Initially, Israeli defense minister MOSHE DAYAN opposed the settlers' plan but eventually acquiesced, in part because of YIGAL ALLON's persuasion. In an interview he gave in the later years of his life, Dayan commented that allowing Jewish settlers into downtown Hebron was "the greatest mistake of my career."

Inside the city, the settlers first focused on the Avram Avinu ruins. In 1976 Israel gave the settlers permission to erect a synagogue on the site, forcing the closure of the Palestinian wholesale market in the area. The new building also served—and still serves—as the central offices for the Hebron Jewish community, a nursery school, a kindergarten, and home to several Jewish families, including the Levingers. The Avram Avinu settlement was followed by several other settlements and Orthodox religious schools, including Beit Hadassa, Beit Castel, Beit Hasson, Beit Schneerson, Beit Fink, Beit Hashisha, Beit Romano, and Tel Rumeida—all in downtown Hebron.

See also GUSH EMUNIM; HEBRON AND JEWISH SETTLEMENTS; HEBRON PROTOCOL, 1997; WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES, 1929

Al-Awda: The Palestine Right to Return Coalition

Founded in 2002 and based in California, al-Awda, the Palestine Right to Return Coalition, is a broad-based, nonpartisan, charitable organization of grassroots activists. It is mainly committed to educating the public about the rights of Palestinian REFUGEES to return to their homes and lands and to receive full restitution for their confiscated and destroyed property in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, INTERNATIONAL LAW, and the numerous UN resolutions upholding such rights. (www.alawda.org).

See also REFUGEES AND THE RIGHT OF RETURN

Ayalon, Ami (1945–)

Ami Ayalon is a former naval admiral, former head of Israel's SHIN BET, and cosponsor, together with Palestinian SARI NUSEIBEH, of the peace initiative The People's Voice or the People's Peace Initiative. He was born and raised in Kibbutz Ma'agan near Tiberias, joined the navy's elite commando unit Flotilla 13, and ascended through the ranks, eventually becoming chief of the Israeli navy from 1992 through 1996. He was formerly head of the Shin Bet, Israel's secret service, and distinguished himself in hundreds of secret missions, winning Israel's highest military honor, the Ribbon of Valor. In addition, he holds a B.A. in economics and political science from Bar-Ilan University and an M.A. in public administration from Harvard University. After the 1995 assassination of Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN, Ayalon was asked to direct the Shin Bet internal security service, which played a key role in suppressing the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. Upon bringing his security career to a close in 2000, Ayalon and Nusseibeh formed The People's Voice, a grassroots lobby for Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation. More than a quarter million Israelis and 160,000 Palestinians have signed on to the campaign.

A member of the Knesset since April 2006, Ayalon served as a member of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense, Ethics, State Control, Labor, Welfare and Health, and Foreign Workers committees. In September 2007 Ami Ayalon was appointed Minister without Portfolio.

See also NUSEIBEH-AYALON AGREEMENT

Ayyash, Yahya (1966–1996)

Yahya Ayyash, a Palestinian, constructed bombs used in suicide attacks against Israelis. Born in the GAZA STRIP, he attended BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY, where he studied chemical engineering and was a member of HAMAS. Though his bombs used the most primitive kind of construction and design, his work earned him the nickname "The Engineer" (al-Muhandis). He started his bombing campaign in April 1994 after BARUCH GOLDSTEIN carried out the massacre of 30 Palestinians at prayer in AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in HEBRON at the end of February 1994. Israel's security force, SHIN BET, assassinated Ayyash on 6 January 1996 at a time of calm in the Occupied Territories; however, the results of the assassination were severe. On 26 February, Hamas launched a series of SUICIDE BOMBINGS in retaliation, beginning with dual early-morning suicide bombings of an Israeli bus and troops on the roadside. Other revenge attacks were the suicide bombing of an Israeli bus and the bombing of Dizengoff Center.

See also GOLDSTEIN, BARUCH; HAMAS; HEBRON MASSACRE; SUICIDE BOMBINGS; TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS

---

B

---

Ba'athism

Ba'athism is the ideology of the Ba'ath Party, formally the Ba'ath Arab Socialist Party, which was founded in 1947 by two teachers from Damascus, Christian Michel 'Aflaq (1910–1989) and Muslim Salah al-Din al-Bitar (1912–1980). Ba'athism does not have an exact analogue in English, but in general it means “resurrection” or “renaissance.” It is constructed around three basic ideas: Arab socialism, pan-Arab nationalism, and secularism; that is, Ba'ath is a secular Arab nationalist political party conceived as a counter to Western colonialism and imperialism. The motto of the party is “Unity, Freedom, Socialism” (wahda, hurriya, ishtirakiya). “Unity” refers to Arab unity, “freedom” emphasizes freedom from foreign control and interference, and “socialism” refers to what has been termed “Arab socialism” rather than to Marxism.

Ba'athism was influenced by nineteenth-century mainland European thinkers, notably conservative German philosophers such as Johann Gottlieb Fichte of the Königsberg University Kantian school and center-left French “Positivists” such as Auguste Comte and Ernest Renan of the Collège de France in Paris. Ba'ath Party cofounders 'Aflaq and al-Bitar both studied at the Sorbonne in the early 1930s, at a time when center-left Positivism was still the dominant ideology among France's academic elite.

The “Kulturnation” concept of Johann Gottfried Herder and the Grimm Brothers had a certain intellectual impact as well. Kulturnation defines a nationality more by a common cultural tradition and popular folklore than by national, political, or religious boundaries, and was considered by some as being more suitable for the Arab countries. GERMANY was seen as an anti-colonial power and friend of the Arab world; cultural and economic exchange and infrastructure projects such as the Baghdad Railway supported that impression.

The Ba'ath Party also had a significant number of Christian Arabs among its founding members. For them, most prominently 'Aflaq, a resolutely nationalist and secular political framework was a suitable way to evade faith-based minority status and to realize full acknowledgment as citizens.

After 1945, the traditional Arab Muslim elites failed to prevent the foundation of Israel and were not able to provide welfare and administrative standards comparable to the Western world. The secular and highly disciplined Ba'ath movement was seen as less corrupt and better organized. In multiethnic, multifaith, and highly divergent countries such as IRAQ and SYRIA, the Ba'ath concept allowed non-Muslims, as well as secular-minded Sunni and Shi'a Muslims, to work under one common roof.

The Ba'ath Party was created as a cell-based organization, with an emphasis on withstanding government repression and infiltration. Hierarchical lines of command ran from top to bottom, and members were forbidden to initiate contacts between groups on the same level of organization; all contacts had to pass through a higher command level. This made the party somewhat unwieldy, but helped prevent the formation of factions and cordoned off members from each other, making the party very difficult to infiltrate, as even members would not know the identity of many other Ba'athists. As the UNITED STATES and its allies discovered in Iraq in 2003, the cell structure has also made the party highly resilient as an armed resistance organization. A peculiarity stemming from its Arab unity ideology is the fact that it has always been intended to operate on a pan-Arab level, joined together by a supreme national command, which is to serve as a party leadership for branches throughout the Arab world.

From the early 1950s, the Ba'ath functioned as a pan-Arab party with branches in various Arab countries, but it was strongest in Syria and Iraq, coming to power in both in 1963. However, in 1966 the Syrian and Iraqi parties split into two rival organizations and remained hostile thereafter.

Both Ba'ath parties kept the same name and maintained parallel structures domestically and in the Arab world. In Syria, Ba'ath remains the ruling party under Bashar Assad, but after the 2003 US deposition of Iraqi president Saddam Husayn, Washington banned the Iraqi Ba'ath Party.

Michel 'Aflaq, the preeminent ideological father of the Ba'ath, was a philosophy student in Paris whose early interest was literary, and it is not clear how this shy and reserved young man formed the ideology that toppled regimes and established two models of oppressive government in the Middle East. The ideology of Ba'athism as it played out in Middle East politics became so ambiguous, ill-defined, and generalized that the Ba'ath Party has suffered from constant disunity and schisms. 'Aflaq never wrote a clear description of the Ba'ath ideology; all his ideas and principles were scattered throughout his many articles and published books, including his major classic, Fi Sabil Al-Ba'ith (On the Way of Resurrection). He did, however, write strongly in favor of free speech, democracy, human rights, and aid for the poor, though these ideals were never put in place by the regimes that espoused his ideology.

Bibliography

- Abu Jabar, Kamel S. The Arab Ba'ath Socialist Party: History, Ideology, and Organization. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1966.
- Alahmar, Abdullah. The Ba'ath and the Regenerating Revolution: A Search in the Aspects of the Ba'athist Arab Socialist Party and Its National Guiding Experience. Beirut: Dar Albaath, 1991.
- Baram, Amatzia. Cultural History and Ideology in the Formation of Ba'athist Iraq, 1968–89. Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 1991.
- Chaitani, Youssef and Patrick Seale. Post-colonial Syria and Lebanon: The Decline of Arab Nationalism and the Triumph of the State. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Heydemann, Steven. Authoritarianism in Syria: Institutions and Social Conflict, 1946–1970. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1999.

—As'ad AbuKhalil

BADIL Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights

The BADIL Center was established in BETHLEHEM in 1998 to provide alternative, critical, and progressive information and analysis in both English and Arabic on the issue of Palestinian REFUGEES and displaced persons. Through professional research and partnership-based community initiatives, it supports the development of a popular refugee lobby for the right of return. The center is a member of the Palestine Right to Return Coalition. (www.badil.org).

See also AL-AWDA; REFUGEES AND RIGHT OF RETURN

Baily Committee

The Baily Committee was formed in 1941 by BRITISH MANDATE officials to assess ways of bolstering the position of traditional Palestinian village leaders to counter the forces of Palestinian nationalism sweeping the country. It issued its findings in the Baily Committee Report on Village Administration. Little came of this initiative.

See also BRITISH MANDATE

Bibliography

- Caplan, Neil. Futile Diplomacy, vols. I and II. London: Frank Cass, 1983 and 1986.

Baker, James Addison III (1930–)

James A. Baker was a successful businessman and a professional diplomat. He served as chief of staff in US president RONALD REAGAN's first administration, US secretary of the treasury from 1985 to 1988 in the second Reagan administration, and as secretary of state through the GEORGE H. W. BUSH administration (1989–1992). In the Bush administration Baker proposed a plan for Israeli-Palestinian dialogue (the BAKER PLAN), presided over the June 1990 termination of the low-level US–PLO DIALOGUE begun eighteen months earlier, oversaw the January 1991 GULF WAR (Operation Desert Storm), and crafted the October 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE.

Baker's principal aide on Arab-Palestinian-Israeli affairs was the pro-Israeli DENNIS ROSS (director of the State Department's Policy Planning Staff), who recruited two other "old hands" in this area, AARON DAVID MILLER and Daniel Kurtzer—all three Jews with inclinations toward Israel's LABOR PARTY. Baker himself had no pro-Israel bias; if anything, he was rather cool toward Israel, and he actively disliked Israel's then prime minister, YITZHAK SHAMIR. Neither, however, did he have much interest in the Palestinians except to aver that the Palestinian issue had to be addressed.

He made no effort to capitalize on Washington's dialogue with the PLO, and he spent a full year promoting, "as the only game in town," Shamir's peace plan, a proposal so restrictive as to be unacceptable to any Palestinian. Indeed, as Daniel Pipes put it, "Baker spent months getting the Arab States to accept a peace process on Israeli terms."

Although Baker and Bush facilitated Soviet-Jewish and Ethiopian-Jewish IMMIGRATION to Israel, they deferred Israel's request for $10 million in loan guarantees to resettle the new immigrants until the Shamir administration fell and LABOR'S YITZHAK RABIN was elected. The loan guarantees were granted in exchange for Rabin's promise to halt SETTLEMENT activity, a promise that he did not keep. Baker and Bush achieved a significant victory for Israel at the UNITED NATIONS—persuading it to rescind its 1975 "Zionism Is Racism" resolution (UN General Assembly Resolution 3379, 10 November 1975). James Baker's major Middle East initiative was organizing and convening the Madrid Conference.

See also BAKER PLAN; GEORGE H. W. BUSH; MADRID CONFERENCE; UNITED STATES–PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION DIALOGUE

Bibliography

Pipes, Daniel. "This Administration Is Good for Israel." Washington Post. 9 June 1992.

Baker Plan

On 1 November 1989, US secretary of state JAMES BAKER formally submitted his five-point "Peace Plan," more accurately called an "election plan," to Israel and EGYPT, although they had reviewed drafts beforehand. It was based squarely on Israel's Four-Point Plan of May 1989 and was intentionally general. Baker intended it to be a framework under which Egypt would facilitate bringing Palestinian Arabs (but not the PLO) into a process of discussion about municipal elections in the Occupied Territories. The initiative contained five points or "understandings":

1. Israeli and Palestinian delegations would conduct talks in Cairo.
2. Egypt would consult with all parties—that is, Israelis, Palestinians, and the UNITED STATES.
3. Israeli participation would be contingent on its acceptance of the proposed Palestinian delegates.
4. Israel would come to the dialogue on the basis of its 14 May initiative, which stipulated that the Palestinians should be prepared to discuss local ELECTIONS and the negotiating process in accordance with Israel's initiative.

5. Palestinians could only raise issues that relate to elections and how to make the negotiating process succeed.

Israel agreed in principle to the Baker Plan in November but attached two reservations: that the PLO not be involved in the naming of Palestinian delegates and that the discussions be limited to preparations for the elections. Disagreement over the Israeli government's response to the Baker initiative caused the Israel National Unity government to fall in March 1990 in a vote of no confidence. Prime Minister YITZHAK SHAMIR formed a new government in June 1990 and rejected the Baker Plan again, even after most of the Israeli demands had been accepted. Shamir's government took the view that the plan was too risky and that the United States was willing to sacrifice Israel and the Jewish people for its own interests. Frustrated by this process, Baker sarcastically provided Shamir with the White House telephone number, suggesting that Shamir call when he was "serious about peace."

See also MADRID CONFERENCE

Bibliography

- Andoni, Lamis. "A Narrowing Window to the US." Middle East International. 357 (25 August 1989).
- Aronson, Geoffrey. "Soviet Jewish Emigration, the United States, and the Occupied Territories." Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:4 (1990).
- Aruri, Naseer. Dishonest Broker: The Role of the United States in Palestine and Israel. Boston: South End Press, 2003.
- Blitzer, Wolf. "How American Pressure Shifted from Israel to the Palestinians." Jerusalem Post International Edition. 29 April 1989.
- Christison, Kathleen. "Splitting the Difference: The Palestinian-Israeli Policy of James Baker." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:1 (1994).
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. "The Bush Administration and the Palestinians: A Reassessment." In U.S. Policy on Palestine from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Normal, IL: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1995.

Balad Party

The Balad Party, formally Al-Tajamu' Al-Watani Al-Dimuqrati (National Democratic Alliance), was established in 1996 by Dr. AZMI BISHARA as a primarily Arab political party in Israel. The party seeks to “transform Israel from a Jewish state into a democratic state, a state with equality for all of its citizens, Jews and Arabs alike, and to eliminate all state institutions and laws which discriminate against Arabs in Israel.” It also supports the establishment of a Palestinian state in the WEST BANK, GAZA, and East JERUSALEM. In 2003 the Israeli parliament’s nationalist-dominated election committee tried to ban the party from running in national elections, claiming it did not respect Israel’s legally mandated status as a Jewish state and that its leader supported TERRORISM. This ban was applied to Azmi Bishara and another Arab member of the Knesset, AHMAD TIBI, who had formed an electoral alliance with the left-wing HADASH coalition, but in the end the ban was overturned by the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT.

See also AL-AWDA; AZMI BISHARA

Bibliography

- Ghanem, As’ad. The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel, 1948–2000: A Political Study. New York: State University of New York Press, 2001.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Rouhana, Nadim N. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities in Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.

Balfour, Lord Arthur James (1848–1930)

Arthur James Balfour, first Earl of Balfour, is perhaps best known for authoring the 1917 BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home for Jews in Palestine. A British statesman, Balfour served as prime minister of the UK from July 1902 to December 1905. He remained leader of the Conservative Party until he was replaced in 1911, then returned to government in 1915 when he was offered the post of first lord of the admiralty in Britain’s World War I coalition government. Prime Minister David Lloyd George appointed him foreign secretary in 1916.

Lord Balfour was a Christian Zionist, an ideology that supported Jewish return to Zion, as were Lord Lindsay, Lord Shaftesbury, Lord Palmerston, Disraeli, Lord Manchester, George Eliot, Holman Hunt, Sir Charles Warren, and Hall Caine, among others. Shaftesbury was probably responsible for the phrase “a land without a people for a people without a land,” later to become the Zionist slogan.

Bibliography

- Balfour, Lord Arthur James. Speeches on Zionism. London: J. W. Arrowsmith, 1928.

Balfour Declaration

The Balfour Declaration, issued on 2 November 1917, stated that the British government favorably viewed the creation in Palestine of “a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of the existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.” It was written in the midst of World War I and presented by LORD ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR, the British foreign secretary, in the name of the wartime Cabinet of Prime Minister David Lloyd George. This declaration now constitutes the principal legal justification for the founding of the state of Israel.

CHAIM WEIZMANN had first contacted Lord Balfour in 1906, hoping to convince the British government of the importance of Zionist objectives. Many Zionist leaders in Britain likewise argued for the necessity of establishing a Jewish homeland. In 1915 HERBERT SAMUEL, then a Cabinet minister, submitted a memorandum to the government suggesting that the establishment of a Jewish state controlled by Britain would expand British colonial interests. The memorandum was favorably received by a number of leaders, including Balfour and Lloyd George, while the lobbying activities of both Weizmann and Samuel influenced many politicians. But imperial interests were also involved in the decision to issue the declaration and essentially ally the British government with Zionists. The British government sought to secure the eastern flank of the Suez Canal by taking possession of Palestine and implanting there a cooperative “client population,” which is how Balfour and George viewed the Jews. Finally, there was a religious component. Lloyd George was of a Christian fundamentalist orientation, and Balfour, though somewhat of a rationalist, was nevertheless convinced of the validity of the Jewish claim to Palestine based on the Bible.

In a 1923 memorandum to the British Cabinet, Colonial Secretary Lord Cavendish described the Balfour Declaration as a “war measure” carried out at “a time of extreme peril to the cause of the Allies.” Its object, according to Cavendish, was to “enlist the sympathies on the Allied side of influential Jews and Jewish organizations all over the world.” This position incorporated the misconception that Zionists represented most of the world’s Jews and that they had sufficient influence to help bring the US government into the war on the side of the English and to prevent the Russian government from abandoning the Allied cause.

The whole episode reflected the imperialist mindset of the time. A European government (Great Britain) had undertaken to promise a private organization (the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION) open access to the territory of a non-European government (the OTTOMAN EMPIRE). In this sense it differed from the more pragmatic and direct promise the British made around the same time to the Sharif of Mecca to support an independent Arab state throughout most of the Arab lands east of Suez, in exchange for military assistance against the Turks. It is not clear if the Zionist leaders came through with their side of the Balfour Declaration bargain, but the British facilitated their subsequent colonization of Palestine. The Arabs, on the other hand, fought against the Turks, only to be subsequently abandoned by the British, who restricted Arab independence to the Arabian Peninsula and converted the remaining Arab lands into appendages of the British and French Empires.

After the Allied victory, the British and the French, following US president WOODROW WILSON’s lead, established the League of Nations. Because of President Wilson’s anti-imperialism, articulated in his “Fourteen Points” (which promised self-determination to the peoples of the German, Austrian, and Ottoman Empires), FRANCE and England also masked the enlargement of their empires with the mandate system, through which the Europeans would supposedly “tutor” the non-Europeans in the art of self-government.

At the conference held at San Remo, Italy, on 24–25 April 1920, the British and the French divided the postwar mandates among the Allied powers as a form of spoils of war. The British gave themselves the mandate for Palestine, and later the League of Nations, essentially following the dictates of France and Britain, confirmed these awards. The British then arranged for the Balfour Declaration to be incorporated into the preamble of the BRITISH MANDATE for Palestine. In this fashion the Balfour Declaration, which was in essence a payment for wartime services perhaps rendered by the World Zionist Organization, changed into a “binding international legal obligation,” or in the opinion of Colonel Ronald Storrs, Britain’s governor in Jerusalem from 1917 to 1926, “a high and noble task placed on our shoulders by the voice of nations.”

The Balfour Declaration promised a Jewish “national home” in Palestine, and many Zionists insist this meant all of Palestine, including Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950), which would place UN RESOLUTION 181 (29 November 1947), partitioning Palestine, at odds with the Balfour Declaration. For those who assert that the Balfour Declaration is the basis of Jewish sovereignty in Palestine, Resolution 181 is an illegal abrogation of Jewish legal rights and their title of sovereignty to the whole of Palestine. It is on this basis that many Zionists insist on Israel’s legal right to keep all the lands it occupied in the 1967 WAR, objecting strenuously to the compromises they see in the OSLO ACCORDS.

See also BRITISH MANDATE; CHRISTIANITY; HUSAYN-MCMAHON CORRESPONDENCE; SYKES-PICOT AGREEMENT; CHAIM WEIZMANN; ZIONISM

Bibliography

- Davidson, Lawrence. America’s Palestine: Popular and Official Perceptions from Balfour to Israeli Statehood. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001.
- Friedman, Isaiah. The Question of Palestine, 1914–1918. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1973.
- Grief, Howard. “Legal Rights and Title of Sovereignty of the Jewish People to the Land of Israel and Palestine under International Law.” Take a Pen! n.d. www.take-a-pen.org/english/Articles/Yesha/Legal1.htm.
- John, Robert. “Behind the Balfour Declaration: Britain’s Great War Pledge to Lord Rothschild.” The Journal of Historical Review. 6:4 (1985–1986).
- Laqueur, Walter. A History of Zionism: From the French Revolution to the Establishment of the State of Israel. New York: MJF Books, 1972.
- Sanders, Ronald. The High Walls of Jerusalem: A History of the Balfour Declaration and the Birth of the British Mandate for Palestine. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1984.
- Stein, Leonard. The Balfour Declaration. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1961.

Ball, George W. (1909–1994)

George W. Ball, a lifelong Democrat, held many critically important political positions in the US government. Among other posts, he served as undersecretary of state and ambassador to the UN during the KENNEDY and JOHNSON administrations. After leaving government, Ball became a defender of the Palestinians and a critic of Israel.

Ball courageously took unpopular positions. An early and staunch supporter of fellow mid-westerner Adlai Stevenson, Ball played a key role in Stevenson's (failed) 1952 and 1956 presidential campaigns. He is best known for his criticism of American policy toward Vietnam and for his counsel during the Cuban missile crisis of 1961–1962. Beginning in 1968, Ball became involved in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. An early friend of Israel, Ball shifted his position and developed a more critical stance when he became convinced that Israel was pursuing a hard-line policy of aggression and violence against the Palestinians. He was particularly outraged by Israeli SETTLEMENT policy.

With the Israeli invasion of LEBANON in 1982 and the massacre by Phalangists (right-wing allies of the Israelis) of unarmed REFUGEES in the SABRA AND SHATILA camps, Ball wrote in defense of the Palestinians and in condemnation of Israeli policy. Two pieces are of special import in this regard: the 1977 Foreign Affairs article "How to Save Israel in Spite of Herself," and the book Error and Betrayal in Lebanon (1984), which condemns Israel, the LEBANON WAR, and US support for Israel in the war.

George Ball considered a Palestinian state inevitable and said so publicly and privately. In 1992, with the assistance of his son Douglas, he wrote The Passionate Attachment, a book that presented his detailed position concerning the Israelis and the Palestinians and documented the history of the relationship among the UNITED STATES, the Palestinians, and the Israelis.

Bibliography

- Ball, George W. "America in the Middle East: A Breakdown in Foreign Policy." Journal of Palestine Studies. 13:3 (1984).
- . "The Coming Crisis in Israeli-American Relations." Foreign Affairs. (Winter 1979–1980).
- . Error and Betrayal in Lebanon. Washington, DC: Foundation for Middle East Peace, 1984.
- . "How to Save Israel in Spite of Itself." Foreign Affairs. (April 1977).

Ball, George W., with Douglas B. Ball. The Passionate Attachment: America's Involvement with Israel, 1947–Present. New York: W. W. Norton, 1992.

Rubenberg, Cheryl A. Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

—James A. Bill

Al-Banna, Sabri Khalil (Abu Nidal) (1937–2002)

Abu Nidal, whose given name was Sabri Khalil al-Banna, was a dissident Palestinian leader, terrorist, and assassin. He was born to a wealthy family from JAFFA that was dispossessed in 1948 and settled in a refugee camp in GAZA. Later he moved to NABLUS, then under Jordanian rule, and worked as an electrician in JORDAN, where he joined the BA'ATH PARTY. For a time he worked in SAUDI ARABIA, was expelled, returned to Jordan, and joined FATAH in 1967. In 1969 Abu Nidal became the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION's (PLO) representative in Khartoum, Sudan, and in 1970 he was appointed PLO representative to IRAQ. In Baghdad, because of his opposition to PLO participation in political negotiations, he began consolidating around himself a group of loyal activists. With the assistance of the Iraqi intelligence services, Abu Nidal formed a terrorist group and began to act against Fatah officials. The PLO tried him in absentia for plotting the murder of YASIR ARAFAT and sentenced him to death. Abu Nidal then officially formed his own organization, the FATAH REVOLUTIONARY COUNCIL, and in the following decades assassinated numerous PLO leaders, almost always the most moderate, including SA'ID HAMAMI, Ali Yassin, Izz 'a-Din Qualaq, ISAM SARTAWI, Maim Khudr, and SALAH KHALAF. He also carried out countless attacks on Israeli and Jewish targets.

Bibliography

- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.
- Melman, Yossi. The Master Terrorist. New York: Adama Books, 1986.
- Said, Edward. The Politics of Dispossession: The Struggle for Palestinian Self-Determination, 1969–1994. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: the Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Seale, Patrick. Abu Nidal: A Gun for Hire. New York: Random House, 1992.

Steinberg, Matti. "The Radical Worldview of the Abu Nidal Faction." Jerusalem Quarterly. 48 (Fall 1988).

Bantustans

Also referred to as cantons or enclaves, "Bantustans" are the small areas of Palestinian habitation in the WEST BANK. These small disconnected areas are the result of several factors, among them the crisscrossing of numerous Israeli SETTLEMENTS, settler bypass ROADS, military encampments, nature preserves, and the BARRIER (separation wall). Because these cantons are not contiguous, it is unlikely that a Palestinian state could be viable when (or if) the conflict ends.

By August 2006 the fragmentation of the West Bank and the ability of Palestinians to move from canton to canton within it were at their nadir. A combination of Israeli CHECKPOINTS, physical obstacles, and a PERMIT system had effectively cut the West Bank into three distinct areas—northern, southern, and central—in addition to East JERUSALEM. Within these areas further enclaves have been created, also bordered by checkpoints and roadblocks that increase the isolation of individual Palestinian communities. In addition, the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY had become an almost inaccessible enclave. Fewer and fewer Palestinians were able to obtain permits to visit "CLOSED MILITARY ZONES"—land to the west of the Barrier. The cantonization of the West Bank, combined with Israel's tight RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT of the Palestinians, is at the heart of the decline of the Palestinian economy—also at this time at its lowest point.

Northern West Bank

In August 2005, following the Israeli disengagement from GAZA and four small West Bank settlements, movement between the north and central West Bank deteriorated. The key Israeli checkpoint of Shave Shomeron closed, stopping Palestinian movement on the main route around NABLUS, the major city in the northern West Bank. In February 2006, Israel placed seven new road gates at the entrances to villages on Road 505. When the road gates were open they were the only possible entrance onto Road 505; in other words, the road running west of the Tappuah/Za'Atara checkpoint along Roads 505 and 5 to the Kafr Qassam checkpoint allowed Israel to completely seal and totally prevent all north-south movement. Between January and April 2006, the number of "flying checkpoints" (random checkpoints scattered throughout the northern districts) and the long delays they caused increased from 40 in mid-2005 to 160 in 2006.

Enclaves within the Northern Section. Since December 2005, residents of Jenin have been prohibited from passing through the Tappuah/Za'Atara junction south of Nablus, effectively sealing all residents within the northern West Bank and severing JENIN and Nablus from the central and southern West Bank and the Jordan Valley.

In March 2006, an east-west closure composed of the Kafriat Tunnel, Anabta, Shave Shaveron, Asira ash Shamaliya, and the al-Badhan road divided the northern West Bank into two parts: Jenin, Tubas, and Tulkarm to the north, and Nablus and Qalqilia to the south.

By the end of March 2006, Palestinians between the ages of fifteen and thirty-two years could not leave Nablus through the Huwwara and Beit Iba checkpoints, preventing their access to Jenin and Tulkarm. Public taxis and buses are also denied access through Huwwara checkpoint. Long delays are experienced by people who are permitted to cross the checkpoints.

Southern West Bank

Beginning in September 2000, Israel prohibited all Palestinian traffic from passing through Jerusalem when traveling from the southern West Bank to the north. Instead access has been via the long and winding road known as Wadi Nar (Road 398). The container checkpoint established at the top of the hill of the Wadi Nar Road effectively controls movement and separates the south from the central and northern areas of the West Bank. Since 2002, passage through the Container checkpoint has been allowed only for Palestinian public transport and private cars with valid permits. During periods of CLOSURE, Palestinians must cross on foot through the hills around the checkpoint to move north or south.

Enclave within Hebron City. The area occupied by Jewish settlers in the Old City of HEBRON (H-2) is surrounded by over 100 impediments to Palestinian movement. The combination of roadblocks, barriers, and military checkpoints isolates approximately sixty-three Palestinian families living in the same area as the settlers and restricts the movement of thousands of Palestinians residing and working © UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), Geneva, reprinted with permission.

Territorial fragmentation of the West Bank

Map 3. Territorial Fragmentation of the West Bank

Map 4. Northern West Bank, Territorial Fragmentation

© UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), Geneva, extracted from Map_Booklets_April_2008_A3_Web.zip, page 10, reprinted with permission.

Map 5. Southern West Bank, Territorial Fragmentation

in the Old City and its immediate neighborhoods. In February 2006 the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) turned over the checkpoint of Givat Havot to the Jewish settlers, who have escalated the incidences of harassment of the twelve Palestinian families residing in that area, who must cross the checkpoint to access the rest of Hebron. The settlers have also prevented international organizations from using the crossing.

Enclave of South Hebron. Even before September 2000 the IDF had begun to seal off the HEBRON SOUTHERN DISTRICT through a combination of physical obstacles and movement restrictions imposed on Palestinian travel, which created clusters of isolated Palestinian communities south of Road 317 and prevented access to HEALTH and EDUCATION facilities as well as to markets further north. In December 2005, Israel announced plans to build a concrete barrier one meter (more than three feet) high along the northern side of Roads 317 and 60 between the Jewish settlements of Karmel and Tene. When completed, the barrier will worsen the isolation of sheepherding communities in Imneizel, at-Tuwayni, and Masafer Yatta. Although Israel has said there are plans to ensure crossings through gates in the barrier, they are unlikely to maintain current levels of access for shepherds and landowners to grazing and cultivated areas on both sides of the road. Roads in the south are used almost exclusively by Jewish settlers and are increasingly difficult for Palestinians to access.

Central West Bank

The situation in the central West Bank, as in other areas, has been harsh, and as in other regions, it has grown increasingly difficult even though the INTIFADA has waned. In April 2006 the IDF imposed a new closure around Ramallah. The flying (randomly imposed) checkpoints at An Nabi Salih and Atara further restrict people from traveling to the northern West Bank. A series of flying checkpoints were deployed along bypass Road 60, delaying people traveling from the northern areas of the West Bank to Ramallah or further south to Jericho and Jerusalem.

East Jerusalem. East Jerusalem is isolated from and almost totally closed to nonresident Palestinians. Israel restricts movement from the West Bank to Jerusalem through a combination of the barrier surrounding the city and the complex system of checkpoints, gates, and permit requirements for West Bank residents. In January 2006, Israel further tightened access by limiting all West Bank Palestinian pedestrian and vehicle access into Jerusalem to four barrier crossings. Initially, there were twelve crossing points through which Palestinians could enter the city, but eight are now open only to residents of Israel and international travelers.

Jordan Valley. Since May 2005 access to and from the Jordan Valley has become increasingly difficult. In May of that year, Israel imposed a new policy requiring all Palestinians, regardless of family ties to valley residents or other links such as employment or landownership, to obtain a permit before crossing the Tayasir, al-Hamra, or Ma'ale Efraim checkpoints. Palestinians with a Jordan Valley address on their IDENTIFICATION CARD can move into and out of the northern Jordan Valley region without a permit.

Jericho Enclave. JERICHO is surrounded on three sides by an Israeli-built trench that prevents open access into or out of the city. There are two access roads to the city: one leading west toward Jerusalem and Ramallah, the other winding through the hills north of Jericho to Ramallah. Both roads are restricted by checkpoints: Jericho DCO (a permanent checkpoint) and An-Nwemeh, which can be crossed only between 5 A.M. and 8 P.M. Movement from other parts of the West Bank to Jericho has become increasingly difficult; for example, ambulances traveling either to or from Jericho or Ramallah are obliged to make prior arrangements with the IDF. On three occasions in April and May 2006, Israel completely denied all access into and out of Jericho.

See also BARRIER; BETHLEHEM; CHECKPOINTS; HEBRON AND JEWISH SETTLEMENTS; HEBRON DISTRICT, SOUTHERN AREA; JORDAN RIFT VALLEY; ROADBLOCKS; ROADS; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM

Bibliography

- Dor, Daniel. The Suppression of Guilt: The Israeli Media and the Reoccupation of the West Bank. London: Pluto Press, 2005.
- Farsakh, Leila. "Economic Viability of a Palestinian State in the West Bank and Gaza Strip: Is It Possible without Territorial Integrity and Sovereignty?" The MIT Electronic Journal of Middle East Studies. Vol. 1 (May 2001).
- . "Under Siege: Closure, Separation and the Palestinian Economy." Middle East Report. 217 (Winter 2000).
- Hassouri, Parastou. Bulldozed into Cantons: Israel's House Demolition Policy in the West Bank since the Signing of the Oslo Agreements, September 1993 to February 1999. Ramallah: Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment—LAW, 1999.
- Keating, Michael, Anne Le More, and Robert Lowe, eds. Aid, Diplomacy and Facts on the Ground: The Case of Palestine. London: Chatham House, 2005.
- OCHA. "Territorial Fragmentation of the West Bank." UN Information System on the Question of Palestine. 18 May 2006.

Barak, Ehud (1942–)

Ehud Barak, originally named Ehud Brog, is an Israeli military officer, politician, and prime minister (1999–2001). He was born on a KIBBUTZ founded by his father, an immigrant from Lithuania. Barak received a B.S. in physics and mathematics from the Hebrew University and, in 1978, an M.S. in economic engineering systems from Stanford University in California.

Barak began his military career as an army corps private, but he was soon transferred to a secret unit then led by ARIEL SHARON, whom he later replaced as its head. During the 1967 WAR Barak served as a reconnaissance group commander, and from 1972 to 1973 he was the leader of a special forces unit that conducted commando raids, including the storming of an airliner hijacked by Palestinian guerrillas at Lod International Airport (now Ben-Gurion International Airport near Tel Aviv) in 1972. In 1973, disguised as a woman and carrying a purse packed with explosives, Barak led a raid on a Palestinian group allegedly responsible for killing Israeli athletes at the MUNICH OLYMPICS.

Barak was deputy commander of the Israeli forces during the 1982 LEBANON WAR, before which he argued for a surprise attack against SYRIA but was vetoed by the defense minister. In 1987 he was appointed deputy chief of staff, and the following year he organized the ASSASSINATION of KHALIL AL-WAZIR at his home in TUNIS. By 1993, after the OSLO ACCORDS were signed, Barak decided that if he wished to continue a professional career, he would have to leave the army and go into politics, which he did two years later, joining the LABOR PARTY as a protégé of then prime minister YITZHAK RABIN.

He served briefly as interior minister under Rabin and as foreign minister under Rabin's successor, SHIMON PERES. In 1996 Barak was elected to the Knesset, and in 1997, following the Labor Party's electoral defeat, he became leader of the party. In 1999 Barak moved the Labor Party to the right of center and created a coalition with several smaller parties. His goal was to increase Labor's focus on social and economic issues and on the need to restart peace talks. On 17 May 1999, Barak was elected prime minister with a record 56 percent of the votes. On 6 July 1999, he assumed office as both prime minister and minister of defense, making him not only the head executive officer of the Israeli government but also responsible for national security.

Barak claimed that his decisive electoral victory gave him a mandate for ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and he resumed the negotiations with Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT that his predecessor BENJAMIN NETANYAHU had suspended. Barak also announced that Israel would resume implementation of the 1998 WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM, but in fact he failed to carry out most of the redeployments stipulated by the memorandum and subsequent agreements.

Barak sought to play the Syrians against the Palestinians, and in December 1999, before meeting with the Palestinians, he held direct talks with Syrian foreign minister Farouk ash-Shara to discuss the Golan Heights. The meetings, as well as his strategy, led nowhere. However, in May 2000 Barak ordered the withdrawal of Israeli troops from southern LEBANON, where they had been stationed since 1982.

In July 2000 Barak participated in the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT, for which he had pressed, allegedly to resolve FINAL STATUS issues and conclude a firm peace between Israel and the PLO. The summit was a fiasco despite what is often called BARAK'S GENEROUS OFFER, which was not in reality generous. Nevertheless, US president BILL CLINTON went to JERUSALEM and on Israeli television absolved Barak of all responsibility for the summit's failure. In September 2000 Barak endorsed LIKUD leader Ariel Sharon's visit to the sacred Muslim site, the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF (TEMPLE MOUNT), which sparked the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. In November Ehud Barak resigned as prime minister, the Knesset called for elections to be held on 6 February 2001, and Ariel Sharon became the next prime minister.

See also BARAK'S GENEROUS OFFER

Bibliography

- Barak, Ehud. Re-ordering the World. Tel Aviv: Foreign Policy Centre, 2002.
- Brown, Derek. "The Main Loser: Ehud Barak." The Guardian (UK). 6 October 2000.
- Ilani, Ofri. "Israeli Human Rights Activists: Arrest Olmert, Livni, and Barak for War Crimes." Ha'aretz. 23 January 2009.
- Kaspit, Ben. Ehud Barak. Hebrew. Tel Aviv: Am Ovid, 1998.
- . Ehud Barak Israel's Number 1 Soldier. Hebrew. Published in Israel. No place or date for publication. ISBN 978-9654740081.
- Levy, Paule-Henriette. Ehud Barak: Le Faucon de la paix. French. Paris: Plon, 1999.

Barak's Generous Offer

Of the leaders involved in the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT (11–25 July 2000), Israeli prime minister EHUD BARAK was by far its strongest advocate. It was Barak who convinced US president BILL CLINTON of the urgency of a leaders' summit and of the possibility that it could produce a FINAL STATUS agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. The summit convened, even though no prior understandings at the professional level had been reached between the two sides on most of the contentious issues dividing them, including JERUSALEM and its holy places, as well as the questions of REFUGEES, BORDERS, and SETTLEMENTS. In light of this situation, the Palestinian leadership expressed concern about holding such a decisive conference. The US government, however, decided to accede to Barak's request and convened the summit.

In the course of the Camp David Summit, Barak took the initiative and presented a far-reaching proposal for settling the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. On almost all final status issues, Barak's proposals represented significant compromises compared to offers made by previous Israeli leaders. From an Israeli perspective, Barak's offer looked exceedingly generous; however, it was far from meeting the Palestinians' minimal demands. Even more fatal to its chance of success was that Barak's offer was conditional on the Palestinians' agreement to end the conflict for all time. In other words, the Palestinians were expected to give up all additional claims vis-à-vis Israel in exchange for Israel's proposals, thus terminating the historic conflict.

Barak's offer and its limitations must be examined in the broader context of his perception of the OSLO PROCESS and the blueprint for a settlement that he strove to achieve during his brief tenure as Israeli prime minister. Before his election on 17 May 1999, Barak had been openly suspicious of the Oslo Process, pointing out, as Knesset member and cabinet minister, its disadvantages. One manifestation of his reservations about Oslo was Barak's abstention on the vote on the INTERIM AGREEMENT (28 September 1995). Before becoming prime minister, Barak had also voiced opposition to the principle of the Oslo blueprint, which he saw as transferring land to the Palestinians without securing a fair exchange for Israel.

After his victory in the elections, Barak was aware that implementation of the Interim Agreement was behind schedule and concluded that he had to enter into negotiations on a permanent agreement during his term. Israel and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) had agreed that the interim stage should be completed by 1999, and that both sides would meet their commitments, such as ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) troop redeployments, by that time. Yet after his election Barak decided not to adhere to the Oslo timetable. He chose to postpone the Israeli troop redeployments, to which Israel had committed itself in the series of agreements reached with the Palestinians after the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES. These were outlined in a timetable of confidence-building measures, whose implementation was to be followed by final status negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. Barak declined to implement these withdrawals, arguing that the PNA's record of acting on its commitments under the agreements was poor, specifically its obligation to prevent acts of TERRORISM against Israelis.

Instead of pursuing implementation of previous commitments made by Israel in the WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM on 23 October 1998 (commitments that were now far behind schedule), Barak decided to bypass these agreements and enter directly into final status negotiations with the Palestinians. He believed that final-status talks would create a permanent agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, that all pending issues between the two sides would be resolved, and that an end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would be achieved. The final status negotiations planned by Barak were to be direct, with the UNITED STATES acting only as a guarantor of the agreement and in limited ways helping to reach its implementation.

Barak's Attitude toward the Palestinians

Immediately after his election as prime minister, Barak proclaimed four "nos" that would guide the Israeli side in the negotiations for a final status settlement:

1. No to returning to the 4 June 1967 lines
2. No to dismantling Jewish settlements
3. No to compromise over Jerusalem
4. No to any right of return by Palestinian refugees to Israel's sovereign territory

In talks with Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT on 11 July 1999, Barak also presented as a fait accompli his decision not to proceed with the redeployment phases outlined in the Wye Memorandum. Barak was determined to get the United States and the Palestinians to adopt his new fast-track approach and worked resolutely toward this end at the Sharm al-Shaykh Summit in early September 1999. Having won EGYPTIAN, JORDANIAN, and US support, Barak succeeded in compelling the Palestinians to sign the SHARM AL-SHAYKH MEMORANDUM and thus to accept his new blueprint for negotiations on an Israeli-Palestinian final status agreement. As part of the memorandum, Israeli and PNA leaders committed themselves “to full and mutual implementation of the Interim Agreement and all other agreements concluded between them since September 1993.”

In addition, however, the memorandum established deadlines for two new agreements intended to resolve all remaining disputed issues and to effect a final status settlement. One of these was a framework agreement, to be signed within five months, which would define the commitments of the parties at this stage while also detailing the issues to be resolved in a final status settlement. The other agreement, to be concluded within a year, would resolve all outstanding disputes between the two sides. This comprehensive agreement was to be considered “the implementation of UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338.” A potential “end of conflict” formula had been created.

Following Sharm al-Shaykh, Barak pressed ahead with his vision of reaching a final settlement with the Palestinians at a “make or break” summit, at which all issues would be put on the table and a final peace treaty signed. He tried to avoid substantive negotiations before this envisioned final summit, because he feared they would jeopardize his own political survival given his domestic political coalition problems, and because he worried that they would limit Israel’s ability to maneuver in the “end-game” stage. One consequence of Barak’s strategy was that he ignored the expectations and sensibilities of the Palestinians in the interim period, failing to meet commitments made to them by Israel at Wye and Sharm al-Shaykh (e.g., the handover of control of certain Jerusalem neighborhoods and the release of Palestinian security PRISONERS).

In talks held with YOSSEI BEILIN on 2 October 1999, he told the Israeli justice minister that “even 50 percent of the West Bank looks like a state,” and asserted that territorial contiguity for the Palestinians would be achieved by means of several bridges and tunnels. With regard to the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY, Barak believed that the Palestinians would tolerate continued Israeli control over the area, including the retention of IDF camps and Israeli settlements there.

One dramatic illustration of Barak’s disregard for Palestinian concerns was his sudden revival of negotiations with SYRIA in December 1999. Only a few months earlier, Barak had insisted on securing the reluctant Palestinians’ agreement to the Sharm al-Shaykh Memorandum. The agreements there should have prompted serious Israeli consideration of the details of a final status agreement with the Palestinians. However, Barak abruptly redirected his negotiators to concentrate on peace negotiations with Syria. Israeli-Syrian contacts culminated in the Shepherdstown Summit (3 January 2000), which ended in failure.

Barak Initiates Camp David

For the first half of 2000, the Barak government did not actively pursue negotiations with the Palestinians. At this stage Barak feared being compromised domestically by protracted interim negotiations. He believed that if news of his potential concessions were leaked to the Israeli public before the start of final status talks, he would have little room to maneuver at the summit itself.

Several factors led Barak to decide in the early summer of 2000 to initiate the summit. He perceived that the political situation was changing in both the United States and Israel. Clinton’s term was nearing its end, and the campaign for the election of a new US president would be fully under way by the fall of 2000. In Israel Barak’s government was facing increasingly severe difficulties with its coalition. Against this background, the prime minister believed that the successful conclusion, with US backing, of a final status agreement could save both himself and his party. The Israeli prime minister knew that the Palestinian leadership was reluctant to come to the summit because they felt that there was inadequate preparation on difficult unresolved issues—especially Jerusalem and the status of refugees. For Barak the summit was to be a crucial test of Arafat’s true intentions; if Arafat rejected Israel’s peace offer, Barak would consider this proof of the Palestinians’ unwillingness to reach a real peace agreement. In this case, Barak believed, Israel would take its fate into its own hands, including unilateral moves to protect its citizens and preserve its national interests.

Barak reasoned that even if he failed to reach a final status agreement, he would appear to have defended Israel’s interests and thus would improve his domestic position. Thus, Barak placed more emphasis on the idea of going to a summit, winning

US approval for his positions, and improving his standing in Israeli public opinion than on gaining acceptance of his blueprint from the Palestinians. In fact, Barak and the entire Israeli team that came to Camp David did not formulate in advance clear, concrete positions on many key issues. For instance, while Barak's team pressed for the annexation to Israel of Jewish settlement blocs beyond the 1967 "Green Line," it did not consider that these areas were also inhabited by tens of thousands of Palestinians. Because of inadequate preparation, the Israeli team also had not developed a solid position on Jerusalem.

Barak's Stands during Camp David

On 10 July 2000, a day before departing for Camp David, Barak once more emphasized that Israel would not return to the 4 June 1967 lines, that Israel would retain sovereignty over a united Jerusalem, that most of the Jewish SETTLERS in Judea and Samaria would remain in settlement blocs under Israeli sovereignty, and that Israel would not take any moral or legal responsibility for the Palestinian refugee problem.

On the first day of the summit, Barak also told the Americans that Israel wanted to control a strip of land running parallel to the Jordan River, thus creating a buffer between the envisioned Palestinian state and Jordan. On two issues that had been considered taboo by previous Israeli governments, Barak endorsed new positions. He was willing to consider a large-scale Israeli withdrawal from the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP, and he did not rule out Palestinian control over the Arab neighborhoods of Jerusalem, except for what he called the "HOLY BASIN": the Jewish TEMPLE MOUNT (AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF Muslim compound). In exchange, Barak wanted the Palestinians to commit to a permanent end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

From the beginning Barak's agenda dominated Camp David. The Americans yielded early on to Barak's demands regarding the opening stage of the negotiations. According to the account of DENNIS ROSS, the chief Middle East peace negotiator under Clinton, the United States had envisioned itself as an arbitrator "bounding the discussions and crystallizing them." The Americans wanted to set the terms on which the two sides negotiated and present solutions on the outstanding issues in the form of a draft agreement. Barak, however, succeeded in changing the role of the United States to that of a mediator who would eventually force the sides to accept a middle-of-the-road proposal. When the Americans attempted to frame the opening discussions at the summit, Barak persuaded Clinton to have the Israelis and Palestinians present their own starting positions instead. Later, when the Americans wanted to present the two sides with a draft agreement, Barak was insistent that both sides should present their own papers. When an arbitrator retreats from the role of controlling the bilateral negotiations of a summit, the stronger of the two sides becomes dominant. At Camp David, in response to Barak's pressure, the Americans receded from their role as brokers who set the terms of discussion, increasing Palestinian suspicions about the US role as an honest broker.

After his initial proposal, Barak prevented his negotiators from raising any new ideas and insisted on sticking to it, thus prohibiting his team from offering concessions. According to Ross, Barak's biggest fear was that he would offer major concessions and Arafat would "pocket" them without offering something in return. Because of the opposition he faced in Israel, Barak insisted that discussions between the sides would be off the record and that no protocols would be kept. During the negotiations themselves, the changing positions of the parties were also not documented, at Barak's request.

Barak allowed his negotiators, Gilead Sher and Shlomo Ben-Ami, more freedom only after pressure from Clinton. To Barak's dismay, the Israeli team made far-reaching offers on Jerusalem without obtaining what he viewed as vital concessions from Arafat. According to Ross, the Israelis showed the most flexible attitude yet regarding Jerusalem, offering to give the Palestinians East Jerusalem's northern Arab neighborhoods while keeping the rest of East Jerusalem for Israel and to institute a "special regime (in the Old City) in which there would be shared responsibilities in the Muslim and Christian quarters," which were to be worked out jointly. The Palestinians, however, downplayed the concessions and said that they could hardly agree to recognize the legitimacy of Jewish settlements in East Jerusalem.

For Barak, this development was a turning point and caused him to accuse the American team of being biased against Israel and of not pressuring the Palestinians enough. In an emotional note to Clinton, Barak said that the Palestinians were refusing to negotiate in good faith and wanted to force Israel into a position that amounted to national suicide. Barak was convinced that the United States would have to apply intense pressure on Arafat, even threats that he faced losing US support, if the Americans wanted Israel to continue negotiating. For the next few days, the negotiations were deadlocked.

On the eighth day of the summit, Barak, responding to American threats that the summit would have to be concluded and negotiations about Jerusalem deferred until later, finally agreed to give Clinton a series of concessions. However, the president would have to present them to the Palestinians as if the Americans were making the demands of Israel. Barak then made his final offer, which was presented to the Palestinians as a US proposal. The following are the main points of Barak's final plan:

- Israel would annex 9 percent of the West Bank and take another 1 percent of it in return for a swap of Israeli land in the Gaza Strip area.
- The Palestinians would control 85 percent of the border with Jordan.
- Israel was to be given control of the Jordan Valley for a maximum of twelve years.
- The Muslim and Christian quarters of the old city of Jerusalem would be under Palestinian sovereignty as well as almost all of the outer Arab neighborhoods. Meanwhile, the inner Arab neighborhoods would be under Palestinian civil jurisdiction, giving the Palestinians control over zoning, security, and law enforcement, but not formal sovereignty.

According to Ross, Barak also offered to give the Palestinians "custodianship" over the al-Haram ash-Sharif, but not sovereignty. On refugees, he pledged that a solution satisfactory to both sides would be agreed upon.

Barak's flexibility, however, had apparently reached its limits. On the tenth day, in response to Palestinian rejection of Israeli control over the Temple Mount/al-Haram ash-Sharif, Barak insisted that he would not continue negotiating until Arafat agreed to the offer, which had been made to him via Clinton. Barak also explicitly reiterated that the Palestinians, in signing a final agreement, would commit to a permanent end of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In the meantime, Clinton had departed for three days to attend the G-8 summit in Okinawa. During Clinton's absence there was another turning point. When it became increasingly clear that the Palestinians would reject Barak's generous offer, Barak became adamant, while the Palestinians became more concerned about perceived failings of the proposal. They believed that Barak's proposals failed to grant a potential Palestinian state enough sovereignty, offered them a fragmented state, failed to make concessions on the refugee issue (in particular, an Israeli admission of responsibility), and failed to give them sovereignty over al-Haram ash-Sharif. From this point onward, Barak, according to different participants, quit participating actively in the summit, convinced that he had received nothing substantial from the Palestinians for his far-reaching offers. Barak sequestered himself, refused to meet with Arafat for direct talks, and practically demanded Palestinian acceptance of his offer if negotiations were to continue.

Barak felt convinced that all red lines had been crossed and went into damage control mode. He asserted that an agreement could not be reached and asked Clinton for a series of measures and gestures of support that would at least help him avoid defeat in the Israeli elections—since he had not achieved a settlement and he did not want to be perceived as having made extensive concessions. To shore up Barak's domestic support, Clinton concluded the talks by emphasizing the courage and vision the Israeli prime minister had shown, while blaming the Palestinians for the lack of progress.

Barak's Offer in the Israeli Post-Camp David Discourse

Barak's offer retained some relevance for several months after the failure of the Camp David Summit. Even after Camp David, Palestinians, Israelis, and Americans who had been involved in the negotiations continued holding meetings. However, two factors convinced most Israelis that Barak's offer was no longer relevant as a basis for future negotiations. One was the CLINTON PARAMETERS, which the president presented on 23 December 2000. With Clinton's blueprint, Barak's offer ceased being a point of reference for negotiations.

Another factor that terminated Barak's offer as a basis for future negotiations was its role in Israeli political discourse. Some Israelis considered the Palestinian refusal of Barak's offer proof that the Palestinians would never be satisfied with anything that Israel offered. Others in Israel depicted Camp David as being consistent with the

© Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA), Jerusalem, Jan de Jong cartographer, reprinted with permission

Map 6. Projection of West Bank Permanent Status Map, Presented by Israel, Camp David, July 2000

© Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (PASSIA), Jerusalem, reprinted with permission.

Map 7. Projection of the Israeli Proposal for Jerusalem's Final Status, Camp David, July 2000

historical tendency of the Palestinian leadership to miss opportunities and to blunder in negotiations.

The Israeli narrative was strengthened by Clinton's public statements after the summit, in which he repeatedly held Arafat solely responsible for the failure to reach a historic agreement at Camp David. In the post-Camp David era, Barak's offer was thus transformed from a potential final-status agreement into proof that there was no Palestinian partner for peace. Barak himself implied that Camp David had unmasked the true intentions of the Palestinians and exposed their hatred of Israel. Barak's interpretation of Camp David thus played a key role in shaping a new Israeli post-Oslo narrative. According to this narrative, the Palestinians had never negotiated in good faith, because they did not genuinely recognize Israel's right to exist. The view that the Palestinians were not fit negotiating partners became pervasive after Camp David. As proof, the spokespeople of the Israeli political-security establishment tended to focus on Arafat's refusal of Barak's offer and the subsequent outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, which they saw as directed entirely by the PNA. Israeli chief of staff Moshe (Bugi) Ya'alon asserted in an interview on 25 August 2002 that Arafat regarded "Oslo as a Trojan horse that enabled the Palestinians to get into the country, and September 2000 as the moment of emerging from the horse's belly." The "no partner" trope—the belief that the Palestinians could never be a viable partner for negotiations—not only deepened during the second Intifada but also paved the way for Israel's unilateral policy toward the Palestinians. The map illustrates the political geography of the West Bank in the aftermath of Camp David and Israel's reoccupation in 2002.

Map 8. The West Bank after Israel's Reoccupation, June 2002

© Foundation for Middle East Peace (FMPEP), Washington, DC, reprinted with permission.

See also CAMP DAVID SUMMIT; OSLO PROCESS

Bibliography

- Baskin, Gershon. "Negotiating the Settlements: The Success of Right-Wing Political Entrapment against Peace." Jerusalem: Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information. 1 November 2000.
- Hass, Amira. "PA Explains Why It Rejected Camp David." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 24 July 2001.
- Malley, Robert. "Fictions about the Failure at Camp David." The New York Times. 8 July 2001.
- Malley, Robert, and Hussein Agha. "Camp David: The Tragedy of Errors." The New York Review of Books. 9 August 2001.
- Meital, Yoram. Peace in Tatters: Israel, Palestine, and the Middle East. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2006.
- Pundak, Ron. From Oslo to Taba: What Went Wrong? Peres Center for Peace. June 2001. <http://www.peres-center.org/media/Upload/61.pdf>.
- Ross, Dennis. The Missing Peace: The Inside Story of the Fight for Middle East Peace. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2004.
- Sher, Gilead. The Israeli-Palestinian Peace Negotiations, 1999–2001: Just beyond Reach. London: Routledge, 2005.
- Slater, Jerome. "Israel, Anti-Semitism and the Palestinian Problem." Tikkun: A Bimonthly Jewish Critique of Politics, Culture and Society. 16:3 (2001).
- Sternhell, Ze'ev. "Barak's Three No's." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 15 December 2000.

—Yoram Meital

Al-Barghuthi, Marwan Hasib Husayn (1959–)

Marwan al-Barghuthi is the secretary-general of the FATAH Higher Committee in the WEST BANK and the most popular INTIFADA ELITE leader in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Born and raised in Kafr Kubr in the West Bank, he was among the founders of al-Shabiba (young men) and headed its faction at BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY in the early 1980s, where he also served as president of the student council. Al-Barghuthi received a B.A. in History and Political Science and an M.A. in International Relations from Birzeit.

Israel imprisoned al-Barghuthi for six years for his activism during the first INTIFADA, then deported him to JORDAN. In 1989 al-Barghuthi became a member of the FATAH-REVOLUTIONARY COUNCIL, coordinating relations between the inside (Occupied Territories) and outside (TUNIS and Amman). He was also an independent member of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION CENTRAL COUNCIL. Returning to the West Bank in April 1994, al-Barghuthi soon established and headed the West Bank Fatah Higher Committee to develop CIVIL SOCIETY and revitalize Fatah as a viable political party. Unhappy with al-Barghuthi's moves, PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY president YASIR ARAFAT ensured that he was not on the Fatah-PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (PLC) slate for the Palestinian elections. Nevertheless, he won the Ramallah seat as an independent. After initial competition over the civil versus military nature of Fatah in the West Bank, he became close to JIBRIL RAJUB and has good relations with Islamist groups. Al-Barghuthi was critical of the centralization of power under Arafat, and at the May 1997 PLC meeting, in the context of a budgetary misuse scandal, he submitted a motion of no confidence in Arafat. In 2000 Arafat attempted to remove him from leadership of the West Bank Fatah in favor of Husayn al-Shaykh, but the Fatah cadres refused to recognize al-Shaykh because of their loyalty to al-Barghuthi. A pragmatist, al-Barghuthi believes that a permanent solution to the Middle East conflict can be found only if the mediator is changed. According to him, the UNITED STATES is too close to Israel to be an honest broker.

Al-Barghuthi was one of the prominent leaders of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, which erupted in September 2000, causing Israel to demand his DEPORTATION. On 4 August 2001, Israel attempted to ASSASSINATE him; but after the attempt failed, Tel Aviv arrested al-Barghuthi in Ramallah in April 2002, accusing him of having links to the AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, a military offshoot of the Fatah movement that has claimed responsibility for numerous SUICIDE BOMBINGS. In June 2004, Marwan al-Barghuthi was convicted by a Tel Aviv court of five attacks carried out by the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, and he was sentenced to five life terms plus forty years. Al-Barghuthi refused to recognize the jurisdiction of the Israeli court and stated that he had no intention of appealing the verdict or asking the court for a reduced sentence.

In December 2004, despite strong pressure from Fatah officials, al-Barghuthi announced that he would stand, from prison, for election as an independent candidate for the Palestinian presidency. Polls demonstrated that he was the most popular choice among Palestinians to succeed Arafat. In the end, he did not run in the election, persuaded that he could not administer Palestinian affairs from prison or negotiate with Israel, and that his candidacy would so hurt that of PNA presidential candidate MAHMUD ABBAS as to lead to the victory of an Islamist candidate. The Islamists won a large victory in the elections for the Legislative Council.

Bibliography

- Brown, Nathan J. Palestinian Politics After the Oslo Accords Resuming Arab Palestine. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Usher, Graham. Dispatches from Palestine: The Rise and Fall of the Oslo Peace Process. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- . Palestine In Crisis. London: Pluto Press, 1995.

Al-Barghuthi, Mustafa Kamil Mustafa (1954–)

A physician and political activist, Mustafa al-Barghuthi is an advocate for the development of Palestinian CIVIL SOCIETY and grassroots democracy. Al-Barghuthi was born in Beit Rima, near Ramallah, on the WEST BANK. He studied medicine at the Russian University of Friendship of Peoples in the former SOVIET UNION. He later earned a master's degree in Business Administration and Management from Stanford University in California.

He is an international spokesman for the Palestinian sector of nongovernmental organizations and an organizer of the international solidarity presence in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Al-Barghuthi is the former leader of the PALESTINIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY (PPP) and secretary of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL INITIATIVE (Mubadara) and was also a delegate to the MADRID CONFERENCE. He is responsible for the introduction of modern concepts and models of health care in Palestine. He has lectured widely at universities such as Harvard, Johns Hopkins, and Stanford, and at think tanks such as the Institute of Strategic Studies in London, Chatham House, the Brookings Institute, and the Sydney Institute. In 2001, he received the UAE Health Foundation Prize of the World Health Organization for his efforts in the Palestinian Medical Relief Society (PMRS).

In 1979 al-Barghuthi organized and headed the Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees (UPMRC), a nongovernmental organization that provides preventive and curative care to Palestinians living in West Bank rural villages and in the GAZA STRIP. The medical relief committees are organized and operate under the umbrella organization that al-Barghuthi organized and operated, the PMRS, establishing mobile clinics and health centers throughout the West Bank.

Ten years later, in 1989, al-Barghuthi was one of the founders of the Health, Development, Information and Policy Institute (HDIP), a think tank that is an alliance of 90 organizations representing the Palestinian community. HDIP sees itself as the interface between policymakers and the Palestinian society. It advises Palestinian politicians and institutions such as the World Health Organization (WHO), the World Bank, and various UN agencies such as UNICEF and UNDP. The institute also coordinates a large network of NGOs in the fields of health care and infrastructure conditions.

In October 2001, al-Barghuthi was one of the founders of Grassroots International Protection for the Palestinian people (GIPP), which focuses on the protection of Palestinians during peaceful demonstrations by arranging the presence of international civilian observers.

Al-Barghuthi also works as an employee of the Oxford Research Group in the development of effective methods of nonviolent civil disobedience that he believes will translate into a positive change in the security situation.

In 2002, al-Barghuthi left the PPP and, together with physician HAYDAR 'ABD AL-SHAFI; Ibrahim Dakkak, a consultant in human rights for the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA); and the literary scholar EDWARD SAID, he founded the Palestinian Initiative (al-Mubadara Al Wataniyya Al Filistiniyya). The goal was a reformist, inclusive, and democratic alternative to the existing parties. The movement sees itself as a "third way" between FATAH, the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), and militant Islamic groups such as HAMAS.

Al-Barghuthi currently serves as the initiative's general secretary.

Al-Barghuthi has consistently criticized the PLO and the PNA for corruption and incompetence. He supports nonviolent resistance as the most effective means of overcoming Israeli OCCUPATION. He supports peace with Israel based on two states, with a Palestinian state in all the territories occupied by Israel in the 1967 WAR, including a capital in Arab East Jerusalem and the right of return for the REFUGEES. He has indicated, however, that while recognition of a right of return is a must, this could be implemented in a way mutually acceptable to both sides.

In 1996, al-Barghuthi was injured while assisting victims of a violent clash between protesters and IDF soldiers in Ramallah. IDF soldiers fired near an area where medical personnel were working, and shrapnel entered his shoulder. On 3 January 2003, he was arrested following an international press conference in East Jerusalem, on charges of disturbing the peace and entering the city illegally. During his detention, al-Barghuthi was interrogated and suffered a broken knee, which, according to his account, was inflicted by blows from a rifle butt. He was released several days later.

In 2005, al-Barghuthi stood as a candidate in elections for president of the PNA subsequent to YASIR ARAFAT's death on 11 November 2004. The IDF arrested him during the election campaign and subsequently expelled him from East Jerusalem when he was planning to hold an election speech. He was also prevented from entering NABLUS and Gaza. Al-Barghuthi came in second in the elections, receiving slightly less than 20 percent of the vote.

In December 2005, the Independent Palestine list, a coalition of independents and NGO members, announced him as its top candidate in the legislative elections scheduled for January 2006. The list promised to fight corruption and nepotism, demanded the dismantlement of the BARRIER, which it termed the "apartheid wall," and pledged to provide "a truly democratic and independent 'third way' for the large majority of silent and unrepresented Palestinian voters, who favour neither the autocracy and corruption of the governing Fatah party, nor the fundamentalism of Hamas." Barghouthi was newly elected to a seat on the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL in January 2006, along with one other member of the Independent Palestine list. The list won approximately 3 percent of the vote in the Council elections. He served as minister of information in the short-lived Palestinian Unity Government of March–June 2007.

Bibliography

- Al-Barghuthi, Mustafa. "Jerusalem Is Now." Palestine Monitor. 26 September 2008.
- . "Olmert Curbs Palestinian Rights." Palestine Monitor. 30 August 2008.
- . "Palestine's Guernica and the Myths of Israeli Victimhood." Palestine Monitor. 31 December 2008.
- . "Steadfast before Goliath." Palestine Monitor. 7 February 2009.
- . "Telling It as It Is." Palestine Monitor. 5 December 2008.
- . "A Year after Annapolis: Has It Brought Any Peace?" Palestine Monitor. 26 November 2008.
- . "We Remain." Palestine Monitor. 17 May 2008.
- Al-Barghuthi, Mustafa, and Mairead Maguire. "Tales from Gaza: Call for International Solidarity with the Palestinian People." Palestinian National Initiative. 22 November 2008.

Bar Giora

Bar Giora (Watchmen) was a paramilitary organization that protected the Jewish SETTLEMENTS in Palestine during the early years of the twentieth century. The Bar Giora organization was founded in 1907 at the home of YITZHAK BEN-ZVI, who later became Israel's second president. In Neve Tzedek, near JAFFA, Bar Giora established the first commune of Jewish guards, who were stationed at Sejera. In a few settlements, young Jewish settlers organized small groups for guard duty on a voluntary basis, having learned the art of guarding and securing their settlements from the few professional military men in Palestine at that time. In 1909 the Bar Giora merged with HASHOMER.

Bibliography

- Jewish Agency. "Bar Giora: Under Ottoman Rule, 1882–1917." Jewish Defense Organizations: Under Ottoman Rule 1882–1917; Under British Mandatory Rule, 1918–1948. n.d.
- Pa'il, Me'ir. "British Mandate Jewish Armed Forces: From Hashomer to the Israel Defense Forces." PalestineFacts. Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs. n.d.
- Shapira, Anita. Land and Power: The Zionist Resort to Force, 1881–1948. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000.

Barrier

The Barrier, composed of a series of electronic fences, deep trenches, wide patrol roads, and, in certain places, 9-meter-high concrete slabs, is variously called the “Separation Wall,” “Annexation Barrier,” “Security Fence,” or “Apartheid Wall.” According to Israel, it is a vital means of improving the security of its citizens. The Israeli government has also publicly contended that the Barrier is a temporary structure. But because a significant part of the Barrier has been built east of the Green Line, leveling hills, flattening valleys, and encircling whole villages and towns, Palestinians fear that its real goal is to determine the BORDER between Israel and any future Palestinian entity.

Historical Trajectory

The idea of creating a wall between Israel and its Arab neighbors can be traced back not only to the writings of Zionist leader Ze’ev (VLADIMIR) JABOTINSKY and his right-wing Revisionist camp but also to the ideologies of mainstream ZIONISM. As Avi Shlaim has observed, this vision has informed Zionism even before the establishment of Israel and the 1948 WAR; through the 1956, 1967, and 1973 Wars; the peace agreement with EGYPT; the LEBANON WAR; and all the way to the OSLO ACCORDS. Given the prominent place of the wall in Zionist ideology and practice, it is not surprising that, in the midst of the OSLO PROCESS, Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN decided to build a fence around the GAZA STRIP in 1993. Within a relatively short period, a patrol road and a series of fences 33 miles (54 kilometers) long closed the border between Gaza and Israel, leaving three passage-ways to connect the two regions. The Palestinians did not oppose the construction of this fence, because it was erected on the Green Line, the border determined by the 1949 ARMISTICE AGREEMENT that differentiated Israel proper from the area it had occupied in the 1967 WAR.

Not long after the construction of the Gaza fence, Israeli military officials suggested creating a barrier to separate the WEST BANK from Israel. The fact that the idea was originally discussed during the Oslo Process and not during a period of overt conflict is telling. No less significant is that the original proponents of the Barrier were members of the LABOR PARTY and not politicians from the LIKUD, who initially opposed its construction because they feared that it would re-demarcate the Green Line.

The discussions concerning the erection of a barrier did not, however, become active within Israel’s ruling establishment until November 2000, about a month after the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. After public opinion within Israel demanded the creation of a barrier that would stop Palestinian SUICIDE BOMBERS, Prime Minister EHUD BARAK approved a plan to establish a barrier from the north to the center of the West Bank as a means of limiting unmonitored entry of Palestinians into Israel. Barak’s government did not begin implementing the plan immediately, and in February 2001 the Labor Party lost the national elections to the Likud.

The new prime minister, ARIEL SHARON, initially opposed the construction of a physical barrier between Israel and the West Bank, but he quickly recognized that an overwhelming majority of Israeli citizens supported its erection. The Barrier had become a code word for security at a time when suicide bombers were exploding themselves on public buses and in shopping malls, killing dozens and injuring hundreds of Israeli citizens. In July 2001 the Israeli cabinet adopted a plan closely resembling the November 2000 Labor government’s decision to erect a barrier that would allow Israel to monitor the entry of motor vehicles and to prevent the passage of people on foot in sections of the West Bank that were deemed high-risk areas.

Yet nine months later—a year and three months after Sharon had become prime minister—almost nothing had been done to execute the government’s decision. Sharon’s hesitancy to implement the plan reflected his and the Likud party’s ambivalence about the Barrier, which stemmed primarily from their fear that it might undermine attempts to actualize the dream of a Greater Israel. Sharon and his political allies recognized that building a physical barrier would reintroduce the international border between Israel and the West Bank and undo in one action years of intense political labor to enlarge Israel, including the SETTLEMENT expansion and its related infrastructure (e.g., bypass ROADS, military bases, PERMITS, ROAD-BLOCKS, nature preserves, and CLOSED MILITARY ZONES). Nonetheless, they had to respond to public opinion. On 14 April 2002, in the midst of the massive military OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD, during which Israel reoccupied all of the West Bank, the Israeli cabinet decided to establish a permanent barrier to “improve and reinforce the readiness and operational capability in coping with TERRORISM.”

In the days after the decision, the Israeli military took control of Palestinian-owned LAND in several locations east (i.e., outside) of the Green Line and began to uproot Palestinian trees and level earth. Although the work was stopped a few weeks later, it resumed in August after the cabinet approved a permanent route for the first 72 miles (116 kilometers) of the Barrier. It became clear that the Sharon government had decided to construct parts of the Barrier deep inside the West Bank. More Palestinian land was confiscated to encircle Jewish settlement blocs from the east and, in this way, to incorporate them into Israel proper. In addition to separating Israelis from Palestinians, in many areas the barrier separated Palestinians from Palestinians.

The Barrier's Structure

The main component of the Barrier is an electronic fence that provides a warning signal when someone attempts to cross it. East of the electronic fence is a service road along which runs a barbed-wire fence. Further east is a trench or deep ditch, designed to prevent vehicles from crashing into the electronic fence. To the west of the fence is a trace road, intended to reveal the prints of anyone who crosses the electronic apparatus, a patrol road, and an armored vehicle road. A second barbed-wire fence is frequently constructed along this armored vehicle path. The average width of the Barrier complex is about 200 feet (60 meters). Because of topographic constraints, some areas have a narrower Barrier that does not include all of the elements supporting the electronic fence, while in other areas the Barrier's width reaches 325 feet (100 meters). This does not include a buffer zone averaging between 500 and 650 feet (150 and 200 meters) on the eastern side of the Barrier, where new Palestinian construction is prohibited. In a number of places, a "depth barrier," made up of a deep trench and a barbed-wire fence, has been constructed a few hundred yards or a few kilometers to the east of the regular Barrier. In built-up areas, where the apparatus supporting the electronic fence could not be erected, the Barrier is made up of a concrete wall 9 meters high, or approximately three stories. Altogether sixty-three gates have been built along the Barrier, of which twenty-five are accessible to Palestinians, who need special permits to pass from one side of the Barrier to the other.

The Barrier's Route

Since August 2002 the government has changed the Barrier's route a number of times following the intervention of ISRAEL'S SUPREME COURT OF

The Barrier

The Barrier at Qalqilya

Justice. (See the section in this entry on “Legal Resistance.”) The total length of the Barrier is expected to be 415 miles (670 kilometers)—a figure that includes sections around MA’ALE ADUMIM and the Ariel-Emmanuel settlements, which at the time of this writing are pending further interministerial examination. By the time it is complete, no less than $3.4 billion will have been spent, over 5 percent of Israel’s annual budget.

The planned route extends in many places deep into Palestinian territory. The Ariel-Emmanuel finger, for instance, penetrates over 13 miles (22 kilometers) into the West Bank, which represents 42 percent of the region’s width. The Ma’ale Adumim section will extend nearly 9 miles (14 kilometers) east across the narrowest section of the West Bank, thus cutting off all of the major arteries between the northern and southern parts of the West Bank and, in effect, blocking Palestinian movement between these two regions. Presently there are sixteen “internal enclaves” where Palestinian villages, towns, or cities are either surrounded totally or on three sides by the Barrier.

Many human rights practitioners and political commentators believe that the Barrier’s penetration east of Jewish SETTLEMENTS is a way to make future Israeli annexations easier. They claim that the Barrier’s construction outside of the Green Line underscores that its major objective is to redraw the border between Israel and the West Bank. Because of its penetrations into the West Bank, the Barrier’s planned route is over twice the length of the Green Line, which is 195 miles (315 kilometers) long.

Once the construction is completed, about 12 percent of Palestinian land will be located between the Barrier and the Green Line, not including large segments of land that will be confiscated if, as expected, a Barrier is erected in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY. This 12 percent includes some of the most fertile parts of the West Bank and is currently home to about 30,500 Palestinians (excluding East JERUSALEM). An additional 244,000 Palestinians reside in the sixteen internal enclaves, which have one or two entrances through which the residents can pass to travel to other parts of the West Bank. In cities such as Tulkarm and Qalqilya, where the Barrier separates the metropolis from the neighboring villages, both urban and rural communities have suffered because the population's fragmentation and isolation have undercut social support networks and economic activity.

Map 9. The Barrier, February 2005

In East Jerusalem the Barrier, made up of concrete slates 30 feet (9 meters) tall, cuts through Palestinian neighborhoods. It disconnects about one-quarter of the estimated 230,000 Palestinians who hold Jerusalem residency cards from the city center, while the remaining three-quarters are cut © Foundation for Middle East Peace (FMEP), Washington DC, reprinted with permission.

© B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, reprinted with permission

Map 10. Barrier Wall Surrounding Qalqilya and Environs

Anti - Apartheid Wall Campaign
www.stopthewall.org
mobilize@stopthewall.org
 Copyright © 2005, PÅLDIS, Jerusalem
 10 km

LEGEND

- The Apartheid Wall, Existing or Under Construction
- Green Line
- Israeli Settlements, Existing / Under Construction
- Israeli Settlements, Military / Industrial
- Further Area Controlled by Settlements
- Settlement Areas not included in the Jerusalem Wall
- Palestinian Villages, Cities and Neighborhoods
- Regional and Local Roads, Obstructed Palestinian Road Link
- Regional and Local Roads, Checkpoint / Gate
- Israeli (Re) Constructed Bypasses / Settler Roads, Projected or Under Construction
- Israeli-Constructed or Proposed Road Tunnels or Bridges
- Israeli Proposed Main "Alternative" Palestinian North - South Road Link

Jerusalem Wall Checkpoints / Gates

- |                     |                   |
|---------------------|-------------------|
| Current      | Planned    |
| RL- Ramallah DCO    | SH- Shuafat RC    |
| BT- Beituniya       | AN- Anatot        |
| BD- Biddu           | TZ- Tur - Zeitim  |
| RT- Ramot           | LZ- Lazaros       |
| QL- Qalandiya       | SR- Sawahra       |
| AT- Atarot          | CT- Container     |
| DT- Dahyat al Barid | MZ- Mazmura       |
| AM- Adam            | P3- Passage 300   |
| HZ- Hizma           | BJ- Beit Jala DCO |
|                     | BL- Beit Jala     |
|                     | KH- Khadr         |

Map 11. Barrier around Jerusalem

© Stopthewall.org, reprinted with permission.

off from the West Bank. After Qalqilya was surrounded by the Barrier, an estimated 4,000 residents (10 percent of the population) left the town, while the business center of ABU DIS in East Jerusalem has become a ghost town, as the existing separation wall cuts the district in half.

The Barrier's Effects

The economic ramifications of the Barrier for the Palestinians have been serious, inflicting further suffering on a society already plagued by extreme poverty. According to the UN, in 2005 the poverty rate, defined as those living on less than $2.10 a day, had climbed to 64 percent in the Occupied Territories. Although the dire economic situation is clearly a result of several factors, the UNITED NATIONS cited the Barrier as an important factor.

Many Palestinians see the Barrier as an effort to undermine their INFRASTRUCTURE so that entire communities will be unable to sustain themselves and will thus move to the Barrier's other side or leave the country altogether. On the other hand, Israel emphasizes that the number of attempts to launch suicide attacks from the West Bank into Israeli proper shrank during 2004 and 2005, after the Barrier was built. However, other factors may have been involved, including TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS of Palestinians as well as changes in the political atmosphere inside the Occupied Territories, where support for suicide bombings has decreased.

Demographically, the Barrier will surround forty-eight Jewish settlements from the east, annexing the land they now occupy so that 188,000 of the West Bank's settlers will be incorporated into Israel's new BORDERS and thus legitimized. The wall being built in East Jerusalem is meant to reinforce the 1967 annexation of this part of the city and to legitimize further the 193,000 Jewish settlers living there. Thus, if the Barrier does become the new border, it will solve the problem of about 86 percent of Israel's illegal settlers. The remaining 14 percent, or 57,000 settlers, will have to be forcefully evacuated, as in ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA. It is unclear what Israel intends to do with the 30,500 Palestinians who are now living between the Barrier and the Green Line, but even if it does not evacuate them, it is likely that they will be unable to keep living in this area since in many respects the infrastructure is being drastically undermined.

Geographically and politically, the Barrier's objective is to enlarge Israel's internationally recognized territory by annexing West Bank land while creating small, isolated self-governing enclaves for the Palestinians. Aside from the sixteen small enclaves already mentioned, the Barrier's route cuts the Palestinian territory into at least two (north and south West Bank) and perhaps four larger enclaves (the north is divided into three parts: north of Ariel, south of Ariel, and JERICHO). Taking the Gaza Strip into account, it becomes clear that any future Palestinian state will be made up of three if not five main regions. Each of these regions will be closed off almost completely from the others, while Israel will continue to control all of the borders so that it will be able to implement a hermetic CLOSURE when necessary.

Grassroots Resistance

The Barrier has spurred ongoing NONVIOLENT resistance. Since Israel began erecting the Barrier, local Palestinian communities, joined by a small number of Israelis from the radical left and foreign activists, primarily members of the INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY MOVEMENT, have confronted the military and bulldozers on a daily basis. Although this struggle has in many places been extremely persistent and has managed to draw the international community's attention to the Barrier's effects, it has not substantially changed the situation. There are several reasons for the ultimate failure of the grassroots movement, of which three are the most crucial:

1. The PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) left the role of leading the resistance to local leaders and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). Consequently, the resistance has been fragmented so that only the villages and towns directly hurt by the Barrier engage in the struggle against it.
2. It is difficult for Palestinians in other areas to take part in the resistance because the CHECKPOINTS and roadblocks divide the West Bank into hundreds of small clusters and make travel from one area to the other extremely difficult, if not impossible.
3. Israel's response to the protesters has been harsh, thus deterring Palestinians from participating. So far over a dozen protesters have been killed by the Israeli military during nonviolent resistance against the wall, and thousands have been injured.

Legal Resistance

The local nonviolent resistance and the NGOs have caught the attention of the international community, and they have been largely responsible for mobilizing both the domestic and international legal struggle against the barrier.

On 9 July 2004, the International Court of Justice (ICJ, the UN's judicial arm) published its ruling regarding the Separation Barrier. While the judges noted that Israel has the right and indeed the duty to protect the lives of its citizens, they stated that any measures Israel adopts must conform to INTERNATIONAL LAW. The ICJ noted that "the wall, along the route chosen, and its associated regime, gravely infringe a number of rights of Palestinians residing in the territory occupied by Israel, and the infringements resulting from that route cannot be justified by military exigencies or by the requirements of national security or public order." The court accordingly concluded the following:

- Because Israel is breaching international law, it must cease the construction of the Barrier in the Occupied Territories, including in and around East Jerusalem.
- Israel must dismantle the Barrier already built and repeal all legislative and regulatory acts relating to it.
- Israel must make reparations for all damage caused by the construction of the Barrier in the West Bank, including in and around East Jerusalem.
- The UN, and especially the General Assembly and the Security Council, should consider what further action is required to bring an end to the illegal situation resulting from the construction of the wall.

The court's ruling is merely advisory, however, and the court has no enforcement mechanism. In response to the court's ruling, on 20 July 2004 the UN General Assembly called on Israel to fulfill its legal obligations. A majority, including the twenty-five countries comprising the EUROPEAN UNION, voted that Israel must comply with the court's ruling. In adopting a resolution by a vote of 150 to 6, the assembly also called on all UN member states "not to recognize the illegal situation resulting from the construction of the wall in the occupied Palestinian territory, including in and around East Jerusalem," and "not to render aid or assistance in maintaining the situation created by such construction."

Just a few days before the ICJ's ruling, the Israeli Supreme Court of Justice gave its verdict concerning eight separate land confiscation orders that Israel issued in preparation for building the Barrier in the northern West Bank Beit Sourik area. Dividing its discussion into two parts, the court accepted the government's claims that the sole purpose for constructing the Barrier was national security, not political, and security justifies the appropriation of plots of land in the West Bank. The court devoted most of its decision to the second issue, ruling that the military command failed to balance security and humanitarian considerations when determining the Barrier's route. Accordingly, the Supreme Court asked the state to change the Barrier's route, annulling six out of the eight confiscation orders (HC 2056/04).

Significant as the resistance has been, Israel has only made one minor change in the Barrier's route and has inexorably pursued its construction as part of its policy of unilateralism toward the Occupied Territories.

See also BANTUSTANS; PERMITS

Bibliography

- Azoulay, Ariella, and Adi Ophir. "The Monster's Tail." In Against the Wall. Edited by Michael Sorkin. New York: The New Press, 2005.
- Bitton, Simone (director). WALL (Hebrew/Arabic documentary film). 2004.
- B'Tselem. "Separation Barrier Statistics." October 2005. http://www.btselem.org/english/Separation\_Barrier/Statistics.asp.
- Gordon, Neve. Israel's Occupation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2008.
- . "The Militarist and Messianic Ideologies." MERIP. 8 July 2004.
- "Israel Is Trying to Push Us out of the Jordan Valley." Jerusalem Post. 30 December 2005.
- "Israel's Security Fence." March 2007. <http://www.seamzone.mod.gov.il>.
- "Justice Minister: West Bank Fence Is Israel's Future Border." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 1 December 2005.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. "Jurisdiction in an Immigrant-Settler Society: The Jewish and Democratic State." Comparative Political Studies. 35:10 (2002).
- Kretzmer, David. The Occupation of Justice: The Supreme Court of Israel and the Occupied Territories. Albany: State University of New York, 2002.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Behind The Barrier: Human Rights Violations as a Result of Israel's Separation Barrier. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, 2003.
- Medzini, Arnon. "A Wall, a Fence, an Obstacle or a Seam Zone Area: A Political-Geographical Review of the Construction of the Dividing Fence between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.” Paper presented at Fourth Annual METU Conference on International Relations, Ankara, Turkey, 30 June–2 July 2005.

Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.

UN Office for Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. The Humanitarian Impact of the West Bank Barrier on Palestinian Communities. Jerusalem: UN, 2005.

Yiftachel, Oren, and Haim Yacobi. “Barriers, Walls and Dialectics: The Shaping of ‘Creeping Apartheid’ in Israel Palestine.” In Against the Wall. Edited by Michael Sorkin. New York: The New Press, 2005.

—Neve Gordon

Basel Program

The Basel Program was a statement of the objectives of the Zionist movement formulated at the First WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS, which was called by THEODOR HERZL. IT WAS held in August 1897 in Basel, Switzerland, and contained the following goals:

- The promotion by appropriate means of the SETTLEMENT in Greater Israel (Eretz-Israel) of Jewish farmers, artisans, and manufacturers
- The organization and uniting of the whole of Jewry by means of appropriate institutions, both local and international, in accordance with the laws of each country
- The strengthening and fostering of Jewish national sentiment and national consciousness
- Preparatory steps toward obtaining the consent of governments, where necessary, in order to reach the goals of ZIONISM

The Basel Program provided the guidelines for the work of the Zionist Organization (later, WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION) started at this congress until the establishment of the state of Israel.

Bibliography

Sachar, Howard Morley. A History of Israel: Vol. 1: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time. New York: Knopf, 1986.

Sokolow, Nahum. History of Zionism: 1600–1918, 2 vols. London: Longmans, 1919.

Basic Laws (Israel)

Israel’s Basic Laws are legislative acts by the Knesset that exist as a consequence of the failure of Israel’s Constituent Assembly and the first Knesset to formulate a constitution. In place of a constitution, Basic Laws serve as fundamental legal referents and supersede general Knesset legislation.

One of the most controversial of these is the Israel LANDS LAW, which is based on “the special relationship between the People of Israel and the Land of Israel and its redemption.” The law ensures that “STATE LANDS,” which constitute about 93 percent of the land in Israel, remain “national,” that is, Jewish property. This means that Israel’s non-Jewish citizens—the approximately 20 percent of Israelis who are Palestinian or Druze—may not rent, lease, purchase, or otherwise use this 93 percent of land.

Another controversial Basic Law is that covering JERUSALEM. This law establishes the status of Jerusalem (east and west) as the capital of Israel, secures its integrity and unity, and concentrates all governing institutions there. This means that fundamental Israeli legislation precludes the Palestinians from having East Jerusalem as the capital of any future state. (www.knesset.gov.il/description/eng/eng\_mimshal\_yesod.htm).

Bibliography

Barzilai, Gad. Communities and Law: Politics and Cultures of Legal Identities. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2005.

Basic Laws of Israel. www.knesset.gov.il/description/eng/eng\_mimshal\_yesod.htm.

Edelman, Martin. Courts, Politics, and Culture in Israel. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1994.

Basilica of the Annunciation

See NAZARETH: BASILICA OF THE ANNUNCIATION

Bat Shalom

Bat Shalom (Women with a Vision for a Just Peace) was established in 1989 in JERUSALEM. It is a grassroots Israeli feminist organization of Jewish and Palestinian-Israeli women who work together to bring about a just resolution of the Israeli-Palestine conflict, respect for human rights, and an equal voice for Jewish and Arab women within Israeli society. Bat Shalom has a sister organization, the JERUSALEM CENTER FOR WOMEN, in Ramallah/East Jerusalem in which Palestinian women from the Occupied Territories participate. (www.batshalom.org).

Bedouin in Israel

The Bedouin living in Israel are among the indigenous Palestinian Arabs who remained in Israel after 1948 and are today a minority group of Israeli citizens. They are concentrated in two separate regions: the Negev in the south, which has the larger of the two groups, and the Galilee in the north. Traditionally they were organized into seminomadic tribes that derived their livelihood from livestock and seasonal agriculture. Since the fifth century CE (until 1948), the Negev desert was inhabited almost exclusively by Bedouin tribes. In the Galilee, which was populated with farming villages and several cities, the Bedouin were always a minority but were well integrated into the local agricultural and trade economies. Traditionally, the Negev and Galilee Bedouin originated from different regions and had little social or economic contact with each other, which remains much the same today.

In 2003 the Bedouin in Israel numbered over 210,000, of whom 140,000 live in the Negev desert. Approximately 50 percent of the Negev Bedouin live in government-planned towns, while the rest live in traditional villages that are not recognized by the government. The Galilee Bedouin number about 70,000, of whom about 30 percent also live in UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES. These two groups make up about 17 percent of the Palestinian Arab minority in Israel and are an overwhelmingly young community, among which over 65 percent are under the age of twenty.

Because of the processes of modernization, Bedouin life throughout the Middle East has undergone many changes. No Bedouin community, however, has been so dramatically affected as the Bedouin in Israel, who have also been directly and indirectly affected by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. This impact is, in large part, the outcome of two ongoing components of the Zionist project: first, the transformation of Palestine from “a land without a people” into a Jewish state and second, the Judaization of the LAND.

A Land without a People

One of the main obstacles to the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine was that the overwhelming majority of the population was Palestinian Arab. However, during the course and aftermath of the establishment of Israel, the land was emptied of over 750,000 Palestinians, including about two-thirds of the Bedouin population, who fled or were expelled to the neighboring Arab countries or territories. Those who remained in Israel were never recognized by the authorities as Palestinians, even though all of them, including the Bedouin, had relatives in the Palestinian DIASPORA.

The second level of remaking Palestine as “a land without a people” was the division of the Palestinian minority in Israel into several smaller minorities based on religion and/or lifestyle. The authorities designated the Bedouin as a separate group and institutionalized this segmentation through administrative structures and conditions, such as allowing the Bedouin to volunteer for military service while denying this option to other parts of the Palestinian minority.

Judaization of the Land

The Judaization of the land in Palestine has its roots in pre-1948 Zionist SETTLEMENT methods, which attempted to create contiguous chains of segregated Jewish localities, particularly in areas with a Palestinian majority, such as the Galilee and the Negev. Jewish settlement in these regions continues to be a highly valued Zionist achievement. The Judaization of the land entailed its “de-Arabization,” and this has been at the crux of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as experienced by the Bedouin in Israel.

Since the establishment of Israel, a number of mechanisms have been used to accomplish the double-pronged objective of de-Arabizing and Judaizing the land. First, a military administration that lasted until 1966 was established to govern the Palestinian minority in Israel. It was empowered to regulate Palestinians’ places of residence and movements, which it used to prevent many from returning to and cultivating their lands. Of the nineteen Negev Bedouin tribes, twelve were removed from their lands, and whole populations were confined to a specially designated restricted area in the northeastern Negev, which represented only 10 percent of the territory they controlled before 1948. During this time the ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW was enacted, which allowed for the confiscation of land whose owners were absent. Thus, the majority of Bedouin, whose absence was being imposed and enforced by the military administration, lost their lands.

Second, the Israeli government enacted a series of additional laws that facilitated the confiscation of land from the Palestinian minority in Israel, most of which was classified as “STATE LAND” and co-administered by quasi-governmental organizations such as the JEWISH AGENCY. As a result, the Palestinian-Arab citizens of Israel are currently prevented from purchasing, using, or leasing land in 93 percent of the country. The land loss has been most severe among the Bedouin, whom the Israeli authorities portrayed as wanderers, with no attachment to or ownership of the land, even though most Bedouin have permanent home bases and only seasonal migration. Before 1948 most Bedouin land was held according to traditional landownership systems, which were clearly demarcated and accompanied by contracts, either oral or documentary ones signed by neighboring tribes and communities. Because the Israeli authorities and courts refused to recognize the traditional ownership systems, the state claimed virtually all the Bedouin land. Unwilling to relinquish their land rights, the Bedouin have attempted to continue living on the land and to practice their traditional livelihood but have been able to do so only to a very limited extent. Their formal legal status as “illegal squatters” and “trespassers/invasers of State Land” has made their efforts particularly difficult. Furthermore, as members of the Palestinian minority, they continue to be viewed as a DEMOGRAPHIC and security threat to the Jewish state and denied full and equal citizenship rights.

Urbanization Program

An additional mechanism that the government instituted in the 1960s to consolidate Israel’s control over the land and remove the Bedouin presence was the “urbanization program.” This program involved the forced resettlement of the Bedouin population into towns on one-quarter-acre lots, making them dependent upon integration into the larger Israeli economy for their livelihoods. The government has claimed that their purpose was to provide the Bedouin with modern services—for example, running water, electricity, telephones, local schools, and HEALTH clinics—that the traditional villages did not provide. While the towns have the most basic services, they lack internal and external public transportation networks, active industrial and commercial centers, sewage systems, libraries, sports and cultural centers, and, in most cases, even banks and post offices—all of which are found in neighboring Jewish towns of comparable size. The official 2004 government document ranking local authorities in Israel according to a socioeconomic index places most of the Bedouin towns at the bottom of the list. Even in comparison to other Palestinian Arabs, Bedouins have the highest unemployment and school dropout rates and the lowest educational levels in the country. Their integration into Israeli society is marginal, and approximately 65 to 75 percent of the Bedouin population lives under the poverty line.

Bedouin who are able to do so have resisted resettlement in the towns, and thus over four decades after the initiation of the urban resettlement program, only half of the Bedouin live in the government-planned towns. The rest live in unrecognized villages and hamlets that lack services such as paved roads, public transportation, electricity, running water, garbage disposal, telephone service, and community health facilities. Because Israel doesn’t recognize these towns, all forms of housing (except tents) are considered illegal and are subject to heavy fines and demolition proceedings. In 1976 the government established the Green Patrol as a paramilitary unit whose official purpose is to preserve nature, oversee state lands, and protect them from “squatters.” However, its actions also include the tight control of herd sizes and grazing areas in the Negev, and the confiscation of flocks and destruction of Bedouin dwellings, crops, and trees found in violation of the restrictions.

The unrecognized villages lack their own representative authorities and have no official local council. Even those who do live in an area under a municipal authority, such as those villages within the jurisdiction of Jewish regional councils, do not receive services from these bodies or vote in their elections.

Government Plan

In light of the Bedouin’s ongoing resistance to the urbanization program, in 2003 the government approved a five-year plan to bring “final closure” to the land conflict with the Negev Bedouin by establishing a number of new Bedouin towns. The plan, which was developed without the participation of the Bedouin, includes the following:

- The establishment of a new police unit and special forces to implement government policies toward the villagers living in unrecognized villages and to carry out house demolition orders
- The allocation of additional funds to the Green Patrol for more personnel, along with new powers to operate against the Bedouin
- The allocation of additional funds to the Ministry of Interior for enforcing planning and construction ordinances, which effectively means intensifying the policy of HOUSE DEMOLITIONS

- The allocation of additional funds to the courts and Ministry of Justice for special court sessions and the hiring of private lawyers to accelerate the processing of demolition orders

The government's plan has been rejected by representatives of the unrecognized villages and is being challenged through national and international legal channels.

See also PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL; UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES

Bibliography

- Abu-Saad, Ismael. "Forced Sedentarisation, Land Rights and Indigenous Resistance: The Bedouin in the Negev." In Catastrophe Remembered: Palestine, Israel and the Internal Refugees. Edited by Nur Masalha. London: Zed Books, 2005.
- Abu-Saad, Ismael, Harvey Lithwick, and Kathleen Abu-Saad. A Preliminary Evaluation of the Negev Bedouin Experience of Urbanization: Finding of the Urban Household Survey. Beer Sheva: Center for Bedouin Studies and Development and the Negev Center for Regional Development, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, 2004.
- Falah, Ghazi. "Israeli 'Judaization' Policy in Galilee." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:4 (1991).
- . "Israeli State Policy toward Bedouin Sedentarization in the Negev." Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:2 (1989).
- Jiriys, Sabri. "The Land Question in Israel." MERIP Reports. 47 (1976).
- Maddrell, Penny. The Bedouin of the Negev. London: Minority Rights Group Report No. 81, 1990.
- Stern, Yoav. "Court Rejects Bedouin Villages' Request for Clean Water Connection." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 25 September 2006.
- Yiftachel, Oren. "Ethnocratic Policies and Indigenous Resistance: Bedouin Arabs and the Israeli Settler State." Holy Land Studies: Interdisciplinary Journal. 2:1 (2003).

—Ismael Abu-Saad

Beged Ivri

See THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Begin, Benjamin "Benny" Ze'ev (1943–)

The son of the late prime minister MENAHEM BEGIN, Benny Begin is a soldier, scientist, and extreme right-wing politician. Born in JERUSALEM, he earned his B.S. and M.S. from the Hebrew University and his Ph.D. in geology from Colorado State University in the United States. From 1960 to 1963, Begin served in the Armored Corps and during 1975–1976 volunteered for a period of military service. He then worked at the Geological Survey of Israel and was co-coordinator of studies on the nuclear power plant site in Israel. Since 1989 he has served as the head of the Research Institute of the College of Judea and Samaria.

From 1988 until January 1997, Begin was a Knesset member from the LIKUD PARTY. In 1997 Begin left Likud, considering it far too soft on the issue of Greater Israel, and ran for prime minister under the banner of a reconstituted HERUT PARTY (originally founded by his father out of the IRGUN). The main issue in Begin's election campaign was his vehement opposition to the OSLO ACCORDS in general and specifically to the WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM, signed by Likud prime minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. According to Begin, "There is only one alternative today, because there are only two possibilities. Either we are dragged down the Wye River and give away more territory to these hoodlums, or we stand firm." He maintains that the HEBRON area is the heartland of the Jewish state and that Netanyahu's signing of the Wye accord was an abandonment of Likud's commitment to a Greater Israel.

Begin allied Herut with MOLEDET and TEKUMA, the most extremist parties on the Israeli political spectrum, becoming leader of the new bloc and its candidate for prime minister. One of his coalition partners, REHAVAM ZE'EV, who openly advocated the TRANSFER of Palestinians from the "Land of Israel," became the number two person on the combined slate. One day before the elections, Begin withdrew from the race and has not returned to public life. Since leaving politics, he teaches science to Israeli high school students.

See also HERUT PARTY

Bibliography

- Begin, Ze'ev B. A Zionist Stand: Collected Speeches. London: Routledge, 1992.
- "Benny Begin Attacks Disengagement Plan." Israelnationalnews.com. 20 April 2004. http://72.14.203.104/search?q=cache:HjjVnkEy2\_kJ:www.israelnational-news.com/news.php3%3Fid%3D61155+Benny+Begin&hl=en&gl=us&ct=clnk&cd=10.
- Landau, David. "Far Right Joins Forces in Bid to Boost Election Prospects." Jewish Telegraphic Agency. 12 March 1999.

Begin, Menahem (1913–1992)

Menahem Begin was one of the most influential leaders in Israel from the mid-1940s, when he commanded the underground organization IRGUN TZEVA'I LE'UMI, through his service as prime minister in the late 1970s and early 1980s. As the leader of a series of parties and coalitions representing Revisionist ZIONISM in the Knesset, Begin led the opposition to LABOR Zionism, which controlled the government of Israel from the founding of the state in 1948 until the 1977 elections, when the coalition led by Begin, the LIKUD, took power. In roughly five years as prime minister, Begin managed the peace process that first produced the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS and later a peace treaty with EGYPT. In making peace with Egypt, Begin provided a major guarantee for Israel's security by removing a threat from the most important nation in the Arab world. At the same time, as a proponent of Greater Israel who was determined to keep the WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, and GAZA, Begin failed to implement the autonomy provisions regarding the Palestinians that were part of the Camp David Accords. In addition, his decision to send Israeli forces into the 1982 LEBANON WAR led to major casualties among all parties and a significant expansion of negative attitudes toward Israel.

Menahem Begin was born in Poland and lived his youth in a society in which virulent expressions of ANTI-SEMITISM were common. He became involved in Zionist activities at an early age, was educated as a lawyer, and served in BETAR, the youth organization of the Revisionist movement, eventually rising to command the Polish branch of the organization. Through his Zionist activities he came into contact with VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY, the most important leader of Revisionism, who recognized the danger for Jews in an increasingly anti-Semitic world. Jabotinsky favored the immediate creation of a Jewish state in Palestine and supported very strong military policies (what he called an "iron wall") to obtain such a state and to protect the Jewish community therein. Through Betar and other organizations, he also advocated training Jews to defend themselves. Begin was deeply influenced by Jabotinsky and for decades applied lessons from the man he labeled his "teacher."

In 1942 Begin immigrated to Palestine after fleeing Poland in September 1939. Initially he and his wife were able to make it as far as Soviet-occupied territory, where he was arrested by the secret police and eventually sent to prison. He would later write about this period in White Nights, which some consider a classic of prison literature. After being detained a little over a year, he was released and went to Palestine, where he immediately joined the anti-British underground and shortly thereafter became the commander of the Irgun, which he led from the fall of 1943 until the creation of the state of Israel. In fall 1944, in response to news of the HOLOCAUST and his belief that the British were not doing nearly enough to protect Jewish lives in Palestine, Begin launched what he called "the revolt" against British control of Palestine. During the four years of the revolt, which he later chronicled in his book of the same name, the Irgun carried out a number of military attacks on the British, the most famous of which was the bombing of the KING DAVID HOTEL, which served as British military headquarters. The Irgun also launched reprisal raids, including an assault on the Arab village DEIR YASSIN that left many dead, in response to what it saw as Palestinian violence against Jews. Although it was often labeled a TERRORIST organization, Begin saw the Irgun as a legitimate group that followed the laws of war and took careful steps to avoid harming innocent civilians. Although the exact influence of the Irgun on the British decision to leave Palestine is contested, it seems clear that the group increased pressure on the British and probably hastened their withdrawal. After the creation of Israel, Begin disbanded the Irgun and formed a political party based on his interpretation of Revisionism, the HERUT.

For almost twenty years Begin lived in a kind of political exile. Throughout this period, he led Herut but never came remotely close to gaining enough support to form a government. Through much of this time, Prime Minister DAVID BENGURION refused to even speak the name of Begin in the Knesset, viewing him as an extremist. Throughout, Begin maintained a consistent ideology based on a policy of strong reaction to any perceived threat, a claim of Israel's right to the LAND on both sides of the Jordan River (including both the West Bank and much of what is now the state of JORDAN), but also a strong commitment to liberal democratic principles, including the rule of law. He also continued to see Israel as threatened by a potential new Holocaust.

Although Begin's worldview did not change, the political world in Israel altered dramatically, beginning with the 1967 WAR, which gave Israel control of the West Bank, and which Begin always referred to as Judea and Samaria. As a result of the war, Israelis could settle in Palestinian land that Begin and others considered the heart of ancient Israel. While a sense of national euphoria gripped the nation after 1967, the rise of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and the 1973 WAR shattered the mood of security, and many Israelis began to feel they were living in a threatening world. In this context, Begin's focus on the threat of a potential Holocaust and his emphasis on strong security policies as well as his absolute commitment to Eretz Yisrael (the Greater Land of Israel) resonated with an increasing number of Israelis. In 1977 he formed a coalition of parties that became the Likud and swept to an election victory. Although there were many factors in the election, not least the disaffection of the majority Arab MIZRAHI/SEPHARDIC segment of the population with ASHKENAZI (European Jews) domination and discrimination, nevertheless Begin's steadfast commitment to Israel's security and his dedication to maintaining sovereignty over all of Eretz Yisrael played a significant role in his victory.

His finest hour occurred when he agreed to full withdrawal from Sinai to achieve peace with Egypt. Shortly after becoming prime minister, Begin sent an Israeli intelligence official to Egypt to warn President Anwar Sadat of a possible Libyan plot against him. He also attempted to make contact with Sadat through third parties. In response, Sadat offered to go anywhere in the world, even JERUSALEM, to achieve peace. Begin then immediately invited Sadat to Jerusalem, and the peace process began. It proceeded in fits and starts until a September 1978 conference organized by the UNITED STATES at Camp David, where President JIMMY CARTER worked tirelessly to produce an agreement in which Egypt agreed to normalize relations with Israel, reject the use of war, and demilitarize the Sinai. Israel agreed to a complete withdrawal from the Sinai and granted the Palestinians limited autonomy, plus a five-year period of negotiations to determine the final status of the Occupied Territories. The ultimate result was a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel in March 1979.

Although the treaty produced what has been labeled a "cold" peace between Egypt and Israel, it has endured the test of time without a breach, and by eliminating the risk of an attack by Egypt, it dramatically improved Israeli security and freedom of movement in the region. For example, Begin was able to launch the 1982 Lebanon War without concern about rear-guard opposition. Although he was steadfast in his commitment to the treaty with Egypt, even ordering the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) to forcibly remove Jewish settlers from the Sinai, he fulfilled none of his commitments to the Palestinians.

With regard to the Palestinians, Begin's commitment to retaining all of Eretz Israel (he did not view Sinai as part of Eretz Israel) precluded any possibility of a settlement. He felt a powerful biblical-mythic connection to the land and argued that the Israeli people drew strength from the return to their ancient homeland. For Menahem Begin, the Land of Israel and the People of Israel were an indivisible whole established by the covenant between God and Abraham, and no part could be sacrificed even for the sake of peace. At the same time, Begin was a committed liberal who believed in civil rights for all. Given these conflicting views, he offered the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories a "CIVIL ADMINISTRATION" and VILLAGE LEAGUES, but he was adamant that Israel would not withdraw from the West Bank, East Jerusalem, or Gaza. In what he continued to label as the "generation of Holocaust and revival," Begin always put what he perceived as the security needs of Israel first, and inevitably that put the legitimate needs of the Palestinians last. The result was that little or no progress was made on producing a just settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The final significant act of the Begin government was the invasion of Lebanon in 1982. Begin's decision to initiate war was based on the desire to destroy Palestinian forces and institutions in LEBANON and to eliminate Palestinian nationalism in the Occupied Territories. Thus Begin ordered the IDF to attack what he considered terrorist bases and to advance forty kilometers into Lebanon. Begin's defense minister, ARIEL SHARON, ignored the forty-kilometer instruction and sent the IDF to the very outskirts of Beirut, where they became bogged down. In a series of statements, Begin compared YASIR ARAFAT to Hitler and justified Israeli military actions as needed to destroy the modern Nazis (the PLO). The results of the invasion were disastrous. Many Palestinians were massacred by a Lebanese militia in two refugee camps under the control of the IDF. Israeli forces suffered more than 600 deaths. Arafat and his followers were forced to leave Lebanon, and the war caused some 20,000 Palestinian and Lebanese deaths. Begin had hoped to produce decades of peace and security for Israel through what he readily admitted was a “war of choice,” but the result was instead a disaster for Israel, the Palestinians, and Lebanon.

Menahem Begin stepped down in the context of the SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRES at the end of the 1982 Lebanon War. Thereafter he lived a reclusive life and was not seen in public again.

Bibliography

- Begin, Menahem. The Revolt: The Story of the Irgun. London: Schuman, 1951.
- Fahmy, Ismail. Negotiating for Peace in the Middle East. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983.
- Gervassi, Frank. The Life and Times of Menahem Begin: Rebel to Statesman. New York: Putnam, 1979.
- Haber, Eitan. Menahem Begin: The Legend and the Man. New York: Delacorte, 1978.
- Perlmutter, Amos. The Life and Times of Menachem Begin. New York: Doubleday, 1987.
- Rowland, Robert C. The Rhetoric of Menahem Begin: The Myth of Redemption through Return. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1985.
- Rowland, Robert C., and David A. Frank. Shared Land/Conflicting Identity: Trajectories of Israeli and Palestinian Symbol Use. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 2002.
- Seidman, Hillel, and Mordecai Schreiber. Menahem Begin: His Life and Legacy. New York: Shengold Publishers, 1990.
- Shindler, Colin. Israel, Likud and the Zionist Dream: Power Politics and Ideology from Begin to Netanyahu. London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.
- Silver, Eric. Begin, the Haunted Prophet. New York: Random House, 1984.
- Sofer, Sasson. Begin: An Anatomy of Leadership. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell, 1988.
- Temko, Ned. To Win or to Die: A Personal Portrait of Menahem Begin. New York: William Morrow, 1987.

—Robert C. Rowland

Beilin, Yossi (1948–)

Yossi Beilin is a journalist, writer, former Knesset member, and one of Israel’s leading “doves.” He is the founder and head of the Social Democratic Party of Israel. Beilin held ministerial posts in the governments of YITZHAK RABIN, SHIMON PERES, and EHUD BARAK and is one of the most experienced left-wing Israeli politicians. He is best known for his involvement with the OSLO ACCORDS, the GENEVA ACCORD, and the Israeli-Palestinian peace process in general.

Beilin was born in Israel and began a career as a journalist before receiving his Ph.D. in political science from Tel Aviv University. By 1977 he was the LABOR PARTY spokesman, a position he held until 1984. From then until 1988, when he was elected to the Knesset, he held a variety of governmental posts. From 1992 to 1994 Beilin headed the Israeli delegation to the multilateral working groups that grew out of the MADRID CONFERENCE. Throughout this time Beilin had close ties to Shimon Peres, which allowed him in 1993 to secretly initiate the Israeli-Palestinian talks in Oslo, in spite of the mistrust of Prime Minister Rabin. Those secret contacts led to the Oslo Accords and to the beginning of the peace process. In addition Beilin was a negotiator at the TABA TALKS with the Palestinians in January 2001.

While out of government in 2001, Beilin initiated secret talks with former Palestinian information minister YASIR ‘ABD RABBU, which lasted for two and a half years and resulted in the Geneva Accord. The initiative, supported by Swiss diplomats and officially launched in Geneva on 1 December 2003, offers an alternative peace plan with an agreement on FINAL STATUS issues in order to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

See also BEILIN-ABU MAZEN ACCORD; GENEVA ACCORD

Bibliography

- Beilin, Yossi. His Brother’s Keeper: Israel and Diaspora Jewry in the Twenty-first Century. New York: Schocken Books, 2000.
- . The Path to Geneva: The Quest for a Permanent Agreement, 1996–2004. New York: RDV Books, 2004.
- . Touching Peace: From the Oslo Accord to a Final Agreement. London: George Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1999.

Beilin–Abu Mazen Accord

The Beilin–Abu Mazen Accord of 13 October 1995 set forth an outline for FINAL STATUS negotiations and was entitled “Framework for the Conclusion of a final status Agreement between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION.” It was concluded immediately after the INTERIM AGREEMENT was signed, as a secret document created by MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen) and YOSHI BEILIN. With BENJAMIN NETANYAHU’S election in 1996, the accord was locked away and did not resurface until September 2000 when, in the wake of the collapse of the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT, Newsweek published the full text. It never played a role in talks between the two parties yet remains of historical significance in terms of the peace process.

Bibliography

Beilin-Abu-Mazen Document (1995). For the full text see "Framework for the Conclusion of a Final Status Agreement between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, 31 October 1995." www.beilin.org.il/Eng/Peace/bamdoceng.html.

Eldar, Akiva. "Arafat Welcomed the Beilin-Abu-Mazen Document." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 5 May 1998.

Reinhart, Tanya. "Mount Temple." ZNet Daily Commentaries. 2 October 2000. www.zmag.org/ZSustainers/ZDaily/2000-10/02reinhart.htm.

Beirut, Siege of 1982

See LEBANON WAR; SABRA AND SHATILA MASSACRE

Beit Orot

Beit Orot is a yeshiva (religious school) and a settler organization at the forefront of the Judaization of East JERUSALEM. As a hesder yeshiva (one that combines religious study with military service), Beit Orot has a multipronged focus: educating its one hundred students in Torah study while they are serving in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES, plus activism in the Jewish SETTLER MOVEMENT IN EAST JERUSALEM.

For all intents and purposes, the Beit Orot yeshiva is a settlement itself, because of its members' ideological profile. It was founded by Rabbi BENNY ELON in the early 1990s when he was minister of tourism. He made a point of transforming the location near the yeshiva into a national park on an overall area of 10 dunum (2.47 acres), known as Ein Tzurim, and the municipality has approved Building Plan No. 4904/A, which relates to public buildings and housing units, and gives Beit Orot the legal right to implement whatever development it wishes. Plans for development of Ein Tzurim were submitted by IRVING MOSKOWITZ, who also provided significant financing.

Successive governments have tried to implement the Judaization of East Jerusalem by integrating two forces that operate in tandem and feed off each other. One is the official, state organ that expropriates LAND and builds Jewish neighborhoods and enterprises, while the nonofficial organ is composed of settlers who perform what the state is unable to do for legal reasons. The settlers' amutot (nonprofit associations) are the long arm of government, moonlighting contractors for the government under each and every administration, LIKUD and LABOR. They flourished and developed with governmental backing and sponsorship, and are warmly embraced by every lawful authority, from the municipality to the police. A close, almost symbiotic relationship has formed between them and state representatives, to the extent that occasionally it is unclear who is leading whom, the state or the settlers.

Several settler associations operate in East Jerusalem: the most notable are Beit Orot and SHIMON HA'TZADIK plus ELAD, ATERET COHANIM, and ATARA L'YOSHNA. Their chief efforts are focused on the OLD CITY in the area of SILWAN, which they call Ir David (City of David), and neighborhoods surrounding the Old City. All of them collaborate in a framework known as the JERUSALEM FORUM, which links all organizations working to Judaize East Jerusalem, including the Messianic groups hoping to build the THIRD TEMPLE on the TEMPLE MOUNT.

Beit Orot is situated on Jerusalem's Mount of Olives and overlooks the TEMPLE MOUNT/AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF. Its role in Judaizing Jerusalem is attested to on its website: "Establishing strategic Jewish assets in areas surrounding the Old City creates a Jewish DEMOGRAPHIC and geographic belt. This contiguous belt serves to both fortify the inner core of eastern Jerusalem as well as protect the Old City."

A new Beit Orot settlement/yeshiva is currently being built on land taken from the Armenian Orthodox Church by Ateret Cohanim in 1991 and will comprise a complex of buildings on 3,000 square meters (0.74 acre) of land.

Beit Orot also takes credit for a number of Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the East Jerusalem area, most notably Ma'ale Ha'Zeitim in RAS AL-AMUD, which was established in 1990, and the Shimon Ha'Tzadik colony in SHAYKH JARRAH, established in 1998. Beit Orot has also played a role in creating Jewish enclaves in A-TUR and ABU DIS, Ir David in Silwan, and Nof Zion on Jabel Mukhaber, with 395 new housing units, which are scheduled to open soon. This latest Jewish settlement is in the heart of the area that every internationally recognized peace plan considers the future capital of a Palestinian state. (www.beitorot.org).

See also SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOUNT

Bibliography

Elon, Benny MK Rabbi. "Whose Land? Reclaiming Jerusalem." Arutz Sheva Israel National Radio. 29 September 1999.

Erlanger, Steven. "EU Critical of Israelis on East Jerusalem." International Herald Tribune. 25 November 2005.

Margalit, Meir. "Beit Orot: Like a Thorn in the Heart of Jerusalem." Occupation Magazine. 31 October 2005.

Beit Sahour Tax Revolt

See TAX REVOLT, BEIT SAHOUR

Ben-Eliezer, Benjamin (1936–)

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer was a career officer in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES, a member of the Knesset, and minister in charge of settlement expansion in several governments. Born in IRAQ, he immigrated to Israel in 1949, speaks fluent Arabic, and is nicknamed "Fouad." He graduated from the Israeli army's Command and Staff College and the Israel National Defense College.

Ben-Eliezer was a commander in the 1967 WAR and the 1973 War; as first commanding officer in southern LEBANON in 1977, he served as army liaison with the Christian militias there. From 1978 to 1981 he was military governor of the WEST BANK and was government coordinator of activities in the Occupied Territories from 1983 to 1984. Considered a hawk on foreign policy and the Palestinian question, Ben-Eliezer was one of the main architects of the 1982 invasion of Lebanon as well as a strong proponent of OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD in 2002.

In 1984 Ben-Eliezer was elected to the Knesset on the YACHAD slate, headed by EZER WEIZMAN. (Yachad subsequently merged with the LABOR PARTY.) He is currently a member of the Labor-MEIMAD parliamentary group. From 1992 to 1996 as minister of construction and housing (the most important post for SETTLEMENT in the Occupied Territories) under YITZHAK RABIN's and SHIMON PERES's governments, Ben-Eliezer strongly promoted the expansion of Israeli settlements, especially around JERUSALEM. In 2000 Prime Minister EHUD BARAK again assigned Ben-Eliezer the construction and housing portfolio, through which he carried out Barak's expansionist settlement policy in Jerusalem and the West Bank.

Ben-Eliezer played an important role in actualizing Rabin's vision and settlement expansion in and around Jerusalem, aimed at putting the future of the city and its West Bank environs beyond the reach of diplomacy. During Barak's administration and through Ben-Eliezer's mandate as minister of housing and construction, colonization was much greater than under his LIKUD predecessor, BENJAMIN NETANYAHU, especially in the Jerusalem area.

Bibliography

Ben-Eliezer, Benjamin. "Fight Terror and Build a Fence." Jewish Telegraph Agency. July 2002. www.jta.org/page\_print\_story.asp?intarticleid=11445.

Jewish Virtual Library. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/biography/ben\_eliezer.html.

Ben-Gurion, David (1886–1973)

David Ben-Gurion was the father of modern Israel, the foremost political and military leader of the Yishuv (the collection of pre-state Zionist institutions in Palestine), the first prime minister, and the most powerful leader in the new state of Israel from 1948 through 1963. In his early political life, Ben-Gurion was equally committed to socialism and ZIONISM, although after immigrating to Palestine in 1906, he gradually eschewed socialism for Zionism. In 1919 Ben-Gurion founded and led the political party AHDUT HA'AVODA. He eventually gravitated toward the right, and in 1930 he created and led the MAPAI party, the antecedent to the LABOR PARTY. Later Ben-Gurion was responsible for institutionalizing the premises and strategy of VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY's "Iron Wall."

Eventually Ben-Gurion's ideology reflected the pure ethnonationalism of Zionism, and his life was devoted to the single-minded pursuit of the goal of a Jewish state in Palestine—and he amassed the power to realize that objective. In the Yishuv, Ben-Gurion rose to positions of political prominence in the trade union movement—in 1920 and beyond serving as the secretary-general of the HISTADRUT (the general federation of labor in Palestine); in 1935 he was elected chairman of the JEWISH AGENCY Executive and held this post until the state of Israel was born in 1948.

The Formative Years

Originally named David-Josef Gruen, Ben-Gurion was born in Plonsk (Poland), then part of Russia and under the restrictive czarist policies that confined Jews to the Pale of Settlement (the term given to a region of Imperial Russia, along its western border, in which permanent residence of Jews was allowed and beyond which Jewish residence was generally prohibited; it extended from the demarcation line to the Russian border with Germany and Austria-Hungary). According to Ben-Gurion's biographer, Shabtai Tevet, Ben-Gurion's strong Zionist identity and his personal sense of superiority, entitlement, and responsibility to Zionism were forged in his early years. Ben-Gurion came from a relatively privileged property-owning family. Both his father and grandfather worked as petition writers or mediators on behalf of Plonsk's Jewish residents, as a go-between for Jewish peasants in dealings with Russian and Polish officials. Although the pokantny doradca (corner advocates) were unlicensed and little respected, Ben-Gurion regarded them as lawyers. His father, moreover, separated himself from Plonsk's common Jews, dressed in a stylish, modern fashion, and was renowned as a host of card parties. He was above all, however, a passionate Zionist who cofounded the Plonsk Hibbat Zion Society, an early Zionist movement that advocated the Jews' return to ERETZ YISRAEL and the creation of an independent nation there.

So it was that Ben-Gurion was immersed in Zionist activity from birth. His father and his older brother aggressively collected funds from Plonsk's Jews, sending them to the Odessa Committee and on to Palestine to support the pioneers there. Ben-Gurion first heard of THEODOR HERZL, the founder of the Zionist movement, in 1896 and recalled his impression of Herzl as "a miraculous man . . . a messiah." Herzl believed that Ben-Gurion, for whom he became a model, was destined for greatness.

Ben-Gurion's education consisted of attendance at Plonsk's heders and a course in Russian. He studied the Torah informally and learned Hebrew. During his teenage post-heder years, together with two friends, he focused primarily on the founding of Ezra, a Zionist youth society. Their main goal was to teach Hebrew to their peers, and they edited their own Hebrew publication and were involved in the collection of money for the victims of the 1903 Kishinev pogroms. In 1903 Ben-Gurion and his Ezra companions aligned themselves with "Zion Zionists," in opposition to the proposal supported by some in the Zionist movement to establish the Jewish state in Uganda as an interim solution for Jewish colonization.

That same year Ben-Gurion moved to Warsaw to study for entrance to a Jewish engineering school. His engineering ambitions, however, were frustrated first by increased competition when the school opened its door to Gentiles and later by illness. The frustration continued even after he forged his birth certificate and "lowered his sights" to another institute. The revolution of 1905 led to the ultimate frustration of Ben-Gurion's aspirations. He returned to Plonsk with plans to sit for the August 1905 entrance exams; however, the martial law imposed in the wake of increased unrest shut down Warsaw's education system entirely.

Ben-Gurion then redirected his energies to politics and joined Ber Borochov's newly formed Socialist Zionist party, PO'ALE ZION. He assumed the outward appearance of a revolutionary intellectual and became an outspoken, somewhat alarmist orator and writer of handbills. He organized Ezra into a Po'ale Zion chapter and a self-defense unit. Around Plonsk Ben-Gurion carried a gun, traveled with a personal armed guard, and used petty intimidation tactics to extract "donations" for travel to small towns to attract membership and to organize Po'ale Zion chapters. Fairly quickly he concluded that he had exhausted his educational and political ambitions at home and that it was time to move to Palestine. He arrived in JAFFA on 7 September 1906.

Ben-Gurion in Palestine

In Jaffa Ben-Gurion was united with local Po'ale Zion members and set off for the pioneering agricultural settlement Petah Tikva. Within one month, however, he returned to Jaffa to pursue politics for the Palestine Po'ale Zion party's founding conference, where he was elected to the central and manifesto committees of the new party. Despite Ben-Gurion's initial favorable positioning in the party, at the subsequent Po'ale Zion meeting in May 1907, he was passed over in the selection of delegates for the WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS and was excluded from the secret planning for a Hebrew paramilitary force, BAR GIORA, and its offshoot, HASHOMER.

In 1909 Ben-Gurion moved to Zichron in Palestine to study French and Arabic, and at the next party conference he was elected to the editorial board of the new party newspaper, Ha-Achdut. In June 1910 Ben-Gurion relocated to JERUSALEM, where he shared a room with his Ha-Achdut colleagues, YITZHAK BEN-ZVI and Jacob Zerubavel. At the time, Ben-Gurion believed that an alliance with the OTTOMAN Turks was the most efficacious way to create a Jewish state in Palestine. Thus in November 1911, he left for Salonika, Turkey, where he studied Turkish in preparation for legal studies. In June 1913, armed with a forged diploma, Ben-Gurion was admitted to Istanbul University.

Ben-Gurion maintained his pro-Turkish stance of Ottomanization until 1917, when Great Britain issued the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine. Thereafter he looked to the British to facilitate a Jewish state until 1939, when, increasingly disenchanted with London's policies, Ben-Gurion turned to the UNITED STATES. His belief in the need to have an "external power" supporting the Zionist project was consistent throughout his struggle.

In 1915, Istanbul deported Ben-Gurion to Egypt for his Zionist activities. From there he departed for the United States, where he focused his energy on mobilizing young American Jews to come to Palestine. He advocated the formation of He-Halutz, a pioneering self-defense movement that could replenish Palestine's then-dwindling HASHOMER, strengthen the Jewish right to the land, and defend the land alongside the Turks. Because his ideas were too controversial for the American Zionist leaders at this time, his success in recruitment was meager.

In 1918 Ben-Gurion enlisted in the British army for the defense of Palestine and while in England met with Zionist and Po'ale Zion leaders. In August he was stationed in Egypt, where he was able to reunite with many of his Zionist colleagues from Palestine. Ben-Gurion used leave time in November to participate in the Jaffa Po'ale Zion council. When his battalion moved into Palestine in December, Ben-Gurion went AWOL to do his political work. As punishment for going AWOL, he was demoted in rank.

In April 1920, Ben-Gurion began work on establishing the united party he envisioned: Ahdut Ha'avodah (United Labor). Ben-Gurion believed that the Jewish state had to be built by Jewish labor, which needed unity to become empowered through a tightly organized political structure. He also wanted a central role for Ahdut Ha'avodah in settlement activity. At Ahdut Ha'avodah's founding convention in February, Ben-Gurion was elected to the new party's executive committee and secretariat. In the first election for the Va'ad Leumi (National Council), the Yishuv's self-governing body, Ahdut Ha'avodah received a plurality of seats (70 out of 314), and Ben-Gurion received the most votes of any candidate in his party.

Ben-Gurion's commitment to unifying and empowering the Jewish labor force led to his creation of the Histadrut, which became the sole representative for organized labor in the Yishuv. Then Ben-Gurion worked to strengthen Ahdut Ha'avodah in order for his party to dominate the Histadrut. By 1921 Ben-Gurion decided that the Histadrut was the best instrument by which to establish a Zionist state. He moved himself and the Histadrut institutions to Jerusalem and conducted a census of its membership. Creating a census and directory ensured that only Histadrut members would benefit from the services of the federation's Labor Center and Sick Fund, which would in turn encourage workers to join the Histadrut. In the early days Ben-Gurion had to contend with the inadequate budget of the Histadrut Executive Committee (HEC), and he often clashed with the Histadrut's constituent organizations in struggles for authority. At the second Histadrut convention, however, the HEC was named the "central executive," and an amendment to the Histadrut's constitution gave it "the right of decision in all the Histadrut institutions," increasing Ben-Gurion's power.

In 1923 the Society of Workers was endorsed by the Histadrut and established as a stock company of Histadrut member-shareholders. Through the Society of Workers, the Histadrut became the major instrument for Zionist agricultural development and included among its subsidiaries some of Israel's largest employers. In the following years Ben-Gurion consolidated his authority in the HEC by campaigning to give executive power to its secretariat, of which he became de facto head. Abandoning socialism, which does not exclude workers based on race, religion, and ethnicity, Ben-Gurion now stood for the contradictory goals of "100 percent Jewish labor" and "100 percent organized labor."

By this time Ben-Gurion's vision of Zionism was increasingly pragmatic. He looked forward to the establishment of a Jewish state with an overwhelming Jewish majority, an exclusively Jewish governing body, and a near-total economic separation from Arabs. He once said of the Palestinians that they are “easily befriended” and that “one might say they are like big children.” More importantly, Ben-Gurion considered the Arabs’ agricultural methods “outmoded and primitive . . . ruinous of the soil.” The Arab “does not know how to derive the maximum benefit from his labor.” From this analysis, Ben-Gurion stressed intrinsic Jewish superiority as a justification in itself for Jews claiming the LAND; he believed that Jews were a “cultured and energetic people.” For Ben-Gurion the superiority of Jewish labor was also a justification for increased Jewish IMMIGRATION. He suggested that the Jews in Palestine should be able to “help the Arab workers and raise up the Arab masses from their degradation.” Yet Ben-Gurion refined the principle of avodah ivrit (exclusive employment of Jews by Jews), and tens of thousands of Palestinian workers, who had already lost their lands to Jewish settlements, were fired from the Histadrut.

Ben-Gurion’s vision of a segregated economy played out in several ways during the 1920s. In one situation, the Histadrut’s railway union was temporarily opened to Arab workers, who were attracted by benefits such as the Sick Fund and the chance for a voice in the Histadrut itself. Zionists admitted the Palestinians with the idea that they would form separate Palestinian unions once they had sufficient numbers. When Palestinians came to outnumber Jews within the union, however, they and leftist Jews issued a call to “de-Zionize” the Histadrut, saying it should function as a BINATIONAL labor union. Ben-Gurion rejected this and proposed the formation of separate labor organizations. The Palestinians departed but their grievances were fueled.

In a second example and in the context of avodah ivrit, Ben-Gurion led action against Jewish citrus growers in Petah Tikvah for their employment of Arab labor. Negotiations reached a conclusion favorable to Ben-Gurion’s position, with an agreement by the growers to hire the Jewish unemployed within a week. Ben-Gurion then advocated “organized violence” against the Arabs and against Jewish employers who hired Arab workers instead of Hebrew labor. Even as the unemployment situation in the Jewish settlements improved as part of an economic upturn, Ben-Gurion engaged in organizing an impromptu “force” of Jewish workers and laying the groundwork with Ha-Po’el ha-Tza’ir (the Histadrut’s sports association) for the organization of trained squadrons.

By cutting off relief to the unemployed, he created conditions for new protests in the settlements. Real economic conditions played no role in Ben-Gurion’s advocating a war on the growers; his actions were an attempt to empower the Histadrut and to emphasize the segregation of labor in Palestine. Under Ben-Gurion’s direction, Jewish agricultural owners and industrialists forcefully removed Palestinians (and nonorganized Jewish workers) from jobs and installed Histadrut members in their place. By the late 1920s, growing unity between Ahdut Ha’avodah and Ha-Po’el ha-Tza’ir led to a merger in 1930 and the founding of Mapai (Israel Workers’ Party), a broad-based labor party and the largest party in the Yishuv. Within a short time, Ben-Gurion became head of Mapai.

From 1930 onward, in the wake of the Arab general strike (the precursor to the ARAB REVOLT), Ben-Gurion portrayed himself as seeking Zionist-Arab understanding, but many believe this was merely a ploy to increase British support of Zionism and to create favorable conditions for immigration that could lead to the establishment of a Zionist state in Palestine, something strongly opposed by the Palestinians. Nevertheless, he met with several Palestinian leaders, including the mufti AL-HAJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI, MUSA AL-ALAMI, and AWNI ‘ABD AL-HADI, and sought their consent to unlimited Jewish immigration and to the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine. None agreed.

During the first half of the 1930s, Ben-Gurion published three works in Hebrew: The Labor Movement and Revisionism (1933), The Working Class and the Nation (1933), and a collection of essays on labor Zionism, Phases (1935).

At the 1935 Zionist Congress, Ben-Gurion was elected chairman of the Jewish Agency. The Arab Revolt (1936–1939) was to erupt one year later, although the general strike remained in force; nevertheless Ben-Gurion abandoned even the pretense of an agreement with the Palestinians. He explicitly stated that sustained immigration was paramount to Zionism and that the support of the British was more valuable than the consent of the Arabs.

Ben-Gurion supported “in principle” the 1936 PEEL COMMISSION recommendations on partition and TRANSFER. Commenting on the “transfer” aspect, Ben-Gurion stated: “We have never wanted to dispossess the Arabs. But because Britain is giving them part of the country which had been promised to us, it is only fair that the Arabs in our state be transferred to the Arab portion.” In another context, he said: "The compulsory transfer of the Arabs from the valleys of the proposed Jewish state could give us something which we have never had, even when we stood on our own during the days of the First and Second Temples. . . . We are being given an opportunity which we never dared to dream of in our wildest imagination. This is more than a state, government and sovereignty—this is a national consolidation in a free homeland."

Although Ben-Gurion accepted partition, he did not view the borders of the Peel Commission plan as permanent. He saw no contradiction between founding the Jewish state in part of Palestine and planning to expand the BORDERS of this state to the whole "Land of Israel." On the territorial issue he pursued a gradualist strategy. The nature and extent of Ben-Gurion's territorial ambitions were revealed in a letter he sent to his son Amos on 5 October 1937. In it Ben-Gurion professed himself to be an enthusiastic advocate of a Jewish state, even if it involved the partition of Palestine, because he assumed that this state would be not the end but only the beginning. A state would enable the Jews to have unlimited immigration, to build a Jewish economy, and to organize a first-class army. "I am certain," he wrote, "we will be able to settle in all the other parts of the country, whether through agreement and mutual understanding with our Arab neighbors or in another way."

The Arab Revolt, which had begun in April 1936, marked a turning point in Ben-Gurion's attitude toward the Palestinians. For the first time he acknowledged openly the national character of the Arab opposition to Zionism. There is a great conflict, he told the Jewish Agency Executive on 19 May 1936: "We and they want the same thing: We both want Palestine. And that is the fundamental conflict."

Ben-Gurion insisted that it was important, especially at this time, to downplay to the outside world the extent of Palestinian opposition to the Zionist project: "In our political argument abroad we minimize Arab opposition to us. But let us not ignore the truth among ourselves. . . . Militarily, it is we who are on the defensive. . . . Politically, we are the aggressors and they defend themselves. . . . The country is theirs, because they inhabit it, whereas we want to come here and settle down, and in their view we want to take away from them their country." Yet he was already advocating the transfer of the Palestinian Arab population to other parts of the Arab world as a just solution to the problem. He stated clearly: "There was no danger of Arabs being landless; they could be transferred to Transjordan [JORDAN after 1950] and no injustice would have been done."

Israeli historian Avi Shlaim elaborates on the contradiction between Ben-Gurion's public and private postures: "Although publicly conciliatory toward the Palestinian Arabs, privately Ben-Gurion realized that Arab opposition was grounded in principle and that it amounted to an utter rejection of the entire Zionist enterprise. Thus, at a very early stage in his career, Ben-Gurion came to the conclusion that the conflict between Zionism and the Arabs was inescapable and that it presented a formidable challenge. Ben-Gurion's analysis and strategy was very similar to that of Ze'ev Jabotinsky in the article 'On the Iron Wall.' Despite common wisdom to the contrary, both men regarded the Arabs of Palestine as a national movement that by its very nature was bound to resist the encroachment of Zionism on its land. Both realized that these Arabs would not willingly make way for a Jewish state and that diplomacy was therefore incapable of resolving the conflict. Both believed that the Arabs would continue to fight for as long as they retained any hope of preventing the Jewish takeover of their country. And both concluded that only insuperable Jewish military strength would eventually make the Arabs despair of the struggle and come to terms with a Jewish state in Palestine. Ben-Gurion did not use the terminology of the iron wall, but his analysis and conclusion were virtually identical to Jabotinsky's."

After the May 1939 MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, which greatly angered Zionists, Ben-Gurion devised one of his well-known "double formula" policies: Jews must fight with Great Britain in the world war as if no White Paper existed but must fight the White Paper as if there were no war.

After the Churchill government came to power in 1940 in Great Britain, Ben-Gurion was hopeful of raising a Jewish military force to fight alongside the British army in defense of Palestine. Although Churchill supported the proposal to create a Jewish force, other British politicians considered it a step toward creating a Jewish army that would establish Jewish independence and undermine the White Paper. Thus, they blocked and repeatedly delayed creation of a Jewish military force.

The Struggle for Independence

In September 1940, Ben-Gurion left for the United States to again recruit American Jews for a fighting force. "I do not rely any longer on assurances and declarations. Our policy must be so directed that at the war's end we take Palestine." Because the British had put limits on Jewish immigration, in 1945 Ben-Gurion began to arm and mobilize Zionists in Palestine and encouraged acts of sabotage against the British by the JEWISH RESISTANCE MOVEMENT, which consisted of the HAGANA underground organizations IRGUN and LEHI. He called upon the Jewish survivors in Europe to immigrate illegally to Palestine. The level of unrest in Palestine led London to seek an end to the BRITISH MANDATE, and the problem of Palestine's fate went before the UN in 1947.

The UN SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PALESTINE (UNSCOP) visited Palestine in the midst of increased tensions, intensified by British efforts to exert control and curb illegal immigration and by violent resistance from the Hagana, Irgun, and LEHI. The majority of the committee recommended a two-state partition plan, and on 29 November 1947 the UN General Assembly passed RESOLUTION 181 recommending the formation of both a Jewish Zionist state and a Palestinian Arab state. To gain support for the Jewish side of the conflict, Ben-Gurion misrepresented the conditions in Palestine. Testifying before UNSCOP, he claimed that Palestine had been empty before the Jews began to arrive. In answer to a UNSCOP committee member who disputed this claim, Ben-Gurion explained that all non-Jewish inhabitants whose ancestors dated back to ancient peoples mentioned in the Bible had died. Ben-Gurion specifically stated: "All of them and their descendants have died out. Yes, they disappeared."

At the beginning of the 1948 WAR, Ben-Gurion strengthened Zionist defenses, including the rallying of financial support, arms, and the consolidation of the factionalized Hagana. Ben-Gurion's name thereafter became synonymous with Israeli military might. The "Ben-Gurionist" or "activist" camp took the stance that if another party failed to meet their "obligations to Israel," whether it be the British in assisting Zionists or the Arabs in accepting them, they should be met with force. From November 1947 through December 1948, Ben-Gurion approved and oversaw the dispossession of 750,000 to 800,000 Palestinians from their homes and land and the destruction of 418 villages. It was a ruthless, single-minded, and successful program to ensure that the new Jewish state had an overwhelming preponderance of Jews.

President of the New State

As prime minister and defense minister in Israel's first days of statehood, Ben-Gurion established the policy of "MASSIVE RETALIATION" against any Palestinian infiltrations into Israel and of offensive militarism that has continued until today. During the 1950s Israel carried out military reprisals on the Jordanian frontier against whole Arab communities for even minor Palestinian infiltrations and engaged in aggressive provocations to create incidents to justify additional actions. Then foreign minister MOSHE SHARETT, who favored a less aggressive approach, accused the Ben-Gurionists of "inventing dangers" and engaging in "provocation-and-revenge." Sharett attributed to Ben-Gurion the following statement: "It would be worthwhile to pay an Arab a million [British] pounds to start a war." Ben-Gurion deemed Sharett "a serious liability in the preservation of Israel's vital interests" and subsequently orchestrated his removal from office in order to pursue further military actions unopposed.

Ben-Gurion entered a short-lived semi-retirement in 1953, at which time Sharett became acting prime minister. During this period the Ben-Gurionist camp continued to consult him on military actions, circumventing or ignoring Sharett. Ben-Gurion returned to office as defense minister in 1955. Eleven days later Israel carried out the Gaza Raid, an act of aggression following a period of relative peace that led Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR to form the first organized group of fida'iyyun.

In 1956 Ben-Gurion joined with FRANCE and Britain, who were angered over Nasir's nationalization of the Suez Canal, in a war on Egypt. For Ben-Gurion this war had the goals of eliminating Nasir and expanding Israel's borders into the Sinai and GAZA STRIP. Ben-Gurion also envisioned, though did not implement, the creation of new borders for the surrounding states of SYRIA and LEBANON, including land gains for Israel, the creation of a Christian state from parts of Lebanon, and "pro-Western" conditions in an expanded SYRIA.

Ben-Gurion was determined to make Israel a major military power and did so by establishing ties with important Western powers; he secured arms from France (including NUCLEAR capability) and forged a relationship with GERMANY to ensure its economic support for Israel through financial reparations. By the late 1950s Ben-Gurion had built up an Israeli leadership loyal to his agenda of militancy and helped advance his supporters, including MOSHE DAYAN, SHIMON PERES, and GOLDA MEIR, into key positions. Although Ben-Gurion resigned in 1963—succeeded by Levi Eshkol—this retirement too was short-lived. A year later he returned to reopen the LAVON AFFAIR and oppose Eshkol's plan to align Mapai with Ahdut Ha'avodah.

The 1965 Mapai Convention, however, approved the plan, which led Ben-Gurion and his adherents to present a separate slate in the upcoming elections. Ben-Gurion was subsequently expelled from the party that he had founded and, together with Dayan and Peres, formed a new party, RAFI (Israeli Workers). The Rafi party ultimately remerged with Mapai and Ahdut Ha'avodah in 1968 to become the Israeli Labor Party. During these years "Ben-Gurionist" militancy waned, while Eshkol focused more on socioeconomic issues and took a more cooperative approach toward the UN and the Arabs.

The 1967 War marked the end of Ben-Gurion's leadership role. Strikingly, he opposed the preemptive action against Egypt, Jordan, and Syria, and in the aftermath he held the unpopular opinion that some captured Arab territories (excluding Jerusalem and the Golan Heights) should be returned for the sake of peace. Ben-Gurion remained in the Knesset unaffiliated until 1970, when he resigned and retired from political life. He spent his final years in Sedeh Boker, his ranch in the Negev, reading and writing his memoirs.

See also HISTADRUN; INFILTRATION AND RETALIATION; TRANSFER AND DISPLACEMENT; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Bar-Zohar, Michael. Ben-Gurion: A Biography, reprint ed. New York: Adama Books, 1986.
- Feldestein, Ariel. Ben-Gurion, Zionism, and American Jewry, 1948–1963. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myth and Realities. New York: Pantheon, 1987.
- Horowitz, Dan. Origins of the Israeli Polity: Palestine under the Mandate. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.
- The Jewish Agency for Palestine. The Jewish Plan for Palestine, Memoranda and Statements. Jerusalem: Papers presented by the Jewish Agency to the UN Special Committee on Palestine, 1947.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. Zionism and Territory: The Socio-Territorial Dimensions of Zionist Politics. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
- Kurzman, Dan. Ben-Gurion, Prophet of Fire. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1983.

- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Protocols of the Jewish Agency Directorate*. Jerusalem: Central Zionist Archives, 1939.
- Rokach, Livia. Israel's Sacred Terrorism: A Study Based on Moshe Sharett's Personal Diary and Other Documents. Belmont, MA: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1980.
- Shalom, Zaky. Ben-Gurion's Political Struggles, 1963–1967: A Lion in Winter. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.
- St. John, Robert. Ben-Gurion: Builder of Israel. New York: London Publishing Company, 1998.
- Teveth, Shabtai. Anahnu ve-Shkheneinu/We and Our Neighbors. Tel Aviv: Davar, 1931.
- . Ben-Gurion: The Burning Ground, 1886–1948. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987.
- . Ben-Gurion and the Palestinian Arabs: From Peace to War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- . Igro/Letters, 3 vols. Tel-Aviv: Am Oved in association with Tel-Aviv University, 1971–1974.

—Norton Mezvinsky

Benvenisti, Meron (1934–)

Meron Benvenisti is an Israeli writer, humanist, and iconoclast. Born in Jerusalem, a geographer and historian by training, he is passionately rooted in his homeland yet able to perceive the world through Palestinian as well as Jewish eyes. Benvenisti's major books include Sacred Landscape: The Buried History of the Holy Land since 1948 (2000), City of Stone: The Hidden History of Jerusalem (1996), Intimate Enemies: Jews and Arabs in a Shared Land (1995), Conflicts and Contradictions (1987), and Jerusalem: The Torn City (1977).

From 1971 to 1978 Benvenisti was deputy mayor of JERUSALEM under TEDDY KOLLEK, responsible for administering Arab East Jerusalem. In 1982 Benvenisti established the West Bank Database Project, which collected, analyzed, and published previously unpublished data on the Israeli OCCUPATION of Palestine. Numerous books came out of the project, which afforded researchers invaluable raw data and analyses on the economic, social, and political situation in the Occupied Territories. Currently Benvenisti is a columnist for Ha'aretz, Israel's preeminent newspaper, where his contributions are known for their caustic comments on the government.

Ben-Yehudah, Eliezer (1858–1922)

Eliezer Ben-Yehudah was one of the first Zionists and is considered the father of modern Hebrew. Eliezer was born in Luzki, Lithuania, raised as an Orthodox Jew, and studied in a yeshiva until one of his rabbis, a secret maskil (enlightened Jew), caused him to change course and become a “free thinker” and a revolutionary. He joined the Haskalah (the Jewish enlightenment movement), although later he returned to Orthodox Judaism. When he was seventeen, Ben-Yehudah had an overwhelming revelation that was to decide his course in life: “the more the nationalist concept grew in me, the more I realized what a common language is to a nation.” Thus he dedicated himself to the goal of Yisrael be’artzo uvilshono (the rebirth of the nation of Israel in its own land, speaking its own language).

Ben-Yehudah immigrated to Palestine in 1881 and began to implement his goals. He established two organizations: Tekhiyat Yisrael (The Rebirth of Israel) and Safa B’rura (Clear Tongue). It was largely in response to his 1879 article in The Dawn (a Hebrew periodical published in Vienna) that the first Zionist colonizers, the BILU GROUP, came to settle the land in Palestine.

Soon after his arrival in Palestine Ben-Yehudah accepted a teaching position at the Alliance School, the first school in Palestine where a few courses were taught in Hebrew (at his insistence). Ben-Yehudah wrote for Hakhavatzet (The Lily), a Hebrew literary periodical, and launched Hatzvi (The Deer), a weekly publication that was the first Hebrew newspaper in Israel. For this paper Ben-Yehudah needed to coin new Hebrew words for nouns and verbs that did not exist in the days of the last Hebrew commonwealth.

Thus Ben-Yehudah founded and presided over Va’ad HaLashon, the forerunner of the Hebrew Language Academy, and worked eighteen hours a day on his Complete Dictionary of Ancient and Modern Hebrew. In 1910 he published the first of six volumes that were completed before his death in 1922. After his death his widow and son, Ehud, continued publishing his manuscripts, a task that was completed in 1959 (seventeen volumes). The dictionary lists all the words used in Hebrew literature from the earliest biblical writings to modern times.

Bibliography

‘Omer, Devorah. Rebirth: The Story of Eliezer Ben-Yehudah and the Modern Hebrew Language, 1st English ed. New York: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1972.

St. John, R. Tongue of the Prophets: The Life Story of Eliezer Ben Yehuda. Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing Group, 1952.

Ben-Zvi, Yitzhak (1884–1963)

Yitzhak Ben-Zvi was a Yishuv leader and the second president of the state of Israel, a symbolic honorific title. Born in Poltava (Ukraine), he immigrated to Palestine in 1907. Before immigrating Ben-Zvi was active in Jewish self-defense and played a leading role in PO’ALE ZION, a Zionist socialist organization. In Palestine Ben Zvi participated in the founding of the BAR GIORA, a paramilitary organization, and in 1909 he cofounded the HASHOMER (The Watchman) association, another paramilitary group. In 1910 Ben-Zvi co-organized the first Hebrew socialist periodical, Ahdu (Unity), in Palestine. With the outbreak of World War I, he was deported by the British, along with DAVID BEN-GURION. Both made their way to New York, where in 1915 they founded the He-Halutz movement in the UNITED STATES, establishing branches in many cities. In 1918 they returned to Palestine as soldiers of the JEWISH LEGION in the British Royal Fusiliers. In 1920 Ben-Zvi was elected to the secretariat of the HISTADRUT labor federation.

From 1920, the year the HAGANA was founded, Ben-Zvi was one of its most prominent figures. After the establishment of Israel, Ben-Zvi was elected as a MAPAI member to the first and second Knesset in 1949 and 1952. Upon the death of CHAIM WEIZMANN in 1952, Ben-Zvi was elected Israeli president and in 1957 was returned by the Knesset to that office for five more years. In 1962 he was elected president for a third term and died in office on 23 April 1963.

Ben-Zvi headed the Institute for the Study of Oriental Jewish Communities in the Middle East, which he founded in 1948, later named the Ben-Zvi Institute. His scholarly works were devoted mainly to research on communities and sects and to the geography of the land of Israel and its ancient populations, antiquities, and traditions.

Bibliography

Ben-Ami, Shlomo. Scars of War, Wounds of Peace: The Israeli-Arab Tragedy. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Ben-Eliezer, Uri. The Making of Israeli Militarism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

- Ben-Zvi, Yitzhak. Nidhei Yisrael the Dispersed Remnant of Israel Yiddish Only. Brooklyn, NY: Shulsinger Publishers, 1962.
- Halpern, Ben Reinharz Jehuda. Zionism and the Creation of a New Society. New York: Brandeis University Press, 2000.
- Sofer, Sasson. Zionism and the Foundations of Israeli Diplomacy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

Bereaved Families Forum

See PARENTS' CIRCLE

Bernadotte, Count Folke (1895–1948)

Count Folke Bernadotte was a Swedish diplomat, a nephew of King Gustavus V, and a UN mediator who was assassinated in Palestine. He was active in the Swedish Red Cross and became its president in 1946. In the final months of World War II Bernadotte led a series of delegations to GERMANY that resulted in the rescue of 30,000 prisoners, including 10,000 Jews who were slated for death in the concentration camps. On 20 May 1948 the UN appointed him as its mediator in Palestine. His mandate rested on Resolution 186 of 14 May 1948, in which the General Assembly empowered Bernadotte to do the following:

- To use his good offices with the local authorities to promote a peaceful adjustment of the future situation in Palestine
- To cooperate with the UN Truce Supervision Commission
- To invite, with a view to promoting the welfare of both the Jewish and Palestinian inhabitants, the assistance of specialized agencies of the UN and of the International Red Cross

The SOVIET UNION voted against the resolution, which originated from a British suggestion and was drafted by the UNITED STATES. The Arab states abstained. Significantly, the resolution gave the UN mediator no resources to enforce its directives.

Against seemingly insurmountable odds, Bernadotte succeeded in arranging a twenty-eight-day truce in the 1948 WAR between Israel and the Arab states, effective on 11 June. At the end of the truce, he presented a new partition plan that would give the Galilee to the Jews and the Negev to the Arabs, but both sides rejected his plan. On 8 July Egyptian forces resumed warfare. As the new round of fighting intensified, Bernadotte gave a vigorous speech to the UN calling for diplomacy, cease-fire, and refugee return. As a result, on 15 July the Security Council ordered a new truce in Palestine, which was to remain in force until a peaceful settlement was achieved. The new truce, which went into effect on 18 July and lasted until 15 October, was to be supervised by a UN mechanism set up by Bernadotte. In a short time, he succeeded in building a small truce supervision body with a Swedish colonel as its first appointed chief of staff. This was the beginning of the UN TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION.

Bernadotte worked to sustain the truce and find a peaceful solution, and he developed a second peace proposal that he presented on 16 October, which again was not accepted. In addition to these concerns, Bernadotte was intensely troubled, in fact “appalled,” at the situation of the Palestinian REFUGEES, which he attempted to alleviate in several ways. In his 27 June peace proposal (and again in his second initiative in September), Bernadotte emphasized “the right of the residents of Palestine . . . to return to their homes without restriction and regain possession of their property.” This became the foundation for UN RESOLUTION 194 of 11 December 1948, demanding that Palestinian refugees be permitted to return to their homes or to receive restitution for lost property. Bernadotte also initiated a humanitarian relief program for the Palestinian refugees. In July 1948 he established the UN Disaster Relief Project, which marked the beginning of what would become, on 1 May 1950, the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, still at work to this day.

In his time in Palestine, Bernadotte presented two plans for a comprehensive settlement. The first plan, dated 27 June 1948, suggested that Palestine—the area defined by the Mandate of 1922, thus including Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950)—would form a union comprising two “members”: Jewish and Arab. All or part of the Negev would be included in Arab territory, while all or part of western Galilee would be Jewish territory. The city of JERUSALEM would be in Arab territory, and Emir Abdullah of Transjordan would rule Arab Palestine. As cited in UN RESOLUTION 181 (on partition), which was approved in 1947, Palestine would be divided between Israel and Transjordan, but the Jewish member state would have less territory than the UN resolution had allotted it. The 27 June plan was rejected by both sides.

In Bernadotte's second plan, presented on 16 September, he recommended that the whole of Galilee be part of Jewish territory; Arab Palestine was still to be merged with Transjordan; the Negev was to be given to the Arab state; and Jerusalem was to be placed under a permanent UN trusteeship. In response to Zionist objections to the first plan, Bernadotte made major changes, but the main winner was still Emir Abdullah, who would rule the Palestinian state called for in UN Resolution 181, including an enormously expanded Transjordan. Bernadotte's second plan had the support of Great Britain and the United States, which agreed that his plan would be presented to the UN. After its approval, the two great powers would ensure that the Arab and Israeli authorities accepted its recommendations.

On 17 September 1948, however, the day following announcement of the second plan, Folke Bernadotte was assassinated in the Israeli-controlled sector of Jerusalem. The murderers were never found, and no one was ever convicted of the assassination; however, it was commonly surmised that members of the LOHAMEI HERUT YISRAEL (LEHI), or the Stern Gang, carried out the assassination. It is now well established that the decision to kill Bernadotte was made by the Central Committee of the LEHI, which included YITZHAK SHAMIR, later prime minister of Israel.

After his death Bernadotte's second plan was also abandoned. The final blow came when US president HARRY TRUMAN, facing an uphill battle in the autumn 1948 presidential election campaign, repudiated Bernadotte's proposals in a pro-Israeli declaration on 28 October. After the United States withdrew its support, the British could not push the Bernadotte plan through the UN alone.

Bibliography

- Bernadotte, Folke. The Curtain Falls: Last Days of the Third Reich. New York: Knopf, 1945.
- . Instead of Arms: Autobiographical Notes. New York: Bonniers, 1948.
- . To Jerusalem: The Rise of Jewish Nationalism in the Middle East. London: Hyperion Press, 1996.
- Death of a Mediator*. Beirut: Newman Neame for the Institute for Palestine Studies, 1968.
- Hewins, Ralph. Count Folke Bernadotte: His Life and Work. Minneapolis: T. S. Denison and Company, 1950.
- Ilan, Amitzur. Bernadotte in Palestine, 1948: A Study in Contemporary Humanitarian Knight-Errantry. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 1990.
- Marton, Kati. A Death in Jerusalem. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1996.

Persson, Sune. Mediation and Assassination: Count Bernadotte's Mission to Palestine in 1948. London: Ithaca Press, 1979.

Sachar, Howard M. Europe Leaves the Middle East, 1936–1954, rev. ed. New York: Allen Lane, 1974.

Touval, Saadia. The Peace Brokers: Mediators in the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1948–1979. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1982.

Betar

Betar, Brit Yosef Trumpeldor, was a paramilitary movement, founded by VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY in 1923 in Riga, Latvia, as an offshoot of his Revisionist Zionist movement. Its major objectives were to recruit youth to the Revisionist worldview and to create a new generation of Jewish warriors. The movement quickly established a reputation as the premier activist Zionist youth organization, a position that it has maintained to this day. Betar members played vital roles in the fight against the BRITISH MANDATE and the creation of Israel. Its members wore and were often known as "brown-shirts." During the Mandate a great many Betarim received military training in DIASPORA countries before settling in Palestine. For this purpose, Betar established a naval school in the Italian city of Civitavecchia. With the creation of the state of Israel, many of the school's graduates joined the Israeli navy and army and became high officers in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES. Many of Israel's most prominent public figures were graduates of Betar, including former prime ministers MENAHEM BEGIN and YITZHAK SHAMIR and former defense minister Moshe Arens.

In 1929, Betar's forces fought from Plugat HaKotel, their residences in Jerusalem, against Palestinians who contested exclusive Jewish prayer in the WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES. In 1938, when Jabotinsky formed ALIYA BET to counter the MACDONALD WHITE PAPER by illegally transporting Jews from Nazi-occupied Europe to Palestine, he delegated to Betar the responsibility for organizing the transports and guiding the immigrants to their ports of embarkation. Betar exists today in chapters around the world known as Zionist Youth Organizations. (www.betar.org).

Bibliography

- Jabotinsky, Ze'ev. Ra'ayon Betar (The Ideology of Betar: The Fundamentals of the Betarian World-Outlook) 1929. Available from www.csuohio.edu/tagar/ideo2.htm (Cleveland State University).

- Katz, Shmuel. Lone Wolf: A Biography of Vladimir [Ze'ev] Jabotinsky. New York: Barricade Books, 1996.
- Litai, Chaim Lazar. Betar bi-sheerit ha-peletah: 1945–1948. Hebrew. Tel Aviv: Muzeon ha-lohamim veba-partizanim, Mekhon Z'abotinski be-Yisrael, 1997.
- Segev, Tom. The Seventh Million: The Israelis and the Holocaust. New York: Henry Holt, 1991.
- Shapiro, Yonathan. The Road to Power: Herut Party in Israel. New York: State University of New York, 1991.

Bethlehem

Bethlehem is located in the Judean hills, about six miles south of JERUSALEM, in the WEST BANK. Evidence of a settlement is first mentioned in ancient Egyptian documents from the fourteenth century BCE, when Bethlehem was settled by Canaanite tribes who named the city Beit Lahama. Around 1200 BCE the Philistines had a garrison stationed in Bethlehem because of its strategic location. The city also is significant to both Jews and Muslims because it is the burial place of the matriarch Rachel, who was the wife of Jacob (the third biblical prophet), and the birthplace of King David, from whose lineage Jesus Christ was descended.

Following the Edict of Milan in 313 CE, in which the Emperor Constantine legalized Christianity, his mother Helena founded the Church of the Nativity over what was thought to be the birthplace of Christ. Christian communities began settling in Bethlehem, and the town became a center of pilgrimage. By 600 CE, Bethlehem was a flourishing town and the site of many churches and monasteries. The original church, destroyed by a SAMARITAN uprising in 529, was rebuilt by Emperor Justinian similar to its present form. After the Muslim conquest in the seventh century, Bethlehem escaped destruction as a result of Muslim caliph Umar's tolerance toward all "Peoples of the Book." However, some Christian sites in Bethlehem were damaged after Umar's death, but the Church of the Nativity was spared.

Under the Latin Kingdom established as a result of the First Crusade, the town was prosperous and remained a center of pilgrimage. When SALADIN's armies entered the city they did no damage and allowed the return of priests to the holy places. It was not until its conquest by the MAMLUK sultan Baybars that the city was destroyed. Despite the expulsion of most Christians, the Church of the Nativity continued to be maintained by the Franciscan and GREEK ORTHODOX communities. This arrangement continued after the OTTOMAN government took control of Palestine in 1516.

In the nineteenth century, Bethlehem was a small agricultural town supported by olive groves, figs, grain fields, and sheep. It was also the economic center of the Ta'amira BEDOUIN who lived south of the town. The prosperity of the area was reflected in a flourishing building industry. The quarrying of limestone employed a large number of people, and stonecutters and masons from Bethlehem were involved in the building boom in nearby Jerusalem. One of the largest sources of income throughout the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was the manufacture and sale of devotional souvenirs. Items made from olive wood, mother-of-pearl, and a type of limestone not only were popular among visiting pilgrims and tourists, but also found markets abroad in Europe, RUSSIA, and South America.

The population remained stable but decreased after World War I to about 6,000 because of emigration. By 1947 there was an increase to about 8,000, nearly all Christians. In 1948, as part of the West Bank, Bethlehem was occupied by JORDAN and became home to thousands of REFUGEES displaced by Israeli forces. Today its population is predominantly Muslim because of both Christian emigration and higher Muslim birthrates.

The Barrier's Effect

Bethlehem has been at the center of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and its residents have suffered, especially since the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000 and the completion in 2006 of the Separation BARRIER around Bethlehem and Beit Jala. The isolation of Bethlehem resulting from the nine-meter-high concrete wall has led to deepening poverty and to many Christians leaving the town. Bethlehem was historically considered a suburb of Jerusalem, but Israel's wall has separated the two cities, although it is barely five kilometers between the holy sites in Jerusalem's OLD CITY and the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem. In the past, tourists streamed between the two centers, and CHRISTIANS had solemn parades originating in Jerusalem and ending in Bethlehem, but the route is now blocked by the wall.

The Barrier's strangulation of Bethlehem has destroyed the tourism industry and the city's economic base. Some seventy-two of the city's eighty largest businesses have been forced to close. Thousands of people in Bethlehem depend on tourism, including hotel owners and their employees, craftspeople, shopkeepers, taxi drivers, souvenir shops, restaurant owners and workers, tour guides, and many others. In better times Bethlehem drew more than 90,000 pilgrims a month, but that level of activity has ended. At Christmas 2006, when the Barrier had increased the difficulty of getting to Bethlehem, just slightly more than 2,500 foreign visitors traveled to Bethlehem.

The Barrier that stops tourists also cuts across Bethlehem's main trade artery. Anyone wanting to cross the wall must go through a sprawling modern building, known as a terminal (Gilo 300 Terminal)—very much like the ERETZ barricade that separates GAZA from Israel—that functions as an international border crossing. Terminal 300 was inaugurated by the Israeli authorities at the northern entrance of the Bethlehem Governorate on 15 November 2005, the first of ten such terminals that are being constructed along the Barrier.

Driving from Jerusalem to Bethlehem entails passing through several CHECKPOINTS, where Israeli officials check IDs, PERMITS, and passports. At the terminal there are two lanes entering from Jerusalem, one for the cars with Jewish passengers and the other for foreign tourist buses. Palestinian Jerusalemites can enter only as pedestrians and only if they have employment cards from one of the international organizations or medical institutions operating there. West Bank Palestinians who live outside the Bethlehem Governorate are prohibited from entering at all.

The land on which the Barrier was constructed, some 4,400 acres (18,000 dunum), was confiscated from Bethlehem residents and the governorate. In September 2002 the Israeli forces handed residents of the Bethlehem Governorate a military order that confiscated four acres (eighteen dunum) of land located in the vicinity of Rachel's Tomb and made provision for about 750 acres (3,000 dunum) of land belonging to the Bethlehem Governorate to be annexed to Jerusalem.

© B'Tselem, photo by Eyal Raz, reprinted with permission.

The Barrier at Bethlehem

Rachel's Tomb

The area around Rachel's Tomb—a holy site for Jews and Muslims located just inside the Bethlehem Governorate—previously was home to restaurants and shops catering to Israelis, Palestinians, and foreign tourists. But the Israeli government surrounded Rachel's Tomb with a wall (different from the Barrier) that has only one access point, from its western side.

In the course of building the second wall, Israelis seized Palestinian land surrounding the tomb, which is now enclosed within ten to eleven-meter-high concrete partitions with four military watchtowers.

These fortifications have severed the main road, and the direct road from Jerusalem to HEBRON, which is blocked by the wall around Rachel's Tomb. Despite its significance in Islam, Palestinians are permanently prohibited from entering the tomb.

A Jewish SETTLEMENT is being built close to Rachel's Tomb, and in 2005 the ultra-Orthodox Kever Rahel Fund announced plans to build 400 Jewish-only apartments adjacent to the tomb. The residents of Bethlehem fear their town will become another Hebron. To facilitate the movement of religious Jews from all over the West Bank to the tomb, Israel has also constructed a bypass ROAD that runs parallel to the path of the Barrier at Bethlehem's northern entrance, from the Gilo 300 Terminal to Rachel's Tomb. On 3 February 2005 the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT rejected a petition presented by eighteen Palestinian families from Bethlehem and Beit Jala against construction of the bypass. A week after the court's ruling, Kever Rahel Fund founder and director Miriam Adani told the Jerusalem Post that the court's decision is the "first step towards the establishment of a Jewish community around the Rachel's Tomb compound." In August 2006, Israel officially severed the Rachel's Tomb area from the rest of Bethlehem.

Aida Refugee Camp

The Aida Refugee Camp abuts Bethlehem and contains Palestinian REFUGEES from the 1948 WAR. It is a small camp of 4,534, whose residents typically traveled to Bethlehem for most of their basic needs before the Barrier was built less than sixty-five feet (twenty meters) from the camp. In early 2004, before building the Barrier, Israel began a campaign of arresting young men from the camp—possibly an effort to preclude protests. Some have been released, but many others have not. Popular protests have resulted in injuries of camp residents and frequent Israeli raids with tear gas. From the perspective of the refugees, the wall has been built along the most devastating course possible. Not only is it right next to the camp, cutting it off from a neighboring olive orchard that was the only open space available to people of the camp, but the wall makes it difficult for residents to travel to adjacent neighborhoods within the governorate.

Before the Barrier, the power supply for Aida came from Jerusalem and its water from Bethlehem. Now both are sporadic and uncertain. The refugees essentially exist in the middle of nowhere, without access to Bethlehem, Jerusalem, or elsewhere. The Barrier has been built literally on the doorsteps of many camp homes, imprisoning families, with no way out in any direction.

Bibliography

- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. Israel Inaugurates Gilo "300" Terminal in Bethlehem. 20 November 2005.
- . The Rachel's Tomb Area Is Undergoing Final Wall Constructions. 1 March 2006.
- Bishara, Amal. "West Bank Refugees: Politically Sidelined, Geographically Isolated, Making Their Own Path." Amin Org. 11 July 2005.
- B'Tselem. A Wall in Jerusalem: Obstacles to Human Rights in the Holy City. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, the Israeli Information for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, 2006.
- The Committee for Rachel's Tomb. www.rachelstomb.org.
- Farag, Najib. "Israeli Army Invades Bethlehem's Aida Refugee Camp and Forces Palestinians into the Narrow Camp Streets." Palestine News Network. 22 August 2006.
- Galili, Lily. "Wall Annexes Rachel's Tomb, Imprisons Palestinian Families." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem) n.d. www.haaretz.com/hasen/pages/ShArt.jhtml?itemNo=449746&contrassID=2&subContrassID=1&sbSub-ContrassID=0&listSrc=Y.
- "Good News for Rachel's Tomb." Arutz Sheva News Service. 6 May 2004. www.IsraelNationalNews.com.
- Greenberg, Joel. "Violence, Economic Hardship Accelerate Exodus of Bethlehem's Christians." Chicago Tribune. 23 December 2006.
- Hadid, Dina. "Conflict Has Hurt Christmas Tourism in Bethlehem." Associated Press. 12 December 2006.
- Hanania, Ray. "Israel Is Using Its Wall to Take Even More Land." Daily Herald. 6 March. 2006.
- Harris, John. "Marooned: Is Bethlehem to Become No More Than a Museum among Ancient Shrines?" The Guardian (UK). 5 November 2005.
- Hollis, Christopher, and Ronald Brownrigg. Holy Places: Jewish, Christian and Muslim Monuments in

- the Holy Land*. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1969.
- Khoury, Noura. "After Nidal Al Azzeh's Son Was Shot." Ma'an News Agency. The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Jordan and the Holy Land. 10 December, 2006. <http://Maannews.net>.
- Landau, Jacob M. Abdul Hamid's Palestine. London: Andre Deutsch, 1979.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Behind the Barrier: Human Rights Violations as a Result of the Separation Barrier. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, the Israeli Information for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, 2003.
- Lein, Yehezkel, and Alon Cohen-Lifshitz. Under the Guise of Security: Routing the Separation Barrier to Enable the Expansion of Israeli Settlements in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, the Israeli Information for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, 2005.
- Leyne, Jon. "Wall Squeezes Bethlehem Christians." BBC News. 20 March 2006.
- McGreal, Chris. "Exit from the Holy Land." New Statesman. 19 December 2005.
- Mitnick, Joshua. "Christmas behind Israel's Wall." Christian Science Monitor. 22 December 2005.
- Sabella, Zack. "The Wall around Bethlehem." Palestine Monitor. 14 March 2005.
- Scholch, Alexander. "European Penetration and the Economic Development of Palestine, 1856–1882." In Studies in the Economic and Social History of Palestine in the 19th and 20th Centuries. Edited by Roger Owen. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1982.
- Sudilovsky, Judith. "Creeping Israeli Separation Barrier Traps Bethlehem Catholic Families." Catholic News Service. 12 July 2005.
- UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. ISRAEL-OPT: Ghettos Form in Shadow of the Wall: Bethlehem. Geneva: UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. 28 November 2006.
- Whitlatch, Corinne. "Jerusalem: The Key to Peace or a Fuse for Conflict?" Churches for Middle East Peace. March 2005.

—Betsy Folkins

Bethlehem: Siege of the Church of the Nativity

In the context of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) held over 150 Palestinians hostage and under siege from 2 April to 10 May 2002 in BETHLEHEM'S Church of the Nativity. This number included mostly unarmed civilians and some armed militants. During the siege the IDF denied food and medicine to the people inside, and Israeli army snipers killed 7 and wounded more than 40 people inside, mostly unarmed civilians. Four Israeli soldiers were wounded.

When the siege ended on 10 May, Israel deported to Cyprus 13 men who it said were among its most wanted militants and banished 26 others to GAZA. Not long after, EUROPEAN UNION negotiators arranged for 12 of the 13 men in Cyprus to be sent to several countries in Europe, including Spain, Portugal, Ireland, Greece, Belgium, and Italy.

Bibliography

- Raheb, Mitri. Bethlehem Besieged: Stories of Hope in Times of Trouble. Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress Publishers, 2004.
- "The Siege of Bethlehem: Links and Readings." Frontline. www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/siege/etc/links.html.
- "Timeline: Bethlehem Siege." BBC News Online. 10 May 2002. http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/middle\_east/1950331.stm.

Bialik, Hayyim Nachman (1873–1934)

Nachman Bialik was a poet, translator, essayist, storyteller, and editor. Born in Radi, RUSSIA, he was one of the greatest Hebrew poets of all time and is considered Israel's national poet. Many Israeli intellectuals claim that Bialik's castigations against Jewish passivity in the face of ANTI-SEMITIC violence in Russia and Poland during the 1880s furthered the idea of founding Jewish self-defense groups in Russia, and eventually the HAGANA in Palestine. He immigrated to Palestine in 1924.

Bialik studied in Lithuania and Russia and was influenced by the Torah, the Talmud, and the Jewish enlightenment (haskalah), especially by the philosopher AHAD HA'AM. Although Bialik wrote in Yiddish, most of his important writings are in Hebrew. In many poems Bialik depicted the suffering of his people, but he also ridiculed the weakness and submissiveness of his fellow intellectuals.

In the early twentieth century, with Yehoshua Hana Rawnitsky, Bialik founded a Hebrew publishing house in Odessa, Moriah, that issued Hebrew classics and school literature. He translated various European works into Hebrew, such as Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, Johann Christoph Friedrich von Schiller's Wilhelm Tell, Cervantes's Don Quixote, and Heinrich Heine's poems. In collaboration with Rawnitsky, Bialik published Sefer

Ha Aggadah (The Book of Legends), a three-volume edition of the folktales and proverbs scattered through the Talmud. The Book of Legends was immediately recognized as a masterwork and has been reprinted numerous times. Bialik also edited the poems of the medieval poet and philosopher Ibn Gabirol and began a modern commentary on the Mishna (the oral law).

After the Bolshevik Revolution, the communist authorities viewed Bialik's work in Hebrew culture with suspicion and closed Moriah. With the help of Maxim Gorky, Bialik received permission to emigrate. In 1921 he moved to GERMANY, where he established the Dvir publishing house. Three years later he moved to Palestine. During the last decade of his life, Bialik followed a number of cultural pursuits. He delivered the address that marked the opening of Hebrew University in JERUSALEM and was a member of its board of governors, visited the UNITED STATES on behalf of the Palestine Foundation Fund, toured in Poland, and founded weekly philosophical and literary discussions in Tel Aviv, which he called Oneg Shabbat (Enjoyment of the Sabbath). Bialik died in Vienna following surgery.

Bibliography

- Bialik, Hayyim Nachman. Random Harvest and Other Novellas, translated by David Patterson and Ezra Spicehandler. New Milford, CT: Toby Press, 2005.
- Biderman, Israel M. Chaim Nachman Bialik: Hebrew Poet Laureate. New York: Youth and Education Department, Jewish National Fund, 1972.
- Jacobs, Steven L. Shirot Bialik: A New and Annotated Translation of Chaim Nachman Bialik's Epic Poems. New York: Alpha Books, 1988.

Biltmore Program, 1942

The Biltmore Program was the first public declaration by the Zionist leadership of its objective of establishing a Jewish state over the whole of British Mandatory Palestine. At an extraordinary meeting of Zionists in the Biltmore Hotel in New York on 6–11 May 1942, a resolution was adopted urging “that Palestine be constituted as a Jewish Commonwealth integrated in the structure of the new democratic world” after World War II. With this resolution, the Zionist movement for the first time openly staked a claim to Palestine in its entirety, and as a state rather than as a homeland.

Participants in the conference included CHAIM WEIZMANN, DAVID BEN-GURION as chairman of the JEWISH AGENCY Executive, and NAHUM GOLDMANN as a member of the Executive. Weizmann had hoped that this conference would reaffirm his position as head of the world Zionist movement, but just the opposite occurred because the “young guard”—Ben-Gurion and his associates—assumed control and steered the movement in a new direction.

Although the resolutions adopted at the Biltmore claimed to reaffirm the essential purpose of the BALFOUR DECLARATION, they went far beyond the intentions of the initial declaration. The British, in their most favorable policy declarations, had always stated that it was their intention to establish in Palestine a Jewish national home, not a “commonwealth,” or an independent state. Beginning with the 1922 CHURCHILL MEMORANDUM, the British had emphasized that a Jewish national home would be formed in Palestine, that is, in a part of Palestine. The Biltmore resolutions now declared that the Zionists wanted “all” of Palestine as a Jewish “state.”

The Biltmore Program was a crucial step in the development of the Zionist movement, which increasingly saw itself as opposed to rather than as a collaborator with Britain, and it determined that henceforth Ben-Gurion and the ZIONIST EXECUTIVE in Palestine, rather than Weizmann, would lead the Zionist movement and establish policy toward the British. The Biltmore Program was adopted before the full scale and horror of the Nazi campaign for the extermination of European Jewry became known. Zionist leaders assumed that at the end of the war there would be millions of Jewish refugees in Europe whose plight would strengthen the case for a large Jewish state in Palestine. Significantly, the Biltmore Program entirely ignored the rights of Palestinian Arabs and thus may be seen as a prelude to the TRANSFER that occurred in 1948.

Bibliography

- Cohen, Michael J. The Origins and Evolution of the Arab-Zionist Conflict. Berkeley: University of California, 1987.
- Halpern, Ben. The Jewish State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1961.
- Heller, Joseph. Birth of Israel, 1945–1949: Ben-Gurion and His Critics. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2003.
- Isseroff, Ami. “The Biltmore Program.” MidEastWeb. 2004. www.mideastweb.org.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.

Bilu Group

The Bilu, or Beit Ya'akov Lekhu Ve-nelkha, Group (Let the House of Jacob Go) was a proto-Zionist group that was founded in 1882 in RUSSIA. Influenced by Marx as well as the Torah, the Bilu'im hoped to establish farming cooperatives in Palestine. The first group of Bilu'im was composed of fourteen former university students unfamiliar with farming. (Because Jews had been forbidden to own land in Russia, the country had almost no Jewish farmers.) Arriving in Palestine with enormous funds of goodwill and energy but with little money and experience, the Bilu'im found life very difficult. The group was given a tract on which to set up a farm in what became the settlement of Rishon le-Zion; however, within a few months, the Bilu'im faced starvation and most left. Eight members remained, and a few years later they were offered land in another location, G'dera, a town on the southern plain, where they struggled against difficult farming and living conditions. The G'dera outpost was eventually saved through the philanthropic efforts of BARON EDMUND DE ROTHSCHILD of FRANCE. Nevertheless, the dispirited and demoralized Bilu'im soon left the settlement—some to other parts of Palestine and others to Europe.

Although the Bilu movement failed completely, its vision of Jewish cooperative farms was later carried out successfully by the KIBBUTZ and MOSHAV movements, and the Bilu dream of Jews living and supporting themselves in their own homeland was regarded as one of the important principles of the Zionist movement.

Bibliography

- Hisin, Hayyim. A Palestine Diary: Memoirs of a Bilu Pioneer, 1882–1887. New York: Herzl Press, 1976.
- Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 2nd rev. ed. New York: Knopf, 1996.
- Sokolow, Nahum. History of Zionism: 1600–1918. London: Longmans, 1919.
- Telushkin, Joseph. Jewish Literacy. New York: William Morrow, 1991.

Binationalism

Binationalism is one of the possible solutions to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Although it has several potential forms, binationalism essentially involves a close and equitable union between two parties, whether as a single unitary state or in the form of a territorially or ethnically based federation.

It was advocated in early-twentieth-century circles by some Zionists, including MARTIN BUBER, JUDAH MAGNES, and others, and is still advocated by some individuals and groups today. Binationalism assumes political equity between groups and also aims toward social and economic equality. It is often suggested as a solution for managing conflict in deeply divided societies. For example, both Jews and Palestinians would be allowed a “law of return” from their respective DIASPORA.

A binational political entity can be achieved through the gradual evolution of a confederate arrangement or directly from two separate states. The former development, a more likely scenario for Palestine and Israel, could take several forms:

- A unitary state with full civic equality for all residents, irrespective of their ethnicity—that is, a state for all its citizens. Containing mainly two peoples, this form does not meet the objectives of the two nations (Jews and Palestinians) and is unlikely to be achieved.
- Mini-cantons, including several for each group of Jews and Palestinians, with separate cantons for Israel's Arab minority and possibly mixed cantons within a federal structure, along the Swiss model. This is also unlikely.
- Two equal, autonomous, nonterritorial national frameworks for each of the two ethnic groups within a federal framework. This is possible but would be very difficult.
- Two autonomous separate units—three if a separate joint one is set up for JERUSALEM—within a federal state, similar to the Belgian model. Most advocates of binationalism believe this is an eventual possibility. The Belgian model is predicated on each substate having rights for all its residents. In this case, Jews would have equal rights in the Palestinian state and Palestinians would have equal rights in the Israeli state, thus minimizing the crucial importance of BORDERS. This form can evolve from a confederation and would aim for the protection of both peoples' rights—Jews and Palestinians—as well as safeguard social and economic equality.

See also PEACE

Bibliography

- Bahiri, Simcha, and Hanna Siniora. “Separation, Confederation or Bi-nationalism: From Full Independence to Full Interdependence.” Palestine-Israel Journal. 6:2 (1999).

Buber, Martin. I and Thou, reprint ed. New York: Free Press, 1971.

Hattis, Susan Lee. The Binational Idea in Palestine during Mandatory Times. Haifa, Israel: Shikmona, 1970.

Mendes-Flohr, Paul R. A Land of Two Peoples: Martin Buber on Jews and Arabs. Gloucester, MA: Peter Smith, 1994.

Rouhana, Nadim. "Bi-nationalism in Israel and in Historic Palestine: Dilemmas of Reality and Consciousness." Paper presented at the Association for Israel Studies, Tel Aviv, Israel, 2000.

Tilley, Virginia. The One-State Solution: A Breakthrough for Peace in the Israeli Palestinian Deadlock. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2005.

Birzeit University

Birzeit University, located in the town of Birzeit near Ramallah, is the premier Palestinian university in the Occupied Territories. Its origins date to 1924, when Nabiha Nasir (1891–1951), a Christian Palestinian educator from Birzeit who received higher education in Sudan, started a school for girls in Birzeit at a time when schools were almost nonexistent in the area. By 1930 it had developed into a secondary school for both boys and girls, and by 1942 it was a two-year junior college. After the 1967 WAR, when the WEST BANK and GAZA fell under Israeli military OCCUPATION, the college saw a pressing need to develop into a university—especially to provide higher educational opportunities to students who were often barred from continuing their education abroad because of imposed military travel restrictions. In 1975, Birzeit became a full-fledged university, and by 1977 it offered its first master's program. Today the university offers numerous undergraduate and graduate programs through six branches: arts, commerce and economics, engineering, sciences, law and public administration, and graduate studies.

More than most Palestinian institutions, Birzeit has suffered from the Occupation. In its attempts to provide an EDUCATION to its students, it has been subject to arbitrary interference, intimidation, and obstruction. Israel has imposed forcible CLOSURES on the university fifteen times, including one that lasted for fifty-one months. Between 1979 and 1992, Birzeit was obliged to operate underground during 60 percent of the time. Fifteen Birzeit University students have been killed, and scores of students and professors have been detained without trial and DEPORTED.

Birzeit is the only Palestinian university located outside of "AREA A," and most students and staff live miles away, encountering enormous obstacles from the Israeli military simply to reach campus. Military CHECKPOINTS and impromptu ROADBLOCKS outside the campus and between Birzeit and the surrounding towns mean that commutes that should take twenty minutes can take up to five hours. Students and faculty are routinely subject to harassment on their way to and from the university, and sometimes arrested. Recently, construction of the BARRIER wall has cut off thousands of students, including many at Birzeit, from their places of education.

Birzeit's mission is to provide quality academic teaching, training, and research as well as community development programs "within the context of sustainable development, emphasizing social conscience and democratic values in a free civil Palestinian society." Students are required to do a minimum of 120 hours of volunteer community work to graduate. Birzeit's student body is more than 50 percent female; it hosts international students from a variety of countries; and its Student Council elections are typically considered bellwethers for political trends in the wider society.

Birzeit graduates often go abroad for doctoral degrees and fill leading positions in both the public and private sectors as well as in governmental institutions in the Occupied Territories and worldwide. (<http://www.birzeit.edu>).

See PALESTINIAN UNIVERSITIES UNDER SIEGE

Bishara, Azmi (1956–)

Azmi Bishara is a Palestinian citizen of Israel, a prominent academic, a politician and political activist, and a member of the Knesset. Born in NAZARETH to a Christian family, he received a Ph.D. in philosophy at Humboldt University in East GERMANY, was head of the Philosophy Department at BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY, and is a senior researcher at the Van Leer Institute in Jerusalem.

Bishara began his political activity in 1974, helping to establish the National Committee of Arab High-School Pupils (of which he also was chairman) and Arab campus organizations at HAIFA University and Hebrew University in JERUSALEM. He was also active on the Committee for the Protection of Lands, established in 1976, and is a critic of the Israeli OCCUPATION of the territories.

Bishara was a key founder of the political party that he represented in the Knesset (1996–2007), the National Democratic Alliance (BALAD). He defines himself as a humanist, democrat, liberal, and neo-Nasirite (neo-pan-Arab nationalist) and advocates transforming Israel into a democratic state and granting cultural autonomy to the Arabs in Israel. He supports a bi-national solution to the Israeli-Palestinian problem.

Following two political speeches Bishara made, on 7 November 2001 the Knesset voted to lift his parliamentary immunity so that the attorney general could initiate criminal prosecution pursuant to the Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance (1948) and the Emergency Regulations (Foreign Travel, 1948). Bishara was charged with supporting the right to resist the Israeli Occupation of the Palestinian territories and South Lebanon in speeches made at a public gathering in the Israeli Arab town of Umm al-Fahem on 5 June 2000 and at a memorial assembly in Syria on 10 June 2001. The removal of Bishara's immunity was an unprecedented event in the history of Israeli politics, being the first time that a Knesset member has been stripped of his immunity because of political statements made while performing his duties as a public representative. Bishara is also charged with organizing a series of visits by elderly Palestinian citizens from Israel to relatives in SYRIA whom they had not seen since 1948.

In April 2003 the Nazareth Magistrate Court dismissed the indictment against Bishara in connection with the visits to Syria, and in February 2006 the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT dismissed criminal charges against Bishara for his political speeches. However, Bishara is not free and still faces pending security-related indictments. A court-imposed gag order prohibits publication of suspicions against Bishara or details of the police investigations into the allegations.

On 22 April 2007 Bishara left Israel in the middle of the police investigation against him, submitting his resignation from the Knesset via the Israeli Embassy in EGYPT. The London-based Ashark al-Awsat newspaper claimed Balad chairman Bishara left Egypt shortly after submitting his resignation; however, his whereabouts are unknown according to Israel Radio. Bishara has said that "exile is not an option. Return is definite but the matter will take some time and arrangements. I want to set the rules of the game." He went on to say: "I have commitments now with other countries which I cannot make if I were there [Israel]. This is why I decided to end my responsibilities with my former post."

He said that if he stayed in Israel, legal proceedings could drag on for years and he would not be able to leave. "There's no point now to clinging to parliamentary status and immunity in this right-wing, fascist, racist orchestra," he added. "When return shall be exactly is linked to dear brothers in the Arab nation and inside [Israel and the Palestinian territories] with whom I must consult to see where is the best place at this point to participate," he said.

Bishara writes a regular column in Al-Ahram (Cairo) and is the author of two books: The Arabs in Israel (nonfiction) and Checkpoints (fiction).

Bibliography

- Bishara, Azmi. Arabs in Israel. New York: Interlink Publishing Group, 2006.
- . The Site of Meaning (Arabic). Ramallah: Muwatin, 2002.
- Falk, Richard. "Azmi Bishara, the Right of Resistance, and the Palestinian Ordeal." Journal of Palestine Studies. 31:2 (2002).
- Ghanem, As'ad. The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel, 1948–2000: A Political Study. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001.
- Lustick, Ian. Arabs in the Jewish State. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1980.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Rouhana, Nadim. Palestinian Citizens in an Ethnic Jewish State: Identities and Conflict. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Sultany, Nimer, and Areej Sabbagh-Khoury. Resisting Hegemony: The Azmi Bishara Trial. (Arabic and Hebrew). Haifa, Israel: MADA Research Paper Series, 2003.

Bitterlemons.org

Bitterlemons.org—Palestinian-Israeli Crossfire—is a website that presents Israeli and Palestinian viewpoints on prominent issues of concern, focusing on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and on the peace process. Produced, edited, and partially written by Ghassan Khatib, a Palestinian, and Yossi Alpher, an Israeli, the website maintains complete organizational and institutional symmetry between its Palestinian and Israeli components. By contributing to mutual understanding through an open exchange of ideas, Bitterlemons.org aspires to affect the way Palestinians, Israelis, and others worldwide think about the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. It draws financial support from the EUROPEAN UNION and additional philanthropic sources based outside the region. (<http://www.bitterlemons.org>).

Black September, 1970

Black September is the name given to the civil war in JORDAN in September 1970 that pitted the Jordanian army against the Palestinian fida'iyyun (Palestinian guerrilla fighters), who were defeated and subsequently expelled from Jordan. Some 3,000 Palestinians—civilians and fighters—were killed in the conflict.

After the 1967 WAR and the succession of Arab failures in conventional conflict against Israel, the Palestinians decided to adopt ARMED STRUGGLE tactics, which they believed would be a more effective method of defeating Israel. In February 1969 YASIR ARAFAT, leader of FATAH, became head of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). By early 1970 at least seven guerrilla organizations, including Fatah, were based in Jordan. One of the most important was the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), led by GEORGE HABASH. Although the PLO sought to integrate these various groups and announced from time to time that this process had occurred, they were never effectively united and often embarked on actions unilaterally.

Initially, Jordan's King Husayn sought accommodation with the fida'iyyun and provided training sites and assistance. In Jordan's internal politics, however, the main issue from 1967 to 1970 was the struggle between the government and the guerrilla organizations for political control of the country. Based mainly in the Palestinian refugee camps, the fida'iyyun developed virtually a state within a state, easily obtaining funds and arms from both the Arab states and Eastern Europe and often openly flouting Jordanian law.

As the guerrilla effort mounted, Israel retaliated quickly and with increasing effectiveness. In March 1968 an Israeli brigade attacked the Jordanian village of KARAMA in retaliation for a guerrilla incursion into Israel. Although Israel inflicted severe damage, in the process it suffered substantial losses. In reprisal, Israel launched heavy attacks in Jordan—on the towns of Irbid in June 1968 and as-Salt in August. Jordan became increasingly concerned about these breaches of its sovereignty, especially when, by late 1968, the main fida'iyyun activities in Jordan seemed to shift from fighting Israel to attempting to overthrow Husayn.

A major guerrilla-government confrontation occurred in November 1968 when Jordan sought to disarm the REFUGEE camps. Although a civil war was averted by a compromise that favored the Palestinians, the ongoing heavy Israeli reprisals that followed each guerrilla attack became a matter of grave concern to Husayn. His loyal BEDOUIN army attempted to suppress guerrilla activity, and sporadic outbursts of fighting between the fida'iyyun and the army occurred during the first half of 1970. In June 1970 an Arab mediation committee intervened to halt two weeks of serious fighting between the two sides. King Husayn, who became increasingly devoted to the promotion of peace in the region, made various peaceful attempts to reestablish his authority in Jordan, concluding a seven-point agreement with the PLO in November 1968.

Also in June, King Husayn designated Abd al Munim Rifai to head a "reconciliation" cabinet that included more opposition elements than had any previous government. Although the composition of the cabinet maintained a traditional balance between the East Bank and the WEST BANK, it included a majority of guerrilla sympathizers, particularly in the key portfolios of defense, foreign affairs, and interior. However, rather than reflecting a new domestic policy, the king's action indicated Husayn's hope that a nationalist cabinet would support peace negotiations generated by a proposed UN peace mission to be conducted by Gunnar Jarring, a Swedish diplomat appointed by UN secretary general U Thant as special representative to secure Middle East peace under the terms of UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242.

On 9 June 1970, Rifai and Arafat signed another agreement conciliatory to the fida'iyyun. According to its provisions, the government allowed the commandos to move freely within Jordan, agreed to refrain from antiguerrilla action, and expressed its support for the fida'iyyun in the battle against Israel. In return, the commandos pledged to remove their bases from Amman, Jordan, and other major cities, to withdraw all armed personnel from the Jordanian capital, and to show respect for law and order. However, they did none of these, and small-scale clashes continued throughout the summer of 1970. By early September, the guerrilla groups controlled several strategic positions in Jordan, including the oil refinery near Az Zarqa. Meanwhile, the fida'iyun were also calling for a general strike among the Jordanian population and were organizing a civil disobedience campaign. The situation became explosive when, as part of a guerrilla campaign to undermine the Jarring peace talks to which EGYPT, Israel, and Jordan had agreed, the PFLP launched an airplane hijacking campaign. Within the space of two hours on 6 September, the PFLP hijacked a TWA jet and a Swissair jet and made an unsuccessful attempt to seize control of an El Al plane. About two hours later, another PFLP group hijacked a Pan Am jet and forced the crew to fly to Beirut airport, where the airplane landed, almost out of fuel. By 12 September the PFLP had three airplanes, sans passengers and crew, on the tarmac at Dawson Field in Jordan. The planes were blown up.

King Husayn viewed the hijackings as a direct threat to his authority. In response, on 16 September he imposed martial law and named Brigadier Muhammad Daud to head a cabinet composed of army officers. At the same time, the king appointed Field Marshal Habis al Majali, a fiercely pro-royalist Bedouin, as commander-in-chief of the armed forces and military governor of Jordan. Husayn gave Majali full powers to implement martial law regulations and to suppress the fida'iyun. The new government immediately ordered the fida'iyun to lay down their arms and to evacuate the cities. On the same day, Arafat became supreme commander of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY, the regular military force of the PLO.

During a bitterly fought ten-day civil war between the fida'iyun and the Jordanian army, SYRIA sent some 200 tanks to aid the fida'iyun, although it failed to provide the promised and necessary air cover, withheld intentionally by air force chief Hafez Asad. However, according to British archival sources, King Husayn was so distraught that he pleaded with both London and Washington to intercede and ask Israel to bomb the Syrian tank forces. London refused, but the United States passed the request to Israel.

To aid Husayn, if necessary, the US Navy dispatched the Sixth Fleet to the eastern Mediterranean, and Israel undertook "precautionary military deployments." (Though Israeli forces never entered Jordan or participated in the conflict, partisans of the idea that Israel is a STRATEGIC ASSET to US interests cite this mobilization as evidence of Israel's strategic utility.) On 17 September, IRAQ, rather than supporting the fida'iyun as promised, began a rapid withdrawal of its 12,000-man force stationed near Az Zarqa. On 24 September, under attack from the Jordanian army and in response to outside pressures, the Syrian forces began to withdraw from Jordan, having lost more than half their armor in fighting with the Jordanians. Finding themselves alone and on the defensive throughout Jordan, the fida'iyun agreed on 25 September to a cease-fire.

At the urging of the Arab heads of state, Husayn and Arafat signed the cease-fire accord in Cairo on 27 September. The agreement called for rapid withdrawal of the guerrilla forces from Jordanian cities and towns to positions "appropriate" for continuing the battle with Israel and for the release of prisoners by both sides. A supreme supervisory committee was to implement the provisions of the agreement. On 26 September Husayn appointed a new cabinet, although army officers continued to head the key defense and interior ministries.

On 13 October Husayn and Arafat signed a further agreement in Amman, under which the fida'iyun were to recognize Jordanian sovereignty and the king's authority, to withdraw their armed forces from Jordanian towns and villages, and to refrain from carrying arms outside their refugee camps. In return, the government agreed to grant amnesty to the fida'iyun for incidents that had occurred during the civil war.

The civil war caused great material destruction in Jordan, and the number of fighters killed on all sides was estimated to be as high as 3,500. In spite of the September and October agreements, fighting continued, particularly in Amman, Irbid, and Jarash, where guerrilla forces had their main bases. Husayn appointed Wasfi al-Tal as his new prime minister and minister of defense who would head a cabinet of fifteen civilian and two military members. The cabinet also included seven Palestinians. Known to be a staunch opponent of the guerrilla movement, al-Tal was directed by Husayn to comply with the cease-fire agreements. Furthermore, according to Husayn's written directive, the government's policy was to be based on "the restoration of confidence between the Jordanian authorities and the Palestinian resistance movement, cooperation with the Arab states, the strengthening of national unity, striking with an iron hand at all persons spreading destructive rumors, paying special attention to the armed forces and the freeing of the Arab lands occupied by Israel in the war of June 1967.” By then most of the fidaiyyun had fled to LEBANON, and soon thereafter the majority of the PLO’s offices and organizations followed.

Those fidaiyyun that remained in Jordan were faced with a government adamantly opposed to them. In July 1971 al-Tal announced that the Cairo and Amman agreements, which had regulated relations between the fidaiyyun and the Jordanian governments, were no longer operative and that some 2,300–2,500 fidaiyyun would have to leave the country. The Jordanian sanctuary was no more. In November 1971 Prime Minister al-Tal was assassinated by Palestinians.

Bibliography

- Abu-Odeh, Adnan. Jordanians, Palestinians, and the Hashemite Kingdom in the Middle East Peace Process. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace, 1999.
- Braizat, Musa S. The Jordanian-Palestinian Relationship: The Bankruptcy of the Confederal Idea. London: I. B. Tauris, 1998.
- Cooley, John K. Green March, Black September: The Story of the Palestinian Arabs. London: Frank Cass, 1973.
- Melman, Yossi, and Dan Raviv. Beyond the Uprising: Israelis, Jordanians, and Palestinians. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1989.
- UK Confidential. “Black September: Tough Negotiations.” BBC: In Depth. 1 January 2001.
- Yorke, Valerie. Domestic Politics and Regional Security: Jordan, Syria and Israel. London: Gower for IISS, 1988.

Black September Organization

The Black September Organization (BSO) was a loosely knit TERRORIST group that existed from late 1970 to 1974 and that was named after the month in 1970, BLACK SEPTEMBER, when the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) was driven out of JORDAN. In the minds of its members, the BSO was an effort to restore the Palestinians’ honor and guerrilla image after the debacle in Jordan. There was also an aspect of revenge against Jordanian officials responsible for the disaster, plus many of the BSO’s operations were designed to bring the world’s attention to the plight of the Palestinians. The BSO was also responsible for attacks against Israelis such as that at the MUNICH OLYMPICS in 1972.

Although not part of Fatah’s chain of command, the BSO was linked to FATAH intelligence; indeed, SALAH KHALAF (Abu Iyad), the deputy chief and head of intelligence for the PLO and second most senior official in Fatah after YASIR ARAFAT, was the mastermind behind the movement. The operations carried out by the BSO represented a total break with the old operational and organizational methods of the fidaiyyun. Its members operated in airtight cells of four or more men and women, and each cell’s members were kept ignorant of other cells. Instead of using a centralized command, leadership was exercised through intermediaries and “cut-outs.” Many of the cells in Europe and around the world were composed of Palestinians and other Arabs who had lived in those countries as students, teachers, businessmen, and diplomats for many years. They operated on a need-to-know basis, which protected the organizers by ensuring that the apprehension or surveillance of one cell would not affect the others. The structure offered plausible deniability that the BSO was linked to the Fatah leadership, which was careful to distance itself from Black September operations.

Even after the passage of so many years, no evidence has been uncovered to suggest that PLO chairman Yasir Arafat was personally involved in the BSO or that he approved any of its operations. Although he was probably in a position to stop at least some of the operations, he chose not to step in. Nor was he averse to seeing the various members of Fatah and the PLO compete with one another over who conducted the more successful acts of terror: competition weakened them and made them more dependent on him. Still, given the chaos of the times and Arafat’s own weakened position, his role cannot be definitively ascertained.

The BSO grew out of the despair, disillusionment, and disorganization of both PLO elites and cadres and the Palestinian masses in general after the defeat in and expulsion from Jordan. Within the PLO, and especially within Fatah, factionalism became the norm; Arafat had little to no control over either the political or military organizations. There were also significant external threats to the integrity of the Palestinian nationalist movement. On the one hand, a group of unaffiliated WEST BANK Palestinians called for the establishment of a state in the Occupied Territories while Israel organized municipal ELECTIONS in the West Bank, which the PLO feared would be used to constitute an alternative leadership. On the other hand, King Husayn called for the establishment of a united Arab kingdom on both banks of the Jordan River while EGYPT called for the PLO to form a "government in exile," which the leadership viewed as a ploy to draw Palestinians into formal negotiations with Israel. Without a secure base of operations and in the midst of so many uncertainties, some PLO leaders from all factions came to feel that only through spectacular terrorist operations would the world take seriously the situation of the Palestinians.

The first operation carried out under the BSO name was the 28 November 1971 assassination of Jordanian prime minister Wasfi al-Tal. A former lieutenant of Khalaf's, 'ALI HASAN SALAMAH, took credit for the action. This was followed by the wounding of the Jordanian ambassador to England, Zayd al-Rifa', on 15 December 1971 and the 6 February 1972 bombing of a Dutch gas company and a German electronics company that Salama claimed were cooperating with Israel. In early 1972, PLO leaders learned of secret meetings between high Israeli and Jordanian officials, and fear of King Husayn's intentions to assume control of the West Bank was reignited. Guerrilla groups responded with renewed sabotage attacks in Jordan, mainly led by Salah Khalaf.

At the same time, YUSIF AL-MUHAMMAD NAJJAR (Abu Yusif), a Palestinian militant from the GAZA STRIP who commanded Fatah's military wing, directed the hijacking on 8 May 1972 of a Belgian aircraft, Sabena Flight 572, flying from Vienna to Ben Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv. None of the passengers or crew were injured or killed, but two of the hijackers were killed and two arrested. Fatah claimed responsibility for the operation because it occurred "on our own soil." On 30 May WADI' HADDAD (POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, PFLP), using three members of the Japanese Red Army, opened fire in the arrival hall of Ben Gurion Airport, killing thirty-one civilians and wounding fifty more. KAMAL 'UDWAN, a founding member of Fatah and a member of Fatah's Central Committee, issued a statement claiming that this was "an ordinary attack similar to any other attack conducted by a combat unit on a SETTLEMENT or military camp . . . in any part of Palestine." 'Udwan's remarks made it seem that the entire Fatah leadership was behind the operation, which it was not. These attacks, however, acted as a safety valve for Palestinian frustration, and the majority of Palestinians applauded them.

By this time Israel had begun retaliating. On 8 July 1972 PFLP spokesman GHASSAN KANAFANI and his niece were killed by a car bomb; on 19 July a letter bomb severely injured Anis Sayigh, director of the PLO research center; and on 25 July another letter bomb permanently disfigured BASSAM ABU SHARIF, at the time editor of al-Hada (the magazine of the PFLP). None of these men were in any way responsible for the terrorist operations.

In September 1972 the most horrific terrorist operation occurred during the Summer Olympics in Munich, GERMANY. On 3 September eight Fatah gunmen, apparently under the direction of Najjar and Khalaf, entered the Olympic village, where they killed two Israeli athletes and took another nine hostage. All nine hostages, five terrorists, and a German policeman died in a shootout at a nearby military base. The surviving Palestinians were captured.

Israel retaliated with extensive raids on SYRIA and LEBANON, killing 200 people (of whom 40 percent were civilians) by Israel's account or 300 people (of whom 75 percent were civilians) by Syria's account. From October to January 1973, Israeli intelligence bombed other Palestinian targets in Paris and Beirut; sent letter bombs to PLO officials in Algeria, Tripoli, and Cairo; and assassinated Fatah representatives in Rome (Wa'il Zu'aytir), Paris (Mahmud al-Hamshari), and Nicosia (Husayn Abu-al-Khayr). On 21 February Israeli commandos attacked guerrilla offices in Baddawi and Nahr al-Barid refugee camps in northern Lebanon, killing 40 Palestinians.

At this point, with much of Arafat's influence restored, the chairman moved to increase his authority over the security apparatuses, reorganize them, and place them in a direct chain of command under his exclusive control. The Palestinian-Israeli "shadow war" was not yet over, but the genie was gradually being forced back into the bottle. On 8 March 1973 a group calling itself BSO attacked the Saudi embassy in Khartoum, killing J. Curtis Moore, the US chargé d'affaires; Cleo Noel, the US ambassador; and Guy Eid, the Belgian chargé d'affaires. In retaliation, Israeli commandos slipped into Beirut on 10 April and assassinated al-Muhammad Najjar (and his wife), Kamal 'Udwan, and PLO spokesman KAMAL NASIR.

By 1979 at least one unit of MOSSAD (the Israeli intelligence agency), known as the "Wrath of God," had assassinated eight additional Palestinian figures it claimed were part of BSO, including Ali Hassan Salameh, killed by a car bomb in Beirut on 22 January. Arafat's second in command and closest ally, KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad), was assassinated by Israel in his house in Tunis on 16 April 1988, even though he had not taken part in Black September operations.

Bibliography

- Abu Iyad, with Eric Rouleau. My Home, My Land: A Narrative of the Palestinian Struggle. New York: Times Books, 1978.
- Cobban, Helena. The Palestine Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Cooley, John K. Black September Green March: The Story of the Palestinian Arabs. London: Frank Cass, 1973.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.
- Jonas, George. Vengeance: The True Story of an Israeli Counter-Terrorist Team, reprint ed. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2005.
- Klein, Aaron J. Striking Back: The 1972 Munich Olympics Massacre and Israel's Deadly Response. New York: Random House, 2005.
- Quandt, William, Fuad Jabber, and Ann Mosely Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Said, Edward. The Politics of Dispossession: The Struggle for Palestinian Self-Determination, 1969–1994. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Bloc of the Faithful

See GUSH EMUNIM

Bludan Conference, 1937

The Bludan Conference was a pan-Arab nationalist congress held on 8 September 1937 in Bludan, SYRIA, partly in response to the 7 July publication of the PEEL COMMISSION's report recommending partition of Palestine into Jewish and Arab states. Representatives of various Arab popular movements met in Bludan to discuss what they saw as the total elimination of Arab national rights in Palestine. They resolved as follows:

- Determination of Palestine as an inalienable part of the Arab homeland
- Rejection of the partition of Palestine and establishment of a Jewish state therein

- Demand for the abolition of the BRITISH MANDATE and the BALFOUR DECLARATION
- Suspension of Jewish IMMIGRATION to Palestine
- Solution of the Palestine problem through the establishment of an independent state

The delegates met again in Bludan in June 1946, this time as the ARAB LEAGUE, and approved a series of secret decisions. They also warned Britain and the UNITED STATES that ignoring Palestinian rights would affect their interests in the Arab world.

Bibliography

- Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim, ed. The Transformation of Palestine. Chicago: Northwestern University Press, 1971.
- Lesch, Ann Mosely. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.

Border Police

The Border Police (Mishmar HaGvul/Magav) are the combat branch of the Israeli Police. They were founded as the Frontier Corps, a gendarmerie, under the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) in 1949 and charged with the task of providing security in rural areas and along the BORDERS. In the course of the following years, they were gradually transferred to the command of the Israeli Police and became the Border Police. During these years, they secured new SETTLEMENTS and countered infiltration by Palestinians, especially from EGYPT and JORDAN.

During the 1956 Suez War, the Border Police were involved in the KAFR QASIM massacre. The resulting public outcry led to a landmark ISRAELI SUPREME COURT ruling on the obligation of soldiers to disobey manifestly illegal orders.

During the 1967 WAR, the Border Police fought alongside the IDF. Following the war, they were deployed in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP and charged with maintaining law and order as part of the military administration. Since then, a significant portion of the Border Police's activity has been in the Occupied Territories, especially during the years of the First INTIFADA. In uprisings and demonstrations during the OSLO years, the Border Police were used as the main element to control all demonstrations and protests. During the AL-AQSA INTIFADA the Border Police played a major role in security activity.

The Border Police have a reputation for unbridled brutality, and Palestinians fear them more than all other Israeli military and paramilitary forces. The Border Police have been prosecuted for beating, shooting, and killing without provocation. Their undercover units have been repeatedly accused by Israeli, Palestinian, and international human rights groups of extrajudicial killing of Palestinians whom Israel considers “wanted.” Recently, Israel has used the Border Police as agents provocateurs embedded in demonstrations against Israel’s BARRIER built in the West Bank; as provocateurs, the police throw stones at Israeli soldiers to justify violence against the demonstrators. Israel admits to the presence of undercover agents among demonstrators and even to the fact that they participate in stone-throwing, but it claims this follows rather than precedes stone-throwing by the demonstrators.

Bibliography

- Associated Press. “Israeli Border Police Confronts Itself.” CNN.com. 21 September 2000.
- Human Rights Watch. “Israel: Palestinian Drivers Routinely Abused.” 2003. http://hrw.org/english/docs/2001/02/27/isrlpa254\_txt.htm.
- Lis, Jonathan. “Border Police Officer Indicted for Shooting, Killing Palestinian.” Ha’aretz, 2006. www.kibush.co.il/show\_file.asp?num=11271.
- Reporters without Borders. “Border Police Beat Agence France-Presse Photographer.” 19 December 2002.
- Reuters and Ha’aretz Service. “Border Police Held Boy, 13, as Human Shield.” 22 April 2004.
- Segal, Naomi. “Two Israeli Border Police Jailed for Kicking Arabs.” Jewish Telegraphic Agency. 22 August 1997.

Borders

The Israel-Palestine arena has experienced continuous territorial and boundary changes throughout the twentieth century, from the collapse of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE to the first partition of the region and the creation of Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950) in 1921 and the partition of Palestine in 1947–1949. As a result of Israel’s War of Independence/Palestinian Nakba (1948 WAR), the borders of the state of Israel were one-quarter larger than those that had been proposed under the 1947 UN PARTITION PLAN (RESOLUTION 181). Boundary changes again occurred after the 1967 WAR, when Israel vastly expanded its territory, and after the 1979 Israel/Egypt peace agreement, when its territory shrank. Further contraction occurred after ISRAEL’S UNILAT-

ERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA IN 2005. The OSLO ACCORDS and the transfer of territory to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (1993–2000), as well as ongoing attempts to reach a final peace settlement that will create an independent Palestine, are likely to result in further territorial change.

Prior to the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire following World War I, Palestine did not constitute a distinct territorial or administrative entity possessing clearly defined boundaries. The first modern border in the region was the British demarcation of a line running from the Mediterranean Sea to the Gulf of Aqaba. The northern border of the Mandate area resulted from negotiations with the FRENCH authorities who had assumed the Mandate for LEBANON and SYRIA. The eastern line was established by the British administration along the Jordan River and the Arava Valley, following the division of Palestine and the creation of the new state of Transjordan in 1921.

Following the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948 and the subsequent 1948 War, Israel entered into ARMISTICE negotiations with each of its new neighbors. The lines drawn up at the RHODES armistice talks reflected cease-fire lines, with minor land exchanges, and were demarcated and delimited as the temporary borders of Israel. It was expected that future political negotiations between Israel and its neighbors would eventually bring about the transformation of these lines into internationally agreed-upon juridical borders of sovereignty. The border lines between Israel and EGYPT in the south, Israel and Lebanon and Syria in the north, and Israel and Jordan to the west (with the exception of the Green Line separating Israel from the WEST BANK) were largely based on the demarcation of the BRITISH MANDATE Authority.

Until the signing of the peace agreement between Israel and Egypt at CAMP DAVID in 1979 and the subsequent withdrawal of Israeli troops from the Sinai Peninsula in 1982, Israel did not have a single internationally agreed-upon border. As a result of the peace agreements with Egypt (1979) and Jordan (1995), the borders with these two countries now constitute the international lines of control and sovereignty. The borders between Israel and Lebanon, Syria, and a future Palestinian state remain to be determined as part of future political negotiations. The Israeli withdrawal from South Lebanon in 2002 essentially determined the official course of this border (with the exception of a tiny piece of land at the Shaba Farms), and the future border with Syria will necessitate negotiations over the future of the Golan Heights, which was conquered by Israel in the 1967 WAR and annexed by Tel Aviv in December 1981.

Israeli-Palestinian Borders and Partition

Partition and division have been central to the territorial discourse since the 1930s and remain the core territorial questions to be resolved in negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian National Authority (PNA). Given Palestine's relatively small area (less than 25,000 square kilometers [9,500 square miles] with a population of approximately 8 million), the territorial discourse takes on microgeographical proportions. The Green Line, the man-made boundary separating Israel from the West Bank, came into being as a result of the 1948 War. The line largely reflected the location of armed forces at the cessation of conflict, which, in turn, reflected the distribution of Jewish SETTLEMENTS established over the previous fifty years. The line emerged in negotiations at Rhodes during 1949 between Israeli and Jordanian representatives. The precise course of the line was determined at the implementation stage, but its general course took effect as a sealed line of separation between Israel and the newly created Jordanian-administered West Bank.

The Green Line was far from perfect. Because it cut through the heart of the Palestinian Arab population, some villages and townships were located within Israel, while their neighbors became part of the West Bank. Residents of the former became Israeli citizens, while the latter were Jordanian citizens or stateless. In some cases, villages were cut off from their agricultural lands; in particular, if a village was located in upland areas that became part of the West Bank, its fields could be on the Israeli Coastal Plain. Many Palestinians who found themselves on the West Bank side were cut off from their places of employment in coastal plain towns such as JAFFA, RAMLA, and LYDDA. The superimposition of this boundary thus had a profound effect on the nature of geographic, economic, and social relationships.

The Green Line functioned as a sealed and armed boundary of confrontation for only nineteen years. Although its barrier effects were removed in 1967, it has remained in place as an effective administrative boundary until the present, largely because Israel did not annex the Occupied Territories, retaining a clear distinction between the sovereign Israel and the administrative status of the West Bank, and also between their respective populations. Despite political statements to the contrary, the Green Line remained in situ, albeit under different functional conditions, and was strengthened whenever a CURFEW was imposed on the Occupied Territories to prevent Palestinians from crossing into Israel.

The Green Line and the Israeli settlements have had a major impact on the thinking of negotiators aimed at finding an acceptable territorial solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The default cartographic image carried around by most Israelis and Palestinians is of a region separated into an Israel and a West Bank, with the line of separation at the Green Line. Even in negotiations where territorial changes and exchanges are suggested, the Green Line continues to serve as the default line from which modifications must be determined. The fact that the West Bank was defined as a separate territory in the first OSLO ACCORD of 1993 and is often classified as a territory whose "jurisdiction is to be decided" on many international maps encourages a default acceptance of this line that determines the territorial and political contours of this region.

Borders and the Peace Process

The Oslo Accords of 1993 and 1995 effectively carved up the West Bank into exclaves of relative autonomy. Approximately 12 percent of the West Bank (Area A) and almost all the Gaza Strip were transferred to the Palestinians. Areas B and C were left under partial or full Israeli control, their future to be determined by negotiations in a final peace agreement. Palestinians accepted the second Oslo Accord in 1995 (the INTERIM AGREEMENT) because they perceived it as only the latest in an ongoing series of negotiations and its territorial outcome as no more than a transitory stage on the way to a final agreement that would provide them with control over a larger, more contiguous territory comprising most, if not all, of the West Bank.

Following the eruption of violence in 2000, including the use of SUICIDE BOMBERS inside Israel, the Israeli government decided to construct a new security border, known as the BARRIER, between Israel and the West Bank. Consisting of partly fortified barbed-wire fences, partly concrete wall, parallel deep trenches, a patrol road, a trace road, and service and armored vehicle roads, as well as electronic surveillance and military observation posts, it has brought about an almost total physical separation between Israel and the residents of the Occupied Territories, who are no longer able to cross into Israel. In some areas the course of the Barrier has deviated from the Green Line as a means of retaining control over as many of the Israeli settlements as possible on the Israeli side of the Barrier. These deviations have been ruled illegal by both the International Court of Justice in the Hague and the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT, but Israel argues that the construction of the Barrier has led to a significant reduction in incidents of violence.

At the same time, the construction of the Barrier has resulted in severe economic and spatial dislocation for many Palestinian inhabitants, especially those who reside on the Israeli side of the Barrier but on the Palestinian side of the Green Line and are denied automatic access to both Israel and the West Bank. Although the Israeli government argues that the Barrier has been constructed for security purposes alone, this Barrier has clear political implications, perceived by many as constituting the Israeli unilateral superimposition of a new political border that will dictate future negotiations between the two sides. As of October 2005, the Barrier was under completion in the southern section of the West Bank, effectively closing off the whole region from physical access to Israel except at a few closely guarded, and difficult-to-traverse, border crossings.

ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in August 2005 did not lead to any significant change in the route of the Israeli-Gaza border, although it did bring about the refortification and strengthening of the line as a means of preventing any form of illegal movement of people and goods across the boundary. The border separating the Gaza Strip from Egypt, known as the PHILADELPHI ROUTE, was transferred from Israeli administration to Egyptian control at the time of disengagement. Israel continues to control all other external Gaza borders, including the maritime boundaries in the Mediterranean Sea.

Numerous proposals have aimed to demarcate a border between Israel and a future Palestinian state. These range from a return to the Green Line, to the establishment of a border along the course of the Barrier, and to other proposals that would necessitate either Israeli annexation of part of the region to maintain control over Israeli settlements or a territorial exchange that would annex an equal amount of land transferred from other parts of Israel to the Palestinian state. The latter proposals would require a bilateral agreement based on negotiations and could not be implemented unilaterally. Most of the areas suggested for possible land exchange include those regions in close proximity to the Green Line (inside Israel), which are inhabited by Palestinian-Arab citizens. For the most part, these residents reject any solution that would force them to become part of the Palestinian state. Other proposals have suggested the transfer of land adjacent to the Gaza Strip, which would enable the expansion of the Gaza land base so as to ease the intense pressure on this densely populated region while at the same time not necessitating any form of involuntary population TRANSFERS.

The establishment of Israeli settlements has played, and continues to play, a major role in the delimitation of boundaries between separate Israeli and Palestinian territories, regardless of whether or not they were established legally. This is as true of the settlements established during the first half of the twentieth century in British Mandate Palestine as it is of those established in the West Bank and Gaza Strip since 1967—all of which have influenced the ultimate location and demarcation of Israel's borders.

See also BARRIER

Bibliography

- Biger, G. "The Boundaries of Mandatory Palestine: How the Past Influences the Future." Israel Affairs. 5:4 (1999).
- . The Encyclopedia of International Boundaries. New York: Facts on File, 1997.
- Brawer, M. "Boundaries of Peace." Israel Affairs. 1:1 (1994).
- Brawer, Moshe. Israel's Boundaries (Hebrew). Tel Aviv: Yavneh Press, 1988.
- Cohen, Saul. The Geopolitics of Israel's Border Question. Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, Tel Aviv University. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1986.
- Falah, Ghazi, and David Newman. "The Spatial Manifestation of Threat: Israelis and Palestinians Seek a 'Good' Boundary." Political Geography. 14 (1995).
- Newman, David. "Creating the Fences of Territorial Separation: The Discourses of Israeli-Palestinian Conflict Resolution." Geopolitics and International Boundaries. 2 (1998).
- . "The Functional Presence of an 'Erased' Boundary: The Re-emergence of the 'Green Line.'" In World Boundaries II: The Middle East and North Africa. Edited by C. H. Schofield and R. N. Schofield. London: Routledge, 1994.
- . "The Geopolitics of Peacemaking in Israel-Palestine." Political Geography. 21:5 (June 2002).

—David Newman

Brandeis, Justice Louis Dembitz (1856–1941)

Louis Dembitz Brandeis was a singularly important US Zionist leader. Born into a liberal Jewish home in Louisville, Kentucky, he received his basic education in GERMANY and went on to take a law degree from Harvard University in 1877. From 1879 to 1916 Brandeis practiced law in Boston, where he specialized in promoting and defending labor rights and fighting against the monopolistic practices of big business. In 1912 he supported WOODROW WILSON's candidacy for president and became his friend and adviser. In 1916 Wilson appointed him as an associate justice of the Supreme Court, marking the first time a Jew sat on the Supreme Court. He served in that capacity until 1939, when he retired.

For the first half of his life Brandeis paid little attention to Jewish issues. He was of a wholly secular temperament, and his time was taken up fighting for liberal reform in the UNITED STATES. Around the turn of the century, he seems to have become more aware of the plight of East European Jewry, the pogroms in RUSSIA and elsewhere, and the resultant massive Jewish IMMIGRATION westward. His acquaintanceships with Jacob de Haas and AARON AARONSOHN, two active Zionists of that time, channeled his concern for persecuted Jews into support for the Zionist movement around the year 1912.

With the outbreak of World War I, the Provisional Executive Committee for Zionist Affairs was established in New York City, and Brandeis accepted the position as its head. Thus, in 1914, Brandeis became the leader of US Zionists. He saw ZIONISM on his own terms, which were not necessarily the same as those of its European founders and leaders. For Brandeis, Zionism was a Jewish nationalist version of American progressivism, which emphasized freedom, cooperation, and small-scale capitalism. The Jewish Palestine he envisioned was one of democratic decisionmaking and both private and public economic ventures.

Unfortunately, this American vision of Zionism clashed with the essentially socialist Jewish Palestine that was being created by the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION (WZO), led by CHAIM WEIZMANN and DAVID BEN-GURION. It should be noted that if the true socialist nature of Zionism in Palestine had become widely known in the United States of this era (a time of rising hostility to Soviet Russia and its evolving ideology), it would have been rejected by the public, both Jewish and Gentile. However, by painting a picture of Zionism as a movement representing US values, Brandeis initiated the powerful and enduring myth that the Zionists were building a society in the Middle East that represented US values and were therefore spreading civilization. In this effort he was fully supported by a misled and misleading American press.

Brandeis was a skilled and tireless administrator and was responsible for placing the US Zionist movement on a sound institutional footing. Its membership grew tenfold under his leadership to around 200,000 by 1917, and financial contributions to the cause soared. He also used his influence in Washington to establish a connection between Zionism and the US government, which has survived to this day. He used his friendship with Woodrow Wilson to encourage US support for the BALFOUR DECLARATION and the BRITISH MANDATE for Palestine. When ARTHUR BALFOUR visited the United States shortly after the issuance of the Balfour Declaration, it was to Brandeis that he turned to garner US Zionist support for what was now an open alliance between the British government and the WZO.

As for the Palestinian Arabs, Brandeis initially urged his fellow Zionists to take a cooperative stand and integrate them into the modern economic infrastructure that the Zionists were erecting. The Zionists in Palestine, however, strove for a Jewish-only economy as far as possible. Brandeis could not sympathize with or put into a proper historical context the rising violence that came with Palestinian resistance to Zionist colonization, and so his position shifted until, by the late 1920s, he was advocating the TRANSFER of Palestinian Arabs into Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950).

Despite his important and very successful role as leader of the US Zionist movement at this time, Brandeis was forced to resign his position in 1921 because he objected to the WZO's growing reliance on the subsidization of Jewish colonization in Palestine, a strategy favored by the socialist-oriented European Zionists. In Brandeis's view, this approach threatened to erode individual initiative and self-sufficiency among Zionist settlers. Even in these early years, the US Zionists were a major source of funds subsidizing Jewish immigration into Palestine, and the WZO could not afford a major difference of opinion with its US branch. Thus, in an internal battle, Brandeis was forced out of his position and replaced by Louis Lipsky, a man more willing to compromise with the European Zionist point of view. However, Brandeis remained an active member of the US Zionist movement for the rest of his life and repeatedly intervened on its behalf with influential members of the government.

Bibliography

- Brandeis, Louis D. Brandeis on Zionism: A Collection of Addresses and Statements, reprint ed. Clark, NJ: Lawbook Exchange, 1999.
- Davidson, Lawrence. America's Palestine: Popular and Official Perceptions from Balfour to Israeli Statehood. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001.
- Grose, Peter. Israel in the Mind of America. New York: Knopf, 1983.
- Halpern, Ben. A Clash of Heroes: Brandeis, Weizman and American Zionism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Medoff, Rafael. Zionism and the Arabs: An American Jewish Dilemma, 1898–1948. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1977.
- Urofsky, Melvin. American Zionism from Herzl to the Holocaust. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1975.

—Lawrence Davidson

Breaking the Silence

“Breaking the Silence” (Shovrim Shtika) was initially a photo and auditory exhibit held at the Tel Aviv Geographic Film School in June 2004, created mostly by unnamed soldiers who served in HEBRON. The exhibit eventually toured Israel and other Western countries. The photographs and recorded monologues illuminated the negative effects of OCCUPATION on Israel and its people but also demonstrated what Occupation means in terms of day-to-day violence and harassment for Palestinians.

Sixty of the ninety photos recorded aspects of the conflict between the Palestinians and the settlers, and thirty showed the soldiers at their daily routines. “One of the photographs showed soldiers ‘drying out’ young Palestinian men who were not suspected of any crime, but the soldiers threatened, beat, blindfolded and detained them. Another photo showed a hillside filled with Palestinian homes, where at night soldiers routinely shot barrages of bullets without targeting any particular suspects.”

Over 6,000 visitors came to the exhibition from all over Israel, many of them soldiers, some of whom brought their families with them. It is the hope of the young soldiers who organized the exhibit that soldiers throughout the country will begin speaking out so “this madness can end.” (www.refusingtokill.net/Israel/breakingthesilence.htm or www.shovrimshatika.org).

Bibliography

- Laor, Yitzhak. “Breaking the Silence: Israeli Soldiers Reflect on Patrolling Hebron.” PeaceWork. October 2004.
- . “In Hebron.” London Review of Books. 26:14 (22 July 2004).
- Plitnick, Mitchell. “Breaking the Silence: Soldiers Speak Out about Their Service in Hebron.” Jewish Voice for Peace. n.d.
- Shtika, Shovrim. “Breaking the Silence: Occupation Soldiers Give Visual and Written Accounts of Their Experience in Hebron.” Press release. 16 July 2004.

British Mandate in Palestine (1922–1948)

The Palestine Mandate was approved by the Council of the League of Nations on 24 July 1922 and officially came into force on 29 September 1923. The Mandate had been assigned to Britain in 1920, when the members of the SAN REMO CONFERENCE (British prime minister David Lloyd George, French prime minister Alexandre Miller, Italian prime minister Francesco Nittie, and Japanese ambassador K. Matsui) redesigned the geopolitics of the Middle East by dividing the war-defeated OTTOMAN EMPIRE’S Arab provinces between FRANCE and Britain. Accordingly, the French were to gain control over SYRIA and LEBANON, while Britain’s share consisted of IRAQ and Palestine.

By the time the Mandate terminated in 1948, the situation in Palestine was remarkably different than it was in 1917, when British general Allenby victoriously entered JERUSALEM with his army. Throughout the three decades that British administration took hold, the DEMOGRAPHIC map was redrawn and landownership shifted from Arabs to others. These major changes took place against a background of frequent civil unrest caused by conflicting claims of self-determination by the growing Zionist movement and the indigenous Palestinian-Arab majority. Toward the late 1940s, the Jewish populace swelled to nearly one-third of the total population and owned some 7 percent of the land, a considerable change from the beginning of the Mandate, when Jews constituted some 11–12 percent of the population and owned 2.5 percent of the land.

UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 181 of 1947 symbolized the transfer of the Palestine “problem” from the hands of war-shattered Britain to the UNITED NATIONS. The international organization recommended the partition of Palestine by calling for the establishment of a Jewish state on 56 percent of the land and an Arab state on the remaining territory, even though half the population of the proposed Jewish state was Arab and this half owned nearly 90 percent of the land. This situation made the eviction of the Palestinians a sine qua non of Zionist policy.

Structure of the Mandate

The British Mandate for Palestine was administered through the Colonial Office of the British government. The first HIGH COMMISSIONER, Sir HERBERT SAMUEL, was appointed on 1 July 1920, more than three years before the League of Nations ratified the Mandate. Enjoying executive as well as legislative powers, the high commissioner administered Palestine through an advisory Executive Council and district commissioners who were exclusively British, although assisted by Palestinian and Jewish employees. The only elected bodies in this context were the municipalities and Jewish community organizations.

The foundations of British policy were laid down in the text of the Mandate and reflected London’s perception of how it expected to deal with both the Jewish and indigenous Arab communities. Issues of self-determination, self-governing institutions, and IMMIGRATION—integral to the interests of both communities—all found their way into the Mandate and illustrate Britain’s attitudes at the beginning of its rule in Palestine.

Although British policy remains a matter of conjecture, it was surely influenced by Zionist pressure, Palestinian protests, occasional violent incidents, the global view of the Colonial Office and the British government, and structural changes in the international system that affected Britain and to which Britain also contributed.

One of the most important characteristics of the Mandate was its inclusion of the 1917 BALFOUR DECLARATION, by which the British government explicitly agreed to facilitate the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine. To understand the significance of incorporating the Balfour Declaration, itself a product of Zionist pressure on the British cabinet, one must consider it in relation to other British commitments made during World War I. In 1915–1916, London promised Arab nationalists (in the HUSAYN-MCMAHON CORRESPONDENCE) unity and independence in return for support against the Ottoman Empire. Later in 1916, Britain and France signed the secret SYKES-PICOT AGREEMENT, which carved up the postwar Arab region between the two European colonial powers. Thus, the inclusion of the Balfour document in the Mandate negated these two prior commitments; more importantly, it clearly indicated the special privilege the Mandate accorded to the Zionist movement, revealingly referring to the indigenous Palestinians merely as the “non-Jewish communities,” despite the fact that they constituted 90 percent of the population.

Moreover, although Palestine was classified as an “A” Mandate, or closest to independence, the Mandate failed to recognize the principles stipulated in Article 22 of the COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, namely that Palestine, like Lebanon, Syria, and Iraq, had reached a stage of development whereby its existence as a nation could be “provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatory until such time as [the inhabitants] are able to stand alone.”

An additional example of Britain’s disregard for the political rights and national aspirations of the Palestinian community can be detected in Article 2 of the Mandate, which reads that “the Mandatory shall be responsible for placing the country under such political, administrative and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the Jewish national home, as laid down in the preamble, and the development of self-governing institutions, and also for safeguarding the civil and religious rights of all the inhabitants of Palestine, irrespective of race and religion.”

Regarding self-determination and related institutions, although Article 4 provided for a “JEWISH AGENCY” to be recognized “as a public body for the purpose of advising and cooperating with the administration of Palestine in such economic, social and other matters as may affect the establishment of the Jewish-national home and the interests of the Jewish population in Palestine,” no comparable public body was provided for the Palestinian community.

Of major significance and greatly contributing to the development of the conflict in Palestine, Article 6 laid the groundwork for the immigration policy adopted by the Mandate throughout the following decades by stating that “the Administration of Palestine, while ensuring that the rights and position of other sections of the population are not prejudiced, shall facilitate Jewish immigration under suitable conditions and shall encourage, in cooperation with the Jewish Agency referred to in Article 4, close settlement by Jews on the land.”

Pillars of British Rule in Palestine

During the first ten years of British rule, nearly as many laws were passed in Palestine as in the British Parliament. The policy of conflicting promises, undertaken by Britain during the war to facilitate its control of Palestine, continued throughout much of the Mandate period through British-enacted legislation. The essence of British policy consisted of reassuring the Zionists that London stood by its commitments while attempting to persuade the Palestinians that a “national home” for the Jews did not mean a Jewish state in Palestine. Britain hoped that the Palestinian opposition to Zionism would eventually wane and become reconciled to the Jewish national home concept. However, neither the Zionists nor the Palestinians were satisfied, but London showed its preferences in its interpretation and implementation of the Mandate articles relating to immigration and landownership.

One of the early actions of the Mandate authorities was to enact the first Immigration Ordinance on 26 August 1920, fixing a quota of 16,500 immigrant Jews for the first year. Even though only about 10,000 authorized Jewish immigrants landed in Palestine from September 1920 to April 1921, the Palestinians began to take this as an alarming indication of escalating Jewish settlement. Small quotas also predominated in 1922 and 1923, but the following year witnessed a larger figure of 12,856 immigrant Jews, growing to 33,801 in 1925—the largest number to do so legally until 1933. Hence, over the ensuing thirty years, the share of the Palestinian population dropped from 89 percent, according to the British census of 1922, to 72 percent in 1931 and to an estimated 69 percent in 1946. This meant that the proportion of Jews to the total population rose from 8 percent in 1918 to about 12 percent in 1922, to 17 percent in 1931, and to 31 percent in 1944. This increase in the size of the Jewish community occurred even though the birthrate among the Palestinians was about 50 percent higher than among Jews (3.2 and 2.2 percent, respectively). It was thus large-scale immigration that accounted for the rapid rise in the ratio of Jews to the total population.

British laws affecting land disposition, registration, and settlement complemented immigration laws in affirming the rising power of the Jewish community in Palestine. The Mandatory authorities retained the complex Ottoman land code but acknowledged its enmeshed chaos and devoted more attention to questions of landownership than the Ottomans had done, especially on technical matters such as surveying and settlement of claims to land rights. The major outcome of this approach was that the Ottoman prohibition on the registration or ownership of land by foreign subjects or institutions was immediately discarded. By this measure, the acquisition of land in Palestine by foreign Jews was legally facilitated. Prior to the onset of significant Jewish immigration, the scope of land owned by Jews in Palestine was negligible: only 22,530 dunum (5,500 acres), or 0.09 percent of the total land and 0.26 percent of the cultivable land, by 1882. By the end of the Mandate in 1948, 54 percent of Jewish-owned land belonged to the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND (JNF, or Keren Kayemeth), which was created together with the Palestine Foundation Fund (Keren Hayesod) by the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION for acquiring and holding land in a coordinated effort to build a Jewish homeland in Palestine by ensuring that whatever land was obtained was held in perpetuity for lease by the Jewish people only. Thus for the Palestinians, the issue was not only the amount of land owned by Jews but that as non-Jews they could never buy, lease, or use it. Moreover, the JNF required as a condition of sale that sellers remove any Palestinian tenant farmers who were working on the land. Hence Zionist land purchases meant the permanent alienation of the land from Palestinian usage, and Arab land acquired by Jews became extra-territorialized, thus multiplying the negative effects of Zionist landownership on Palestinians.

In addition to contributing to rising land prices, the set of five land ordinances enacted by the British to increase Zionists’ ability to secure rights to and facilitate land purchases did little to change the situation that existed under the Ottomans, which favored the interests of landlords over those of the farmers. Thus throughout the Mandate period, there was a continuing, and increasingly greater, process of peasants’ dispossession, which was a major factor in the unrest—especially in the 1930s. The nature of the land ordinances, which instituted advantages to sellers, also helps to explain why large tracts of land were sold by some Palestinian landlords to Zionist brokers.

Some of the new laws gave Palestinian tenants—and even squatters—certain tenancy rights and protected them against eviction. If a landlord was burdened with taxes on land yielding almost no revenue as a result of the new laws, Jewish land brokers typically stepped in to buy the land. In one instance, over 40,000 acres, comprising eighteen villages, was sold, resulting in the eviction of 688 Arab agricultural families. By the end of the Mandate, some 70 percent of land purchased by the JNF and other Zionist bodies had been sold by large owners, the Mandate government, or corporate bodies.

Beginning in 1929, however, political factors led to a shift in British strategy toward the issue of land in Palestine. Palestinian violence that year prompted the British to conclude that rising Palestinian landlessness, as a consequence of Zionist land purchases, was a significant factor in Jewish-Arab tensions. Consequently, legislation was enacted in 1929 and 1933 to protect the rights of tenant farmers who might be evicted as a result of land sales, but this did not address the question of owner-cultivators rendered landless by selling their own land. Eventually, in 1940, the British curtailed Jewish purchases from Palestinian owners in certain regions altogether. A novel approach to the matter came in the aftermath of the wide-scale ARAB REVOLT of 1936–1939, which led Britain to propose partition for the first time.

The White Papers: Policy Statements of British Rule

Continuity and change in British rule in Palestine can be traced through the various WHITE PAPERS issued throughout the Mandate period. Such statements of policy came in the aftermath of periods of violence—in 1920, 1921, 1929, and 1936—when investigatory commissions were established by the British government to examine the causes of the disturbances.

The investigatory committees repeatedly pinpointed the unpremeditated nature of the outbreak of violence as well as the causes of the disturbances, which centered on Palestinian worries over rising Jewish immigration, increased land sales, and dispossession of the peasants; resentment about the unfulfilled promises of independence that had been given during World War I; and the concern that Zionists' real objective was a state that excluded the Palestinians' right to self-determination. The resulting recommendations of the commissions would soon be followed by a white paper announcing a new British policy. The Palestinians usually rejected the white paper's recommendations and adopted various methods of resistance. The Zionists also regularly disagreed with the finding and recommendations, but, having influential international contacts, they tended to opt for more intense diplomacy, especially in London.

The British government did not always implement white paper recommendations. At times London's inaction was a response to the pressures of communal violence in Palestine or to Zionist lobbying. On many occasions, however, regional circumstances also played a role. For example, the PALIN COMMISSION investigated the first instance of Palestinian discontent in April 1920, on the occasion of the local festival of AL-NABI MUSA (the prophet Moses), when a procession from outside the walls of Jerusalem through the Jaffa Gate resulted in the death and wounding of several people and required the intervention of the army to prevent further violence. The October 1921 Palin Report, however, was kept confidential because of the imminence of the SAN REMO CONFERENCE, which was the venue for rewarding the postwar mandates to the victorious powers, and Britain wanted to downplay local disturbances in Palestine.

Churchill Memorandum, 1922

On 3 June 1922 the British government issued the so-called CHURCHILL MEMORANDUM, which clarified its Palestine policy in light of the 1920 disturbances. The memorandum reaffirmed Britain's commitment to a Jewish national home in Palestine and stated that the Jewish presence in the country was based on "a right and not on sufferance." Although it stated that the Jews needed continued immigration to build their national home, it somewhat tempered Zionist ambitions by stating that "the absorption of Jewish immigrants would be limited to the 'economic capacity' of the country."

After Palestinian-Jewish violence in JAFFA involved nearly 100 deaths in May 1922, the HAYCRAFT COMMISSION of inquiry in October determined that the disturbances were a spontaneous result of frustrated national aspirations and Palestinian resentment toward Jewish immigration. While expressing certain restrictions, the commission's report supported the idea of a Jewish national home in Palestine, thus maintaining Britain's policy of dual obligations for the two communities of Palestine. Downplaying phrases such as "Palestine is to become as Jewish as England is English," the memorandum stated that "His Majesty's Government regards any such expectation as impracticable and has no such aim in view." Its interpretation of the Balfour Declaration was that Palestine as a whole should not be converted into a Jewish national homeland but that such a home should be founded within Palestine. Nevertheless, facilitating the national home idea meant that the Jewish community in Palestine should be able to increase its numbers by immigration. Thus an order suspending Jewish immigration, issued by the high commissioner as a result of the al-Nabi Musa demonstrations, was revoked. However, from this point till 1936, immigration was to be regulated by a new principle, that of the economic absorptive capacity of Palestine.

The Palestinians rejected the Haycraft Commission's report because it upheld the Balfour Declaration and allowed further immigration, but their reaction was not violent. Instead, they refused to participate in elections for the high commissioner's proposed LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL because they would have been at a disadvantage against the combined vote of the British and the Jews. In August 1922, in accordance with the Mandate articles calling for "development of self-governing institutions," Herbert Samuel had promoted creation of a Legislative Council composed of eight Muslims, two Christians, two Jews, and eleven British, reserving for himself the right to veto legislation.

Thereafter, Palestine was governed by the high commissioner assisted by an ADVISORY COUNCIL composed solely of British officials. The Palestinians had thus closed themselves off from direct channels of communication with the Colonial Office. Thereafter, the Palestinians consistently refused to cooperate with investigatory commissions sent by the British government.

The British also suggested the formation of an ARAB AGENCY that would parallel the Jewish Agency established by the Mandate. However, unlike the Jewish Agency, its Arab counterpart was to be appointed by the high commissioner and would not be incorporated into the Mandate instrument. The Palestinians rejected this proposal because agreeing to an Arab Agency under such conditions would mean Palestinian acceptance of the equal standing of the Arab and Jewish communities in Palestine, whereas their principal argument was that Palestine was to remain primarily Arab.

Between 1922 and 1929, Palestinian politics remained relatively quiescent, arguably because of lack of leadership. However, Palestinians' fears revived in 1928 when Jewish immigration took an upward turn. Moreover, the JNF was expanding its land purchases, and the World Zionist Organization, acting as an umbrella organization for the Jewish Agency, was gaining more power by including wealthy non-Zionists in the UNITED STATES. Those developments paved the way for renewed unrest, leading Palestinians to overlook their political differences and convene a congress in July 1928 that elected the forty-eight-member ARAB EXECUTIVE, incorporating all the factions of the Palestinian community. The outbreak of rioting that commenced in August 1929 revealed the underlying anger and potential strength of the Palestinian national movement.

Passfield White Paper, 1930

The 1929 bloody outbreak, known as the HEBRON DISTURBANCES, began in Jerusalem and spread across the country, and its intensity caused the British to reexamine their policy in Palestine. The conflict began on 15 August 1929 when members of the BETAR youth movement held a demonstration and raised a Zionist flag over the WESTERN (Buraq) WALL. During the ensuing weeklong Arab-Jewish clashes, 133 Jews and 115 Arabs were killed and many more wounded.

The SHAW COMMISSION of inquiry, created in March 1930, attributed the 1929 violence to Palestinian fear of Zionist takeover of the country. In October the British appointed the HOPE-SIMPSON COMMISSION, which concluded that the country was unable to absorb large numbers of Zionist immigrants. Both commissions generally determined that the Palestinian violence was unpremeditated and had stemmed from the community's anxiety over the adverse effects of Zionist immigration and land purchases. They recommended that British authorities limit both practices.

In response to those two investigatory commissions, the subsequent PASSFIELD WHITE PAPER revived the idea of forming a Legislative Council for Palestine and recommended limiting Jewish immigration and land acquisitions by linking them with the absorptive capacity of Palestine's economy. Moreover, the Passfield White Paper stated for the first time that Britain's obligations to the Jewish and Arab communities were "of equal weight."

If the findings of the Shaw Commission, the Hope-Simpson report, and the Passfield White Paper gave the Palestinians a glimmer of hope that British policy might be changing, such hopes were dashed by British prime minister Ramsay MacDonald's letter of "clarification" to CHAIM WEIZMANN, a prominent Zionist leader, in February 1931. The letter accorded Jewish institutions the right to hire only Jews, confined land leases to Jews, and stipulated that the criterion for immigration quotas was the economic absorptive capacity of the Jewish sector of the economy (as opposed to the economy of all Palestine). Denounced by the Palestinians as the "Black Letter," MacDonald's recommendations illuminated the degree of influence that Weizmann and his fellow Zionists wielded in official British circles.

The political and military radicalization of Palestinians increased in direct proportion to the rapidly mounting Jewish immigration and the increasingly developed Yishuv that occurred in the 1930s. Nonetheless, the Palestinian resistance still held to a moderate course, with some still pressing for a Legislative Council and for legislation to restrict land purchases. However, a temporary leadership vacuum developed when the ARAB EXECUTIVE dissolved after the demise of its president, MUSA KAZIM AL-HUSAYNI, in 1934.

MacDonald White Paper, 1939

The acceleration in Jewish immigration and growing economic disparities between the Jewish and Arab areas, coupled with the widespread and mounting distrust of the British administration, led to yet another violent showdown in 1933. The domestic scene was thus set for the forthcoming general strike, arguably the most significant resistance act in the history of the Mandate. Lasting for six months, the general strike of 1936 was precipitated by a chain of events between Jews and Arabs. Palestinian groups in Jaffa and NABLUS called for a strike, demanding that Britain suspend Jewish immigration and begin negotiations to form a national government. However, the British administration not only refused to suspend immigration but also announced new quotas. Jewish immigration laws enacted between 1933 and 1936 allowed for about 165,000 new Jewish arrivals in Palestine, raising the proportion of Jews in the population to around 30 percent.

At the same time, the newly formed ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE, established in 1936 as the central political organ of the Arab community in Palestine, announced its leadership of the general strike. With the intervention of the Arab kings and emirs and their hollow promises, the strike tapered off in early October.

In 1936 the British responded to the unrest by forming the PEEL COMMISSION to investigate its causes. The commission stressed the Mandate's inability to provide a sufficient political solution for the two communities' contradictory national aspirations and recommended the revolutionary proposal of partitioning Palestine into two states—Jewish and Arab. The report reignited Palestinian anger at being denied statehood, and violence soon erupted again. Rather than crush the nationalist movement, British authorities arrested and deported most of the resistance leaders, which only galvanized the local people and intensified the violence across the country.

By the time it ended, the ARAB REVOLT had claimed the lives of nearly 3,000 Palestinians, and London sent out yet another fact-finding mission in 1938, the WOODHEAD COMMISSION. Woodhead's report signaled the abandonment of the Peel proposal for partition and declared that Britain would reassess the entire political situation at a round-table conference in London to be attended by Zionist delegates, Palestinians, and Arab delegates from EGYPT, Iraq, SAUDI ARABIA, Transjordan (JORDAN after 1950), and Yemen.

As a result of the turbulent events of 1936–1939, the British government, on 17 May 1939, issued the MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, which became British policy in Palestine for the duration of World War II. In London, the Colonial Office school of thought, which in 1937 had regarded partition as the most appropriate way out of the conundrum in Palestine, was superseded during the course of 1938 by the Foreign Office school of thought, which argued that Britain had already fulfilled its obligations to the Zionists under the Balfour Declaration. The white paper averred that the Jewish national home, as envisaged in the Balfour Declaration and in previous statements of British policy, had been established. Therefore, after the admission of a final quota of 75,000 more Jewish immigrants over a period of five years, Jewish immigration would stop. In parallel, during this five-year period, restrictions would be placed on additional land acquisition by the Jews, and self-governing institutions would eventually be set up in the country.

The MacDonal White Paper concluded that fundamental conflicting interests between the Jews and Arabs were the essential causes of the explosion of violence in Palestine. Although British officials knew that the white paper would be unacceptable to the Zionists because it limited Jewish immigration and land purchases, they reasoned that, because of the threat posed by the Nazis in Europe, the Jews would have no other choice but to acquiesce. The white paper was also an attempt to allay fervent Palestinian nationalist aspirations. However, these issues were not the only motivations for Britain's change of course. London was extremely concerned about the escalating tensions in Europe and was keen on securing the support of the Arab states and preventing them from allying with Italy and GERMANY. Additionally, Britain had other problems in the region and elsewhere: the termination of the British Mandate in Iraq, the national militancy of the Wafd Party in Egypt, the apparent success of a national strike in Syria, and more generally the challenge to Britain's dominant position in the region during the Abyssinian crisis, in addition to the threat posed by German Nazism.

The Jewish community in Palestine, by now too strong, too organized, and too well mobilized to be contained, denounced the British for withdrawing the promise of partition and statehood. Jewish activists viewed the Nazi threat as even more reason to have a Jewish state and responded to the white paper with TERRORIST attacks, clandestine military training, and massive propaganda efforts in Europe and the United States.

Contrary to the Zionists' absolute rejection, Palestinian reactions to the new policies articulated in the MacDonal White Paper were mixed. Politically and economically weakened, and lacking a strong visionary leadership (largely in exile because of British deportations), Palestinians were unable to take advantage of the possibilities inherent in the white paper. Some questioned the sincerity of the British government, but most were willing to support it. However, one faction flatly rejected it because it failed to fully meet the national aspirations of the Palestinians, and that became the official Palestinian policy.

By 1945 the United States under President HARRY TRUMAN was involved in the Palestine question. Truman called for the immediate admittance of 100,000 Jews to Palestine, but Britain was reluctant to consent. Finally Britain and the United States agreed to establish the ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY to review the issue of Jewish immigration. After a four-month investigation, the committee recommended the immediate admission of 100,000 displaced Jews and the creation of a BINATIONAL state in Palestine in which the interests of both communities would be carefully balanced and protected, as under the British Mandate, until a UN trusteeship could be implemented.

The Jewish Agency continued to orchestrate an intensified campaign of violence against the British and to promote and facilitate illegal immigration. Still, London made one more attempt to settle the Palestine problem by convening the LONDON CONFERENCE in 1946–1947. There the British put forward a proposal whereby a trusteeship over Palestine would continue for another five years with the declared objective of preparing the country as a whole for independence. In response, the Palestinians presented their own proposals for independence with guarantees for Jewish minority rights that were unacceptable to the British. The Jewish Agency rejected the British proposals outright and intensified its militancy.

The escalating hostilities between Arabs and Jews over the fate of Palestine, the attacks by Zionist militias against the British, and London's devastation in the aftermath of World War II paved the way for the termination of the Mandate. Although the British requested that the recently established United Nations determine the future of Palestine, the British government's hope was that the United Nations would be unable to arrive at a workable solution and would turn Palestine back to it as a UN trusteeship. A UN-appointed committee, the UNITED NATIONS SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PALESTINE (UNSCOP), of representatives from various countries, went to Palestine to investigate the situation. Although committee members disagreed on the form that a political resolution should take, there was general agreement that the country would have to be divided to satisfy the needs and demands of both Jews and Palestinian Arabs. At the end of 1946, 1,269,000 Arabs and 608,000 Jews resided within the borders of Mandate Palestine. Jews had purchased 6 to 7 percent of the total land area of Palestine, amounting to about 20 percent of the arable land.

On 29 November 1947, THE UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY, in RESOLUTION 181, voted to partition Palestine into two states: one Jewish and the other Arab. The plan divided the country in such a way that each state would have a majority of its own population, although some Jewish settlements would fall within the proposed Palestinian state and many Palestinians would become part of the proposed Jewish state. The territory designated for the Jewish state would be slightly larger than the Palestinian state (56 percent and 44 percent, respectively), on the assumption that increasing numbers of Jews would immigrate there. According to the UN partition plan, the area of Jerusalem and BETHLEHEM was to become a permanent international trusteeship.

Days after the adoption of the UN plan, fighting began between Palestinian and Jewish residents of Palestine. The Zionist military forces, although numerically smaller than the Palestinian forces, were better organized, trained, and armed. By the spring of 1948, the Zionist forces had secured control over most of the territory allotted to the Jewish state in the UN plan.

On 15 May 1948 the British evacuated Palestine, Zionist leaders proclaimed the state of Israel, and the first Arab-Israeli war began.

Conclusion

The 1939 white paper marked the end of the British-Zionist alliance. At the same time, the defeat of the Arab Revolt and the exile of the Palestinian political leadership meant that the Palestinian Arabs were politically disorganized during the crucial decade in which the future of Palestine was decided. British rule in Palestine began with the vision of a victorious great power confident of its ability to manipulate what it perceived as local intercommunal skirmishes in a region that it believed would be quiescent under its colonial arrangements and control. The Mandate articles that legitimized British administration in Palestine enumerated numerous policies that enabled Britain to govern the country. One policy, however, dominated Britain's approach: the concept of dual obligation to the two communities seeking self-determination. The main tactics utilized by British policymakers to implement this approach involved enacting laws of immigration and landownership and submitting proposals for self-governing institutions.

During the first half of the Mandate, the British administration succeeded in downplaying the issue of a Jewish state while effectively allowing the Jewish community to grow, prosper, and establish an organized, institutionalized presence on the ground. Despite their myriad and varied modes of resistance, Palestinians found themselves in the unenviable situation of failing to persuade the British to grant them independence. Throughout the Mandate and in the aftermath of violent incidents, Britain sent numerous commissions of inquiry, and each succinctly pinpointed the causes of unrest in Palestinian opposition: exclusion and fear. Nevertheless, British policymakers did not always follow the recommendations of the white papers they issued.

The situation took a different path in the mid-1930s when the British administration was obliged to recognize that the Palestinians were a people with genuine national aspirations and perceived the necessity of restraining Jewish landownership and immigration. The 1939 MacDonal White Paper marked the end of the British-Zionist alliance. These insights were as much a product of regional conditions and international circumstances as they were of events on the ground in Palestine. Such were the circumstances that gave rise to the initiative to partition Palestine and Britain's bequeathal of that idea to the United Nations as it prepared to give up the Mandate.

On 18 February 1947 the British foreign secretary announced in the House of Commons that "the Mandate has proved to be unworkable in practice, that the obligations undertaken to the two communities had been shown to be irreconcilable," and therefore that the government intended to give it up. After twenty-six years of administering Palestine, Britain withdrew from its mandatory responsibilities on 15 May 1948. On the same day the state of Israel was proclaimed, the first of six Arab-Israeli wars ignited. Decades later, land continues to be an integral component of the unresolved conflict, and Palestinians expelled during the 1948 War are into their fourth generation as refugees.

Bibliography

- Abdullah, King. My Memoirs Completed. London: Longman, 1978.
- Abu-Ghazalah, Adnan Muhammad. Arab Cultural Nationalism in Palestine during the British Mandate. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute of Palestine Studies, 1973.

- Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim, ed. The Transformation of Palestine: Essays on the Origin and Development of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 2nd ed. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1987.
- Awaisi, Abd Al-Fattah Muhammad El-. The Muslim Brothers and the Palestine Question, 1928–1947. New York: I. B. Tauris, 1998.
- Begin, Menahem. The Revolt. New York: Nash, 1981.
- Bentwich, Norman, and Helen Bentwich. Mandate Memoirs, 1918–1948. New York: Schocken Books, 1965.
- Budeiri, Musa. The Palestine Communist Party, 1919–1948: Arab and Jews in the Struggle for Internationalism. London: Ithaca, 1979.
- Canaan, Tawfik. Mohammedan Saints and Sanctuaries in Palestine. Jerusalem: Syrian Orphanage Press, 1927.
- Caplan, Neil. Futile Diplomacy, vols. I and II. London: Frank Cass, 1983 and 1986.
- . Palestine Jewry and the Arab Question, 1917–1925. London: Frank Cass, 1978.
- Cattan, Henry. The Palestine Question. London: Croom Helm, 1988.
- Cohen, Michael Joseph. Palestine and the Great Powers, 1945–1948. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1982.
- . Palestine, Retreat from the Mandate: A Study of British Policy, 1936–45. Teaneck, NJ: Holmes and Meier, 1978.
- Diqs, Isaak. A Bedouin Boyhood. London: George Allen and Unwin, 1967.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon Books, 1987.
- . Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1979.
- Fromkin, David. A Peace to End All Peace: The Fall of the Ottoman Empire and the Creation of the Modern Middle East. London: Phoenix Press, 2000.
- Furlonge, Geoffrey. Palestine Is My Country: The Story of Musa Alami. London: John Murray, 1969.
- Gavish, Dov. The Survey of Palestine under the British Mandate, 1920–1948. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Glubb, John Bagot. Britain and the Arabs: A Study of Fifty Years: 1908 to 1958. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1959.
- Granott (Granovsky), Avraham. The Land System in Palestine: History and Structure. London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1952.
- Hadawi, Sami. Bitter Harvest: Palestine 1914–1979, rev. ed. Delmar, NY: Caravan Books, 1979.
- . Palestinian Rights and Losses in 1948: A Comprehensive Study. London: Saqi Books, 1988.
- Hattis, Susan Lee. The Bi-National Idea in Palestine during Mandatory Times. Haifa, Israel: Shikmona Publishing, 1970.
- Holliday, Eunice, and John Holliday, eds. Letters from Jerusalem during the Palestine Mandate. London: Radcliff Press, 1997.
- Howard, Harry N. The King-Crane Commission: An American Inquiry in the Middle East. Beirut, Lebanon: Khayats, 1963.
- Hurewitz, J. C. The Struggle for Palestine, reprint ed. New York: Schocken Books, 1976.
- Hyamson, Albert. Palestine under the Mandate: 1920–1948. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1976.
- Ilan, Amitzur. The Origins of the Arab-Israeli Arms Race: Arms, Embargo, Military Power and Decisions in the 1948 Palestine War. New York: New York University Press, 1996.
- Ingrams, Doreen, ed. Palestine Papers, 1917–1922: Seeds of Conflict. New York: George Braziller, 1973.
- Jabra, Jabra Ibrahim. The First Well: A Bethlehem Boyhood. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1995.
- Jbara, Taysir. Palestinian Leader Hajj Amin al-Husayni, Mufti of Jerusalem. Princeton, NJ: Kingston Press, 1985.
- John, Robert, and Sami Hadawi. The Palestine Diary, Vol. I (1914–1945) and Vol. II (1946–1948). Beirut, Lebanon: The Palestine Research Center, 1970.
- Jones, A. Philip, ed. Britain and Palestine, 1914–1948: Archival Sources for the History of the British Mandate. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Katz, Yossi. Partner to Partition: The Jewish Agency's Partition Plan in the Mandate Era. Portland, OR: Frank Cass, 1998.
- Keith-Roach, Edward. Pasha of Jerusalem: Memoirs of a District Commissioner under the British Mandate. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.
- Kendall, Henry. Village Development in Palestine during the British Mandate. Surrey, UK: Crown Agents for the Colonies, 1949.
- Khalaf, Issa. Politics in Palestine: Arab Factionalism and Social Disintegration, 1939–1948. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.
- Khalidi, Rashid. Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Khalidi, Walid, ed. All That Remains: The Palestinian Villages Occupied and Depopulated by Israel in 1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.
- , ed. Before Their Diaspora: A Photographic History of the Palestinians, 1876–1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1984.
- , ed. From Haven to Conquest: Readings in Zionism and the Palestine Problem until 1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1987.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. Zionism and Territory: The Socioterritorial Dimensions of Zionist Politics. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Klieman, Aaron. Foundations of British Policy in the Arab World: The Cairo Conference of 1921. Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins Press, 1970.
- Kolinsky, Martin. Britain's War in the Middle East: Strategy and Diplomacy, 1936–42. New York: Palgrave, 1999.
- . Law, Order and Riots in Mandatory Palestine, 1928–35. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.
- Kupferschmidt, Uri M. Supreme Muslim Council: Islam under the British Mandate for Palestine. Leiden: Brill, 1987.

- Lesch, Ann M. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Lockman, Zachary. Comrades and Enemies: Arab and Jewish Workers in Palestine, 1906–1948. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Louis, Wm. Roger, and Robert W. Stookey, eds. The End of the Palestine Mandate. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1986.
- Masalha, Nur. Expulsion of the Palestinians: The Concept of “Transfer” in Zionist Political Thought, 1882–1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.
- Mattar, Philip. The Mufti of Jerusalem: Al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni and the Palestinian National Movement. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- McCarthy, Justin. The Population of Palestine: Population History and Statistics of the Late Ottoman Period and the Mandate. New York: Institute of Palestine Studies and Columbia University Press, 1990.
- McGowan, Daniel, and Marc H. Ellis, eds. Remembering Deir Yassin: The Future of Israel and Palestine. Northampton, MA: Olive Branch Press, Interlink Books, 1999.
- McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1922. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.
- Metzer, Jacob. The Divided Economy of Mandatory Palestine. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Migdal, Joel S., ed. Palestinian Society and Politics. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980.
- Miller, Ylana N. Government and Society in Rural Palestine, 1920–1948. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985.
- Moghannam, Matiel. The Arab Woman and the Palestine Problem, reprint ed. New York: Hyperion Press, 1976.
- Monroe, Elizabeth. Britain’s Moment in the Middle East: 1914–1956. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1963.
- Muslih, Muhammad Y. The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Pappe, Ilan. Britain and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1948–51. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1988.
- . A History of Modern Palestine: One Land, Two Peoples, 2nd ed. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- . The Israel-Palestine Question. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian-Arab National Movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- . The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1977.
- Reiter, Yitzhak. Islamic Endowments in Jerusalem under British Mandate. London: Frank Cass, 1996.
- Rubin, Barry. The Arab States and the Palestine Conflict. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1981.
- Sanders, Ronald. The High Walls of Jerusalem: A History of the Balfour Declaration and the Birth of the British Mandate for Palestine. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1984.
- Seikaly, May. Haifa: Transformation of an Arab Society, 1918–1939. London: I. B. Tauris, 1995.
- Shapira, Anita. Land and Power: The Zionist Resort to Force, 1891–1948. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Shepherd, Naomi. Plowing Sand: British Rule in Palestine 1917–1948. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2000.
- Sherman, A. J. Mandate Days: British Lives in Palestine 1918–1948. New York: Thames and Hudson, 1997.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- . The Iron Wall. London: Penguin Books, 2001.
- Smith, Barbara J. The Roots of Separatism in Palestine: British Economic Policy, 1920–1929. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1993.
- Stein, Kenneth W. The Land Question in Palestine, 1917–1939. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Swedenburg, Ted. Memories of Revolt: The 1936–1939 Rebellion and the Palestinian National Past. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1995.
- Tannous, Izzat. The Palestinians: A Detailed Documented Eyewitness History of Palestine under British Mandate. New York: Igt Company, 1988.
- Taylor, Alan R. Prelude to Israel, an Analysis of Zionist Diplomacy 1897–1947. New York: Philosophical Library, 1959.
- Teveth, Shabtai. Ben-Gurion and the Palestinian Arabs: From Peace to War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Tibawi, A. L. Arab Education in Mandatory Palestine: A Study of Three Decades of British Administration. London: Luzac, 1956.
- Wasserstein, Bernard. The British in Palestine: The Mandatory Government and the Anglo-Jewish Conflict 1917–1929. London: Royal Historical Society, 1978.
- Zweig, Ronald. Britain and Palestine during the Second World War. Suffolk, UK: The Boydell Press for the Royal Historical Society, 1986.

—Shahira Samy

Brit Shalom

Brit Shalom, established by Jews in the Yishuv in the mid-1920s, proposed a solution to the Jewish-Palestinian conflict that was built on the principle of parity—that two nationalities could coexist side by side in a BINATIONAL state. Its members shared a deep belief that, for both moral and practical reasons, a dominant people could not decide the terms of the dominated and that such an arrangement was unjust and would lead to enough friction to cause a war. Under Brit Shalom's solution, Jews would not have an independent, sovereign Jewish state, and Palestinians would have to concede their ambition for self-rule. Brit Shalom argued that, although there would inevitably be differences of opinion among Jews and Arabs, there would also be a great degree of cooperation. Issues such as economic development, social security, quality of life, trade, agriculture, industry, labor, and commerce would, in its opinion, draw Jews and Arabs together.

MARTIN BUBER became active in Brit Shalom from its outset in 1925. Buber rejected the idea of ZIONISM as just another national movement and wanted instead to see the creation of an exemplary society that would not be characterized by Jewish domination of the Arabs. He remained the most important intellectual influence throughout the existence of Brit Shalom.

One of Buber's disciples, JUDAH MAGNES, emerged as the leader and promoter of Brit Shalom. His activism on behalf of the organization's principles was legendary. Magnus was also deeply influenced by the Jewish philosopher AHAD HA'AM, one of the earliest critics of the policies of the political Zionist movement. The title of his essay, "Lo zeh haderech" (This Is Not the Way), became the touchstone of earnest criticism. Despite much opposition from the Zionist movement, Brit Shalom continued to propound its ideas throughout the 1920s and 1930s. In 1942 it founded a small political party, called the IHUD (Union Association of Palestine), and continued to lobby the international community for support and recognition of its ideas. However, the ideas espoused by Brit Shalom and Ihud were not well received in the Yishuv or the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, and insofar as they sought to replace the traditional Zionist aim of Jewish dominance and statehood with a unitary state for all citizens, they were simply dismissed out of hand.

Today Brit Shalom: Toward a Covenant of Peace in the Middle East is a contemporary Israeli peace alliance formed in 2001 that draws its inspiration and principles from its historic predecessor. It is mainly active in Israel and the UNITED STATES. (www.britshalom.org).

See also PEACE

Bibliography

Reisel, Daniel. "The History of the Original Brit Shalom, Founded 1925." Brit Shalom. www.britshalom.org/background.htm.

Brit Tzedek v'Shalom

Brit Tzedek v'Shalom (Jewish Alliance for Justice and Peace) is a national organization of US Jews committed to achieving a negotiated settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. It is guided by the mitzvah, or obligation, to pursue peace and justice, an obligation that is rooted in both secular and religious Jewish traditions. Brit Tzedek v'Shalom believes that enduring peace and security can only be achieved through the establishment of an economically and politically viable Palestinian state, which would necessitate an end to Israel's OCCUPATION of land acquired during the 1967 WAR and in turn bring an end to Palestinian TERRORISM. (www.btvshalom.org).

B'Tselem

B'Tselem (in the image of), the Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, is the foremost Israeli human rights organization that concerns itself, almost exclusively, with human rights abuses in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. It has published scores of reports, many comprehensive in scope, covering almost every kind of human rights violation, including TORTURE, fatal shootings by security forces, RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT, expropriation of LAND and WATER, discrimination in planning and building in East JERUSALEM, ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, and SETTLER VIOLENCE. These reports, available in Hebrew, Arabic, and English, are impeccably researched and documented, making B'Tselem the most important source for accurate information on human rights abuses. (www.btselem.org).

Buber, Martin (1878–1965)

The most important Jewish religious philosopher of the twentieth century, Martin Buber wrote widely in the fields of art, education, sociology, philosophy, politics, religion, biblical interpretation, Judaism, and ZIONISM. His work I and Thou has been universally recognized as a classic. Buber was born in Vienna; studied there and in Leipzig, Berlin, and Zurich; and joined the Zionist movement in 1898. During the first years of Hitler's rule, Buber stayed in GERMANY, but by 1938 he felt he had to leave and immigrated to Palestine; from then on he lectured at the Hebrew University in JERUSALEM.

Buber became a Zionist because he believed that European ANTI-SEMITISM made it necessary for Jews to have their own homeland; however, he soon became disenchanted with THEODOR HERZL's brand of nationalistic political Zionism. Instead, he favored the form of Zionism developed by AHAD HA'AM, based on the fundamental moral and spiritual values of Judaism. For Buber, Zionism had to be no less than a Jewish path to bring about tikkun olam (redemption of the world through establishment of truth and justice) in all of the institutions and activities of the Jewish settlement in Palestine. In this way, he believed, Zionism could contribute to human civilization as a whole and avoid self-centered nationalism. Buber could not accept a Jewish state that did not provide justice and security for all of its inhabitants—Jews and non-Jews—and hoped for a deep and continuing solidarity of genuine interests between the two peoples. He wrote that the Arab question would be the moral litmus test of Zionism. In 1921 he proposed a federation of Middle Eastern states to link the Jewish community with its Arab neighbors.

In 1925, when Buber was still living in Germany, a number of his followers in Palestine started an organization called BRIT SHALOM. They based their political philosophy on Buber's writings and advocated a democratic BINATIONAL state in which Jews and Arabs would be completely equal. Once in Palestine, Buber was active in Brit Shalom, and he and his comrades, including Rabbi JUDAH MAGNES, worked with moderate Arabs to try to forge links between the two peoples. Although they tried to influence the direction of Zionism, their views were never taken seriously by the Zionist establishment.

Following the 1948 WAR, Buber told Israel's founder, DAVID BEN-GURION, that one of the most important priorities of the new state of Israel should be to solve the Palestinian REFUGEE problem, but Ben-Gurion refused to listen. Throughout the remainder of his life, Buber worked to defend the civil rights of the PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL, and he urged Jews and Arabs to engage in genuine dialogue. He continued to try to influence public policy in this arena until his death.

See also BINATIONALISM; IHUD; PEACE

Bibliography

- Biemann, Asher D. The Martin Buber Reader: Essential Writings. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Buber, Martin. Between Man and Man. New York: Routledge, 1947.
- . Good and Evil. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1980.
- . I and Thou. New York: Free Press, 1971.
- . Israel and Palestine: The History of an Idea. New York: Strauss and Young, 1952.
- . On Zion: The History of an Idea: Martin Buber Library. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1997.
- . Tales of the Hasidim. London: Schocken, 1991.
- Flor-Mendes, Raul R. A Land of Two Peoples: Martin Buber on Jews and Arabs. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Herberg, Will. The Writings of Martin Buber, reissue. New American Library, 1983.
- Hodes, Aubrey. Martin Buber: An Intimate Portrait. New York: Viking, 1973.

Al-Budayri Family

The al-Budayri family is a prominent JERUSALEM family whose authenticated origins date back to the seventeenth century. Composed of lawyers, newspaper publishers and editors, and very strong Palestinian nationalists, the family enjoyed wealth and social stature—evident from the official OTTOMAN titles they held, such as pasha and naquib (representative of the family).

Shaykh Mohammad ibn Budayri (1747–1805) was born in Jerusalem and was sent by his father to Cairo for his education in Islamic theology at al-Azhar Mosque. Upon attaining the highest order of education, he returned in 1778 to Jerusalem, where he taught Islamic theology and doctrines at AL-AQSA MOSQUE. The shaykh spent a large portion of his private wealth in acquiring books and rare manuscripts for his library. One of three remaining Palestinian family-owned libraries in Jerusalem today, the al-Budayri library contains 642 rare manuscripts and 2,200 books. The family is currently planning to open it to the public.

The following generations continued in the path of their fathers, especially in teaching Islam and the Arabic language. However, at the beginning of the twentieth century, the trend in family education shifted to law, medicine, engineering, applied sciences, and social studies. Men and women were educated equally, and some of the first Palestinian lawyers, doctors, pharmacists, and engineers came from the Budayri family. In September 1919 the lawyer Muhammad Hasan al-Budayri opened the first newspaper in Palestine, Suriyya al-Janubiyya, published in Jerusalem. This paper was important in several respects: it appears to have been the most influential organ of opinion during its short lifetime; it was highly political and intensely nationalist; and its articles were vividly written. It attracted talented writers, in part, because it was affiliated with the Arab Nationalist Club (al-Nadi al-'Arabi) in Jerusalem.

In 1921 Muhammad Hasan al-Budayri's cousin Muhammad Kamil Budayri published a new newspaper called al-Sabah, which stated in its first issue that it was being published in Jerusalem, "the capital of Palestine." Minor though this might seem, it bespoke a subtle but important change in focus for many Palestinians, who now saw that Jerusalem, not Damascus, was the center of their political and social lives. The current generation of al-Budayris maintains the same high standard of education laid down by their founding fathers, and Jerusalem remains an essential part of their lives.

Bibliography

- Khalidi, Rashid. "The Formation of Palestinian Identity: The Critical Years, 1917–1923." In Rethinking Nationalism in the Arab Middle East. Edited by Israel Gershoni and James Jankowski. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Lesch, Ann Mosely. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Metropolitan Books, 2000.

Building Permits

To construct a home, enlarge an existing one, or build any type of structure (such as sheds, chicken coops, etc.) on one's LAND, Palestinians must obtain a PERMIT from the Israeli Occupation Authorities. Such permits, however, are almost never granted. Over the past four decades of OCCUPATION, Israel has employed in the WEST BANK a policy of planning, development, and building that severely restricts construction by Palestinians while allocating broad expanses of land to establish and expand Jewish SETTLEMENTS. In this way, Israel has created a situation in which thousands of Palestinians are unable to obtain permits to build on their land and are compelled to build without a permit to meet family needs for shelter.

The existing planning schemes, which date back fifty years and more, serve as the basis for approval, or far more often rejection, of applications for building permits. Land registration for Palestinians has been frozen for forty years, facilitating Israel's denial of permits on the grounds of failure to prove ownership of the land. The building authorities are administered by Israel and have no Palestinian representation. A Palestinian wanting to obtain a building permit to construct something on his land in AREA C (that part of the West Bank that remains under complete Israeli control according to the INTERIM AGREEMENT) must undergo a prolonged, complicated, and expensive procedure that generally results in denial of the application.

When Palestinians have built without a permit, Israel has adopted a policy of mass HOUSE DEMOLITIONS. In the ten years preceding 2003, the authorities demolished more than 2,200 residences, leaving more than 13,000 Palestinians homeless. This policy continued uninterrupted during the OSLO PROCESS. In this same period, at least 155 Israeli settlements, containing more than 170,000 (many put the number at 400,000) Jewish Israeli citizens, have been established in the West Bank. All these settlements are efficiently planned and constructed. But because thousands of houses within the settlements were built without permits, Israel has issued retroactive building permits, and it has never demolished any permitless Jewish structures.

Bibliography

- B'Tselem: The Israeli Information Center on Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. Planning and Building. Jerusalem: Israel, n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Planning\_and\_Building/Index.asp.

Bush, George H. W. (1924–)

The forty-first president of the UNITED STATES, George H. W. Bush, governed from 1989 to 1993. Much of his term was focused on Middle East issues, including the 1991 GULF WAR (the first war against IRAQ) and the MADRID CONFERENCE. President Bush and his secretary of state, JAMES BAKER, supported the long-standing US policy of an alliance with Israel and a refusal to recognize the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), including the termination in June 1990 of a low-level dialogue with the PLO begun in the REAGAN administration.

Opposition to the PLO

One aspect of the Bush administration's policy to discredit the PLO included strenuous efforts to block the Palestinian organization from membership in various international organizations, including the World Health Organization (WHO); the Food and Agricultural Organization (FAO); the International Labour Organization; the International Telecommunications Union; the UN Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization; and the International Atomic Energy Agency, as well as to prevent the PLO from signing the four Geneva Conventions. In this regard, Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizational Affairs John Bolton told the Subcommittee on Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs of the US Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1989: "Following an extensive lobbying campaign in Geneva, Washington, and virtually all foreign capitals, Secretary Baker made it clear in his 1 May statement that: (1) 'we oppose the PLO's efforts as a matter of principle,' and (2) the inevitable result of any enhancement of the PLO's status in an international organization would be the complete termination of United States funding for that organization."

The FAO, bowing to US pressure not to give the PLO full membership, was nevertheless desirous of granting the Palestinian organization some form of recognition. It thus passed a resolution that endorsed a PLO role in providing technical assistance to farmers in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Slightly over a month later, the United States announced that it was sharply cutting FAO's funding—from $61.4 million to $18 million.

Other efforts to delegitimize the PLO under the Bush administration included US government pressure on the Council on Foreign Relations to cancel PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE member YASIR 'ABD RABBU's invitation to speak before the council, the US State Department's warning that a speaking event at the UNITED NATIONS involving members of the PLO delegation would be considered improper "political activity" and could lead to the revocation of the delegation's visas, and repeated denials of requests from YASIR ARAFAT for visas to speak at the United Nations.

US diplomacy at the United Nations provided another venue for minimizing Palestinian interests and conversely supporting Israel. In Bush's first week in office, his UN delegate put strong pressure on Security Council members to withdraw a resolution that the United States deemed too critical of Israel's human rights violations in the Occupied Territories. Although fourteen Security Council members voted for the resolution, on 17 February 1989 the United States vetoed it. On 20 April 1989 the United States voted against a UN General Assembly resolution again condemning Israel's policies in the Occupied Territories, while stressing the need for an international conference. The vote was 129 to 2, with the United States and Israel being the sole opponents. On 31 August the United States abstained on a Security Council resolution that deplored Israel's DEPORTATION of Palestinians and called on Israel to respect the Geneva Conventions in the Occupied Territories. The US abstention was considered by many a great victory for the Palestinians, though clearly it did not deter subsequent Israeli deportations, which reached their peak in December 1992. On 6 October 1989 the United States and Israel cast the only two negative votes (140 to 2) against a General Assembly resolution condemning Israel's policies against the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories.

On 16 February 1990 the United States abstained on a resolution passed by the UN Commission of Human Rights affirming the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the Occupied Territories and calling on the Israeli government to cease settling Jewish immigrants in these areas. Subsequently, the Bush administration explained its abstention by stating that although it objected to new SETTLEMENTS in the Occupied Territories, "We have not determined that it is productive to address the legal issue. . . . We are concerned that the [resolution] . . . while upholding the principle of freedom of emigration, also refers to the Right of Return [for Palestinians]. . . . We also object . . . to the use of the phrase 'Palestinian and Arab territories.' . . . We do not accept the implied prejudgment of their status." On 16 May the United States voted against a WHO resolution condemning Israel for HEALTH CARE conditions in the Occupied Territories. The vote was 67 to 2, with the United States and Israel opposed. Additionally, the Bush team mounted a successful campaign in the United Nations to repeal the 1975 General Assembly Resolution 3379 defining Zionism as a form of racism.

In May 1990, in the context of massive SOVIET JEWISH immigration to Israel (for which the Bush administration had marshaled significant diplomatic, economic, and logistical support) and extensive Israeli settlement building in the Occupied Territories, including in East JERUSALEM, to house these and other settlers, the Bush administration successfully pressured the Security Council to drop a resolution terming Jewish settlement in the Occupied Territories and East Jerusalem illegal. In the same month, after escalating Israeli human rights violations in the Occupied Territories, US pressure in the Security Council killed a proposed resolution to send a UN observer force to the Palestinian territories and a compromise resolution that would have sent a special UN envoy to investigate the violence. On 31 May the United States vetoed a Security Council resolution to send a special commission of inquiry to the Occupied Territories.

Support of Israel

The first policy statement from the Bush administration on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict came on 10 February 1989 from Vice President Dan Quayle, who told a meeting of the ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE: "I am here to tell you that the Bush Administration shares your basic outlook. . . . The first principle of US Middle East policy remains strong and unwavering support for Israel's security. . . . America and Israel are linked by common strategic interests. The fact is that we have no more reliable friend than Israel. And the scope of our STRATEGIC COOPERATION is vast. . . . Our relationship with Israel has expanded into a 'true strategic alliance' . . . [and] I want to assure you that . . . the Bush-Quayle years will . . . continue to strengthen and deepen our strategic alliance with Israel."

In early March Secretary of State Baker broadly outlined what would become the administration's "two-tier" approach to the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli conflict. This strategy involved separating negotiations on Israeli-Arab states issues from Israeli-Palestinian issues (excluding the PLO). The initial Bush-Baker diplomatic effort centered on a proposal put forth by Israeli prime minister YITZHAK SHAMIR in April 1989 in response to an administration request for an Israeli initiative. In fact, the "Shamir Plan," which became the BAKER PLAN, constituted the parameters of the Bush administration's Middle East peace efforts throughout the entire four years of this administration—even after the Gulf War, which objectively altered a number of other significant factors in the region.

Prior to the Gulf War, the United States focused on the aspect of Shamir's plan that encouraged the Palestinians to participate in local elections, and after the war the United States emphasized the Israeli idea of bilateral negotiations and worked to promote talks between Israel and the Arab states and between Israel and a delegation of non-PLO Palestinians from the WEST BANK and GAZA. However, even as the United States shifted its attention to bilateral agreements between Israel and the Arab states, the Shamir Plan for ELECTIONS (in the context of limited autonomy) remained the animating principle in US efforts to find some sort of settlement for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

On 14 May 1989 the Israeli government released a follow-up proposal to its original election plan. The Palestinians responded by spurning Shamir's proposals and reiterating their own position on peace in a letter signed by West Bank leaders and made public in Jerusalem on 27 April 1989. The US response was articulated by Baker in an address to the AMERICAN-ISRAEL PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE on 22 May 1989: "President Bush believes, and I believe, that on these issues, there can be only one policy and that is continuity. American support for Israel is the foundation of our approach to the Middle East. . . . For the Palestinians, now is the time to speak with one voice for peace. Renounce the policy of phases in all languages, not just those addressed to the West. Practice constructive diplomacy, not attempts to distort international organizations, such as the World Health Organization. Amend the [PLO] Covenant. Translate the dialogue of violence in the INTIFADA into a dialogue of politics and diplomacy. Violence will not work. Reach out to Israelis and convince them of your peaceful intentions. You have the most to gain from doing so, and no one else can or will do it for you. Finally, understand that no one is going to 'deliver' Israel for you."

On 1 November 1989 the secretary of state formally submitted his peace plan, the "Baker Plan," which reflected Israel's dicta regarding "peace"—no negotiations with the PLO, no Palestinian state, no right of return for Palestinians, no discussion of Jerusalem, and the elections would be only to select individuals to participate in negotiations on Palestinian autonomy. Yet, by the spring of 1990, Israel was refusing to implement its own election proposal—a stance that resulted in growing frustration and irritation on the part of President Bush toward Shamir.

By 1990 approximately 1.1 million Jews had left the SOVIET UNION, the vast majority settling in Israel. These huge numbers of IMMIGRANTS inextricably altered the nature of the Palestine-Israel conflict because the drive to house them in settlements led to the appropriation of more Palestinian LAND and WATER resources in the West Bank, East Jerusalem, and the Gaza Strip. Also, new immigrants from the Soviet Union replaced many Palestinians from the territories who had worked in Israel. Israeli analyst Amiram Goldbloom wrote that the new settlements had enormous political significance in that “they are intended to prove to the Palestinians, and . . . to the Arab world, that the Israeli government thumbs its nose at the US efforts to advance peace in the region. . . . The government is now mobilized to torpedo any chance for peace.”

At this point, sensing that its credibility as an impartial broker with the Arab states was increasingly coming into question, the Bush administration began to exert some pressure on Israel. On 1 March 1990 Secretary Baker issued a statement tying US approval of an Israeli request for $10 million in loan guarantees to help settle Soviet Jewish immigrants to a halt in Israeli settlement construction. At the same time, President Bush made several unprecedented statements to the effect that the settlements were a serious, even the main, obstacle to peace. This led to a hardening of the Shamir government’s position and, consequently, increasing tensions in the US-Israeli relationship. Movement toward an Israeli-Palestinian accord came to a virtual halt, while at the same time Israel engaged in a program of massive new settlement construction.

On 13 June Shamir publicly blamed the United States for stirring up “Arab hostility” in the territories and at the same time laid down new, more restrictive conditions for peace talks, saying that Israel would not negotiate with any Palestinian who opposed limited autonomy for the Occupied Territories and that Palestinians from East Jerusalem could not have a role in the talks. Another Israeli official declared that Baker’s formula for talks was “no longer relevant,” and Israeli foreign minister DAVID LEVY averred that Baker’s plan had “distorted” the Israeli peace initiative and called on the United States to “get back to basics” with Israel. Baker responded by expressing impatience with the peace process and suggested that if positive peace moves from the Middle East actors were not forthcoming, the United States might disengage. He then made his famous comment to Israel—“When you’re serious about peace, call us”—and gave the White House telephone number.

Yet, in the very same week (on 20 June), the United States suspended the dialogue with the PLO, marking the end of eighteen fruitless months of talks. The Bush administration had indicated from the outset that it accorded little importance to the US-PLO DIALOGUE (Baker had stated early in the administration, “The existence of the dialogue should not lead anyone to misunderstand our overall policy or question our enduring support for the state of Israel”), but ending the talks was a severe blow to the Palestinians. The ostensible reason for the termination was the PLO’s failure to condemn a 30 May attempted raid on Israel by the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (PLF) and its subsequent refusal to submit to the US demand to expel ABU AL-ABBAS, PLF leader, from the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE. More important was US capitulation to relentless domestic and Israeli pressure to discontinue the dialogue.

After the United States ended the dialogue, the PLO continued to seek ways to placate US objections and restart the talks, but the Bush administration ignored the Palestinian entreaties. PLO efforts were brought to a halt with the 2 August 1990 Iraqi invasion of KUWAIT, followed by its 8 August annexation and Yasir Arafat’s support of Iraq.

Gulf War

From August 1990 through January 1991, the Bush administration’s interests in the Middle East were primarily directed at cobbling, then holding, together a coalition of Arab states in support of its objectives vis-à-vis Iraq. This necessitated maintaining a certain distance from Israel and satisfying some—mainly symbolic—Arab demands regarding the Palestinians. As a result, the United States further delayed approval of Israel’s request for $10 million in loan guarantees. Shamir responded by publicly attacking two pillars of US policy—the sale of arms to the Arab states and efforts to arrange Israeli-Palestinian peace talks—and declared that it was necessary for the Jewish state to keep “the land of Israel from the sea to the Jordan for the generations to come.”

Still, the United States supported Israel's interests, successfully postponing meetings of the Security Council on 7 and 10 December that were scheduled to discuss an international conference for solving the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. On the other hand, the United States declined to veto Security Council Resolution 681 deploring Israel's deportation of four Palestinians. Following its passage, Israel ignored the resolution and declared that “the fate of this resolution will be like the fate of other resolutions which are now in the UN archives.”

Peacemaking Efforts

Following the end of the Gulf War, during the spring and summer of 1991, the United States undertook an intensive venture to catalyze an Arab-Palestinian-Israeli peace process. Between March and July 1991, Secretary Baker made five trips to the Middle East. Yet, in spite of the flurry of American diplomacy, the 1989 Shamir Plan remained the basis of Baker's efforts.

Even the form of the US endeavor suggested that it would work against the Palestinians. Washington's pursuit of a two-track strategy of separating Israeli-Arab state and Israeli-Palestinian negotiations seriously weakened the Palestinian position. Unlike the comprehensive settlement that all relevant UN resolutions envisioned, the US plan was aimed at separate bilateral agreements, and the United States was far more committed to a just solution of the Israeli-Arab state conflict than it was to the Israeli-Palestinian one. Moreover, the United States demonstrated substantive opposition to Palestinian interests and rights, with the Bush administration repeatedly reiterating US opposition to an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza as well as refusing to recognize the PLO or to include it in the negotiating process. The latter stance was manifested in the strong pressure exerted by Baker on West Bank and Gaza residents to find a group of non-PLO, non-Jerusalemite Palestinians to join a Jordanian delegation to negotiate with Israel about some form of autonomy for the Palestinians.

The Bush administration's objectives in advancing a peace strategy were narrowly conceived and focused more on process than substance. Bush sought to bring about an end to the ARAB LEAGUE economic boycott of Israel, to terminate the Palestinian INTIFADA, to get the various parties to the negotiating table, and to cement a stable pro-American status quo in the region. Washington openly admitted that it had “no plan” to resolve the differences between Israel and the Palestinians when a conference was convened.

Despite its favorable terms for Israel, the Jewish state initially rejected the US Baker Plan (relenting only in August). Israel insisted that the conference be simply a one-day ceremonial opening to direct talks between Israel and its Arab state neighbors. Israel also made it clear that it would not exchange territory for peace—negating UN RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338 (the territories for peace formula)—and demanded a veto over the composition of a Palestinian delegation, which it now insisted, in addition to its previous stipulations (no PLO affiliates, no Jerusalemites), could contain no Palestinians living in the DIASPORA.

The MADRID CONFERENCE opened in Spain on 30 October 1991 with a group of non-PLO Palestinians (vetted by Israel) participating in a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. Each delegation gave an address, and the conference recessed indefinitely on 1 November. The first round of bilateral talks commenced for one day in Madrid on 3 November, and thereafter successive rounds were held in Washington, D.C., and elsewhere. By November 1992 seven sessions of the peace conference had been held. In the meantime, Shamir had been replaced by the LABOR PARTY, and a new prime minister, YITZHAK RABIN (to whom President Bush immediately granted the loan guarantees), was in office. George Bush had been defeated by BILL CLINTON, who would assume office in January 1993, and the secret talks in Oslo that led to the OSLO ACCORDS were only a few months away.

Bibliography

- Aronson, Geoffrey. “Soviet Jewish Emigration, the United States, and the Occupied Territories.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:4 (1990).
- Aruri, Nasser. “The United States and Palestine: Reagan's Legacy to Bush.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:3 (1989).
- Barilleaux, Ryan J., and Mark J. Rozell. Power and Prudence: The Presidency of George H. W. Bush. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2004.
- Bush, George H. W. All the Best, George Bush: My Life in Letters and Other Writings. New York: Touchstone, 1999.
- Christianson, Kathleen. Perceptions of Palestine: Their Influence on U.S. Middle East Policy, updated ed. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.

- Goldbloom, Amiram. "Are Settlements an Obstacle to Peace?" New Outlook (Tel Aviv). 34:4 (1991).
- Greene, John Robert. The George H. W. Bush Years. New York: Facts on File, 2005.
- Khalidi, Walid. "The Half Empty Glass of Middle East Peace." Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:3 (1990).
- Kurtzer, Dan. "The Bush Administration." Policy Forum Report. Washington, DC: Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1989.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. "The Bush Administration and the Palestinians: A Reassessment." In U.S. Policy on Palestine from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Washington, DC: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1995.
- . "The Gulf War and the Palestinians." In The Middle East in the Aftermath of the Gulf War. Edited by Tareq Ismael and Jacqueline Ismael. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1993.
- . "The U.S.-PLO Dialogue: Continuity or Change in American Policy?" Arab Studies Quarterly. 11:4 (1989).
- . "U.S. Policy toward the Palestinians: A Twenty Year Assessment." Arab Studies Quarterly. 10:1 (1988).

Bush, George W. (1946–)

George W. Bush, the forty-third US president, is the son of GEORGE H. W. BUSH, who was president from 1989 to 1993. Under the younger Bush's administration, which started in 2001, US policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict took a qualitative shift to the right. Although previous administrations had never been particularly sympathetic to Palestinian concerns and had generally supported Israel's positions, most mainstream analysts placed the US position more or less in the center of the Israeli political spectrum. By contrast, the Bush administration firmly identified with the Israeli right, in particular with the LIKUD. Paradoxically, however, Bush was the first US president to call for an independent Palestinian state and the first to use the word Palestine in a public address.

During President Bush's first year in office, administration officials made a number of contradictory statements regarding Israeli policies. For example, Secretary of State COLIN POWELL criticized certain Israeli actions on several occasions only to have them soft-pedaled later by the White House. Both Republican and Democratic congressional leaders during this period tended to say that the administration was not being sufficiently anti-Palestinian.

The Bush administration's official position toward the Israeli-Palestinian peace process was largely based on leaving the two parties to work it out between themselves. Not surprisingly, given the asymmetry in power between the Palestinians and their Israeli occupiers, taking a hands-off approach toward bilateral negotiations resulted in little progress in the peace process and allowed Israel to further consolidate its OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, GAZA (until 2005), and the Golan Heights.

In 2001, the Bush administration—spearheaded by CIA director GEORGE TENET and retired marine commandant Anthony ZINNI—followed up on the MITCHELL Commission Report by pushing for a cease-fire agreement from the Palestinians at the same time that ARIEL SHARON's government pledged to continue building more Jewish SETTLEMENTS. Indeed, the administration soon directed its attention almost exclusively to ending Palestinian violence and did not follow up on the Mitchell Report's call for a settlement freeze and other Israeli responsibilities. Bush and his advisers basically considered Palestinian TERRORISM the cause of the conflict and adopted the same rhetoric as Prime Minister Sharon (who assumed office less than a month after Bush) and his aides.

On several occasions during President Bush's tenure, the UNITED STATES utilized its veto power in the UN Security Council to block resolutions critical of Israeli violations of international humanitarian law, such as Israel's TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS against suspected militants and its attacks on civilian targets—including UN personnel and facilities—in the Occupied Territories.

After the 9/11 terrorist attacks against the United States by Arab hijackers, the Bush administration moved even closer to the Likud worldview of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as one dimension of the global threat of Islamist terrorism. Secretary of State Colin Powell declared that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict resulted not from "the absence of a political way forward" but from "terrorism . . . in its rawest form." Furthermore, he accused IRAQ, IRAN, and SYRIA of "using the Middle East conflict as an excuse for those terrorist organizations" operating in the region.

What became known as the Bush Doctrine, formalized in June 2002, moved US foreign policy away from its long-standing policy of deterrence, containment, and negotiation to emphasize unilateral action, military preemption, and full-spectrum dominance of the Middle East and other parts of the world against any potential adversary. Although there was also a rhetorical shift supporting greater democracy and liberty in the Arab and Islamic world, US support for autocratic regimes in the region actually increased. The post-9/11 US wars in Afghanistan and Iraq quickly eclipsed the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as the major focus of US policy initiatives in the region.

One component of the Bush Doctrine was that those who harbor terrorists or have any other links to terrorists will be treated as terrorists themselves and thereby subjected to military action and excluded from any peace negotiations. In the case of Israel and Palestine, this doctrine led to full US support of Israel's massive offensives in 2002 against the Palestinians—OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS, OPERATION DETERMINED PATH, OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD, and others—during which the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES reoccupied much of the WEST BANK, severely damaging major parts of the territory's civilian infrastructure, and at the same time destroying key segments of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY'S security and governing institutions. The Bush administration also refused to engage in substantive negotiations with the Palestinians beyond issues dealing with Israeli security concerns.

This more hard-line policy under President Bush came in part as a result of his decision to give US Defense Department officials unprecedented clout in the formulation of US policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which had previously been largely the purview of the State Department. One consequence was that the hard-line Pentagon officials who viewed the conflict strictly in security terms and tended to be sympathetic to Israel—for example, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz, and Undersecretary of Defense Douglas Feith—marginalized the pragmatic conservatives in the administration, such as Secretary of State Powell, who saw the conflict more in political terms. For example, before joining the administration, Feith, a prominent NEOCONSERVATIVE intellectual, had contributed to a 1996 paper that advised then Israeli prime minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU to make “a clean break from the peace process.” Similarly, Feith wrote a widely read 1997 article that called on Israel to reoccupy “the areas under Palestinian Authority control,” even though “the price in blood would be high.”

The Bush administration also ignored the ARAB LEAGUE'S peace initiative, approved unanimously in its 2002 Beirut Summit, which would have provided security guarantees for Israel and establish full normal diplomatic relations in return for a complete Israeli withdrawal from the Occupied Territories.

On 24 June 2002, in the midst of Israel's massive military offensive against the Palestinians, President Bush gave a major, televised speech setting forth the US position on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In the most important speech on the conflict in his eight years in office, Bush remained faithful to his tenets. He accepted the Israeli view that “terror” alone was fueling the conflict and defended all Israeli violence as self-defense. Bush demanded that the Palestinians “reform” themselves before any demands were made of Israel. He declared: “I call on the Palestinian people to elect new leaders, leaders not compromised by terror. I call upon them to build a practicing democracy, based on tolerance and liberty. If the Palestinian people actively pursue these goals, America and the world will actively support their efforts.” This amounted to a demand that the Palestinians, under the conditions of military OCCUPATION, develop all the institutions of a fully independent, democratic state and a fully functioning democracy.

In addition, Bush chastised the Palestinians for having a weak legislature and an ineffective judicial system. But, if they complied with his goals, “the United States of America will support the creation of a Palestinian state whose borders and certain aspects of its sovereignty will be provisional until resolved as part of a final settlement in the Middle East” (emphasis added). While support for even interim independence and partial sovereignty was further than any previous administration had gone in recognizing Palestinian national rights, it still fell far short of international demands for a viable Palestinian state.

On the issue of violence, Bush made it clear that the Palestinians must renounce it categorically, while Israel was given a free hand to “continue to defend itself.” Although Palestinians were required to stop “terror” immediately, Bush only called on Israel to withdraw its forces to the positions held prior to 28 September 2000 and to stop settlement construction in the Occupied Territories, “as we make progress.” This was interpreted by Israel to mean that it could carry on with unilateral military operations and could accelerate the settlement enterprise until there was “progress.”

Bush clearly viewed the Palestinians as being the direct cause of Israeli suffering: "I can understand the deep anger and anguish of the Israeli people. You've lived too long with fear and funerals, having to avoid markets and public transportation, and forced to put armed guards in kindergarten classrooms. The Palestinian Authority has rejected your offer at hand and trafficked with terrorists. You have a right to a normal life; you have a right to security; and I deeply believe that you need a reformed, responsible Palestinian partner to achieve that security."

Although Bush didn't cite any direct Israeli culpability for the Palestinians' situation, he was sympathetic to their feelings. "I can understand the deep anger and despair of the Palestinian people. For decades you've been treated as pawns in the Middle East conflict. Your interests have been held hostage to a comprehensive peace agreement that never seems to come, as your lives get worse year by year." Bush declared further that after the Palestinians met his demands for a fully functioning democracy, "they [would] be able to reach agreement with Israel and EGYPT and JORDAN on security and other arrangements for independence." Later he affirmed that the "provisional" Palestinian state "could rise rapidly, as it comes to terms with Israel, Egypt, and Jordan on practical issues, such as security." Though this was the first time a US president had called for the creation of a Palestinian state, the conditions placed upon Palestinian independence, Bush's failure to call for an end to the Occupation, and his dismissal of Israeli responsibility for the Palestinian situation amounted to a US endorsement of Israeli policies.

In late 2002, under enormous pressure from the international community and desirous of solidifying support for the "coalition of the willing" in the Iraq War, the Bush administration cosponsored the "Performance-Based ROAD MAP to a Permanent Two-State Solution to the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict" with the EUROPEAN UNION, RUSSIA, and the UNITED NATIONS. Reaching consensus among the four parties, which became known as "the QUARTET," was initially difficult because of the Bush administration's policies as stated in the June 2002 speech and his unwillingness to give much credence to INTERNATIONAL LAW and UN Security Council resolutions. Bush eventually reached agreement with the other three parties by the end of the year, only after he successfully pushed them to incorporate much of the Tenet Plan in the first phase of the Road Map. The Bush administration then insisted that this third and final version of the Road Map not be formally announced until after the January 2003 Israeli elections so as not to hurt Ariel Sharon's prospects for reelection. Bush greatly appreciated Sharon's strong support for US policy in the region, including the invasion of Iraq, in contrast to his principal challenger, the left-leaning and more independent-minded LABOR PARTY leader Amram Mitzna.

Unlike his father, who pursued a number of policy initiatives just prior to the 1992 Israeli elections (such as withholding a proposed $10 billion loan guarantee to help the more moderate Labor Party leader YITZHAK RABIN defeat the incumbent LIKUD prime minister YITZHAK SHAMIR), President Bush, in the run-up to the 2003 Israeli elections, worked to help ensure a Likud victory. For example, just before Israelis went to the polls, Bush announced his support for a $12 billion loan guarantee to the Israeli government, along with substantial increases in military aid for Israeli Occupation forces.

During what should have been the first phase of the Road Map, the Bush administration failed to pressure Israel to live up to its obligations, and the plan eventually died. The Bush administration also largely ignored the draft peace agreement, the GENEVA ACCORD, signed by prominent former Israeli and Palestinian officials in Geneva in December 2003. Meanwhile, President Bush refused to meet with YASIR ARAFAT, who was president of the Palestinian National Authority (PNA), or other leading Palestinian officials and refused to encourage Israel to resume the peace negotiations it had broken off in February 2001.

In April 2004, in a summit meeting with Sharon in Washington, President Bush effectively abandoned the "land for peace" formula, which had nominally been the basis of US policy toward the conflict during seven administrations since the June 1967 WAR, by endorsing Sharon's "unilateral disengagement" plan, later known as the "convergence" plan. Under this unilateral initiative, Israel would withdraw illegal settlements from the occupied GAZA STRIP but incorporate into Israel virtually all of the settlements in the occupied West Bank, leaving the Palestinians with a series of noncontiguous and economically unviable BANTUSTANS, each surrounded by Israeli territory with Israel controlling the BORDERS, the SEAPORT, and the airspace, as well as having the right to conduct military operations inside Palestinian areas. According to Israeli press reports, Sharon brought four separate disengagement plans to Washington requiring various degrees of Israeli withdrawal. President Bush endorsed the one that allowed Israel to annex the largest amount of Palestinian territory. Declaring that Sharon was “a man of peace,” Bush also pledged that “the United States will do its utmost to prevent any attempt by anyone to impose any other plan,” an apparent reference to the Geneva Accord supported by the Palestinian leadership and leading Israeli moderates.

At the same time, the Bush administration openly acknowledged that it would not force Israel to withdraw from most of its WEST BANK settlements as required by the Fourth Geneva Convention and a series of UN Security Council resolutions, as well as its opposition to any negotiations for the Palestinian REFUGEES’ right to return. That summer, the Bush administration denounced the landmark advisory ruling by the International Court of Justice that Israel’s separation BARRIER within occupied Palestinian territory was a violation of international law and had to be dismantled.

Though more open to dialogue with MAHMUD ABBAS after his assumption of the PNA presidency following Arafat’s death in November 2004, the Bush administration led international efforts to place tough sanctions and other restrictions on the PNA following the election of a HAMAS-led parliamentary majority in the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL fourteen months later. Ironically, it had been the Bush administration that had successfully weakened the Palestinian presidency by insisting that it add the position of prime minister, which was then assumed by Hamas activist ISMAIL HANIYEH. Subsequently, the Bush administration opposed the formation of a Fatah-Hamas coalition government negotiated by the Saudis in 2006 and actively pushed Fatah to stage a coup against Hamas. When a Hamas counter coup succeeded in consolidating the Islamist group’s control of the Gaza Strip, the Bush administration led international sanctions against the besieged Palestinian territory, resulting in a humanitarian crisis. In the face of the international outcry regarding large-scale civilian casualties during Israel’s three-week war on Gaza commenced in December 2008, Bush strongly came to the defense of the Israeli attack.

President Bush brought together Israeli, Palestinian, and other Arab leaders for a summit in Annapolis, Maryland, in December 2007 for what was ostensibly an effort to revive the Road Map. Instead, it apparently further doomed the Road Map by consolidating US control of the process at the expense of the other members of the Quartet. According to the text of the Annapolis agreement as put forward by the Bush administration, “implementation of the future peace treaty will be subject to the implementation of the Road Map, as judged by the United States” [emphasis added], with Bush emphasizing that “The United States will monitor and judge the fulfillment of the commitment of both sides of the road map.” Despite making confident predictions of a final peace agreement by the end of this presidency, Bush did little to move the process forward during his final thirteen months in office.

A key component of the Bush administration’s policy toward Israel was using Israel to advance perceived American objectives in the region, such as counterterrorism efforts, training US occupation forces in urban counterinsurgency warfare, and supporting pro-US Kurdish militias in northern Iraq. The US military also began working with its Israeli counterparts in drafting plans for a joint military operation against Iranian nuclear facilities and other Iranian targets, though Bush ended up blocking a proposed Israeli attack on Iran in 2008. In May 2006, however, during a Washington summit, President Bush pushed Israeli prime minister EHUD OLMERT to attack LEBANON and Syria. Although Israel rejected Bush administration pressure to go after Damascus, it did launch a devastating four-week air and ground assault on Lebanon in July, with the US government virtually alone in the international community supporting Israel’s massive attacks against the country’s civilian infrastructure and initially blocking UN efforts to impose a cease-fire.

The rightward tilt in US policy toward Israel and Palestine under President Bush can be attributed to a number of factors. One was the strong influence of neoconservative intellectuals on the administration, some of whom strongly identified with the Revisionist Zionist ideology that supports Israeli expansionism and opposes negotiations with Israel’s Arab neighbors. Another factor was the 9/11 attacks, which led to the reliance on military responses to political problems, particularly those that included Arab Islamic groups challenging US allies. A third was the failure of the Democratic Party to challenge Bush on Israeli-Palestinian issues, essentially giving his administration a free hand to pursue policies opposed by virtually the entire international community as well as, according to public opinion polls, the majority of the US public.

Perhaps the most important factor involved the emergence of a new major constituency within the Republican Party in support of US backing for a Greater Israel—an Israel fully sovereign in all of Jerusalem, the West Bank, and Gaza. Most previous Republican presidents had tended to be more moderate on Israeli-Palestinian issues than most of their Democratic counterparts, largely as a result of Republican ties to the oil industry with its links to the Arab world. However, recent years have seen the rise in influence of the CHRISTIAN Right, which has come to dominate key sectors of the Republican Party. Most of the leadership of this movement espouse a messianic theology centered on the belief that a hegemonic Israel is a necessary precursor to the second coming of Christ and—along with hot-button social issues like abortion and homosexuality—have made US support for Israel's rightist governments a major focus of their political agenda. Though Bush was less dependent on Jewish voters than any modern president, a number of his administration's key policy decisions in support of Israeli Occupation policies appear to have been influenced by vigorous lobbying campaigns by Christian conservatives.

Bibliography

- Abunimah, Ali. "Bush's Speech—A Vision of Permanent War." Electronic Intifada. 25 June 2002. www.electronicintifada.net.
- Begala, Paul. It's Still the Economy, Stupid: George W. Bush, the GOP's CEO. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2002.
- Bush, George W. "Rose Garden Speech on Israel-Palestine Two-State Solution." White House, Washington, DC. 24 June 2002.
- Cohen, David B., and John W. Wells, eds. American National Security and Civil Liberties in an Era of Terrorism. Houndmills, Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Contenta, Sandro. "Bush Speech Ignores Bloody Reality." Toronto Star. 25 June 2002.
- Corn, David. "Bush's Faux Peace Plan for the Middle East." The Nation. 25 June 2002.
- Eisendrath, Craig R., and Melvin A. Goodman. Bush League Diplomacy: How the Neoconservatives Are

- Putting the World at Risk*. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2004.
- Joslin, Anne DuBose. Ambushed: Why George H. W. Bush Really Lost in 1992. New York: Henley and Luce, 2003.
- Kamiya, Gary. "Fiddling While the Middle East Burns." Salon.com. 25 June 2002.
- Moore, James, Wayne Slater, and James C. Moore. Bush's Brain: How Karl Rove Made George W. Bush Presidential. New York: Wiley, 2003.
- Suskind, Ron. The Price of Loyalty: George W. Bush, the White House, and the Education of Paul O'Neill. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2004.
- Turner, William W. Mission Not Accomplished: How George Bush Lost the War on Terrorism. Sacramento, CA: Penmarin Books, 2004.
- Van Ness, Peter. Confronting the Bush Doctrine. London: RoutledgeCurzon, 2005.
- The White House. "President Bush Calls for New Palestinian Leadership." 24 June 2002. www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2002/06/20020624-3.html.
- Zunes, Stephen. "Bush's Speech: A Setback for Peace." Counterpunch. 28/30 June 2002.
- . "The Influence of the Christian Right on Bush Administration Policy toward Israel and Palestine." Middle East Policy. XII:3 (July 2005).
- . "The Swing to the Right in U.S. Policy toward Israel and Palestine." Middle East Policy. IX:3 (September 2002).
- . Tinderbox: U.S. Middle East Policy and the Roots of Terrorism. Monroe, ME: Common Courage Press, 2003.

—Stephen Zunes

Bustan L'Shalom-Wadi Na'am

Bustan L'Shalom-Wadi Na'am (Builders without Borders) is a grassroots partnership of Jews and Israeli Arabs who are working to raise awareness of the plight of the indigenous BEDOUIN population in Israel by introducing sustainable, low-budget building techniques in the UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES. These are villages that Israel does not recognize and for which it does not provide social services or infrastructure assistance. Bustan works with villagers who have been denied access to public resources and raises awareness of systemic discrimination through programs that, for example, provide educational materials and technical support for the construction of medical clinics and other vital services in the Bedouin and other rural Israeli-Palestinian villages. In addition, it is hoped that this project will spawn interest in sustainable building across the Negev, where 70,000 Bedouins are living in corrugated tin shanties in villages that are denied medical services, water, education, and electricity infrastructure. (<http://builderswithoutborders.org/projects/project4.htm>).

See also BEDOUIN IN ISRAEL; UNRECOGNIZED VILLAGES

Bypass Roads

See ROAD SYSTEM IN THE WEST BANK

---

C

---

Cairo I

See GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT I

Cairo II

See GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT II

Cairo Agreement, 1969

See LEBANON

Cairo Declaration, 1985

In the Cairo Declaration, issued on 7 November 1985, PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman YASIR ARAFAT renounced TERRORISM and pledged that the PLO would henceforth not engage in acts of terror, and, if a faction or individual broke the pledge, it would be punished by the PLO. The Cairo Declaration was approved by the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL, the Palestinian parliament in exile, on 19 November 1988 in Algeria.

In the declaration, Arafat further stated: “The Palestinian people has and continues to struggle to liberate its occupied land, to exercise its right to self-determination, and to establish a state as a necessary condition for achieving a just and lasting peace in the region in which all peoples would coexist, free from acts of terrorism or subjugation. . . . And, in the framework of pursuing a just and peaceful solution, and given the PLO’s struggle by all legitimate means to regain the established national rights of the Palestinians as well as their political freedom, the PLO condemns all violations of human rights, especially the right to life and security without discrimination on the basis of creed, gender, or color. . . . The PLO reaffirms its declaration issued in 1974 which condemned all operations outside [Palestine] and all forms of terrorism. And it restates the adherence of all its groups and institutions to that declaration. Beginning today, the PLO will take all measures to deter violators. . . . In this context, the PLO stresses its insistence upon the right of the Palestinian people to resist the Israeli OCCUPATION of its land by all available means, with the goal of achieving withdrawal from its land. For the right to resist foreign occupation is a legitimate right, not abrogated by the UN Charter, which calls for disavowing the use of force or threatening to use it to settle conflicts, and which considers the resort to force a violation of its principles and goals. The right of the Palestinian people to resist the Occupation in the Occupied Territories has been stressed in numerous UN resolutions and in the rules of the Geneva Convention.”

The context of the declaration resides in Palestinian politics in the post–LEBANON WAR era. At the seventeenth Palestine National Council (28 November 1984) in Amman, JORDAN, a very splintered PLO called for an independent Palestinian state in confederation with Jordan. In February 1985, Jordan’s King Husayn and Arafat announced the Amman Agreement (HUSAYN-ARAFAT AGREEMENT), which included a pledge by Arafat to cease terrorism. However, the September 1985 murder of three Israelis in Cyprus by Arafat’s elite security guard, FORCE 17, and the 7 October hijacking of the cruise ship ACHILLE LAURO by ABU AL-ABBAS’S PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT (in retaliation for the 1 October bombardment by Israel of PLO headquarters in Tunis that killed 68), weakened Arafat’s position with King Husayn and rendered the Jordanian-PLO agreement void, and hindered his attempt to foster a dialogue with the UNITED STATES. Thus on 7 November he issued the Cairo Declaration, publicly renouncing terrorism.

Bibliography

- Arafat, Yasir. “The Cairo Declaration, 1985.” www.al-bab.com/arab/docs/pal/pal1.htm.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.
- Lukacs, Yehuda. The Israeli-Palestinian Conflict—A Documentary Record 1967–1990. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat: Between Gun and Olive Branch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.

Cairo Declaration, 2005

The Cairo Declaration (17 March 2005) was an accord among thirteen Palestinian factions to end their feuding and come together as a unified movement in order to confront the Israeli OCCUPATION and in particular Israel's continuing offensives in the context of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. It was concluded under the auspices of EGYPT and attended by the deputy foreign minister of SYRIA. The declaration called for the release of all Israeli-held PRISONERS, paved the way for HAMAS to become part of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), and established rules and procedures for the 2006 parliament ELECTIONS. All groups agreed to extend the existing truce as long as Israel did not initiate aggression or alter the status quo; however, ARMED STRUGGLE was explicitly acknowledged as an option if Israel continued military actions.

Even as the Palestinian delegates were assembling in Cairo, the Israeli cabinet announced that the West Bank BARRIER would separate occupied East JERUSALEM from the WEST BANK by looping around the vast Jewish settlement bloc of MA'ALE ADUMIM. On 20 March Israeli defense minister Shaul Mofaz approved plans for the construction of 3,500 new houses for the bloc, cutting off another large slice of the small urban space that remained to Palestinians in East Jerusalem. The Cairo Declaration anticipated these moves: "Continued SETTLEMENT, construction of the wall and the Judaization of Jerusalem are issues liable to explode the calm," it warned. The truce among the Palestinian factions did not hold, Hamas and Fatah renewed fighting, and Israel undertook a major military offensive against the GAZA STRIP beginning in June 2006, OPERATION SUMMER RAINS, that lasted through November.

The 2005 Cairo Declaration is historically significant for several reasons beyond its ultimate failure. It marked the full integration of Hamas into the Palestinian political system, coming after ten years of conflict and negotiations between FATAH and Hamas, and by itself held the potential for a more unified national movement. Conversely, numerous issues at Cairo were unresolved and remained potentially problematic for the future. The upcoming elections would mark a major test of the two factions' ability to cooperate. But when Hamas overwhelmingly won the parliamentary elections for the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, Fatah refused to accept the results and resorted to violence as a means of control.

Whereas Fatah is a veteran organization and has in fact been the ruling party of Palestinian nationalism for almost forty years, Hamas is a relatively young player. Hamas defined itself as a political movement only in the early months of the First INTIFADA at the beginning of 1988, when it published its ideological platform. It called this platform the Islamic Covenant, as a counterweight to the famous National Covenant of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Hamas was founded as an Islamic religious organization in opposition to the secular PLO. On its founding a Hamas member declared: "On the day that the PLO adopts Islam as a way of life, we shall be its soldiers."

Although Hamas leaders avoid claiming that Hamas is an alternative (to the PLO) leadership, they have behaved from the outset as if this were their objective. For example, during the First INTIFADA (1987–1991) they refused to take part in the Unified National Leadership, which consisted of all the other factions, and presented instead a different political agenda that was totally opposed to the decisions taken by the PLO in the summer of 1988, the main thrust of which was the acceptance of UN resolutions and de facto recognition of Israel's right to exist.

The refusal by Hamas to recognize the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people, however, did not prevent it from engaging in a dialogue with the PLO. One of the first and most interesting meetings between Hamas and Fatah representatives was in January 1993 in Khartoum, Sudan, during the interim period of the diplomatic process, between the MADRID CONFERENCE (November 1991) and the OSLO AGREEMENT (September 1993). At this meeting Hamas expressed willingness to join the PLO under two major conditions. The first was that the PLO retract its recognition of UN RESOLUTION 242—or, in other words, change its policy of striving for a political settlement with Israel. The second was that Hamas would receive a representation of 40 percent in all PLO institutions. YASIR ARAFAT responded angrily, saying: "I didn't come to Sudan in order to sell you the PLO." The Hamas representative, Ibrahim Ghusha, replied: "We have expressed willingness to enter the PLO and not become an alternative to it."

The differences of opinion between Hamas and Fatah regarding Israel were, and to a certain extent have remained, differences of principle, at least until January 2006, when Hamas won an overwhelming victory in the Palestinian Legislative Council elections. Hamas has stood for the liberation of all Palestine, which according to its covenant is “the land of the Islamic Waqf for generations of Muslims until Judgment Day,” a position that precludes ceding any part of Palestine. However, between 2007 and 2009, Hamas began to alter these absolutes and is gradually moving toward acceptance of a two-state solution. In contrast, Fatah officially supports the principle of a two-state solution, provided that the solution to the REFUGEE problem is based on their right of return, but it took Fatah some fifteen years to transform its position on the liberation of all of Palestine to the commitment to the two-state solution. Hamas declares that the sole operational method is jihad and armed struggle, whereas Fatah (and the PLO) have taken decisions opposed to violence and TERRORISM. Yet, initially, Fatah similarly believed that armed struggle was the only appropriate method of resistance.

There are significant social differences that exist between Fatah and Hamas. Whereas the initial breeding ground for some Fatah leaders was in the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD (e.g., Yasir Arafat and SALAH KHALAF), others came from a secular-leftist atmosphere (e.g., GEORGE HABASH and WADI' HADDAD), and over the years secularism came to dominate in Fatah. In addition, Fatah was based outside historic Palestine, especially in Beirut and Tunis, which exposed it to multiple influences, while Hamas is a local organization that originated in the Gaza refugee camps and was fed by a traditional religious atmosphere inspired by the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. Finally, Fatah leaders have an image among the Palestinian public of being hungry for authority and power, and tainted by personal corruption, whereas the public image of Hamas activists is of modesty and integrity.

Just as the first Hamas and Fatah dialogue ten years ago in Sudan failed, so did subsequent dialogues throughout the 1990s. One major dimension of the dispute between Hamas and Fatah (or specifically the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, PNA) was during the years 1996–2000, when the PNA security services arrested hundreds of Hamas operatives in the West Bank and Gaza and attempted to block the activities of the movement.

Tensions between Hamas and Fatah rose in 2005 after the 11 November 2004 death of longtime PLO leader Yasir Arafat and after Hamas won the 2006 PLC elections.

The period from March to December 2006 was marked by conflict. Fatah commanders refused to take orders from the Hamas government and the PNA initiated a campaign of assassinations and abductions against Hamas, leading to retaliatory operations by Hamas against Fatah. Tensions grew more acute between the two factions after they failed to reach an agreement to share governing power.

On 15 December 2006 fighting broke out in the West Bank after Palestinian security forces fired on a Hamas rally in Ramallah, wounding at least 20 people. This came shortly after Hamas accused Fatah of attempting to assassinate ISMAIL HANIYEH, the Palestinian prime minister.

Intense fighting continued throughout December 2006 and January 2007 in the Gaza Strip. Several cease-fire attempts failed. SAUDI ARABIA sponsored a conference to bring about a permanent cease-fire and a national unity government, resulting in Fatah and Hamas signing the MECCA AGREEMENT on 8 February 2007. However, minor incidents continued through March and April 2007, and in mid-May 2007, clashes erupted once again in the streets of Gaza. In less than 20 days, more than 50 Palestinians were killed. Leaders of both parties tried to stop the fighting with dozens of truces, but none of them held for longer than a few days.

Beginning on 7 June 2007, what is referred to as the “Battle of Gaza” was transformed into a full-fledged military conflict between Hamas and Fatah in the Gaza Strip. The fighting lasted about a week, and it resulted in Hamas remaining in control of the Gaza Strip after forcing out Fatah. As a result of the conflict, the territory controlled by the PNA is de facto divided into two entities: the Hamas-controlled government in the Gaza Strip, and the West Bank governed by the PNA.

The al-Aqsa Intifada, which erupted in September 2000, brought Hamas and Fatah together in countering the Israeli-Palestinian violence. The failure of the Oslo Process with Israel restored the option of violence to the Palestinian agenda, and Fatah activists returned to the methods of armed struggle and terrorist attacks, including the use of SUICIDE BOMBERS, which were previously employed solely by Hamas and other Islamic extremists. In other words, in the years between September 2000 and 2005, Fatah activists retreated to a large extent from their previous positions and adopted a stance similar to that of Hamas. Furthermore, public support for Hamas had increased considerably, as had Palestinian public opinion in favor of violent attacks against Israel.

The renewal of contacts between Hamas and Fatah during the Intifada, as well as their intensification in 2003, occurred against a background of increasing Hamas prestige and power. In the Cairo dialogue in early 2002, Hamas representatives refused to agree to a joint document prepared by the Egyptians regarding a one-year suspension of armed activities. Abu Mazen (MAHMUD ABBAS), appointed by Arafat in the summer of 2003 as the first Palestinian prime minister, adamantly opposed Hamas activities and attempted to persuade Hamas leaders and others that the terrorist attacks and acts of violence—or, in his words, “the armed Intifada”—did not help the Palestinians but rather harmed their cause.

Abu Mazen’s efforts to achieve rapprochement and an understanding with Hamas regarding the cessation of the terrorist attacks, combined with the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) policy of TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS of Hamas leaders, produced a change in the Hamas position. Indeed, an understanding was reached in the summer of 2003 regarding a hudna, a temporary cease-fire, for which Hamas presented clear conditions, including the following: Israel would stop killing Palestinian citizens, halt its penetration of Palestinian territories, and release prisoners. Abu Mazen’s hudna, achieved at the Cairo Conference in the summer of 2003, was short-lived, as was his government. The dialogue between the sides was renewed only after Arafat’s death and Abu Mazen’s election as president of the PNA. By this time the atmosphere between the factions had changed, and the Cairo Conference in March 2005 led to a cease-fire and agreement about a joint document.

What gave rise to the change in atmosphere at this conference? Several factors of varying degrees of importance may have contributed: Arafat’s death in November 2004; Israel’s assassination of three senior Hamas leaders—SHEIKH AHMAD YASIN, Dr. ABD AL-AZIZ RANTISI, and Ismail Abu Shenev; national and regional circumstances that included global aspects of Islamic terrorism; and the war in IRAQ. In addition, the events in LEBANON and SYRIA probably exerted a great deal of influence on the Hamas leadership, which was based in Damascus.

All these factors probably prompted Hamas to modify its positions, but it is important to note the additional influence of Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON’S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT plan from Gaza. As far as most Palestinians were concerned, and certainly from the Hamas viewpoint, the Sharon government drafted the disengagement plan solely because of the Palestinians’ violent struggle. They regarded it as a tremendous Palestinian victory. All the opinion polls in the territories testified to this sentiment. The sense of victory and of Hamas strength allowed the heads of the movement in the territories and abroad to adopt more flexible positions, sensing an opening to assume control of the Palestinian national movement and perhaps the governing authority of the West Bank and Gaza. Meanwhile, support for Hamas was increasing, in part because of the disgust of the public in the territories with the corruption in Fatah and the PNA leadership. The internal disputes in Fatah between the older veterans of Tunis, who controlled the movement’s central committee, and the younger veterans of Israeli jails from the al-Aqsa Intifada encouraged Hamas activists to believe that their goal lay within their grasp.

Consequently, the most important development achieved in 2005 in Cairo was not the cease-fire agreement but the preparation by Hamas to participate in the Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC) elections. Hamas (and the other opposition movements) had refused to participate in the elections held in 1996 because the elections were based on the OSLO ACCORD, which they rejected out of hand. Hamas had also refused to participate in the election for PNA president in which Abu Mazen was elected.

Hamas, as noted, overwhelmingly won the 26 January 2006 elections for the PLC, offering the first substantive defeat ever to Fatah. Fatah immediately began a sporadic armed campaign to dislodge Hamas and the conflict deteriorated from then on.

Bibliography

- BBC News. “Palestinian Truces: Text of Hamas and Islamic Jihad Declaration of Initiative as Published on the Pro-Hamas Palestinian Information Centre Website.” Document provided by BBC News. 29 June 2003.
- Cairo Declaration. Available at United Nations Information, 2005.
- JMCC. “The Palestinian Factions and the National Dialogue.” Reprinted from Al Ayyam newspaper, 29 January 2003, in Jerusalem Media Communication Center.

- Kristianasen, Wendy. "Palestine: Hamas Besieged." Le Monde diplomatique (French). June 2006.
- Kurz, Anat, and Tal Nahman. Hamas: Radical Islam in a National Struggle. Jerusalem: The Palestinian Centre for Policy and Survey Research, 1997. Reprinted from the Jafee Center for Strategic Studies. Kurz and Tal Memorandum No. 48, July 1997.
- Rubenstein, Danny. "A Turning Point? The National Dialogue between Fatah and Hamas." Strategic Assessment. 8:1 (June 2005).
- System on the Question of Palestine (UNISPAL). <http://domino.un.org/UNISPAL.nsf/1ce874ab1832a53e852570bb006dfaf6/69b9d56df48732c48525708a0053358b!OpenDocument>.
- Usher, Graham. "The Calm before the Storm?" Al-Ahram (Egyptian weekly, English). 735 (24–30 March 2005).

CAMERA/Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

Camp David Accords, 1979

The Camp David Accords were the peace agreements forged during 5–17 September 1978 between Israel and EGYPT at the US presidential retreat at Camp David, Maryland. The negotiations had been catalyzed by Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat in November 1977 when he made a dramatic pilgrimage to JERUSALEM, the first visit by an Arab leader to Israel. After subsequent negotiations between Cairo and Tel Aviv came to an impasse, US president JIMMY CARTER invited the two sides to Camp David, where for thirteen days he mediated between them. The official accords were signed on 26 March 1979 in Washington, D.C., by Israeli prime minister MENAHEM BEGIN and Egyptian president al-Sadat, with Carter as a witness.

The agreement consisted of two documents. The first was a general "Framework for Peace in the Middle East" that was based on a five-year transitional period of self-rule for Palestinians in the WEST BANK and GAZA. This framework was never implemented because it was not legally tied to the bilateral accord between Israel and Egypt; in addition, Begin was opposed to it and Carter ultimately agreed with him. Carter had pressured Begin to bring something demonstrating that the Palestinians were being considered, but Begin only agreed to a vague statement of principles and insisted that there be no legal tie between this document and the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty.

Sadat's failure to demand greater concessions from Israel in recognizing the Palestinians' right to self-determination contributed to his assassination in 1981.

The second document, the "Framework for the Conclusion of a Peace Treaty between Egypt and Israel," was fulfilled. In it, Israel agreed to return the Sinai Peninsula, captured from Egypt in the 1967 WAR. In exchange, Egypt recognized Israel as a sovereign nation-state and agreed to normalize relations with it—the first Arab country to do so. Further, although Israel had to withdraw both its troops and settlers from the Sinai and restore it to Egyptian control, Egypt had to guarantee Israel freedom of passage through the Suez Canal and other nearby waterways (e.g., the Straits of Tiran) and had to accept a restriction on the number of troops it could deploy in the Sinai Peninsula. The two countries exchanged ambassadors and continued to take steps to fulfill their treaty obligations until the final tract of land in the Sinai was returned to Egypt on 25 April 1982. Just over a month later, Israel undertook a war against the Palestinians in LEBANON, confident that Egypt would remain on the sidelines. The Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty, though at times described as a "cold peace," has held firm for twenty-five years without a breach by either side.

Bibliography

- Carter, Jimmy. The Blood of Abraham: Insights into the Middle East. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1985.
- Dayan, Moshe. Breakthrough: A Personal Account of the Egypt-Israel Peace Negotiations. New York: Knopf, 1981.
- Fahmy, Ismail. Negotiating for Peace in the Middle East. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983.
- Quandt, William B. Camp David: Peacemaking and Politics. Washington, DC: The Brookings Institution, 1986.
- Saunders, Harold H. The Other Walls: The Politics of the Arab-Israeli Peace Process. Washington, DC: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy, 1985.
- Shadid, Mohammed K. The United States and the Palestinians. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1981.
- Stein, Kenneth W. Heroic Diplomacy: Sadat, Kissinger, Carter, Begin and the Quest for Arab-Israeli Peace. London: Routledge, 1999.
- Tillman, Seth P. The United States in the Middle East: Interests and Obstacles. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982.
- Tivan, Edward. The Lobby: Jewish Political Power and American Foreign Policy. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Vance, Cyrus. Hard Choices. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1983.

Camp David Summit, 2000

In the context of the OSLO PROCESS, the Camp David Summit was supposed to resolve FINAL STATUS issues, including BORDERS, JERUSALEM, settlement of the REFUGEE issue, and LAND and WATER access, paving the way for the conclusion of a peace treaty between Israel and the Palestinians. The July 2000 summit involved Israeli prime minister EHUD BARAK, PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY president YASIR ARAFAT, and US president BILL CLINTON plus their respective aides. The participants met at the US presidential retreat at Camp David, Maryland. The summit failed to reach an agreement, and the MEDIA blamed the failure entirely on Arafat and misrepresented Israel's position on key issues of the conflict, as BARAK'S GENEROUS OFFER reveals.

President Clinton was partially responsible for the widespread misunderstandings. Immediately after the Camp David Summit, he broke his promise to Arafat that no side would be blamed if the negotiations failed and went on Israeli television declaring that although Barak made bold compromises, Arafat had missed yet another opportunity for peace. However, what Barak offered at Camp David would have meant the following for Palestine: no territorial contiguity for the Palestinian state, no control of its external borders, limited control of its own water resources, and no full Israeli withdrawal from the Occupied Territories as required by UN RESOLUTION 242 and INTERNATIONAL LAW. In addition, the Barak plan called for continued Israeli military control over large segments of the WEST BANK, including almost all of the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY; the right of Israeli forces to be deployed in the Palestinian state at short notice; and the continued presence of fortified Israeli SETTLEMENTS and Jewish-only ROADS. It would also have required nearly 4 million Palestinian refugees from 1948 to relinquish their rights in exchange for compensation to be paid not by Israel but by the international community.

Robert Malley, who was Clinton's special assistant for Arab-Israeli affairs, participated in the Camp David negotiations. In an article entitled "Fictions about the Failure at Camp David" published in the New York Times on 8 July 2001, Malley pointed out that Barak's offer was far from ideal and emphasized that Arafat had made far more concessions than anyone gave him credit for. Malley wrote: "Many have come to believe that the Palestinians' rejection of the Camp David ideas exposed an underlying rejection of Israel's right to exist. But consider the facts: The Palestinians were arguing for the creation of a Palestinian state based on the June 4, 1967, borders, and living alongside Israel. They accepted the notion of Israeli annexation of West Bank territory to accommodate settlement blocs. They accepted the principle of Israeli sovereignty over the Jewish neighborhoods of East Jerusalem—neighborhoods that were not part of Israel before the Six Day War in 1967. And, while they insisted on recognition of the refugees' right of return, they agreed that it should be implemented in a manner that protected Israel's DEMOGRAPHIC and security interests by limiting the number of returnees. No other Arab party that has negotiated with Israel—not Anwar al-Sadat's EGYPT, not King Husayn's JORDAN, let alone Hafez al-Assad's SYRIA—ever came close to even considering such compromises."

See also BARAK'S GENEROUS OFFER; TABA TALKS, 2001

Bibliography

- Abunimah, Ali, and Hussein Ibish. "Debunking 6 Common Israeli Myths." The Electronic Intifada. 14 April 2002.
- Avnery, Uri. Shedding Some Light on Barak's "Generous Offers". Tel Aviv, Israel: Gush Shalom, 2000.
- Barak, Ehud. "Building a Wall against Terror." New York Times. 24 May 2001.
- Baskin, Gershon. Negotiating the Settlements: The Success of Right-Wing Political Entrapment against Peace. Jerusalem: Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information, 2000.
- . What Went Wrong: Oslo—The PLO, Israel, and Some Additional Facts. Jerusalem: Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information, 2001.
- Benn, Aluf. "The Selling of the Summit." Ha'aretz. 27 July 2001.
- Benvenisti, Meron. "Oslo—Without Illusions." Ha'aretz. 8 March 2001.
- Finkelstein, Norman G. "The Camp David II Negotiations: How Dennis Ross Proved the Palestinians Aborted the Peace Process." Journal of Palestine Studies. 36:2 (2007).
- Fisk, Robert. "Sham Summit Promised Little for Palestinians." The Independent (UK). 29 December 2000.
- Gresh, Alain. "The Middle East: How the Peace Was Lost." Translated by Wendy Kristianasen. Le Monde diplomatique. 1 September 2001.
- . The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.

- Hanieh, Akram. "The Camp David Papers: A Special Document File." Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:2 (2000).
- Malley, Robert. "Fictions about the Failure at Camp David." New York Times. 8 July 2001.
- Malley, Robert, and Hussein Agha. "Camp David: The Tragedy of Errors." New York Review of Books. 9 August 2001.
- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Pundak, Ron. "From Oslo to Taba: What Went Wrong." Survival. 43:3 (2001).
- Slater, Jerome. "Israel, Anti-Semitism and the Palestinian Problem." Tikkun: A Bimonthly Jewish Critique of Politics, Culture, and Society. May–June 2001.

Camps' War, 1985–1987

The Camps' War, or War of the Camps, was a series of clashes between the Palestinian REFUGEES in LEBANON and the Shi'ia Amal militia backed by SYRIA in the mid-1980s. After YASIR ARAFAT and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) withdrew from Beirut and Tripoli, the Palestinian refugee camps were extremely vulnerable. The Camps' War claimed more than 2,500 Palestinian lives. The camps themselves were devastated, and thousands of refugees fled the fighting to seek uncertain refuge in the coastal strip north of Sidon.

Background

In the wake of the creation of Israel in 1948, tens of thousands of Palestinians became refugees in southern Lebanon. Palestinians with skills and capital were allowed to reside in cities and live dignified lives; however, the majority, who could only offer their unskilled workforce to the Lebanese economy, were kept in squalid refugee camps, prohibited from working or attaining education in Lebanon, and suffered intense repression from the Maronite-dominated Lebanese government.

Following the establishment of the PLO in Lebanon, it created a series of social institutions—health care (the Red Crescent); employment (SAMED); welfare, arts, and culture organizations; and unions—to meet the needs of the Palestinians in the camps. The PLO extended these services, and protection from the government, to the impoverished, oppressed Shi'a population of southern Lebanon. Thus, for many years the Lebanese Shi'a were allies of the PLO. The PLO also formed militias in Lebanon who undertook guerrilla operations against Israel. Israel responded with massive retali-tions wherein whole villages were laid waste and many were killed. The Shi'a eventually created their own political movements, Amal and later Hizbullah, and turned against the PLO.

By the time of Israel's LEBANON WAR in 1982, relations between Amal and the Palestinians had deteriorated significantly. As a result of this war, most of the PLO was driven out of Lebanon, but gradually, by the spring of 1985, PLO fighters had filtered back in, and Palestinian militias in the Sidon area were strong enough to repel attacks by the Lebanese Christian Phalange and South Lebanese Army (SLA) against the al-Miya wa-Miya and 'Ayn al-Hilwa refugee camps.

Such developments were viewed with concern by Syria and by the Phalange and its forces in Lebanon. Even more strongly opposed was the Shi'a party militia, Amal. Amal's hostility toward the Palestinians stemmed from prior Shi'a-PLO conflict and was reinforced by fears that a resurgent Palestinian presence would threaten the powerful political position that Amal had established for itself in post-1982 Lebanon.

Rex Brynen has provided an insightful analysis of the Camps' War. He relates that the first round of the conflict began on 19 May 1985, with an incident between Palestinians in the Sabra refugee camp in Beirut and Amal militiamen. Heavy fighting quickly erupted between the approximately one thousand armed Palestinians in the Sabra, Shatila, and Burj al-Barajne refugee camps and Amal's more than three thousand fighters, the latter supported by over a thousand soldiers of the (predominately Shi'a) Sixth Brigade of the Lebanese army and even some units of the (predominately Christian) Eighth Brigade stationed in East Beirut.

On 30 May, Sabra fell to its attackers. Amid Arab and SOVIET political pressures on Syria and the scheduling of an emergency meeting of ARAB LEAGUE foreign ministers to discuss the issue; Amal declared a unilateral cease-fire the next day. The fighting had claimed more than six hundred dead and two thousand wounded. A cease-fire agreement was signed by Amal and representatives of the PALESTINE NATIONAL SALVATION FRONT (PNSF) in Damascus on 17 June.

Despite the Damascus agreement, small-scale fighting continued for weeks. In Shatila, Palestinian defenders retained control of a small area around the camp's mosque, despite repeated efforts to dislodge them. Burj al-Barajne was not penetrated at all, but nevertheless remained under siege as Amal prevented supplies from entering or its population from leaving.

Under the terms of the Damascus agreement, Amal and its Syrian sponsor were politically and militarily rebuffed. Amal was forced to retreat, having gained only the promise that the Palestinians would surrender nonexistent medium and heavy weapons and allow an ineffectual Lebanese police presence in the camps.

Yet the tensions that had sparked the Camps' War had not been resolved, and fighting erupted again. In Sidon, Palestinian reorganization attracted stern warnings from Amal. Clashes between Amal and Palestinians in the camps erupted in Beirut briefly in September, and again in late March 1986, then on 19 May 1986 a second major round of fighting began. Once again Amal was unable to penetrate the camps, despite a supply of T-54 tanks provided by Damascus. After the failure of more than a dozen cease-fires, the fighting finally died down with the deployment of Lebanese army units and Syrian military observers around the Beirut camps on 24 June 1986.

This set the stage for the third and most severe round of the Camps' War. It began with an incident on 29 September 1986 at the Rashidiyya refugee camp on the outskirts of Tyre in which Palestinians allegedly fired on an Amal patrol. Amal immediately surrounded the camp, demanding the surrender of all arms. The demand was refused. By late October, the fighting had spread to Sidon and Beirut. In an effort to relieve pressure on Rashidiyya, Palestinian forces in Sidon broke through Amal lines on 24 November and seized the strategic hilltop village of Maghdusha, overlooking the coastal highway south of the city. As Amal's military weaknesses became evident, Syrian Special Forces reportedly lent support in the battle for Shatila. At Sidon, Israel launched multiple airstrikes against Palestinian positions around the city.

As before, the clashes led to an emergency session of Arab League foreign ministers and diplomatic intervention to halt the fighting. Iranian mediation secured a partially effective ceasefire between Amal and the PNSF on 15 December 1986. Pro-Syrian groups withdrew from around Maghdusha, but remained elsewhere in a status quo ante.

Some of these positions were subsequently vacated to Hizbullah in January, and some supplies were allowed into the beleaguered camps. But for the most part the sieges continued, and new fighting soon erupted. In Beirut, the shelling of the camps was compounded by a blockade of food and medical supplies that resulted in sickness, starvation, and death for thousands of trapped residents.

Finally, on 21 February 1987 the first of seven thousand Syrian troops were deployed in West Beirut to maintain order. On 7 April, following an agreement with the PNSF, Amal lifted the siege as Syrian forces took up positions around the camps. That same month, negotiations between Amal and the PNSF began, eventually achieving a cease-fire in the south.

See also AMAL; LEBANON WAR

Bibliography

- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1990.
- Fisk, Robert. Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon, 4th ed. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press/Nation Books, 2002.
- Johnson, Michael. All Honorable Men: The Social Origins of War in Lebanon. London: I. B. Tauris in association with the Centre of Lebanese Studies, 2002.
- Norton, Augustus Richard. Amal and the Shi'a: Struggle for the Soul of Lebanon. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1987.
- Peteet, Julie. Landscape of Hope and Despair: Palestinian Refugee Camps: The Ethnography of Political Violence. College Station: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. "Lebanon's Protracted Conflict: Causes and Consequences." In Conflict, Migration, and the Expression of Ethnicity. Edited by Nancie L. Gonzalez and Carolyn S. McCommon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1989.
- . "Palestinians in Lebanon: A Question of Human and Civil Rights." Arab Studies Quarterly. 6:3 (Summer 1984).
- Sayigh, Rosemary. Too Many Enemies: The Palestinians in Lebanon. London: Zed Books, 1994.
- Shaery-Eisenlohr, Roschanack. Shi'ite Lebanon: Transnational Religion and the Making of National Identities. New York: Columbia University Press, 2008.
- Winslow, Charles. Lebanon: War and Politics in a Fragmented Society. London: Routledge, 1996.

Cantons

See BANTUSTANS

Al-Carmel

Al-Carmel was an influential Palestinian newspaper that was established in HAIFA in 1908 by Christian publisher Najib Nassar (1865–1947). The newspaper reflected the politicization of Palestinians at a very early period. Regarding the Paris Peace Conference, an editorial in al-Carmel questioned: “Should we allow the Zionists to revive their nationalism at the expense of our nationalism? Have we agreed upon selling them our LAND piece by piece until they expel us from our land in groups and on an individual basis?” Another editorial called on the OTTOMAN authorities to “fulfill their obligation and not allow Jewish immigrants to remain in the country.” Al-Carmel was a consistent voice in opposing Zionist land purchases and IMMIGRATION. Although other Palestinian newspapers followed, al-Carmel remains unique for its vision regarding the fate of Palestine.

Bibliography

- Khalidi, Rashid. Palestinian Identity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Shomali, Qustandi. The Arab Press in Palestine: Al-Carmel Newspaper 1908–1942. Jerusalem: al-Lika’ Center, 1996.

Carter, James (Jimmy) Earl, Jr. (1924–)

James “Jimmy” Carter was the thirty-ninth president of the UNITED STATES, serving from 1977 to 1981. Much of his foreign policy was focused on peacemaking in the Middle East. Although he was deeply committed emotionally and politically to Israel, he was the first president to directly address the Palestinian issue. There was however, much ambiguity in the president’s approach to the Palestinians and in his foreign policy in general. Examples include the contradictory principles of “human rights” and the “Carter Doctrine” as well as Carter’s transition from working closely with the SOVIET UNION, especially on the Middle East, to abandoning the policy of détente. The Carter Doctrine was expressed in his 23 January 1980 state of the union address, in which he declared, in response to Moscow’s invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, that the United States would use military force if necessary to defend its national interests in the Persian Gulf region. The ambiguity in Carter’s policies was partly due to the fact that his two top foreign policy advisers—Secretary of State CYRUS VANCE and National Security Council Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski—held completely different worldviews.

Yet, as Kathleen Christson observed, Jimmy Carter changed the vocabulary of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in the United States and to a great extent changed the frame of reference for the Palestinian issue. By broaching the notion of giving the Palestinians a homeland, by trying to deal with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), by recognizing the Palestinians as a critical factor in any peace settlement, and by attempting to involve them in the peace process, Carter overturned assumptions and misconceptions that had been in place for decades about the Palestinians’ insignificance and in a real sense took US policy out of the old constricting framework around thinking on the Palestinian problem. Carter was a rarity among US presidents in dealing with the Arab-Israeli problem. More than any president before or since, he made an imaginative, good-faith effort to involve the Palestinians in negotiations throughout 1977, confronting Israel’s objections, trying to face down opposition from within the United States, attempting different alternatives and new ideas when initial proposals were rejected, and persisting even when obstacles loomed.

He was ultimately defeated, however, by the persistence of a frame of reference that continued, despite his serious efforts to alter it, to center on Israel and Israel’s concerns and to ignore or consciously discard the Palestinian perspective. Although he successfully negotiated an Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty, electoral politics ultimately undermined Carter’s attempts to bring the Palestinians into the process of a peace settlement. No US president except Dwight Eisenhower has won an election while putting heavy pressure on Israel, and Carter, already in political trouble and losing popularity for a variety of other reasons, simply did not in the second half of his one-term presidency have the political capital to expend on a serious effort to oppose Israel’s desire to keep the Palestinians out of peace talks. In the end, Carter’s efforts to begin a serious peace process that would involve the Palestinians fell victim to an enduring frame of reference that held Israel’s concerns to be paramount and the Palestinian perspective to be unimportant or even pernicious.

President Carter assumed office with several ideas that differed from those of his predecessors. He was committed to an active US policy to break the deadlock in the Arab-Israeli conflict, forthrightly addressed the need for a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace, and undertook specific steps to reconvene the GENEVA CONFERENCE, which was an attempt, based on UNSC Resolution 242, to bring Israel and the Arab states into negotiations to find a peaceful solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Carter spoke of three main requirements for Middle East peace. First, peace should entail the normalization of relations—for example, exchange of ambassadors, trade, open borders, tourism, and regional economic cooperation. But he was sensitive to the Israeli position that there was an inherent unfairness in Israel having to give up territory in exchange for peace (even though the territory had belonged to Arab states). Second, Carter believed in the need for recognized BORDERS and arrangements for security that would go beyond borders. For this reason, the president was committed to meeting Israel's concerns about security by placing heavy emphasis on technical arrangements, such as measures to ensure that no state violated the peace. Carter was also prepared to bolster Israel's security up to and including a US-Israel defense pact as part of an overall settlement. Third, Carter took the lead in articulating a new position for the United States on the Palestinian question, calling for a homeland for the Palestinians. He was, however, vague and ambiguous about what this meant, and he never spoke of Palestinian self-determination or of an independent Palestinian state. Moreover, he felt that the homeland concept was tied to the Palestinian REFUGEE issue.

When Carter publicly articulated his thoughts on a Palestinian homeland on 17 March 1977, Israel and its domestic supporters immediately condemned the president. Consequently, he qualified his comments: "The exact definition of what that homeland might be, the degree of independence of the Palestinian entity, its relations with JORDAN, or perhaps SYRIA or others, the geographical boundaries of it, all have to be worked out by the parties involved." In other words, rather than supporting Palestinian self-determination, Carter subscribed to some form of "autonomy" for the Palestinians under one or another foreign domination. Still, Israel and its domestic friends were not mollified and barraged the president with visits, letters, and phone calls.

On 1 October 1977 President Carter and the Soviet premier issued a joint Soviet-US statement on the Middle East outlining a comprehensive settlement. The communiqué called for (1) Israel's withdrawal from occupied Arab lands; (2) resolution of the Palestinian question, including ensuring the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people; (3) termination of the state of war between Israel and the Arabs with the establishment of normal, peaceful relations among the countries on the basis of mutual recognition, sovereignty, territorial integrity, and political independence; and (4) international guarantees (in which both the Soviet Union and the United States would participate) to ensure compliance with the terms of the settlement. The statement was also significant for what it did not say: it did not call for direct PLO participation in the talks at Geneva, it did not mention a Palestinian state, and Israel was not asked to return to its 1967 borders or to abandon East JERUSALEM.

Israel reacted vehemently and negatively, rejecting the Soviet-US statement "with both hands" because it was "the first step toward an imposed solution" and "indicated American willingness to have the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) participate in the Geneva Conference." Even Israel's LABOR PARTY fully supported the LIKUD, which was then in power, on this position. The Israelis were particularly upset because of the absence of any specific reference to UN RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338: "We hang on to those with all our strength because they say nothing about the Palestinians." (This rarely mentioned aspect of Resolution 242 explains why the PLO, despite intense US pressure, declined to accept the resolutions until 1988.) Opposition to the joint Soviet-US initiative was also intense from domestic Jewish groups. For example, the chairman of the CONFERENCE OF PRESIDENTS OF MAJOR AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS declared that the statement "on its face, represents an abandonment of America's historic commitment to the security and survival of Israel."

Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN dispatched Foreign Minister MOSHE DAYAN to the United States to inform the president personally of Israel's objections. The two men met in a New York hotel room on 4 October, and after a lengthy session Carter agreed to the series of proposals presented by Dayan, including a specific promise never to use military or economic sanctions to pressure Israel to make concessions on any issue. William Quandt, an adviser to Carter, wrote that Dayan had great leverage in these negotiations because the president approached Dayan from the perspective of seeking help on Carter's domestic problems with American Jews. At the end of their session, Carter and Dayan issued a joint Israeli-US statement in which all of Israel's main interests and policies were incorporated. On 28 October 1977, the United States abstained from a vote in the General Assembly condemning Israel's drive to build Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the Occupied Territories; 131 countries voted in favor of the resolution.

After Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat's pilgrimage to Israel in November 1977, President Carter became intensely engaged in the bilateral Israeli-Egyptian peace process, virtually to the exclusion of other aspects of the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli conflict. From 5 September to 17 September 1978, Carter's involvement culminated with the president inviting Begin and al-Sadat to the presidential retreat at CAMP DAVID, where the three heads of state spent thirteen grueling days before agreeing to two accords. During these talks, Carter abandoned all his previously articulated principles on the Palestinians. Instead of one accord, he agreed with Begin to have two accords and to have no binding connection between them. The accord that was supposed to protect Palestinian national interests afforded nothing more than "limited autonomy" for the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. After the talks Begin broke his explicit promises to Carter and presided over a massive expansion of the settlement project in the Occupied Territories. Instead of penalizing the Israeli president, Carter oversaw an enormous increase in aid to Israel from $1.7 billion in 1977 to $4.8 billion in 1979.

In March 1978, six months prior to the Camp David Summit but in the midst of Egyptian-Israeli negotiations, Israel invaded LEBANON and established a "security zone" deep along the southern border. During the operation, President Carter sent Begin a message asking that Israel discontinue its advance, pull back its army behind the frontier, and permit a UN force to be posted in southern Lebanon. Additionally, the United States convened the Security Council and introduced Resolution 425, which was adopted. It called for a cease-fire in Lebanon, withdrawal of forces, and the establishment of the UN Interim Force. Begin responded by ordering the campaign expanded. Israel finally accepted Resolution 425 on 23 March but did not withdraw its troops until 13 June, after it had established a proxy army to control the south. Nevertheless, while Israeli troops remained in Lebanon, Carter gave Begin a warm welcome in Washington on 21 March and again on 1 May. On 31 May 1978, in a press conference, Carter stated that the United States had never been in favor of a Palestinian state, which it saw as a "destabilizing factor."

After leaving office, Carter remained involved in international affairs. In 1982 he became university distinguished professor at Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia, and founded, and actively guides, the Carter Center there, which addresses national and international issues of public policy. Carter has remained particularly interested in Middle East affairs, especially the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In March 2006 he gave a speech at the Council on Foreign Relations in which he assessed the situation between Israel and the Palestinians. The following are some of his comments: "The three most basic premises [for peace] are quite clear and simple. First, Israel's right to exist and to live in peace must be recognized and accepted by Palestinians and all other neighbors. Second, the killing of innocent people by SUICIDE BOMBS or other acts of violence cannot be condoned. And third, Palestinians must live in peace and dignity, and permanent Israeli settlements on their land are a major obstacle to this goal. . . . The PLO accepted the ROAD MAP, and Israel also announced its acceptance, but with 14 caveats and prerequisites, some of which preclude final peace talks. . . . What, then, are the impediments to future progress? . . . in the last few years—the last five years—Israel's rejection of any substantive talks with Palestinian leaders. . . . With tension rising, the occupying forces have become increasingly oppressive in order to retain control over the Palestinians, who are deprived of basic human rights, militarily, politically and economically. This is obvious to anyone who visits Palestine."

Subsequently, the former president published Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, a book that is deeply critical of Israel and for which Carter was vilified by the MEDIA, pro-Israel groups, and the US Congress. Henry Siegman, former executive director of the AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS, wrote, "Since the appearance of the book coincided with the recent Congressional elections, leaders of the Democratic Party went into near panic and fell over one another disassociating themselves from Carter's book, and his criticisms of certain Israeli policies. Indeed, the panic was so intense that so independent-minded a man as Howard Dean, chair of the party, who in the past has had the courage to challenge the conventional wisdom of the party's establishment on a whole range of issues, joined the herd as well."

See also CAMP DAVID ACCORDS; MOSHE DAYAN; CYRUS VANCE

Bibliography

- Carter, Jimmy. The Blood of Abraham: Insights into the Middle East. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1985.
- . Keeping Faith: Memoirs of a President. Toronto: Bantam Books, 1982.
- . Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2006.
- . Sources of Strength: Meditations on Scripture for a Living Faith. Colorado Springs, CO: WaterBrook Press, 2000.
- . We Can Have Peace in the Holy Land: A Plan That Will Work. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2009.
- Christison, Kathleen. Perceptions of Palestine: Their Influence on U.S. Middle East Policy. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.
- Council on Foreign Relations. "Peace versus Democracy in Palestine: A Conversation with Jimmy Carter." 2 March 2006. www.cfr.org/publication/10024.
- Dayan, Moshe. Breakthrough: A Personal Account of the Egypt-Israel Peace Negotiations. New York: Knopf, 1981.
- Fahmy, Ismail. Negotiating for Peace in the Middle East. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983.
- Al-Hassan, Hani. "The PLO on Camp David: The Plan Is to Liquidate the Palestinians Politically." MERIP Reports. 72 (November 1978).
- Laqueur, Walter, and Barry Rubin, eds. The Israel-Arab Reader. New York: Penguin Books, 2001.
- MERIP Reports*. "PLO Rejects U.S. Attempt to Finesse Question of Participation in Peace Talks." No. 60 (September 1977).
- Quandt, William B. Camp David: Peacemaking and Politics. Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1986.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Sayegh, Fayez A. "The Camp David Agreement and the Palestine Problem." Journal of Palestine Studies. 8:2 (1979).
- Shadid, Mohammed K. The United States and the Palestinians. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1981.
- Siegmán, Henry. "Hurricane Carter." The Nation. 22 January 2007.
- Stork, Joe. "Sadat's Desperate Mission." MERIP Reports. 64 (February 1978).
- Terry, Janice J. "The Carter Administration and the Palestinians." In U.S. Policy on Palestine from Wilson to Clinton. Edited by Michael W. Suleiman. Normal, IL: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1995.
- Tillman, Seth P. The United States in the Middle East: Interests and Obstacles. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982.

Tivan, Edward. The Lobby: Jewish Political Power and American Foreign Policy. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Vance, Cyrus. Hard Choices. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1983.

Cattan, Henry (1906–1992)

Henry Cattan was a renowned international jurist, a prolific writer, and an advocate for the Palestinians. Born in JERUSALEM, he received a law degree from the University of Paris and a master of law degree from the University of London. During the BRITISH MANDATE, he practiced law in Palestine and taught at the Government Law School in Jerusalem from 1932 to 1942. Cattan served on the third ARAB HIGHER COMMITTEE (AHC), and in 1947 he represented the AHC before the UN General Assembly. The ARAB LEAGUE appointed Cattan to represent the Palestinian Arabs during discussions with COUNT FOLKE BERNADOTTE, the UN mediator on Palestine. In 1948, the Israeli OCCUPATION of West Jerusalem forced him into exile, first to Damascus, later to Beirut, and finally to Paris. While in exile he authored several books, including Jerusalem; The Garden of Joys: An Anthology of Oriental Anecdotes, Fables and Proverbs; Palestine, the Arabs and Israel; and The Palestine Question, among others. He died in Paris.

Bibliography

- Mathews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1997.

Cave of Machpelah

The Cave of Machpelah is considered by Jews to be the spiritual center of the ancient city of HEBRON. It is known by Muslims as al-Haram al-Ibrahimi, the Abraham Sanctuary, or AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE. According to Jewish tradition, its hidden twin caves are believed to be the burial place of three pairs of important biblical couples: Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, and Jacob and Leah (and thus is also called the Cave of the Double Caves [or tombs]). Because both Jews and Muslims consider Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as patriarchs of their respective religions, this site is revered equally by Jews and Muslims and has been a place of almost continuous conflict, especially since 1967.

The sanctuary Ma'arat Hamachpelah inside the cave is dedicated to Abraham, the most important of the patriarchs in both religions. The history of the Cave of Machpelah also has a special importance because the site is believed to be the first piece of land bought by Abraham in the Promised Land, as well as his burial place. In addition to believing in Abraham and his sons' connection to the site, Muslims believe it was visited by the Prophet Muhammad on his night flight from Mecca to JERUSALEM.

After the Islamic conquest in the seventh century, the site was under the control of the Islamic Waqf (religious trust). During the Crusades, when Christians had control of the site, it was made into a church, and the large structure over the cave today dates to that period. For seven centuries, access to the cave was restricted to Muslim worshippers only; Jewish pilgrims were allowed to pray at a special location outside the building. During the 1967 WAR, on the same day that Israeli troops entered Hebron, the chaplain of the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) placed a Torah scroll inside the al-Ibrahimi Mosque. This initiative made it possible for Jews to hold prayers and religious services in various parts of the sanctuary, sometimes at the same time and place as Muslims. The move created great indignation among Muslims and their clergymen, who argued that the installation of a synagogue inside the sanctuary challenged the Muslim character of the site.

The al-Ibrahimi Mosque/Cave of Machpelah and the surrounding city of Hebron have been continuous flashpoints of Jewish-Muslim conflict. Israel's 1967 capture of the site led to other provocations, including Jewish SETTLEMENT around the site, conflicts over where and when the two groups would pray that were consistently resolved to favor Jewish worship, the 1994 massacre of twenty-nine Muslims at prayer by extremist settler BARUCH GOLDSTEIN, and others. Although the WYE RIVER Accords provided a temporary status agreement for the site and for Hebron itself, since the eruption of the 2000 AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the IDF has surrounded the site with soldiers and forbids Muslims from entering the area.

See also GUSH EMUNIM; HEBRON AND JEWISH SETTLEMENTS; HEBRON MASSACRE; AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE

Bibliography

Armstrong, Karen. Jerusalem: One City, Three Faiths. New York: Knopf, 1996.

Vilnay, Zev. Legends of Palestine. New York: The Jewish Publication Society of America, 1932.

Center for Architectural Conservation

See CENTRE FOR ARCHITECTURAL CONSERVATION

Center for Security Policy

The Center for Security Policy (CSP) is an American neoconservative think tank with close ties to Israel and to the right wing of the Republican Party. The CSP, together with other neoconservative pro-Israel think tanks, such as the WASHINGTON INSTITUTE FOR NEAR EAST POLICY, the JEWISH INSTITUTE FOR NATIONAL SECURITY AFFAIRS, and the Project for a New American Century, has had a profound impact on US foreign policy during the ten years between 1997 and 2007, especially on the Middle East and the Israel-Palestine conflict. The CSP advocates a stronger US military and further development of nuclear and space weaponry; warmly supports Israel, especially the LIKUD; and advocates closer military and national security ties between the UNITED STATES and Israel. The CSP is highly critical of the UNITED NATIONS, nonproliferation treaties, peace organizations, and anything it deems to be an impediment to US global hegemony and Israel's interests.

The CSP accomplishes its goals by influencing national and international policy debates that bear upon the security of the United States and Israel. The center specializes in the rapid preparation and real-time dissemination of information, analyses, and policy recommendations via e-mail distribution, computerized fax, its website, published articles, and the electronic media. The principal audience for such materials is the US security policymaking community (the executive and legislative branches, the armed forces, and appropriate independent agencies), corresponding organizations in key foreign governments, the MEDIA (domestic and international), the global business and financial community, and interested individuals in the public at large. (www.centerforsecuritypolicy.org).

See also AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS

Bibliography

Eisendrath, Craig R., and Melvin A. Goodman. Bush League Diplomacy: How the Neoconservatives Are Putting the World at Risk. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2004.

Halper, Stefan, and Jonathan Clarke. America Alone: The Neo-Conservatives and the Global Order. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

Sniegoski, Stephen J. The Transparent Cabal: The Neo-conservative Agenda, War in the Middle East, and the National Interest of Israel. Norfolk, VA: IHS Press, 2008.

Center of Life Policy

The Center of Life Policy, sometimes called the “Quiet Deportation,” was one of many methods used by Israel to attain its DEMOGRAPHIC objective of reducing the number of Palestinians living in JERUSALEM. The policy was instituted by the Interior Ministry in 1995 in the context of the OSLO PROCESS, and deals with the residency status of East Jerusalem’s Palestinian residents. According to B’Tselem, an Israeli human rights organization, between December 1995 and December 2004, Israel revoked the residency rights of 3,606 Palestinians from East Jerusalem.

The Interior Ministry revoked the residency of those who had moved outside Jerusalem’s municipal borders and of Palestinians who were unable to prove that they had lived in Jerusalem in the past. Thus, every Palestinian who lived outside Jerusalem for a number of years lost the right to live in the city. The Israeli authorities never announced this policy and never warned the Palestinians that by leaving Jerusalem they jeopardized their status and right to return. Under the new policy, the ministry requested proof, including numerous documents, that the individual’s “center of life” was in Jerusalem. In explaining the policy change, the Interior Ministry said that permanent residency, unlike citizenship, is a matter of individual circumstances, and when these circumstances change, the PERMIT granting permanent residency expires.

Prior to 1995, the policies of the Israeli government and the Jerusalem municipality in a variety of spheres led thousands of Palestinians to leave the city, many to reside in Jerusalem’s suburbs and others in the WEST BANK and JORDAN. Until this time, moving outside the city limits did not affect their status as permanent residents in Jerusalem, as long as they returned to Jerusalem to renew their exit permits at the Interior Ministry. Only a continued stay of more than seven years outside Jerusalem without having renewed the permits was liable to lead to revocation of residency status. Palestinians who moved to Jerusalem’s suburbs or elsewhere in the West Bank did not require exit permits and could live there for years without having their status affected.

In March 2000, Minister of the Interior NATAN SHARANSKY submitted an affidavit to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT of Justice stating that the Center of Life Policy would cease. He indicated that the ministry would operate according to the pre-December 1995 policy and that residency would be returned to those whose status had been revoked, provided that they lived in Jerusalem for at least two years. The rate of revocation of permanent residency permits for Palestinians declined following Sharansky’s announcement. In a clarification of the terms of the new policy before the Israeli High Court of Justice, Sharansky stated that Palestinian Jerusalemites living abroad would not lose their permanent residency if they visited Israel at least once every three years and maintained valid Israeli-issued travel documents. Palestinians who acquired foreign nationality or permanent residency status in other nations continued to lose their Jerusalem residency rights.

See also FAMILY REUNIFICATION; NATIONAL INSURANCE INSTITUTE

Bibliography

- B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). “Revocation of Residency in East Jerusalem.” 2004. www.btselem.org/english/jerusalem/revocation\_statistics.asp.
- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Halabi, Usama. “Revoking Permanent Residency: A Legal Review of Israeli Policy.” Jerusalem Quarterly File (Palestinian journal in English). 9 (2000).
- Human Rights Watch. “Israel, the Occupied West Bank, Gaza Strip, and Palestinian Authority Territories.” In World Report 2001. New York: Human Rights Watch, 2001.
- Kadman, Noga, et al. Families Torn Apart: Separation of Palestinian Families in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: HaMoked (Center for the Defense of the Individual) and B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1999.
- Rouhana, Kate B. The Reality of Jerusalem’s Palestinians Today. Jerusalem: Jerusalem Media and Communication Center, 2001.
- Stein, Yael. The Quiet Deportation: Revocation of Residency and Denial of Social Rights of East Jerusalem Palestinians. Jerusalem: B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) and HaMoked (Center for the Defense of the Individual), 1998.

———. The Quiet Deportation: Revocation of Residency of East Jerusalem Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israel Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) and HaMoked (Center for the Defense of the Individual), 1997.

Tsemel, Lea, et al. The Trap Is Closing on Palestinian Jerusalemites: Israel's Demographic Policies in East Jerusalem from the 1967 Annexation to the Eve of the Final Status Negotiations (1996). Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 1996.

Tsemel, Lea, and Ingrid Jaradat Gassner. The Trap Is Closing on Palestinian Jerusalemites. Memorandum No. 1/96. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 1996.

Central Intelligence Agency

The US Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) has a long history of involvement with both Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). This involvement deepened considerably with the 1998 WYE RIVER MEMORANDUM and then in June 2001, when CIA director GEORGE TENET proposed the Tenet Plan for an Israeli-Palestinian cease-fire and security arrangements.

The agency's ties with the Israeli intelligence agency MOSSAD date as far back as 1951. In 1964 both agencies began monitoring the PLO and worked clandestinely to recruit Palestinian agents to spy for their respective causes. The first US contacts with the PLO began in late 1969, when the CIA spotted a promising potential recruit in the FATAH organization named 'ALI HASAN SALAMAH. A CIA case officer in Beirut, Robert Ames, made contact through a Lebanese intermediary, and a brief exchange of information followed. The White House approved the opening, as did then head of the PLO YASIR ARAFAT, who hoped to establish a channel to the Americans. Then, in November 1974, a secret understanding between Arafat's man Salamah and the CIA was reached in a meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria at the time of Arafat's visit to the UNITED NATIONS. The understanding amounted to a mutual nonaggression pact between the UNITED STATES and the PLO. During the 1975–1976 Lebanese Civil War, the liaison deepened when Arafat's operatives provided security for US diplomats in West Beirut. Senior US intelligence officials have stated that the Palestinian link helped save many dozens of US lives in the mid-1970s.

When Israel invaded LEBANON in 1982, Ames was instrumental in formulating the REAGAN PLAN, which called for autonomy for the Palestinian inhabitants of the WEST BANK and GAZA in some sort of informal agreement with JORDAN. Although the Reagan Plan foundered, the United States brokered a deal that enabled the PLO to evacuate Lebanon in safety, away from Israeli fire. CIA contacts with the PLO were downgraded thereafter by the REAGAN administration and remained frozen during the GEORGE H. W. BUSH administration, but they were revived and expanded by the CLINTON administration shortly after the Israelis and Palestinians signed the OSLO ACCORDS in 1993.

In 1993, in a highly unusual mission, the CIA established an office in Tel Aviv to facilitate security cooperation between the United States and Israel. This role was expanded and formalized during peace negotiations in 1998 at the Wye Plantation in Maryland at the behest of US national security adviser Sandy Berger and DENNIS ROSS, the senior US negotiator in the Middle East. When Israeli prime minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU refused to cede more territory without a mechanism for ensuring a Palestinian crackdown on "TERRORISTS," CIA director George Tenet offered to have his agents monitor Arafat's security effort. Netanyahu bristled, but Arafat embraced the idea, knowing that the CIA had been a reliable partner with the PLO in the past and welcoming third-party involvement in the peace process.

The October 1998 Wye Memorandum, which required Israel to exchange territory for tougher action by the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) to prevent attacks against Israel, outlined a central role for the CIA (without mentioning it by name) in monitoring both sides' compliance with the agreement. However, many considered this role as uncharted and potentially dangerous waters for the CIA.

In the subsequent two years, agents under the command of the Tel Aviv CIA station chief actively monitored Arafat's security efforts, oversaw Israeli and Palestinian troop deployments, verified reductions in the size of the Palestinian police force, kept track of Palestinian efforts to arrest suspected militants, and sought to ensure that alleged militants were not hired as Palestinian security officers. In addition, CIA officials stationed in Tel Aviv met regularly with Israeli and PNA representatives to resolve disputes, help manage border CHECKPOINTS, and review other security matters. Formal biweekly meetings were held to review steps taken by the PNA to eliminate HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD cells and support structures. These tasks involved close CIA coordination with the Palestinian General Intelligence (Mukhabbarat al-Amma) and the Preventive Security Service, as well as with various Israeli intelligence departments (Mossad, SHIN BET, Aman).

In January 2001, in the context of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the role of the CIA in assessing and mediating security matters between Israel and the PNA was considered by proponents as more integral than ever to any future for the peace process. The June Tenet Plan supposedly reaffirmed Israel's and the PNA's commitment to the security agreements forged at SHARM AL-SHAYKH in October 2000 and was embedded in the MITCHELL Report of April 2001; however, the plan was primarily a list of security measures each side should take to halt violence so that talks could proceed. In any case, it brought the CIA even deeper into the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Despite the strong military, security, political, economic, and emotional ties between the United States and Israel, the CIA gained considerable trust on the Palestinian side because of the relatively close personal friendship between Tenet and Arafat and because of US efforts to strengthen PLO/PNA intelligence in key areas, such as infiltration of militant groups, clandestine communication, interrogation methods, computer technology, and intelligence processing. The CIA policy of "observing" the interrogations of suspected militants brought strong criticism from Palestinian human rights advocates, who argued that the agency was tacitly supporting the PNA's use of TORTURE, prolonged detention without trial, and other human rights abuses.

See also MOSSAD; 'ALI HASAN SALAMEH; SHIN BET

Bibliography

- Central Intelligence Agency. www.cia.gov/cia/information/info.html.
- Duffy, Brian, and Bruce B. Auster. "In from the Cold: The CIA's New Role." U.S. News & World Report. 2 November 1998.
- "Editorial: New Mission for the CIA." Washington Post. 27 October 1998.
- "Editorial: Spies for Peace." New York Times. 28 October 1998.
- Feldman, Shai. "Israel and the Cut-Off Treaty." Strategic Assessment (Tel Aviv). 1:4 (1999).
- Gates, Robert M. "The C.I.A.'s Little-Known Résumé." New York Times. 29 October 1998.

- Gertz, Bill. "CIA's Mideast Mission 'to Act as Bridge' between the Two Sides." Washington Times National Weekly Edition. 2–8 November 1998.
- Ignatius, David. "Secret Strategies." Washington Post. 12 November 2004.
- Klovens, Dean. "The CIA's Role in the Peace Process." Middle East Intelligence Bulletin. 3:1 (January 2001).
- Pincus, Walter. "Tenet Stresses CIA Will Be Intermediary, Not Enforcer." Washington Post. 27 October 1998.
- Pincus, Walter, and Barton Gellman. "Tenet Said He Might Quit over Pollard Release." Washington Post. 11 November 1998.
- Posner, Steve. "The Spy at Wye." Washington Post. 27 October 1998.
- Risen, James, and Steve Erlanger. "C.I.A. Chief Vowed to Quit If Clinton Freed Israeli Spy." New York Times. 11 November 1998.
- Seigle, Greg. "CIA Too Involved in Palestinian Peace Accord?" Jane's Defense Weekly. 4 November 1998.
- Tenet, George J. "What 'New' Role for the C.I.A.?" Washington, DC: CIA Public Affairs Staff, 1998. www.odci.gov.
- Waller, Douglas. "Coming in from the Cold: Under the Wye Agreement, the CIA Embarks on a New—and Highly Visible—Mission in the Middle East." Time. 2 November 1998.

Centre for Architectural Conservation

The Centre for Architectural Conservation (RIWAQ) is a nongovernmental, nonprofit Palestinian organization established in June 1991 in the WEST BANK. Its main objective is to protect the cultural, architectural, ARCHAEOLOGICAL, and natural heritage of Palestine, which is considered part of the PALESTINIAN IDENTITY. RIWAQ is particularly concerned with several issues: that contemporary Palestinian construction is losing its historic characteristics; the destruction of the ENVIRONMENT; the demolition of historic architecture because of the political conflict; and the transformation of the natural environment, including the cutting down of coniferous trees and soil erosion caused by the wearing away of rocky lands and stone walls. At the same time, traditional handicrafts and related professions are becoming extinct, as crafts workers fail to hand down their expertise and skills to the following generations. RIWAQ works in a variety of ways to try to rectify these concerns. (<http://www.riswaq.org>).

See also ENVIRONMENTAL DEGRADATION

Chai Vekayam

See THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Checkpoints

Military checkpoints have long been used to control civil unrest in Palestine. The phenomenon mirrors broader changes in perceptions about the security role of the state in relation to individuals, changes brought on by colonialism, postcolonialism, and the post–Cold War era. Israel’s use of the military checkpoint, however, is remarkable both in its connection to LAND confiscation policies and in its many other ramifications for Palestinians. Furthermore, the Israeli military checkpoint regime is now copied by other militaries in the post–September 11 world, especially by the US military in its occupation of IRAQ and Afghanistan.

The occurrence of the checkpoint in Palestine can be traced to the late 1800s and the strengthening of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE. BRITISH MANDATE encirclement practices, implemented most extensively after the 1936 general strike (ARAB REVOLT), were enforced using widespread troop deployment, CURFEWS, ROAD closures, demolition of structures that hindered military access to population centers, and the building of fences that disrupted supplies and communications. Similar methods were leveraged through the 1945 DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS intended to clamp down on Jewish rebels.

It was only after 1948, however, that movement restriction was closely connected to land confiscation. In 1950 the new Israeli government instituted military rule over Palestinian citizens of the state, including common martial law powers regulating freedom of speech, movement, and assembly. These regulations were based on earlier British edicts and allowed for the detention, search, or DEPORTATION of any individual suspected of activities “inimical to public safety.” Fearing that the Palestinian Arab population might act as a fifth column in its midst, Israel dispatched the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES’ Frontier Corps (the precursor to today’s BORDER POLICE) to patrol border areas. But the regulations and troop deployment tightened the state’s hold on Palestinian villages depopulated during and after the 1948 WAR and allowed for SETTLEMENT by new Jewish immigrants. Thus, approximately 1,500 residents of Palestinian villages inside the new Israeli border were removed from their homes and barred from returning. This change was facilitated by the ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW of 1950, which meant that even “PRESENT ABSENTEES” could have their land confiscated by the state. Under this law, 40 percent of Arab land was confiscated from Palestinians still living inside the new Israeli borders. Areas where Palestinians lived were designated “CLOSED MILITARY ZONES,” and residents were restricted from leaving without a military PERMIT. Jews living nearby, on the other hand, had no RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT. One of the most important means of controlling the movement of the Palestinian population—and therefore their access to and ownership of the land under the law—was the military checkpoint.

Israeli policy after its 1967 OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK, East JERUSALEM, and the GAZA STRIP initially emphasized the economic integration of Palestinians newly under Israeli control. The military checkpoint was rarely employed, and Palestinians were allowed fairly free access through Israel and the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. The Border Police, now under the Israeli police instead of the military, were dispatched to maintain law and order under the military administration in the Occupied Territories. In 1972, Israel issued general exit orders that allowed Palestinians in the Occupied Territories to move in and out of Israel and Jerusalem except between the hours of 1 and 5 A.M. In June 1989, however, Israel began to restrict the general exit permits, a policy managed through checkpoints at the entrances to the Gaza Strip and West Bank.

In January 1991, during the first GULF WAR, Israel revoked the general exit permits of 1972, and every resident of the Occupied Territories was now required to carry a personal exit permit to enter Israel. After the 1993 signing of the OSLO ACCORDS, this permit policy was hardened. In addition, Israeli checkpoints that marked the outlines of Palestinian territory under the agreement were matched by PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) checkpoints on the other side. At this time, both Israeli and Palestinian checkpoints were rudimentary structures along roadways marked by a national flag, perhaps a small observation structure or a military vehicle blocking the road, and armed soldiers. Only periodically did PNA checkpoints actually monitor traffic; instead, they were symbolic markers of Palestine sovereignty. Israeli checkpoints, on the other hand, determined the mobility of not only Palestinian civilians but also officials and police, who were required under the Oslo agreements to request Israeli permission to move from one PNA area to another.

The outbreak of hostilities between Palestinians and Israelis in September 2000 marked the gradual disappearance of PNA checkpoints (rendered useless in the face of Israeli incursions) and the intensification of the Israeli checkpoint regime. Early on, Israeli checkpoints were the natural targets of Palestinian demonstrations. Deploying sharpshooters, the Israeli army quickly moved its military forces to encircle areas that the Oslo agreements had designated as AREA A, under complete PNA control. As the conflict persisted, these military checkpoints became the “public face” of the Israeli Occupation: the arena where most Palestinians interacted with Israelis and Israeli authority. Although the government’s security rationale in maintaining the checkpoints went largely unquestioned in Israeli society, MACHSOMWATCH (Checkpoint Watch), a group formed by Israeli women, stood at the checkpoints to monitor them and verify that the soldiers manning them behaved appropriately and professionally.

MachsomWatch performs a much needed service, as human rights organizations, including B’Tselem, have documented countless cases of beatings—sometimes severe, soldiers subjecting Palestinians to senselessly long delays in all temperatures, the random (and sometimes targeted) opening of fire on civilians, and other abuses. In addition, the checkpoints have prevented Palestinians from receiving proper HEALTH CARE: women in labor, dialysis patients, and critical cases have been held up by the military cordon, resulting in eighty-three documented deaths. Humiliating treatment is the norm at checkpoints. Over the years, these acts of physical abuse and humiliation have become an integral part of the daily life of Palestinians in the Occupied Territories.

Israeli checkpoints are currently found in many forms: permanent and partially manned checkpoints, temporary checkpoints, ROADBLOCKS (consisting of rows of 1-meter concrete blocks), metal gates, earth mounds, earth walls (a long series of earth mounds), trenches, and road barriers. From 2003 to 2006 the number of checkpoints and roadblocks hindering Palestinian movement in the West Bank at any given time ranged between 376 and 735. Developing in tandem with this grid of control was the system of Israeli-only and Palestinian-only roads running through the West Bank—access to each available only through checkpoints or gates.

Manned checkpoints usually require Palestinians to show the orange or green IDENTITY CARDS that designate them as Palestinian residents of the Occupied Territories (versus Israeli settlers, who carry Israeli citizenship and blue identity cards). Some manned checkpoints do not check all passengers, but soldiers stationed there survey an individual’s appearance to determine if he or she should be stopped. Travelers can be denied passage on the basis of their identity cards, their places of origin, their ages (frequently men aged sixteen to thirty-five, for example, are banned), the origin of their vehicles (some checkpoints are reserved for permitted, commercial, or noncommercial vehicles), or even the whim of the presiding soldier. Some manned checkpoints incorporate a search of the vehicle or accompanying luggage, using hand searches, metal detectors, x-ray scanners, or dogs. Major manned checkpoints are closed at night, although soldiers periodically slow traffic and even stop traffic altogether during the day. Drivers are then forced to seek out detours, which extend short journeys to long ones on remote back roads. Unmanned checkpoints, composed of physical barriers, prevent the travel of any vehicle and require passengers to traverse the area by foot.

The entire checkpoint regime divides the West Bank into five BANTUSTANS, with movement from one region to the other restricted in varying degrees. At the same time, Israel has developed a separate high-speed road system (commenced in the Oslo years) to connect Israeli settlers in the Occupied Territories with their jobs and families in Israel. This dual system not only impedes Palestinians’ movement to family, work, and recreation outside their home locales but also has a crippling effect on the economy. Palestinian exporters pay twice the transportation costs of their Israeli competitors and are unable to promise regular delivery. Prior to the INTIFADA, 22 percent of Palestinians worked in Israel. That number decreased to 9 percent by 2003, with Israel planning to completely eliminate Palestinian guest labor in Israel by the end of 2008 through the use of checkpoints. The World Bank named the “CLOSURE” implemented through the checkpoint regime as a “key factor” in the radical escalation of Palestinian poverty (by 2004, 47 percent of Palestinians were living below the poverty line).

Although Israeli policy at the beginning of the Intifada was primarily intended to isolate and control Palestinian population centers, as the hostilities progressed Israel again linked its security rationale to its claims on land. Between August 2005 and February 2006, checkpoints resulted in the de facto Israeli requisition of 7,884 dunum (1,950 acres) of West Bank land for the construction of a series of concrete walls, fences, guard towers, electronic monitors, and gates, including the BARRIER, to surround Palestinian population centers in the West Bank. These structures, Israel stated, would reduce the number of checkpoints, give greater protection to Israeli soldiers monitoring Palestinian movement, and ultimately prevent Palestinian access to prime Israeli interests, such as Jerusalem, border areas with JORDAN, WATER aquifers, and Israeli settlements. However, initial reports by the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, established to monitor Palestinian and Israeli commitments, show that, in areas where the Barrier has been completed, the number of checkpoints has actually increased. In fact, rudimentary checkpoints at the start of the Intifada have been converted into major “crossings” between Israel and the Occupied Territories or between two regions of the West Bank.

In the Gaza Strip, one of the consequences of the August 2005 Israeli unilateral redeployment was the removal of checkpoints that had severed the strip into several areas. Still, the “super-checkpoints” (now operating more like border crossings) on Gaza’s fenced borders prevent the movement of Palestinians and their goods in and out of the Gaza Strip. In the spring of 2006, citing security concerns, Israel closed Gaza’s KARNI industrial crossing for several months, causing severe shortages in sugar, wheat, and gasoline and contributing to civil unrest within the Gaza Strip.

Bibliography

- Blau, Uri. “No Exit.” Harper’s Magazine. 2 January 2004. (First printed in Kol Ha’Ir, Jerusalem weekly, in September 2001. Translated from the Hebrew by Tal Haran.)
- B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). “Closure.” n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Closure.asp.
- . “Forbidden Checkpoints and Roads.” n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Checkpoints\_and\_Forbidden\_Roads.asp.
- . “Statistics on Checkpoints and Roadblocks.” 2005. www.btselem.org/english/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Checkpoints.asp.
- Conover, Ted. “The Checkpoint.” Atlantic Monthly. March 2006.
- Gerber, Haim. “A New Look at the Tanzimat: The Case of the Province of Jerusalem.” In Palestine in the Late Ottoman Period: Political, Social and Economic Transformation. Edited by David Kushner. Jerusalem: Yad Izhak Ben Zvi Press, 1989.
- Giacaman, Rita, Anita Abdullah, Rula Abu Safieh, and Luna Shamieh. Schooling at Gunpoint: Palestinian Children’s Learning Environment in War-Like Conditions. Birzeit, West Bank: The Ramallah/al-Bireh/Beitunia Urban Centre and the Institute of Community and Public Health, Birzeit University, 2002.
- Hamammi, Rema. “On the Importance of Thugs: The Moral Economy of a Checkpoint.” Middle East Report. 231 (Summer 2004).
- Hammer, Joshua. “Grandmothers on Guard.” Mother Jones. November–December 2004.
- Hass, Amira. Drinking the Sea at Gaza. New York: Henry Holt, 1996.
- . “Living beside the Checkpoints.” Ha’aretz. 22 July 2004.
- Keret, Etgar. “Speak Hebrew or Shut Up.” The Guardian. 11 August 2004.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. Palestinians: The Making of a People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Levy, Gideon. “Twilight Zone: Birth and Death at the Checkpoint.” Ha’aretz. 12 September 2003.
- Peretz, Don. Israel and the Palestinian Arabs. Washington, DC: Middle East Institute, 1958.
- Sachar, Howard. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, vol. I. New York: Knopf, 1979.
- Stein, Yael. “Abuse of Palestinians at the Sarra Checkpoint, Nablus District 27–31 December 2003.” Jerusalem: B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2004.
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. “West Bank Closure Count and Analysis.” January 2006. www.unocha.org.
- Von Schubert, Katharine. Checkpoints and Chances: Eyewitness Accounts from an Observer in Israel-Palestine. London: Quaker Books, 2005.
- Wilkins, Dexter. “Tough New Tactics by U.S. Tighten Grip on Iraq Towns.” New York Times. 7 December 2003.
- World Bank. “Four Years—Intifada, Closures and Palestinian Economic Crisis: An Assessment.” October 2004. www.worldbank.org.

—Charmaine Seitz

China

Though the Palestinian-Israeli conflict was apparently marginal to its international concerns, Beijing’s official policy has meandered over time, duplicating the twists and turns of Chinese foreign policy and domestic politics. Mao Zedong, the would-be leader of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and the People's Republic of China (PRC), was aware of the Palestine problem even before he fully adopted communism. In a piece he published on 14 July 1919, entitled "So Much for National Self-Determination," he made the crucial link that was to govern the way China perceived this problem until his death in 1976: "The desire of the Jews to restore their nation in Palestine will not succeed because it is of no great concern to the Allied powers" (mainly FRANCE, the UNITED STATES, and Great Britain). Nevertheless, he later planned to include a chapter on "The Jewish National Liberation Movement" in a volume entitled Collected Writings on the National Liberation Movement (19 May 1926), although the chapter (and the book) was never written. There was no mention of a Palestinian "national liberation movement."

Chinese awareness of the Palestine problem emerged in the early 1940s, long before the CCP seized power in China. A number of commentators who later became prominent officials in the CCP were the first to discuss the Arab-Jewish imbroglio in Palestine. Motivated by international politics and their implications for the future of Chinese communism, these discussions and commentators attributed the primary causes of the Palestine problem not to endogenous Jewish-Arab hostility but to exogenous Western interference (later to be joined by the SOVIETS). Put differently, what was later to be known as the Palestinian-Israeli conflict was seen as having been fabricated and exacerbated by the Western powers, especially England and France, to provide an excuse for their long-term presence in the Middle East. The CCP was concerned that GERMANY would exploit these rivalries and the Palestinian-Israeli conflict to gain a foothold in the Middle East as a springboard to its advance toward East Asia and China, where it would join forces with Japan. This is why for many years the Chinese insisted on the withdrawal of foreign powers from the Middle East as a first step toward the resolution of the Palestine problem. These fundamental assumptions about global politics determined Chinese attitudes toward the Palestinian-Israeli conflict until the early 1980s at least and, to an extent, to this very day.

China's stand on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict has gone through a number of stages. In the first stage, until the mid-1950s, Beijing adopted a relatively balanced policy. While deploring the fact that a Palestinian state had not been established as stipulated by the 1947 UN RESOLUTION 181, the Chinese blamed not just Israel but also the Arabs. Both had occupied territories allotted by the UNITED NATIONS to Palestine. Beijing's cautiousness was related to Israel being the first, and at that time the only, government in the Middle East to recognize the PRC (on 9 January 1950, although full diplomatic relations were not established until 1992), as well as the Soviet role in the foundation of Israel. Perceiving Israel as a proto-socialist country just liberated from the yoke of British colonialism, the Chinese considered the Arab regimes as reactionary "running dogs" of Western imperialism. Still, while diplomatic explorations were taking place with Israel, though not with the Arabs, by the mid-1950s the second stage in China's stand on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict began to take shape.

Lasting until the mid-1960s, this stage opened with the preparations for the Afro-Asian Conference in Bandung, Indonesia. Because Beijing wanted to take part in the conference at the expense of Taipei, it had to bow to Arab-Palestinian pressure to exclude Israel. At the conference, held in April 1955, the PRC delegation, headed by Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Zhou Enlai, had to cope publicly for the first time with the Palestine problem as well as meet, for the first time, with Arab leaders. They included AHMAD SHUQAYRI, who in 1965 would become the first PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) chairman. Zhou Enlai called for implementation of the relevant UN resolutions on Israel and reiterated China's official view that denounced foreign meddling for fomenting and prolonging the Palestine problem. His tone, however, was conciliatory. He insisted on a peaceful settlement of the conflict and avoided criticizing Israel. Yet the course had been charted, and China had to move closer to the Arab-Palestinian-Islamic position to expand its constituency and power base in the third world.

This policy paid off when China gained its first diplomatic foothold in the Middle East in 1956. As the prospects of establishing relations with Israel diminished, the Chinese began to manifest a greater interest in the Palestinians, though not yet at the expense of Israel. This attitude, however, changed dramatically by the mid-1960s, when the third stage began. This era was governed by domestic radicalization (leading to the Cultural Revolution), international isolation (following the break with Moscow), and the establishment of the PLO. It is the convergence of these developments that paved the way for the Sino-Palestinian alliance. For Beijing, this alliance was still not motivated by any particular interest in the Palestine problem but rather by China's pursuit of Arab (and Islamic) support against the two superpowers. Unable to compete with the Soviet Union and the United States in diplomatic, economic, and military terms, the Chinese used the Palestine problem to win the goodwill of the Arab governments that had created the PLO. By the early 1970s, however, Beijing had become deeply committed to the FATAH-dominated PLO as the genuine representative of the Palestinian people. Other Palestinian organizations were largely overlooked not only for their radical Marxist-Leninist agenda but also, and mainly, for undermining Palestinian national unity.

As early as March 1965, China became the first non-Arab country to host a PLO delegation, led by Ahmad Shuqayri, as well as to establish a permanent quasi-diplomatic PLO mission in Beijing. After the PLO visit, China's MEDIA launched a massive propaganda campaign urging the Palestinians to wage a people's war against Israel. The possibility of a peaceful settlement, however, was subordinated to China's policy of (modestly) supplying the PLO with light weapons and ammunition accompanied by military and ideological training. In their nearly total identification with the PLO, the Chinese stopped short of challenging Israel's right to exist. Yet all these efforts aborted. Unable to offset the power wielded by the Soviet Union and the United States, China failed to win over the PLO, let alone the Arab governments, against its rivals. This was just one reason for Beijing to reconsider its stand on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in the late 1960s. There were additional reasons.

To begin with, after the violent phase of the Cultural Revolution, China began to return to normal life and to reconstruct its domestic affairs and foreign policy. Equally important, while Moscow's military threat to China reached its peak in a series of armed clashes, Washington signaled its interest in reconciling with the PRC, in both words and deeds. These developments convinced other governments to resume or establish diplomatic relations with China, and in October 1971, China was admitted to the United Nations as a permanent member of the Security Council—at Taiwan's expense. As China's diplomatic network and international responsibilities expanded, Chinese support for national liberation movements, the Palestinian one included, dwindled. Since China had not been strictly interested in "national liberation" but rather in undermining the two superpowers, these movements now became superfluous.

The fourth stage in the Chinese attitude to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict began with China's emphasis that its relations with the Palestinians and with Israel had never been a zero-sum game. Although China appreciated Israel's vote for its admission into the United Nations and even more so Israel's role in checking "Soviet expansionism" in the Middle East in the early 1970s, the Chinese had no intention of establishing diplomatic relations with Israel. However, governed by other considerations, their sympathy for the Palestinians cooled considerably, not only because of the domestic and international changes but also because of Palestinian behavior. Beijing became visibly irritated by the Palestinians' inability to unite, by their growing association with Moscow despite China's opposition, and primarily by their use of TERRORISM, especially civilian aircraft hijacking. These practices undermined Mao's revolutionary principles and contradicted China's newly assumed responsibilities. To be sure, in the United Nations and elsewhere Beijing firmly and consistently called for a complete Israeli withdrawal from all OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and for a full restoration of Palestinian "rights." At the same time, however, Chinese verbal attacks against Israel became less frequent and less virulent. Mao no longer advocated ARMED STRUGGLE but, instead, advised the Palestinians to follow the lead of the moderate and pro-Western Arab governments. This explains China's (tacit) approval of the Israeli-Egyptian peace process and the 1979 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS, which led to stage five in China's stand toward the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Consistent with its time-honored policy, Beijing's interest in these developments had more to do with the consolidation of the US position in the Middle East at the expense of the Soviet Union. Obsessed by its enmity toward Moscow, Beijing underestimated and misinterpreted the degree of Arab, and particularly Palestinian, opposition to the Israeli-Egyptian agreements. Indeed, by 1979 disagreements between the PRC and the Palestinians had reached unprecedented proportions. Palestinian officials accused the Chinese leadership of selling out the Palestinians by supporting the 1979

EGYPT-Israeli peace agreements while “shrouding its policy on our cause in obscurity and political obfuscation.” The Palestinian irritation with China was fed by the emergence of post-Mao reform leaders who not only promoted international stability as beneficial to the PRC interests but also established full diplomatic relations with Washington (Israel’s main supporter) and, worse, invaded revolutionary Vietnam, which had been unified only four years earlier. These developments, especially the latter, provoked the most furious Palestinian reactions up to that time. Palestinian leaders openly stated “that we stand on the side of Vietnam against the Chinese invasion” and accused post-Mao Beijing of apostasy, of collaboration with reactionary regimes in and outside the Middle East, and last but not least, of betraying the Palestinian revolution.

To intercept this onslaught, Beijing modified its stand on Palestinian demands. So far the Chinese had consistently, yet vaguely, called for an Israeli withdrawal from the Occupied Territories and the restoration of Palestinian national and legitimate rights. Never had the Chinese, either publicly or even privately, advocated the establishment of a Palestinian state (probably in view of China’s own separatist challenges). Now, for the first time, a commentary issued on 20 April 1979 set the stage for a new act in the Sino-Palestinian drama. Its keynote lines read: “Only by persistence in unity and struggle can the Arab people recover the land usurped by the Israeli aggressors and assert the national rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to set up their own state” (emphasis added). By supporting an independent Palestine, the Chinese wanted not only to win back Palestinian goodwill but also to align themselves with many other governments all over the world who supported the Palestinian cause and, moreover, to refute rumors circulating at that time (which later turned out to be true) about secret Sino-Israeli relations. To underline the message, Chinese media intensified their condemnation of Israeli Zionist aggression against the Palestinians.

By that time, however, Beijing had already realized that Egypt’s approach of recognizing and directly negotiating with Israel should be adopted to resolve the Palestine problem. Indeed, Beijing tried to convince the Palestinians that flexible, practical, and peaceful negotiations with Israel—rather than armed struggle—would lead to a “fair” and “just” settlement of the Palestine problem (namely, that would take into account Israel’s concerns as well). Beijing’s position was completely rejected by the Palestinians. Yet, while Sino-Palestinian relations reached a deadlock, the PRC was moving ahead, gradually modifying its foreign policy. Instead of thinking that foreign powers had fabricated the Palestinian problem, the Chinese leadership wondered if the problem had attracted foreign powers and that therefore a settlement of the conflict was the precondition for their withdrawal from the Middle East. Now less anxious about the Soviet Union, the Chinese believed, in a complete about-face, that the solution to the Palestine problem should not be left to the parties concerned but should become the responsibility of the great powers, the PRC included. The Palestinian-Israeli peace process should not be monopolized by the United States.

The PLO and Israel were to be copartners in the process, which should “take into consideration the legitimate rights and interests of the Jewish people and the existence of the Israeli entity.” Such a statement not only reflected China’s new pragmatism but also legitimized China’s unofficial relations with Israel, which involved primarily, but not only, military affairs. These unprecedented exchanges and military sales infuriated the Palestinians. For example, the head of the PLO Beijing office, who left in 1983 at the end of his term, was not replaced until 1986. To appease the Palestinians, and despite its continued misgivings about them, on 20 November 1988 the PRC recognized the newly proclaimed (though virtual) state of Palestine. Having been the first non-Arab government to endorse the PLO in 1965, it now took Beijing five days and following thirty other governments to recognize Palestine. Yet it was not done at Israel’s expense. In fact, recognizing Palestine legitimized China’s establishment of diplomatic relations with Israel. By then, the extent of unofficial Sino-Israeli relations and political exchanges could no longer be concealed. Moreover, Beijing, which had already called for an international conference to settle the Palestine conflict under the auspices of the UN Security Council, knew that it would not be allowed to take part in such meetings without having diplomatic relations with Israel.

This situation paved the way for the sixth, and final, stage in the Chinese stand on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In the late 1980s, Beijing tried to justify its evolving relations with Israel as beneficial to the peace process and to the Palestinians. These messages were transmitted to PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT when he visited China in early October 1989, for the first time as “president of the State of Palestine.” Using this opportunity, Prime Minister Li Peng put forward a five-point proposal to settle the Palestinian conflict. It (1) urged the two parties to solve the problems by political means, (2) without the use of force and (3) through a direct dialogue based on mutual recognition, (4) under the auspices of an international conference presided over by the United Nations, and (5) with the participation of the five permanent members of the Security Council. Li called on Israel to stop oppressing Palestinians in its Occupied Territories and to withdraw, but he also called for measures that would guarantee Israel’s security. The die was cast.

It is conceivable that China had decided to establish diplomatic relations with Israel by the late 1980s but was looking for the right timing. Two events led to the acceleration of this process. On 21 July 1990, SAUDI ARABIA became the last Arab government to establish diplomatic relations with Beijing, ironically opening the door for Israel. Twelve days later, IRAQ president Saddam Husayn invaded KUWAIT and, paradoxically, facilitated Sino-Israeli diplomatic relations, for several reasons. First, Beijing realized there were other conflicts in the Middle East as serious as the Palestinian-Israeli one. Beijing also appreciated Israel’s restraint in the face of the Iraqi Scud missile attacks on its civilian population, which prevented a regional deterioration that China did not want. Finally, Beijing was aware that with the end of the war, the peace process would top the international agenda, as a US reward for the Arab countries that supported the anti-Iraqi alliance.

To be sure, in late October 1991 an international peace conference was held in MADRID, but without the participation of China (which did not yet have official relations with Israel). The next meeting, the Multilateral Middle East Conference, was due to take place in Moscow on 28–29 January 1992. Interested in this meeting as the first step in its involvement in the Palestinian-Israeli peace process, the PRC finally decided to establish diplomatic relations with Israel. The ceremonies took place on 24 January, just a few days before the Moscow meeting. Beijing disregarded its own preconditions, articulated consistently since the 1980s, that Israel completely withdraw from all Occupied Territories, including JERUSALEM, and fully restore Palestinian national rights, including an independent state. In retrospect, it is clear that the Moscow meeting was the key impetus for China to establish relations with Israel. Yet, since then, China has failed to take an active part in attempts to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, something its special envoy to the region has consistently avoided.

Rhetorically, Beijing has regularly commented on the progress in the peace process (or lack thereof) while criticizing Israel’s operations in the Occupied Territories, occasionally in slanderous language. Furthermore, Chinese-made or -designed rockets and missiles have been fired against Israel by radical organizations such as Hizbullah (from LEBANON in July 2006) and HAMAS (from Gaza in late December 2008–January 2009), to Beijing’s barely concealed embarrassment. At the same time, relations with Israel have been consolidated and expanded in all contexts. From a twenty-first-century perspective, China has always considered the Palestinian-Israeli conflict a sideshow and still does.

Bibliography

- Behbehani, Hashim S. H. China’s Foreign Policy in the Arab World 1955–75: Three Case Studies. London: Kegan Paul International, 1981.
- Cooley, John K. “China and the Palestinians.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 1:2 (1972).
- Craig Harris, Lillian. “China’s Relations with the PLO.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 7:1 (1977).
- Efrati, Alon. “China Israel’s Largest Trade Partner in Asia: Israel-China Bilateral Trade Totaled $2.99 billion in 2005.” Globes Online: Israel’s Business Arena. 22 February 2006. www.globes.co.il.
- Gilbert, Nina. “China, Israel Discuss Expanding Defense Ties.” Jerusalem Post. 22 June 2005.
- Goldstein, Jonathan, ed. China and Israel, 1948–1998: A Fifty Year Retrospective. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 1999.
- Haddad, William W., and Mary Foeldi-Hardy. Chinese-Palestinian Relations. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage, 1999.
- Israeli, Raphael. “The People’s Republic of China and the PLO.” In The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Edited by Augustus Richard Norton and Martin H. Greenberg. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Kumaraswamy, P. R., ed. China and the Middle East: The Quest for Influence. New Delhi: Sage, 2000.
- Pomper, Miles A. “U.S., Israel Reach China Arms Deal.” Arms Control Today. 35:7 (2005).
- Shichor, Yitzhak. China and the Palestine Liberation Organization: Ups and Downs. Jerusalem: Leonard Davis Institute for International Relations, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (in Hebrew), 1991.

- . “Early Chinese Attitudes towards the Arab-Israeli Conflict.” Asian and African Studies. 15:3 (1981).
- . “‘Just Stand’ and ‘Just Struggle’: China and the Peace Process in the Middle East.” Australian Journal of Chinese Affairs. 5 (1981).
- . The Middle East in China’s Foreign Policy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1979.
- . “The Palestinians and China’s Foreign Policy.” In Dimensions of China’s Foreign Relations. Edited by Chün-tu Hsüeh. New York: Praeger, 1977.
- Sufott, E. Zev. A China Diary: Towards the Establishment of China-Israel Diplomatic Relations. London: Frank Cass, 1997.

—Yitzhak Shichor

Christianity

With their huge numbers and divisions, Christians do not share a consistent perspective on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Christianity comprises more than 2 billion people worldwide, divided among three historical groups of church families: Roman Catholics (1 billion), Orthodox and Oriental Catholics (about 218 million), and Protestants, including Anglicans and independents (about 800 million). Orthodox and Oriental Catholics are divided among a number of national and historic churches, and Protestants are fractured into hundreds of small and large church bodies. Increasingly, there are deep ideological and theological divisions within and among these church bodies.

This entry discusses seven groupings of perspectives on the conflict:

- Christian Zionism, its history in Britain and in the UNITED STATES, and its contemporary politics
- Evangelical critics of Christian Zionism
- Mainline churches—pro-Israel views
- Mainline churches—critical views of Israel
- The VATICAN and its developing views
- Orthodox churches and Arab Christians, with particular attention to the Orthodox views of the Arab world and Palestinian Christians and to Palestinian Christian theologians and church leaders
- Palestinian Christians

Christian Zionism

Classical Christianity theoretically embraced an exclusivist universalism, but in practice it embraced various Christian-ruled empires and nations. In the first millennium CE, Christians believed that Israel as an elect nation had been superseded by the universal church, the “New Israel,” or chosen people of God drawn from all nations. The “promised land” was the whole creation transformed into a redeemed and spiritualized “new heaven and earth.” Palestine, however, was still venerated as the “Holy Land” of Jesus’s life, death, and resurrection, and hence as a place of pilgrimage.

To the early Christians, the Jews were under divine reprobation for having failed to accept Jesus as their messiah and thus were condemned to wander the earth and be kept from political power and cultural dominance as an expression of God’s wrath. Christianity also taught that, in order to be redeemed, Jews must convert to Christianity. This, it was believed, would happen “in the last days” when Elijah returned in preparation for the return of Christ, the Last Judgment, and transformation of the world into the millennial Kingdom of God. In this classical Christian view, there was no place for a nationalist restoration of the Jews to their ancient homeland.

This view, however, began to be modified in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, particularly among English Calvinists. Rejecting the allegorical for a literal, historical interpretation of the Bible, they saw the “promised land” as the actual land of Palestine and the Jews as historical descendants of the elect people of Hebrew scripture. At the same time, the breakup of western Christendom into rival nations created a new nationalism in which the English, French, and Spanish claimed to be the “new Israel,” as nations rather than as an expression of a universal church. In particular, English Protestants created a parallelism between Jews as the original nation and themselves as the new chosen nation. The biblical traditions regarding the fulfillment of God’s promises of redemption were reinterpreted in the light of these ideas. Nationalist Jewish hopes of redemption were no longer superseded by the universal hopes of Christianity; instead, Christians believed that Jewish fulfillment must come first, and then those of Christianity. This meant that the Jews must first be restored to their ancient land, reestablish their rule over it, and rebuild the Second Temple—a THIRD TEMPLE. Only then would Christ return and the final redemptive acts of history unfold—the resurrection of the dead, the Last Judgment, and the millennial reign of the saints on earth. Some Christian Zionists assumed the Jews would be converted to Christianity before returning to Palestine, whereas others felt this would happen only with the return of Christ.

Belief in the restoration of the Jews to Palestine was common among British evangelicals in the seventeenth century, particularly during the English Civil War. One politician, Sir Henry Finch, called for the British government to help the Jews to return to Palestine. Such ideas faded in the eighteenth century but were revived in the early nineteenth century as Christian evangelicals sought to counteract enlightenment rationalism.

The major formulator of a Christian Zionist premillennial dispensationalist theology was John Nelson Darby (1800–1882), founder of the Plymouth Brethren. For Darby there were two separate covenants: one between God and Israel and the second between God and the Christian church. The first covenant was suspended while the church carried out the conversion of Gentiles. But in the last days of world history, the covenant of God with the Jews would resume its priority. The Jews then must return to Palestine, reassert their control of the whole of the promised land, and rebuild the Third Temple. In the final apocalyptic crisis, there would be a showdown with the evil powers of the world. Born-again Christians would be “raptured” into the heavens while the battle of Armageddon was being fought between the army of Christ and the army of Satan. Once these evil powers were defeated, true Christians, which according to scripture included 144,000 converted Jews, would descend from heaven and reign over a renovated earth. The return of the Jews to Palestine was the signal that these final events of world history were beginning to unfold.

Darby made six missionary journeys to the United States between 1840 and 1880 and promulgated these ideas among US evangelicals. The Scofield Reference Bible, the most popular Bible in the United States at the time, disseminated these views through its annotations, and evangelists such as Dwight Moody made these notions key to an understanding of the Bible. William Blackstone, author of the popular apocalyptic book Jesus Is Coming (1878), recruited 413 leading Americans to petition US president Benjamin Harrison (1889–1893) to support a restored Jewish state in Palestine. Such efforts were indignantly rejected by American Reform Jews as an effort to divert Jews fleeing Russian pogroms from immigrating to the United States.

In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Christian Zionism came to play an influential role in the imperial designs of Great Britain and then of the United States. In 1839 an evangelical social reformer, Lord Shaftsbury, called for the British government to aid the return of the Jews to Palestine. He also importuned Parliament to facilitate the founding of an Anglican bishopric of JERUSALEM, appointing a British Jewish convert, the Reverend Dr. Michael Solomon Alexander, as its first incumbent. Shaftsbury saw this as the means for spreading Christianity among the Jews in preparation for the return of Christ.

In the BALFOUR DECLARATION (1917), in which the British announced their support for “the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people,” and in the founding of the BRITISH MANDATE for Palestine (1922), British leaders such as LORD BALFOUR, High Commissioner for Palestine HERBERT SAMUEL, and Prime Minister Lloyd George mingled British imperialism with their Christian beliefs. These men saw British support for Zionist ambitions in Palestine as advantageous both to the consolidation of British global interests and to their belief in the first and second covenants. (In the first covenant, God promises Abraham a great nation in perpetuity for his tribe, the Israelites; Calvin believed that God gave the whole world to the Christians in the second covenant.)

In the United States, a widely disseminated Christian Zionist premillennialist dispensationalism became muted in the first half of the twentieth century as evangelicals retreated from political involvement in the face of a dominant liberalism and secularism. But the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948 brought new faith that the prophesied events of the world’s end were about to unfold, a faith confirmed by the greatly expanded power of Israel after the 1967 WAR. In reaction against the New Left of the 1960s, with its promotion of feminism, gay rights, and criticism of American militarism and imperialism, in the 1970s a newly politicized Christian Right movement began to see the possibilities of an alliance with NEOCONSERVATISM.

As liberal Christians became more critical of Israel, American Jewish establishment leaders began to explore an alliance with a newly empowered Christian Right. This alliance among the Christian Right, neoconservatives, and US and Israeli Jewish leaders blossomed during the REAGAN years.

In retreat during the presidencies of GEORGE H. W. BUSH and BILL CLINTON, it exploded into new dominance in US politics during the presidency of GEORGE W. BUSH. This shift also reflects the increased militancy of JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST settlers and the dominance of the conservative LIKUD Party over the LABOR Party in Israel.

This alliance among neoconservatives, such as Donald Rumsfeld, Dick Cheney, Paul Wolfowitz, and Richard Perle; Christian premillennialists, such as the late Jerry Falwell, Pat Robertson, and the late Ed McAteer; and Jewish establishment leaders with ties to pro-Israel lobbying groups, such as the AMERICAN-ISRAEL PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE and the MIDDLE EAST MEDIA RESEARCH INSTITUTE, represents a strange marriage of convenience. Beliefs that the United States must become a Christian nation and that the Jews in Israel are part of an apocalyptic scenario in which they will become part of a Christian millennium are hardly acceptable to Jews in the United States, Israel, or elsewhere.

What unites the three groups is a devotion to a hard-line politics of MILITARISM and expansionism in the state of Israel and to a vision of US economic and military world hegemony in which Israel plays a key supporting role. For the Christian Zionist premillennialists, Israel's return to the promised land means an exclusive right of modern Israeli Jews to the whole of Palestine, including the WEST BANK and GAZA and perhaps also parts of JORDAN, LEBANON, and SYRIA. Palestinians, including Palestinian Christians, are infidels who have no right to the land and should be expelled in favor of exclusive Jewish rule. Any proposal to turn over land to the Palestinians in return for peace is a betrayal of the exclusive divine gift of the LAND to the Jews.

Citing Genesis 12:3 ("I will bless those who bless you and curse those who curse you"), this group views the United States as a blessed world power because of its support for exclusive Jewish rights to all of the promised land. Christian Zionists also support the takeover of Jerusalem for exclusive Jewish residency and an eventual destruction of the Muslim sites on the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF in order to build a Jewish temple on the site. Falwell and others saw this expansion of Israeli power as a mere transition to Jewish conversion to Christianity and the destruction of all remaining Jews (who have not converted) in the battle of Armageddon. Yet this fact is ignored in light of the power and wealth such evangelicals mobilize for neoconservative politics in the United States and Israel.

Evangelical Critics of Christian Zionism

From the 1980s and particularly after 2000, with the consolidated alliance of the Christian Right, neoconservatives, and the pro-Israeli Right in US politics, there has emerged an increasing critique of Christian Zionism and its political effects. US and British evangelicals, often those previously schooled in these views, but who have come to repudiate them, have taken the lead in this critique. Among the leading evangelical critics of Christian Zionism and its politics are Donald Wagner, author of Anxious for Armageddon (1995) and Dying in the Land of Promise (2003); Gary M. Burge of Wheaton College, author of Whose Land? Whose Promise? (2003); and the Reverend Stephen Sizer, a British pastor and author of Christian Zionism: Road Map to Armageddon (2005).

These evangelical writers are responsible for making the history and theology of Christian Zionism better known among mainstream Protestant, Catholic, and Orthodox Christians, including Palestinians, to whom the theology is bizarre and alien. These writers have carefully detailed how this view arose, what its ideas are, and how it has become a political force today—all in the cause of discrediting it. While taking biblical authority seriously, they seek to propose a different theology based on a God who supports all nations and peoples equally. They denounce a view of a tribal war God as incompatible with the teaching of Jesus.

These evangelicals are sympathetic to the Palestinians, whom they see as having been unjustly deprived of their lands and homes, and they assume some kind of TWO-STATE SOLUTION that will allow both Israel and the Palestinians to forge a peaceful coexistence. Wagner, Burge, and others have developed alternative networks of evangelicals, such as Evangelicals for Middle East Understanding, and have been behind major international conferences critical of Christian Zionism, such as the one sponsored by the Palestinian Christian Liberation Theology Center, SABEEL, in Jerusalem in April 2004, "Challenging Christian Zionism: Theology, Politics and the Palestine-Israel Conflict." At such conferences Christian Zionism is called a "false ideology," a "heresy," and "idolatry."

Mainline Churches—Pro-Israel Views

In the aftermath of World War II and the horrific revelations of the Nazi death camps, many mainstream Christian bodies, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, sought to probe Christian responsibility for the atrocity and to reform Christian theology and pastoral practice to eliminate ANTI-SEMITISM. Some Christians felt the need to dispense with any idea that Christianity was superior to Judaism and to affirm the equal validity of both faiths as vehicles for a relationship to God. The extent to which anyone should continue to convert Jews to Christianity proved controversial for many Christians.

Already in 1942, theologians Reinhold Niebuhr, Paul Tillich, and William Albright formed the Christian Council on Palestine to help Jewish refugees migrate to Palestine from Europe. Their objectives were primarily humanitarian. Displaced Jews needed some place to settle and to be secure from anti-Semitic hostility. The fact that Palestine, rather than some other land (such as the United States), was seen as the place for such secure residency reflected an assumption that Jews had a unique relation to this land as their historic homeland. In the 1980s the development of Jewish-Christian dialogues suggested a deeper revision than just purging Christian theology of anti-Semitism. Jewish spokesmen at these dialogues generally insisted that Jews are not just a religious community but a nation and so need a Jewish nation-state, arguing that ANTI-ZIONISM is anti-Semitism. Thus many Christians involved in the dialogues felt they must accept the unique relationship of Judaism to the state of Israel.

Several Christian theologians emerged who supported this view, including the husband-and-wife couple Roy and Alice Eckhardt, Paul Littell, and Paul Van Buren. The Eckhardts claimed that all people have a right to security within a state of their own choice. To deny this for Jews would support the original Christian view that Jews are reprobate and should be a wandering, stateless people. Palestinian rights to a state were dealt with by claiming that Palestinians already have a state in Jordan and that Palestinian Israelis already have equal citizenship rights in Israel. Paul Littell took the view that God's gift to Jews of the promised land gave them a unique right to a Jewish state different from any other nation. Paul Van Buren attempted a more radical revision of Jewish-Christian relations, postulating that God's election of the Jews is the only covenant of God with an elect people, and it is eternal and unchangeable. The election of the Christian church is dependent on God's election of the Jews, for the purpose of extending that election to the conversion of the Gentiles. Jesus is not the Jewish messiah but simply the embodiment for the Gentiles of the covenant of God with Israel, which has a unique religious role. This means that Israel should not be secular as a nation but governed by the Torah. Christians have a responsibility to encourage Jews to be observant of the Torah, Van Buren believed, and also the responsibility to defend Israel against its enemies. Palestinians have no claims on Israel, he maintained, but should be taken care of by the Arab world, which should integrate the REFUGEES into their societies.

Although Van Buren's more radical revision has not caught on with mainstream Christians, there remains within the theology of Jewish-Christian dialogue a general assumption that God's gift of Palestine exclusively to the Jews means they have a right to a Jewish state and that Christians should be uncritical of this state, supporting it as a necessity for Jewish security against further outbreaks of anti-Semitism. Many Christian pastors and theologians, having spent many years trying to amend their worldviews through such dialogue, are reluctant to learn much about the Palestinian plight lest any attention to Palestinian grievances sour their relations with their Jewish colleagues. In effect, fear of being called anti-Semitic has caused many Western Christians either to be silent on Palestinian suffering or to mute any criticism of Israel.

An example of such pro-Israel Christian theology of dialogue was the address of Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams, delivered by a proxy at the fifth Sabeel conference in April 2004. In this address, Williams said Israel, as the covenanted people with God, is called to be a paradigmatic people for all nations who exemplify what it means to be obedient to God and just toward one another. The state of Israel was described as the needed homeland for this people, "the sole place where the Jewish people have a guaranteed place." Rowan called on Israelis to better exemplify this calling by being more just to the people around them (i.e., the Arab states around Israel) as well as to the "stranger in their midst"—presumably Palestinians, who were not mentioned by name in his speech (nor were Palestinian rights to a state mentioned). This address created great indignation at the conference among both Palestinian Christians and Western Christians with a more sympathetic view of Palestinian rights.

Mainline Churches—Critical Views of Israel

From the 1980s into the first decade of the twenty-first century, Christian denominational views of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict evolved from a pro-Israel view based on Jewish election, God's gift of the promised land, need for refuge from anti-Semitism, and compensation for Christian guilt to one that sought to balance Israel's right to security with the rights of Palestinians to a state. These views became less biblical and theological and more based on a calculus of social justice: both Jews and Palestinians have historical roots and affinities with the land of Palestine, and both have suffered injustice. The new Christian view seeks to "balance" the claims of each and their civil and economic needs, as well as promote reconciliation and peaceful coexistence.

These evolving perspectives among mainline Protestants are illustrated through the development of the statements of the World Council of Churches (WCC). Starting in 1948, the WCC and various Christian denominational bodies were involved in refugee work with Palestinians but were reluctant to propose political solutions, such as a Palestinian or a BINATIONAL state, in case they were prevented by the Israeli government from giving humanitarian aid in the camps.

These limitations began to shift after 1967 as Israel occupied the West Bank and Gaza, which the WCC increasingly saw as unjust. At the same time the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) emerged as the political representative of the Palestinians, and the Middle Eastern Council of Churches was created as a vehicle for Arab Christians to speak for themselves. Moreover, the politics of the WCC, influenced by liberation theology, leaned toward supporting the political rights of colonized and oppressed peoples in their struggles for liberation. In 1969 the student arm of the WCC, the World Student Christian Federation, recognized the PLO—becoming the first Christian international body to do so. That same year the WCC's body on interchurch aid, the Refugee and World Service, declared that the Palestinians had an equal right to a state along with the Jewish state of Israel. Because the great powers had failed to recognize Palestinian rights to self-determination along with the rights of Israel, "injustice has been done to the Palestinian Arabs by the great powers and this injustice should be redressed."

In 1974 the WCC made explicit its view that guarantees of the existence and secure borders of the state of Israel should be "balanced" with affirmations of the rights of Palestinians to self-determination. "What we desire is equal justice for both Palestinian people and Jewish people in the Middle East." The WCC's statements have become models for those of other world Protestant bodies such as the Lutheran World Federation and the Alliance of World Reformed Churches, as well as national denominational bodies.

Thus mainline Protestant churches have come to assume that the framework for a just peace is a two-state solution with a Palestinian sovereign state within the 1967 borders of Israel, with Jerusalem as the capital of both nations, the return of Palestinian refugees or compensation for loss or damage to their property, and the dismantling of the Jewish SETTLEMENTS. WCC and other mainstream Protestant groups have sharply increased their criticism of Israel's violations of Palestinian human rights and its continued promotion of settlements, CLOSURES, TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS, the building of the BARRIER wall of separation, and other impediments to negotiating a just settlement. In 2004–2005, some denominations, such as the Presbyterians and United Church of Christ, also began to suggest that pressure in the form of economic boycotts might be exercised to force Israel to make a just settlement with the Palestinians.

The Vatican

The Second Vatican Council's (1962–1965) "Statement on the Relationship to Non-Christian Religion" declared that God's election of the Jews is the root onto which the Christian church has been grafted and that this covenant still holds. The council repudiated any collective guilt of the Jews for Jesus's death and condemned anti-Semitism. This statement laid the basis for a Catholic-Jewish dialogue that was institutionalized in 1970 with the Catholic-Jewish Liaison Committee. However, the Vatican has also insisted on separating religious Judaism from the political state of Israel, particularly pressing for equal access to the holy sites in Jerusalem for all three religious faiths.

The Vatican has also maintained major institutions that support Palestinian human rights. The Pontifical Mission for Palestine, established in 1949, oversees a large number of schools and charitable works on a nonsectarian basis. In 1982 and again in 1988, the Vatican received YASIR ARAFAT as the representative of the Palestinian people. After the second meeting, the Vatican affirmed that the Palestinians and the Israelis “have an identical fundamental right to their own homeland in which they could live in liberty, dignity and security, in harmony with neighboring people.” This same view of parallel rights was affirmed by the US Bishops’ Conference in 1989, where it was stated that the Palestinian homeland should have “sovereign status recognized by Israel.”

The Vatican delayed granting full diplomatic recognition to Israel on the grounds that the BORDERS for both states were not secure. After the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS between the PLO and Israel in 1993, which appeared to grant such a secure homeland for the Palestinians, the Vatican signed a “fundamental agreement between the Holy See and the State of Israel,” focusing on religious freedom to be upheld by both Israel and the Palestinians. In 1994 this agreement was balanced by establishing official relations with the PLO. As hopes for a just peace have faded, the Vatican has joined with the WCC and the Lutheran World Federation to denounce Israeli violence and repression of Palestinians. In particular, the Palestinian delegate to the Holy See, Afif Safieh, has said that the pope’s strong opposition to the US-led war against IRAQ “has saved the future of Christian-Muslim relations.”

Orthodox Churches and Arab Christians

The Orthodox churches, many of them members of the WCC, have generally followed similar views to those of the WCC in upholding equal rights of Palestinians and Israel. Since Greek Orthodoxy is the historic majority church in Palestine and holds large properties there, it is particularly concerned about protecting these properties. At the same time, the Greek patriarch of Jerusalem has been faulted by other Palestinian Christians for allowing GREEK ORTHODOX properties to be sold to Israelis.

Other Orthodox leaders, such as Patriarch Alexy II of MOSCOW, have joined with other Christian bodies in denouncing the violence against both Jews and Palestinians in the Second INTIFADA. He describes the Holy Land as a place of many ethnic groups and all three religions: Christianity, Judaism, and Islam. “One national or religious group cannot prevail in this sacred land. The Holy Land must become a hospitable home for everyone.” The patriarch called for the world community (the Russian Federation, the United States, the UNITED NATIONS, and the EUROPEAN UNION) to become involved in stopping the bloodshed and restoring negotiations for peace.

The Orthodox Youth Movement played a major role in revitalizing Middle Eastern Christian churches and linking them with international bodies such as the WCC. Metropolitan George Khodr, one of the founders of this movement and its general secretary for many years, helped organize the 1967 statement by Middle Eastern theologians, “What Is Required of the Christian Faith Concerning the Palestine Problem?” In this statement, Christians are called to be witnesses to God’s redeeming love for all human beings and so must reject any nationalism based on religious, ethnic, or cultural exclusivism.

Because separation of religion and state is a primary means for distinguishing religious and political allegiances and thus allowing for equal citizenship of people of all religions, the 1967 statement condemns both Israel as a Jewish state and Islamic states as Muslim states. ZIONISM and Muslim nationalism are seen as parallel distortions of monotheistic religions into religious states. Secular, pluralistic states are necessary so that Christians, Jews, and Muslims can live together as equal citizens. In their statement, the theologians call upon Jews in Israel to overcome racism and to affirm the universal vocation of Judaism. Palestinian refugees who have been thrown out of their homes should be integrated into Israeli society and reparations made for the damages. And the Middle Eastern Christian statement maintains that all inhabitants of Palestine should be considered full and equal citizens, thus following the lines of early PLO views that Palestine should become one secular pluralistic state for all its citizens.

Palestinian Christians

Like other Christians in the Arab world, Palestinian Christians have historically been a minority in Islamic societies. Unlike Western Christians, they have lived outside of Christian-ruled societies since the seventh century. In modern times that means they have been strong supporters of the secular pan-Arabism movements.

Generally well educated and urbanized, Palestinian Christians have benefited from the many schools that Western churches, both Protestant and Catholic, have founded in the Holy Land, as well as from cultural ties to Europe and the United States. Many have been educated in the West. Afif Safieh, for example, came from a cultured and well-to-do Catholic family from West Jerusalem. He was educated at the French Collège des Frères in English, French, and Arabic and at the University of Louvain, Belgium.

In the context of the ongoing conflict, these cultural ties have facilitated emigration, scattering Palestinian Christians around the world. In Israel and Palestine, they have decreased today to less than 2 percent, raising fears that indigenous Christianity will disappear from the Holy Land.

Christians have been disproportionately represented among Palestinian intellectuals. The late EDWARD SAID, professor of literature at Columbia University in New York, was an outstanding example of such an exiled intellectual, noted for his sharp critique of Western "Orientalism" and his indefatigable defense of Palestinian human rights. But it is hard to trace particular Christian influences on the thought of such intellectuals, who tend to be predominately secular and even somewhat disgusted with the spectacle of Christian competition for resources and services in Jerusalem. Their pan-Arabism and support for a secular nationalism of equal citizenship follows the views of Arab Christians in general and may be related more to the position of Arab Christians as a minority group than to Christian tradition.

However, there has also emerged a significant sector of Palestinian Christian theologians and pastors who have defined a distinctively Palestinian contextual theology. Among these are Naim Ateek, Anglican priest and founder of the Sabeel Center for a Palestinian Ecumenical Christian Liberation theology; Mitri Raheb, pastor of Christmas Lutheran Church in BETHLEHEM; Munib Younan, bishop of Jerusalem of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Jordan; and Elias Chacour, Melkite priest and creator of the Prophet Elias schools in Ibillin, Israel.

These Palestinian Christians articulate a vision of inclusive universalism. God is seen as one who loves and seeks the well-being of all peoples. He speaks through all religions, although, in practice, these theologians are primarily concerned with the three Abrahamic faiths: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. They denounce a God of exclusive nationalism, who chooses one people against others, as a tribal idol. Palestinian Christians are called to reject the temptation to hate Jews because of the injustices they have suffered and to steadily insist on the equal humanity of Jews and Palestinians, who must learn to respect and love one another as members of one extended family.

The Jerusalem Sabeel Center document, "Principles for a Just Peace in Palestine-Israel" (2004), articulates this Palestinian Christian vision for a just peace. Theologically, this vision is based on a universal God who loves all people equally and demands that justice be done between them as the basis for true peace. The wounds of both people should be acknowledged: the HOLOCAUST in the case of the Jews, and the Nakba, by which Palestinians have been displaced from their land and kept under harsh military rule.

The document supports a two-state solution with a sovereign, viable, and democratic state of Palestine on the whole of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, including East Jerusalem. The Jewish settlements in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES must become part of Palestine, and Palestinian REFUGEES must be guaranteed the right of return. "Our vision involves two sovereign states, Palestine and Israel, who will enter into a confederation or even a federation, possibly with neighboring countries and where Jerusalem becomes the federal capital," the Sabeel document states. "Indeed the ideal and best solution has always been to envisage ultimately a bi-national state in Palestine-Israel where people are free and equal, living under a constitutional democracy that protects and guarantees all their rights, responsibilities and duties without racism or discrimination: One state for two nations and three religions."

See also VATICAN; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Ariel, Yaakov. On Behalf of Israel: American Fundamentalist Attitudes toward Jews, Judaism, and Zionism, 1865–1945. Chicago Studies in the History of American Religion. Brooklyn, NY: Carlson Publishing, 1991.
- Ateek, Naim. Justice and Only Justice: A Palestinian Theology of Liberation. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Press, 1998.
- Ateek, Naim, and Michael Prior. Holy Land, Hollow Jubilee: God, Justice and the Palestinians. London: Melisende, 1999.
- Burge, Gary M. Whose Land, Whose Promise: What Christians Are Not Being Told about Israel and the Palestinians. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press, 2003.

- Chacour, Elias. Blood Brothers: A Palestinian Struggle for Reconciliation in the Middle East. Eastbourne, UK: Kingsway Publications, 1985.
- Elkin, Larry. Enduring Witness: The Church and the Palestinians. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1985.
- Ellis, Marc H. Toward a Jewish Theology of Liberation: The Challenge of the 21st Century. Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2004.
- . Unholy Alliance: Religion and Atrocity in Our Time. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress Publishers, 1997.
- Fishman, Herzel. American Protestantism and the Jewish State. Detroit: Wayne State University, 1973.
- Halsell, Grace. Prophecy and Politics: The Secret Alliance between Israel and the U.S. Christian Right. First printed in 1986 as Prophecy and Politics: Militant Evangelists on the Road to Nuclear War (Lawrence Hill). Westport, CT: Lawrence Hill, 1989.
- Irani, George E. The Papacy and the Middle East: The Role of the Holy See in the Arab-Israeli Conflict. Notre Dame, IN: Notre Dame University Press, 1986.
- King, Michael. The Palestinians and the Churches, 1948–56. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1981.
- Kreutz, Andrej. Vatican Policy on the Palestinian-Israeli Conflict: The Struggle for the Holy Land. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1990.
- Kuttab, Jonathan. “Open Letter to Archbishop Rowan Williams.” FaithFutures Foundation, 2004. www.faithfutures.org/Sabeel/KuttabLetter.html.
- Malachy, Yona. American Fundamentalism and Israel: The Relation of Fundamentalist Churches to Zionism and the State of Israel. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press, 1978.
- Patriarch Alexy II. “Statement by Patriarch Alexy II of Moscow and All Russia and the Holy Synod of the Russian Orthodox Church on the Situation in the Middle East.” Russian Orthodox Church News. n.d.
- Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.). “Mission Responsibility through Investment.” August 2005. www.pcusa.org/worldwide/israelpalestine/resources/mrti1.pdf.
- “Principles for a Just Peace in Palestine-Israel.” Sabeel Document. 2004. www.sabeel.org/documents/5thConfStatementfinal.htm.
- Raheb, Mitri. I Am a Palestinian Christian. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1995.
- Ruether, Rosemary, and Herman Ruether. The Wrath of Jonah: The Crisis of Religious Nationalism in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 2nd ed. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2002.
- Safieh, Afif. “Interview: God and I.” St. Anthony’s Messenger. March 2004.
- Said, Edward. The Question of Palestine, 2nd ed. London: Vintage, 1992.
- Sharif, Regina. Non-Jewish Zionism: Its Roots in Western History. London: Zed, 1983.
- Sizer, Stephen. Christian Zionism: Road Map to Armageddon. Downers Grove, IL: Intervarsity Press, 2005.
- Wagner, Donald. Anxious for Armageddon: A Call to Partnership for Middle Eastern and Western Christians. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1995.
- Weber, Timothy P. On the Road to Armageddon: How Evangelicals Became Israel’s Best Friend. Ada, MI: Baker Academic, 2004.
- Williams, Rowan (archbishop of Canterbury). “Holy Land and Holy People.” April 2004. www.archbishopofcanterbury.org.
- Younan, Munib, Fred Strickert, and Frederick M. Strickert. Witnessing for Peace: In Jerusalem and the World. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2003.

—Rosemary Radford Ruether

Christian Peacemaker Teams

Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT) grew out of a commitment by members of the Mennonite, Anabaptist, Quaker, and Church of the Brethren denominations to utilize their commitment to pacifism, nonviolent intervention and direct action, and justice in order to make a difference in real-world conflicts. It began its work in HEBRON in 1995 after an initial delegation visited the city and met with Palestinian mayor Mustapha Natshe, who provided a formal letter of invitation. Today CPT has a twelve-member full-time team plus reservists.

CPT’s most significant work is its nonviolent interventions to protect Palestinians. Team members act as shields between Israeli soldiers with live ammunition and tanks and unarmed Palestinian demonstrators, between bulldozers and Palestinian orchards and homes about to be destroyed, and among Jewish SETTLERS who are harassing or harming Palestinians.

Because the scope of its operation is so small, CPT’s effectiveness in protecting the Palestinians of Hebron is unclear. Moreover, CPT has been subject to hostility from the soldiers and settlers and has not been protected by the Israeli government, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCE, or any other official institution from the attacks and depredations of the settlers. (www.cpt.org/hebron/hebron.php)

See also HEBRON; SETTLER VIOLENCE

Christopher, Warren Minor (1925–)

Warren Christopher is an American diplomat and lawyer. During BILL CLINTON’s first term as president, Christopher served as the sixty-third secretary of state from January 1993 until January 1997. As the top US diplomat, Christopher led US diplomacy through the first four years of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. He logged more travel miles than any secretary of state before him, including eighteen trips to the Middle East.

The US government had no part in the secret negotiations that led to the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES that initiated the OSLO PROCESS until SHIMON PERES, Israel's foreign minister at the time, handed an advance text to Secretary Christopher. Christopher declined to present the agreement as a US document as Peres requested: "Secretaries of state are not supposed to lie," he said to the Israeli foreign minister. Instead he instructed Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) to draft a mutual recognition agreement between them. As conditions for this to occur, Israel insisted that the Palestinians first recognize the state of Israel and its right to exist, abstain from the use of TERRORISM, and accept UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338, all of which they had already done. Israel further demanded that the PLO pledge to change the PALESTINE NATIONAL CHARTER to remove language offensive to Israel. The final agreement was the Declaration of Principles.

In May 1996 the secretary of state told the WASHINGTON INSTITUTE FOR NEAR EAST POLICY: "America's most critical role . . . is defending the Middle East peace process and peacemakers against the vicious attacks of their enemies. Terrorists and their supporters are now engaged in a systematic assault on Israel and the peace process. Their goal is clear: they seek to kill the very possibility of peace by destroying every Israeli's sense of personal security. . . ."

"Chairman ARAFAT today clearly understands that he must give a 100 percent effort in the war on terror—and not just because his agreements with Israel require it. He is doing it because he knows that the bombs of HAMAS and ISLAMIC JIHAD are trying to destroy Palestinian aspirations as much as they are Israeli lives. The United States will continue to insist that this increased Palestinian effort be sustained."

In January 1997, Secretary Warren Christopher tilted further toward Israel by attaching to the HEBRON PROTOCOL (an agreement in the Oslo Process) a letter to Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU recognizing Israel's "right" to determine from which areas it would "re-deploy." The word withdraw disappeared from the Oslo vernacular.

Although Christopher's diplomatic efforts were remarkably unsuccessful, he did legitimize the role of the Palestinians in the peace process: on 19 June 1995, Christopher said, "The United States will continue to support the peacemakers in this area—including the PALESTINIAN [NATIONAL] AUTHORITY"; however, this was said in the context of increasing support for Israel.

Bibliography

Christopher, Warren. Chances of a Lifetime: A Memoir. New York: Scribner, 2001.

———. "Fighting Terrorism: Challenges for Peacemakers." Address to the Washington Institute for Near East Policy annual Soref Symposium, Washington, DC, 21 May 1996. US Coast Guard. www.uscg.mil/hq/g-m/nmc/security/peace.htm.

———. In the Stream of History: Shaping Foreign Policy for a New Era. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 1998.

Churchill Memorandum, 1922

The Churchill Memorandum (also known as the Churchill White Paper) of 1922 was the result of an inquiry commissioned by Winston Churchill into clashes between Arabs and Jews in 1921 and 1922 and came after a Palestinian delegation spent nearly a year in London lobbying for independence. The memorandum reaffirmed Britain's commitment to a Jewish national home in Palestine and stated that the Jewish presence in Palestine was based on "a right and not on sufferance." The statement defined the national home as "the further development of the existing Jewish community, with the existence of Jews in other parts of the world, in order that it may become a center in which the Jewish people as a whole may take, on grounds of religion and race, an interest and a pride." The memorandum went on to say that, to accomplish this, "it is necessary that the Jewish community in Palestine should be able to increase its numbers by IMMIGRATION."

However, the memorandum also tempered Zionist ambitions "to the effect that the purpose in view is to create a wholly Jewish Palestine . . . His Majesty's government regards any such expectations as impractical and have no such aim in view." The memorandum also affirmed Britain's commitment to prevent "the disappearance or the subordination of the Arab population, language or culture in Palestine," and it promised that the Jewish community would not dominate or impose Jewish nationality on the indigenous Palestinians and that "the absorption of Jewish immigrants would be limited to the 'economic capacity' of the country."

The Zionists accepted the white paper because, even though it appeared to be a step back from the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Zionists a national home in Palestine, it did not rule out the eventual establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. In fact, when Churchill appeared before the PEEL COMMISSION in 1936, he affirmed that he had not implied such a prohibition. Conversely, Palestinian leaders rejected the memorandum because it upheld the Balfour Declaration and continued to allow Jewish IMMIGRATION.

Bibliography

- Abu Lughod, Janet L. "The Demographic Transformation of Palestine." In The Transformation of Palestine. Edited by Ibrahim Abu-Lughod. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1971.
- Government of Palestine. A Survey of Palestine: Vols. 1 and 2, reprint. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1991.
- Hurewitz, J. C. The Struggle for Palestine. Originally published in 1950. New York: Schocken Books, 1976.
- John, Robert, and Sami Hadawi. The Palestine Diary: vol. 1, 1914–1945. Beirut, Lebanon: The Palestine Research Center, 1970.
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939: The Frustration of a Nationalist Movement. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- . "The Palestine Arab Nationalist Movement under the Mandate." In The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism. Edited by William B. Quandt, Fuad Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- . "Palestine Mandate (1922–1948)." In The Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Marlow, John. The Seat of Pilate: An Account of the Palestine Mandate. London: Cresset Press, 1959.
- Mattar, Philip. "Churchill Memorandum." In The Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1922. Lanham, MD: University Press in America, 1983.
- Porath, Yehoshua. The Emergence of the Palestinian Arab National Movement 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass, 1974.
- . The Palestinian Arab National Movement, 1929–1939: From Riots to Rebellion. London: Frank Cass, 1977.

Church of the Annunciation

See NAZARETH: BASILICA OF THE ANNUNCIATION

Church of the Holy Sepulcher

The Church of the Holy Sepulcher (Church of the Resurrection/Anastasis) is a Christian church within the walled Old City of JERUSALEM. The church sits on the site venerated by most Christians as Golgotha, the Hill of Calvary, where the New Testament says that Jesus was crucified and buried (the sepulcher). An important destination for pilgrims since the fourth century, today it serves as the headquarters of the GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH patriarch of Jerusalem and is a center of conflict among Israelis, Palestinians, and the patriarchy, particularly over its LAND sales to Jews. Palestinian Christians from the WEST BANK and GAZA are unable to worship at the church because they are prohibited by Israel from entering Jerusalem.

See also GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH

Church of the Nativity, Siege of

See BETHLEHEM: SIEGE OF THE CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY

Cinema, Israeli

Although cinema cannot resolve conflicts, it can, under certain circumstances, shape a new sensibility toward political problems. The dramatic change that has taken place over the last fifty years in the cinematic representation of the Palestinians and the land of Israel/Palestine reflects the different attitudes Israelis have developed toward their neighbors, attitudes that do not always fit the dominant views.

From the very first days of Hebrew cinema in prestate Palestine, LAND has been a major issue, both symbolically and in its most concrete and tangible aspects. Thus the early Zionist propaganda films, made by Jewish filmmakers from Europe and intended mainly to raise funds in Europe and the UNITED STATES for the new Jewish SETTLEMENTS, depicted the settlers' efforts to adapt to rural life, emphasizing their determination to renew their link with the land of their biblical forefathers. These early films were inspired by the nineteenth-century romantic fantasy of a return to nature and revealed the new settlers' ambivalent approach to their Palestinian peasant neighbors. On the one hand, the fellahin (Palestinian peasant farmers) embodied the Zionists' own dreams about the fusion between humans and their land and therefore inspired the settlers' admiration and envy. On the other hand, the Palestinians' way of cultivating the soil, which held to premodern methods, as well as their superstitious beliefs about the land's fertility, proved in the settlers' eyes their own incontestable superiority. In a recurrent narrative pattern, these films begin with the Palestinians' suspicious approach toward the newcomers and end with their recognition of the Jews' improved farming in prestate Palestine.

Both Settlers (Alexander Ford, 1933) and Avoda (Laborers) (Helmar Lerski, 1935) retrace the efforts of small groups of Jewish settlers to adapt to the dramatic changes in their lives. The films focus not only on the groups' internal need to coalesce but also on how they create a common understanding with the Palestinians. In Ford's Settlers, a relatively short fiction film imitating a documentary style, a group of Jewish settlers reach the promised land from the sea and look for ways to acclimate to this oriental space that differs so much from where they came. At first they encounter the positive image of the Palestinians—the famous oriental hospitality—as the latter offer them food and drink. But the more deeply rooted in the land the settlers become, the less the Arabs cooperate with them. The prevalent myth of the few against the many becomes stark and vivid as this alienated relationship reaches its peak through a technique of parallel editing and sequences juxtaposing the Jewish settlers, who after many efforts at digging wells finally find a WATER source, and the Palestinians, who, confronted with the same drought, stop praying to Allah and decide to attack the Jews. A close-up shows a sword pulled out then the camera backs up to emphasize the large number of attackers.

This scene's editing thus establishes the visual representation of one of the leading myths of the Zionist ethos: David (the Jews) against Goliath (the Arabs). What could have ended in a massacre is avoided thanks to the intervention of one of the Palestinian children, who reveals to the attackers' leader that the shaykh has closed the well, meaning that the Jews are not responsible for the drought. The ending depicts the Palestinian as "Other," as irrational in his beliefs (that is, only a war could bring rain) and thus unpredictable in his reactions. It also illustrates the way the first Jewish filmmakers in Palestine constructed the image of brave settlers by presenting the Palestinians in stark opposition as primitive and uncultured, thus reinforcing the superiority of the Western Jews over the oriental natives.

In a different approach from Settlers, Lerski's Avoda uses symbolism to reveal in a didactic way the transformation of an anonymous, passive Jewish settler, shown at first only by his footsteps in the sand, into an active participant when he joins a group of settlers and becomes part of the Zionist enterprise. The land of Palestine is presented from this newcomer's point of view as initially neutral but later as something he can dominate. Avoda graphically illustrates the roles ZIONISM attributed to the two sides: the Palestinians are shown in horizontal compositions that emphasize their passiveness compared to the settlers' determined attitude to alter the land and make it "bloom." Avoda also emphasizes the Palestinians' passivity in the way they relate to water. For example, before the settlers' arrival, the Palestinians considered drought as a divine punishment, but the Jewish newcomers refuse to accept the land's hardships and, after many efforts, finally discover the hidden resource. In this documentary, the representation of the Palestinian demonstrates the biased approach of the entire Zionist cinema of the time. At the beginning of the film, the Palestinian Arabs are presented as part of the background, but, as the narrative progresses, they gradually disappear even from the landscape, leaving the entire frame to the Zionist workers.

One of the first feature films made after the establishment of the state of Israel, They Were Ten (Baruch Dinar, 1960), returned more or less to this same premise and depicted the hardships encountered by a group of ten settlers in the first decade of the twentieth century. This film, representative of the Israeli national cinema genre, begins by retracing the naïve and mostly passive approach of the settlers to the land: when they ask the local inhabitants for water, they are expelled by a Palestinian mob. This incident leads to a radical change in their attitude: they use the well without permission. This scene, revolving around the crucial elements of land and water, functions as a turning point that describes the way the passive and effeminate DIASPORA Jew abandons his previous self and becomes the "New Jew," the forefather of the zabar (the Jew born in the land of Palestine). In fact, the Palestinian's opposition to the Jew's presence on his land and the latter's resistance to this hostility were to become the central themes of Israeli national cinema, not only in its revision of the past but also in its representation of the present.

In the late 1960s, however, Israeli national cinema abandoned these thematic issues in favor of more introspective narratives that still left no room for Palestinian representation. This short period (1967–1974), influenced by European modernism, expressed for the first time the filmmakers' wish to diverge from the traditional representation of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and led to a reevaluation of the image of the "New Jew."

After the 1973 WAR, Israeli filmmakers began to question the basic assumptions of the Zionist narrative. One of the first films in this genre was Hirbet Hizeh (Ram Levy, 1976), adapted from a well-respected 1950s novel by S. Iz'har bearing the same name. The television adaptation caused a violent polemic, and its broadcast was censored. Set during the last days of Israel's independence war, Hirbet Hizeh tells the story of a small unit of Israeli soldiers whose mission is to conquer the Arab village of Hirbet Hizeh. At first, it seems that the place is deserted, but, as the soldiers penetrate further, they discover elders, women, and children. The film's plot reveals how this mission, which initially seems relatively simple—to put the villagers on a truck and expel them beyond the Israeli border—turns into a moral dilemma when one of the soldiers, Micha, speaks out about the moral significance of their operation and its consequence for each of them.

Hirbet Hizeh can be considered the trigger for a new thematic approach to the conflict and was followed by a series of political films, such as Hamsin (Daniel Waxman, 1980), which deals with the tense relationship between an Israeli landowner and his Palestinian worker, and The Smile of the Lamb (Shimon Dotan, 1987; based on a novel by DAVID GROSSMAN), which, set in an imaginary Palestinian village occupied by the Israeli army, tells the story of local resistance that ultimately leads to a tragic end. Both films depict the Israeli protagonists as morally corrupted by war, OCCUPATION, and domination of the Palestinian people, a situation that could lead only to a tragic end.

Most interesting is the case of Once We Were Dreamers (Uri Barabash, 1988), shot during the First INTIFADA. Set in the background of the first settlers' arrival in Palestine, Once We Were Dreamers seems to reinterpret Dinar's They Were Ten. As a small group of enthusiastic European Jews reach the desolate land of Palestine, they encounter a local Jew, Amnon, who introduces himself as a kind of middleman with the Arab population. But the group's leader refuses to accept him into the group, declaring: "Here you don't join, you get accepted." This answer reveals one of the unspoken "sins" of the first settlers, namely, their European arrogance and feeling of superiority toward Palestinian Arabs and later, oriental Jews.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict, to which the film relates by analogy, serves as the background of the plot. These ideologically motivated young men and women have to deal with the existence of the Others—either Jews or Arabs—in order to survive on the land. Whereas a superficial reading of the plot centers on Amnon's efforts to accompany the group in their confrontations with the local Palestinians, a more profound view hints at the high price the settlers have to pay to maintain, ideologically and in practice, the "difference" between Jews and Arabs and between Jews and Jews. In one of the most dramatic scenes, one of the group's women commits suicide, feeling that she cannot renounce her entire past. Her burial becomes the site of confrontation between traditional Jews, represented by Amnon, and modern secular ones. During the burial, an intercut shows the Palestinian women standing on a hill and watching the disintegration of the Jewish group, both by death and by discord. This burial scene echoes a similar one in They Were Ten in which a woman's death miraculously brings an end to the drought and thus contributes to the success of the settlers' mission. But in Once We Were Dreamers, the Jewish woman's death brings no miracle and marks only one more step in the ever-growing divisions inside the group, which leads to the death of the two mediators—Amnon and his friend, the son of the shaykh. This pessimistic end reveals the director's vision of the conflict as a whole. As in Hirbet Hizeh, the return to the past becomes a way to criticize the present and to illustrate the sources of its conflicts.

Another aspect of the 1980s approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in Israeli cinema is the interchangeability between Palestinian Arabs and Israeli Jews. Already represented in Once We Were Dreamers, this approach was to evolve and become dominant in the Israeli films of the late 1980s. In Dotan's The Smile of the Lamb, a Palestinian-Israeli actor, Makhram Huri, plays a high-ranking Israeli officer whose role is to implement the Occupation in a small village. The technique of Arabs and Jews taking on each other's roles reaches its peak in Avanti Popolo (Rafi Bukai, 1986), in which one of the two Egyptian soldiers lost in the desert on the seventh day of the 1967 WAR addresses the Israeli soldiers with Shakespeare's famous monologue by Shylock, the legendary Jewish moneylender: "I am a Jew! Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same Winter and Summer as a Christian is? If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die? And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?" By creating the character of an Egyptian soldier who is an actor, director Bukai uses the interchangeability technique to maximize his political viewpoint: just because Jews have been persecuted for centuries in Diaspora, they cannot turn into persecutors and ignore the suffering of Others.

This technique of political oppositionality expressed in terms of interchangeability between Israelis and Palestinians can also be found in Haim Bouzaglo's first feature film, Fictitious Marriage (1989). Shot during the First Intifada, Fictitious Marriage presents the story of an Israeli high school teacher from JERUSALEM who, following his experience as a reserve soldier in GAZA during the Intifada, decides to leave his peaceful existence and ponder the mysteries of his Israeli identity. Pretending to be going to the UNITED STATES for a vacation, the hero arrives at Tel Aviv after intentionally losing his luggage at the airport. He rents a room in a small and empty hotel and borrows two fake identities: the first, of an Israeli living in the United States who has come to Israel to visit his aging mother, and the second, of a mute Palestinian worker from Gaza. Both identities afford him highly meaningful encounters. The Palestinian employee of the hotel explains to him that, as opposed to Israelis, he cannot leave his land, and the Palestinian workers show him the basic values that so many Israelis have lost in their race to modernization and capitalism. His visit to a Palestinian REFUGEE camp in the Gaza Strip becomes his journey's climax as he realizes the human face of "Israel's enemies"—hospitable and generous families with respect for their elders and for religion.

But this journey suddenly ends as his ingrained Israeli paranoia overcomes his newfound compassion. When he sees a tire left by his Palestinian friends in a children's playground, the mute Palestinian suddenly shouts in Hebrew: "Watch the bomb!" This cry of alarm reflects the anxiety and fear of the Other that characterized most Israelis at that point of the Intifada, but it also reveals his true identity. Our hero returns to his old self, his home, and family with a better understanding of his Palestinian neighbors. The director ends his film with a close-up of the hero's son opening presents, depicting the child sitting with his legs crossed in the same way the hero's former Palestinian friends sit. This image summarizes the entire understanding of the hero: the external masquerade hides the many similarities between "us" and "those people" who used to share the same behavior, the same culinary choices, and the same manners.

The interchangeability between Palestinian Arabs and Israeli Jews is one of the interesting features of Israeli political cinema in the 1980s. However, it should be noted that the films' subtexts often reveal these efforts as vain because this understanding could only lead to a sense of siege. As Ella Shohat claims, the focalization remains an Israeli one, and therefore the role exchanges, achieved in various ways (either by the film's cast or by the hero's masquerade), fail to achieve the expected recognition of the similarities between the two peoples. As can be seen in The Smile of the Lamb, the Israeli protagonist projects his hopes and dreams on the Palestinians, who embody the Israeli longing to become part of the land and its history. Though the Palestinian remains the film's protagonist, his unique personal voice is not heard. The various analogies that the film draws between Israelis and Palestinians finally lead to a dead end and fail to reach any optimistic horizon.

Whereas Israeli filmmakers in the 1980s depicted the Palestinian Arab as a reflection of the first settlers' endeavor to work the land, the more recent politically engaged Israeli feature films, Cup Final (Eran Riklis, 1991) and Look-Out (Dina Zvi-Riklis, 1992), offer a more complex Palestinian representation. Set against the background of the LEBANON WAR (1982), Cup Final introduces a group of Palestinian exiles in South Lebanon who have taken an Israeli soldier as a prisoner. Much as in the 1980s political films, the director's view sympathizes with the Palestinian freedom fighters and the hardships they encounter, but it still maintains primary empathy for the fate of the Israeli reserve soldier. The film shows these guerrilla fighters' ambivalence toward their prisoner, some of them wishing to get rid of him before they confront the Israeli army, others trying to save his life by providing him food. This dual approach ends suddenly as the Israeli army approaches their refuge and the Israeli prisoner runs to his compatriots, abandoning his momentary Palestinian companions to die. As in The Smile of the Lamb, Cup Final's end expresses the impossibility of creating solid bonds between antagonistic sides.

Zvi-Riklis's feature film, Look-Out, offers another representation of the same issue. From his lookout post, an Israeli soldier in occupied Gaza observes the daily life of a Palestinian village. At first distanced, this naïve voyeur becomes emotionally involved in the family's daily life and aware of a private tragedy that derives from the Israeli Occupation. His remote position from the Palestinian people, iconographically expressed in the distance between the family and the guard tower and the background sound of a Hebrew radio soundtrack to which he listens as he stands at his lookout post, becomes a metaphor for the limited Israeli perspective in general and the cinematic Israeli gaze in particular, both of which fail to communicate an authentic image of the Palestinian Arabs.

In fact, both approaches mostly reveal the absence of a Palestinian voice in Israeli cinema. In the 1990s, this was counteracted by a growing number of Israeli documentary filmmakers who offered Palestinian men and women an opportunity to speak for themselves in films such as Behind the Veil of Exile (David Ben Shetrit, 1992), The Women Next Door (Michal Aviad, 1992), Detained (Anat Even and Ada Ushpiz, 2001), and The Inner Tour (Ra'anana Alexandrowitz, 2001). At the same time, the growing success of Palestinian filmmakers in Israel finally offered documentaries and feature films from the Other's true voice. Finally, Amos Gitai's Kedma (2002) offers a new approach to the conflict: a perspective that sees both sides as victims. Taking place a few days before the creation of the state of Israel, this feature film tells the story of a small group of illegal immigrants from Europe who have survived the concentration camps and arrive in Palestine, where they are given weapons and asked by the PALMAH (Jewish soldiers) to take arms against the Palestinians and the British soldiers. Without any military training and incapable of understanding the Israeli soldiers, they soon discover that their promised land belongs to many others. Thus, those who were victims of the European concentration camps have become victims of the war over the land of Palestine. Gitai uses quotations from Israeli and Palestinian canonic texts to find the victims' lost voices. Kedma returns to the point of departure of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, emphasizing for the first time the other victims of the conflict—those who were driven into the war without knowing why.

Gitai's Kedma offers yet another perspective on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, adding to the ones provided by previous Israeli and Palestinian filmmakers, all of them trying in their own way, though not always successfully, to describe the human faces of those trying to resist the oppression of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

See also CINEMA, PALESTINIAN

Bibliography

- Ben-Shaul, Nitzan. Mythical Expressions of Siege in Israeli Films. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1977.
- Gertz, Nurith. Captive of a Dream: National Myths in Israeli Culture (Hebrew). Tel Aviv, Israel: Am Oved Publishers, 1995.
- . Motion Fiction: Israeli Fiction in Film (Hebrew). Tel Aviv, Israel: Open University, 1993.
- . "The Reflection of Social Myths in Literary and Political Texts during the Yishuv and State Period." In Perspectives on Culture and Society in Israel (Hebrew). Tel Aviv, Israel: Open University, 1988.
- . "Within the Eternal Present, without Hope, without Memories." IGRA (Hebrew). 2 (1985–1986).
- Lubin, Orly. "Body and Territory: Women in Israeli Cinema." Israel Studies. 4:1 (1999).
- Munk, Yael. "Frontières de conflit, frontières de représentation/Borders of Conflict, Borders of Representation." In Israéliens, Palestiniens: Que peut le cinéma? (French). Edited by J. Halbreich-Euvrard. Paris: Éditions Michalon, 2005.
- Shohat, Ella. Israeli Cinema: East/West and the Politics of Representation. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1989.
- Stein, Rebecca, and Ted Swedenburg, eds. Palestine, Israel, and the Politics of Popular Culture. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2005.
- Zanger, Anat. "Blind Space: Roadblock Movies in the Contemporary Israeli Film." Shofar: An Interdisciplinary Journal of Jewish Studies. 24:1 (2005).

—Nurith Gertz and Yael Munk

Cinema, Palestinian

In its endeavor to invent, document, and consolidate Palestinian history, Palestinian cinema has traditionally focused on the momentous crisis experienced by Palestinian society in 1948 with the establishment of the Israeli state and the DEPORTATION of a substantial part of the Palestinian people from their LAND. Some Palestinian films have created a historical sequence that leads from the past to the present and then to the future; others have frozen history either in a utopian, idyllic past or in experiences of exile and uprooting that severed the past but are revived as if they were part of the present. According to Freud, such stagnation characterizes posttraumatic situations in which the traumatic memory is reactivated again and again in the present.

Historical processes largely dictate to which direction the historical memory in Palestinian films inclines, whether freezing the past in the present or constructing a historical sequence. In its early days (the 1970s), Palestinian cinema operated under the patronage of Palestinian organizations and documented the events of the period: for example, bombardments of REFUGEE camps by the Israeli air force and the civil war between the Christians and Muslims in southern LEBANON. The films created during this time picture battles, air attacks, ruin, and the conflict's victims as narrated by combatants, civilian eyewitnesses, and political as well as military leaders. These films are a cinematic representation of the trauma of Palestinian history through a plot structure that, by documenting present occurrences, also revives in an abstract symbolic manner the story of the past, complete with olive trees, green pastures, and traditional hospitality. Thus, the tranquil life in the Lebanese refugee camps prior to the Israeli air force bombardments is linked through various techniques with the peaceful life in the homeland abandoned in 1948, and the violent events of the present are identified with the 1948 catastrophe.

In addition to constituting a structure typical of trauma, the pattern of reviving the past in the present also had another role—that of unifying the national experience. During this period Palestinian society was diverse and divided into various diasporas, classes, hamayel (pl. of hamula, clan), and generational and religious groups. The memory of the common past and shared place, along with the revival of that past in the present, contributed to a homogeneous national unity and created collective symbols to replace the diverse reality of Palestinian society.

Mustafa Abu Ali's film Zionist Aggression (1973), which deals with the destruction and loss of life that the Israeli air force bombardments caused in a refugee camp in Lebanon, illustrates that plot structure. The film opens with an extremely long shot of scenes of daily life in a Palestinian village. The tranquil scenes end abruptly with the appearance of the film's title and credits. While an Israeli strike plane patrols the sky, captions in several languages announce that "on April 8, 1972, Zionist combat planes launched an attack on Palestinian refugee camps in southern Lebanon, northern Lebanon, and SYRIA." The visual serenity and soft Arabic music in the opening are interrupted and replaced by the sights and sounds of planes and bombardments, wails of Red Crescent ambulance sirens, and a close-up of the remains of a shell or missile stuck in the ground. These brief scenes, and the quick transitions from one scene to another with a camera movement that shows wrecked houses and bodies of children without pausing on a single one for long, serve to erase the individual stories, the faces, and the names. Instead they present a general story of destruction and ruin that brutally ended the rural tranquility. This amounts to a cohesive national narrative that reconstructs the 1948 catastrophe.

A shift occurred in Palestinian cinema in the 1980s, when the Palestinian struggle escalated and determined the agenda of Palestinian society. Filmmakers of that era attempted to narrate the Palestinian experience by depicting the actual land—real places—and the nature of life prior to 1948 rather than by reviving the past in the present. This change, which reflected the growing significance of the land as a symbol of Palestinian identity and nationality, was first seen in the films of Palestinian directors living in Israel and able to shoot within Israel, particularly in the works of Michel Khleifi. Although born and raised in NAZARETH, Khleifi lived most of his life in Belgium. His first film, Fertile Memories (1980), was considered innovative in terms not only of Palestinian films but also of Arab documentary films in general. The period of the lost past in Fertile Memories is preserved mainly in the character of Romiya Farah, one of the two main protagonists; in the landscape filmed around her house—the terraces, olive trees, and stone-built houses; in the Arab village tradition of food—baking bread in a taboon (outdoor brick oven) and preparing stuffed vegetables; and in her conservative lifestyle. The place where Romiya lives reverberates with the idyllic past before the loss. The film concludes with a freeze frame of Romiya sorting sheep fleece, which is as effective as freezing time—not the present but the pre-urbanized and premodernized past. In general, however, the film is not about reviving the past but about weaving a historical sequence from the past to the present, and presenting life in the present environment. This life is a concrete, specific place where Romiya lives alongside other protagonists—men, women, and children, including the film's other protagonist, the writer Sahar Khalifa.

Other films by Khleifi include Wedding in Galilee (1987), Tale of the Three Jewels (1994), and Canticle of the Stones (1990), all of which continued to document the diversity of Palestinian life alongside the catastrophe that befell it in 1948.

In addition to Khleifi, other important directors, such as Rashid Masharawi, Ali Nassar, Elia Suleiman, and Hanni Abu Assad, established themselves during the 1980s. Some of their films attempt to tell the Palestinian story from a personal perspective: in this way, by telling the story of everyday life, they avoid the tendency to freeze the enchanted past in the present. In the following years, between the two INTIFADAS (1987 and 2000) in the Occupied Territories and the attempt at reconciliation with Israel through the OSLO ACCORDS, life in the refugee camps became more complex. On the one hand, the peace process aroused great hope; on the other hand, daily life was increasingly experienced as endless anguish, gradually unfolding as static, passive, and desperate. In Palestinian cinema that sense of being mired in the present gave rise to a revival and re-creation of the lost idyll of the pre-1948 period, and particularly of the trauma that destroyed it.

Tawfik Abu Wael's Waiting for Salah A-Din (2001) portrays this stasis in images of people waiting hours upon hours at ROADBLOCKS, slouching along on winding dirt roads to avoid Israeli army CHECKPOINTS, and waiting in line for a PERMIT from the Interior Ministry. Abu Wael's film intertwines five separate episodes of life in JERUSALEM that concentrate on the minor, ever-present grievances of everyday life. Everything in this film contributes to the sense of distress experienced by people who repeat the same meaningless actions over and over, including endless job hunts, HOUSES DEMOLISHED again and again, and the Sisyphean effort to keep open fruit stands while police officers confiscate the produce. Out of this barren existence, in which there are no events or occurrences, nowhere to go, and no goals, people try to find hope and a purpose. They find them in the distant past transposed to the present—in the figure of SALADIN, the historical hero who led the Islamic opposition to the Third Crusade.

Sometimes Palestinian cinema endeavors to shake off the experience of being trapped in the empty present by exploring the subjective, private memory. Subhi A-Zubeidi's film My Private Map (1998), for example, explores the distance between the present and the past. The film recounts two histories: that of the Jilazun refugee camp (where the director grew up) from its establishment until the present day, and the earlier history of life in Palestine and its people's expulsion. What is emphasized here is the process of remembering the past rather than the history itself. "I remember that twenty years ago the place was smaller and prettier. But I also remember that point in time when there was no such thing as a refugee camp at all." The film incorporates the enchanted past and the traumatic event that ended it into a succession of memories from the present to the past, thereby connecting the collective experience to the subjective, living, fluid, and flowing experience. The two tendencies—that of freezing time and of setting it into motion—are also apparent in the way space is filmed. Certain films still attempt to accomplish what Khleifi did in his films: to construct the whole Palestinian map—encompassing the house, the yard around it, the orchard, and the fields all the way to the horizon—while also fragmenting it into various separate areas and quarters. However, as the AL-AQSA INTIFADA escalated and Israeli OCCUPATION shrunk and reduced Palestinian land, filmmakers have found it difficult to construct a whole Palestinian map. They also find it difficult to deconstruct this already threatened space. They limit their filming, therefore, to obstructed areas or border zones, turning them into symbols of the lost unity. Such is the case, for example, of the olive tree in Liana Badar's Zeitunat (2002) and the traditional house unfolding in front of our eyes during a granddaughter's visit with her grandmother in Azza Al Khassan's Place, or Out of Eden (2000). In either case, discovering lost unity is related to finding lost time: either imagined lost time, when the Palestinian people lived on their land, or the time of the catastrophe that disrupted the connection to the land. The difference between Elia Suleiman's two feature films, Chronicle of a Disappearance (1996) and Divine Intervention (2002), best illustrates what transpired in Palestinian society and its cinema between the Oslo Accords and the outbreak of the Second Intifada, between the “quiet before the storm,” as Suleiman calls it, and the period of “total destruction and disintegration.” In the early part of Chronicle of a Disappearance, the film focuses on Nazareth, on a local coffee shop, a souvenir shop, and the home of Suleiman’s parents, where his father plays backgammon and his mother converses with her neighbors. From this place—this town and house—the movie sets out, roaming the country. It reaches the shore of ACRE, the northern part of the country on the Sea of Galilee, the road to JERICHO, and the Tel Aviv promenade. The second part of the film takes place in Jerusalem, where we see the American Colony Hotel, the director’s house, and the AL-AQSA MOSQUE. These spaces, always shot through a car window, are congested and threatened, but it is possible to reside in them and lead a normal daily life, even if it is fraught with violence.

In contrast, in Divine Intervention we find almost no open spaces. All we see are brief takes: a small grove where Santa Claus escapes those trying to kill him; a private yard into which a neighbor throws his rubbish; another neighbor who repeatedly cleans the yard, piling the garbage up into a single heap; and a street with an abandoned bus stop, where no bus will ever arrive. The father’s house is reduced mainly to the kitchen, and, instead of the Jerusalem sights, we see the A-Ram roadblock separating Jerusalem and Ramallah. Daily life has deteriorated into a static routine full of hate, rage, and ever-potential conflict.

Several films produced in the early years of the new millennium arguably mark a transition in Palestinian cinema, which tends to focus on the private sphere and family life. One of the most important of these films is Juliano Mer’s Arna’s Children (2004), which recounts the story of the children of the theater founded by Arna Mer Khamis, the director’s mother, in the JENIN refugee camp. The film centers particularly on Yussef and three of his friends—Ashraf, Ala’a, and Nidal. At first glance, the film seems similar to many other Palestinian movies that focus on children’s hardships and dreams and use them as an allegory for the suffering of the entire Palestinian people. However, Mer weaves in shocking flashbacks and flash-forwards, inserting the bleak future into the present and the hopeful past into the future, thus building a narrative of a personal rather than a national desperation. Unlike most other films, the future does not appear to spoil aspirations and dreams. Rather, the future is embedded in the heart of the present: the dead fighters and the living children, the camp in its prospering stage and the destroyed camp in the aftermath of the 2002 invasion, the lively theater and the forsaken theater. All of these, as well as the tanks patrolling the dark city before and after the destruction of Jenin, become a single picture, dissolving all hopes and dreams and yet disallowing the possibility of forgetting or relinquishing them.

This new direction can also be recognized in Tawfik Abu Wael’s first feature film, Atash (Thirst) (2004). The movie is constructed as a disrupted sequence—image after image, extracted from a seemingly shapeless continuity of flowing time, in cycles from day to night, from night to misty morning, and again to the evening. The film has no dynamic plot or action, aside from the dominant theme of oppression and eventually rebellion—the son’s rebellion against the tyrannical father who had compelled his family to live in isolation outside the village. The disrupted time finds its echo in the interrupted music and obstructed images: family members wander around the empty yard and among the rooms, observing other family members who are trapped in themselves. The images are seen through both the lens and the building’s broken sections. All the features characterizing Palestinian cinema in recent years—distress, monotony, immovable time, and obstructed space—here become an existential state, the result of numerous unspecific reasons.

One might consider Atash, together with Arna’s Children and Hanni Abu Assad’s Paradise Now (the winner of the 2006 Golden Globe award), as testament to the Palestinian cinema’s ability to transcend the boundaries of historical and geographical catastrophe caused by a seemingly endless Occupation and the continuation of one story and two protagonists: us and them. These three films use a broader cinematic language through which a new story and a new cinema can emerge.

The prolonged Occupation, life in exile, and the Palestinian national struggle did not erase Palestinian creativity, which began in the 1970s, changed direction in the 1980s, and continues to flow on and transform itself. Despite lack of internal support and funding, Palestinian directors have succeeded in creating films that illuminate a complex Palestinian society, and have been acclaimed in international festivals. The road paved by Michel Khleifi with Fertile Memories still serves as a model for Palestinian cinema, even if the national and personal living conditions present obstacles for those traveling it.

See also CINEMA, ISRAELI

Bibliography

- Bresheeth, Haim. "A Symphony of Absence: Borders and Liminality in Elia Suleiman's Chronicle of a Disappearance." Framework. 43:2 (2002).
- . "Telling the Stories of Heim and Heimat, Home and Exile: Recent Palestinian Films and the Iconic Parable of the Invisible Palestine." Intellect. 1:1 (2002).
- Brooks, Xan. "When We Started Shooting, So Did They." Interview with Elia Suleiman. The Guardian. 13 January 2003.
- Gertz, Nurith, and George Khleifi. Landscape in Mist: Memory and Spaces in Palestinian Cinema. Tel Aviv, Israel: Am Oved and the Open University, 2006.
- Hennebelle, Guy, and Khemaïs Khayati. La Palestine et le Cinéma. E-100. Paris, 1977.
- Shafik, Viola. Arab Cinema: History and Cultural Identity. Cairo, Egypt: American University in Cairo Press, 1998.
- . "Cinema in Palestine." In Middle Eastern and North African Film. Edited by Oliver Leaman. New York: Routledge, 2001.
- Shohat, Ella, and Robert Stam. Unthinking Eurocentrism: Multiculturalism and the Media. New York and London: Routledge, 1994.
- Stein, Rebecca, and Ted Swedenburg, eds. Palestine, Israel, and the Politics of Popular Culture. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2005.

—Nurith Gertz, George Khleifi, and Meital Alon

Citizens' Rights Movement

The Citizens' Rights Movement (CRM or Ratz) was founded in 1973 by SHULAMIT ALONI, a former LABOR PARTY Knesset member. The CRM favored strengthening civil rights in Israel, particularly on issues involving the boundaries between the state and religion, and compromise in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Its main constituents were ASHKENAZI (Jews from Europe), the urban middle class, and the intelligentsia. In the 1973 elections, CRM won three seats and briefly joined the coalition government. In the 1977 and 1981 elections, it was part of the Labor alignment in which the LIKUD dominated, but in 1984 it broke off from Labor again. In 1984 it won three Knesset seats and in the 1988 elections another five mandates. In the 1992 elections CRM joined MAPAM and SHINUI to form MERETZ (Democratic Israel). The CRM received considerable support from the country's liberal community over the years, and prominent among its leaders were Knesset member Yossi Sarid (formerly of the Labor Party); Ran Cohen, a high-ranking reservist in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES; and Mordechai Bar-On and Dudy Zucker, leaders of the PEACE NOW movement.

Bibliography

- Edmunds, June. The Left and Israel: Party-Policy Change and Internal Democracy. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Roberts, Samuel J. Party and Policy in Israel: The Battle between Hawks and Doves. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.

City of David Foundation

The City of David Foundation was created in 1986 by extremist Jews intent on transforming JERUSALEM into a completely Jewish city. It is the parent of ELAD, which has also been active since 1986 in taking over Palestinian homes, especially in SILWAN and RAS AL-AMUD. Members of both groups consider Silwan the biblical Ir-David (City of David) and are intent on restoring the area to its Jewish origins. ([www.cityof david.org.il/hp\_eng.asp](http://www.cityof david.org.il/hp_eng.asp)).

See also SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM

Civil Administration

In September 1981, in an effort to place a more genial face on military governance in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, Israel established the Civil Administration (CA) to govern the West Bank. Headed by Menachem Milson, the CA was actually a branch of the Military Administration and had several aims: to provide social services to the Palestinians and to thus shift their identity and loyalty away from the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), and in general to implement Israel's concept of the "autonomy" contemplated in the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS.

The Civil Administration was responsible for providing HEALTH, EDUCATION, and other services as well as for granting PERMITS for work, travel, construction, drivers' licenses, and the myriad other things for which Israel required a permit. Although administered by the CA, the permits were conditional upon the approval of the General Security Service (GSS), or SHIN BET, which was not required to uphold CA decisions and did not adhere to any criteria in its decisionmaking. The GSS was overwhelmingly interested in recruiting COLLABORATORS, and it frequently made the granting of a permit or service contingent on the applicant's agreement to work with it.

The GSS, including the Civil Administration, approached granting permits and services as favors and expressions of goodwill that could be revoked at any time. Major General (Res.) Shlomo Gazit, the first coordinator of government activities in the territories, described the basic premise behind this policy: "The policy that emerged was directed toward creating a situation in which the population would have something to lose, a situation in which the most effective sanction is the revocation of benefits." Gazit's principle was articulated earlier and more clearly by then defense minister MOSHE DAYAN on 10 November 1967 in a discussion that took place in the Ministry of Defense: "Let the individual know that he has something to lose. His home can be blown up, his bus license can be taken away, he can be deported from the region; or the contrary: he can exist with dignity, make money, exploit other Arabs, and travel in [his] bus."

The CA did not ease bureaucratic procedures for Palestinians. Even seemingly simple matters involved a lengthy and cumbersome application procedure. By 1987 the receipt of most permits was dependent on seven different authorities, including the police and the GSS. The granting of services based on agreement to collaborate increased significantly, and extortion was a common recruitment practice.

Immediately after taking office, Milson moved to organize "VILLAGE LEAGUES" among the rural population, seeking to establish a group of local "moderate" or anti-PLO Palestinian leaders who would accept Israel's rule of the Occupied Territories and mediate Israel's relationship with Palestinian residents. Milson approached MUSTAFA DUDIN to organize the leagues, which were extended throughout WEST BANK towns during the early 1980s.

Despite considerable effort and cost, most individuals in the West Bank considered the leagues as collaborationist. Even most of the village notables and rural intelligentsia refused to join an organization that had the declared aim of combating Palestinian nationalism. Palestinians continued to support the PLO and refused to accept the leagues, and the project eventually failed. The Civil Administration still officially exists, but, in terms of its original objectives, it cannot be said to have been successful.

Bibliography

- Be'er, Yizhar, and Saleh 'Abdel-Jawad. Collaborators in the Occupied Territories: Human Rights Abuses and Violations. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1994.
- Litani, Yehuda. "'Village Leagues': What Kind of Carrot?" Journal of Palestine Studies. 11:3 (1982).
- Milson, Menahem. "How Not to Occupy the West Bank." Commentary Magazine. 81:4 (1986).
- Tamari, Salim. "In League with Zion: Israel's Search for a Native Pillar." Journal of Palestine Studies. 12:4 (1983).

Civil Society, Israel

See CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; ISRAELI MILITARISM; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT

Civil Society in the West Bank and Gaza

If civil society emerges in the shadow of a state, whether in cooperation or in opposition, it could be argued that Palestinian civil society in the WEST BANK and GAZA was born with the ink on the OSLO ACCORDS and the coming of the "proto-state" of the interim PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY to Palestinian soil in May 1994. Indeed, it is telling that the concept of civil society (al mujtama' al madani) only entered mainstream Palestinian public discourse in the interim period, when it quickly became a synonym for nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). While reflecting globalized discourse, the new term also signaled an explicit notion of Palestinian "civil society," asserting a shared public sphere and making claims on an emerging Palestinian state.

If civil society is more widely conceived as society organized outside the state, the lengthy statelessness of Palestinian society in the West Bank and Gaza—despite various regimes of foreign rule—has generated its own forms of civil organization and association. When Israeli military OCCUPATION ruled directly, Palestinian society and its institutions developed within an overall imperative of survival and resistance. A broader historical argument has also been made that Western notions of civil society need to be expanded in the context of "Muslim societies," to include other categories of social organization (family, clan, notables, networks of religious scholars).

Although some categories have virtually disappeared in Palestinian society, others, particularly family and clan associations and networks, are constantly reconfigured and play important roles in the public sphere. With these caveats and a brief review of forms of association in other periods, the development of associational life and organization in the West Bank and Gaza after 1967, as well as their transformation in the period of Palestinian self-rule, provide insight into the dynamics shaping Palestinian civil society.

Pre-1948 Roots of Associational Life

New forms of Palestinian urban associations arose during the BRITISH MANDATE, which responded both to colonial and Zionist threats to Palestinian identity and community survival and to new forms of modernity and urban living, including the emergence of a middle class. Major Palestinian cities saw the formation of women's organizations, labor unions and professional societies, Muslim and Christian charitable societies, sports clubs, cultural and literary societies, and chambers of commerce, among others, that focused on charitable work, nationalist assertion, and specific union or cultural activities. Like other Palestinian organizations and movements, these organizations primarily served an urban elite, and the overwhelming majority of the population (70 percent) was rural and largely outside their purview. They have striven, in various ways, to overcome this dichotomy, most successfully in the mass-based organizations within the West Bank and Gaza and in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION'S (PLO'S) bases in refugee camps outside Palestine.

Although many of these organizations were swept away with the dismemberment of Palestine in 1948 and the loss of its coastal cities, there are some remarkable continuities within the West Bank and Gaza today. The Arab Women's Union in NABLUS, established independently in 1921, for example, remains today an important local organization that runs a major hospital and engages in a host of charitable and developmental activities. Professional and commercial associations, active in the Jordanian period in the West Bank (the period of Egyptian administration in Gaza), and to a lesser extent labor union activity, are also marked by continuity, as are town and village associations formed by 1948 REFUGEES.

Civil Society under Israeli Occupation

Despite these links with the past, the sustained period of direct Israeli military Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza witnessed two new significant and related forms of civil society beginning in the early 1970s: mass socially based organizations (sometimes called grassroots movements), whose most striking feature was mobilization and participation in opposing Israeli Occupation; and nationalist institutions, including universities, municipalities, and a range of other institutions, that developed as a national infrastructure in the absence of a state. Both involved a confluence of civil and political society. The rise of the Palestine National Movement and the PLO after 1967 was a necessary (if not sufficient) prerequisite for opposing Occupation as an organized group. The PLO's swift failure in launching an ARMED STRUGGLE within the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES (although more prolonged in Gaza), which led to a national front strategy with differing factions working together, also favored the development of nonmilitarized forms of civil organization to resist Israeli military occupation.

But the rise of the national movement is not the only explanation for the rise of opposition to Occupation: inside the Occupied Territories, new experiences, practices, and consciousness arose. The longevity of the Occupation, coupled with its ever-expanding program of Israeli SETTLEMENT, economic incorporation, and nonbenign neglect of the civic welfare of the Occupied population, is central to an understanding of the character and consequences of the mass organizations and nationalist institutions that developed in its shadow.

Voluntarism. One of the first to emerge was a voluntary work movement, founded in 1972 in the JERUSALEM-Ramallah area, with local committees forming in most West Bank towns in the next several years, although this movement was not as prominent in Gaza. Inspired by leftist and liberationist ideas circulating globally, the voluntary work movement eventually counted thousands of young people in activities ranging from reclaiming LAND and assisting in harvests to literacy campaigns, which served to mobilize and politicize a generation of Palestinian young men and women. Notions of a new civil society where all participated, including the young and the marginalized, in voluntary organizations were important themes that spread to other organizations.

Mass Organizations: Women, Students, Workers. Influenced by the experience and ethos of voluntary work, about fifty young women activists met in Ramallah in 1978 to form the first women's committees, distinguished from the older generation of women's charitable societies by a focus on women's political mobilization and by increasing participation of women from villages and camps. Initially concerned with improving working women's conditions and labor rights, they eventually added an important social dimension that would develop into explicit platforms for women's rights. Although inequalities within the family were not incorporated as programs, married and young women's increasing participation in committee activities, legitimized by a nationalist mandate, provided new models of women's autonomy and activism.

In a similar vein, student unions and youth movements incorporated youth from a wide variety of backgrounds (both male and female, but with leadership weighted strongly toward men) in a range of activities—from demonstrations against the Occupation and student rights inside Palestinian institutions to book exhibits and student forums, cultural troupes, and student counseling. Although these activities clearly mobilized youth, a second mobilization—often one of leadership—ironically occurred when thousands of young student activists were sentenced to Israeli prisons.

Factionalism. Labor unions differed from other organizations in that they drew on existing frameworks, although unions had very small memberships in 1967. With a steady increase in membership, although never able to engage more than a small proportion of the massive flow of laborers into Israel, labor unions took on the character of mass organizations in the late 1970s and 1980s. Then, like women and youth mass organizations, they became factionalized. With Palestinian political parties illegal, these mass organizations worked through clandestine links with the major factions in the PLO (as well as the Communist Party), all of which inevitably claimed a portion of the growing constituencies by forming separate organizations. These factions were extremely competitive ideologically and never coalesced into one national union.

Middle-Class Professionals' Volunteer Services. Although women, youth, and workers formed the core of grassroots movements, the 1980s saw the incorporation of different sectors of society within a wide range of organizational frameworks.

Among the most important were HEALTH professionals who volunteered their services for the neglected population of the rural poor and an agricultural relief initiative founded by agronomists in 1982. Other professional associations, whether of writers, engineers, pharmacists, or university teachers and employees, also placed their group interests squarely within the framework of national resistance. Another important development at this time was the rise of several dedicated human rights organizations, prototypes of the professional NGOs that came to dominate in the Oslo years.

Intifada: Popular Committees and New Directions. Mass organizations formed the backbone of the popular rebellion known as the First INTIFADA, which began in December 1987 and led to the creation of one of the Intifada's most interesting civic associations: decentralized popular neighborhood committees that organized neighborhoods and informal schooling during school closures and assisted the population in supplying basic needs. The Israeli military quickly declared these committees illegal, at the same time targeting the mass organizations, particularly student movements and unions. Many student leaders, especially from universities, and a number of trade union activists were summarily DEPORTED. As the Intifada's course changed—with resistance commanded more and more by cells of young men—mass organizations also changed direction, and links to their respective political factions became more troubled, partly because of a lack of internal democracy. The growing economic and social needs of the population also motivated a shift in Palestinian organizations toward development, research, and service provision. Women's organizations, for example, began to concentrate more on expanding income-generating activities for women and childcare centers.

Transition to Self-Government

Although Palestinian civil organizations were able to expand their developmental activities into the early 1990s and the period of self-government beginning in 1994, they were largely unable to draw on their history and experience of mass mobilization and popular participation to confront the negative aspects of Palestinian rule or the continuing threats from Israeli control, including the Jewish settlements and Occupation. In the transition to Palestinian self-government, the spirit of the popular committees was largely left behind.

NGOs: From Grassroots to Civil Society. The relationship between the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) and civil organizations took place within a process of incomplete state formation, lack of Palestinian sovereignty, and continued Israeli control and expansion. An additional factor was the new trend of an international donor community infusing funds to stabilize the continually threatened peace process. Indeed, the major shift in civil society, from mass organizations oriented toward resistance to professional NGOs focused on development, was clearly visible before the PNA entered Gaza and JERICHO in May 1994. But the process was accelerated by increased attention and funding support from the international community in the early 1990s, particularly after the MADRID CONFERENCE. The triangulated relationship among the PNA, civil organizations, and donors continued to be a striking feature of the Oslo years.

The professionalization of Palestinian NGOs in this period was not solely driven by donor influence: their greater participation in global forums, new skills for societal needs, and the process of state formation, which involved projects of legal reform and developmental planning that were for the first time in Palestinian hands, encouraged this process of professionalization. Nonetheless, donor demands for long-range planning, short-term and clearly defined projects, and reporting and accountability, as well as a preference for certain areas of work, such as democracy, governance, and legal reform, led to the formation of an emerging Palestinian elite composed of NGO leaders. Over the years, these leaders garnered professional skills and relatively high salaries, traveled the conference circuit, participated in globalized discourses and agendas, and gained international contacts.

The transition from nationalist to professional work was always uneven and never complete. Leaders of the largest and most successful NGOs of the Oslo period had strong nationalist histories, and many activists searched for strategies that combined building Palestinian democracy and development with confronting Israel's continued control. Nonetheless, the NGOs themselves identified their obstacles as external political constraints imposed by both Israel and the PNA, a societal crisis of values, and a lack of voluntarism.

Relations with the Palestinian National Authority. At the beginning of the interim period, perhaps 1,000 NGOs (estimates in 1995 ranged from 800 to 1,200) were operating, and activists believed that society could push the PNA in a democratic direction or provide a democratic alternative to it. This optimism was not entirely unjustified: initial regulations announced by the PNA restricting freedom of assembly and the press foundered, and after incidents of abuse and TORTURE of prisoners in PNA jails were exposed by human rights organizations, conditions improved to some extent. A proposal by the PNA to require NGOs to receive permission from the PNA to receive foreign funds was countered by a network of Palestinian non-governmental organizations (PNGOs), joined by the Union of Charitable Societies, that drafted its own NGO law. After a long battle, most of the NGO-produced law was passed by the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL in 1988 and signed into law by President YASIR ARAFAT in January 2000.

Advocacy and lobbying, as in the NGO law conflict, were the dominant approach for NGO activism. Even when clearly divisive issues arose, such as Arafat refusing to sign the constitutional Basic Law (until 2001) or the detention of NGO activists, civil organizations tended to lobby rather than sharply oppose the PNA. (Exceptions include the 1997 student protests over arbitrary arrests.) This was partly due to their own loss of constituencies and political linkages and also to structural constraints, including, paradoxically, a shrinking public sphere constrained, some analysts argue, by the dominance of Oslo-mandated security and police services. But the constraints on the NGOs also derived from the common bonds of national struggle, a political culture of kinship, and an incomplete (and endangered) national project. This practice of kinship also influenced PNA officials, who tended to use informal and nonpublic means to discipline unruly NGOs. One exception, significantly, was a controversy over funding that erupted in the wake of a May 1999 UN report on donor funding to the Palestinian human rights and legal sector, in which the Palestinian minister of justice launched a campaign marked by bitter invective over the allegedly excessive support for nongovernmental human rights organizations.

Some NGOs forged more intimate relations with the PNA, following the model that was familiar in the PLO, with its array of general unions and little distinction between political authority and society. The General Union of Palestinian Workers, many of whose officers were on the PNA payrolls, seemed to undermine rather than contribute to labor activism: two nationwide strikes by teachers, in 1997 and 2000, were run by coordinating committees rather than the union, and workers in Gaza, faced with massive unemployment and impoverishment during the Second Intifada, formed independent workers' committees to press for their demands. Partial incorporation into the PNA through its payroll was also more evident in Gaza, particularly among professional associations. Moreover, the PNA sponsored a government-friendly NGO network to counter the weight of PNGO, which had documented PNA human rights abuses. On the other hand, an interesting model can be found in the zakat (Islamic alms) committees (Awqaf) that were integrated into the PNA in 1994 but nonetheless operated in a decentralized and independent fashion.

Conflict and cooptation were not the only models that shaped the relationships between the PNA and Palestinian society. Cooperation, particularly in health, education, agriculture, and developmental planning, flowed not only from common goals but also from interests, as the relevant ministries, struggling with limited budgets and capabilities, realized in practice that they needed the nongovernmental sector to augment or deliver services. Models of mixed government–civil society participation in policy and planning were also in evidence: a National Poverty Commission in this mode produced the first National Poverty Report in 1998, although the commission reverted to a governmental model in the succeeding years. Most strikingly, the Palestinian draft constitution drew on a wide-ranging committee of civil society leaders for advice and input. In many ways the interdependence of the PNA and NGOs, as well as their financing by the same donors, led to a guarded and reluctant partnership that undergirded much of the period.

New Issues, New Organizations. In the first year of Palestinian self-government (1995), at least twenty Palestinian NGOs were already engaged in new programs for democracy and governance. By 1996, major projects for legal reform—including the Basic Law—were on the table at research centers as well as at legal, human rights, women's, and labor organizations, among others. It was a ball that would keep rolling, oiled by donor interest to be sure, but also by a sense of urgency that the legal foundations for Palestinian democracy were in the process of being established. Although an uncertain legislative process, crippled both by the restrictions of the Oslo Accords and sharp conflicts with the executive, did not entirely meet these expectations, civil society activism influenced the Basic Law, the draft constitution, labor legislation (not yet signed into law), a draft criminal code, draft social insurance legislation, and other critical legal initiatives. On the contentious ground of family law, a major legal reform initiative from the women's movement, culminating in a Model Parliament in 1988, opened an important, if acrimonious, public debate with a number of analysts who concluded that NGO forms of organization were insufficient to the mission of societal change. In a less productive form, "NGOization" could be found in the plethora of democracy programs that focused on training and capacity-building workshops, which by their nature could not address the structural constraints impeding Palestinian democracy.

Despite shifts in donor support from nongovernmental to governmental health services during the late 1990s, it is striking that NGOs continued to provide a majority of primary health care throughout this period and over 90 percent of services to the disabled, as well as taking a major role in emergency services. In addition, NGOs are active in health education and awareness campaigns; health advocacy, particularly reproductive health; and health policy research. This form of service provision goes well beyond what is considered supplementary and places health NGOs in an unusual position to contribute toward a national health system, although such a development might raise problems of fragmentation and possibly undermine the developing state responsibility for the welfare of its citizens. The agricultural sector is quite similar, with one highly effective "mega-NGO" implementing more programs for agricultural relief and development than the responsible ministry.

Refugee and Islamist Associations. Two kinds of civil society organizations that rose to prominence in the interim period differ from other models. Spurred by the neglect of refugee issues in the interim accords and fear for refugee rights in FINAL STATUS agreements, refugee committees in camps in the West Bank and Gaza drew on their own constituencies to meet, protest, and network for refugee rights. Their activity also had a transnational dimension, coordinating with camp committees outside Palestine.

Islamist associations' civic, social, and developmental services (as well as their political activities) grew notably in this period, despite measures by the PNA to restrict them. Although also characterized by highly qualified staff, these associations differ from their secular NGO counterparts in several ways, including funding sources (considerable local funding rather than Western funding), strong links to constituencies, and a strong spirit of voluntarism linked to ideological commitment. More arguably, Islamist associations may constitute a social movement whose informal social networks allow for mobilization.

With the outbreak of the Second Intifada and years of warlike conditions, insecurity, and receding hopes for justice, there has been a varying but growing realization among civil organizations that much that was discarded or undermined in the Oslo years—whether framed as popular mobilization or a social movement model—is needed to meet the threats of the present. NGO campaigns against the BARRIER (the Wall) are one example of a new direction. There is no way back to the neighborhood committees and mass organizations of the past, but civil society actors and organizations are seeking a way forward.

Bibliography

- Banyeh, Mohammed. "Civil Society and the Islamic Experience." ISIM Review (Leiden University). 2005.
- Barghouthi, Mustafa. "Palestinian NGOs and Their Contribution to Policy Making." In Dialogue on Palestinian State Building and Identity. Edited by Mahdi Abdul Hadi. Jerusalem: PASSIA, 1990.
- . Palestinian NGOs and Their Role in Building a Civil Society. Jerusalem: Union of Palestinian Medical Relief Committees, 1994.
- Bishara, Azmi. "Reflections on the Realities of the Oslo Process." In After Oslo: New Realities, Old Problems. Edited by George Giacaman and Dag Jorund Lonning. London: Pluto Press, 1998.
- Brown, Nathan. "Civil Society in Theory and Practice." Palestinian Politics after the Oslo Accords: Resuming Arab Palestine. Edited by Nathan Brown. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Brynen, Rex. A Very Political Economy: Peacebuilding and Foreign Aid in the West Bank and Gaza. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Studies, 2000.
- Chambers, Simone, and Will Kymlicka, eds. Alternative Conceptions of Civil Society. Princeton and Oxford: Princeton University Press, 2002.
- Giacaman, George. "In the Throes of Oslo: Palestinian Society, Civil Society and the Future." In After Oslo: New Realities, Old Problems. Edited by George Giacaman and Dag Jorund Lonning. London: Pluto Press, 1998.
- Giacaman, Rita, and Penny Johnson. "Searching for Strategies: The Palestinian Women's Movement in the New Era." In Women and Power in the Middle East. Edited by Suad Joseph and Susan Slyomovics. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2001.

- Hammami, Rema. "Palestinian NGOs since Oslo: From NGO Politics to Social Movements?" Middle East Report. 214 (Spring 2000).
- Hammami, Rema, Jamil Hilal, and Salim Tamari. Civil Society and Governance in Palestine. San Domenico, Italy: European University Institute, 2001.
- Hammami, Rema, and Penny Johnson. "Equality with a Difference: Gender and Citizenship in Transitional Palestine." Social Politics (Fall 1999).
- Hanafi, Sari, and Linda Taber. The Emergence of a Palestinian Globalized Elite: Donors, International Organizations and NGOs. Jerusalem: Institute of Jerusalem Studies and Muwatin, 2005.
- Jad, Islah. Women at the Crossroads: The Palestinian Women's Movement between Nationalism, Secularism and Islamism. Ph.D. diss., Department of Development Studies at the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, 2004.
- Jamal, Amaney. Barriers to Democracy: The Other Side of Social Capital in Palestine and the Arab World. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2007.
- Johnson, Penny. "Agents for Reform: The Women's Movement, Social Politics and Family Law Reform." In Women's Rights and Islamic Family Law: Perspectives on Reform. Edited by Lynn Welchman. London: Zed Press, 2004.
- Robinson, Glenn. "The Role of the Professional Middle Class in the Mobilization of Palestinian Society: The Medical and Agricultural Committees." International Journal of Middle East Studies. 35:2 (1993).
- Roy, Sara. "The Transformation of Islamic NGOs in Palestine." Middle East Report. 30:1 (2000).
- Shawa, Seliwa. Adapting for Change: The Case Study of Four Palestinian NGOs in the West Bank and Gaza (1994–1998). Jerusalem and Ramallah: The Forum for Social and Economic Policy Research in Palestine, 2000.
- Sovich, Nina. "Palestinian Trade Unions." Journal of Palestine Studies. 29:4 (2000).
- Taraki, Lisa. "Mass Organizations in the West Bank." In Occupation: Israel over Palestine. Edited by Naseer Aruri. Belmont, MA: AAUG Press, 1989.

—Penny Johnson

Civil War (Palestinian) in Lebanon, 1983

See CAMPS' WAR; LEBANON WAR

Clifford, Clark McAdams (1906–1998)

Clark Clifford was a corporate attorney and special White House counsel to President HARRY TRUMAN from 1946 to 1950. He worked closely with Truman on the Palestine question and was the chief architect of the administration's pro-partition policy. Clifford represented the pro-Israeli stance adopted by the White House, contending, together with other Zionists, that Israel could be an important STRATEGIC ASSET for the UNITED STATES in the Middle East because of its military strength, evident even at that time, and its predisposition toward the West. According to Clifford, the Arab nations, despite their oil reserves, should not be allowed to dictate the foreign policy of the United States. He also felt strongly that European Jews deserved a safe haven after the atrocities of the HOLOCAUST. Finally, he argued that a Jewish state would come into existence whether the United States supported it or not.

After the 1947 UN partition plan was passed, a number of the great powers that had voted for UN RESOLUTION 181 had second thoughts. Even Truman, under pressure from Secretary of State George Marshall, began to doubt the viability of partition, at least not without US troops, which the president was unwilling to commit. Great Britain and FRANCE too were putting pressure on Truman to back away from carrying out the plan. In this context, the president sent a memorandum to Marshall and Clifford asking each to present his position on the UN resolution. Truman called on Clifford first. "Mr. President, there must be a state of Israel," Clifford said. "The greatest proof that there has to be a state of Israel is the Bible." He proceeded to quote scripture after scripture to prove that the Jewish people had the right to a homeland in Palestine and that they would be returned to their homeland at the end of days. Without even listening to Marshall, Truman said, "I'm convinced. We'll carry on with the partition plan and an independent state." Marshall got up and said, "Mr. President, if you proceed with that position, in the next election I will vote against you," and left the room.

Clifford was also instrumental in securing US recognition for Israel within hours of its proclamation of independence, but his motivation for supporting Israel was not just for religious reasons. He was also concerned about Truman's ability to win the upcoming presidential election; he was convinced that securing the Jewish vote was Truman's only opportunity to prevail and that supporting Israel was the key to the Jewish vote.

Clifford went on to become the personal lawyer to President JOHN KENNEDY and secretary of defense for President LYNDON JOHNSON.

See also CHRISTIANITY; HARRY TRUMAN; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Benson, Michael. Harry S. Truman and the Founding of Israel. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1997.
- Clifford, Clark M. Counsel to the President: A Memoir. New York: Random House, 1991.
- Curtiss, Richard H. "Special Report: Insider Clark Clifford's Death Recalls Two Mideast Scandals: Premature Recognition of Israel and BCCI." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. December 1998.
- Donovan, Robert J. Conflict and Crisis: The Presidency of Harry S. Truman, 1945–1948. New York: W. W. Norton, 1977.
- Grose, Peter. Israel in the Mind of America. New York: Knopf, 1983.
- Khoury, Fred J. The Arab-Israeli Dilemma, 3rd ed. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1985.
- Mallison, Thomas, and Sally V. Mallison. The Palestine Problem in International Law and World Order. London: Longman Group Ltd., 1986.
- Neff, Donald. "Truman Overrode Strong State Department Warning against Partitioning of Palestine in 1947." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. September–October 1994.
- Rearden, Steven L. History of the Office of the Secretary of State: The Formative Years 1947–1950. Washington, DC: Historical Office, Office of the Secretary of Defense, 1984.
- Saiya, Nilay. "The U.S. Recognition of Israel: A Bureaucratic Politics Model Analysis." n.d. Available at www.publications.villanova.edu/Concept/2005/US\_recognition.pdf.
- Snetsinger, John. Truman, the Jewish Vote, and the Creation of Israel. Palo Alto, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 1974.
- US Department of State. Foreign Relations of the United States 1947 (Vol. 5), The Near East and Africa. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1971.
- . Foreign Relations of the United States 1948 (Vol. 5), The Near East, South Asia, and Africa. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1975.
- . "Memorandum by the President's Special Counsel (Clifford) to President Truman, 8 March 1948." Foreign Relations of the United States, 1948. (Vol. V). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1975.
- Wilson, Evan M. Decision on Palestine: How the U.S. Came to Recognize Israel. Palo Alto, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 1979.

Clinton, William Jefferson (Bill) (1946–)

William "Bill" J. Clinton was the forty-second president of the UNITED STATES, serving two terms from 1993 to 2001. Before being elected president, he had served for a dozen years as governor of Arkansas, yet he had a strong awareness of international issues. Clinton majored in international affairs at Georgetown University, where he studied under the late Palestinian-American intellectual HISHAM SHARABI, and was a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford. Although Clinton focused primarily on domestic economic issues during his presidential campaign, he also challenged the incumbent Bush administration in regard to Israeli-Palestinian issues, criticizing President GEORGE H. W. BUSH and Secretary of State JAMES BAKER from the right for putting too much pressure on Israel to stop expanding its SETTLEMENTS and withdraw from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

Among President Clinton's first appointments was that of MARTIN INDYK, from the right-wing WASHINGTON INSTITUTE FOR NEAR EAST POLICY, as assistant secretary of state for the Middle East; he later appointed Indyk US ambassador to Israel. Clinton's support for Israeli policies in the Occupied Territory appears to have been both a reflection of his strong political proclivity for currying favor with special interests that helped him get elected and a realization that as the first post-Cold War US president he could take a stronger pro-Israel position without risking pushing Arab states toward the SOVIET camp.

As president, Clinton became deeply enmeshed in diplomatic efforts regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the peace process and shifted US policy to an unprecedented degree to support expansionist elements in Israel. When he assumed office in January 1993, the post-MADRID Israeli-Palestinian negotiating track had stalled, in part because of the US insistence that representatives of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO)—then effectively serving as the Palestinian government-in-exile—not participate in the talks. As a result, at the initiative of a Norwegian nongovernmental organization and later the Norwegian Foreign Ministry, officials in the Israeli government of YITZHAK RABIN began secret talks with the PLO in Oslo.

During that summer, unaware of the clandestine Israeli-PLO talks in NORWAY, President Clinton put forward what he referred to as a "compromise" proposal for Palestinian autonomy. Ironically, the Israeli negotiating proposal simultaneously developing in Oslo was more favorable to the Palestinians than the US plan. The talks in Norway resulted in the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES, also known as the OSLO ACCORDS, which, while failing to recognize the Palestinians' right to statehood and imposing other limitations, did provide a framework in which substantive progress toward Israeli-Palestinian peace might result. President Clinton was a cosignatory of the agreement, which was initialed on the White House lawn on 13 September 1993 and in which the United States agreed to be guarantor of the agreement.

Peace talks resumed in Washington within the Oslo framework, but Israeli negotiators came under intense pressure from right-wing elements at home, which hurt their ability to make compromises. Over the next seven years, President Clinton presided over a series of Israeli-Palestinian agreements that led to the withdrawal of Israeli forces from most of the GAZA STRIP and small areas of the WEST BANK. With some of those areas coming under the administration of the FATAH-led PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, the agreements gave the Palestinians, for the first time, a degree of self-governance in their own country. Nevertheless, during this period, the Israeli government imposed a variety of harsh measures on Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. It put severe RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT within and between the West Bank and Gaza Strip, dramatically expanded LAND expropriation for colonization by Jewish settlers, and repeatedly refused to make withdrawals from territory to which it had committed itself in US-brokered disengagement agreements.

Not only did President Clinton fail to sanction Israel for any of these policies, but in some cases he also helped facilitate the measures. For example, the 23 October 1998 WYE RIVER disengagement agreement was crafted to facilitate Israel's implementation of the 1995 INTERIM AGREEMENT and the 1997 HEBRON PROTOCOL, plus further Israeli redeployments. Despite the fact that Israel did not implement the commitments made at Wye, Clinton nevertheless agreed to supplemental economic assistance for Israel to build bypass ROADS and enhance security infrastructure for Israeli settlements in the West Bank. Moreover, Clinton maneuvered to evade restrictions on settlement construction set by his predecessor. As part of a $10 billion US loan guarantee to Israel signed five months prior to Clinton's assuming office, the estimated costs of settlement construction during the previous year were to be deducted from the $2 billion annual installment of the loan. Each year, however, Clinton increased US AID TO ISRAEL by roughly the amount deducted according to the loan guarantee, effectively subsidizing the expanded settlement construction.

Even before the advent of Oslo, the Palestinians had renounced ARMED STRUGGLE and unilaterally recognized Israel's right to exist in 78 percent of Palestine. Their strongest remaining resource was a series of UN Security Council resolutions reaffirming principles of INTERNATIONAL LAW that applied to the conflict with Israel; however, the Clinton administration also opposed these, arguing that the UNITED NATIONS no longer had any relevance to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, that the UN resolutions had been superseded by the Oslo Accords, and that such "FINAL STATUS" issues as REFUGEES, settlements, BORDERS, sovereignty, and the status of JERUSALEM should be up to the two parties alone. Additionally, the Clinton administration cast a series of vetoes in the UN Security Council that criticized Israeli violations of the FOURTH GENEVA CONVENTION and became the first US administration not to vote in favor of the annual confirmation of UN RESOLUTION 194, guaranteeing the right of return for Palestinian refugees. Moreover, in a policy statement designed to further undercut the Palestinians, President Clinton and top administrative officials began referring to the West Bank, Gaza Strip, and Golan Heights as "disputed territories" rather than "occupied territories." The phrase "disputed territories" implies that both sides have equal claim to the land and that the human rights provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention do not apply, nor do any other aspects of international law pertaining to war and belligerent OCCUPATION.

Clinton also became the first president to effectively recognize Israel's annexation of GREATER JERUSALEM; his administration stopped counting Israeli settlements in this area in the annual census of Israeli settlement activities in the Occupied Territories and vetoed UN Security Council resolutions referring to East Jerusalem as part of the Occupied Territories.

Throughout the OSLO PROCESS, the Clinton administration coordinated the pace and agenda of the talks closely with Israel while largely ignoring Palestinian concerns. In a similar vein, the United States treated Israeli security as the primary focus of the negotiations rather than a more comprehensive approach that addressed Palestinians interests as well.

Camp David Summit

During the summer of 2000, the Clinton administration unsuccessfully presided over a summit conference that attempted to forge a final peace agreement between the two sides. The trilateral meeting was held at CAMP DAVID, Maryland, the site of the historic Israeli-Egyptian peace talks hosted by President JIMMY CARTER in 1978. Clinton's summit failed largely because neither side was ready for a final agreement and the US president was unable to pressure Palestinian president YASIR ARAFAT to accept Israel's terms. In the spring of that year, a series of missteps by both the Israelis and the Palestinians, and by Clinton as well, appears to have doomed the Camp David Summit. For example, Clinton relayed to Arafat that Israeli prime minister EHUD BARAK would transfer three occupied Palestinian villages on the outskirts of Jerusalem to Palestinian control, which Arafat then announced to the Palestinian public. When Barak reneged on the promise, Clinton refused to push him to honor his pledge.

President Clinton's insistence to jump to final status negotiations without prior confidence-building measures, such as a freeze on new settlements or the fulfillment of previous pledges to withdraw from the settlements, led the Palestinians to question the sincerity of both Tel Aviv and Washington. Arafat and other Palestinian officials repeatedly warned both Israeli and US officials of the increasing resentment among ordinary Palestinians toward the dramatic growth of settlements and other Israeli policies. Furthermore, they argued that the previously agreed-upon withdrawals needed to take place before the more difficult final issues could be addressed. Clinton, however, insisted on moving directly to a summit on the final status questions, even though they had only begun to be addressed in earnest during the previous eight weeks of what had been a more than seven-year process.

Despite strong Palestinian objections, Clinton insisted that the two parties come to Maryland to try to hammer out a final agreement. Arafat pleaded that they needed more time, but Clinton pushed him, promising, "If it fails, I will not blame you." Yet, not only did Clinton put enormous pressure on Arafat to accept Israel's proposals, but he indeed did blame him for the collapse of the talks when the Palestinian leader rejected BARAK'S GENEROUS OFFERS on the grounds that they fell far short of Israel's obligations under international law and making possible a viable Palestinian state. At the news conference at the close of the talks, Clinton declared that "Prime Minister Ehud Barak showed particular courage, vision, and an understanding of the historical importance of the moment" while insisting that it was Arafat who had been unwilling to compromise.

Hussein Agha and Robert Malley (respectively, special assistant to President Clinton for Arab-Israeli affairs and director of Near East and South Asian Affairs for the National Security Council), who participated in the Camp David Summit, later wrote that Israel stuck to a position clearly unacceptable to the Palestinians, knowing the United States would support it. Furthermore, they noted, there was a clear US bias favoring the Israeli negotiating position. President Clinton substantially departed from UN Resolutions 242 and 338, which the Palestinians had been promised would be the basis of the negotiations. Malley further charged that rather than judging the Israeli proposals on the terms of the resolutions, the United States instead rewarded Israel for its negotiating ploy of initially taking extreme positions as a tactical maneuver and then partially backing off from them. When Barak inched away from the hard line of his predecessors on some issues, Clinton gave these so-called concessions undue significance. After the talks, President Clinton declared on Israeli television that Barak "was more creative and more courageous" than Arafat, and then the White House leaked a series of accusations blaming the Palestinian leader for the breakdown of talks.

Clinton Framework

Despite these enormous obstacles, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators pressed on. In late December, after securing the approval of the Israeli government, President Clinton for the first time presented a US proposal for a permanent Israeli-Palestinian peace. While addressing some of the Palestinians' concerns over Barak's Camp David plan, it contained fundamental elements that reflected the Israeli stance at the summit. Most importantly, Clinton reiterated Israel's demand to incorporate unspecified parts of occupied East Jerusalem as well as large settlement blocs elsewhere in the West Bank. Although he reaffirmed the Palestinians' central demand for sovereignty, he did not detail the critical territorial dimensions of such a state or the powers a Palestinian state would be allowed to exercise. In essence, Clinton proposed total Israeli sovereignty over the annexed Palestinian lands in East Jerusalem and elsewhere in the West Bank, and he chose not to address Palestinian self-determination in areas such as WATER, borders, and airspace as well as safe passage routes.

Much like Barak's plan at Camp David, Clinton's proposal offered the Palestinians 95 percent of the West Bank but excluded Greater Jerusalem and the proposed Israeli security zones in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY and elsewhere. Clinton produced no maps to delineate his plan, which by itself raised suspicion among Palestinians. His plan divided the West Bank into three effectively separate BANTUSTANS connected and divided by Jewish-only and Arab-only roads. As many as 80,000 Palestinian villagers in the occupied West Bank would have found themselves annexed to Israel under this plan. Clinton's proposal also allowed for transfer of at least 6 percent of West Bank land outside of Jerusalem to Israel, when the settlements took up less than 2 percent of that land. In fact, large areas of unsettled land, particularly near Jerusalem and BETHLEHEM, were to be annexed to Israel.

Underlying the US plan was the Clinton administration's assumption that Israeli territorial contiguity required incorporation of recently established illegal settlement blocs but that Palestinian territorial contiguity was unnecessary even to the extent that centuries-old villages would not be part of the Palestinian state. Additionally, under Clinton's plan, Palestinian urban areas would be isolated from one another, eliminating any possible natural expansion, particularly around Ramallah, Bethlehem, and Jerusalem. In a spirit of flexibility and under heavy US pressure, the Palestinians had already given up their right under international law to Palestinian territory confiscated by Israel. However, the Palestinians insisted that there be a territorial swap for land inside Israel of equal size and value, which the Clinton plan rejected. Instead, the United States would have forced the Palestinians to give up valuable West Bank land for an area less than half its size in Israel's Negev Desert, which had been used in recent years as a major dumping area for toxic wastes. Under the Clinton plan, Palestinian East Jerusalem would be divided into a number of unconnected islands separated from each other and the rest of the Palestinian state, while the complicated arrangements for the Old

City and the sacred AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF site fell short of providing real Palestinian sovereignty. Clinton also insisted that Israel was under no moral or legal obligation to allow the return of Palestinian refugees expelled from what is now Israel in the 1948 WAR.

The US plan allowed Israel to maintain a continued military presence in the Jordan Valley, parts of southern extremes of the West Bank, and two military posts in more populated areas in the central part of the territory. The United States also insisted that the Palestinians accept emergency deployment rights for Israeli troops in the new Palestinian state. The Palestinians questioned why the Israelis needed both deployment rights and an ongoing military presence, particularly since the Palestinians had already agreed to the stationing of an international monitoring force. Also problematic for the Palestinians was the Clinton proposal's insistence on allowing a full three years for Israel to evacuate settlements and military forces from what would become part of an independent Palestine.

In early January the Palestinians formally rejected the Clinton proposals. Hopes that President Clinton would convene a new summit did not materialize, and the United States ended its active involvement when Clinton left office later that month. However, both the Israelis and Palestinians recognized that they were closer to an agreement than they had been at Camp David and resumed talks in TABA, Egypt, coming close to an accord prior to the talks' suspension with the election of ARIEL SHARON as Israeli prime minister in February.

Clinton and the Israeli-Syrian Track

In July 2004 President Clinton provided US auspices for the Israeli and Syrian governments to engage in peace talks for a resolution of their conflict, including Israel's ongoing Occupation of the Golan Heights (the southwestern corner of SYRIA, seized by Israeli forces in 1967). In brokering the talks, the Clinton administration made Israeli security concerns the primary focus of negotiations, going beyond the security guarantees required of Syria under UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, long acknowledged as the basis for negotiations. The Syrians found President Clinton unresponsive to their concerns regarding Israeli obligations to withdraw from the occupied Golan Heights under international law. Israel broke off talks in 1996 and then resumed them in 1999 with a greater willingness to compromise than when they were previously supported by the United States. The two sides came very close to agreement in January 2000 before the talks were suspended, but the death of Syrian president Hafez al-Assad later that year and the election of Ariel Sharon in Israel early the following year resulted in the end of that peace process.

President Clinton also defended Israel's ongoing Occupation of southern LEBANON and Israeli assaults against Lebanese Hizbullah guerrillas and civilian targets, vetoing UN Security Council resolutions condemning the violence as well as questioning the credibility of human rights groups and UN agencies that reported on the deaths at Qana. In 1996, Israel launched a mortar attack against a UN compound near the Lebanese village of Qana that was sheltering refugees from nearby villages, which had been under Israeli assault for several days; the attack killed more than 100 civilians. Although the United Nations, Amnesty International, and other investigators concluded that the bombardment was most likely intentional, the Clinton administration insisted that it was an accident, accusing Hizbullah of using civilians as cover for military activities. (Some reports have indicated that President Clinton's decision to veto UN secretary general Boutros Boutros-Ghali's reelection the following year was related to his refusal to suppress or tone down the UN's findings on the Israeli assault on Qana.)

By 1999, in response to public opinion polls showing that a sizable majority of Israelis wanted their forces out of Lebanon, Ambassador Indyk publicly encouraged Israel to keep its Occupation forces there indefinitely, a position openly defended by President Clinton despite long-standing UN Security Council resolutions that called for Israel's unconditional withdrawal.

See also CLINTON PARAMETERS

Bibliography

- Agha, Hussein, and Robert Malley. "Camp David: The Tragedy of Errors." The New York Review of Books. 48:13 (9 August 2001).
- . "The Last Negotiation." Foreign Affairs. May–June 2002.
- "The 'Clinton Parameters.'" Ha'aretz. 8 January 2001.
- Clinton, President William, and President Hosni Mubarak. "Sharm el-Sheikh—Remarks by President Clinton and President Mubarak in Delivery of Joint Statements at the Conclusion of the Middle East Peace Summit; October 17, 2000." The Avalon Project at Yale Law School. 2002. www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/mideast/mid022.htm.

- Cohen, Benjamin. "Clinton: Arafat Missed a Golden Opportunity." IsraelInsider. 21 January 2002. www.israelinsider.com/channels/diplomacy/articles/dip\_0158.htm.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestinians in Search of a Just Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Shlaim, Avi. "America and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, 1991–2001." Lecture, Yale University, New Haven, CT, 8 November 2001. www.yale.edu/dsj/lectures/lecturePDF/ShlaimLecture.pdf.
- Sontag, Deborah. "And Yet So Far: A Special Report: Quest for Mideast Peace: How and Why It Failed." New York Times. 26 July 2001.
- Wagner, Donald. "The Interregnum: Christian Zionism in the Clinton Years." Information Clearing House. 11 October 2003. www.informationclearinghouse.info/article4951.htm.
- Zunes, Stephen. "The Evolution of U.S. Policy towards Jerusalem." Middle East Policy. 3:2 (Fall 1994).
- . "The U.S. Role in the Breakdown of the Israeli-Palestinian Peace Process." Middle East Policy. 8:4 (December 2001).

—Stephen Zunes

Clinton Parameters (23 December 2000)

After the failure of the July 2000 CAMP DAVID SUMMIT to achieve a peace agreement between Israeli and Palestinian delegations led, respectively, by Prime Minister EHUD BARAK and Palestinian president YASIR ARAFAT, negotiations continued between the two sides and gaps between the parties on various issues were narrowed, but there was no comprehensive agreement.

In a last-ditch effort, US president Bill Clinton offered the following "Parameters" on 23 December to Israeli and Palestinian negotiators at a meeting in the White House. President Clinton's parameters were not the terms of a final deal, but guidelines for final accelerated negotiations that he hoped could be concluded in the coming weeks. He said his terms would not be binding on his successor when he left office in January 2001.

Arafat, after a delay, accepted the Clinton parameters, but with questions and reservations. Barak accepted the parameters, but Israel's position was also equivocal. The parameters laid the foundation for the final negotiations that took place in January 2001 at TABA before the election of ARIEL SHARON in February 2001, which effectively ended the peace process. The text of the Clinton Parameters follows:

"Territory: Based on what I heard, I believe that the solution should be in the mid-90%'s, between 94–96% of the West Bank territory of the Palestinian State.

"The LAND annexed by Israel should be compensated by a land swap of 1–3% in addition to territorial arrangement such as a permanent SAFE PASSAGE.

"The parties should also consider the swap of leased land to meet their respective needs. There are creative ways for doing this that should address Palestinian and Israeli needs and concerns.

"The parties should develop a map consistent with the following criteria:

- 80% of the settlers in blocks
- Contiguity
- Minimize annexed areas
- Minimize the number of Palestinians affected

"Security: The key to security lies in an international presence that can only be withdrawn by mutual consent. This presence will also monitor the implementation of the agreement between both sides.

"My best judgment is that the Israeli withdrawal should be carried out over 36 months while international force is gradually introduced in the area. At the end of this period, a small Israeli presence would remain in fixed locations in the JORDAN VALLEY under the authority of the international force for another 36 months. This period could be reduced in the event of favorable regional developments that diminish the threats to Israel.

"On early warning situations, Israel should maintain three facilities in the West Bank with a Palestinian liaison presence. The stations will be subject to review after 10 years with any changes in status to be mutually agreed.

"Regarding emergency developments, I understand that you still have to develop a map of relevant areas and routes. But in defining what is an emergency, I propose the following definition: Imminent and demonstrable threat to Israel's national security of a military nature requires the activation of a national state of emergency.

"Of course, the international forces will need to be notified of any such determination.

“On airspace, I suggest that the state of Palestine will have sovereignty over its airspace but that the two sides should work out special arrangements for Israeli training and operational needs.

“I understand that the Israeli position is that Palestine should be defined as a “demilitarized state” while the Palestinian side proposes “a state with limited arms.” As a compromise, I suggest calling it a “non-militarized state.” This will be consistent with the fact that in addition to a strong Palestinian security force, Palestine will have an international force for BORDER security and deterrence purposes.

“JERUSALEM and REFUGEES: I have a sense that the remaining gaps have more to do with formulations than practical realities.

“Jerusalem: The general principle is that Arab areas are Palestinian and Jewish ones are Israeli. This would apply to the OLD CITY as well. I urge the two sides to work on maps to create maximum contiguity for both sides.

“Regarding the Haram/TEMPLE MOUNT, I believe that the gaps are not related to practical administration but to the symbolic issues of sovereignty and to finding a way to accord respect to the religious beliefs of both sides.

“I know you have been discussing a number of formulations, and you can agree on any of these. I add to these two additional formulations guaranteeing Palestinian effective control over Haram while respecting the conviction of the Jewish people. Regarding either one of these two formulations will be international monitoring to provide mutual confidence.

“1. Palestinian sovereignty over the Haram and Israeli sovereignty over [the WESTERN WALL and the Holy of Holies of which it is a part]. There will be a firm commitment by both not to excavate beneath the Haram or behind the Wall.

“2. Palestinian shared sovereignty over the Haram and Israeli sovereignty over the Western Wall and shared functional sovereignty over the issue of excavation under the Haram and behind the Wall as mutual consent would be requested before any excavation can take place.

“Refugees: I sense that the differences are more relating to formulations and less to what will happen on a practical level.

“I believe that Israel is prepared to acknowledge the moral and material suffering caused to the Palestinian people as a result of the 1948 WAR and the need to assist the international community in addressing the problem.

“An international commission should be established to implement all the aspects that flow from your agreement: compensation, resettlement, rehabilitation, etc.

“The U.S. is prepared to lead an international effort to help the refugees.

“The fundamental gap is on how to handle the concept of the right of return. I know the history of the issue and how hard it will be for the Palestinian leadership to appear to be abandoning this principle.

“The Israeli side could simply not accept any reference to right of return that would imply a right to immigrate to Israel in defiance of Israel’s sovereign policies on admission or that would threaten the Jewish character of the state.

“Any solution must address both needs.

“The solution will have to be consistent with the two-state approach that both sides have accepted as the end of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict: the state of Palestine as the homeland of the Palestinian people and the state of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people.

“Under the TWO-STATE SOLUTION, the guiding principle should be that the Palestinian state will be the focal point for Palestinians who choose to return to the area without ruling out that Israel will accept some of these refugees.

“I believe that we need to adopt a formulation on the right of return to Israel itself but that does not negate the aspiration of the Palestinian people to return to the area.

“In light of the above, I propose two alternatives:

1. Both sides recognize the right of Palestinian refugees to return to Historic Palestine. Or,
2. Both sides recognize the right of the Palestinian refugees to return to their homeland.

“The agreement will define the implementation of this general right in a way that is consistent with the two-state solution. It would list five possible final homes for the refugees:

1. The state of Palestine
2. Areas in Israel being transferred to Palestine in the land swap
3. Rehabilitation in a host country
4. Resettlement in a third country
5. Admission to Israel

“In listing these options, the agreement will make clear that the return to the WEST BANK,

GAZA STRIP, and the areas acquired in the land swap would be a right to all Palestinian refugees, while rehabilitation in host countries, resettlement in third world countries and absorption into Israel will depend upon the policies of those countries.

“Israel could indicate in the agreement that it intends to establish a policy so that some of the refugees would be absorbed into Israel consistent with Israel’s sovereign decision.

“I believe that priority should be given to the refugee population in LEBANON.

The parties would agree that this implements Resolution 194.

“I propose that the agreement clearly mark the end of the conflict and its implementation put an end to all its claims. This could be implemented through a UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION that notes that Resolutions 242 and 338 have been implemented through the release of Palestinian prisoners.

“I believe that this is an outline of a fair and lasting agreement.

“It gives the Palestinian people the ability to determine the future on their own land, a sovereign and viable state recognized by the international community, Al-Quds as its capital, sovereignty over the Haram, and new lives for the refugees.

“It gives the people of Israel a genuine end to the conflict, real security, the preservation of sacred religious ties, the incorporation of 80% of the settlers into Israel, and the largest Jewish Jerusalem in history recognized by all as its capital.

“This is the best I can do. Brief your leaders and tell me if they are prepared to come for discussions based on these ideas. If so, I would meet them next week separately. If not, I have taken this as far as I can.

“These are my ideas. If they are not accepted, they are not just off the table, they also go with me when I leave the office.”

Closed Military Zones

Closed military zones (CMZs) are areas in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES declared by the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) as off-limits to unauthorized persons in the interest of security. The Israeli military imposes CMZs for a variety of reasons and in diverse circumstances, but the main purpose is at all times to restrict the movement of persons, primarily (though not always) Palestinians, from entering a specific area. These zones need not be of military significance; at times, Israeli officials abort peaceful demonstrations or restrict journalistic access to an area by temporarily designating a site—a building, a city, a region, a refugee camp, the entire Gaza Strip, even occasionally the whole West Bank—a closed military area. To enter a CMZ, one must obtain a PERMIT from the Israeli military.

According to Israeli law, the IDF can only declare an area a CMZ when (1) a concrete danger is posed (at a defined place and time) to human life; (2) no other means are available to reasonably deal with the situation in the specific time frame; or (3) access to the land is blocked for the minimal amount of time required to deal with the aforementioned situations. In practice, however, the IDF declares CMZs for numerous reasons that have nothing to do with danger to human life, and many such declarations have been in effect for decades. Legally, the only way the security forces can deny access to land under the rubric of a CMZ is through a valid military order signed by either a regiment commander or a regional commander. Only in extreme cases is it possible to order territorial closure verbally.

When Israel first occupied the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP in 1967, it established military control and governance of these areas by declaring them CMZs. This was soon transformed into a general CLOSURE that was essentially a mechanism for controlling the movement of the Palestinian population, but Israel’s administrative and military framework allowed the CMZs to be later tightened for the imposition of strict and absolute closures. Israel used declarations of CMZs as a preliminary step in the designation of areas as STATE LAND, which allows Israel to confiscate the LAND from its Palestinian owners and use it for Jewish SETTLEMENT purposes.

From the outset of the OCCUPATION, Israel used CMZs to protect the settlements and their environs from Palestinian entry, and Palestinians have been required to obtain permits to work or otherwise enter these areas. The areas of Jewish settler jurisdiction in the West Bank extend far beyond the built-up settlement territories per se, yet the full extent of these jurisdictions has been defined as CMZs. Whereas Palestinians are forbidden to enter these areas without authorization, Israeli citizens, Jews from throughout the world, and tourists are all allowed to enter such areas without the need for special permits.

With the eruption of the First INTIFADA, the relatively lenient use of CMZs as RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT of Palestinians changed drastically, and Israel began extensively issuing orders for CMZs, imposing partial or total closures on the entire Occupied Territories. During the OSLO years, Israel declared huge areas in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY and in the HEBRON SOUTHERN DISTRICT CMZs in order to evict BEDOUIN shepherds and farmers from the lands they had lived on for decades. Additionally, Israel used CMZs to evict many Bedouin who resided in Area C (mainly in the eastern and southern parts of the West Bank) from Palestinian-owned areas that had been kept largely vacant of houses (through the denial of building permits) during the previous decade.

Many of the uses of CMZs involve collective punishment. For example, Israel has designated the area between the BARRIER (wall) and the Green Line a CMZ, thus strictly out of bounds to all Palestinians. As such, Palestinians are “not authorized” to farm their outlying lands, graze their sheep, or even in some places reach their villages. Moreover, Israeli plans call for this area to be permanently a CMZ.

Israel also uses CMZs to prevent Israeli and international human rights organizations, such as B’TSELEM, from examining alleged human rights violations. Israel also frequently obstructs solidarity meetings or protests in the West Bank and Gaza by declaring the whole region a CMZ. Israeli peace activists are denied permits to enter the zones; moreover, when they apply for a permit, they are “invited” to meetings with the SHIN BET, the Israeli internal security service, which “warns” them about their activities. For months during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the Gaza Strip was totally closed off to peace activists, including Knesset members; only Jewish settlers and soldiers could enter the region. Journalists have protested bitterly over their denial of access to news through the arbitrary imposition of CMZs. At one point in 2002 during the al-Aqsa Intifada, for example, Israel declared six autonomous West Bank Palestinian towns (Bethlehem, Nablus, Ramallah, Jenin, Tulkarm, and Qalqilya) CMZs to keep reporters out.

During the olive harvest season in the West Bank, Israel often declares the olive groves CMZs so that Palestinians cannot access the groves and harvest the crops. During its UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA, Israel declared the Gaza Strip a CMZ to keep out settlers from the West Bank who intended to create problems for the IDF during the evacuation of Jewish settlers.

During 1949–1966 the Arab citizens of Israel were also subject to closed military zones. Israel imposed on this population a number of controlling measures, beginning in 1949, that amounted to martial law. A variety of “laws” and “legal” measures facilitated the transfer of Palestinian land to the Israeli state and/or its NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS. One common legal expedient was the use of emergency regulations to declare land belonging to Arab citizens a closed military zone, followed by Israel’s taking control of the land.

Bibliography

- Amnesty International. Israel and the Occupied Territories. Surviving under Siege: The Impact of Movement Restrictions on the Right to Work. MDE London: Amnesty International. 8 September 2003. 15/064/2003.
- Eldar, Akiva. “Once Again the Olive Orchards Will Become Closed Military Zones.” Ha’aretz. 11 October 2005.
- Gordon, Neve. The Fascisization of Israel. Information Brief No. 86. Washington, DC: Palestine Center. 4 February 2002.
- Jaradat, Ahmad. Palestinian Farmers under Severe Hardship during Olive Harvest. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center. 2 November 2006.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Land Grab: Israel’s Settlement Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2002.
- Pacheco, Allegra. Closure and Apartheid: Seven Years of “Peace” through Separation. Information Brief No. 26. Washington, DC: Palestine Center. 6 March 2000.
- Reporters sans frontières. Israel—2005 Annual Report. Paris, 2005.
- Yehudah, Limor. The Right to Free Access to Agricultural Land. Israel: Association for Civil Rights in Israel, 2005.

Closure

Closure is the total prohibition on Palestinian residents of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES from entering Israel unless they have a special PERMIT. To comprehend the nature and meaning of closure, it is necessary to understand the evolution of Israel’s policy regarding Palestinian right of access to Israel.

Following the 1967 WAR, Israel’s military commanders in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP issued orders proclaiming these areas to be CLOSED MILITARY ZONES (CMZs). In 1972, Israel issued general exit permits that allowed residents from the Occupied Territories to move freely, enter Israel and East JERUSALEM, and pass between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. However, they were not allowed to stay in Israel and East Jerusalem between 1 and 5 A.M.

In June 1989, during the First INTIFADA, Israel restricted the general exit permits for the first time. In the Gaza Strip, Israel imposed a magnetic-card system whereby only those with such a card were allowed to leave the Strip. The authorities did not issue magnetic cards to released PRISONERS, former ADMINISTRATIVE DETAINEES, or even Palestinians who had been detained and released without charges being filed against them. In the West Bank, green, rather than orange, IDENTITY CARDS were issued to Palestinians whom Israel prohibited from leaving the Occupied Territories.

In January 1991, during the GULF WAR, Israel changed its previous policy and required instead that every resident of the Occupied Territories have a personal exit permit to enter Israel. At first Israel issued many permits for relatively long periods, and, except for days on which a total closure on the Occupied Territories was imposed, most Palestinians could routinely enter Israel. However, Israel's permit policy gradually became stricter, and the number of residents of the Occupied Territories allowed to enter Israel and East Jerusalem steadily decreased.

The new policy divided the Occupied Territories into three areas—the Gaza Strip, the West Bank, and East Jerusalem—with passage between them requiring a permit from the Israeli authorities. Movement within the West Bank was also limited insofar as the main road between the southern and northern areas of the West Bank passes through Jerusalem, into which all entry was prohibited.

Revocation of the general exit permit in 1991 marked the beginning of the permanent closure policy, which reached its apex two years later. In March 1993, Israel imposed an overall closure on the Occupied Territories “until further notice.” To enforce the closure, Israel set up CHECKPOINTS along the Green Line separating Israel and the West Bank, between the West Bank and East Jerusalem, and within the Occupied Territories. Approvals were granted sparingly and according to criteria unknown to Palestinians.

The OSLO ACCORDS and the geopolitical changes that followed had almost no effect on these restrictions, although the severity of the closure changed depending on the circumstances. For example, after Palestinian violence against Israelis, the authorities imposed a total closure during which no exit permits were granted except in exceptional cases. A total closure was also typically issued for the Occupied Territories during Israeli holidays. At times Israel also closed specific towns or villages in the West Bank.

With the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada, Israel imposed a comprehensive closure on the Occupied Territories and almost completely prohibited Palestinians from entering Israel and from traveling between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Thereafter, for a short period, Israel allowed a limited number of workers from the Occupied Territories to return to work in Israel and enabled, with severe restrictions, a few Palestinians to enter Israel for medical treatment, trade, and other needs. For the overwhelming amount of time from 2000 to the present (2009), Israel has held a comprehensive closure on the Occupied Territories and refused to issue entry permits.

See also CURFEW; RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). “Closure.” n.d. www.btselem.org/english/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Closure.asp.
- Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. General Closure of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Jerusalem: IMFA. 31 March 2007.
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. OCHA Closure Update Occupied Palestinian Territories. Geneva: OCHA. 30 April 2007.
- . West Bank: Closure Count and Analysis. Geneva: OCHA. September 2006.

Coalition of Women for Peace

The Coalition of Women for Peace was founded in Israel in December 2000, six weeks after the AL-AQSA INTIFADA began, and has become one of the leading voices in Israel advocating a just and viable peace between Israel and Palestine. A mix of Jewish and Palestinian women (all citizens of Israel), the coalition brings together independent women and nine women's peace organizations, some newly formed, others promoting coexistence since Israel's founding. The principles of the coalition include the following:

- An end to the OCCUPATION
- Full involvement of women in negotiations for peace
- Establishment of the state of Palestine side by side with the state of Israel based on the 1967 borders
- Recognition of JERUSALEM as the shared capital of two states
- Demand that Israel accept its share of responsibility for the results of the 1948 WAR and cooperate in finding a just solution for the Palestinian REFUGEES
- Opposition to the MILITARISM that permeates Israeli society
- Equality, inclusion, and justice for PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL
- Equal rights for women and all residents of Israel
- Social and economic justice for Israel's citizens and integration in the region

In addition to supporting the work of its member organizations, the coalition carries out mass rallies, human rights campaigns, outreach, and advocacy activity, including rallies twice a year calling for an end to the Occupation. The coalition has provided emergency supplies to women and children in Palestinian refugee camps and school supplies to thousands of Palestinian children. In 2004, together with other Palestinian women, it completed the International Human Rights March of Women, which traveled for three weeks through Israel and Palestine and called for an end to the Occupation and the creation of a just peace between the two peoples. The coalition includes BAT SHALOM, THE FIFTH MOTHER, MACHSOMWATCH, MOVEMENT OF DEMOCRATIC WOMEN FOR ISRAEL (TANDI), NEW PROFILE, NOGA (A FEMINIST JOURNAL), Women for Coexistence (NELED), WOMEN IN BLACK, and Women's International League for Peace and Freedom (WILPF). (www.coalitionofwomen4peace.org).

Collaborators, Palestinian

In the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, a collaborator is a Palestinian who assists Israeli security forces by gathering information, trapping or identifying "wanted persons" for Israel, or selling land to Israeli organizations, among other things. Collaboration is one of the prime mechanisms used by Israel to fight Palestinian resistance to the OCCU-PATION. Menahem Landau, head of the Arabic section of the SHIN BET (the Israeli internal security service), said in an interview with Israel's Channel One on 20 May 2001 that the role of collaborators was crucial to Israel. He said that, despite developments in electronic technology, collaborators remained the prime and most reliable source of intelligence gathering. "Without them we could never achieve anything in our war against TERRORISM," he commented. "We cannot, for one second, do without the services they provide us."

Collaborators have been a convenient way for Israel to obtain information in the Palestinian territories since 1967, and there has been no shortage. Israel follows an aggressive recruitment policy and has used poverty, cultural norms, entrapment (sometimes staged), and bribery (making the supply of essential services dependent on cooperation) to induce individuals to become collaborators. Israel looks for those in vulnerable positions and then exerts pressure on them, sometimes using blackmail and other threats to keep them cooperative. Most often, Israel pays a small sum: before the 2000 uprising, about $100 a month for a typical collaborator. Sexual entrapment is sometimes used, according to some Palestinians. Palestinian homosexuals are particularly vulnerable in a society that is intolerant of gay relationships. Israel also uses drug dealers and addicts.

The most common means of recruitment, however, is an Israeli offer to provide necessary services in exchange for collaboration. For example, to obtain a PERMIT to earn a livelihood, to acquire medical treatment, to travel, and so on, Palestinians are induced to collaborate with Israelis. In their 1990 book, Every Spy a Prince, Yossi Melman and Dan Raviv put it thus: "If a Palestinian wants a building license, the government will first review this with the local Shin Bet case officer. And an Arab merchant could not get the proper licenses without the consent of the Shin Bet. Almost every daily activity and every minute in the lives of Palestinians is subjected to supervision by the Shin Bet." Given the extensive control the Israeli authorities exercise over the Palestinian areas, it is not hard for the Israeli intelligence services to constantly find new ways to induce collaborators.

Israel's ability to recruit in exchange for services is related to the fact that, although the Military Government is responsible for providing services to the Palestinians, it has never fulfilled this duty. This insufficiency, combined with the great dependence of Palestinians in the territories on the branches of the Military Government, has led to the emergence of an institution of lobbyists, collaborators, and individuals with close ties to the authorities who, for a price, act as go-betweens and obtain the services and permits needed by the local residents. B'TSELEM (Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) notes that, "since 1967, the security forces have recruited tens of thousands of Palestinians from the territories to serve as collaborators."

Another aspect of the collaborator issue relates to Palestinian culture and social structure, which is based on the hamula—the extended family or clan—and upheld by the ideology of honor versus shame. In this social system, Palestinians are accustomed to approaching intermediaries to obtain certain types of services. If the intermediary is successful in granting the request or obtaining the service, then some kind of reciprocity is expected. This system has made it easy for Israel to co-opt individuals, even family elders and mukhtars (village chiefs), because their social rank has depended to a great extent on their ability to dispense favors, and this power lies ultimately in the hands of the Israeli authorities. It is also the case that Palestinians engaging in behavior considered dishonorable in Palestinian society—for example, a woman seen in public with a man other than her husband or a very close relative, or a man taking drugs—might opt to collaborate rather than risk bringing shame to her or his family.

Collaborators receive preferential treatment from the authorities. To enable collaborators to protect themselves against attacks by other Palestinians, the authorities supply many of them with weapons, but collaborators frequently use those weapons illegally to threaten, wound, or kill other Palestinians for personal reasons. Israel does not punish collaborators who are implicated in criminal offenses such as forgery, fraud, murder, and other crimes.

Israel also uses collaborators as agents of the state to perform acts that the authorities may not want to engage in. For example, collaborators participate in the interrogation of Palestinian detainees and engage in the use of TORTURE.

When Israel redeployed from some Palestinian towns beginning in 1994 in the context of the OSLO PROCESS, it wanted to expand its operation for finding and maintaining collaborators so as to keep track of events outside its area of control.

The Shin Bet set up a special unit to select likely collaborators from among the close circles of HAMAS activists and PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) officials. An indication of its success is evident, for example, in BETHLEHEM, where Shin Bet increased the number of offices for its collaborator network from two mobile homes in 2000 to seven in 2003. Each Palestinian village and refugee camp has about ten collaborator agents, and in the cities the number is far greater.

In the post-Oslo period, the supply of collaborators has increased because of Palestinian frustration over the failure of the peace process and the lack of a political solution on the horizon. This is compounded by the ECONOMIC situation: unemployment has risen to more than 60 percent and poverty is widespread. In this period, it has been primarily money that has turned Palestinians into informants, and it does not take very much. Collaborators who have confessed to PNA police often say they get as little as $50 for each meeting with a handler.

Israel not only overlooks its collaborators' criminal activity, but it also takes measures to protect them. When Palestinians attack suspected collaborators, as is quite common, the authorities make strenuous efforts to apprehend, try, and punish those involved. Palestinians who become collaborators, if discovered, are typically killed by other Palestinians. Frequently, the authorities resort to collective punishment for this killing, such as by demolishing or sealing suspects' houses. Some of those sought on suspicion of attacking collaborators have been declared "wanted individuals," a status usually given to individuals who have committed terrorist attacks against Israel.

See also ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Bibliography

- Be'er, Yizhar, and Saleh 'Abdel-Jawad. Collaborators in the Occupied Territories: Human Rights Abuses and Violations. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1994. www.btselem.org/English/Publications/Summaries/199401\_Collaboration\_Suspects.asp.
- Cook, Jonathan. "Matrix Reloaded—Yet Again." ZNet. 16 November 2003.
- Ghazi Hamad, Ghazi. "Dealing with the Enemy." Palestine Report. 11:12 (2004). www.palestinereport.org.
- Gorenberg, Gershom. "The Collaborator." New York Times Magazine. 18 August 2002.

- Hamad, Jamil, and Aharon Klein. "Beset by the Israelis, the Palestinians Are Seeing Collaborators All Over: 'The Enemy Within.'" Middle East. 27 August 2001.
- Hass, Amira. "Come Pray, and Tell Us about Your 'Military' Connections." Ha'aretz. 15 February 2005.
- . "I Told the Shin Bet Man: 'Sweetie, I'm Not a Liar.'" Ha'aretz. 7 December 2000.
- . "Palestinian Claims Shin Bet Forcing Him to Become a Collaborator." Ha'aretz. 5 July 2004.
- Jawwad, Saleh Abdel. The Classification and Recruitment of Collaborators. The Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs, 2001. www.passia.org/publications/dialogue\_series/collaborators/saleh.html.
- McGreal, Chris. "Informer in Pay of Israel Unbowed by Brother's Bloody Fate." The Guardian (UK). 4 August 2004.
- Myre, Greg. "Coerced or Not, Palestinians Who Assist Israel, Face Death." New York Times. 29 November 2003.
- Palestinian Centre for Human Rights. "Collaborators." Press release (Ref: 169/2004). 1 December 2004.
- Palestinian Human Rights Monitor*. "Human Rights and Legal Position of Palestinian 'Collaborators': A Look into the Fate and Legal Position of Suspected Collaborators since the Establishment of the Palestinian Authority." 2001. www.phrmg.org/monitor2001/jul2001.htm.
- Raviv, Dan, and Yossi Melman. Every Spy a Prince: The Complete History of Israel's Intelligence Community. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1990.
- Taylor, Catherine. "How Israel Builds Its Fifth Column." Christian Science Monitor. 22 May 2002.

Combatants' Letter

In the Combatants' Letter, published in 2002 by fifty reserve combat officers and soldiers in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES, the signers made public their refusal to fight in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. The initiators of the letter, Captain David Zonshein and Lieutenant Yaniv Itzkovits, officers in an elite unit, had served for four years in compulsory service and another eight years as reserve soldiers, including long periods of active combat both in LEBANON and in the Occupied Territories. The letter reads: "We, reserve combat officers and soldiers of the Israel Defense Forces, who were raised upon the principles of ZIONISM, sacrifice and giving to the people of Israel and to the State of Israel, who have always served in the front lines, and who were the first to carry out any mission, light or heavy, in order to protect the State of Israel and strengthen it.

"We, combat officers and soldiers who have served the State of Israel for long weeks every year, in spite of the dear cost to our personal lives, have been on reserve duty all over the Occupied Territories, and were issued commands and directives that had nothing to do with the security of our country, and that had the sole purpose of perpetuating our control over the Palestinian people. We, whose eyes have seen the bloody toll this OCCUPATION exacts from both sides.

"We, who sensed how the commands issued to us in the Territories, destroy all the values we had absorbed while growing up in this country.

"We, who understand now that the price of Occupation is the loss of IDF's human character and the corruption of the entire Israeli society.

"We, who know that the Territories are not Israel, and that all SETTLEMENTS are bound to be evacuated in the end.

"We hereby declare that we shall not continue to fight this War of the Settlements.

"We shall not continue to fight beyond the 1967 borders in order to dominate, expel, starve and humiliate an entire people.

"We hereby declare that we shall continue serving in the Israel Defense Forces in any mission that serves Israel's defense.

"The missions of Occupation and oppression do not serve this purpose—and we shall take no part in them."

By mid-2005, 634 combatants from all units of the IDF and from all sectors of Israeli society had signed the letter and had joined the movement COURAGE TO REFUSE. The members of the movement, often called "refuseniks," continue to do their reserve duty wherever and whenever they are summoned but refuse to serve in the Occupied Territories. Many have been punished and imprisoned for refusing their orders to serve. (www.seruv.org.il/defaulteng.asp).

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; REFUSER SOLIDARITY NETWORK

Communists in Israel

In 1922, Jews and Palestinians formed the Palestine Communist Party, also called the ARAB-PALESTINE COMMUNIST PARTY. In the 1940s this party split in two: the mostly Jewish Communist Party of Israel (MAKI or Miflaga Komunistit Yisraelit), which was inclined to Zionist views and recognized the new state of Israel, and a mostly Arab group, the Palestine Communist Party, which did not recognize the new state.

In 1965 Maki split into two groups: a primarily Jewish party that retained the name Maki and a second group, the New Communist List (RAKAH), which was mostly, though not exclusively, Israeli-Arab and considered itself the remnant of the Palestine Communist Party.

In 1973, Maki joined the noncommunist, pro-peace party MOKED (Focus), and in 1977, Maki, Moked, and several other small groups joined SHELLI (Peace for Israelis, Equality for Israelis). Meanwhile Rakah, in 1977, joined other ANTI-ZIONIST groups (Jewish and Arab) to form HADASH (Democratic Front for Peace and Equality, or DFPE), a left-wing group made up of the Communist Party of Israel and other small left-wing groups. In 1988 former LABOR PARTY Knesset member Abdul Wahab Daroushe founded the noncommunist ARAB DEMOCRATIC PARTY, which competed with Rakah and Hadash.

In 1989, Rakah changed its name to Maki, and it remains the leading force in Hadash. It is largely but not entirely Arab and remains anti-Zionist. In 1995 a new party emerged, according to its founders, because of the failure of Israel's "Communist Party," called ODA in Hebrew and DA'AM in Arabic. It is not a strictly Communist party but adheres to Marxist ideology. In 1999 another new group appeared, the Israeli Communist Forum, which sees itself as the true heir to the Israel Communist Party.

Bibliography

- Benin, Joel. Was the Red Flag Flying There? Marxist Politics and the Arab-Israeli Conflict in Egypt and Israel, 1948–1965. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Rubenstein, Sondra. The Communist Movement in Palestine and Israel, 1919–1984, replica ed. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1985.

Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations

See AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS; MEDIA, US; US AID TO ISRAEL

"Conquest of Labor"

See HISTADRUT

Conscientious Objectors

Conscientious objection to war and military service in Israel should be understood in the context of what has been termed "civil militarism," that is, the capacity of the Israeli state to mobilize the resources of groups and individuals to enhance its geopolitical capacity and make war or turn war into an interest of various groups in Israel. The conscientious objection movement challenged the main motifs of Israeli civil militarism while at the same time contributing to the emergence of civil society.

Though Israel has been involved in a state of protracted conflict and in a cycle of wars since its establishment in 1948, a massive peace movement emerged only in 1978. From 1948 to 1978, political space was closed to peace initiatives; the political elite displayed a unified opinion regarding the solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, and cultural norms precluded any deviations from militarism. The predominant element in this attitude was the view that because Israel was surrounded by non-democratic, hostile states that wished to destroy it, only the establishment of democratic regimes in the surrounding Arab countries could bring about a peaceful solution. Therefore, to advance peace, Israel had to mobilize most of its resources to ensure its survival, and peace would be achieved only in an almost utopian future. Another assumption that loomed even larger was that the Arab-Israeli conflict could be resolved only by force and military might. The belligerent mood of most Arab states as well as the polarization of the international arena by the Cold War and the power contest between the UNITED STATES and the SOVIET UNION only strengthened these basic assumptions regarding issues of war and peace.

The 1967 WAR bore paradoxical results. On the one hand, Israel's military victory and the expansion of its boundaries brought about the glorification of the army and of all things military. On the other hand, the OCCUPATION of the GAZA STRIP, the WEST BANK, the Sinai Peninsula, and the Golan Heights; the control and management of populations under military rule; and the establishment of Jewish SETTLEMENTS gave rise to small protest movements that conceived of the new OCCUPIED TERRITORIES as a bargaining chip in peace negotiations. During the 1970s two small groups of Israeli high school seniors published a letter addressed to the prime minister and minister of defense in which they declared their refusal to serve in the Occupied Territories. This was the first time in Israeli history that anyone had attempted to change the terms of the unwritten contract between the individual and the state. However, none of those initiatives gained momentum, and only two of the signatories were convicted for refusal.

The 1973 War shattered the illusion that territorial depth and expanded boundaries could guarantee the security of Israel. The war's devastating results (2,569 fallen soldiers) sowed the seeds for a reconsideration of the entire outlook regarding Israel's role in a peace process.

It was not until 1978, with the visit of Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat to Israel and the expectations created by the prospects of peace with EGYPT, that the formula "territories for peace"—in which Israel returns Arab territory it conquered in war in exchange for peace and normal relations—began to take hold among wide sectors of the Jewish-Israeli population, especially those identified with the LABOR PARTY. Moreover, Labor's loss of hegemony—after thirty consecutive years in government—afforded these sectors a more autonomous outlook regarding alternative solutions to the Arab-Israeli conflict. The relative opening of the political space and engagement of other elites who shared peace values were among the factors that enabled the spread of the formula "territories for peace" and the emergence of a mass peace movement, PEACE NOW. However, this did not change the patterns of political obligation; Israeli males continued their service in the military, and their opposition to Israel's war policies was frozen the moment they were called up for active duty.

This situation was to change in June 1982 when Israel invaded LEBANON. The LEBANON WAR represented a qualitative change in Israelis' attitudes toward political obligation and protest. The very sectors that gained their prestige and standing through their allegiance to the national missions and war policies—mainly secular, middle-class Israeli Jews of Western origin associated with the Labor movement—recognized for the first time that Lebanon was a war of choice. From the first week of the war, small demonstrations were staged, which, as the war expanded, turned into massive protests around the country. These rallies contradicted a tacit but firmly established consensus that as long as there is active warfare, the home front is in solidarity with the battle front and abstains from any critical stance that could undermine national solidarity. For the first time in the history of Israel, citizen soldiers questioned the right of the state to command its male citizens to kill and be killed under any circumstances, especially when the security of the state was not threatened. This questioning was translated into a movement of selective conscientious objectors. From 1982 to 1985, 160 reserve soldiers were convicted and sentenced by military courts to jail terms for refusing to serve in the war in Lebanon, and an unknown number of reserve soldiers reached informal agreements with their commanders to be either released from their reserve duty in Lebanon or granted the option to serve within the borders of Israel.

Conscientious objection during the Lebanon War signaled the emerging crisis of Israeli civil militarism. YESH G'VUL (There Is a Limit) mounted a frontal challenge to the war policies of the Israeli state, citing the invasion of a foreign country, the attempt to interfere in its internal affairs, the establishment of a government friendly to Israel, the length of the war, and its cost weighed against its gains. The war in Lebanon was perceived as a transgression of all the accepted conditions for waging a war—that is, only when there is an existential threat to the state and its people and only for defense and its targets, that is, other armies. The crystallization of the conscientious objector movement during the war in Lebanon contributed to a split between citizenship and military service and broke down the halo of sanctity surrounding war and warmaking, thus blazing the path for an active opposition to Israel's war policies.

In 1985, Israel partially redeployed its forces in Lebanon. Two years later, in 1987, the Palestinian uprising, or INTIFADA, broke out, initiating a new cycle of Israeli-Palestinian violence and a new form of protest. The Intifada was a popular, grassroots uprising that included demonstrations, strikes, tax revolts, and other acts of civil disobedience that involved virtually the entire Palestinian population. Soldiers trained in combat faced mostly policing missions, such as enforcing CURFEWS, chasing demonstrators in alleys, doing home searches, and making arrests. These missions further undermined the morale and prestige of soldiering, and the fissures that had emerged during the Lebanon War between combat soldiering and constabulary activities deepened the crisis of Israeli civil militarism.

At that time, the effects of the conscientious objector movement could already be ascertained. From 1987 to 1993, 190 reserve soldiers were convicted and jailed for refusing to serve in the Occupied Territories. Moreover, a considerable number of soldiers made alternative arrangements, and refusal (declared and undeclared) turned into a viable option for opponents of Israel's military policies. However, conscientious refusal did not expand beyond the ranks of the reserve army, nor was it granted covert or overt legitimacy by the left-wing political parties. To the contrary, their representatives as well as the main organization of the Israeli peace movement (Peace Now) not only kept a distance from the conscientious objector movement but were also among their most adamant critics.

The 1993 Oslo DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES brought about a partial demilitarization of Israel and, to a certain degree, a deescalation of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Although Oslo did not bring an end to the Israeli Occupation of the Palestinian Territories, the possibility of an agreement partially demobilized the organizations within the peace movement. Yet, although protest activity subsided during the "Oslo period," new radical peace initiatives were developed. Certain Israeli Jews perceived the militarization of the Israeli state and society, and especially "civil militarism," as requiring an alternative. The emergent movement NEW PROFILE (The Movement for the Civilization of Israeli Society) set a wide and ambitious agenda that sought to examine the relationship between militarism, inequality, and violent and discriminatory practices that hinder the development of democratic participation. Moreover, the movement maintained that the militaristic Israeli mindset prevented the achievement of real peace in the region. New Profile sought to achieve its goals through an array of projects, such as a rethinking of conscription, an open endorsement of citizens who refused to be inducted into military service, and various projects that demilitarized education and the curriculum. During the new cycle of violence sparked by the outbreak of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, New Profile blazed the path for a new wave of draft refusers and a thorough questioning in Israeli society of civil militarism in Israel.

The collapse of the OSLO ACCORDS after the failure of the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT (July 2000) and ARIEL SHARON'S visit to the Muslim religious site AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF in East JERUSALEM were among the factors that accelerated the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada in October 2000, which immediately shattered the expectations of a peaceful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Prime Minister EHUD BARAK'S faltering coalition fell apart in February 2001, and Ariel Sharon was elected prime minister. The new coalition, which included LIKUD and Labor representatives as well as religious and extreme rightist parties, was defined as a National Unity government. Like former governments of this type, it led to a political stalemate. The peace camp, already demobilized under the Barak coalition, was slow to react to the mounting cycle of violence. SUICIDE BOMBER attacks on Israeli urban centers, combined with the delegitimization of YASIR ARAFAT as a partner for peace, drained the disintegrated peace movement's energies and massive constituency. The Israeli military sought to escalate the conflict with the Palestinians and to define it as a full-fledged war from its very beginning. As violence increased, the Israeli army's actions against the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) and its institutions undermined the PNA's ability to restrain militant groups (the role assigned to them by the Oslo Accords), and a new wave of suicide bombings brought about a strong Israeli military reaction. However, contrary to what happened in the First Intifada, there were no Israeli groups protesting the ever-escalating cycle of violence. From February to March 2002, TERRORIST attacks on Israeli urban centers escalated, and the death toll swelled. The military buildup that had been in progress for years, including the preparations for yet another military operation against the Palestinians, was becoming apparent.

Amid the war preparations, mobilization of reserve units, and partial demobilization of peace organizations, a group of fifty combat officers published a letter, called the "COMBATANTS' LETTER," in which they stated their refusal to continue to fight what they termed "this war for the peace of the settlements." Behind the letter stood a new organization, COURAGE TO REFUSE. More than 600 combat soldiers and officers signed the Combatants' Letter, and approximately half the signatories were convicted and jailed for their refusal to serve in the Occupied Territories. The new organization of conscientious objectors called into question the relation between the ongoing Occupation of the Palestinian territories and the security of Israel. Moreover, Courage to Refuse portrayed the soldiers' missions in the Occupied Territories as destroying the core values of Israeli education and of the Israeli military as well. Taking pride in their role as combat soldiers and officers, the signatories to the letter claimed that the Occupation completely undermined and defiled the best qualities of the Israeli combat soldier and transformed him into a hooligan executing illegal and immoral orders.

There are both differences and similarities between conscientious objection in the 1980s and 1990s and that developing in the new millennium. In the first period, conscientious objection represented an attempt to redefine the unwritten contract between the individual and the state. While capitalizing on the discourses of Israeli civil militarism, this movement of conscientious objectors promoted the idea that military service and war participation are one way to contribute to society but not the only one. As such, it set the agenda to liberalize Israeli citizenship and to open it to groups and individuals who were marginalized by the close association between citizenship and military service. In the wake of the new millennium, the conscientious objector movement has expanded, and different organizations pursue different and sometimes contradictory agendas, each attempting to monopolize the movement. Some groups—such as Courage to Refuse—strongly adhere to the narratives of Israeli civil militarism and ZIONISM, whereas other organizations promote agendas that represent a sharp departure from those narratives. For these groups, conscientious refusal is partly a means to regain the lost cultural and political dominance of the ASHKENAZI middle and upper-middle classes. As such, conscientious objection is part of the identity struggles taking place in Israel.

For other groups, mainly for the emergent and expanding group of draft REFUSENIKS (SHMINISTIM and New Profile), conscientious objection is a way to demilitarize Israeli society. Instead of reinstating militaristic values and identities, the new movement, composed mainly of high school students facing the draft, not only opposes the Occupation but also seeks alternatives to military service as different ways to contribute to their society.

Since the 1980s, conscientious objection in Israel has had an important role in the formation of civil society and in the promotion of a critical outlook toward the war and security politics. In its expansion from reserve soldiers to draftees to regular military service and from one organization to a variety of organizations that promote different visions of Israeli society and of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, conscientious objection has gained legitimacy in Israel and reflects profound changes in the relations between individuals, social groups, and the state while also furthering these changes.

See also ISRAELI MILITARISM; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY

Bibliography

- Ben-Eliezer, Uri. The Emergence of Israeli Militarism 1939–1956 (Hebrew). Tel Aviv, Israel: Dvir Publishing House, 1995.
- . “State versus Civil Society? A Non-Binary Model of Domination through the Example of Israel.” Journal of Historical Sociology. 11 (1998). Courage to Refuse. www.seruv.org.il.
- Helman, Sara. “From Soldiering and Motherhood to Citizenship: A Study of Four Israeli Peace Protest Movements.” Social Politics. 6 (1999).
- . “War and Resistance: Israeli Civil Militarism and Its Emergent Crisis.” Constellations. 6 (1999).
- Kimmerling, Baruch. “Militarism in Israeli Society.” Theory and Criticism: An Israeli Forum (Hebrew). 4 (1993).
- . “State Building, State Autonomy and the Identity of Society: The Case of the Israeli State.” Journal of Historical Sociology. 6 (1993).
- Levy, Yagil. “Militarizing Inequality: A Conceptual Framework.” Theory and Society. 27 (1998).
- Mann, Michael. “The Roots and Contradictions of Modern Militarism.” New Left Review. 162 (1987).
- . “War and Social Theory: Into Battles with Classes, Nations and States.” In The Sociology of War and Peace. Edited by Martin Shaw and Colin Creighton. London: Macmillan, 1987.
- New Profile. What We Do: The New Profile Movement to Civil-ize Israel. Israel: New Profile: Movement for the Civil-ization of Israeli Society, 1999.
- Shafir, Gershon, and Yoav Peled. Being Israeli: The Dynamics of Multiple Citizenship. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

—Sara Helman

Convergence Plan

Devised by former Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON and first formally articulated by EHUD OLMERT, convergence is premised on the belief that because Israel has no partner with which to negotiate, it therefore must unilaterally determine its final BORDERS to ensure a Jewish majority.

Ehud Olmert, Sharon’s successor, waged his election campaign for the prime ministership (won in March 2006) as a referendum on the Convergence Plan: settling the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians over control of LANDS under Israeli OCCUPATION by annexing to Israel the major WEST BANK SETTLEMENTS and settlement blocks (e.g., MA’ALE ADUMIM, Etzion, and Ariel). The 2005 Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, implemented under Sharon, was one aspect of the Convergence Plan. In its most expansive version, Olmert proposed that Israel annex approximately 10 percent of the West Bank, including settlements and historic areas in East JERUSALEM, along a perimeter defined more or less by the separation BARRIER. Israel would expand settlements west of the Barrier and withdraw its settlers from the remaining areas—this includes seventy-two settlements with a current population of close to 60,000—while maintaining exclusive security control over these territories as well as over the border crossing points to JORDAN.

Although Olmert and the KADIMA PARTY he leads won the 2006 elections, they did so without a parliamentary majority large enough to be considered a mandate to fully implement the convergence project. From the outset, it appeared that Olmert would not have enough Knesset votes to proceed with his plan. Nevertheless, in May 2006 Olmert traveled to Washington to obtain the US seal of approval. US president GEORGE W. BUSH praised Olmert's "bold ideas . . . [that] could lead to a two-state solution if a pathway to progress on the ROAD MAP is not open in the period ahead."

After two wars in the summer of 2006—in Gaza and more importantly in LEBANON—Olmert's ability to maneuver was considerably reduced. Still, the convergence scheme enjoys strong support in Israel, and if not Olmert, undoubtedly another prime minister will implement it. Palestinians in general and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in particular have been and continue to be excluded from this process.

See also ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA; EHUD OLMERT

Bibliography

- Baskin, Gershon. "Partnership with Abbas Is the Guarantee for Olmert's Convergence Plan to Succeed." Partners for Peace—The Copenhagen Group. 25 April 2006.
- Benn, Aluf. "Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Favors Rapid West Bank Withdrawal Push." Ha'aretz. 1 June 2006.
- Benn, Aluf, and Shmuel Rosner. "Bush: Olmert's Convergence Plan Could Be 'Important Step to Peace.'" Ha'aretz. 24 May 2006.
- Cook, Jonathan. "How Olmert Conned Washington over Convergence." Dissident Voice. 3 June 2006. www.dissidentvoice.org.
- . "Israel's Road to 'Convergence' Began with Rabin." CommonDreams.org News Center. 11 May 2006. www.CommonDreams.org.
- Klein, Menachem. "Unilateralism of the Desperate: The Israeli and American Way to Confront Hamas." Logos (Summer 2006).
- Lefkowitz, Etgar. "PM Goes to US to Discuss Convergence." Jerusalem Post. 8 May 2006.

- Macintyre, Donald. "Olmert Says West Bank Settlements Will Stay." The Independent (UK). 8 February 2006.
- McGreal, Chris. "Israel Sets Four Year Deadline to Draw Final Borders." The Guardian (UK). 10 March 2006.
- "Olmert to WSJ: Convergence Is to Be Done within 18 Months." Ha'aretz. 14 April 2006.
- Sternhell, Ze'ev. "Suffering from a Paralysis of Thought." Ha'aretz. 30 June 2006.
- Susser, Leslie. "Olmert: Convergence Is 'Zionism's Lifeline.'" Jewish News Weekly. 26 May 2006.

Councillists

See ARAB PARTY

Courage to Refuse

Courage to Refuse (Ometz Le'sarev) was founded following the publication of the COMBATANTS' LETTER in 2002 by the original letter signatories and serves as a support group for soldiers who refuse to serve in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. As of mid-2005, more than 280 members of Courage to Refuse had been court-martialed and jailed for periods of up to thirty-five days as a result of their refusal, and 629 had signed the letter. Over time, well-known public figures expressed their support of Courage to Refuse. Hundreds of university professors signed support petitions, and the word seruv (Hebrew for "refusal"), which a few years ago was synonymous with treason, has become an accepted part of the Israeli political discourse. According to a 2003 survey conducted by the Yaffee Center for Strategic Studies, over 25 percent of all Israelis sympathize with Courage to Refuse and acknowledge each citizen's civil right and moral duty to refuse to serve the OCCUPATION. Beyond refusing to serve in the Occupied Territories, the group's members take part in demonstrations, cultural events, and public education aimed at ending the Occupation and bringing peace to Israel. (www.seruv.org.il/English/default.asp).

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT; PILOTS' LETTER; REFUSER SOLIDARITY NETWORK; SHMINISTIM

Covenant of the League of Nations, Article 22 (1919)

Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations created the mandates for four new Arab states: IRAQ, LEBANON, SYRIA, and Palestine. The covenant was approved by the Paris Peace Conference on 28 April 1919 and was incorporated in the Treaty of Versailles, which was signed two months later. Article 22 applied to the Arab territories that were detached from OTTOMAN TURKEY at the end of World War I. In accordance with Article 22, these four states were subjected to “temporary mandates” designed “to assist them and to lead them to complete independence.” Despite the affirmative words, in reality the mandates were extensions of French and British imperialism. Moreover, the Palestine mandate, into which Britain incorporated the BALFOUR DECLARATION promising a homeland for the Jews, negated the league’s principle “that the well-being and development of their [the mandate’s] inhabitants form a sacred trust of civilization.”

A fifth territory located in the area lying east of the Jordan River was entrusted to Britain and attached to the Palestine mandate. This territory, Transjordan, had not been part of historic Palestine but had been administratively part of the province of Syria in Ottoman times, when it was called the district of Al Balqa’. When the question of delimiting the mandates arose, Britain insisted on the inclusion of Al Balqa’ in its mandate over Palestine because it wished to reward Emir Abdullah, son of Sharif Husayn Ben Ali of Mecca, for his help during the war against the Ottomans. The new territory assumed the name Transjordan and Britain set it up as an emirate. It remained under a protective treaty relationship with Britain until 25 May 1946, when it was formally detached from the Palestine mandate and Emir Abdullah was recognized as king of Transjordan. In 1949 the new kingdom assumed the name of the Hashemite Kingdom of JORDAN.

See also BRITISH MANDATE; JORDAN

Crusades

A series of nine major (and many more minor) military campaigns between 1095 and 1291 were waged by Christians, usually sanctioned by the pope of Rome in the name of Christendom, with the goal of recapturing JERUSALEM and the sacred “Holy Land” from Muslim rule. In 1187 the Muslim general SALADIN retook Jerusalem without bloodshed, and the city remained in Muslim hands until 1228, when, during the Sixth Crusade, the invaders captured and held Jerusalem for ten years, after which it again reverted to and remained under Muslim control until 1967.

Cultural Zionism

See ZIONISM

Curfew

Curfew in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES—sometimes called lockdown or mass house arrest—is the most extreme RESTRICTION ON MOVEMENT imposed by the Israeli authorities. Ostensibly a security measure, it is a collective restriction imposed on a whole area—a neighborhood, town, city, refugee camp, or even the entire WEST BANK and/or the GAZA STRIP. A curfew can remain in force for several days, weeks, a month, or several months. During a curfew the residents of the affected area are confined to their homes twenty-four hours a day.

Israel does not announce a curfew in advance but uses Israeli jeeps, tanks, and armored personnel carriers to drive through Palestinian streets with loudspeakers notifying all to go home. This announcement is regularly accompanied by rapid machine-gun fire in the air and the exploding of tear gas canisters and stun grenades in the open markets to make sure people understand the message.

All businesses and stores close immediately, schools dismiss, government offices lock their doors, and medical services are, for all intents and purposes, inaccessible to the public. Families are dependent on what food supplies they have on hand, although during lengthy curfews the authorities usually lift the lockdown once a week for two to four hours so that people can stock up on necessities.

During the curfew, tanks, military jeeps, and snipers patrol the streets, making sure residents remain confined to their houses. Anyone seen outside their home—even on their front door steps—can be arrested or shot. There have been numerous instances of Palestinian civilians being killed for violating a curfew. For example, on 21 June 2002, four Palestinians, three of them children, were killed and twenty-four injured when Israeli soldiers opened fire on a market in Jenin at a time when Palestinian residents believed the curfew on the city had been lifted. B’TSELEM (Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) reported that “as of October 2002, the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) had killed nineteen Palestinians, twelve of them children under fifteen years old, for violating a curfew.” Dozens more were wounded. None of these Palestinians, according to B’Tselem, had endangered soldiers’ lives.

It is often difficult for residents of an area to determine when a curfew has been suspended because in many areas the Israeli military fails to publicly announce the lifting of restrictions. Residents are forced to rely on MEDIA reports and other informal sources of information to learn when and for how long the curfew will be relaxed. Frequently, a lift is announced and then canceled at the last minute, or the curfew is reimposed prior to the originally announced time.

B'Tselem has reported extensively on the many adverse effects of curfews: "Another grave practice employed by the IDF in enforcing curfew is the firing of tear gas. This practice caused the death of an infant and others were injured when they were hit by the tear-gas canister. Some Palestinians required medical treatment for inhalation of the gas . . . soldiers sought to punish Palestinians by intentionally firing tear-gas canisters into a house and car." Israel maintains that the enforcement of the curfews is a security issue.

As collective punishment, curfew has been used frequently during the First INTIFADA, for three months during the 1991 GULF WAR when the entire West Bank and Gaza were under curfew, and frequently during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. In addition to these "long curfews," the practice is used before, during, and after every Jewish holiday, which typically lasts eight or more days, and during which the entire West Bank and Gaza Strip are under curfew. When Jews kill Palestinians, Israel imposes curfews. For instance, in May 1990 when Ami Popper murdered seven Palestinian workers and wounded another ten in Rishon le-Zion, the entire Gaza Strip was put under curfew for eight days. When, in 1994, BARUCH GOLDSTEIN massacred twenty-nine Muslim worshippers in the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE, all of HEBRON'S Palestinian population was put under curfew for a month. Palestinians killing Israelis is another occasion for curfew. For instance, when unknown assailants stabbed to death Rabbi Shlomoh Ra'anah in his mobile home in the settlement outpost of Tel Rumeida in the southern part of HEBRON DISTRICT, Israel imposed a curfew on all 18,000 Palestinians living in H2 (Israeli-controlled Hebron) and imposed a hermetic closure on H1 (the Palestinian-controlled part of the city), where 150,000 people live.

During OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD, a major Israeli offensive lasting three weeks during the al-Aqsa Intifada, the IDF imposed a curfew on most residents of the West Bank, and in some areas, to prevent Palestinian resistance, the curfew continued even after the operation finished. In the next incursion, OPERATION DETERMINED PATH, which lasted several months, the army reentered Palestinian cities in the West Bank and reinstated the curfew for all the cities except JERICHO and for many refugee camps, towns, and villages. In the initial weeks of the operation, almost 2 million Palestinians were under curfew. After two months, the IDF began to gradually lift the curfew from the towns and villages, but the major cities remained under curfew for many more months.

See also CLOSURE; RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Aziz, Nadya. "Testimony: Life under Curfew." From Occupied Palestine. 9 October 2003.
- Bahour, Sam. "The Violence of Curfew." The Blanket: A Journal of Protest and Dissent. 2002. <http://www.counterpunch.org/bahour0827.html>.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). "Curfew." n.d. www.btselem.org/english/Freedom\_of\_Movement/Curfew.asp.
- Hanieh, Adam. "West Bank Curfews: Politics by Other Means." Middle East Report. 24 July 2002.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Civilians under Siege: Restrictions on Freedom of Movement as Collective Punishment. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center on Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2001.
- Middle East Watch. Under the Toughest Curfew since 1973, West Bank and Gazan Palestinians Face Growing Hardship. Human Rights Watch, 1991. www.hrw.org/reports/pdfs/i/israel/israel-1.pdf.
- Swisa, Shlomi. Lethal Curfew: The Use of Live Ammunition to Enforce Curfew. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center on Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2002.

Custodian of Absentee Property

The ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW that Israel enacted in 1950 defines categories of "absentee persons," which then permits the state of Israel to seize their property. By this law Israel acquired all the land, homes, movable properties, and other assets of the approximately 800,000 Palestinian REFUGEES of the 1948 WAR as well as those of many Palestinian citizens of Israel, such as the PRESENT ABSENTEES. The law stipulates that all the property of the absentees would be transferred to the Custodian of Absentee Property, with no possibility of appeal or compensation. (From there, by means of another law, the property was transferred to the state of Israel or the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND.) The law gives the custodian the "right" to seize, administer, and control land owned by persons defined as “absentees.” An absentee is someone who is not on his land on a specified verification date. Eventually all absentee property is turned over to a state institution for exclusive use by Jews.

Some relevant aspects of the authority of the Custodian as prescribed in law are as follows: “(1) All absentees’ property is hereby vested in the Custodian . . . (a) every right an absentee had in any property shall pass automatically to the Custodian . . . and the status of the Custodian shall be the same as was that of the owner of the property. (b) The proceeds of vested property shall be dealt with like the vested property yielding the proceeds. (c) Vested property . . . (2) may be taken over by the Custodian wherever he may find it. . . (5) The fact that the identity of an absentee is unknown shall not prevent his property from being absentees’ property . . . (6) (a) A person who has in his possession any absentees’ property is bound to hand it over to the Custodian. (b) A person who has a debt to or any other obligation towards an absentee shall pay such debt or discharge such obligation to the Custodian. . . . (7) . . . (b) The Custodian may, himself or through others having his written consent, incur any expenses and make any investments necessary for the care, maintenance, repair or development of held property or for other similar purposes [for use by Jews]. (8) (a) The Custodian may carry on the management of a business on behalf of an absentee, whether or not he indicates that the business is managed by the Custodian, but he shall always have the right to sell or lease the whole or a part of the business, and—(1) if it is the business of an individual—to liquidate it; (2) if it is the business of a partnership all the partners of which are shareholders which are absentees, or of a cooperative society, in which all the members of which are absentees—to wind up the partnership, company or cooperative society by order . . . (7) in every case as if the Custodian had been appointed as a liquidator not replaceable by another liquidator.”

Israeli historian Tom Segev has described in detail the work of the Custodian of Absentee Property in Israel in 1948–1949. This Custodian commissioned individual contractors with the following advice: “Go from house to house, from shop to shop, from warehouse to warehouse, from plant to plant, from quarry to quarry, from field to field, from orchard to orchard, and also from bank to bank and safe to safe—to count, measure, evaluate, estimate, replace locks on doors and transfer all moveable property to well-guarded warehouses, while maintaining a correct inventory of the property and its location.”

“This inventory included approximately 45,000 homes and apartments, 7,000 shops and businesses, 500 workshops and industrial plants, and over 1,000 warehouses. Alongside this work, the Custodian wanted to ensure that over 800,000 acres of Palestinian land continued to be cultivated so that crops didn’t go to waste and livestock did not die. All profits were to go to the government treasury, although many were taken for individual personal use and sale against orders of the government.”

How much of Israel’s territory consists of land confiscated under the Absentee Property Law is uncertain but in an interview in 1980, the Custodian of Absentee Property estimated, “this could amount to up to 70 percent of the territory of Israel, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.”

See also ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; PALESTINIAN REFUGEE PROPERTY CLAIMS; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Fisk, Robert. “The Land of Palestine, Part Eight: The Custodian of Absentee Property.” The Times (London). 24 December 2008.
- Israel, State of. “Basic Laws of the State of Israel.” Vol. 14, Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew. Jerusalem: Government Printer, 1948–1987.
- . Custodian of Absentee Property/Absentee Property Law, 1950. <http://domino.un.org/UNISPAL.nsf/eed216406b50bf6485256ce10072f637/b444fa0215cb59118525683300758ef9?OpenDocument>
- . “General Laws of the State of Israel.” Vol. 4, Laws of the State of Israel: Authorized Translation from the Hebrew. Israel Law Resource Center. Jerusalem: Government Printer, 1948–1987.
- Jiryis, Sabri. The Arabs in Israel, updated ed. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1977.
- Kretzmer, David. The Legal Status of the Arabs in Israel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Lehn, Walter. “The Jewish National Fund.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 3:4 (1974).
- Orni, Efraim. Land in Israel: History, Policy, Administration, Development. Jerusalem: Jewish National Fund, 1981.
- Rabinowitz, Dan, and Khawla Abu-Baker. Coffins on Our Shoulders: The Experience of the Palestinian Citizens of Israel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
- Segev, Tom. 1949: The First Israelis, reprint ed. New York: Owl Books, 1998.
- Sohar, Ezra. Israel’s Dilemma. New York: Shapolsky Publishers, 1989.

---

D

---

Da'am

Da'am/Organization for Democratic Action is a Palestinian-Jewish, secular Marxist party in Israel that broke away from Israel's COMMUNIST Party in 1995. It argues that the Palestinian question will be solved only within the context of a global solution to the crises caused by capitalism.

Dahlan, Muhammad Yusuf (1961–)

Muhammad Dahlan (Muhammad Yusuf Shakir Dahlan/Abu Fathi) was head of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY'S (PNA) Preventive Security Service (PSS) in GAZA from 1994 to 2000. He is a member of FATAH and was a leader of the First INTIFADA, during which he was deported, landing in TUNIS where he became the protégé of YASIR ARAFAT. Dahlan returned to Gaza with Arafat and his coterie in 1994, where he established a personal power base, growing out of his position in the PSS. Arafat's trust in Dahlan was reflected in the negotiating positions he appointed him to as PNA representative: at the US-sponsored WYE RIVER talks (1998), at CAMP DAVID (2000), and at TABA (2001). In the Occupied Territories, he became a principal representative of Fatah's "YOUNG GUARD" and a vocal critic of the older generation of Palestinian leaders who returned from exile with Yasir Arafat and remained entrenched at the head of Fatah institutions. During the years of the OSLO PROCESS (1994–2000), Dahlan enjoyed generally good relations with Israel and the UNITED STATES, including long-established cooperative links with the CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY (CIA). In 2006–2007, Dahlan led the Fatah insurrection against HAMAS to weaken the resistance of the Islamist movement, which seized control of the Gaza Strip in 2007, and in 2008 he advised Israel ahead of OPERATION CAST LEAD, the twenty-two-day offensive in the Gaza Strip.

Born in the Khan Yunis refugee camp in the Gaza Strip to a REFUGEE family from Hammama, Palestine (now Nitzanim, Israel), Dahlan began his political activity as a teenager in Khan Yunis, where he recruited friends into organized groups for civic projects, such as road sweeping. As a student leader at the Islamic University of Gaza, where he earned a B.A. in business administration, he expanded the group to become a network of charitable organizations staffed by children and teens. Members delivered food and medicine door-to-door while advocating Palestinian nationalism and national unity. In 1981 the group formally became the Shabiba (Fatah Youth Movement), which was a driving force in the First Intifada.

When the Intifada broke out in 1987, Dahlan emerged as one of the uprising's young leaders in Gaza, but in 1988, Israel arrested and DEPORTED him to JORDAN. From there he went to Tunis, becoming very close to Yasir Arafat. He speaks fluent Hebrew, much of which he learned during eleven incarcerations in Israeli prisons before he was twenty-five. Dahlan was allowed to return to Gaza in July 1994 with Arafat, who put him in control of the Fatah movement in Gaza and made him head of the PSS for the Gaza Strip, one of the major security forces of the PNA. The control of these two large organizations made Dahlan one of the most powerful officials in the PNA.

As head of the newly formed PSS, Dahlan was responsible for building a police force from scratch. He received training and assistance from the CIA and created a police force of more than 20,000 men. Dahlan also developed a small empire in Gaza, informally called "Dahlanistan." He maintained order, sometimes ruthlessly, and Palestinian and international human rights organizations accused his PSS of serious abuses, including torture. He accumulated personal wealth from some of the PNA's monopolies—for example, oil and cement—and from the awarding of building contracts. Dahlan was the object of considerable criticism when he purchased the largest house in Gaza—the luxurious estate of former Gaza mayor HAJJ RASHAD AL-SHAWWA—for a reported $600,000. The fact that Dahlan's many years in Israeli jails insulated him to some extent from public criticism, and he was popular among younger Fatah members, who identified with him more easily than with the senior Palestinian Tunisian leadership. Nevertheless, that he contributed to the PNA's reputation for corruption is undeniable.

As head of the Gazan PSS, Dahlan was responsible for restraining Palestinian militants, in particular Hamas, which rejected the OSLO ACCORDS between the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION and Israel and which carried out attacks against Israel. At a January 1994 meeting in Rome with senior ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) and SHIN BET officials, Dahlan is believed to have drawn up a plan to coordinate security measures for containing Hamas. Until 2001 he met regularly with Israeli and US defense and intelligence officials. Dahlan's close liaison with the CIA and Israeli security services earned him considerable suspicion among the Palestinians and often accusations of COLLABORATION. In 1995, following a spate of Hamas SUICIDE BOMBINGS, Dahlan cracked down hard on the militant Islamic organization's infrastructure. On orders from Arafat, he disarmed and jailed some 2,000 known Hamas members, shaved their beards, and tortured many. His police also raided and closed Islamic charities, schools, and mosques. Even Israel acknowledged that the PNA's actions against Hamas were effective. During the crack-down, Dahlan worked closely with the FBI and the CIA, and he developed a warm relationship with US CIA director GEORGE TENET, an appointee of President BILL CLINTON who stayed on under President GEORGE W. BUSH until July 2004.

Dahlan (and Arafat) were able to strike Hamas in 1996 because the PNA and the Oslo peace process with which it was identified still enjoyed the support of the majority of the Palestinian public. Within a year, however, a new Israeli (LIKUD) government was in place, and Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU and his aides effectively halted implementation of the Oslo Accords. As a result public confidence in the OSLO PROCESS began to slip among Palestinians, and the PNA's repression of militants for the benefit of an Israeli government that was not interested in ending the OCCUPATION became controversial among Palestinians. By the time the AL-AQSA INTIFADA erupted in September 2000, Palestinian anger at the failure of Oslo to bring them anything but increased hardship was intense and extremely widespread. In such an environment, Dahlan could do little to rein in militants.

In November 2000, Israel accused Dahlan of being a TERRORIST, and Prime Minister EHUD

BARAK dispatched Israeli planes to strafe Dahlan's Gaza headquarters, after which opposition leader ARIEL SHARON declared that Dahlan "deserved to die" and should be "liquidated." Six months later, Dahlan's motorcade came under fire from the IDF, seriously wounding four of his bodyguards as he returned to Gaza from a negotiating session with Israeli officials. Dahlan, however, continued to be a player in Palestinian politics. In 2002, together with HASAN 'ASFUR, SAEB EREKAT, MUHAMMAD RASHID, and NABIL SHA'TH—the "GANG OF FIVE"—Dahlan took over leadership of the PNA from Arafat, running its affairs from March to May.

In 2003, after an intense struggle over the composition of the new Palestinian Cabinet, and under heavy pressure from the United States and Great Britain, Arafat agreed on 23 April that MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen), the minister of the interior, would bring Dahlan into the government as minister of state for security affairs. Within two weeks, Abbas had quietly authorized Dahlan to restructure the PNA's Interior Ministry, in preparation for cracking down on militant groups under the US-sponsored ROAD MAP to Middle East peace. This effectively gave Dahlan control of the ministry and about 20,000 of the PNA's security police, but without the official job title. From the start, the struggle between Arafat and Abbas over Abbas's appointment of Dahlan contributed to undermining Dahlan in Gaza by making him look like an Israeli and US security agent.

Additionally, Dahlan was in the difficult position of needing the cooperation of both Hamas and Israel's Likud government if he was to deliver on his security obligations under the Road Map. While Israel expected Dahlan to produce a complete cessation of attacks on Israelis, the Palestinian public and the Islamic organizations expected him to obtain an end to Israel's TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS and incursions into the West Bank and Gaza, lifting of Israeli CLOSURES so that Palestinians could work their fields, and release of the thousands of PRISONERS in Israeli jails—none of which Dahlan could deliver without the cooperation of Ariel Sharon, now prime minister, who declined to provide it.

In 2004 Dahlan put forward a plan to negotiate with Hamas and smaller militant groups to bring about a hudna (cease-fire) with Israel, which he achieved in July 2004. He proposed to detach up to 25,000 men from Fatah's TANZIM and AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, and remove them from their WEST BANK power bases by turning them into a border police force, deployed along the BORDERS with Israel, Jordan, and the Golan Heights. In their place, the Palestinian cities would be policed by a newly created police force, made up of new recruits with no prior attachment to existing factions. Dahlan had apparently presented his intentions to the Bush administration at the Aqaba Summit of 4 June 2003 and won US approval. In practice, however, Abbas's government (already suffering repeated disagreements with Arafat and his supporters in the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE) was unable to elicit the necessary Israeli cooperation for Dahlan's proposals. The hudna collapsed in its second month, when Hamas and ISLAMIC JIHAD withdrew following the IDF's assassination of a senior leader from each of their respective movements.

In mid-July 2004 Dahlan was behind a wave of kidnappings and protests against his opponents in other factions that brought chaos to the Gaza Strip. Although Israeli and Western MEDIA tended to present the unrest as protest by "reformers" against a corrupt OLD GUARD, Palestinian commentators emphasized that this was rather a face-off between strong men in positions of power who used issues of reform and corruption to lend support to those who wished to challenge Arafat's entrenched leadership. And even though Dahlan and others were profiting from grassroots discontent, they had, in fact, used the same tools of patronage, cronyism, and brute force to rise to positions of prominence as had Arafat. When Abbas was elected president of the PNA in early 2005 after Arafat's death, he appointed Dahlan as minister for cabinet affairs. But PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL elections, held shortly thereafter, brought a Hamas government to power, and Dahlan's authority was diminished, although he was narrowly elected to the council as a representative for Khan Yunis in the legislative elections of 2006.

With the victory of Hamas, tensions between Hamas and Fatah escalated significantly. As the Palestinians slid toward civil war in the spring of 2006, Dahlan played a major role in fomenting unrest. And when, in June, Israel opened a campaign (which included the deaths of some 1,000 mostly Palestinian civilians from June to August) to bring down the elected Hamas government, Dahlan and his Fatah comrades did not attempt to protect their fellow Gazans, hoping, it appeared, that Hamas would fall and they could once again assume power. Unwilling to preside over a Palestinian civil war, Abbas tried another tactic. For weeks, King Abdullah of SAUDI ARABIA had been trying to persuade him to meet with leaders of Hamas in Mecca and formally establish a national unity government. On 6 February 2007, Abbas agreed to meet and took Dahlan with him. Two days later, on 8 February, the two major Palestinian factions—Fatah and Hamas—signed a historic conciliation agreement in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, known as the MECCA AGREEMENT.

Subsequently, Hamas and Fatah formed a National Unity Government in which ISMAIL HANIYEH of Hamas would be prime minister while Fatah members would occupy several important posts. The Bush administration was strongly opposed to this government, because it included Hamas and offered the organization legitimacy, and immediately drew up plans to bring about its demise. The US State Department proffered a proposal known as "Plan B"; its objective, according to a State Department memo that has been authenticated by an official who knew of it at the time, was to "enable [Abbas] and his supporters to reach a defined endgame by the end of 2007. The endgame should produce a [PNA] government through democratic means that accepts QUARTET principles." This would remove Hamas from a leadership role in the government. Plan B also called for Abbas to "collapse the government" if Hamas refused to alter its hostile attitude toward Israel. From there, Abbas could call early elections or impose an emergency government. It is unclear whether, as PNA president, Abbas had the constitutional authority to dissolve an elected government led by a rival party.

Another plan to terminate the National Unity Government was revealed by Vanity Fair magazine, which obtained and published confidential documents, since corroborated by sources in the United States and Palestine, that exposed a covert initiative spearheaded by Dahlan, approved by Bush, and facilitated by Secretary of State CONDOLEEZZA RICE and Deputy National Security Adviser Elliott Abrams to provoke a Palestinian civil war. The plan was for Dahlan to lead, armed with new weapons supplied at US behest, which would give Fatah the muscle it needed to remove the democratically elected Hamas-led government from power. According to a State Department official who declined to have his name on the record, there were two "parallel programs": the overt one, which the Bush administration took to Congress, “and a covert one, not only to buy arms but to pay the salaries of security personnel” to wage a campaign to remove Hamas. Congress never passed a measure expressly prohibiting the supply of aid to Fatah and Dahlan, but, according to a former CIA official, “it was close to the margins, but it probably wasn’t illegal.” Legal or not, arms shipments soon began to take place.

During the implementation of the secret plan, Dahlan “used my image, my power,” to wage what he termed “very clever warfare” for many months. According to several alleged victims, the tactics in this warfare entailed widespread kidnapping and extensive torture of Hamas members. Dahlan denies the use of such tactics but admits “mistakes” were made.

On 1 February 2007, Dahlan took his warfare to a new level when Fatah forces under his control stormed the Islamic University of Gaza, a Hamas stronghold, and set several buildings on fire. Hamas retaliated the next day with a wave of attacks on police stations. The National Unity Government lasted only a few weeks. Instead of driving its Islamist enemies out of power, the US-backed Fatah fighters, led by Dahlan, inadvertently provoked Hamas to seize total control of Gaza by mid-June 2007. In March 2007, despite objections from Hamas, Abbas appointed Dahlan to lead a newly reestablished Palestinian National Security Council, intended to oversee all security services in the Palestinian territories. However, after the Hamas takeover of Gaza, Abbas issued a decree in July 2007 dissolving his security council.

Dahlan has been blamed by many in Fatah for the rapid collapse of its forces in Gaza in the face of a Hamas offensive of June 2007 that lasted less than a week. Dahlan and most of the other senior commanders of the Fatah-dominated PNA security forces were not in Gaza during the fighting, leading to charges that they had abandoned their men in the field. During the fighting, Dahlan’s house on the coast of Gaza was seized by Hamas militants and subsequently demolished.

No man is more hated among Hamas members than Dahlan, who has been a favorite of US presidents and policymakers. Mahmoud Zahar, the former foreign minister for the Haniyeh government, who now leads Hamas’s militant wing in Gaza, commented that “everyone here recognizes that Dahlan was trying with American help to undermine the results of the elections. He was the one planning a coup.” President Bush has met Dahlan on at least three occasions. After talks at the White House in July 2003, Bush publicly praised Dahlan as “a good, solid leader.” Many Israeli and US officials say that the US president described him privately as “our guy.” Dahlan stated in Vanity Fair: “Yes, I was close to Bill Clinton, I met Clinton many times with Arafat.” Indeed, according to the New York Times, Dahlan was trusted by some in Israel and the United States, and some saw him as a potential successor to Abbas as Palestinian president.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY

Bibliography

- Abu Toameh. “Where in the World Is Fatah’s Strongman Dahlan?” Jerusalem Post. 13 June 2007.
- Avnery, Uri. “The Skin of the Seal.” Gush Shalom (Israel). 24 July 2004.
- Berg, Raffi. “Profile: Mohammed Dahlan.” BBC News Online. 23 April 2003. http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/middle\_east/2068270.stm.
- Burston, Bradley. “A Who’s Who of Corruption in Arafat’s Palestine.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 28 July 2004.
- El Fassed, Arjan. “Who Is Mohammad Dahlan?” Electronic Intifada. 20 December 2006. <http://electronicintifada.net/v2/article6275.shtml>.
- Erlanger, Steven. “A Gaza Political Figure (Dahlan) Says He’s Become a Scapegoat.” New York Times. 17 June 2006.
- Karon, Tony. “Palestinian Pinochet Making His Move?” Electronic Intifada. 21 May 2007.
- Kershner, Isabel. “Abbas Aide (Dahlan) in the Wake of Fatah Rout in Gaza.” New York Times. 27 July 2007.
- Massad, Joseph. “Pinochet in Palestine.” Electronic Intifada. 11 November 2006.
- Palestine/Israel Resources. “Dahlan, Muhammad: A Biography.” n.d. www.geocities.com/lawrenceofcyberial/palbios/pa05000.html.
- Rose, David. “The Gaza Bombshell.” Vanity Fair. April 2008.
- Samuels, David. “In a Ruined Country: How Arafat Destroyed Palestine.” Atlantic Monthly. September 2005.
- Shamir, Shlomo. “Fatah Strongman Dahlan Collaborated with Israel ahead of Gaza Op.” Ha’aretz. 9 February 2009.
- Waked, Ali. “Dahlan: Israel Has Changed.” Ynetnews.com. 22 August 2005.

Dajani Family

The Dajani family is deeply rooted in the history of Palestine and especially in JERUSALEM. During the BRITISH MANDATE, leading members of the family played important roles in the Opposition Party (led by the NASHASHIBI FAMILY). Dajanis helped form the Arab National Party in 1923 and were later associated with the NATIONAL DEFENSE PARTY. The family is known primarily for its achievements in the professions of medicine, law, and journalism, as well as in politics and business.

Historically prominent Dajanis include Sufist shaykh Ahmed Dajani, who lived in Spain in the fifteenth century. He led pilgrims to Jerusalem, where he was recognized as a learned religious leader. As a reward for his services to the people of Jerusalem, the OTTOMAN EMPIRE appointed him as the custodian of Prophet David's Mausoleum.

Other important family members included Abdel Rahman Ahmad, who became the first mayor of Jerusalem in 1763; Shaykh Hussein Bin Salim (1788–1858), the grand mufti (judge) of HAIFA; Abdullah Shafik (1871–1927), a well-known judge in JAFFA; Aref Bakr Ahmad (1856–1930), the second Dajani to serve as mayor of Jerusalem and later, under the British Mandate, head of the MUSLIM-CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION in Jerusalem; Shaykh Rawfiq Abdullah (1865–1951), mufti of Jaffa; Aref Pasha (1860–1930), also president of the Muslim-Christian Association during the mandate; and Mohammed Taher, elected in the late 1950s and early 1960s as a member of the Municipality of Jerusalem and the Arab Chamber of Commerce.

Several family members have been involved in the Jordanian government: Said Wafa, a district officer in the British Mandate government who also served in the Jordanian administration and from 1965 was a Cabinet minister several times; Nijm-ul-Din and Raja'i, ministers in the Jordanian government in the 1970s; Nijm-ul-Din, ambassador; Haj Ali Taher, minister of transportation in the Jordanian Cabinet in the mid-1960s; and Omar Sidqi, confidant and political advisor of King Abdullah of JORDAN.

Others in the family have been active in medicine or journalism: Fouad Ismail Bakr (1890–1940), a physician who built the first private hospital in Jaffa, known as the Dajani Hospital; Hasan Sidqi (1898–1938), a lawyer and journalist and one of the main leaders of the al-Dajani-Nashashibi opposition, leading to his assassination by the HUSAYNI faction; Mahmud Taher, a physician who established the Red Cross and Red Crescent Associations in Jerusalem in 1947; and Kamel Dajani, who was the first to issue a newspaper in Jaffa, Al-Sabah (The Morning), dealing with current political issues, and who was later a Jordanian government minister in the 1960s.

More recently Ahmed Sidqi (1936–2003) was a senior PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION official who served in several capacities: as a member of the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE (1977–1985), a member of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL, director of the PLO's PALESTINE RESEARCH CENTER, and cofounder of its organ Shu'un Filastiniyya (Palestine Affairs).

Dalet Plan/Plan Dalet

Plan Dalet, or Plan D, was a military strategy developed by the HAGANA, a Jewish military force in Mandatory Palestine considered illegal by the British, but regarded as a legitimate popular military force by the settler population. Plan D was conceived in phases: (1) Plan B, September 1945; (2) the May 1946 Plan, revised in December 1947 after the passage of the 1947 UN Partition plan (UN RESOLUTION 181); and (3) the Yehoshua Plan, 1948, finalized on 10 March 1948. Officially, the Zionist leadership described its purpose as defending the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. However, revisionist Israeli historians have argued that the true purpose of the final plan was to conquer as much of Palestine as possible in addition to what the UNITED NATIONS had allotted for the Jewish state and to force as many Palestinians as feasible to leave both the allotted and conquered areas. Although the military devised Plan D, the highest political echelons, including DAVID BEN-GURION, supported it.

The plan begins: "the objective of this plan . . . also aims at gaining control of the areas of Jewish SETTLEMENTS and concentration which are located outside the BORDERS [of the Hebrew state] against regular, semi-regular, and small forces operating from bases outside or inside the state." In Section 3b, Plan Dalet describes how defense forces were expected to deal with occupied "enemy" population centers by "destruction of villages (setting fire to, blowing up, and planting mines in the debris), especially those population centers which are difficult to control continuously . . . [and by] mounting search and control operations according to the following guidelines: encirclement of the village and conducting a search inside it, in the event of resistance, the armed force must be destroyed and the population expelled outside the borders of the state."

The Hagana officially began to implement Plan Dalet in April of 1948, although there had been numerous ethnic cleansing operations prior to that time, setting in motion the TRANSFER of Palestinians from their towns. On 9 April Jewish forces killed 254 Palestinians in the village of DEIR YASSIN. Within a month Palestinians were expelled from JAFFA, HAIFA, TIBERIAS, and SAFED. Israeli historian Ilan Pappé describes the directives of Plan Dalet: "The plan was executed because the soldiers in the battlefield were oriented by a general attitude from above and motivated by remarks made by the Yishuv's leaders on the need to 'clean' the country. These remarks were translated into acts of depopulation by enthusiastic commanders on the ground who knew that their actions would be justified in retrospect by the political leadership."

Israeli scholar Avi Shlaim provides an important insight: "The novelty and audacity of the plan lay in the orders to capture Arab villages and cities. . . . [Plan D's] objective was to clear the interior of the country of hostile and potentially hostile Arab elements, and in this sense it provided a warrant for expelling civilians. By implementing Plan D in April and May [1948], the Hagana thus directly and decisively contributed to the birth of the Palestinian REFUGEE problem."

According to Pappé, "Plan D can be regarded in many respects as a master plan for [Palestinian] expulsion. Moreover, the Plan legitimized, a priori, some of the more horrendous atrocities committed by Jewish soldiers. . . . Plan D, with its specific orders of destruction and eviction [resulted in] the lower strata of the Palestinian society [being] driven out. . . . The massacre in Deir Yassin [also] played an important role in driving these groups out of Palestine in April and May 1948. . . . [It] had a psychological effect on the Arab community and acted as a catalyst to the exodus."

The success of Plan D within the overall context of the establishment of Israel resulted in the expulsion or flight of some 770,000 to 800,000 Palestinians, more than half the total population, and their transformation into refugees. Four hundred eighteen villages were destroyed (more than 50 percent of the total Arab property in Palestine), and vast amounts of agricultural land were burned, while large quantities of both movable and fixed property (houses, factories, livestock, jewelry, bank accounts, etc.) were confiscated. This huge displacement of the Palestinians gave Israel a sovereign Jewish state in 78 percent of historic Palestine, with only a small population of Arabs remaining.

See also PALESTINIAN REFUGEE PROPERTY CLAIMS; TRANSFER AND DISPLACEMENT; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Begin, Menahem. The Revolt: Story of the Irgun. London: W. H. Allen, and New York: Henry Schuman, 1951.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon, 1987.
- . Zionism and the Palestinians. London: Croom Helm, 1979.
- Hadawi, Sami. Bitter Harvest: Palestine 1914–1979. New York: Caravan Books, 1979.
- Khalidi, Walid. "Plan Dalet: Master Plan for the Conquest of Palestine." Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:1 (1998).
- . "Text of Plan Dalet (Plan D) 10 March 1948: General Section: Arabic Translation." Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:1 (1988).
- Khalidi, Walid, ed. All That Remains: The Palestinian Villages Occupied and Depopulated by Israel in 1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992.
- . From Haven to Conquest: Readings in Zionism and the Palestine Problem until 1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1971.
- Masalha, Nur. A Land without a People: Israel, Transfer and the Palestinians, 1949–1996. London: Faber and Faber, 1997.
- Morris, Benny. 1948 and After: Israel and the Palestinians. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- . The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–1949, reprint ed. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge Middle East Library, 1989.
- . "Operation Dani and the Palestinian Exodus from Lydda and Ramla in 1948." Middle East Journal. 40 (Winter 1986).
- Nazzari, Nafez. The Palestinian Exodus from Galilee in 1948. Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1978.
- Pappé, Ilan. Britain and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1948–51. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 1988.
- . "The Geneva Bubble." London Review of Books. 26:1 (8 January 2004).
- . A History of Modern Palestine: One Land, Two Peoples. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- . The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951. London: I. B. Tauris, 1994.
- Pappé, Ilan, ed. Israel/Palestine Question: Rewriting Histories. New York: Routledge, 1999.
- Rogan, Eugene L., and Avi Shlaim, eds. The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge Middle East Studies, 2001.

- Segev, Tom. 1949: The First Israelis. New York: Free Press, 1986.
- . One Palestine Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate, 2nd reprint ed. New York: Owl Books, 2001.
- Shahak, Israel. "A History of the Concept of 'Transfer' in Zionism." Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:3 (1989).
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1988.
- . The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Slutsky, Yehuda, ed. "Text of Plan Dalet. Hebrew translation." Sefer Toldot Hahaganah (History of the Haganah), vol. 3, Appendix 48. Tel Aviv: Zionist Library, 1955–1960, 1972.
- Teveth, Shabtai. Ben-Gurion and the Palestinian Arabs: From Peace to War. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Vidal, Dominique. "The Expulsion of the Palestinians Re-examined." Le Monde. December 1997. www.palestineremembered.com/Acre/PalestineRemembered/Story674.html.

Darwish, Mahmud (1942–2008)

A Palestinian poet and political activist, Mahmud Darwish was arguably the most acclaimed poet in the Arab world. He was born in al-Birwah, a mixed Christian-Muslim village between HAIFA and ACRE in the Galilee. In 1948, after he was dispossessed by the Israelis and his village destroyed, he fled to LEBANON with his landowning Sunni Muslim family. The family returned to Haifa clandestinely after the census of Palestinians and thus had no proper identification papers. Darwish was a founder of AL-ARD (The Land), a left-wing non-communist, Arab nationalist political party banned by Israel in 1963. He was also a member of RAKAH (the Communist Party) and editor of its newspaper, al-Ittihad. Several times between 1961 and 1969, Israel imprisoned Darwish or placed him under house arrest, often for traveling around the country without a PERMIT.

He left Israel in 1970 for the USSR and then settled in Cairo in 1971, where he worked for al-Ahram, the official Egyptian newspaper. In 1973 he joined the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and moved to Beirut, where he was an assistant to the director of the PLO Revolutionary Council, later becoming the director. During his time in Beirut, he edited Shu'un Filastiniyya (the party magazine) and al-Karmil (a literary review). After the LEBANON WAR in 1982, Darwish left with PLO forces to TUNIS; then, following disagreements within the PLO, he moved to Paris and then to Amman, JORDAN, and Ramallah in the WEST BANK. Even after the OSLO PROCESS, Israel forbade him from returning to Haifa. He drafted the PALESTINIAN DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE in 1988, was president of the Union of Palestinian Writers and Journalists from 1984 until his death, and was a member of the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE from 1987 to 1993. Darwish has often been criticized for what some have considered his excessive closeness to Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT. Many readers consider his poem "Madih al-Zill al-Ali" an homage to Arafat, although Darwish denies it.

Poetry is the preeminent mode of cultural expression in the Arab world, and Mahmud Darwish is the iconic poetic voice of the Palestinian people. His poetry is characterized by vivid and haunting metaphors that tell of the suffering, loss, and resistance of the Palestinian people. Although Darwish's preoccupation with Palestinian issues remained constant, his treatment of these concerns evolved considerably through the years. His second poetry collection, Awraq al-Zaytun (Olive Leaves), published in 1964, contains two of his most famous poems. In "Identity Card," he writes an imaginary response to an Israeli official's questions, defining himself as an Arab robbed of his land who does not hate but only reacts like an animal when cornered. In "On Resistance," Darwish presents the land, the peasants, and resistance as an unbreakable trinity. As with all his political poems, aesthetic considerations were subordinated to the political imperative of encouraging Palestinians to resist Israel's encroachment. His early love poems foreshadow the eventual transformation of the beloved female into the beloved homeland that is characteristic of Darwish's subsequent poetry. The transformation appears complete in Ashiq Min Filastin (A Lover from Palestine, 1966, 1970). This intimate love relationship between poet and land grows steadily more intense until it reaches an almost mystical union in Darwish's later poems.

While he lived in exile, Darwish's encounter with the reality of the Arab world proved disillusioning, and much of his poetry contains a gripping sense of nostalgia for Galilee, Haifa, Mount Carmel, and the coast of Palestine, scenes that reverberate through the poems of the early and mid-1970s. The poetry of this phase is replete with common images of daily life in the homeland, such as the faces of family, friends, and the topography of the landscape. These poetic meditations are reflected in Darwish's collection Uhibbuki aw la Uhibbuki (I Love You, I Love You Not), published in 1972. Here the words, pictures, memory, and dreams of life before the Nakba (1948 catastrophe) join descriptions of wounds and death in exile as key concepts in Darwish's poetic language. In these poems the workings of dream and memory and the body of the beloved female blend imperceptibly with that of the homeland until they become virtually indistinguishable.

Although Darwish's poetry has a personal, almost confessional quality, it also frequently appeals to the prophetic tradition of the three great monotheistic religions, which imparts a universalistic dimension to these poems. Increasingly the cross, crucifixion, and especially wounds and sacrificial death become permanent motifs. Darwish also makes extensive use of the Hebrew prophets, notably Isaiah and Jeremiah, on whom he frequently calls to condemn Israel's acts of injustice against the Palestinians; for instance, Uhibbuki aw la Uhibbuki begins with seventeen psalms to Palestine. In tone and style, many of Darwish's lamentations echo those of the Old Testament, which Darwish, bilingual in Arabic and Hebrew, was able to read in the original.

Two important poems Darwish wrote after the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon merit mention, both for their form and substance. Both "Qasidat Bayrut" (Ode to Beirut, 1982) and "Madih al-Zill al-Ali" (A Eulogy for the Tall Shadow, 1983) are narrative poems of substantial length. The subject of both is the Palestinian resistance to the Israeli siege of Beirut during the summer of 1982. In each, Darwish abandons the subjective voice of the lyricist and, following the tradition of the classical Arab poets, uses the plural to praise the collective heroics of his people. Both poems employ a simpler, more direct, and clearer style than that of his earlier, more introspective poems. Of the two poems, "Madih al-Zill al-Ali" is significantly longer and is considered more accomplished artistically. It introduces into modern Arabic poetry the city (Beirut) and the sea (Mediterranean) as objects of sustained poetic interest and continues Darwish's cultivation of the prophetic voice, in this case using the voice of the prophet of Islam, Muhammad, to chastise the Arab regimes for abandoning the Palestinians and the Lebanese to the Israeli onslaught. Darwish's harshest invectives are reserved for the oil-rich Arab monarchies. Since writing these two narrative poems, Darwish's style has again become more intensely personal, although it is also allegorical. But in his most recent work, he avoids references to present-day occurrences—at least not in any discernible context.

Darwish received many awards for his poetry, including the Lotus Prize (Union of Afro-Asian Writers, 1969), the Lenin Prize (USSR, 1982), the Lannan Cultural Freedom Prize (United States, 2001), and the Erich Maria Remarque Peace Prize (Germany, 2003). Darwish was nominated as a Nobel laureate.

See also PALESTINIAN POETRY

Bibliography

- Antoon, Sinan. "Mahmud Darwish's Allegorical Critique of Oslo." Journal of Palestine Studies. 31:2 (2002).
- Aruri, Naseer Hasan. Enemy of the Sun: Poetry of Palestinian Resistance. Washington, DC: Drum and Spear Press, 1970.
- Darwish, Mahmud. The Adam of Two Edens: Poems by Mahmoud Darwish. Translated and edited by Munir Akash and Daniel Moore. Syracuse, NY: Jusoor and Syracuse University Press, 2000.
- . Unfortunately, It Was Paradise: Selected Poems. Translated by Munir Akash and Carolyn Forché. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
- Jayyusi, Salma Khadra, ed. Anthology of Modern Palestinian Literature. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Meisami, Julie Scott, and Paul Starkey, eds. "Imru' al-Qays." In Encyclopedia of Arabic Literature. London: Routledge, 1998.
- Said, Edward. "On Mahmoud Darwish." Grand Street. 48 (1993).
- Siddiq, Muhammad. "Mahmoud Darwish." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- Stein, Rebecca, and Ted Swedenburg, eds. Palestine, Israel, and the Politics of Popular Culture. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2005.

Dayan, Moshe (1915–1981)

A prominent Israeli military and political leader, Moshe Dayan was the architect of Israel's military policy in three wars: the 1956 invasion of EGYPT; the 1967 WAR against Egypt, JORDAN, and SYRIA; and the 1973 War against Egypt and Syria. As foreign minister for Israeli prime minister MENAHEM BEGIN, he was instrumental in fashioning the CAMP DAVID ACCORDS with Egypt.

Dayan was born in Deganya, an agricultural settlement in Palestine, the son of Shemuel Dayan (1891–1968), who was born in Zhashkov, Ukraine, and immigrated to Palestine in 1908. His mother, Devorah (1890–1956), came to Palestine from Russia in 1913. As a young man Dayan learned guerrilla warfare tactics and became the leader of special night patrols organized to fight Palestinian resistance groups during the BRITISH MANDATE. He helped organize the HAGANA, an illegal military force in British-occupied Palestine, which resulted in his arrest and imprisonment from 1939 to 1941. After his release Dayan served with British forces during World War II. While in combat in Syria, he lost his left eye, and the black patch he wore thereafter became a distinguishing trademark.

Moshe Dayan was known for his outspokenness. For instance, commenting on the transformation of Palestine into Israel, he remarked in an often-quoted 1969 speech before students at the Israeli Institute of Technology: “We came here to a country that was populated by Arabs, and we are building a Hebrew, Jewish state. . . . Instead of Arab villages, Jewish villages were established. You even do not know the name of the villages and I do not blame you, because those geography books no longer exist. Not only the books, but the villages no longer exist. . . . There is not a single SETTLEMENT that was not established in the place of a former Arab village.”

Dayan played a major part in the development of Israel’s civil militarism and was the epitome of the warrior-politician. He provided a clear example of discursive militarism in his famous eulogy for a KIBBUTZ member who was killed by infiltrators from the GAZA STRIP in April 1956. “It is our generation’s fate,” said Dayan, “it is our choice in life to be ready and armed, strong and unflinching, lest the sword slip from our grasp and our lives be cut off. . . . Let us not today fling accusation at the murderers. What cause have we to complain about their fierce hatred to us? For eight years now, they sit in their refugee camps in Gaza, and before their eyes we turn into our homestead the land and villages in which they and their forefathers have lived. We should demand his blood not from the [Palestinian] Arabs of Gaza but from ourselves. . . . Let us make our reckoning today. We are a generation of settlers, and without the steel helmet and gun barrel, we shall not be able to plant a tree or build a house. . . . Let us not be afraid to see the hatred that accompanies and consumes the lives of hundreds of thousands of Arabs who sit all around us and wait for the moment when their hands will be able to reach our blood.”

In 1958 Dayan retired from the military and joined Israel’s LABOR PARTY (MAPAI). The following year he was elected to the Knesset and was appointed minister of agriculture under Prime Minister DAVID BEN-GURION. He resigned in 1964 but joined Ben-Gurion in forming the new RAFI Party (Alliance of Israel’s Workers) in 1965, from which he was reelected to the Knesset. During the crisis preceding the 1967 War, Dayan was appointed minister of defense.

After the war Dayan was the first top-level secular politician to use suggestive biblical metaphors in his rhetoric; for example, he stated: “we’ve returned to Shilo [believed to have been a sanctuary containing the Ark of the Covenant until it was taken by the Philistines],” and “we’ve returned to Anathot [the prophet Isaiah’s birthplace] never to part from them again.” In Israel Dayan was the adored victor in a glorious war and according to AMOS ELON, it was at Dayan’s “urging that the war was retrospectively named after the Six Days of Creation. Right-wing and religious fundamentalists made the most of the victory and endowed the Six-Day War with a metaphysical, pseudo-messianic aura.” After successfully conducting the war, Dayan pacified the WEST BANK and developed a long-term plan—the DAYAN PLAN—for establishing Israeli control over the area. He then served as the military administrator for the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

As Menahem Begin’s foreign minister, Moshe Dayan personally advocated his expansive vision for Israel’s future to the UNITED STATES, which provides crucial insight into the US-Israeli relationship. The Israeli newspaper Ha’aretz reported his efforts in an article headlined “The Fathers of Success: Israel Has Succeeded in Finding the Most Appropriate Line in Its Relations with Washington.” According to Ha’aretz, and verified by others, the basis of the Dayan Plan, as presented to Washington was threefold:

1. Because Israel could do its own fighting, all it needed from the United States was armaments, not soldiers.

2. A militarily strong Israel, with the land acquired in the 1967 War, would make the Arabs despair of a military solution, thus preserving the peace and preventing the possibility of a confrontation in the Middle East between the United States and the Soviet Union.
3. A greater Israel could serve American interests in the Middle East—mainly the uninterrupted flow of oil—by protecting the conservative Arab regimes (the oil-rich kingdoms of the Persian Gulf) from the Arab radicals, such as Egypt and Syria. In the Ha'aretz piece Dayan was quoted as saying, “We explained that the Israeli army, with its real and not just relative power, presents a first line of defense for American interests in the Mediterranean area.”

“To sum up,” said Dayan, “what we did was to succeed in intertwining some of our interests with some American interests. . . . We suddenly realized that the State Department is not the place where ‘the buck stops.’ We realized that [Secretary of State WILLIAM] ROGERS can advance programs, but that it is possible to reject these and not bring the world to an end. Thanks in no small measure to [then ambassador] YITZHAK RABIN and his assistants, we suddenly discovered that we not only have contributors in the United States, but that we can exert strong and influential pressure and help to benefit individuals in elections. This time we succeeded in part in mobilizing our power (not officially, of course) to help [President RICHARD] NIXON in the election.”

After convincing the United States of Israel’s vision for the Middle East and after the Israeli-Egyptian treaties were concluded in 1979, Dayan resigned from Begin’s government and formed a new party, TELEM, which won two seats in the 1981 election. Dayan died shortly thereafter.

During his life Dayan was also an avid amateur archaeologist, which led to some controversy because of his illegal private acquisition of historical artifacts, often with the help of his soldiers. Upon his death Dayan’s extensive archaeological collection was sold to the state. Dayan also wrote five books: Diary of the Sinai Campaign (1966), Mappah Hadasha-Yahasim Aherim (New Map, Different Relations, 1969) on problems after the 1967 War, Moshe Dayan: Story of My Life (1976), Living with the Bible (1978), and Breakthrough: A Personal Account of the Egypt-Israel Peace Negotiations (1981).

See also CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS; DAYAN PLAN; INFILTRATION AND RETALIATION; ISRAELI MILITARISM; ISRAELI PEACE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Amdur, Richard. Moshe Dayan. London: Chelsea House Publishers, 1989.
- Aronoff, Myron J. “The Origins of Israeli Political Culture.” In Israeli Democracy under Stress. Edited by Larry Diamond and Ehud Sprinzak. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1993.
- Ben-Eliezer, Uri. The Emergence of Israeli Militarism 1936–1956 (Hebrew). Tel Aviv: Dvir, 1995.
- Ben Meir, Yehuda. Civil-Military Relations in Israel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.
- Carmi, Shulamit, and Henry Rosenfeld. “The Emergence of a Militaristic Nationalism in Israel.” International Journal of Politics, Culture and Society. 3:2 (1989).
- Dayan, Moshe. “The Fathers of Success: Israel Has Succeeded in Finding the Most Appropriate Line in Its Relations with Washington.” Interview, Ha'aretz. 7 March 1973.
- Elon, Amos. “Israelis and Palestinians: What Went Wrong?” The New York Review of Books. 49:20 (2002).
- Gertz, Nurith. Captive of a Dream: National Myths in Israeli Culture (Hebrew). Tel Aviv: Am Oved Publishers, 1995.
- Horowitz, Dan. “Is Israel a Garrison State?” The Jerusalem Quarterly. 4 (Summer 1977).
- Kimmerling, Baruch. “Militarism in Israeli Society.” Theory and Criticism (Hebrew). 4 (1993).
- Lau-Lavie, Naftali. Moshe Dayan: A Biography. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1969.
- Levy, Yagil. How Militarization Drives Political Control of the Military: The Case of Israel. New York: Center for Studies of Social Change, New School for Social Research, n.d.
- Lomsky-Feder, Edna, and Eyal Ben-Ari, eds. The Military and Militarism in Israeli Society. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999.
- Peri, Yoram. Between Battles and Ballots—The Israeli Military in Politics. London: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Rokach, Livia. Israel’s Sacred Terrorism: A Study Based on Moshe Sharett’s Personal Diary and Other Documents, 3rd ed. Belmont, MA: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1986.
- Sharett, Moshe. The Diaries of Moshe Sharett (Hebrew). Tel-Aviv: Sifriyat Ma’ariv, 1978.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
- Slater, Robert. Warrior Statesman: The Life of Moshe Dayan. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1991.
- Teveth, Shabtai. Moshe Dayan, the Soldier, the Man, the Legend. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1973.
- Van Creveld, Martin. Moshe Dayan. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 2004.

Dayan Plan

After Israel's sweeping victory in the 1967 WAR, two Israeli leaders—YIGAL ALLON and MOSHE DAYAN—put forth plans for the newly OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Within two weeks of the war's end, the two plans were conceptualized and ready for discussion by the Israeli Cabinet. The June 1967 Dayan Plan advocated settling Jews in densely populated Palestinian areas, while the ALLON PLAN called for establishing SETTLEMENTS as territorial buffers in strategic areas. Both plans were variations on the same goal of permanent Israeli control of major parts of the WEST BANK. As well as providing the guiding framework for the settlement movement in the years to come, Dayan and Allon both defined the limits of debate about the disposition of the West Bank and permanently foreclosed a range of other Israeli options. Although neither plan was ever officially adopted by an Israeli Cabinet, they have nevertheless provided the guiding principles for all Israeli governments as the settlement project inexorably moved forward.

Dayan's plan was based on the argument that Israel's minimum security requirements called for retention of some two-thirds of the Sinai, all of SYRIA'S Golan Heights, and a permanent, Israeli-controlled protective barrier along the Jordan River. Dayan envisioned permanent Israeli rule over the West Bank, which he sought to accomplish by building five blocks of settlements from north to south and settling Jews in areas with large Arab populations. The Dayan Plan proposed a vague "functional autonomy" for the Palestinians (or, he posited, they could remain citizens of JORDAN) and "garrison settlements" for the Jews. AMOS ELON, an Israeli writer and intellectual, observes that, contrasted with Allon's proposal (the Allon Plan), Dayan's plan was more ambiguous but also far more ambitious. Indeed, Dayan personally encouraged a variety of right-wing and religious fundamentalist militants to establish settlements and so-called heachsujot (outposts) that multiplied over the years through formal and semi-informal arrangements with the government.

Soon after the 1967 War, according to Elon, prominent Palestinian civic and political leaders were interviewed by two senior Israeli intelligence officers, one of whom was David Kimche, who later served as deputy director of MOSSAD (the Israeli intelligence agency) and director general of the Israeli Foreign Ministry. Kimche reported that most of the Palestinian leaders throughout the West Bank, including intellectuals, notables, mayors, and religious leaders, said they were ready to establish a demilitarized Palestinian state on the West Bank and that they would sign a separate peace with Israel. The PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION at the time was still a marginal group. Dayan shelved Kimche's report, which was never submitted to the Cabinet. Dayan's vision precluded even the discussion of a Palestinian state. Moreover, Dayan believed that as long as the "natives" were treated "decently," it would be possible to maintain the status quo in the West Bank and in Gaza for generations.

Jordan's King Husayn also made an early overture to Israel. He was ready to offer concessions to Israel along the narrow coastal plain and at the WESTERN WALL in the OLD CITY of JERUSALEM. Israel, however, had its own plans for Jerusalem. The municipal area of East Jerusalem was expanded by 24 square miles (64 square kilometers) of West Bank land that included 28 Palestinian villages together with their grazing and farming lands. The newly designated area of "East Jerusalem," together with what had been West Jerusalem, was declared Israel's unified capital for "all eternity." In addition to the GREATER JERUSALEM area, which Israel established on LAND confiscated from its Palestinian owners, Israel insisted on an expanded version of the Allon Plan, which was fully supported by Dayan. This called for the annexation of the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY from Lake Tiberias down to the Dead Sea, the heavily populated area between Jerusalem and HEBRON in the south, and the slopes of the western and northern mountain range of Samaria in the north. Husayn could not politically afford to accept such far-reaching concessions.

Dayan's approach was reflected in an interview he gave at the time to the editor of Der Spiegel. Asked how Israel hoped to achieve peace, he answered: "by standing firm as iron, wherever we are now standing, until the Arabs are ready to give in." As the settlement project expanded rapidly, Dayan provided new legitimizations for why Israel should keep the Occupied Territories. His most persistent tactic, according to Elon, was the argument that a treaty with the Arabs would be worthless because no Arab government was capable of guaranteeing the peace. Only by keeping the Arab land, Dayan repeated, could Israel count on "a generation of peace." The Dayan Plan, and the settlement movement it gave rise to, are summarized in a comment by Michael Ben Yair, Israel's attorney general in YITZHAK RABIN's government, who wrote in Ha'aretz: "The Six-Day War was forced on us; but the war's Seventh day, which began on June 12, 1967—continues to this day and is the product of our choice. We enthusiastically chose to become a colonialist society, ignoring international treaties, expropriating lands, transferring settlers from Israel to the Occupied Territories, engaging in theft and finding justifications for all this."

See also GUSH EMUNIM; JERUSALEM; SETTLEMENTS; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; UNITED STATES

Bibliography

- (See also bibliographical listings under DAYAN, MOSHE.)
- Ben Yair, Michael. "The War's Seventh Day." Ha'aretz. 3 March 2002.
- Ben-Yishai, Ron. "Israel's Move." Foreign Policy. 42 (Spring 1981).
- Dayan, Moshe. "The Fathers of Success: Israel Has Succeeded in Finding the Most Appropriate Line in Its Relations with Washington." Interview. Ha'aretz. 7 March 1973.
- Elon, Amos. "Israelis and Palestinians: What Went Wrong?" The New York Review of Books. 49:20 (2002).
- Forsyth, Jack. "Arab Oil and the Zionist Connection." The Link (Americans for Middle East Understanding). 7:1 (1974).
- Golani, Motti. "Chief of Staff in Quest of a War: Moshe Dayan Leads Israel into War." Journal of Strategic Studies. 24:1 (2001).
- Gorenberg, Gershon. The Accidental Empire: Israel and the Birth of the Settlements, 1967–1977. New York: Times Books, 2006.
- Lau-Lavie, Naftali. Moshe Dayan: A Biography. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1969.
- Osgood, Carl. "Akiva Eldar Stresses: Third Party Help Is Vital to Mideast Peace." Executive Intelligence Review. 4 July 2003.
- Pedatzur, Reuven. "Opportunity Knocked." Book review of Dreams and Missed Opportunities, 1967–1973, by Dan Bavly. Ha'aretz. n.d.
- Shainin, Jonathan. "Left at the Altar: Israeli Settlement Policy Disjoined Sovereignty and Occupation." Bookforum. April–May 2006.
- Stone, I. F. "Confessions of a Jewish Dissident." The New York Review of Books. 9 March 1978. www.nybooks.com/articles/article-preview?article\_id=8251.
- Tevet, Shabtai. Moshe Dayan, the Soldier, the Man, the Legend. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1973.
- Zertal, Idith, and Adiva Eldar. Lords of the Land: The War for Israel's Settlements in the Occupied Territories, 1967–2007. New York: National Books, 2007.

Dayr Yasin

See DEIR YASSIN

Declaration of Independence, Israel

Israel's Declaration of Independence, proclaimed on 14 May 1948, has been analyzed many times by Israeli scholars, many of whom conclude that the document contains an overarching contradiction: the conflict between universalistic democracy and the tenets of a particularistic nationalism—that is, ZIONISM—or what is also called the "dual commitment" to Jewishness and democracy. Because Israel has no constitution, the Declaration of Independence, together with the BASIC LAWS promulgated in the following years, constitutes the foundation of Israel's social, legal, and political culture. Israeli scholar Ilan Peleg argues that the declaration's dual commitment has led Israel to adopt both "Jewish" and democratic policies, and that such policies have frequently been in conflict. For example, acting Jewishly, the state sponsored the IMMIGRATION of millions of Jews under the 1950 LAW OF RETURN while, undemocratically, it acquired Palestinian LANDS specifically to "Judaize" the country and denied the right of return to Palestinian Arabs who were displaced in 1947–1948 so that Israel could be a Jewish state. Additionally, according to Peleg, "All the problems in terms of the quality of Israel's democracy stem directly from the country's adherence to its 'Jewishness' enshrined in the Declaration of Independence."

See also ISRAELI NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Bibliography

- Gavison, Ruth. "Jewish and Democratic? A Rejoinder to the 'Ethnic Democracy' Debate." Israel Studies. 4:1 (1999).
- Israel, State of. Declaration of Independence. 1948. <http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Peace%20Process/Guide%20to%20the%20Peace%20Process/Declaration%20of%20Establishment%20of%20State%20of%20Israel>.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. "Jurisdiction in an Immigrant-Settler Society: The 'Jewish and Democratic State.'" Comparative Political Studies. 35 (2002).
- Kretzmer, David. The Legal Status of the Arabs in Israel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Lustick, Ian. Arabs in the Jewish State: Israel's Control of a National Minority. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1980.

- Peled, Yoav. "Ethnic Democracy and the Legal Construction of Citizenship: Arab Citizens in the Jewish State." American Political Science Review. 86:2 (1992).
- Peleg, Ilan. Challenging a Sacred Formula. Report of the Oxford Centre for Hebrew and Jewish Studies, 2003. www.jrf.org/israel/ochjs.html
- . Human Rights in the West Bank and Gaza: Legacy and Politics. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1996.
- . "Israel as a Liberal Democracy: Civil Rights in the Jewish State." In Review Essays in Israel Studies: Books on Israel, vol. V. Edited by Laurie Eisenberg and Neil Caplan. New York: SUNY Press, 2000.
- . "Israel Constitutional Order and Kulturkampf: The Role of Ben-Gurion." Israel Studies. 3:1 (1998).
- Smooha, Sammy. "The Models of Ethnic Democracy: Israel as a Jewish and Democratic State." Nations and Nationalism. 8:4 (2002).
- Yiftachel, Oren. "The Concept of 'Ethnic Democracy' and Its Applicability to the Case of Israel." Ethnic and Racial Studies. 15 (1992).
- . "Ethnocracy, Geography and Democracy: Comments on the Politics of the Judaization of Israel." Alpaim. 19 (2000).

Declaration of Independence, Palestinian

At its nineteenth session (held in Algiers on 14 November 1988), the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC), the legislative body of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), adopted a formal Palestinian Declaration of Independence and a symbolic Declaration of Statehood in Exile. The declaration was released with a political communiqué intended to clarify specific PLO positions.

The declaration was and remains significant because it explicitly accepts the UN General Assembly's Partition Resolution 181(II) of 1947. For the first time, and in an historic compromise, the PLO formally accepted the two-state solution, thus acknowledging Israel's claim to 78 percent of historic Palestine and signaling the PLO's willingness to settle for a Palestinian state on the remaining 22 percent.

In the declaration, the PLO also stated its commitment to the purposes and principles of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to the policy and principles of non-alignment. The latter indicated that the state of Palestine was prepared to forswear any type of security treaty or other arrangement with the SOVIET UNION, along the lines of the ones then in existence between SYRIA and the Soviet Union, and was intended as a confidence-building measure for the benefit of Israel and the UNITED STATES.

Additionally the Declaration of Independence stated that, without prejudice to its natural right to defend the state of Palestine, the PLO rejects "the threat or use of force, violence and intimidation against its territorial integrity and political independence or those of any other state." The latter commitment was also explicitly intended to allay Israel's security concerns.

In a political communiqué attached to the declaration, the PNC indicated its willingness to accept UN supervision over Palestine on an interim basis until the OCCUPATION was terminated. The Palestinian concept of UN supervision was flexible; it could be implemented by means of a UN trusteeship of Palestine, or it could involve temporary UN supervision (or even temporary supervision by US troops). In whatever form, the concept was intended to reassure Israel.

The political communiqué called for the convocation of an international peace conference on the Middle East, based on UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 (1967) AND 338 (1973), which would guarantee the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people, first and foremost their right to self-determination. In other words, the PLO explicitly accepted Resolutions 242 and 338 but requested an additional element. The PNC's acceptance of these resolutions represented a significant concession as well as a major policy change by the Palestinians. The PLO had traditionally rejected Resolutions 242 and 338 because they referred only to a "solution to the REFUGEE problem" and said nothing about the political rights of the Palestinians.

Further, in the political communiqué the PLO indicated its willingness to establish a voluntary confederation between the states of JORDAN and Palestine. Again, this was a concession to the United States and Israel, which had called repeatedly for such a union—in the 1978 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS and the 1982 REAGAN PLAN, among others. The United States, however, did not consider the declaration sufficient to meet its demands for conducting a dialogue with the PLO and Israel dismissed it out of hand.

After the PNC issued the Declaration of Independence, Chairman YASIR ARAFAT vigorously pursued a peace offensive, most notably in his 14 December statement to the press in Geneva. In the political communiqué, the PLO had stated its “rejection of TERRORISM in all its forms including state terrorism.” In this regard, Arafat personally declared on 6 December 1988 that he renounced all forms of terrorism and was ready to start negotiations that would eventually lead to peace in the Middle East. At the press conference, Arafat accepted UN Resolutions 242 and 338 without directly coupling them with demands for Palestinian independence. He specifically stated that Israel has the right to exist in peace and security and declared, “we totally and absolutely renounce all forms of terrorism including individual, group, and state terrorism.” With that statement, Arafat fulfilled all the conditions set by the United States for talks with the PLO and opened the door for the short-lived US-PLO dialogue that began on 14 December 1988. At that point President RONALD REAGAN authorized the start of a low-level diplomatic dialogue with the Palestinian organization, in spite of opposition by Israel.

See also US-PLO DIALOGUE

Bibliography

- Arafat, Yasir. “Address of PLO Chairman Yasir Arafat to the Socialist Members of the European Parliament, Strasbourg, 13 September 1988.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:2 (1989).
- . “Yasir Arafat, Speech before the Forty-third Session of the United Nations General Assembly on the Question of Palestine, Geneva, 13 December 1988.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:3 (1989).
- . “Yasir Arafat, Text of Press Conference Statement, Geneva, 14 December 1988.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:3 (1989).
- Boyle, Francis A. “The Creation of the State of Palestine: The Framework for Negotiating a Comprehensive Middle East Peace.” The European Journal of International Law. n.d. www.ejil.org/journal/Vol11/No1/art20-01.html.
- . “International Law and Palestinian Independence Day.” Mid-East Realities. 15 November 2002.
- . Self-Determination: Palestine, Palestinians, and International Law. Atlanta: Clarity Press, 2003.
- Khalidi, Rashid. “The Resolutions of the 19th Palestine National Council.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 19:2 (1990).
- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Palestine Liberation Organization. Declaration of Independence. 1988. www.palestine-net.com/politics/indep.html or www.palestinegd.fi/stat.html.
- “Palestinian National Council, ‘Political Communiqué,’ Algiers, 15 November 1988.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:2 (1989).
- Said, Edward. The Politics of Dispossession: The Struggle for Palestinian Self-Determination, 1969–1994. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
- Sela, Abraham, and Moshe Ma’oz, eds. The PLO and Israel: From Armed Conflict to Political Solution, 1964–1994. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997.
- Sharif, Bassam Abu. “Bassam Abu Sharif, a Message from the PLO: ‘Give Peace a Visa,’ London, 28 November 1988.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:3 (1989).
- . “Prospects of a Palestinian-Israeli Settlement, Algiers, 7 June 1988.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 18:1 (1988).

Declaration of Principles

The Declaration of Principles (DOP), signed on 13 September 1993, was the first in a series of agreements between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in the OSLO PROCESS and the most important because it set the parameters for each of the accords that followed. It was signed by Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN and PLO chairman YASIR ARAFAT, under the auspices of US president BILL CLINTON.

The DOP was essentially a blueprint for the conduct of future negotiations: “the aim of the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations [is] . . . to establish a Palestinian Self-Government Authority . . . for a transitional period not exceeding five years, leading to a permanent settlement based on UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS 242 AND 338” (i.e., “Land for Peace”). The authority would be established in GAZA and JERICHO first, to be followed at a later time in other unspecified populated areas in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Negotiations over permanent status issues would begin “not later than the beginning of the third year . . . and will cover remaining issues including: JERUSALEM, REFUGEES, SETTLEMENTS, security arrangements, BORDERS, relations and cooperation with other neighbors.” The DOP constructed a two-stage process—an interim period and a FINAL STATUS stage, which meant that the PLO was forced to accept a five-year transition period, without prior agreement about the nature of a permanent settlement. Before Oslo the PLO had been steadfast in its opposition to an interim accord unless the principles of a final settlement were established in advance. Its acceptance here was a reflection of the weakness of the PLO at the time of the agreement.

According to the DOP, the domain of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), the interim administrative organization, would be functional, not territorial; that is, the PNA could exercise authority over the Palestinian people on specified matters, but it had no sovereignty over LAND, WATER, resources, or BORDERS. The DOP provided for ELECTIONS “under agreed supervision and international observation” that would select a “Council”—the governing authority. The council could legislate on matters concerning “education and culture, health, social welfare, direct taxation, and tourism . . . [and a] Palestinian police force, as agreed upon.”

The policing role would be split between the Palestinians and Israel. The PNA was to “establish a strong police force, while Israel will continue to carry the responsibility for defending against external threats as well as responsibility for overall security of Israelis for the purpose of safeguarding their internal security and public order.” Moreover, “the withdrawal of the military government will not prevent Israel from exercising the powers and responsibilities not transferred to the Council.” From Israel’s perspective, the PNA’s purpose was to police the Palestinian population to ensure that no attacks were perpetrated against Israel or Israeli settlers in the Occupied Territories. If the PNA failed to carry out this role to Israel’s satisfaction, Israel had the right to resume its previous responsibility in this area.

The DOP stipulated that Israel would “withdraw” from the Gaza Strip and “redeploy” from the Jericho area (and later other areas). In this context, redeployment indicated that the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) would be moved from the center of a major Palestinian city (or cities) to another nearby area—just outside of and around the city or cities. As Rabin made clear in a speech before the Knesset, the IDF would remain in the territories—redeployed from the urban centers to less provocative locations—but at the ready whenever Israel determined there was a need for its intervention.

The DOP also established “joint liaison committees” composed equally of Palestinians and Israelis for every issue and eventuality, including issues not mentioned in the DOP. In these committees both sides were treated in principle as equal; yet, in the reality of Israeli-Palestinian politics, Israel was overwhelmingly stronger and had far more resources to employ—not least of which was direct US intervention to pressure the Palestinians to accede to Israel’s wishes. Thus the Palestinians felt their interests were continuously sacrificed to Israel’s demands.

Another controversial aspect of the DOP was its foundation on UN Resolutions 242 and 338, which were interpreted differently by the Palestinians and Israelis. When the PLO accepted these resolutions in 1988 as a basis for peacemaking, it did so based on the international consensus that Israel would withdraw from the WEST BANK, Gaza, and East Jerusalem to the June 1967 borders. Subsequent PLO diplomacy focused on the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in these areas. Israel, however, argued that the resolutions required Israel to withdraw only from “some” but not all of the territories, and that Israel would never accede to a Palestinian state that possessed international sovereignty. The DOP does not clarify the two contradictory interpretations of the resolutions, and it puts the Palestinians in the position of having to bargain over how much and from which areas Israel would withdraw.

The DOP substituted the term “disputed areas” for “Occupied Territories,” a term carried over from the documents used at the MADRID CONFERENCE. Substantively, this meant that there was no Israeli commitment to end the OCCUPATION, because there were only “disputed” areas over which the two parties could negotiate.

Another contentious point was the DOP stipulation that “negotiations” would determine the Palestinian elections for a legislative council as well as its structure and responsibilities. By vetoing anything with which it disagreed, Israel would thus control who would be eligible to vote in the elections, how many seats the council would have, and how it would function, as well as its areas of jurisdiction. The constitution for the self-governing authority was also to be negotiated between Israel and the Palestinians.

Finally, the DOP required that all matters related to “economic development” must be “negotiated” or decided in a liaison committee, including water resources, electricity, energy, transport, trade, and industry. Again, the disparities in power were of such magnitude that Israel would always be able to realize its interests. Thus the DOP constrains the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) from pursuing its own independent economic development and growth.

The PLO entered the Oslo Process at one of the lowest points in its history, in part because of its support for IRAQ in the GULF WAR. Conversely, Israel was at the apex of its political and military achievements and enjoyed a full strategic partnership with the United States. In such circumstances the PLO was not able to influence even the most basic elements of the framework for peace in the DOP, and with every new agreement Israel was able to extract additional concessions. Moreover, when Israel failed to implement the agreements to which it committed itself, the Palestinians were powerless to compel it to do so. Conversely, when Israel determined that the PNA was not fulfilling its commitments—for example, each time an act of violence occurred—it undertook collective punishments.

The DOP grew out of the warm, personal relations that developed in Oslo between Abu Ala (AHMAD QUREI') and URI SAVIR. Savir was a highly skilled Israeli lawyer accustomed to dealing with the details of international agreements, while Abu Ala was a Palestinian economist with no legal background. The DOP was ambiguous enough to convince Abu Ala, Arafat, and Abu Mazen (MAHMUD ABBAS), the second president of the Palestinian National Authority, that it was the first step on a direct road to a sovereign independent Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem. Yet it contained all the legal safeguards necessary to protect Israel's interests and to prevent such a state from coming into being.

The other major aspect of the DOP that hurt the Palestinians was the separation of the interim period from the final status. While the Palestinians never seemed to understand the legal details of the final status provisions, the two-track framework permitted Israel to determine unilaterally the nature of the final outcome. Moreover, separating the two stages allowed Israel to prolong indefinitely the initiation of final status talks (in contrast to the three-five-year interim period stipulated in the DOP), in what some have termed a policy of "the permanence of temporary arrangements." In the interim period, Israel constructed new settlements, expanded existing ones, and built a new ROAD SYSTEM grid for use only by Jews throughout the West Bank.

Substantively, the DOP is not based on any aspect of INTERNATIONAL LAW or UN resolutions relating to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The DOP also does not mention any of the significant provisions in the body of international law that bear specifically on this conflict—for example, the Fourth Geneva Convention, the conventions relating to refugees and stateless persons, or the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Consequently, the DOP is not based on law, rights, or precedent but on a political agreement between two parties that are depicted as symmetrical, but which in fact have enormously unequal levels of power. Similarly, the failure to mention the Palestinian right to self-determination—a right specifically enshrined in numerous UN resolutions—deprived the PLO's potential to make use of these international norms and laws in its negotiations with Israel.

An additional significant grievance for the Palestinians was that the DOP had no provision for an impartial mediator in the event that Israel failed to fulfill its obligations. Although the United States assumed the role of broker, with Israel's blessing, Washington's strong support of Israel resulted in its ignoring Israel's failure to comply with its obligations under the DOP. Instead the United States consistently blamed Arafat and the Palestinians for all the setbacks, delays, and other problems throughout the seven-year Oslo Process. Ultimately the Oslo Process was ended by Israel's "security concerns." Each time residents of the Occupied Territories carried out an act of violence toward Israelis, Israel claimed that the PNA had failed to meet its security obligations under Oslo and suspended negotiations, halted redeployments, imposed CURFEWS, and so on.

The Declaration of Principles thus contained major structural impediments to the Palestinians' realizing their objectives. At the same time, it provided institutional safeguards for Israel's interests. Such an imbalance could not lead to a just and fair peace.

Bibliography

- Abdul-Hadi, Mahdi F. Documents on Palestine. Vol. I, From the Pre-Ottoman Period to the Prelude of the Madrid Middle East Conference. Jerusalem: Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs, 1997.
- Albin, C. "When the Weak Confront the Strong: Justice, Fairness, and Power in the Israel-PLO Interim Talks." International Negotiation. 4:2 (1999).
- Avnery, Uri. "The Peace Criminal." Gush Shalom. 21 July 2001. www.gush-shalom.org/archives/article154.html.
- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Brownlie, Ian, QC, ed. Basic Documents on Human Rights, 3rd ed. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1992.
- Center for Economic and Social Rights. Peace without Justice: Abandoning Rights in the Oslo Process. New York: Center for Economic and Social Rights, 2000.

- Dajani, Burhan. "The September 1993 Israeli-PLO Documents: A Textual Analysis." Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:3 (1994).
- Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace. www.usip.org/library/pa/israel\_plo/oslo\_09131993.html.
- Eldar, Akiva. "How Long Is the Western Wall?" Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 15 February 2002.
- . "A Negative Balance of Return." Ha'aretz. 15 February 2002.
- . "Symbols of Sovereignty." Ha'aretz. 15 February 2002.
- Lieberfeld, Daniel. "Conflict 'Ripeness' Revisited: The South African and Israeli/Palestinian Cases." Negotiation Journal. 15:1 (1999).
- Mallison, W. Thomas, and Sally V. Mallison. The Palestine Problem in International Law and World Order. London: Longman Group, 1986.
- Mattair, Thomas R. "The Breakthrough in Arab-Israeli Diplomacy." Middle East Policy. 2 (1993).
- Qurei, Ahmed. From Oslo to Jerusalem: The Palestinian Story of the Secret Negotiations. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.
- Sanders, Jacinta. "Honest Brokers? American and Norwegian Facilitation of Israeli-Palestinian Negotiations (1991–93)." Arab Studies Quarterly. 21 (1999).
- Shehadeh, Raja. "Questions of Jurisdiction: A Legal Analysis of the Gaza-Jericho Agreement." Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:4 (1994).
- Shlaim, Avi. "The Oslo Accord." Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:3 (1994).
- United Nations. Resolutions on Palestine. www.Palestine-UN.org.
- US House of Representatives, Committee on Foreign Affairs. Human Rights Documents: Compilation of Documents Pertaining to Human Rights. Washington, DC: US Government Printing Office, 1983.

De-development

See ECONOMY: THE EFFECTS OF OCCUPATION ON THE PALESTINIANS

Defense Emergency Regulations

In 1945 the BRITISH MANDATE government enacted the Defense Emergency Regulations, initially used against the Palestinians and later against the Jews. After Britain's Mandate ended in May 1948, Israel then adopted these emergency regulations to implement an official state of emergency over its Palestinian citizens who remained within the BORDERS of the new Israeli state after the 1948 WAR. Thereafter the Knesset continuously renewed the state of emergency and approved the continued use of the emergency regulations. They served as the legal basis for the military rule over the Israeli Palestinians, which lasted until 1965. Following the 1967 WAR, Israel used them as one of several legal mechanisms to control Palestinians in the Occupied Territories.

After cancellation of military rule in 1965, the Israeli Ministry of Justice established a committee of experts to examine the regulations and draw up proposals for their partial utilization, but the outbreak of the 1967 War brought the committee's work to a halt. At the beginning of its 1967 military OCCUPATION of the WEST BANK, GAZA STRIP, and East JERUSALEM, the Israeli government issued a military order applying the Defense Emergency Regulations in their entirety to the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES while at the same time "freezing" the legal situation then existing in those areas.

Over the years Israel has used these regulations extensively in the Occupied Territories to punish and deter. From the perspective of INTERNATIONAL LAW and civil rights, the most important of the regulations adopted by Israel are:

- Regulation 84—Unlawful Associations. This law empowers an Israeli government official or military commander to declare any body of persons or any organization to be an unlawful association. Any person who joins such an organization, attends its meetings, or is allegedly associated with it in any way may be subject to fine or imprisonment. Under this law Israel imprisoned tens of thousands of persons for alleged membership in the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION and later for alleged membership in HAMAS.
- Censorship: Regulation 94—Newspaper Permits. This law prohibits the publication of any newspaper without a prior PERMIT from the military authorities. In practice Israel extended it to the publication of books, volumes of poetry, and anything the military government thought that Palestinians should not read. In the early 1980s the military government issued a list of several thousand banned books that Palestinians were forbidden from reading.
- Regulation 110—Police Supervision. This regulation empowers the government/military to confine people to a limited area without trial or formal charges. This has been used by Israel for CLOSURES, town arrests, house arrests, CURFEWS, mass detentions, and other restrictions.
- Regulation 111—Administrative Detention. As the name suggests, this regulation provided the legitimization for ADMINISTRATIVE DETENTION, imprisonment without charge, or trial.

- Regulation 112—DEPORTATION. Israel has used this regulation to deport people from their area of residence without trial or formal charges.
- Regulation 119—Forfeiture and Demolition of Property, etc. House Demolitions or Sealing, Destructions of Crops. Israel uses this regulation to legalize HOUSE DEMOLITIONS, the sealing of houses, the destruction of crops, the uprooting of fruit and OLIVE TREES, and the demolition of other property.
- Regulation 124—Movements of Persons. This regulation has been used by Israel to confine people to their homes for an undetermined length of time and has provided the “legal” basis for curfews.
- Regulation 125—Area Closures. This law has empowered the military to declare an area a “CLOSED MILITARY ZONE” in which no one is allowed in or out without a permit from the Israeli military. This regulation has also been used to exclude a landowner from his OWN LAND so that it could be judged as unoccupied and then expropriated under the Land Acquisition Law (1953).
- Regulation 125—Closed Areas: Movements of Persons. This regulation expands on Regulation 124 and is used to permit a military commander to declare any area or place to be a closed area for any purpose. This law is widely used for a variety of reasons.

See also ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Bibliography

- Bash, Tami, Yuval Ginbar, and Eitan Felner. Deportation of Palestinians from the Occupied Territories, and the Mass Deportation of December, 1992. Jerusalem: B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1993.
- Benvenisti, Eyal. Legal Dualism: The Absorption of the Occupied Territories into Israel. The West Bank Data Base Project. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). “Defense (Emergency) Regulations.” n.d. www.btselem.org/english/Legal\_Documents/Emergency\_Regulations.asp.
- Drury, Richard T., and Robert C. Winn. Plowshares and Swords: The Economics of Occupation in the West Bank. Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 1992.
- Kretzmer, David. The Legal Status of the Arabs in Israel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- . The Occupation of Justice: The Supreme Court of Israel and the Occupied Territories. Albany: SUNY Press, 2002.

Shehadeh, Raja. From Occupation to Interim Accords: Israel and the Palestinian Territories. Boston, MA: Kluwer Law International, 1997.

———. Occupier’s Law: Israel and the West Bank. Washington DC: Institute for Palestinian Studies, 1985.

Degel HaTorah

Degel HaTorah (Torah Flag) is a mostly ASHKENAZI HAREDI political party with a small number of seats (two or three) in the Knesset. Rabbi Eliezer Menahem Mann Shach founded the party as a splinter from AGUDAT YISRAEL in 1988. Policy disputes among the Hasidic rabbis within Agudat Yisrael, which had been the only party for all Ashkenazi Haredi Jews in Israel, gave rise to the division. Degel HaTorah’s fundamental interests are connected to religious matters, for example, forcing restaurants to close on the sabbath. Initially it was more likely to join a LABOR coalition, but it has grown increasingly hard-line—supporting the Jewish SETTLEMENTS and opposing compromise with the Palestinians. This transformation is mainly related to the increasing number of Haredi who live in WEST BANK settlements. Degel HaTorah was a member of BENJAMIN NETANYAHU’S and ARIEL SHARON’S governing coalitions.

Bibliography

- Diskin, Abraham. The Last Days in Israel: Understanding the New Israeli Democracy. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Schiff, Gary S. Tradition and Politics: The Religious Parties of Israel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

Deir Yassin (Dayr Yasin)

Early in the morning of 9 April 1948, Jewish fighters from the IRGUN and the LEHI (the STERN GANG) attacked Deir Yassin, a small, Palestinian village located on a hilltop three miles west of the Old City of JERUSALEM. It was six weeks before the end of the BRITISH MANDATE and the declaration of the state of Israel. The village, which had a peaceful reputation, lay outside the area assigned by the UNITED NATIONS to the Jewish state. It was located on high ground in the corridor between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, and with the knowledge of the mainstream Jewish defense force (the HAGANA), it was to be conquered and held.

The conquest was initiated by the two underground groups, the IRGUN and the LEHI (aka the Stern Gang), and in spite of being better armed, they were at first unable to conquer the village. But after they elicited the help of a small band of PALMAH troops (the elite fighters of the Hagana), Deir Yassin soon fell. After the Palmah soldiers left, the massacre began. That evening, the leader of the Irgun told foreign correspondents in the neighboring Jewish SETTLEMENT of Givat Shaul that more than 200 Arabs had been killed and 40 had been taken prisoner. The guerrillas lost 4 of their own forces. They boasted of the “battle” but made no mention of the male Palestinians whom they had loaded onto trucks, paraded through the Jewish sections of Jerusalem, and then taken to a stone quarry between Givat Shaul and Deir Yassin, where they were shot to death. On 13 April The New York Times reported that 254 Arab men, women, and children had been killed at Deir Yassin; there was no mention of prisoners.

The official leaders of the Hagana denounced the dissidents of the Irgun and the Stern Gang, accusing them of massacre, robbery, looting, and barbarism. DAVID BEN-GURION sent an apology to KING ABDULLAH of JORDAN. Modern historians agree that the massacre at Deir Yassin marked the beginning of the depopulation of over 500 Arab villages and the exile of over 750,000 Palestinians. In spite of protests by MARTIN BUBER and other noted Jewish scholars, within a year the village was repopulated with Orthodox Jewish immigrants from Poland, Romania, and Slovakia. Its cemetery was mostly bulldozed and its name was wiped off the map.

See also TRANSFER AND DISPLACEMENT; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Begin, Menahem. The Revolt. Translated from the original Hebrew text by Shmuel Katz. New York: H. Schuman, 1951.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon, 1987.
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–1949. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1979.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

—Daniel A. McGowan

Deir Yassin Remembered

Deir Yassin Remembered is an organization dedicated to the remembrance of DEIR YASSIN, the small Palestinian village in which the IRGUN, an underground military group led by Menahem Begin), massacred more than 100 civilians in 1948. A group of Israelis, Palestinians, and Americans conceived the organization during the OSLO PROCESS, inspired by Simon Wiesenthal’s observation that “hope lives when people remember” and by the fact that few memorials exist for the Palestinians who died in 1948. The organizers of Deir Yassin Remembered seek to acknowledge and memorialize the suffering of Palestinians, as the suffering of Jews is memorialized. Initially the main purpose of Deir Yassin Remembered was to build a memorial on the site where the village actually stood, but Israel refused to grant permission. Thus the organization developed a broader, more humanitarian objective: to work to eliminate prejudice against Palestinians and to promote the human side of this oppressed people. Deir Yassin Remembered has held numerous international conferences and built several memorials across the Western world. (www.deiryassin.org).

Demilitarized Zones (DMZs)

See UNITED NATIONS TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION

Democracy

See ELECTIONS

Democracy and Workers’ Rights Center

The Democracy and Workers’ Rights Center was established in October 1993 by a group of Palestinian academics, lawyers, trade unionists, and political figures. The main office is in Ramallah, with a branch in GAZA. Its basic objectives are to contribute to the construction of a strong democratic and CIVIL SOCIETY in Palestine and to achieve peace and stability under the sovereignty of an independent Palestinian state within the 1967 borders, next to the state of Israel. It is a nongovernmental, nonprofit organization without any political party affiliation. (www.zmag.org/content/showarticle.cfm?ItemID=2815).

Democratic Alliance, 1983

The Democratic Alliance was one of three groups (the others were the NATIONAL ALLIANCE and FATAH UPRISING) that split from the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) after the 1982 LEBANON WAR. It was composed of the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE, the PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT, and the PALESTINIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY. After the split and despite intense SYRIAN pressure to do otherwise, the Democratic Alliance upheld YASIR ARAFAT's leadership of the PLO, strongly condemned the Fatah rebels' use of violence, and rejected all attempts at "containment" of the PLO or subjecting it to Arab—especially Jordanian—tutelage.

See also ADEN-ALGIERS ACCORD; LEBANON WAR

Bibliography

Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine

The Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (DFLP) was at one time the third largest Palestinian organization. It was founded in 1969, in a split with the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), by NAYIF HAWATIMAH, who remains its head. Both Hawatmeh and GEORGE HABASH were part of the MOVEMENT OF ARAB NATIONALISTS, which after 1967 decided to decentralize and set up movements in individual Arab states, or qutri (countries-wide as opposed to pan-Arab-wide), to facilitate political changes in Arab states and to give impetus to the Palestinian resistance movement. YASIR ARAFAT exploited the feud between the PFLP and the DFLP and took the DFLP under his wing, using the disputes between the two groups for his own ends, often using the DFLP to float his political trial balloons.

The DFLP was the first Palestinian group to put into practice a version of Marxism-Leninism that adhered to ARMED STRUGGLE, unlike the PALESTINIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY. It also advocated dialogue with progressive Jewish (and later Israeli forces), and Hawatmeh was one of the first Palestinian leaders from any faction to give an interview to an Israeli newspaper. The DFLP, however, never succeeded in attracting a mass following, although Hawatmeh appealed to many Arab intellectuals. Its ideology was politically and socially sophisticated, drawing on European Marxism that also gave it insight and flexibility in dealing with the Jewish question.

In the context of the Cold War the DFLP was a classic Marxist-Leninist organization but without a mass base. Few Palestinian cadres understood the complex ideology of the DFLP and fewer still were moved by its ideas, and the DFLP was notoriously weak in mobilizing mass support. The leadership, however, held to the party line. The DFLP never questioned the Soviet Union, and it followed Soviet policy on the Arab-Israeli conflict even when MOSCOW's line clashed with Arab public sentiments. The DFLP had some influence with South Yemen, and the Soviet Union relied on it to promote Soviet interests in the Middle East. In the 1970 BLACK SEPTEMBER war in JORDAN, the DFLP played a role beyond its size. Its slogan, "All power to the resistance," challenged the Jordanian regime and encouraged the Palestinians to overthrow it. Several Palestinian factions accused the DFLP of taking provocative and extremist stances, while others claimed the DFLP was engaged in left-wing adventurism.

In the mid-1970s Arafat used the DFLP to put forward the idea of the "phased program," which had as its end point a two-state solution and which attracted the attention of European leftists and progressive Israeli groups. The DFLP did not abandon its version of armed struggle but was made to seem by Fatah as capitulationist. When it aligned itself with Fatah after the 1974 PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL meeting in Cairo, which supported the phased program, the DFLP lost some of its Arab leftist appeal.

The DFLP played a role in the Lebanese civil war on the side of the leftist coalition, but the defeat of the Lebanese leftists at the hands of BA'ATHIST SYRIA signaled the decline of the DFLP. Support for the DFLP was further eroded by the rise of Islamic fundamentalism after the Iranian revolution, a trend that undermined the influence of Arab communists and socialists.

In 1991 the DFLP split, with a minority faction led by YASIR 'ABD RABBU (who had become increasingly close to Yasir Arafat) favoring the MADRID negotiations that led initially to limited Palestinian autonomy in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP. Inspired by the USSR's glasnost and the fall of the Berlin Wall, this group also favored a new political orientation, focused less on Marxism and armed struggle and more on the democratization of Palestinian society. It reconstituted itself as the PALESTINIAN DEMOCRATIC UNION (FIDA), and 'Abd Rabbu was officially made an advisor of Arafat.

The influence of the DFLP suffered after the OSLO ACCORDS because it took an ambiguous position that reflected splits within its ranks. The DFLP under Hawatmeh, based in Syria, was able to retain its external branches, whereas the majority of the organization within Palestine, mainly on the West Bank, was taken over by FIDA. The influence of DFLP is now marginal in Palestinian politics.

Bibliography

- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Frangi, Abdallah. The PLO and Palestine. London: Zed Books, 1982.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State. London: Zed Books, 1985.
- Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat: Between Gun and Olive Branch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.
- Musallam, Sami. The Palestine Liberation Organization. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Norton, Augustus, and Martin Greenberg, eds. The International Relations of the Palestine Liberation Organization. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Quandt, William B., Faud Jabber, and Ann Mosley Lesch. The Politics of Palestinian Resistance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.

—As'ad AbuKhalil

Demography

Demography was a factor that ultimately determined the outcome of the South Africa conflict and shaped the nature of Northern Ireland's power-sharing arrangements. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has proved no different. Demography was, and remains, a key aspect of this conflict as well, and in recent years, demography has assumed ever-increasing importance, for Israelis in particular. The very prospect of Jews in Israel losing their shrinking majority led to ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT from the GAZA STRIP and parts of the north of the WEST BANK in August 2005. The demographic balance will continue to preoccupy Israel and dictate its behavior toward the Palestinians across and within the Green Line.

The Quest for a Jewish Majority

Though the Zionist movement was deliberately ambiguous for several decades (primarily for tactical purposes), its objective was from the outset to create a Jewish state. Such an entity required a definite Jewish majority. As the Zionist leader AHAD HA'AM noted after the publication of the BALFOUR DECLARATION, "We cannot demand Jewish coinage or a Jewish governor for towns with Arab majorities. We will be mocked if we present such demands." The need for a Jewish majority has been a point of common cause for the majority of Zionists representing differing persuasions. This view is embraced across the political spectrum, for example by both the rightist politician ARIEL SHARON and the leftist YOSSI BEILIN and their supporters. Beilin, for instance, notes, "The Zionist idea was about the Jewish state. If we give up on this idea, then there is no advantage of living in this country for many of us. There are much nicer countries than Israel in which we can be a minority as Jews."

Securing such demographic preponderance was to be a formidable task. When Jews first began arriving in Israel around 1800, there was only one Jew for every forty Arabs. By 1880, on the eve of the First ALIYA (the immigration of Jews to Palestine, 1882–1904), there were twenty-two Arabs for every Jew. That aliya added some 35,000 Jews. Though the Zionist movement harnessed historical claims to Palestine, the advent of popular sovereignty implied that a Jewish state required a Jewish majority. A failure to create a majority would mean that the exercise of self-determination would create a racial minority regime. It was, and remains, only a minority of Zionists that were prepared to accept a Jewish entity ruled by a minority of Jews.

Securing a Jewish entity implied the dispossession and displacement of the indigenous Arab population. Indigenous Palestinians were acutely aware of this imperative, hence their fierce opposition to Jewish IMMIGRATION under both Turkish and British rule. Much of the tension between the two communities in the period between the BRITISH MANDATE and the establishment of Israel revolved around Jewish efforts to change the demographic balance and Arab efforts to maintain the status quo.

Despite the Zionist movements' best endeavors, by 1915 there was a ratio of some six to seven Arabs for every Jew. The Second Aliya (1904–1914) saw the addition of 40,000 Jews. The Third Aliya (1919–1923) brought an additional 35,000 Jews to Palestine. By 1931 the number of the Jews had only marginally increased to a one-to-five ratio, but by 1947 it had reached one-to-two. This change was attributable to the Fourth Aliya (1924–1928) and the Fifth Aliya (1929–1939). While the former wave of immigration added 67,000 Jews to the Yishuv's population, the latter witnessed the arrival of some 250,000 Jews. This drastic increase of Jews was the result of Adolf Hitler's rise to power. A third stream of immigrants before 1948 was the "illegal immigration" (Aliya Bet) prompted by the publication of the British MACDONALD WHITE PAPER, which attempted to limit the number of immigrants but brought an additional 115,000 Jews to Palestine. In total more than 430,000 Jews arrived between 1924 and 1948. Nevertheless, it was ultimately conflict and displacement, rather than immigration, that eventually secured a Jewish majority.

Arab Flight and Jewish Absorption. The conflict between Jews and Palestinians from December 1947 to July 1949 produced a Palestinian exodus (al-Hijra al-Filasteeniya) of 711,000 Palestinians, mainly to JORDAN, LEBANON, and SYRIA. This figure, which is provided by the UN Relief and Works Agency, is disputed by both Israelis and Palestinians. The former claim that the number of REFUGEES was closer to half a million, while the latter suggest it was closer to one million.

The Nakba (disaster), as the exodus is referred to by Palestinians, fundamentally altered the demographic balance in favor of the Jews. At the end of the 1948 WAR, there were only 146,000 Arabs inside Israel's post-armistice BORDERS. Palestinians claim that the exodus was the result of a deliberate Zionist strategy to exploit the cover of war to carry out ethnic cleansing by encouraging the flight of Palestinians. TRANSFER, Israeli historian Benny Morris writes, was "the solution to the seemingly insoluble Arab minority problem of the future Jewish state." After World War II, transfer was also supported by the British Labour Party. Some Israeli scholars argue that the widespread support for the transfer idea was for voluntary transfer or transfer agreed on with the neighboring Arab countries. They add that the refugee problem was "born of war, not by design." Others consider it to have been well planned and executed. The TRANSFER COMMITTEE and its activities lend some validity to this latter view.

Though there is no evidence of a formal plan for ethnic cleansing, except for the DALET PLAN, there was an implicit understanding that the immediate post-World War II demographic balance militated against a Jewish state. The Zionist leadership made it clear to the military that they wanted as "few Arabs as possible to remain in the Jewish State." Only days after the UNITED NATIONS adopted a resolution calling for the partition of Jewish and Arab states (UN RESOLUTION 181), Israel's founder, DAVID BEN-GURION, noted, "there can be no stable and strong Jewish state so long as it has a Jewish majority of only 60 percent." There is evidence that the new Jewish state and its military structures deliberately prevented the return of these refugees. The "retroactive transfer" policy involved destroying their houses and villages. For demographic reasons Israel has been unwilling and unable to be flexible on the issue of the right of Palestinians to return to their homeland. Implementing the right of return could spell the end of the Jewish state.

Table 1 Demographic Ratios

Year	Arab Population	Jewish Population	Total Population	Ratio
1800	268,000	6,700		1:40
1880	525,000	22,400		1:220
1915	590,000	80,000–85,000		1:6–7
1922	660,641	84,000		1:7
1931	837,000	174,000		1:5
1947	1,310,000	630,000		1:2
...
2000	4,900,000	4,800,000	9,700,000	1:1
2020 (projected)	8,800,000	6,400,000	15,200,000	1:1.4

Challenge of Maintaining the Jewish Majority. The Jewish majority in Israel has been bolstered and maintained by successive waves of immigration. Israel in fact doubled its population after independence (1948) as significant portions of Jewish communities relocated to Israel. After the absorption of the remnants of Europe's decimated Jews, followed by an influx of Jews from the Middle East and North Africa in the early 1950s, Israel enjoyed an 80-to-20 ratio of Jews to Arabs. That ratio was buttressed by additional inflows of Jews, the most significant of these in the 1990s, following the collapse of the SOVIET UNION. Between 1990 and 1998 over 790,000 immigrants arrived in Israel. In the absence of immigration, the 60,000 Jews living in Palestine in 1918 would have grown only to 250,000–260,000.

Israel's supply of potential immigrants is dwindling because of two factors. One is that most Jews today reside in developed countries, where they enjoy a quality of life higher than they could enjoy in Israel. More importantly, however, the number of DIASPORA Jews is rapidly declining due to low fertility rates and high assimilation rates. Indeed, there are today 13 million Jews worldwide, compared to 11 million in 1945 after the HOLOCAUST. It is only population growth in Israel that has compensated for the decline of Diaspora Jewry.

Despite a concerted pro-natalist policy by successive Israeli governments, the birthrate of Jewish Israelis was only nominally (25 percent) above the replacement rate and well below that for Palestinians. Indeed, Israeli pro-natalism proved to be an ill-considered strategy for maintaining a Jewish majority, as the country's Arab minority was the real beneficiary of incentives to promote larger families. Jewish fertility rates result in a natural growth rate of 1 percent, compared to over 3.5 percent (up to 4 percent) for Palestinians. If immigration is added, Israeli Jewish growth rates rise to 2 percent. Over time these differing fertility rates work against a Jewish majority.

According to sociologist Phillipe Fargues, high Palestinian birthrates are linked to nationalist considerations and to efforts to cope with the economic insecurity of life under OCCUPATION by having more contributors to household income. Palestinians came to view demography as their most potent weapon against Israel. In 1987 YASIR ARAFAT famously stated, "the Palestinian woman, who bears yet another Palestinian every ten months . . . is a biological bomb that threatens to blow up Israel." Maintaining larger families is made possible by the subsidization of rents through development assistance from the Gulf States and elsewhere, especially to refugees. Hence, Fargues suggests that peace and economic stability will make a significant contribution to reducing Palestinian fertility rates.

Demographic Parity and Disengagement

Israel's demographic balance was again fundamentally affected by the 1967 WAR. Whereas 1948 improved the ratio between Jews and Arabs, Israel's Occupation of the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP in 1967 worsened Israel's demographic position because of the additional Palestinian regions under Israeli control. The effect was initially not apparent to most Israelis, partly because Israel had stated that the Occupation would be temporary. After almost four decades, the Occupation came to appear less transient.

In part the demographic factor caused the Zionist left to support a political accommodation, whereby Israel could off-load as many Palestinians as possible. At first an accommodation for off-loading was sought with JORDAN. When that proved impossible, Israel was forced to seek an accommodation with the Palestinians and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in the form of the 1993 OSLO PROCESS. It is indeed instructive that Israel was willing to leave the Gaza Strip and the major Palestinian cities early in the process. Through this disengagement Oslo allowed Israel to claim that 95 percent of the Palestinians did not live under Occupation. Oslo seemingly squared Israel's demographic circle.

The collapse of the peace process beginning in 2000, failure to reach a permanent status accord, and Israel's reoccupation of the Palestinian territories, however, prompted the return of the demographic question. As demographic parity in the Occupied Territories west of the River Jordan has approached, Israeli support for separation has increased. This demographic fear explains Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON's decision to disengage from the Gaza Strip (2005) and build a separation BARRIER. It is demographic fear that underpins Israeli support for separation and the Barrier. Though it has been justified as a security measure, the Barrier is widely viewed as an impediment to the Palestinian right of return. Israeli commentator Ari Shavit described the disengagement plan as "a national rescue plan." In a candid statement to the Israeli public on the eve of the execution of the plan, Sharon, who had traditionally dismissed the demographic threat, said: "It is no secret that I, like many others, believed and hoped that we could forever hold on to Netzarim and Kfar Darom [Israeli settlements in Gaza]. However, the changing reality in this country, in this region, and in the world required reassessment and changing of positions. Gaza cannot be held forever. Over one million Palestinians live there and they double their numbers with every generation."

Although demography was once the primary preoccupation of liberal Zionist elites, it has been appropriated by the LIKUD and the secular right. This is captured in the statement of Michael Azoulay, a Likud Central Committee member, that "we must never forget that what General Winter was to Russia, General Time is to Arafat." Growing awareness and use of the demographic issue have fundamentally weakened the settlers' movement and those who support Israel's retention of the West Bank and Gaza. Recognizing this, a group of US and Israeli experts sought to dispute claims that parity is imminent. Palestinians, alert to Israeli fears, have hinted that they will abandon their support for a two-state solution if Israel does not end settlement expansion. In this context, the option of BINATIONALISM has returned to the discourse over the conflict and come to haunt the Zionist project.

After the Occupation. Many assume that demographic concerns will ultimately compel Israel to end the Occupation, but a full Israeli withdrawal from territories occupied since June 1967 does not entirely eliminate the demographic issue and the binational option. Israel will need to come to terms with the existence of a significant Palestinian minority within its borders. Since 2001, Jews constitute only 73 percent of the population within the pre-1967 borders (including the Palestinians of East JERUSALEM). Demographers estimate that that proportion will fall to 69 percent by 2020. It is worth noting that a 1987 prediction by the Israeli Central Bureau of Statistics that Israel's Arabs would constitute just 21.5 percent of the population by 2000 was fulfilled only by the then-unanticipated arrival of over 700,000 Jews in the 1990s, suggesting that Israeli demographers underestimated Palestinian numbers at the time.

The internal demographic threat has also increasingly come to preoccupy Israeli elites. Russian immigrant politician AVIGDOR LIEBERMAN has been most candid in this regard: "I want to guarantee a Jewish and Zionist state. By current trends, there will not be such a country in twenty years' time, maximum." This concern is reflected in growing strategies to secure a Jewish democracy—that is, a Jewish majority. One indication of the salience of this issue is an amendment of the Citizenship and Entry Law, which would restrict the prospects and rights of Israeli Palestinians to secure citizenship for their spouses. Israeli officials state that almost 100,000 Palestinians exercised their right to return through marriage and FAMILY REUNIFICATION. The measure was originally introduced as a security precaution, on the basis that a number of Palestinians involved in terror had gained their citizenship in this manner. In reality it is motivated by demographic considerations. The preamble to the law states that one purpose is "to solve the demographic problem that stems from the fact that foreigners receive status in Israel as a result of being related to a citizen or resident of Israel, without themselves being eligible for citizenship status under the Law of Return."

There is also growing support in Israel for redrawing Israel's borders on the basis of demographic considerations. In effect, what is being proposed is the transfer of areas populated by significant Palestinian communities—for example, Umm al-Fahm and Taybeh—as part of a future Palestinian state. Such initiatives and growing Israeli concerns over demography will affect relations between Jews and Arabs inside of Israel. It also could pose a threat to ISRAELI DEMOCRACY. Reflecting on Israel's efforts to limit the number of West Bank Palestinians becoming Israeli citizens by marrying Israeli Arabs, columnist Orit Shachat noted, "A democratic state cannot exist if paranoid fears about the demographic threat lurk perpetually around the corner and are fanned now and then by demagogic politicians. Demographic fears lead to racist policies."

See also DEMOGRAPHY AND FOREIGN NATIONALS; DIASPORA; FAMILY REUNIFICATION; IMMIGRATION; PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL

Bibliography

- Azoulay, Michael. "Arafat's Time Tunnel." Ma'ariv. 10 May 2004.
- Bishara, Azmi. "A Short History of Apartheid." Al-Ahram Weekly Online. 672 (8–14 January 2004).
- Caplan, Neil. Palestine Jewry and the Arab Question 1917–1925. London: Frank Cass, 1978.
- DellaPergola, Sergio. "Battle of the Numbers: Jewish Minority by 2020." The Jerusalem Post. 16 May 2005.
- . Jewish Demography, Facts: Outlook and Challenges. Jerusalem: The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute, 2003.

- Fargues, Phillipe. "Protracted National Conflict and Fertility Change: Palestinians and Israelis in the Twentieth Century." Population and Development Review. 26:3 (2000).
- Gilbar, Gad. Population Dilemmas in the Middle East. London: Frank Cass, 1997.
- Goldscheider, Calvin. "The Demographic Embeddedness of the Arab-Jewish Conflict in Israeli Society." Middle East Review. 21:3 (1989).
- Gorny, Yosef. Zionism and the Arabs, 1882–1948: A Study of Ideology. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1987.
- Ilan, Shachar. "Demographically Correct." Ha'aretz. 7 June 2005.
- Israeli-Palestinian ProCon. "Population Statistics." n.d. www.israelipalestinianprocon.org/population/palestine.html#chart2.
- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–1949. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Portugese, Jacqueline. Fertility Policy in Israel: The Politics of Religion, Gender, and Nation. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1998.
- Saban, Ilan. "Either Family or Country." Ha'aretz. 19 May 2005.
- Sharon, Ariel. "Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Statement on the Day of the Implementation of the Disengagement Plan." The Jewish Agency for Israel. 15 August 2005. www.jafi.org.il/education/actual/conflict/disengagement/8c.html.
- Shavit, Ari. "The Cruel Face of Zionism." Ha'aretz. 8 July 2004.
- Shochat, Orit. "A Democratic, Not Demographic, Threat." Ha'aretz. 23 July 2004.
- Soffer, Arnon. Israel, Demography 2000–2020: Dangers and Opportunities. Haifa: University of Haifa, 2000.
- Zimmerman, Bennet, Roberta A. Seid, and Michael L. Wise. "Battle of Numbers: What Demographic Time Bomb?" The Jerusalem Post. 16 May 2005.
- Zureik, Elia. "Demography and Transfer: Israel's Road to Nowhere." Third World Quarterly. 24:4 (2003).

—Anonymous Israeli scholar

Demography and Foreign Nationals

Beginning in 2006, Israel undertook a new undeclared policy toward foreign nationals, which in the main refers to Palestinians who have citizenship in Western countries, such as the UNITED STATES, Britain, and others. The policy denies foreign nationals entry to the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, even those seeking to enter for a short period of time, but especially those who live with Palestinian spouses and families, are Palestinian expatriate nationals, or are working in the Occupied Territories. Israel claims the restrictions are related to security concerns, but others believe the real reason is Israel's demographic concerns. Because Israel is intent on reducing the number of Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, it has decided that it cannot permit additional non-Jewish individuals to settle there. Since 1967, Israel has used a variety of demographic manipulations to reduce the Palestinian population of the Occupied Territories, causing some 100,000 people to lose their status as permanent residents. These are in addition to the 240,000 Palestinians who were born in the WEST BANK and GAZA and left the areas because of the 1967 WAR, and another 60,000 who were abroad when it broke out and not permitted to return.

Until 2006, Palestinians with Western citizenship were able to avoid this comprehensive policy. During the OSLO years foreign nationals were considered a desired population (investors, businessmen, academics, and professionals working in such organizations as the World Bank). Israel did not grant them permanent residency status but did permit them to live in the Occupied Territories and regularly renew their visas. This was also the case with Western spouses of Palestinian residents. However, from the start of 2006, Israel has denied their ability to renew their visas, and their entry or reentry has been blocked.

The situation has also affected professors, teachers, researchers, and students at universities and schools in the Occupied Territories. In May 2006, Birzeit University, in Birzeit Village in the West Bank, reported a 50 percent decline in employees with foreign passports and listed the recent policy of visa refusals as a significant factor. The US Consulate in Jerusalem has been notified of more than 100 cases of Palestinian Americans denied entry to the West Bank but says that the actual number of cases could be significantly higher. US secretary of state Condoleezza Rice raised the issue with Israeli officials during her visit to the region in October 2007 and later made public reference to it in a speech to a Palestinian-American group, promising to do everything in her power "to ensure that all American travelers receive fair and equal treatment."

See also DEMOGRAPHY; FAMILY REUNIFICATION

Bibliography

- Ashkar, Antigona. Perpetual Limbo Israel's Freeze on Unification of Palestinian Families in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2006.

- Association for Civil Rights in Israel. "Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law: Enacted with No Factual Basis." Association for Civil Rights in Israel. n.d. www.acri.org.il/english-acri/engine/story.asp?id=255.
- Campaign for the Right of Entry/Re-entry to the Occupied Palestinian Territories. www.righttoenter.ps.
- Greenberg, Joel. "New Visa Rules Separate Palestinian Families in the West Bank." Chicago Tribune. 3 November 2006.
- Hass, Amira. "Doors of Re-entry Shut to Palestinians." Ha'aretz. 1 October 2006.
- . "Israel Bars Palestinian Americans for First Time since 1967." Ha'aretz. 11 July 2006.
- . "The New Refugees." Ha'aretz. 27 December 2006.
- Ilan, Shahar, and Gideon Alon. "Amendment to Citizenship Law Rapped across Political Spectrum." Ha'aretz. 30 November 2006.
- Kalman, Matthew. "Israeli Policy Divides Palestinian Families: Immigration Crackdown in West Bank." The Boston Globe. 23 September 2006.
- Knesset (Israel). "The Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (Temporary Provision) 5763–2003." www.knesset.gov.il/laws/special/eng/citizenship\_law.htm.
- Kruger, Martha. "Israel: Balancing Demographics in the Jewish State." Migration Information Source: Country Profiles. July 2005. www.migrationinformation.org.
- Merriman, Rima. "Israel's Visa Freeze." The Jordan Times. 14 September 2006.
- . "Let My People In." The Electronic Intifada. 4 September 2006. <http://electronicintifada.net/v2/article5674.shtml>.
- Myre, Greg. "Israeli Visa Policy Traps Thousands of Palestinians in a Legal Quandary." New York Times. 18 September 2006.
- Patience, Martin. "Israeli Visa Rules Trap Palestinians." BBC News. 18 September 2006. http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/middle\_east/5345752.stm.
- de Quetteville, Harry. "U.S. Hits Israeli Expulsion Policy." London Sunday Telegraph. 30 October 2006.
- Right to Entry Campaign. "Israeli Denial of Entry Policy Continues Despite Promises Made to the EU." Press release. 17 December 2006.
- Wilson, Scott. "Stricter Policy Splits West Bank Families: Americans Who Live There Denied Visas." Washington Post. 23 October 2006.

Deportation

Deportation is a controversial tactic used by Israel in its conflict with the Palestinians. Israel says it issues deportation orders in order to prevent a potential security offense by the deportee, although its critics say that deportation is exercised largely for political rather than security considerations. No deportees have ever been charged with a criminal offense or tried and convicted. From the beginning of the OCCUPATION (in June 1967) to 1992, Israel deported 1,522 Palestinians, mainly to JORDAN and LEBANON. There were no deportations between 1992 and 2002, but the laws concerning deportation remained on the books. In 2002, Israel resumed the practice of deportation. All deportations are administrative rather than court-imposed.

From 1967 to 1985, deportees from the WEST BANK (almost no Gazans were expelled) were overwhelmingly professional individuals—of which 40 were women. They included professors, teachers, school principals, a university president, journalists, physicians, a mayor and other civic leaders, lawyers, a bank director, and the head of the Women's Society in JERUSALEM. All expressed public opposition to the Occupation, which, combined with their status as part of the educated elite, caused Israel to fear a mobilized political opposition.

It was not until the 1987–1991 INTIFADA that a second wave of deportations began. As the essentially nonviolent Intifada became prolonged, Israel responded by deporting Palestinian civilian activists involved in the uprising. These deportees included political leaders, activists, and the first individual in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES to formally promote nonviolent civil disobedience: Mubarak Awad. Within the first year, Israel deported 56 Palestinians, and the deportations peaked in December 1992, when Israel expelled a group of 415 Palestinian Islamists to Lebanon.

During the first two weeks of December 1992, Palestinian members of HAMAS killed six members of the Israeli security forces, and in response Israel arrested some 1,600 Palestinians. On 15 December, Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN announced that Israel intended to take severe action against Hamas. On the morning of 16 December, the Israeli government ordered deportation for "inciters, those inhabitants of the area who endanger human lives by their activities, or those who incite others to such actions." More than 400 Palestinians, most taken directly from prison facilities, were put on buses heading for Lebanon.

Israeli human rights organizations responded by filing petitions with the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT. Justice Aharon Barak issued a temporary injunction stopping the deportations on 16 December. The next morning the court approved the government's plan, and officials proceeded with the mass deportation the same day (17 December). The court, however, deferred a hearing on the legality of the procedure—meaning that the men were expelled before the court determined whether their deportation was legal. On 28 January it upheld the government’s position that the deportations were legal, based on Israel’s security needs. The ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF), however, did not contend that the deportees were responsible for or had participated in the attacks on IDF soldiers, which were the usual grounds for deportations. Moreover, the court upheld the government’s argument that this was not collective punishment, although the deportation orders indicated that the deportees were linked to Hamas or the ISLAMIC JIHAD. “Due to their membership and activities in the area in the framework of the Hamas organization or the Islamic Jihad organization in a manner that severely harms the security in the area and the public order” was how the orders read.

Critics who contend that the deportations were collective punishment point to the fact that around 25 percent of the Palestinians expelled were found to have been included in error, and their deportation was cancelled. Also, the mass deportation orders were signed at night—some after the deportation was under way. And, unlike High Court hearings on deportations in the past, individual names of deportees were not provided. B’TSELEM (Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) concluded that this deportation of 415 Palestinians was illegal since both deportation and collective punishment are forbidden under Geneva Convention Four.

The deportees were transported to the northernmost point of Israel’s “security zone” in Lebanon, but because the Lebanese army prevented them from continuing north and entering unoccupied Lebanon, they were left in a no-man’s-land without shelter or other facilities for six months.

On 28 December the IDF announced that 10 of the deportees had been expelled by mistake and would be allowed to return. On 3 January 1993 the Israeli attorney general informed the High Court that 6 additional Palestinians had been deported in error and would be allowed to return. Later 5 more deportees were permitted to return for health reasons.

The international outcry that followed this mass expulsion, in addition to the prospects of peace opened by the OSLO ACCORDS, resulted in Israel’s reluctance to use deportation as a political tactic after 1992, until it was renewed in the context of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. In the summer of 2002, following a number of serious attacks in Israel and in the Occupied Territories during the al-Aqsa Intifada, the Israeli government, in the interest of “deterrence and punishment,” decided to deport relatives of the Palestinian attackers to other places in the Occupied Territories. On 1 August 2002 the Central Command signed the first orders and by the end of 2004, Israel had deported 32 Palestinians from the West Bank to the Gaza Strip.

The first 2 individuals who received such orders were siblings of a man allegedly responsible for an attack on the central bus station in Tel Aviv, who had been killed by the IDF. Both individuals were represented by two Israeli human rights organizations, and they first filed an appeal with the Military Appeals Committee (which denied their appeal) and then petitioned the Israeli Supreme Court. The court ruled that the transfer of the siblings was lawful even though they were not considered security risks. The debate revolved around the deterrent effect that would supposedly prevent other attacks if the attackers knew their relatives would be deported.

See also FAMILY REUNIFICATION; HEBRON DISTRICT, SOUTHERN AREA; HOUSE DEMOLITIONS; ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM; ISRAELI SUPREME COURT; JERUSALEM; TRANSFER AND DISPLACEMENT; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

- Bash, Tami, Yuval Ginbar, and Eitan Felner. Deportation of Palestinians from the Occupied Territories and the Mass Deportation of December 1992. Jerusalem: B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1993.
- B’Tselem. Collective Punishment in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip: Comprehensive Report. Jerusalem: B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1990.
- . “Deportation: Background.” n.d. www.btselem.org/english/Deportation/Index.asp.
- . “Deportation of Family Members to Gaza: Prohibited Collective Punishment.” n.d. www.btselem.org/english/Deportation/Deportation\_to\_Gaza.asp.
- . “The Mass Deportation of 1992.” n.d. www.btselem.org/english/Deportation/1992\_Mass\_Deportation.asp.
- . Renewal of Deportation of Women and Children from the West Bank on Account of “Illegal Residency.” Jerusalem: B’Tselem, 1991.
- . “Statistics on Deportation.” n.d. www.btselem.org/English/Deportation/Statistics.asp.

B'Tselem and HaMoked. Families Torn Apart: Separation of Palestinian Families in the Occupied Territories. Joint report. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) and HaMoked (Center for the Defence of the Individual), July 1999.

Lesch, Ann. "Israeli Deportation of Palestinians from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, 1967–1978." Journal of Palestine Studies. 8:2 (1979).

———. "Israeli Deportation of Palestinians from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, 1967–1978 (Part II)." Journal of Palestine Studies. 8:3 (1979).

ReliefWeb. Deportation, Forcible Transfer and Assigned Residence in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. Boston: Harvard University Press, 2004.

Stein, Yael. Expulsion of Palestinian Residents from the South Mt. Hebron Area, October–November 1999. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2000.

—Bassem Eid

Development Authority

Shortly after the 1948 WAR the state of Israel passed a series of laws to validate its seizure of Palestinian property and to ensure that such property remained in the control of Jews in perpetuity. The 1950 ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW transferred ownership of Palestinian property to the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY. The Transfer of Property Law, also in 1950, was promulgated to create the Development Authority, a quasi-independent body empowered to sell, buy, lease, exchange, repair, build, develop, or cultivate Palestinian property provided that the beneficiary is a Jew or a Jewish entity. The Development Authority was conceived to ensure that the property it acquired, and continues to acquire, is disposed of in the interests of the state of Israel and the Jewish people. As such, it gives priority to the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND and the JEWISH AGENCY, which act exclusively in the interest of Jews and have quasi-governmental status as ISRAEL'S NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS within the framework of the Development Authority Law.

In 1953, to validate prior illegal expropriations, the Knesset passed the Land Acquisition Law (Validation of Acts and Compensation). This law permitted the minister of finance to vest ownership of previously and newly expropriated land in the Development Authority. Most of this land belonged to Palestinian citizens of Israel. The law also allowed for compensation to any (i.e., Palestinian) owner who applied. Compensation was based on the assessed value of the property as of 1 January 1950 in Israeli pounds of that date, plus 3 percent per annum thereafter, minus property maintenance costs. Because the vast majority of Palestinians were unaware of the law and many who were aware objected to it as a matter of principle, practically no Palestinians took the offer.

All of these laws remain in effect and are still used, especially in JERUSALEM, to acquire Palestinian property and transfer it to the Development Authority, which then sells it back to the groups that confiscated it in the first place—for example, ATERET COHANIM and other Jewish settlement groups.

See also CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY; ISRAELI REGIME AND THE QUESTION OF DEMOCRACY; LAND; PALESTINIAN REFUGEE PROPERTY CLAIMS; STATE LAND; WAR, 1948

Bibliography

Algazy, Joseph. "Palestine, 1947–1997: From Partition to 'Allon Plus.'" Le Monde diplomatique. September 1997.

COHRE and Badil. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva, Switzerland: Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights, 2005.

Israel, State of. Transfer of Property Law, 1950. www.geocities.com/savepalestinenow/israelilaws/fulltext/absenteepropertylaw.htm.

Dhimma/Dhimmis

Muslims have a special respect for People of the Book, Jews and Christians, because Islam accepts Moses (and all prophets of the Hebrew scriptures as well as Jesus) as prophets. Christian and Jewish minority populations in Muslim-dominated empires or states were therefore given a special status as protected persons. The dhimma (writ of protection) gave the dhimmis (Christians and Jews) certain rights denied other minorities and conquered peoples, but still made clear they were viewed as inferior to the Muslims in terms of taxation and military service.

Diaspora, Jewish, from the Perspective of the Diaspora

The numbers of Jews in the UNITED STATES, the length of their time in the area, and the level of their integration into the society have imparted to them both an organizational strength and a personal autonomy that set them apart from other Jewish diasporas. While making up less than 3 percent of the overall US population, American Jews nevertheless represent two-thirds of the entirety of Jewish diasporics throughout the world. Not only do the Jews in the United States still outnumber those of Israel, but with a population of 5.3 million, they are more than ten times as numerous as the second largest Jewish Diaspora, that of FRANCE.

Israel's reliance on American Jewish strength and vitality highlights a contradiction within classical ZIONISM: on the one hand, an ideological imperative that all Jews including American ones immigrate to the Jewish state; on the other, an acknowledgment that, without a strong Zionist Jewish constituency in the United States, Israel would not have flourished as it has. Nor would it have had enjoyed, vis-à-vis the Palestinian challenge, such long-standing, strong, and important support from Washington.

Jews have taken full advantage of their rights, freedoms, and prosperity as US citizens to advance their positions with respect to modern Israel and its perennial conflict with the Palestinians. Social integration and assimilation have also allowed countless individuals to opt out of taking any position on the Middle East conflict or even to relinquish their Jewish identity altogether. The result has been a schism between the American Jewish leadership and its constituency, on the one hand, and competing visions of Zionism and the preferred resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, on the other. Indeed, prior to the HOLOCAUST the official position of the American Reform Movement of Judaism and the American Council for Judaism was outright opposition to the very notion of an independent Jewish state. A unique period of consensus and solidarity prevailed from Israel's founding in 1948 until sometime after the 1973 WAR, peaking with the 1967 WAR. That consensus was based on the beliefs that Jews in the global Diaspora (though not necessarily those in the United States) needed the Jewish state as a refuge from persecution, that Israel was under constant military threat from hostile Arab neighbors, and that it was incumbent upon American Jews to support Israel with both direct financial aid and political remonstrances to the US government and its elected representatives. The latter strategy involved strengthening Zionist organizations and interest groups and voting for pro-Israel candidates in national elections.

Thus arose the myth of a "Jewish lobby" that, combining the alleged dominance of a "Jewish-controlled" MEDIA, Wall Street, and Congress (the latter through campaign contributions) in lockstep, forced the White House to do its Zionist bidding with respect to foreign policy in the Middle East. The AMERICAN-ISRAEL PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE (AIPAC) became emblematic of this so-called Jewish power that maintained a hard-line US position against Palestinian sovereignty and in favor of virtually unconditional military and diplomatic support for Israel.

Despite some high-profile contests that pitted AIPAC against sitting presidents (most notably JIMMY CARTER, RONALD REAGAN, and GEORGE H. W. BUSH [over F-15 and AWACs sales to SAUDI ARABIA and loan guarantees covering Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the WEST BANK]), this highly effective interest group did not represent the views of the American Jewish Diaspora as a whole. In the years leading up to Israel's incursion into LEBANON in 1982, and especially as a result of it, other US-based organizations arose that directly challenged what they saw as Israel's increasing MILITARISM, specifically the Israeli OCCUPATION of the West Bank and GAZA. Breira (Alternative) was one of the first such movements that, in contrast to the mainstream Jewish leadership, advocated peace with the Palestinians through negotiation and concessions. Breira came to reflect the sentiments of liberal Jewish intellectuals such as Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, Irving Howe, and Arthur Waskow. Other left-wing (or "universalistic/prophetic") groups emerged that promoted Jewish-Palestinian coexistence and compromise between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION. These included the New Jewish Agenda, Americans for Peace Now, Americans for a Progressive Israel, Jewish Peace Lobby, New Israel Fund, Abraham Fund, Interns for Peace, and American Friends of Neve Shalom. Rabbi Michael Lerner's San Francisco-based Tikkun provided the most public expression of such pro-peace sentiments, even including prayers for Palestinians in his magazine's High Holiday supplements.

Along with AIPAC, other right-wing Jewish organizations (including the more mainstream "ethnonational" ones such as the United Jewish Appeal and the Zionist Organization of America) initially mobilized not only against concessions to Palestinians but also against the dovish sentiments expressed by the left-wing Jewish groups. Opposing the dismantlement of Jewish settlements, the return of territory captured in 1967, and the creation of a Palestinian state were groups such as Americans for a Safe Israel, American Friends of Likud, CAMERA, the HEBRON Fund, American Friends of ATERET COHANIM, Project Nishma, and Religious Zionists of America. As indicated by the latter's name, the Orthodox community (though only 10 percent of American Jewry) has become increasingly identified with this camp. So have ideologically neoconservative Jewish intellectuals such as Norman Podhoretz and Irving Kristol, whose viewpoints are given prominence in Commentary magazine. Though not representative of overall American Jewish opinion, Elliott Abrams, Richard Perle, and Paul Wolfowitz obtained high-ranking government positions that both reflected and reinforced the hard-line NEOCONSERVATIVE position, as shown in President GEORGE W. BUSH's refusal to deal with Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT.

Supposedly neutral groups, such as the AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE, AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS, and CONFERENCE OF PRESIDENTS OF MAJOR JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS, have been buffeted by these growing divisions between advocates and opponents of territorial compromise and Palestinian independence, the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations in particular tilting to the right. Upsurges in threats to Israel, such as the wave of SUICIDE BOMBINGS since 2000, have precluded restoring unanimity to American Jewish attitudes toward Palestine.

Many Jewish Americans generally feel free to support Israel and its government, just as other Jewish Americans feel free to condemn aspects of Israeli policy. Such disagreements have waxed as the war in Lebanon, the OSLO ACCORDS, the First INTIFADA, and the 2008–2009 Gaza war polarized the population in Israel itself. In short, despite a backdrop of organized Jewry's general success in promoting a pro-Israel US foreign policy, the self-confidence of Jews in the United States has paradoxically given rise to serious ideological and organizational rifts, particularly over how best to resolve Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

Although no Jewish Diaspora outside of the United States is completely unified on the Palestinian question, the minority and often more marginal status of Jews in other countries militates against equivalent political strength and internal dissent, as well as a more centralized Jewish establishment, than that prevailing in the United States. In France, for example, the presence of a relatively large population originally from the Arab world puts French Jewry and Zionism on the defensive. A sense of besieged empathy with Israeli Jews reinforces hard-line positions on conflict resolution with Palestinians, particularly as reflected in the state-recognized Representative Council of Jewish Institutions of France. In Great Britain, notwithstanding the controversial, liberal, and critical pronouncements of its chief rabbi Jonathan Sacks toward Israeli government policy, organized Jewry there exercises limited influence over foreign policy. In Australia cordial relations between Jewish leaders and their country's elected representatives (particularly Prime Minister John Howard [1996–2007]) have resulted in a somewhat more sympathetic foreign policy toward Israel.

Throughout Latin America, where israelita (Jew) is sometimes confused with israeli in local parlance, Jewish communities not only have little influence on their governments' Middle East positions but in some places they have also been targets of related violence and TERRORISM. The resurgence of ANTI-SEMITISM in the former SOVIET UNION also dampens Jewish expressions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Canadian Jewry, somewhat less fragmented than American Jewry, has put forth a more unified public stance supporting incumbent Israeli governments regarding the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. In South Africa, the Jewish community has weathered lingering divisions between a pro-Israeli establishment now embarrassed about (and making amends for) the Jewish state's ties with the former apartheid regime and leftist Jews who joined the black liberation movement.

Smaller Jewish diasporas beyond the United States—IRAN excepted—tend more toward equating ANTI-ZIONISM with anti-Semitism. More vulnerable and less influential than their North American counterparts, they tend to adopt more unified and less critical stances on Israel's handling of its conflict with the Palestinians.

See also AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS

Bibliography

- Don-Yehiya, Eliezer, ed. Israel and Diaspora Jewry. Ideological and Political Perspectives. Jerusalem: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1991.
- Elazar, Daniel J. People and Polity: The Organizational Dynamics of World Jewry. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1989.

- Goldberg, J. J. Jewish Power: Inside the American Jewish Establishment. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1996.
- Habib, Jasmin. Israel, Diaspora, and the Routes of National Belonging. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2004.
- Kushner, Tony, and Alisa Solomon, eds. Wrestling with Zion: Progressive Jewish-American Responses to the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. New York: Grove Press, 2003.
- Levy, André, and Alex Weingrod, eds. Homelands and Diasporas: Holy Lands and Other Places. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2005.
- Rosenthal, Steven. Irreconcilable Differences? The Waning of the American Jewish Love Affair with Israel. Hanover, NH: Brandeis University Press, 2001.
- Seliktar, Ofira. Divided We Stand: American Jews, Israel, and the Peace Process. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 2002.
- Sheffer, Gabriel. "From Israeli Hegemony to Diaspora Full Autonomy: The Current State of Ethno-National Diasporism and the Alternatives Facing World Jewry." In Jewish Centers and Peripheries: Europe between America and Israel Fifty Years after World War II. Edited by S. Ilan Troen. New Brunswick, NJ, and London: Transaction Publishers, 1999.
- Singer, David, ed. "Other Countries." In American Jewish Year Book. New York: The American Jewish Committee, 1985–2004.

—William F. S. Miles

Diaspora, Jewish, from the Perspective of Israel

There are roughly 12 million Jews in the world and about 7 million in the Diaspora. From the perspective of the Israeli government and its NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS—the JEWISH AGENCY, the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND, and the WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION, which are legally part of the Israeli government—every Jew in the Diaspora should be a committed Zionist actively involved with Israel. Because a great number are not, these institutions have undertaken numerous programs to reverse such issues as weak Jewish identities, assimilation, mixed marriages, and indifference toward Israel, and to instill a strong Zionist identity and worldview into every Jew.

Israel has two overarching objectives with regard to the Diaspora: IMMIGRATION and financial assistance for immigrant absorption. The issue of immigration is cardinal, because to maintain itself as a Jewish state, Israel must at least preserve, and would prefer to increase, the present balance of approximately 80 percent Jews to 20 percent Palestinians within the Green Line. In JERUSALEM, likewise, Israel wants to preserve or if possible increase the existing ratio of approximately 66.8 percent Jews to 33.2 percent Palestinians. In the WEST BANK, much of which Israel intends to absorb, some 2.4 million Palestinians outnumber the approximately 250,000–300,000 Israeli SETTLERS. Concerns about DEMOGRAPHY then drive the need for increasing numbers of Jewish immigrants, whose absorption or integration must be externally financed. To achieve these aims, several organizations are engaged in the work of creating strong Jewish and Zionist identities and commitments to Israel in Diaspora communities. Education, very broadly defined, is the key to these efforts.

The Jewish Agency has instituted the "Jerusalem program," the purposes of which are, among others: (1) fostering the unity of the Jewish people, their bond to Israel, and the importance of Jerusalem; (2) encouraging ALIYA (immigration) to Israel from all countries and the effective integration of all immigrants into Israeli society; (3) ensuring the future and the distinctiveness of the Jewish people by furthering Jewish, Hebrew, and Zionist education, fostering spiritual and cultural values and teaching Hebrew as the national language; and (4) settling the country as an expression of practical ZIONISM.

The World Zionist Organization (WZO) also has numerous principles, policies, and programs relating to the transformation of the Diaspora. It proposes that the money for immigrant absorption should come from three sources in the Diaspora: charitable contributions, investment in Israel, and tourism, with the goal that every Jew in the Diaspora should visit Israel every three years. With regard to strengthening Jewish identities, the WZO's major aims and goals are to (1) foster hagshama activities (Zionist activities that create "self-realization" as a Jew and Zionist) in the younger generation; (2) sponsor ideological Zionist education in Israel and the Diaspora; (3) encourage aliya; and (4) establish a popular movement for students of Hebrew.

The 34th WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS (WZC—the global meeting of the WZO) refined several of these objectives. To expand fluency in Hebrew throughout the Diaspora, "the [World] Zionist Congress instructs the ZIONIST EXECUTIVE to create a comprehensive program for the instruction of the Hebrew language at schools and in educational institutions and universities, and in formal and informal education, and for the establishment of ulpanim (institutes or schools exclusively for intensive study of Hebrew) for the learning of the Hebrew language and Jewish tradition, identity and heritage, worldwide. . . . The Hebrew language must serve as a common platform for the Jewish people.” To achieve these goals the WZC proposed several programs:

1. A “University of the Jewish People in Israel,” to enable Jews from the Diaspora to study in Israel.
2. Improvement of the bar and bat mitzvah in Israel.
3. Joint summer camps for Israeli and Diaspora Jewish youth on a regular basis.
4. Encouragement of Jewish university students to pursue academic studies in universities in Israel.
5. A comprehensive network of Hebrew ulpanim in every active Diaspora Jewish community. The WZC stated: “the Zionist Movement considers the strengthening of Jewish education and activity among youth and students in the Diaspora a top priority that will guarantee the prevention of assimilation and the loss of members of our People.”

The WZC further proposed “the development of formal and informal Jewish educational frameworks . . . [that] include the history of the Jewish people, the current situation of Jews worldwide, acquaintance with Israeli society, Jewish cultural works throughout the generations.” Most important is the study of the Hebrew language. The informal frameworks would include youth movements, student organizations, the Dor Hemshech (future leadership) program, and community centers, which would “unite different generations under the same roof, from kindergarten and up to the old age.”

In the Diaspora, the hagshama youth movements are the spearhead of the Zionist Movement. They are a basic component of building Zionist leadership among young people in the Jewish communities. One such youth group is the World Union of Jewish Students, whose objectives include:

1. Educational activity carried out by young people to create leadership and Zionist activity
2. Strengthening of Jewish identity and Zionist awareness in order to place Israel at the center of the Diaspora Jewish community

How effective these organizations and programs are is difficult to judge. If these global organizations working full-time to ensure immigration to Israel and to provide financial substance for absorption are successful, the dynamics of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will be irrevocably altered.

The activities of Israel and its national institutions frequently go beyond education when they become involved with specific Diaspora communities. In 2001 an official statement of the WZC called upon the Jews of the Diaspora to make aliya to Israel and to strengthen the Judaism and Zionism of their countries. As part of that effort the WZO instituted several campaigns, particularly targeting GERMANY, FRANCE, and the former SOVIET UNION.

In 1991, Germany began offering Jews from the former Soviet Union the right to settle in that country to help rebuild its own Jewish communities devastated by the country’s Nazi past. Between 1991 and 2003 some 190,000 Jews emigrated from the Soviet Union to Germany. In 2004, for the first time, twice as many Jews from the former Soviet Union—or 20,000 people—chose to move to Germany over Israel. In 2003 the Jewish Agency appointed a former ambassador to Germany, Benjamin Navon, to lobby the German government to restrict immigration. In December 2004 the German government complied, passing a law allowing only Jews under the age of forty-five and familiar with the German language to immigrate. The new German law drew praise from Zionist authorities. Michael Jankelowitz, a spokesman for the WZO, said that the new regulations should increase the number of Jews in Israel from the former Soviet Union.

The episode with Germany recalled the pro-Israel pressure on the UNITED STATES government in 1990 to cease admitting SOVIET JEWS, thus ensuring they would have to go to Israel, to which Washington eventually agreed. The United States was also a focus of the twenty-first-century WZC campaign, which enjoyed significant success. The WZO expected American Jewish immigration to Israel to approach a twenty-year high in 2004. In the first ten months of 2004, 2,240 Americans exercised their right to automatic Israeli citizenship, compared with 2,385 for the whole of 2003.

In France WZO agents mounted a campaign that emphasized the rising ANTI-SEMITISM there and encouraged French Jews to immigrate to Israel as the only place they could be safe. In 2004 Jewish emigration to Israel from France reached its highest level since 1972.

Focusing on South Africa in 2002, the Zionist General Council, which acts on behalf of the WZC between sessions, called for “the allocation of special resources for the aliya and absorption in Israel of South African Jews, who are leaving their country of current residence in large numbers, but are mostly preferring to emigrate to other Diaspora communities. . . . The Zionist Movement must not miss this opportunity to bring them to Israel.”

The Diaspora, then, is an important source of immigration for demographic purposes, and, as at the outset of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict more than 100 years ago, it remains the core (together with LAND) of that conflict.

See also DEMOGRAPHY AND FOREIGN NATIONALS; IMMIGRATION

Bibliography

- Friedman, Motti. “Israel and Zionism. Israel-Diaspora Relations: The Modern Era.” The Jewish Agency for Israel, Department for Jewish Zionist Education. www.jafi.org.il/education/100/concepts/gola4.html
- “Immigration and Absorption.” The Jewish Agency for Israel. www.jafi.org.il/about/imm.htm.
- Jerusalem Institute for Israel and Israel Studies. “Two-thirds of Jerusalem’s 633,000 Residents Are Jews.” Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies. 6 July 1999. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Society\_&\_Culture/jerpop.html.
- “Jerusalem: Jewish, Muslim, and Christian Population (1910–2000).” Israeli-Palestinian ProCon.org. <http://www.israelipalestinianprocon.org/population/palestine.html#chart2>.
- “The Jewish Population of the World.” Jewish Virtual Library. 2005. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Judaism/jewpop.html.
- Meretz USA. “The World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency for Israel.” MERETZ. www.meretzusa.org.
- Mor, Aharon. “The Diaspora and Israel: A Spiritual Connection with Economic Backing: Fifty-two Years of Israeli Independence.” The Hagshama Department of the World Zionist Organization. 1 May 2001. www.wzo.org.il/en/resources/view.asp?id=9.
- Zionist General Council. “Resolutions Passed by the XXXIII/2 Session of the Zionist General Council, November 1998.” www.wzo.org.il/en/resources/view.asp?id=203&subject=28.

Diaspora, Palestinian

The concept of Diaspora leads us to consider the complex nature of relationships between the ethnic and religious communities in the Palestinian homeland, the similarities and differences in communities dispersed from the homeland, and the diverse ways in which they establish networks. The Diaspora, in other words, is a vast web with interconnections among both various peripheries and the center. Connectivity means not only the possible “return to the center” or the homeland, but also the continuous circulation and movement between different peripheries and the center. In the Palestinian Diaspora there is a global matrix of economic, social, and cultural networks established among individuals sharing the same Palestinian ethnicity. But possession of a Palestinian identity does not necessarily mean that a person would choose to return to Palestine (if permitted). There are multiple ways of being Palestinian and relating to Palestine. Most of the literature on expatriate Palestinians has focused on “Palestinian REFUGEES” and has considered other notions, such as “Diaspora,” “forced and volunteer migrants,” or “Palestinians abroad,” as inadequately expressing the Palestinian experience or undermining the Palestinian cause. It has been assumed that the relationship between the expatriate communities and the Palestinian territories or historical Palestine is “natural” and “primordial.” Yet, particularly since the beginning of the OSLO PROCESS in 1993, there are several impediments to relationships between the Palestinians abroad and the emerging Palestinian entity.

The Palestinian Diaspora today is composed of between four and five million people, settled for the most part in historic Palestine’s neighboring countries but also in the Arab Gulf States, in North and South America, and in Europe. This Diaspora maintains ties with the present Palestinian territories (WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP plus the Palestinian community in Israel), but the connections are fragile and diverse, involving three main spheres: networks, ideology, and cyberspace.

The first sphere—networks—is based on the relations among members of kinship, social, and economic groups, especially on a domestic basis rather than on transnational levels, because the political geography in the region hinders mobility and limits the possibility of visits between exiles and family members remaining in Palestine. The literature on the Diaspora often presupposes mechanical ties between peripheries and a center, founded on transnational social and economic networks, ethnically organized economic activities (e.g., ethnic businesses), and a system of solidarity (financial help, grants, etc.). However, these connections are far from being obvious in the Palestinian case. Indeed, some networks have been completely sundered under the weight of the structural constraints imposed by the Arab states—for example, difficulties in obtaining visas or economic systems that discourage regional travel and trade. Israeli policies have also impeded such mobility. Thus a person's decision to return to Palestine from the Diaspora would likely be affected by the quality and extent of his/her kinship network plus the practical limitations implemented by the various states.

The decision to return would be affected also by the intensity of an individual's ideology, which is constructed around the concept of the Nakba (literally disaster or catastrophe) and of the sacredness of the "right to return."

Finally, in the era of the Internet, Palestinian Diaspora communities are developing increasingly significant virtual relations. Indeed, the emergence of this medium has led to a new era in transnational imagined communities—the ability to be fully Palestinian without actually being in Palestine.

Another dimension of the Diaspora-Palestine relationship involves capital transfers from the Diaspora to the Palestinian territories. These take numerous forms, including investments, contributions, and remittances from earnings. Since 2005, remittances have been declining as workers have been prohibited from working in Israel, but investments and contributions continue to constitute an important element of connectivity. Although the Diaspora's contributions have not been regular, they increased significantly after the OSLO ACCORDS and the establishment of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY. Increased financial contributions during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA were crucial in helping families cope with the severe economic decline resulting from the SIEGE and the massive military destructions in the spring of 2002. These subsidies came mainly from the Gulf countries and the UNITED STATES.

To suggest an idea of the size of the Diaspora's contribution during a "normal" time, one study demonstrated that in 1996 the Palestinian Diaspora's contribution in investments and philanthropic activities together could be valued at $408 million (of which 74 percent was investments) and in 1997 $410 million (of which 76 percent was investments). These investments represent one of the main resources for the Palestinian economy. Indeed, compared to the total international assistance for the Palestinian territories, Palestinian investment from the Diaspora constituted 74 percent ($549 million) of this assistance in 1996, and 95 percent ($432 million) in 1997. Nevertheless, this level of investment is insufficient for a young entity ravaged by forty years of de-development and is substantially below the investment capability of business people in the Palestinian Diaspora.

During the Second INTIFADA and the War on Gaza (2008–2009), it is notable that some contributions have come from the lower-middle classes of Diaspora Palestinian communities. Contributions have been sent from JORDAN, LEBANON, and SYRIA. In this situation it is possible to distinguish two types of donations: individual contributions to specific families residing in the West Bank or Gaza (although it is impossible to accurately estimate these monies because the major part of such cash flows is not transferred through banks); and institutional contributions from Islamic associations, Christian charities and churches, or simply from pro-Palestinian solidarity groups/organizations (which are not necessarily managed by Palestinians in the Diaspora).

The WELFARE ASSOCIATION constitutes the most important financial institution of the Palestinians in the Diaspora, as much by its symbolic authority as by its financial strength. Composed of prominent Palestinian businesspeople and intellectuals, the association is a philanthropic and independent voluntary foundation established in 1983. It has earned its solid reputation as a serious organization by leading Palestinian development. From the start, it adopted the principle of self-sustainability. To guarantee financial durability, the association trustees set up an endowment fund, supervised by an investment committee and looked after by professional portfolio managers. The revenue is used to cover the association's recurring costs, which ensures that annual dues and donations are wholly appropriated to fund grants related to Welfare Association programs and projects in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

Thus it is evident that there are multiple levels and types of connections between Palestinians in the Diaspora and those in the homeland. The different forms of connectivity, their varying strength or weakness, the nature of individuals' lives in the host country, and other factors all make it quite difficult to predict how many Palestinians would return to Palestine even should they have that option.

Bibliography

Benvenisti, Eyal, Sari Hanafi, and Chaim Gans, eds. Israel and the Palestinian Refugees. Heidelberg: Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public and International Law, 2006.

- Hammer, Julianne. Palestinians Born in Exile: Diaspora and the Search for a Homeland. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2005.
- Hanafi, Sari. Between Two Worlds: Palestinian Businessmen in the Diaspora and the Construction of a Palestinian Entity. Cairo: CEDEJ (French); Cairo: Dar al-Mostaqbal al-Arabi (English); and Ramallah, West Bank: Muwatin (Arabic), 1996.
- . "The Impact of Social Capital on the Eventual Repatriation Process of Refugees: Study of Economic and Social Transnational Kinship Networks in Palestine/Israel." In The Predicaments of Palestinians and Jews: The Meanings of Catastrophe, Historical Knowledge, and the Return of Exiles. Edited by Ian Lustick and Ann Lesch. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- . "Investment by the Palestinian Diaspora in the Manufacturing Sectors of the West Bank and Gaza Strip." In Proceedings of the Expert Group Meeting on the Impact of the Peace Process on Selected Sectors. Amman, Jordan: UN Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, 1999.
- . "Opening the Debate on the Right of Return." Middle East Report. No. 222. March 2002.
- . "Reshaping Geography: Palestinian Community Networks in Europe and the New Media." Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies. 31:3 (2005).
- . "Rethinking the Palestinians Abroad as a Diaspora: The Relationships between the Diaspora and the Palestinian Territories." In Homelands and Diasporas: Holy Lands and Other Places. Edited by André Levy and Alex Weingrod. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2004.
- Hanafi, Sari, and Linda Tabar. The Emergence of a Palestinian Globalized Elite: Donors, International Organizations, and Local NGOs. Ramallah, West Bank: Muwatin and the Institute of Jerusalem Studies, 2005.

—Sari Hanafi

Dimona

See NUCLEAR PROGRAM, ISRAEL

Disengagement from Gaza

See ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA

Disturbances, 1921

By 1920, Palestinians, peasants in particular, felt their survival was at stake. That year Zionists paid an ABSENTEE LANDLORD and tax-farmer family 300,000 pounds sterling for 240,000 dunums (59,000 acres)—a huge block of land, including twenty-two villages in the fertile Jezreel Valley of northern Palestine. Nine thousand people—comprising 688 peasant families—were driven off the land, and their fields were given to new Jewish immigrants. As Zionist IMMIGRATION and LAND purchases increased, the frustration and misery of the peasants as well as the urban poor led to protests.

In the spring of 1921, Palestinian anger turned into violence in the city of JAFFA. A clash between two Zionist groups at a parade spilled over into the Arab quarter. After Palestinians attacked a Jewish immigration center and killed thirteen Jews, fighting spread throughout the city and beyond. In all, forty-seven Jews and forty-eight Palestinians were killed in the disturbances. In an attempt to calm the atmosphere in Palestine following the upheaval, the British high commissioner for Palestine, Sir HERBERT SAMUEL, asked Whitehall to establish a commission of inquiry.

The HAYCRAFT COMMISSION of Inquiry was set up originally to investigate what were termed the "Jaffa riots," but its remit was widened. Its report was entitled "Palestine: Disturbances in May 1921." The report blamed the Arabs for the violence, but identified a series of grievances concerning the way their interests were apparently being subsumed to the interests of the Jewish immigrants, who then made up around 10 percent of the population and were increasing rapidly. Some measures to ease Arab dissatisfaction were taken, but Jewish colonies were helped to arm themselves and ultimately the report was ignored. Publishing it (unlike the PALIN Report of the previous year) was considered a propitiatory measure.

Bibliography

- Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim, ed. The Transformation of Palestine. Chicago: Northwestern Press, 1971.
- Flapan, Simha. Zionism and the Palestinians. London: Croom Helm, 1979.
- Halbrook, Stephen P. "The Alienation of a Homeland: How Palestine Became Israel." The Journal of Libertarian Studies. 5:4 (1981).
- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- McTague, John J. British Policy in Palestine, 1917–1922. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1983.
- Muslih, Muhammad. The Origins of Palestinian Nationalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs under the British Mandate. New York: Henry Holt, 1999.

Dome of the Rock

The Dome of the Rock (Qubbat As-Sakhrah) is both a sacred shrine and an important historical and political site for Muslims—and a place of continuous strife in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The Dome of the Rock is one of the buildings on the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, the third holiest site in Islam, located in the OLD CITY of East JERUSALEM. At the macro level, Palestinians want to make East Jerusalem the capital of their proposed state, while Israel resists the emergence of a Palestinian state and considers all of Jerusalem, including the eastern sector, the eternal capital of Israel. At the quotidian level of the conflict, several Jewish fundamentalist groups want to level the Haram and all the buildings on it in order to rebuild the THIRD TEMPLE in its place.

Since 1967 some of these groups have attempted to blow up the Dome of the Rock, some have attacked it, and others pray there to demonstrate Jewish sovereignty. In 2005 one group, the Temple Mount Movement, petitioned the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT for permission to pray on the al-Haram ash-Sharif during the Tish'a Be'av Tzom holiday. The radical Third Temple groups have called for the destruction of the Dome and the entire Haram, and in 2005, Israeli police uncovered a plot to fire a missile at the Dome. The police arrested a handful of Jewish extremists on suspicion of plotting attacks against the Dome of the Rock, but none were charged or held.

The Dome of the Rock is sacred to Muslims for several reasons. One involves a passage in the Quran that links the Prophet Muhammad with Jerusalem and the al-Haram ash-Sharif. That passage, entitled "The Night Journey," relates that Muhammad was carried "from the sacred temple to the temple that is most remote, whose precinct we have blessed, that we might show him our signs." Muslims believe the two temples mentioned in this verse are in Mecca and Jerusalem. Further, according to Muslim belief, Muhammad's mystic night journey in the company of the archangel Gabriel stopped briefly at Mt. Sinai and then BETHLEHEM before finally alighting on the al-Haram ash-Sharif, where they encountered Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and other prophets whom Muhammad led in prayers. Gabriel then escorted Muhammad to the pinnacle of the Sakhrah (rock), where a ladder of golden light materialized. On this glittering shaft, Muhammad ascended through the seven heavens into the presence of Allah, from whom he received instructions for himself and his followers.

Islamic history is also deeply tied to the Dome. For a brief period between 680 and 692, Mecca was the capital of a rival (to the Umayyad's) caliphate that controlled most of Arabia and parts of IRAQ. Following the retreat of the Umayyad army from its siege of Mecca, the ninth caliph, Abd al-Malik, built the Dome of the Rock over the Sakhrah between 687 and 691, in part to discourage pilgrimages to Mecca. During this period the holy rock of Sakhrah was the primary sacred site of Islam.

Designed by Byzantine architects engaged by the caliph, the Dome of the Rock is considered the greatest monumental building in early Islamic history. It is sixty-five feet (twenty meters) high and thirty-three feet (ten meters) in diameter, and its supporting structure, made of lead, was originally covered in pure gold (the real gold was removed over the centuries and the Dome is now made of anodized aluminum). The Dome is encircled by sixteen arches, and its columns are made of rare marble and brilliant mosaics. It is not a mosque for public worship but rather a mashhad, a shrine for pilgrims. Adjacent to the Dome is the AL-AQSA MOSQUE, where Muslims make their prayers.

See also AL-AQSA MOSQUE; AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Bender, Arik. "Temple Mount Activist Says Blowing up Dome of the Rock Is 'Worthy Act.'" Ma'ariv International. 18 November 2004.
- Garbar, Oleg. The Shape of the Holy: Early Islamic Jerusalem. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.
- Nuseibeh, Said. The Dome of the Rock. New York: Rizzoli, 1996.

Dreyfus, Captain Alfred (1859–1935)

In 1894 in FRANCE, Captain Alfred Dreyfus was falsely charged with high treason and espionage in what came to be seen as an ANTI-SEMITIC smear known as the "Dreyfus Affair." His trial catalyzed journalist THEODOR HERZL's concept of ZIONISM and was subsequently used to support the belief that Jews could never be assimilated and thus Zionism was the only alternative.

In 1894, papers that were discovered in a wastebasket in the office of a German military attaché made it appear that a French military officer was providing secret information to the GERMAN government. Dreyfus, an obscure captain in the French army, came under suspicion probably because he was a Jew but also because he had access to the type of information that had been given to the German agent. The army authorities declared that Dreyfus's handwriting was similar to that on the papers. Despite protestations of innocence, he was found guilty of treason in a secret military court-martial during which he was denied the right to examine the evidence against him. The army stripped him of his rank in a humiliating ceremony and shipped him off to life imprisonment on Devil's Island, a penal colony off the coast of South America. In 1899 the president of France pardoned Dreyfus, thereby making it possible for him to return to Paris, but he had to wait until 1906—twelve years after the case had begun—to be exonerated of the charges, after which he was restored to his former military rank.

At the time of Dreyfus's initial trial, Herzl was a journalist for an Austrian newspaper, assigned to report on the trial and its aftermath. Although Herzl's Jewish connections were then weak and tenuous, he nonetheless saw in the Dreyfus Affair a harsh reminder of the persistence of anti-Semitism. He concluded that Jews could never be fully integrated into their adopted countries and would always be considered outsiders. They could never feel safe from persecution and abuse, except in a land that they could claim as their own. Soon thereafter Herzl wrote his first major book, Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State), in which he outlined his program of political Zionism. Within a remarkably short time the Zionist movement became global and settlers were immigrating to Palestine; by 1948 the state of Israel came into existence.

Bibliography

- Bredin, Jean-Denis. The Affair: The Case of Alfred Dreyfus, reprint ed. New York: George Braziller Publisher, 1986.
- Dreyfus, Alfred. Five Years of My Life: The Diary of Captain Alfred Dreyfus, reprint ed. Translated by James Mortimer. (Select Biographies). Manchester, NH: Ayer Co. Publisher, 2001.
- Dreyfus, Alfred, with Pierre Dreyfus and Donald C. McKay. The Dreyfus Case. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1937.
- Fulcher, Jane F. French Cultural Politics and Music: From the Dreyfus Affair to the First World War. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Sinclair, Michael. The Affair: The Case of Alfred Dreyfus. Winston-Salem, NC: Wake Forest University, n.d. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/anti-semitism/Dreyfus.html.

Spitzer, Alan B. Historical Truth and Lies about the Past: Reflections on Dewey, Dreyfus, De Man, and Reagan. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

Drobles Plan

The Drobles Plan was produced in 1978 by the head of the JEWISH AGENCY'S Division of Land and Settlement, Mattityahu Drobles. This plan (known as the Gush-Drobles Plan or Master Plan for the Development of Settlements in Judea and Samaria, 1979–1983) for the development of JEWISH SETTLEMENTS in the WEST BANK contended that 100,000 Jews could be settled in the West Bank by 1986. The GUSH EMUNIM adopted the plan, and ARIEL SHARON, then a minister in the government of MENAHEM BEGIN, explicitly supported it. Both Sharon and Drobles believed that Jewish colonization could be an instrument of "DEMOGRAPHIC transformation," which would change the ethnic character of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. The ultimate goal of the plan was Israeli annexation of the West Bank (and Gaza).

Excerpts from Drobles's Plan indicate its scope as well as its details: "(1) Settlement throughout the entire Land of Israel is for security and by right. A strip of settlements at strategic sites enhances both internal and external security alike as well as making concrete and realising our right to Eretz-Israel. (2) The disposition of the proposed settlements will be implemented according to a settlement policy of blocs of settlements in homogenous settlement areas which are mutually inter-related—this enabling, in time, the development of common services and means of production. . . . (3) The disposition of the settlements must be carried out not only around the settlements of the minorities [Palestinians], but also in between them. . . . (4) New settlements will be established only on STATE LAND. . . . (6) . . . We must also ensure, from the State and WZO [WORLD ZIONIST ORGANIZATION] budgets, the required investments for realising and executing this task. . . . Altogether, then, after five years there will be added in Judea and Samaria—in the proposed settlements, the existing ones and those under construction—27,000 families, this necessitating an overall investment of IL [Israeli lira, historical currency] 54 billion." The Drobles Plan also provided for the creation of four new ROADS in the West Bank.

By August 1984 some 113 settlements were spread over the entire West Bank, including a half dozen sizable towns. Some 46,000 Jewish settlers lived in the area (excluding expanded East JERUSALEM), and housing and services were under construction to absorb 15,000 additional settlers each year.

Bibliography

- Bazbaz, Marwan. "Settlement in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip." Palestine-Israeli Journal of Politics, Economics, and Culture. 6:2 (1997).
- Drobles, Mattityahu. Master Plan for the Development of Settlement in Judea and Samaria, 1979–1983. Jerusalem: Jewish Agency, 1978.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. Settlements in the West Bank (database). www.fmep.org/settlement\_info/statistics.html.
- Lein, Yehezkel. Land Grab: Israel's Settlement Policy in the West Bank. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center on Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2002.
- Lustick, Ian S. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: The Council on Foreign Relations, 1988.
- Mallison, W. Thomas, and Sally V. Mallison. Settlements and the Law: A Juridical Analysis of the Israeli Settlements in the Occupied Territories. Washington, DC: American Educational Trust, 1982.
- Newman, David, ed. Impact of Gush Emunim: Politics and Settlement in the West Bank. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 1985.
- UK Parliament Select Committee on International Development. "The Network of Settlements in the Occupied Territories." Memorandum submitted by Discovery Analytical Resourcing. February 2004.

Dudin, Mustafa (ca. 1916–1995)

Mustafa Dudin was an anti-PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) activist from the WEST BANK who worked for the Israeli CIVIL ADMINISTRATION organizing VILLAGE LEAGUES. During the BRITISH MANDATE, Dudin worked for the British as an officer in the Mandatory Police. From 1948 to 1965 he was an official in the Egyptian administration that governed the GAZA STRIP and afterward served as a Jordanian parliamentarian, cabinet minister, and ambassador to KUWAIT. In 1975, after a dispute with JORDAN (over an offense committed by his brother), he returned to his West Bank village of Dura near HEBRON.

Dudin then worked for Menahem Milson, whom Israeli prime minister MENAHEM BEGIN had appointed as head of a new civil administration in the military government in the OCCUPIED TERRI-TORIES. Milson asked Dudin to organize the rural population into village leagues, which, the Israelis hoped, would provide a counter to the PLO and lead to the acceptance of Israel's de facto annexation of the West Bank.

In August 1978 Dudin established the first village league, in Dura. Milson and Dudin promoted the leagues as a means to give the Palestinians some autonomy under local leaders, but most individuals in the West Bank considered the leagues as COLLABORATORS with Israel. Most traditional village notables and rural intelligentsia refused to join an organization that had the declared aim of combating Palestinian nationalism. Most Palestinians continued to support the PLO and refused to accept the leagues, leading to the failure of the project. In September 1983 Dudin resigned, and the project ended shortly thereafter.

Bibliography

- Be'er, Yizhar, and Dr. Saleh 'Abdel-Jawad. Collaborators in the Occupied Territories: Human Rights Abuses and Violations. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1994.
- Journal of Palestine Studies*. "Iron Fist on the West Bank." 11:1 (1981).
- Litani, Yehuda. "Village Leagues: What Kind of Carrot?" Journal of Palestine Studies. 11:3 (1982).
- Tamari, Salim. "Eyeless in Judea: Israel's Strategy of Collaborators and Forgeries." Middle East Report. No. 164/165 (1990).
- . "In League with Zion: Israel's Search for a Native Pillar." Journal of Palestine Studies. 12:4 (1983).

Dulles, John Foster (1888–1959)

John Foster Dulles was US secretary of state for six years (1953–1959) during the two-term presidency of DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER, who took his own major foreign policy ideas and moral compass from Dulles. As secretary of state, Dulles was instrumental in forming the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization and the Baghdad Pact. He was the first US secretary of state to make an extended tour of the Middle East, in 1953. On his return he advocated strict arms control throughout the region, the internationalization of JERUSALEM in accordance with the original UN partition resolution (UN RESOLUTION 181), and a solution for the Palestinian REFUGEES. Dulles was sharper in his criticisms of Israeli military policies than any secretary of state has been since. This did not mean, however, that he was pro-Palestinian or even pro-Arab; both Arab oil and anticommunism were his major US concerns, and Dulles feared that if the Arab-Israeli conflict was not solved, the Soviets could make inroads in the Middle East.

Dulles considered the Palestinian issue to be solely about the refugees and argued that the solution would be found in the economic development of the region so the refugees would have a better life. Dulles was silent on the political rights of the Palestinians and the implementation of Resolution 181 (partition), which would have granted the Palestinians self-government. Instead he favored JORDAN's occupation of the WEST BANK, because he believed the Hashemite monarchy in Jordan, despite King Abdullah's assassination in 1951, was a trustworthy pro-Western ally. Dulles had earlier played an important role in the establishment of the state of Israel. He was acting head of the US delegation to the 1948 Paris General Assembly session after George Marshall, head of the delegation, was called back to Washington. Dulles took charge and with the support of delegates Eleanor Roosevelt and Ben Cohen, persuaded the delegation to vote for the admission of Israel to the UNITED NATIONS.

Five months into his service as secretary of state, Dulles took a twenty-day trip through the Middle East in May 1953, visiting twelve nations and Jerusalem. After returning, on 1 June 1953 he gave a major foreign policy speech on national television and radio. He reported that he found Jerusalem "divided into armed camps split between Israel and the Arab nation of Jordan. The atmosphere there is heavy with hate. As I gazed on the Mount of Olives, I felt anew that Jerusalem is, above all, the holy place of the Christian, Muslim, and Jewish faiths. That has been repeatedly emphasized by the United Nations and that fact does not necessarily exclude some political status in Jerusalem for Israel and Jordan. But the world religious community has claims in Jerusalem which take precedence over the political claims of any particular state."

Dulles also described the "bitter fate" of the Palestinian refugees: "Closely huddled around Israel are most of the over 800,000 Arab refugees who fled from Palestine as the Israelis took over. They mostly exist in makeshift camps with few facilities for health, work or recreation. Within these camps, the inmates rot away spiritually and physically. Even the Grim Reaper offers no solution, for as the older die, infants are born to inherit their parents' bitter fate. Some of these refugees could be settled in the area presently controlled by Israel. Most, however, could more readily be integrated into the lives of the neighboring Arab countries. This, however, awaits irrigation projects, which will permit more soil to be cultivated. Throughout the area the cry is for WATER for irrigation."

Dulles continued: "The UNITED STATES should seek to allay the deep resentment against it that has resulted from the creation of Israel. In the past, we had good relations with the Arab peoples. American educational institutions there had built up a feeling of goodwill and also American businessmen had won a good reputation in this area. There was mutual confidence to mutual advantage.

"Today the Arab peoples are afraid that the United States will back the new state of Israel in aggressive expansion. They are more fearful of ZIONISM than of communism, and they fear the United States, lest we become the backer of expansionist Zionism. On the other hand, the Israelis fear that ultimately the Arabs may try to push them into the sea." Dulles admonished Israel to become "part of the Near East community and cease to look upon itself, or be looked upon by others, as alien to this community."

On 25 July 1953, on Dulles's advice, President Eisenhower rejected "for the time being" Israel's request for a $75 million loan. The decision reflected his displeasure with Israel's creeping annexation of Jerusalem. The loan was eventually granted, but on 18 September 1953 Dulles announced a temporary suspension of aid to Israel for its violation of the UN TRUCE SUPERVISION ORGANIZATION's request that Israel suspend work on its hydroelectric project on the Jordan River—the National Water Carrier.

This crisis grew out of Israel's secret plans to use the Palestinian village of Banat Ya'qub in the demilitarized zone near the Syrian border for a major water diversion project that would move the waters of the Jordan River to central Israel and south to the Negev. The United Nations, the United States, and the Palestinians who lived in that area were unaware of Israel's plans. Earlier the Eisenhower administration had offered to finance a US-sponsored regional water-usage plan (the Eric JOHNSTON PLAN), and Israel had promised to cooperate in that effort. But in reality Israel wanted complete control of the flow of water in the region, despite its commitments to the United States. Consequently a dispute ensued between the two countries.

Israel believed that if it completed the water diversion project, the United Nations would back down because the work could not be easily undone. Israel moved ahead on the project and worked nonstop, twenty-four hours a day, using searchlights at night to hasten completion while trying to maintain total secrecy. Israel even omitted appropriations for the project from its published budget and did not mention it to the Americans working with them on other water projects; however, US intelligence soon detected the activity.

When Dulles realized that Israel had deliberately deceived the United States and had no intention of keeping its earlier promise to cooperate in the US-sponsored regional water-usage plan, he recommended that Eisenhower withhold $26 million under the Mutual Security Act and suspend economic aid until Israel agreed to cooperate with UN observers. Eisenhower agreed. Acting on another suggestion by Dulles, President Eisenhower directed the Treasury to prepare an executive order removing tax-deductible status from contributions by Jewish Americans to Zionist organizations such as the United Jewish Appeal. Eisenhower did not make these actions public because he did not want to humiliate Israel, but the Israelis interpreted his reticence as a sign of weakness and continued work on the project, convinced that the Americans would back down.

Israel's strategy might have worked had Israel not launched a bloody raid on the village of QIBYA on the night of 14 October 1953. In that attack, twenty-five-year-old ARIEL SHARON, and his 300 Israeli commandos known as UNIT 101, massacred fifty-three Palestinian civilians. The Eisenhower administration condemned the raid and, for the first time, publicly revealed that it had already suspended construction funds for Israel's water project. This resulted in a major domestic backlash against Eisenhower. Hadassah, a Jewish charitable organization, publicly condemned the US government. An attaché at the Israeli Embassy attempted to divert attention from the water controversy by claiming, in a widely publicized speech, that the Qibya raid was in response to Jordanian aggression. Pro-Israeli US congress members and Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION accused Eisenhower and Dulles of ANTI-SEMITISM.

Fearing the financial consequences, Israeli representatives informed President Eisenhower on 19 October that work had ceased on the water diversion project and that Israel would cooperate with the Security Council's efforts to solve the Jordan River development problem. Within twenty-four hours, Dulles approved the restoration of aid to Israel. The Israelis interpreted Dulles's abrupt change of position as proof that they could manipulate the United States by applying adequate pressure. Ultimately Israel completed the water diversion project in a slightly altered manner.

On 26 August 1955 Secretary Dulles made a speech before the Council of Foreign Relations in New York in which he outlined terms for peace in the Middle East. He stated that the problem of Palestinian refugees could be resolved, but that Israel should not be expected to assume the full cost. He proposed that Congress approve an international loan to finance the resettlement or repatriation of Palestinian refugees in Arab states. The loan would also help develop irrigation projects to assist refugees in cultivating their land.

Dulles took a dim view of Israel's growing militarism, manifested in its policy of massive retaliation against neighboring Arab states, allegedly undertaken to stop Palestinian incursions but actually to force the Arab states to conclude peace agreements with Israel on its terms. The secretary of state feared that Israel's massive attacks on its Arab neighbors would heighten the Arab-Israeli conflict and provide the Soviet Union an entrée to the region. One of these attacks, the GAZA Raid in February 1955, resulted in EGYPT's purchase of weapons from the Soviet Union—the "Czech arms deal"—and provided MOSCOW its first opportunity for involvement in the Middle East. Dulles had repeatedly warned the Israelis that attacking their neighbors was no way to encourage peace. After the Gaza Raid Dulles told Israel, "Such raids dangerously heighten existing tensions. The very insecurity of which Israel complains is aggravated by such a policy."

On 29 October 1956, Israel attacked Egypt and advanced toward the Suez Canal. On 1 November British and FRENCH forces, in a plan developed before the Israeli attack, also invaded Egypt and began occupation of the Suez Canal zone. Opposition from President Eisenhower, Secretary Dulles, and UN secretary-general Dag Hammarskjöld, together with Soviet threats of intervention, put an immediate stop to British and French involvement, but Israeli troops remained in the Gulf of Aqaba and the GAZA STRIP in defiance of a UN resolution. Eisenhower is said to have told Dulles, "Foster, you tell 'em, goddamn it, we're going to apply sanctions, we're going to the United Nations, we're going to do everything that there is to stop this thing." He later explained, "We just told the Israelis it was absolutely indefensible and that if they expect our support in the Middle East and in maintaining their position, they had better behave."

Nevertheless, Israel continued to occupy the Sinai and the Gulf of Aqaba. On 2 February 1957 the UN General Assembly passed a resolution demanding Israel's withdrawal from the Gulf of Aqaba and the Gaza Strip, but Ben-Gurion refused. Disturbed by Israel's intransigence, Eisenhower wrote a strong letter (drafted by Dulles) to Ben-Gurion, demanding Israel's withdrawal. Still, Ben-Gurion refused. Hammarskjöld was quietly pushing for sanctions at the United Nations—with the full support of the Eisenhower administration—against Israel if it continued to occupy Egyptian territory. In response, then Senate majority leader LYNDON JOHNSON published a letter to Dulles in the New York Times, urging the Eisenhower administration not to support UN sanctions against Israel. Johnson argued that the United States would follow an unfair double standard by punishing a small country such as Israel when large countries such as the Soviet Union openly defied UN resolutions without being punished. In addition, Johnson rallied Senate Democrats to oppose sanctions against Israel. He used partisan politics in an attempt to pressure Eisenhower and Dulles into retreating, but both stood their ground and delayed financial assistance. When Israel began to feel the financial effects in March 1957, Ben-Gurion finally agreed to withdraw troops from Egyptian territory.

When Eisenhower was campaigning for his second term in the White House in 1956, Dulles was called to appear before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to discuss the Arab-Israeli conflict. In the hearings he was given a sharp reminder of the domestic political dimensions of the problem and was subjected to several hours of hard questioning, much of it from pro-Zionist Democrats such as Wayne Morse of Oregon and Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota. Dulles responded with the remark: "our difficulty . . . derives very largely from the fact that the Arabs believe that the United States, when it confronts problems which relate to Israel, is in the last analysis dominated by domestic political considerations."

A few days after the Senate hearings, which took place on 24 February 1956, Dulles was so irritated with the Zionist lobby that he took the extraordinary step of taking up the issue with ABBA EBAN, the Israeli ambassador to the United States. In a "bitter dressing down" of the ambassador, Dulles complained of "the political campaign being waged by the Israelis against the administration, the paid advertisements, the mass meetings, the resolutions, the demands of Zionist organizations, the veiled threats of domestic political reprisals."

In the end Dulles made no progress in solving the Arab-Israeli conflict. He resigned his office on 15 April 1959, after being diagnosed with terminal cancer.

Bibliography

- Adams, Sherman. First Hand Report: The Story of the Eisenhower Administration. New York: Harper, 1961.
- Eveland, Wilbur Crane. Ropes of Sand: America's Failure in the Middle East. New York: W. W. Norton, 1980.
- Finer, Herman. Dulles over Suez: The Theory and Practice of His Diplomacy. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1964.
- Gerson, Louis L. John Foster Dulles. New York: Cooper Square Publishers, 1967.
- Hoopes, Townsend. The Devil and John Foster Dulles. London: Andre Deutsch, 1974.
- Khoury, Fred J. The Arab-Israeli Dilemma, 3rd ed. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1985.
- Kyle, Keith. Suez: Britain's End of Empire in the Middle East. London: I. B. Tauris, 2002.
- . Whither Israel? The Domestic Challenges. London: I. B. Tauris, 1994.
- Neff, Donald. "Middle East History: It Happened in June: Surprises for the First U.S. Secretary of State to Visit the Mideast." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. June 1994.
- . Warriors at Suez: Eisenhower Takes America into the Middle East. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.
- Tivnan, Edward. The Lobby: Jewish Political Power and American Foreign Policy. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Al-Dura, Muhammad Rami Jamal (1989–2000)

Muhammad al-Dura was an 11-year-old Palestinian boy killed by Israeli gunfire near Netzarim junction in the GAZA STRIP on 30 September 2000 at the beginning of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA. A resident of Breij Refugee Camp in the Gaza Strip, Muhammad died of injuries sustained from five bullets to his body and head. His father took eight bullets but survived. A French television crew (France 2) filmed the boy clutching his father as his father tried to shield him from bullets. Broadcast around the world, this image became a rallying symbol of resistance and rage against Israel—a symbol of the al-Aqsa Intifada.

Bibliography

Tamari, Salim, and Rema Hammami. "The Second Uprising: End or New Beginning?" Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:2 (2001).

---

E

---

E1 Plan

E1 is an Israeli government plan to connect distant WEST BANK SETTLEMENTS, in particular MA'ALE ADUMIM, the largest Jewish settlement (population 32,000 in 2005), directly to East JERUSALEM. The E1 Plan involves confiscation of a swath of some 3,100 acres (12,590 dunum) of land between East Jerusalem and Ma'ale Adumim; the construction of 3,500 new housing units absorbing 15,000 additional Jewish settlers in new and existing colonies; plus the establishment of an industrial estate, police station, cemetery, park, and tourist and public areas. Expansion of the infrastructure is to include an elaborate system of roads, tunnels, and services.

The E1 Plan was conceived in 1997, a product of Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU'S grand strategy for the expansion of West Bank settlements and their linkage to East Jerusalem. In March 2005 ARIEL SHARON'S defense minister, Shaul Mofaz, gave governmental approval for implementation of the E1 Plan, but strong US pressure delayed its start.

Ha'aretz reported in February 2009 that "during the past two years Israel has invested close to NIS 200 million ($50 million) in preparing INFRASTRUCTURE for construction of housing units to create a contiguous block between Ma'aleh Adumim and East Jerusalem." The neighborhood of Mevaseret Adumim, slated to be built on Area E1, has so far not been begun because of continuing US opposition. However, in May 2008 construction of the Judea and Samaria police headquarters in E1 was completed. The building sits atop a hill where it moved from the Palestinian neighborhood of RAS AL-AMUD in East Jerusalem. Even though it is a relatively small complex (3.5 acres) inside a huge area, the police base opened a window for massive construction in the area.

In 2008 and 2009, there was dramatic infrastructure construction in the E1 area. A large system of ROADS, with an overpass, divided highways of up to three lanes wide, traffic circles, lighting, observation posts, and fences, has been completed. The extent of this construction is obviously meant to serve more than the several hundred employees traveling to the police headquarters every day. The construction of the police station, done with the required PERMITS, seems to have been a necessary initial stage for the "claiming" of Area E1 for eventual construction of residential neighborhoods there.

The completion of the E1 Plan will allow Israel greater control of the movement of Palestinians from one part of the West Bank to another while cutting off East Jerusalem from the rest of Palestinian territory. Because 40 percent of the Palestinian ECONOMY revolves around Jerusalem and its tourist-based income, E1 could isolate the economic center of any Palestinian entity and render any developing Palestinian state little more than a set of economically nonviable BANTUSTANS.

At the same time, E1 will block off East Jerusalem from the West Bank by encircling the city with settlements and the BARRIER wall, putting an end to territorial contiguity of East Jerusalem Palestinians with the rest of the Palestinian territories, and tipping the DEMOGRAPHIC balance of Jerusalem in favor of Israel by creating a decisive Jewish majority through the incorporation of the settlers from the Ma'ale Adumim settlement bloc (including Ma'ale Adumim, Mishor Adumim, Kfar Adumim, and Allon, plus the new colonies to be established within E1). The plan's implementation will expand the territorial and infrastructural foundations for the Israeli capital to double its size, while disrupting the only prospective Palestinian route of passage still available for relinking not only Arab East Jerusalem's currently scattered neighborhoods but also the discontinuous Palestinian territories of the northern and southern West Bank.

On the other hand, through E1, the contiguity of Israel's territory with major parts of the West Bank is solidified. E1 controls the main axis of socioeconomic development for Israelis outlined in Israel's METROPOLITAN JERUSALEM PLAN. The critical area of E1 runs along the trajectory of

Map 13. Location of E1 Development Plan

Road 45, which originates in greater Tel Aviv and leads via Ben Gurion Airport—scheduled to be greatly expanded in conjunction with large industrial zones around the city of Modi'in—to GREATER JERUSALEM at the West Bank settlement of Givat Ze'ev. The road continues along the recently developed archaeological site next to the Prophet Samuel's tomb and passes the East Jerusalem settlement community of Ramot and the expanding industrial park of Har Hotzvim, to arrive at the projected Eastern Gate settlement site in East Jerusalem. From here it passes to Ma'ale Adumim and further to a newly projected settlement area at Tibek Kuteif on the heights above the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY.

The E1 scheme has significance beyond the territorial area that it encompasses by demonstrating the degree to which settlement expansion has been seamlessly integrated into Israel's national planning framework. The E1 Plan additionally calls for linking, through the system of existing and new bypass roads, Ma'ale Adumim with Giv'at Ze'ev in the north and the Etzion Bloc in the south, as well as with Pisgat Omer, Neve Ya'acov, and French Hill, thus creating a large bloc of Jewish colonies.

According to a public statement by Defense Minister EHUD BARAK, "Ma'aleh Adumim is an inalienable part of Jerusalem and the State of Israel in any permanent settlement . . . E1 is a corridor that connects Ma'aleh Adumim to Mount Scopus and therefore it is important for it to remain part of the country." This has been the position of the Israeli LABOR PARTY since YITZHAK RABIN and also of the government of Barak in 1999.

Bibliography

- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. The E1 Plan. Jerusalem: ARIJ, 2005.
- . A Military Order to Seize 300 Dunums of Al' Khader. Jerusalem: ARIJ, 2001.
- . Reactivating E-1 Plan of Ma'ale Adumim Colony. Jerusalem: ARIJ, 2005.
- . The Status of Jerusalem Reconstructed: Israel's Unilateral Actions Determine the Future of Jerusalem. Jerusalem: ARIJ, 1999.
- Benn, Aluf, and Yossi Verter. "A Country That's Fun to Live In." Interview with Ehud Olmert. Ha'aretz. 14 March 2006.
- Ben-Tal, Daniel. "In Jerusalem: Eastward Bound." Ma'aleh Adumim News. 28 April 2005. www.jr.co.il/ma/manews05.htm.
- Brubacher, Matthew. "The Jerusalem Ring Road: The Good, the Bad, and the Explosive." News from Within (Jerusalem monthly). 17:4 (2001).
- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Eldar, Akiva. "Settlers to Move into East Jerusalem Police HQ." Ha'aretz. 28 April 2008.
- Foundation for Middle East Peace. E1 Settlement Expansion Plans Preempting the Growth of Arab Jerusalem. FMEP 4 (Winter 1998). Washington, DC.
- Ginbar, Yuval. On the Way to Annexation: Human Rights Violations Resulting from the Establishment and Expansion of Ma'ale Adumim Settlement. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 1999.
- Halper, Jeff. "E1: The End of a Viable Palestinian State." ICAHD. 27 March 2005. <http://fromoccupiedpalestine.org/node.php?id=1505>.
- Harel, Amos. "Israel Plans to Build up West Bank Corridor on Contested Land." Ha'aretz. 1 February 2009.

- Hilsun, Lindsey. "Out of Gaza—and into Jerusalem." New Statesman. 15 August 2005.
- Shragai, Nadav, and Baruch Kra. "Committee Approves Jerusalem Ring Road through West Bank: The Plan Effectively Puts an End to the Possibility That Abu Dis Will Revert to the PA." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 15 March 2001.

Early Empowerment

Early Empowerment, short for "Israel and the PLO Agreement on Preparatory Transfer of Powers and Responsibilities: Early Empowerment," was the fourth accord between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in the OSLO PROCESS and was signed on 29 August 1994. The agreement, hundreds of pages in length, was intended to facilitate the implementation of Israel's transfer of responsibility to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) for administration of aspects of civilian life in the GAZA STRIP and JERICHO. Building on previous accords, Early Empowerment further spelled out the limitations and restrictions as well as the obligations and responsibilities incumbent on the PNA when it assumed self-government in five areas, including EDUCATION and culture, HEALTH, social welfare, tourism, and direct taxation. The latter sphere was to be shared with Israel for "security" reasons. The OCCUPATION, together with all the military orders and laws that sustain it, remained in effect, especially in the WEST BANK. The Israeli CIVIL ADMINISTRATION was dissolved in Gaza but remained in place throughout the West Bank. The existence of two separate entities, Palestinians and settlers, with separate legal standards was preserved and legitimized in the Early Empowerment accord. Finally, consistent with the provisions in the 4 May 1994 GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT II, Israel was explicitly exempted from legal responsibility for acts committed during its twenty-eight-year Occupation.

Bibliography

- Aruri, Naseer H. "Early Empowerment: The Burden Not the Responsibility." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:2 (1995).
- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Bowen, Stephen, ed. Human Rights, Self-Determination and Political Change in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. London: Kluwer Law International, 1997.

Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Israel and the PLO Agreement on Preparatory Transfer of Powers and Responsibilities: Early Empowerment, 29 August 1994. www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Peace+Process/Guide+to+the+Peace+Process/Agreement+on+Preparatory+Transfer+of+Powers+and+Re.htm.

East Jerusalem

See GREATER JERUSALEM; JERUSALEM; METROPOLITAN JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM

East Jerusalem Settler Groups

See SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM

Eastern Orthodox Church

See GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH

Eban, Aubrey (Abba) Solomon (1915–2002)

Aubrey “Abba” Eban was an Israeli scholar, diplomat, and politician. Born in Cape Town, South Africa, and educated in England, he immigrated to Palestine in 1942. Eban received degrees from Cambridge University in Middle Eastern languages and literature and served with the British army in World War II as a liaison officer between the Allies and the Jewish Yishuv. He remained in Palestine after the war.

In the years preceding Israel’s independence, Eban was chief instructor (1944–1946) at the Middle Eastern Center for Arab Studies in JERUSALEM and worked at the JEWISH AGENCY before commencing his diplomatic career as representative to the 1947 UN SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PALESTINE. From that position, Eban worked for approval of the UN General Assembly Resolution for the Partition of Palestine (UN RESOLUTION 181). Known for his superb oration, in 1948 he became Israel’s UN representative, serving concurrently as ambassador to the UNITED STATES from 1950 until his election to the Knesset in 1959. A member of the LABOR PARTY, Eban held various cabinet positions before becoming foreign minister.

From 1966 to 1974, Eban served as Israel’s foreign minister and strongly defended the country’s position in the 1967 WAR. In 1967 he played an important role in inserting language into UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242 (as well as UN RESOLUTION 338 in 1973) that allowed Israel to argue that the resolutions do not call for its withdrawal from all of the territories occupied in 1967.

In 1988, after three decades in the Knesset, Eban lost his seat due to internal splits in the Labor Party. He devoted the rest of his life to writing and teaching, including serving as a visiting academic at Princeton University and Columbia University. He also narrated television documentaries, including Heritage: Civilization and the Jews (PBS [Public Broadcasting Service], 1984), for which he was host; Israel: A Nation Is Born (1992); and On the Brink of Peace (PBS, 1997). His books include My Country; Abba Eban: An Autobiography; Diplomacy for the Next Century; and Heritage: Civilization and the Jews. In 2001 Eban received the Israel Prize, his country’s highest honor, for his life’s work.

Bibliography

Haber, Leo. “Abba Eban, z”l.” Midstream Journal. 49:1 (2003). <http://www.midstreamthf.com/200301/feature.html>.

Economic Protocol

See GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT II

Economy: The Effects of Occupation on the Palestinians

In 1967, when Israel occupied the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP, it integrated Palestinian markets in these areas into its economy. At the time, the Israeli economy was approximately ten times the size of the Palestinian economy, its sectoral diversification was much greater, and the manufacturing sector’s share of its GDP (gross domestic product) was more than four times larger than the Palestinians’. These differences in size and structure defined the relations between the two economies: on the one hand, a large, advanced, and rich economy, and, on the other, a small, underdeveloped, and poor economy. Both theoretical analyses and empirical studies suggest that the dynamics of such a relationship always generate two opposing forces—spread effects and backwash effects—that disproportionately affect the smaller economy and distort its development.

Such relations include an increased demand for the products of the small economy, possible diffusion of technology and knowledge from the large economy to the small one, as well as other spread effects resulting from the geographical proximity of the two economies. These effects typically lead to subcontracting, joint ventures, and coordination in tourism and other services. Unfavorable repercussions arise from the disappearance of many industries in the small economy, its confinement to producing labor-intensive and low-skilled goods, and the emigration of a sizable segment of its labor force to the neighboring economy as well as to other countries. These effects are known in the literature as backwash effects or polarization effects. They arise from the capability of efficient, large-scale industries in the advanced economy to outcompete inefficient, small-scale industries in the less advanced economy and to attract both labor and capital to the advanced economy and away from the poorer economy.

From the perspective of the small economy, therefore, the crucial question is the net balance between the two opposing dynamic impacts: to what extent do they help its own development and to what extent do they reinforce underdevelopment? Among the factors that determine the relative strength of these two forces is the degree of integration between the two sides, which can be easily illustrated by examining trade. A removal of tariff and other barriers to trade between the two countries would increase the exports of the small economy to its neighbor in a pattern of comparative advantage. This level of exports, however, will not be sustained if free trade between the two countries is accompanied by a common external tariff and if the tariff is substantial and fixed, as is likely when an advanced economy wants to protect its industries or when the poor economy does not have a substantial natural endowment or a niche advantage. Such protection would increase the price of intermediate and capital goods imported by the small economy and thus raise its cost of production in a way that would compromise its comparative advantage.

Further measures of integration between the two economies, such as allowing free movement of labor and capital, would significantly reduce the export of goods from the small to the large economy because the export of labor services would be substituted for the export of goods. In other words, free trade and free mobility would gradually wipe out comparative advantage from trade and confine it to absolute advantage, resulting in the small economy exporting low-skilled goods and importing high-skilled goods, thus locking in its poverty and underdevelopment. The small economy would be relegated to the status of a backward region in an otherwise advanced country, as is the case of the south in Italy and central Appalachia in the United States. Had the integration between the two countries been allowed to proceed at a slower pace and had the poor economy been able to exploit its own natural or human resources, free trade between the two sides without a common external tariff and free mobility of factors of production may have allowed producers in the small economy to expand production. This would have been the result of taking advantage of economies of scale and enhancing a comparative advantage favorable to development. In short, a slow pace of integration and sovereignty over resources and trade could improve the comparative advantage of the small economy by tapping the spread effects, whereas a hasty integration and usurpation of domestic resources would destroy the comparative advantage through the working of the polarization effects.

The pattern that evolved between the Israeli and Palestinian economies is characterized by the following:

- Israel possesses the majority of the modern sectors, operating under increasing returns of scale characteristic of manufacturing activities.
- By offering a wage premium to Palestinian workers in the traditional sector, such as in agriculture and crafts, Israel has assured itself an elastic supply of labor for its modern industries. This wage premium was a small one, given the low wages in Palestinian agriculture and the geographical proximity of the pools of migrating workers to their work in Israel.
- The influx of Palestinian labor into Israel at a fraction of the Israeli labor cost has reduced the wage premium in the Israeli modern sector, including technology and communication, and made it more profitable and sustainable.
- The shekels (Israeli currency) earned by Palestinian migrant workers in Israel are typically spent on the consumption of Israeli products, thus increasing demand for these products.
- Israel imposed on the Palestinian economy a common tariff regime that effectively wiped out any comparative advantage that the Palestinians could have with Israel or with neighboring Arab markets.

- The geographical proximity between the two economies reduced transportation costs and time and contributed to the destruction of the traditional sector. The Occupied Territories lost even their absolute advantage in many agricultural products after the traditional sector was disrupted by the OCCUPATION and could not act as a buffer sector for local employment.

Economics of the Occupation

Immediately after Occupation in 1967, Israel imposed on the West Bank and Gaza Strip a customs union trade arrangement (that is, a free trade area with a common external tariff) that increased tariffs approximately fourfold. This drastic increase, along with the many nontariff barriers applied by Israel, resulted in Palestinians turning away from trade with neighboring Arab countries and the rest of the world and toward the Israeli market. It also raised the cost of capital and intermediary goods to Palestinian producers, which effectively wiped out their competitive edge in foreign markets. For instance, the cost of garment production in the West Bank is larger than that of JORDAN by a factor of 2.17, mainly because Palestinian producers pay double the price for their imported Turkish textiles compared to the superior-quality and cheaper East Asian materials imported by Jordanian producers. The Palestinians cannot import the Asian textiles because of the prohibitive tariff imposed by Israel to protect its own industry and trade with its strategic partners. Similarly, the cost of agricultural products, pharmaceuticals, and shoes is lower in Jordan than in the Palestinian territories partly because of the differences in imported input prices.

Another reason for the high cost of Palestinian production in both agriculture and industry is the relatively high wage rate. It is estimated that wages of Palestinian workers are larger than those in Jordan by a factor of 2 to 3 in agriculture, a factor of 2 in the garment industry, and a factor of 2.3 in the shoe industry. These higher wages are the result of distortions in the labor and product markets created by Israel's hiring of Palestinian commuters to work by the day in Israel—a practice that started with the Occupation and steadily increased to account for almost a third of the Palestinian labor force in the early 1990s—plus the high cost of imports under the Israeli price and trade regimes. Higher wages in Israel have put pressure on employers in the Occupied Territories.

This trade arrangement has increased the cost of Palestinian production, causing Palestinian exporters to lose their comparative advantage in traditional neighboring markets, and facilitated their migration to Israeli markets. More importantly, economies of scale realized by the advanced Israeli manufacturers enabled them to undercut the small Palestinian firms producing for the domestic market, disrupting and replacing Palestinian artisan and small-industry production. A UNITED NATIONS study in the mid-1980s showed that 50 percent of Palestinian imports from Israel had been produced domestically prior to the Occupation.

While these adverse backwash effects were at work, other positive spread effects were introduced by the Occupation, including a limited number of new opportunities for employment in and trade with Israel and a minor transfer of technology. The rapidly rising income earned by Palestinians working in Israel contributed to increased demand and domestic economic activities. Palestinian agriculture benefited from a transfer of technology from the more advanced Israeli agriculture, and this contributed to increased exports of some agriculture products to Israel. The cumulative impact of this expansion in economic activities helped increase Palestinian income, savings, and investments, especially in residential construction.

Economic Policies and Practices

The higher cost of living in Israel and the external diseconomies produced by congestion in Israel suggest that backwash effects should ultimately outweigh the benefits of greater efficiency and economies of scale in Israel. However, the relation between the two economies has followed a different path. In the first decade, the Palestinian economy benefited from its relation with Israel; the Palestinian GDP per capita grew from 11 percent to 16 percent of that of Israel. But then the ratio declined continuously, and at the start of the limited self-rule in 1994 was almost at the level of a quarter century before. The reason for this reversal was the Zionist policies practiced by Israel since the start of Occupation, which increased in intensity and aggressiveness in the mid-1970s and circumvented the forces in the market, bolstering the effects of polarization and diminishing the spread effects. These policies and practices include the following measures.

Restriction on the Use of Natural Resources

Since the start of the Occupation, the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip have increasingly lost control over their LAND and their supply of WATER. It is widely believed that by the time Palestinian limited self-rule was established in 1994, Israel had confiscated 68 percent of the total land of the West Bank and 40 percent of the Gaza Strip, mainly for new Jewish SETTLEMENTS and CLOSED MILITARY ZONES. As of 2004, more than 85 percent of Palestinian water from the West Bank aquifers was taken by Israel, accounting for 25.3 percent of Israel's water needs. Palestinians are also denied their right to utilize water resources from the Jordan and Yarmuk Rivers. West Bank farmers historically used the waters of the Jordan River to irrigate their fields, but this source has become polluted because Israel is diverting water flows from around Lake Tiberius into the lower Jordan. Moreover, Israeli diversion from Lake Tiberius into the National Water Carrier has reduced the flow considerably, leaving Palestinians downstream with little water and water of low quality.

In Gaza the coastal aquifer serves as its main water resource, but it is now suffering from severe saltwater intrusion. Other Gaza water sources, such as runoff from the HEBRON hills, have been diverted for Israeli purposes. Gaza, which housed only 50,000 people before 1948, is now one of the most densely populated regions in the world, with over 1.4 million inhabitants as of July 2007. This is the result of the high levels of forced IMMIGRATION following the 1948 and 1967 WARS and the high rate of natural population increase.

Most of the water used by Israel is for use within Israel and by Israeli settlers in the West Bank and, until 2005 when Israel withdrew, the Gaza Strip. With regard to total water consumption, Israel uses 1,959 cubic meters per year per capita compared to an average Palestinian use of 238 cubic meters per year per capita. By the end of 2008 the number of Jewish settlers had reached around 450,000 in the West Bank (including East Jerusalem).

These Israeli policies toward land, water, and settlements had a profoundly negative impact on all economic activities but particularly on agriculture. But most importantly, they facilitated the forced migration of labor whose ranks swelled from the proletarianization of Palestinian farmers, who lost their land and water, which in turn produced a sharp decline in irrigated land and steep increases in the price of land and water. The most important component of the Palestinian economy, the agricultural sector, employs about one-quarter of the labor force and contributes approximately one-third of the GDP and exports. In contrast, Israeli agriculture, an advanced capital-intensive sector, contributes no more than 2 percent to the GDP and less (1.7 percent) to exports. The loss of large stretches of agricultural land in the Occupied Territories after 1967 and limitations on water supply and product markets have led to a substantial decline in the production and importance of this sector. In 1967, Palestinian agricultural production, on balance, was almost identical to Israel's. Although tomatoes, cucumbers, and melons were roughly half of Israel's crop, plum and grape production was equal to Israel's, and Palestinian production of olives, dates, and almonds was higher. At that time, the West Bank exported 80 percent of the entire vegetable crop it produced and 45 percent of total fruit production. According to David Kahan, an Israeli scholar, "The agricultural sector was hit hard after Israel occupied the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Thereafter the sector's contribution to Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in the Palestinian Occupied Territories declined. Between 1968/1970 and 1983/1985 the percentage of agricultural contribution to the overall GDP in the West Bank fell from 37.4/53.5 percent to 18.5/25.4 percent. The labor force employed in this sector has also declined. Between 1969 and 1985, the agricultural labor force as a percentage of the total labor force fell from 46 to 27.4 percent."

In 1965, before the Israeli Occupation, the actual cultivated area in Palestine was estimated at 600,000 acres (2,435 square kilometers). In 1980 the total area fell to 480,000 acres (1,951 km<sup>2</sup>), in 1985 to 428,000 acres (1,735 km<sup>2</sup>), and in 1989 to 421,000 acres (1,706 km<sup>2</sup>), a reduction by 30 percent of the area cultivated in 1965. Israeli restrictions also have drastically limited the irrigation of Palestinian land so that today only 6 percent of the West Bank land cultivated by Palestinians is under irrigation, the same proportion as in 1967. By contrast, about 70 percent of the area cultivated by Jewish settlers in the West Bank is irrigated.

Marketing of farm products and their distribution to local and external markets are another major obstacle facing Palestinian farmers.

Throughout the Occupation years, selling Palestinian agricultural products within Israel has required special PERMITS issued by the Israeli authorities. Transporting products from north to south in the West Bank has become difficult as well, especially after Israel enforced a CLOSURE on East JERUSALEM that included the main road connecting northern and southern parts of the West Bank. Movement of agricultural products between the West Bank and Gaza Strip is also subject to Israeli control.

The GULF WAR in 1991 also severely affected Palestinian agriculture, because the bulk of exports were previously sent to Arab Gulf countries. Although Palestinian exports to the Gulf States before the war had accounted for approximately $25.4 million per year, Palestinian exports fell by 14 percent after the crisis.

Restrictions on Other Productive Sectors

In addition to the removal of land and water from Palestinian control, the Israeli authorities have followed a general practice aimed at changing the structure and performance of the Palestinian economy. In 1967 all economic activities were placed under the scrutiny of the Israeli military administration in the territories, and every economic undertaking requires its approval. Permits are required for all activities related to the acquisition of land, the construction of buildings, the transportation of goods, and export and import activities.

Palestinian firms have to pay a value added tax (VAT) on all their imports of raw materials through Israel. Long delays in receiving VAT refunds has caused some firms severe problems of cash flow and shortage of capital, resulting in an annual loss estimated to be 8 to 12 percent of the value of their finished products. Investment was further discouraged by the underdevelopment of effective financial sources in the Palestinian economy. This reflected the fact that all Arab banks were closed at the beginning of the Occupation and only reopened on a very small scale in the mid-1980s.

Another Israeli restriction is related to technological change and modernization. The Israeli authorities did not permit Palestinian firms to import machines and tools incorporating the latest technology, but instead Palestinians were compelled to buy secondhand machines from Israel.

It should also be noted that the customs union arrangement Israel imposed on the territories was, in effect, an asymmetric trade scheme that allowed Israel's own heavily subsidized products free entry into Palestinian markets but prevented the entry of Palestinian products into the Israeli market except on a selective and limited basis. This imbalance in trade relations, combined with complex administrative procedures aimed at limiting Palestinian exports to the rest of the world, has made Palestinian trade completely dependent on Israel. Not only do 90 percent of all Palestinian imports come from Israel, but Palestinians pay for these imports partly by exporting labor services to Israel and partly by exporting goods manufactured under subcontracting arrangement with Israeli firms.

Resource Transfer to Israel and the Neglect of the Public Sector

The forced integration of the Palestinian economy into that of Israel involved a transfer of resources from the former to the latter via three channels. First, Palestinians pay VAT and customs duties on products imported from Israel. It is estimated that half of the taxes paid by Palestinians in the Occupied Territories accrued to the Israeli treasury in this way. The second source is the income tax and social security contributions paid by Palestinians working in Israel. The third is the seigniorage revenue Israel received because its currency was made legal tender in the Occupied Territories. The total of these resource transfers is large and, according to some estimates, reaches in any given year from 15 percent to a quarter of the Palestinian GNP.

As a consequence of this transfer, public expenditures in the Occupied Territories (health, education, utilities, infrastructure, etc.) have been very low. Palestinians complain about the poor state of public infrastructure in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and the low level and poor quality of public services and utilities, which they view as far below those of neighboring countries. The poor condition of the basic infrastructure and public services causes market fragmentation, which in turn inhibits specialization and the realization of economies of scale that are essential for a small economy to be competitive.

The cumulative impact of the foregoing restrictions on resource use, business activities, and domestic and international trade has substantially weakened the traditional productive sectors of the Palestinian economy. As a consequence, a major structural transformation of the Palestinian economy has taken place. It has become an economy characterized by a growing resource gap, a labor market imbalance, a great and unhealthy dependence on external sources of income and aid, an INFRASTRUCTURE gap, sectoral disarticulation, and a depressed and debilitated infrastructure.

Economics of Limited Self-Rule during the Interim Period

The gradual establishment of Palestinian limited self-rule in parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip after May 1994, the result of the implementation of the OSLO ACCORDS between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, resulted in a transfer of power over some economic affairs from the Israeli CIVIL ADMINISTRATION (CA) to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), including the removal of restrictions on business activities. In some geographical areas, Palestinian firms were no longer required to get permits and licenses previously required by the Israeli CA. However, some of the indirect restrictions remain, including indirect taxes and the tariffs on consumer durables from neighboring Arab countries.

Under limited self-rule, the customs union regime that was at the center of the economic relationship between Israel and the Occupied Territories changed in two directions. First, some elements were removed. In principle, Palestinian goods should have received the same tariff treatment in Israel that Israeli goods received in Palestine. Second, some elements of a free trade area regime were introduced, and the PNA was permitted to choose its own tariff rates on three lists of goods specified by Israel.

Monetary arrangements during the transitional period of 1994–2000 were an improvement over those of direct Occupation. Arab banks reopened, new ones were established, and banks were monitored by the Palestinian Monetary Authority (PMA), which has some of the functions of a central bank but not the right to issue national currency. The Israeli currency (the shekel) and the Jordanian currency (the dinar) remained as legal tender. While the absence of a national currency renders Palestinian monetary policy ineffective, the existence of a two-currency standard has the potential for increasing costs associated with fluctuations in exchange rates typical of a flexible exchange rate regime. Moreover, a dual currency tends to reduce the ability of commercial banks to perform their function of transforming debt maturities, because the currency is mismatched in mixed portfolios. This discourages banks from extending long-term loans, which are essential for investment and growth.

Under the limited self-rule, some of the resource transfers to Israel were eliminated. Nevertheless, Israel retains control over reimbursements to the PNA for 75 percent of the income tax collected from Palestinians working in Israel and 100 percent of the income tax collected from those working in Jewish settlements. According to agreements between Israel and the PLO, Israel was also to collect and transfer to the PNA all VAT on goods purchased in Israel by Palestinian firms, although in periods of conflict Israel has withheld and refused to transfer these funds. Palestinian imports from the rest of the world, which must pass through Israel, still generate customs duties received by Israel and are not transferred to the PNA. This happens because Palestinian wholesalers and firms use Israeli traders, who include the Palestinian imports as part of imports destined to Israel (rather than the West Bank and Gaza Strip). Accordingly, customs paid by Palestinians on these imports accrue to Israel and are not transferred to the PNA. Although there is no precise way of measuring the exact size of this forfeited revenue, studies at differing time periods have estimated it to be around one-third of total tax revenue and about 3 percent of the Palestinian GDP.

The most important feature of the limited self-rule is the continued absence of Palestinian sovereignty and the lack of control over natural resources. In the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP), it was agreed that there would be no change in sovereignty over land, water, and settlements during the transitional period, but that these issues would be left to the FINAL STATUS negotiations. Consequently, the restrictions imposed on the Palestinian use of land and water remain intact. Furthermore, the conditions under which the limited self-rule has been implemented have caused geographic segmentation with harmful economic effects. According to a World Bank report, the new situation “split up the West Bank and Gaza into a number of largely separate economic units with little economic interrelationships among them, breaking up an already small domestic market into even smaller ones.” Moreover, the awkward fractionalization of the limited self-rule areas has created a multidimensional uncertainty that is discouraging to both domestic and foreign investment. For example, a prospective investor can obtain a license for starting a business from the PNA, but bringing outside capital, goods, and people for that investment needs the approval of the Israeli authorities; and he cannot be certain that if his factory is in NABLUS, for instance, he will be able to reach other parts of the West Bank due to CHECKPOINTS, ROADBLOCKS, and other impediments, let alone export to other countries.

During the interim period, Palestinians received their severest blow with the rapid construction of new Jewish settlements and the expansion of existing ones.

All of these activities increased in scope and intensity after 1997, especially in Palestinian lands surrounding the city of JERUSALEM. After six years of limited self-rule, the Palestinian economic outlook was as bleak as it was under direct Occupation. In fact, the general well-being of the Palestinian people in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, as measured by all indices, seriously deteriorated after the establishment of the limited self-rule. The Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics reported that in the 1995–1996 period real average per capita expenditure was 15 percent below its value for the years 1992–1993. A growing gap between Israeli and Palestinian per capita income also reflected this deterioration in the standard of living.

Post-Intifada Crisis

A deep economic crisis pervades the West Bank and Gaza in the waning years of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, which began late in 2000. The Intifada and Israel's responses have impoverished an entire generation of young Palestinians and have served to undermine the credibility of the PNA while increasing the popular appeal of militant factions—especially the Islamists. The economic recession is among the worst in modern history. Average personal income declined by more than a third after September 2000, and nearly half of Palestinians live below the poverty line. These losses exceed the scale of economic losses suffered by the UNITED STATES in the Great Depression or Argentina during its major financial collapse. Unemployment increased from 10 percent of the workforce to an average of 41 percent during 2002, and the number of poor rose from 20 percent to over 50 percent of the population. In Gaza, unemployment exceeded 46 percent of the workforce, and the poverty level rose to 68 percent. Private investment and trade fell dramatically through 2001 and 2002.

The main cause of this economic crisis has been closures—a multifaceted system of RESTRICTIONS ON THE MOVEMENT of Palestinian goods and people designed to protect Israelis in Israel proper and in the settlements. Closures typically take three basic forms: (1) internal restrictions within the West Bank and Gaza reinforced by CURFEWS, (2) restrictions on the BORDERS between Israel and the West Bank and between Israel and Gaza, and (3) restrictions at the international crossings between the West Bank and Jordan and between Gaza and EGYPT. Closures have affected the web of Palestinian economic transactions, raised the costs of transactions and doing business, and disrupted the predictability needed for orderly economic life and investment. They have reduced the already small Palestinian economy and shredded any possibility of reaping economies of scale or scope. Although the Palestinian economy stabilized in 2003, this reflected diminished levels of violence, fewer curfews, more predictable closures, and adaptation by Palestinian businesses to the contours of a cantonized West Bank economy. It also reflected the temporary fiscal stimulus from Israel's resumption of revenue transfers in late 2002 (Israel paid the PNA $294 million of a debt of over $441 million, although after the Palestinian elections in 2006 brought a HAMAS-led government to power, Israel again ceased all revenue transfers). Led by increased construction activity and informal transport and commerce, 97,000 new jobs were created in the West Bank and Gaza, and unemployment and poverty levels both fell by some four to five percentage points.

The economy, however, continued to operate at well below its previous performance, and under the closures it cannot generate the employment needed to absorb a rapidly expanding workforce or organize a sustained attack on unemployment. With the population growing at 5.2 percent in 2003 (and 5.5 percent in Gaza), 2003's GDP increase of 6 percent translated into per capita GDP (or domestic output) growth of about 1 percent. The quality of most new jobs created in 2003 was poor, with more than half classified as self-employed or unpaid family labor in commerce and agriculture—low-skilled jobs with limited potential, evidence of a growing “informalization” of the economy, and down-skilling the labor force and employment. Investment and trade remained depressed in 2003: private investment totaled at most US$600 million, roughly one-third of 1999 levels, while exports actually decreased, contributing only 14 percent to GDP.

An easing of closures alone will not attract investors back to the Palestinian economy, nor will additional donor money solve the current economic problems. Donor disbursements of US$1 billion per annum are already high. Additional aid in today's economy would help alleviate day-to-day hardship but would have little lasting impact. As long as the economy is fragmented and unpredictable, investors will stay away and short-term gains will not be sustainable.

Economic Impact of the Barrier

In April 2002 the Israeli government approved the construction of a permanent BARRIER in the West Bank, with the stated aim of preventing Palestinians from carrying out attacks against Israelis. Upon completion, the Barrier, or the Wall, will be over 400 miles (652 kilometers) in length, 16 to 26 feet high, depending on the locale, and surrounded by a 200-foot (60-meter) exclusion area. The route does not consistently follow the Green Line (1967 border), but penetrates up to 13 miles (22 kilometers) into the Palestinian land, affecting about 375 square miles (973 square kilometers), or 17 percent of its area, and encompassing about 20 percent of the population of the West Bank.

About 13 percent of the cultivated area in the West Bank, 91 square miles (238 square kilometers) of land, will be isolated between the Green Line (1967 border) and the Barrier, resulting in additional restrictions on movement of the Palestinians, separating peasants from their lands and workers from jobs, and depriving thousands of the ability to earn a livelihood. By the fall of 2004, Israel had expropriated 6,900 acres (2,800 hectares) of Palestinian land for the construction of the Barrier.

In the northern West Bank, the confiscated land is among the richest and most productive agricultural land in the Occupied Territories, with some of the best water resources in the area. Combining all the negative impacts of the Barrier on Palestinian agriculture could lead, according to some estimates, to a reduction of at least 20 percent of the sector's productive capacity. The construction of the Barrier will have a negative impact on other economic sectors as well. Limitations on mobility of people and goods result in higher transaction costs for all economic activities. And because the Barrier increases uncertainty about the future, it dampens investment.

Economic Impact of the Israeli Disengagement Plan from Gaza

In June 2002, after the Israeli army reoccupied most of the West Bank, the Israeli government announced that "the state of Israel has reached the conclusion that there is currently no partner on the Palestinian side with whom progress can be made on a bilateral peace process." Guided by this political stance, the Israeli government began a process of unilateral actions independent of the Palestinians. In August 2005, Israel implemented its plan of UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA. The Israeli army redeployed from Gaza, and Jewish settlers vacated the settlements. In a prearranged agreement with Egypt, Israel turned over control of the PHILADELPHI ROUTE to Cairo, while retaining exclusive control of Gaza airspace and the Gaza coastline.

Theoretically, the Palestinians could benefit from this disengagement in two ways. First, the redeployment of the Israeli army will reduce the internal closures in Gaza and restore some mobility of people and goods. Second, Gazans could utilize the land previously taken by settlements, agricultural land, and military installations. The potential benefits of these two sources, however, are not significant, because Gaza remains an isolated enclave, surrounded by an electronic fence, and the restrictive trade arrangement imposed on Gaza will discourage investment.

The practical details of the disengagement plan are not yet clear, however. The Israeli government is planning to transform the Gaza Strip into a customs zone separate from the economic system in the other territories. This implies that Israel is planning to disengage the Gaza Strip from the economic regime established by the Paris Protocol/Annex IV of the Gaza-Jericho Agreement. According to the protocol, Israel collects customs duties on goods destined for the West Bank and Gaza Strip and transfers them to the PNA, which comprises about two-thirds of all PNA revenue. The imposition of a new customs system on Gaza that is different from that of the West Bank will have far-reaching economic ramifications.

The Economics of the Labor Market

The working of the labor market best epitomizes the dynamic of the relationship between the Israeli and Palestinian economies. Since the beginning of the Occupation, opportunities for Palestinians to work in Israel have been the most important single factor in the relation between the two economies. In just a few years after the beginning of the Occupation, the problem of unemployment in the Palestinian economy was almost completely eliminated by allowing Palestinians to work in Israel. The number of these workers increased steadily in the first decade of the Occupation and contributed to a very rapid increase in Palestinian money income. However, this steady injection of financial resources was not channeled into productive investment in the Palestinian economy due to various obstacles created by Israeli regulations that stifled investment under Occupation. The export of labor to Israel earned incomes that became a major source of financing imports from Israel. As we have seen in the foregoing, this dynamic had a deleterious effect on the possibility for economic development in the Occupied Territories. Moreover, beginning in 1993 (the year Oslo was initiated), when Israel began to drastically reduce the number of Palestinian workers it permitted to enter Israel—culminating in a total prohibition in 2000, which sent unemployment skyrocketing and resulted in widespread, massive poverty—Palestinian economic dependence on Israel was shown in all its horrific dimensions.

Estimates of economic losses from the resulting interruption to labor and trade flows vary, but most indicate huge losses, reaching in 1996 about 18.2 and 39.6 percent of GNP of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, respectively.

Bibliography

- Arnon, A., et al. The Palestinian Economy: Between Imposed Integration and Voluntary Separation. New York: Brill, 1997.
- Awartani, H. Palestinian-Jordanian Agricultural Relations. Nablus, West Bank: Center for Palestinian Research and Studies, 1994.
- Bhagwati, J., and V. Dehejia. "Free Trade and the Wages of the Unskilled: Is Marx Striking Again?" In Trade and Wages. Edited by J. Bhagwati and V. Dehejia. Washington, DC: American Enterprise Institute, 1994.
- Cobbam, David, and Nu'Man Kanafani, eds. The Economics of Palestine: Economic Policy and Institutional Reform for a Viable Palestinian State. London and New York: Routledge, 2004.
- Diwan, I., and R. Shaban, eds. Development under Adversity: The Palestinian Economy in Transition. Ramallah, West Bank: Palestine Economic Policy Research Institute (MAS) and the World Bank, 1999.
- Farsakh, Leila. Palestinian Employment in Israel 1967–1997: A Review. Ramallah, West Bank: Palestine Economic Policy Research Institute (MAS), 1998.
- . Palestinian Labor Migration to Israel: Labor, Land and Occupation. New York: Routledge, 2005.
- Fischer, S., et al. Securing Peace in the Middle East. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1994.
- German-Arab Chamber of Commerce. Trade for Peace in the New Middle East. Cairo: Commission for the European Communities, 1995.
- Gorden, W. M., and A. P. Neary. "Booming Sector and De-industrialization in a Small Open Economy." Economic Journal. 92 (December 1982).
- Hamed, O., and R. Shaban. "One Sided Custom and Monetary Union: The Case of the West Bank and Gaza Strip under Israeli Occupation." In The Economics of Middle East Peace. Edited by S. Fischer, D. Rodrik, and E. Tuma. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1993.
- Krugman, P. R. Development, Geography, and Economic Theory. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1998.
- Krugman, P. R., and M. Obstfeld. International Economics: Theory and Policy. New York: Harper-Collins College Publishers, 1994.
- Lonergan, S., and D. Brooks. Watershed: The Role of Fresh Water in the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. Ottawa, Ontario: International Development Centre, 1994.
- Luski, I., and J. Weinblat. The West Bank and Gaza Strip: A Macroeconomic Profile and Simulation Model. Tel Aviv: The Philip Monaster Center for Economic Research, 1994.
- Makhool, B. Competitiveness of Palestinian Industry vs. Jordanian Industry. Ramallah, West Bank: Palestine Economic Policy Research Institute (MAS), 1996.
- Mansour, A., and B. Destreman. Palestine and Israel: Subcontracting in the Garment Industry. Ramallah, West Bank: Palestine Economic Policy Research Institute (MAS), 1997.
- Murphy, R., A. Schleifer, and R. Vishny. "Industrialization and the Big Push." Journal of Political Economy. 97 (1989).
- Naqib, F. M. A Preliminary Evaluation of the Tax System in the West Bank and Gaza. Ramallah, West Bank: Palestine Economic Policy Research Institute (MAS), 1996.
- Norman, V., and A. B. Venables. International Trade and Factor Mobility and Trade Costs. CPER Discussion Paper 766. 1993.
- Owen, R., and S. Pamuk. A History of the Middle East Economies in the Twentieth Century. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Roy, S. "The Palestinian Economy after Oslo." Current History. 97:615 (1998).
- . "US Economic Aid to the West Bank and Gaza Strip." Middle East Policy. October 1996.
- United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. Development in the Economy of the Occupied Palestinian Territory. UNCTAD: TD/B/40 (1). 1993.
- UNCTAD. The Palestinian Economy and Prospects for Regional Cooperation. UNCTAD: GDS/SEU/2. 1998.

- . Palestinian External Trade under Israeli Occupation. UNCTAD: /RDP/SEU/1. 1989.
- . Prospects for Sustained Development of the Palestinian Economy: Strategies and Policies for Reconstruction and Development. UNCTAD: ECDC/SEU/12,21. 1996.
- United Nations Industrial Development Organization. Survey of the Manufacturing Industry in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Vienna: UNIDO, 1984.
- World Bank. Developing the Occupied Territories—An Investment in Peace. Washington, DC: World Bank, 1993.

—Atif Kubursi and Fadle Naqib

Education and the Role of Textbooks

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has been fought on every conceivable level, and propaganda has been an instrument employed by both sides. During the years of the OSLO PROCESS, opponents of the peace talks mounted a major campaign charging that Palestinian textbooks were ANTI-SEMITIC, that they incited students to hatred and violence, and that they spoke of a Palestinian state in all of historic Palestine (thus denying Israel's existence). So successful was this campaign that, in the US MEDIA and other elite circles, the allegations were taken at face value and widely repeated. Since then, several serious studies have demonstrated the fallacies of the allegations. In order to obtain a complete picture of the role that Palestinian and Israeli textbooks play in peace education or the opposite, an Israeli educator and a Palestinian educator compared the two societies' textbooks.

Ruth Firer, director of Peace Education Projects at the Harry S. Truman Institute for the Advancement of Peace at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and Professor Sami Adwan of Bethlehem University carried out research on Palestinian and Israeli textbooks over a three-year period (2002–2005). Their central finding was that “the books used in each society reflect the perspective on the conflict in which they are both engaged and are also part of a wider societal mechanism to ensure that the conflict becomes part of the children's identities.”

Firer and Adwan analyzed Palestinian history and civics textbooks for middle schools as well as the primary-level textbooks used in all types of Palestinian schools—public, private, and UNITED NATIONS Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East. The Israeli sample included only the most commonly used texts among the numerous Israeli textbooks in history and civics as well as Israeli readers for the first six grades of primary school (for secular, religious, and ultra-Orthodox schools).

Palestinian Texts

In September 2000, for the first time in Palestinian history, twenty-nine new textbooks for grades one and six were introduced into schools. In addition, in September 2001, sixteen textbooks for grades two and seven were introduced. Until the establishment of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in 1994, no effort was made, including by Israel, after 1967 to modernize or change textbooks used by Palestinians. The PNA, however, set a priority of transforming the educational system, including writing completely new textbooks. The PNA Ministry of Education plans to introduce new texts for two grades at the beginning of each school year. In the meantime, Jordanian and Egyptian textbooks continue to be used in the remaining grades, as they have been since 1948, when those countries occupied the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP, respectively. And although both countries have peace treaties with Israel, their texts continue to present negative stereotypes of Israelis.

Although the textbooks from JORDAN and Egypt ignored the Palestinians' own narrative, Firer and Adwan report that the new Palestinian textbooks reflect Palestinian life and reality, as well as the diversity within Palestinian society; they talk about Palestinian culture and tradition and focus on building Palestinian identity as part of the Arab world. Most important, Firer and Adwan found that the texts teach Palestinian students to respect human rights, justice, peace, equality, freedom, and tolerance in terms of both self and others. The books caution students to avoid extremism and stereotypes and encourage them to treat all people equally. The books also encourage students to respect other religions and to protect all religious places, not just their own.

The researchers further reported that Palestinian students are warned in the texts about the terrible results of wars and conflict—that they result in death and destruction—and are encouraged instead to resort to negotiation and peaceful forms of conflict resolution. The texts discuss the OSLO

ACCORDS as a step toward peace and to breaking the enmity and long period of conflict. Students learn about Gandhi and his form of civil disobedience as well as other peaceful forms of conflict resolution. The researchers state categorically: “We found no incitement for the use of violence at all.”

Additionally, Firer and Adwan report that the new Palestinian textbooks define the future independent Palestinian state within the 1967 borders as described in UN resolutions. The few maps that are included mainly show the PNA-governed areas of Gaza and the West Bank, although some show Israeli towns and cities. At the same time, students are taught to cooperate and develop good relationships with neighboring states. Arab East JERUSALEM is presented as part of the Occupied Territories and the future capital of Palestine.

The books, the researchers write, portray Jews throughout history in a positive manner and avoid negative stereotypes. However, according to the everyday experience of Palestinians, modern-day Israelis are presented as occupiers. The texts include examples of Israelis killing and imprisoning Palestinians, demolishing their homes, uprooting fruit trees, and confiscating their LANDS and building SETTLEMENTS on them. When describing how the 1948 Palestinian REFUGEES lived in camps, the texts talk about the right of return for the refugees.

Israeli Texts

The Israeli Ministry of Education publishes and recommends a list of texts from which teachers can choose, although others are available from the textbook market in Israel. The primary-level textbooks that were analyzed are used by three different audiences: secular, religious, and ultra-Orthodox. Firer and Adwan observe that those used in secular schools (which include more than 60 percent of the students in Hebrew-language primary schools) encourage patriotism, on the one hand, and individual and social human rights, on the other, including children’s rights, freedom of expression, and the uniqueness of the individual. The books also provide exercises in self-criticism, analytical thinking, acknowledgment of emotions and skills for controlling them, as well as dialogue with others. Although Western values are the source of the human rights described in the secular textbooks, the values in the textbooks in religious schools are derived from the Halacha (Jewish religious laws and way of life).

The protagonists of the secular textbooks are children who learn to be themselves, to cope with family, friends, school, and their national identity. In contrast, in the religious textbooks, the children are part of a collective that is built on hierarchy and the roles defined by Judaism. Firer and Adwan report that Zionist ideology is the main pillar of the secular books. Accordingly, the sovereign state of Israel is presented as the only answer for the historical problem of anti-Semitism and as the only alternative for the Jewish nation. The secular textbooks also include stories about Arab children (Jordanian and Palestinian) who play or would like to play with their Israeli peers. Messages of peace with the neighboring countries and peoples are integrated explicitly and implicitly into the texts.

Further, the researchers observe, the textbooks used in the state religious primary schools are also Zionist, but in a different way. These texts enhance religious-national education, strongly emphasizing the collective values connected to the history of the Jews in “their land” and God’s promises to the Jews that give them an absolute right to the land. The land of Eretz Yisrael described in the books includes the Palestinian territories occupied in 1967. In addition, stories and poems about religious and national holidays are based on a perceived existential threat posed to Jews and Israelis by “others.” These stories are about wars and loss and pain caused by the “others” through the generations. Many of the chapters describe “the good land,” sometimes called “our birthplace” or “homeland,” and include photos of places that are in the PNA-designated areas or are disputed by the two nations, such as East Jerusalem—presented as belonging to the Israeli state. Such religious textbooks are used in almost 20 percent of the Jewish state schools.

Firer and Adwan report that the primary-level textbooks for the ultra-Orthodox community are used by less than 20 percent of the autonomous schools (which are not supervised by the Israeli Ministry of Education) and ignore the state of Israel, Independence Day, and HOLOCAUST Commemoration Day. Instead, they heavily emphasize God’s promise of the broader Eretz Yisrael to the Jews and include photos from all the places considered to be part of Jewish land. In both Orthodox and ultra-Orthodox textbooks, the “others” are the goyim (Gentiles), which includes Arabs of all nationalities as well as everyone else not Jewish.

Firer and Adwan observe that the Palestinians, as such, are not found in any of the three types of primary-level textbooks. In these readers, the Palestinian minority in Israel and the PNA Palestinians are referred to as Arabs. Texts that emphasize peace and tolerance for “others” were found only in the secular primary-level textbooks. Otherwise, tolerance and camaraderie are only encouraged within the defined kin (i.e., Jewish) collective.

In conclusion, Firer and Adwan state that, “while we argue of course, that school textbooks are an important element in peace education, the main ‘textbook’ is life outside schools and the oral presentations by teachers that reflect the public’s general feelings. Currently, such oral and real-life instruction is far from conveying genuine peace education messages. Since the Palestinian-Israeli conflict has not been resolved, modifying textbooks is problematic. As part of a true peace process, both Palestinians and Israelis have to revise their textbooks to clearly reflect the values of peace education.”

Bibliography

- Anti Defamation League. “Anti-Semitism in Palestinian Textbooks: Letter to President Abbas.” Washington, DC: ADL. 11 April 2005.
- Brown, Nathan J. “The International Controversy Regarding Palestinian Textbooks.” Paper presented at the George-Eckert Institute for International Textbook Research, Braunschweig, Germany, 9 December 2002.
- Levin, Andrea. “Palestinian Textbooks Teach Anti-Israel Hate.” Washington, DC: CAMERA. 1 June 1999.
- Moughrabi, Fouad. “The Politics of Palestinian Textbooks.” Palestine Monitor: The Voice of Civil Society. Ramallah, West Bank, n.d. www.palestine-monitor.org/Special%20Section/debate%20on%20incitement%20in%20Pal.%20Schoolbooks/politics\_of\_palestinian\_textbook.htm.
- Eldar, Akiva. “What Did You Study in School Today, Palestinian Child?” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 2 January 2001.
- Firer, Ruth, and Sami Adwan. “Comparing Palestinian and Israeli Textbooks.” Palestine Monitor. 28 March 2002. (The article was distributed by the Common Ground News Service [CGNews] and is to be published in broader form as a book by the George Eckert International Institute of Textbooks Research in Germany.)
- Jewish Virtual Library. “Incitement, Anti-Semitism and Hatred of Israel in Palestinian School Textbooks.” November 2001. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Peace/patext1.html.

Stahl, Julie. “Palestinian Authority Still Pushing Anti-Semitism in Textbooks Israeli Minister Says.” CNSNews.com. 11 April 2005.

Tarazi, Marwan. “The Palestinian Academic Network.” East Jerusalem: The Palestinian Council for Higher Education, n.d. www.ercim.org/medconf/papers/zoughbi.html.

Egypt

Egypt’s involvement in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has stemmed from its yearning for regional stability, which supported Egyptian national interests, and from its desire to maintain domestic stability in a country where much of the public identified with the Palestinian cause and suffering.

Egypt, along with the other Arab states, considered the UNITED NATIONS decision to partition Palestine (29 November 1947) a historical injustice against the Arabs in general and against the Palestinians in particular. Egypt joined the Arab effort to prevent the implementation of the partition resolution for a variety of reasons, including ideological and moral considerations, domestic public opinion, and national prestige—of which one factor was Cairo’s desire to realize its hegemonic aspirations in the Arab world. As soon as Israel declared independence, Egypt deployed its regular army to fight against the nascent Jewish state; however, it did not fare well in battle, and by the end of 1948 the Egyptian army had suffered a total defeat. An ARMISTICE AGREEMENT was signed between the two states on 24 February 1949.

The failures at the Israeli front aggravated an internal crisis that Egypt had been experiencing for several years. The campaign in Palestine was widely criticized, socioeconomic tensions mounted, and internal instability grew steadily. On 23 July 1952, a coup by the Free Officers toppled King Farouk’s regime and ushered in a new era in the history of modern Egypt. The new Egyptian leaders held deeply ingrained hostility toward Israel and the perception that its establishment was an injustice to the Palestinians and an imperialist conspiracy directed against all Arabs. As time went on, these tenets became permanent components of the overall political perceptions, both of the leadership and the Egyptian public at large. In terms of concrete objectives, however, the struggle against Israel was not a top priority of the new regime. Relations with Israel were mainly influenced by border incidents and by Egypt’s blockage of Israeli ships and cargoes through the Suez Canal and the Straits of Tiran (the passage from the Red Sea to the Gulf of Aqaba). Still, the new regime refrained from an escalation of the border situation and even carried out high-level secret contacts with Israel.

It is possible to discern a change in Egyptian domestic and foreign policies from 1955 to 1956. By that time, the main objective of the revolutionary regime was to secure full national freedom from Great Britain and pursue socioeconomic development. The international goodwill and financial contributions from Western nations in support of the construction of the Aswan High Dam project were reversed as Egypt acquired the image of a pivotal leader in the anti-imperialist struggle. Egypt's recognition of the People's Republic of CHINA, its intensifying contacts with MOSCOW, and JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR'S increasing prestige, especially after the role he played in the Bandung Conference (March 1955), only exacerbated Western anxiety. Yet it seems that it was the signing of the Egyptian-Czechoslovakian arms deal that most alarmed many Western states as well as Israel. In reaction to announcements by the UNITED STATES, Britain, and the World Bank that they would not provide financial aid for the High Dam project, 'Abd al-Nasir proclaimed the nationalization of the Suez Canal (26 July 1956), ending British administrative control over the waterway.

Four months later, the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) launched a full-scale military operation into the Egyptian Sinai Peninsula. As Britain and FRANCE landed troops in Port Said a few days later, it became obvious that the two countries had formed a secret attack plan with Israel. Militarily, Egypt's armed forces were unable to contain the three attacking armies. Only diplomatic pressure from the two superpowers, especially the United States, brought the war to an end. When the guns fell silent (7 November), the IDF had already completed the occupation of the Sinai Peninsula, while British and French forces held some areas along the Suez Canal. However, the agreement that terminated the war stipulated the complete withdrawal of British, French, and Israeli forces.

Despite its total military defeat, 'Abd al-Nasir's revolutionary regime had not only survived but actually become stronger. Most significantly, the Suez crisis launched what can be characterized as the decade of Nasirite domination. One of the implications of this crisis was that it caused Egypt's decisionmakers to solidify their perception of Israel as aggressive and expansionistic, to set themselves goals consonant with this perception, and to decide on the means to attain them. 'Abd al-Nasir and his regime disputed—on ideological, moral, political, national, economic, and historical grounds—the legitimacy of Israel's existence as a sovereign and independent state in the midst of the Arab Middle East. At times, 'Abd al-Nasir declared openly that Israel's existence was a threat to the Arabs and that its ultimate destiny was to disappear. Official spokesmen frequently referred to the need to return all of Palestine to the Palestinian people; that is, to liquidate the state of Israel as the home of the Jewish people and as the realization of ZIONISM. 'Abd al-Nasir sharply opposed other Arab quarters that proposed an accommodation with Israel, envisaged Arab recognition of Israel's right to exist in the partition boundaries, or contemplated signing a peace agreement. A salient example of this attitude was his out-of-hand rejection of Tunisian president Habib Bourguiba's appeal, in March 1965: "When it becomes clear that our forces are not capable of destroying the enemy and of throwing him into the sea it will be advisable to proceed phase after phase."

In January 1964, at the first Arab summit meeting held in Cairo, the Arab states approved the formation of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), an organization initiated and coordinated in the preceding years by Egypt, and its head, AHMAD SHUQAYRI, a Palestinian who was handpicked by 'Abd al-Nasir. Despite its fiery rhetoric against Israel, the PLO was intended by 'Abd al-Nasir to be an organization devoid of actual autonomy, which would serve to prevent other, underground groups from getting Egypt entangled in a war before it was prepared for military confrontation with Israel. Egypt failed, however, in its bid to control the Palestinian National Movement. Within five years of its creation, the compliant PLO was taken over by Palestinian guerrilla groups (mainly by YASIR ARAFAT'S FATAH) that had been engaged in ARMED STRUGGLE against Israel.

Crisis after the 1967 War

Following its defeat in the June 1967 WAR, Egypt lost the Sinai, its armed forces were in total disarray, the Egyptian economy was dealt a mortal blow by the loss of transit fees through the Suez Canal, and Cairo had to contend with the loss of the Sinai oil fields as well as the near-total cessation of tourism. Investments also declined steeply while defense expenditures increased sharply. Moreover, a sense of insecurity spread throughout the population, as certain quarters of the public began to doubt the leadership's ability to extricate the country from the crisis. The war had turned into a test of 'Abd al-Nasir's personal, charismatic leadership and of that of his associates, as well as of the regime's legitimacy. 'Abd al-Nasir and his colleagues regarded the crisis as a threat to Egypt's most vital interests, and change became the watchword of the hour. After rather prolonged deliberations, the leadership concluded that the key to the changes needed at home and in foreign relations lay in Egypt's ability to stop Israel as an expansionist state that sought to dominate Arab territories from the Nile to the Euphrates.

On the other hand, Egypt began to perceive the conflict with Israel as having two dimensions. One was the traditional pan-Arab Nasirite view that there could be no settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict without first a just settlement for the Palestinians. The second view, which became predominant in Egyptian leadership circles as a consequence of the magnitude of the 1967 defeat, was that recovering lost Arab territories had to be Cairo's overwhelming priority. The Palestinian issue could wait. 'Abd al-Nasir had firmly moved to the second perspective.

The countless statements by Egyptian official personages that "what has been taken by force can only be recovered by force" led many to assume that despite the 1967 defeat, Cairo was clinging to the concept of a military option as the only strategy for dealing with the conflict with Israel. But, from an early point after the war, Egypt was thinking in terms of a twofold approach—both military and political means, which were viewed as complementary. Each was to be pursued as the means became available and as circumstances would allow. One of the most revealing statements 'Abd al-Nasir made was his address on 23 November 1967, a day after the passage of Resolution 242 in the UN Security Council, in which he stressed that the political and the military option must be pursued side by side—at least during that particular period. "Neither is preferable to the other," he said. And indeed the WAR OF ATTRITION dominated the Egyptian-Israeli front for the next three years.

After 'Abd al-Nasir died on 28 September 1970, his successor, Anwar al-Sadat, pursued a gradual change in Egypt's overall strategic aims, first and foremost concerning the conflict with Israel. Sadat's point of departure, much like 'Abd al-Nasir's, was that the maintenance of the status quo was harmful to Egypt. The War of Attrition against Israel's occupation of the Sinai Peninsula was taking a heavy toll on Egypt. Sadat continued to uphold the combination of political and military action, however. He took pains to affirm his personal interest in promoting peace, and as early as February 1971 he stated: "We want peace, and I have already said several times that I am ready to go to the end of the world to prevent a single soldier of ours from being wounded."

When Sadat realized that his peace overtures had gained no consideration, he decided instead to go to war with the objective of ending the "no peace, no war" status quo. On 6 October 1973, Egypt and SYRIA launched a surprise attack on Israel's forces in Sinai and the Golan Heights. Egypt's strategic aims were to break the status quo, to regain the Egyptian territory Israel had occupied in 1967, to cause the United States to substantially change its policy toward the Arab-Israeli conflict, and to make the political solution more advantageous to Egypt. When the fighting ceased, Israel occupied even more territory of the two Arab states than it had when the war began. Nevertheless, from Sadat's perspective, because the Egyptians had taken Israel by surprise, had crossed the Suez Canal and occupied the Bar-Lev line, and had acquitted themselves well in the fighting, Egypt had regained its national honor and achieved important strategic gains. And, despite not recapturing Egyptian territory, Cairo had accomplished its strategic goals. After the 1973 War, both Cairo and Washington revised their attitudes toward each other, and Washington attributed increasing importance to Egypt's positions in the regional system.

The revised US policy had two principal aims: to ensure the flow of oil to the West and to weaken the Soviet hold in the Middle East. Diplomatic relations were restored (on 28 February 1974), and President RICHARD NIXON asked the US Senate to grant Egypt $250 million in economic aid. Such a policy was capable of producing pressure on Israel—at least up to a point. In view of Israel's dependence on the United States (and despite the closeness of the two countries), Cairo assumed that Washington could be made to pressure Jerusalem, provided the Arabs knew how to present their case to US administration and public opinion. In Sadat's view, any political settlement with Israel pursued by Egypt would have to be preceded by an understanding between Cairo and Washington.

Cairo's claim that the October war had opened the road toward a peace settlement with Israel encountered a great deal of criticism in Egypt and beyond. On the Arab scene, Egypt's principal critics were Syria, IRAQ, Libya, and the PLO. Sadat answered his critics by emphasizing that Egypt was adhering to Arab decisions as laid down at the RABAT SUMMIT (28 December 1974). He argued that the only differences Egypt had with other Arab states was what constituted the best tactics to realize the common Arab strategic aims. Nevertheless, Egypt was careful to distinguish between all-Arab concerns, which required inter-Arab consultation, and issues subject only to its own sovereign consideration.

Settlement with Israel

The 1975 UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 3379, equating Zionism with racism, was received by many in Egypt as a confirmation of Israel's expansionist nature that went beyond Palestine. But regardless of Egyptians' negative image of Israel, calculations of national interest proved stronger, which dictated a search for a political settlement to be carried out with the help of the United States. Yet two issues continued to present a dilemma: the precise nature of the peace to be sought with Israel and the link between an Egyptian-Israeli accommodation and a similar settlement with Israel's other Arab neighbors. While frequently pledging, between 1973 and 1977, Egypt's readiness to reach a peace settlement with Israel, Sadat also dwelt on what he considered the objective constraints that made full peace impossible in the near future, including Israeli OCCUPATION of Arab territory and its intractability on the Palestinian issue, among others.

During the years 1974–1977, the search for a practical formula for linking the Egyptian-Israeli settlement with a wider Arab-Israeli accommodation became a major preoccupation for Egypt's foreign ministry. Egypt's policy on the Palestinian issue was based on the following premises:

- The Palestine problem was the core of the dispute with Israel, and no comprehensive settlement was possible without agreement on it.
- The Palestinians themselves were the only party authorized to choose their representatives, which meant that no solution was feasible without the participation of a legitimate Palestinian delegation—that is, the PLO.

- Egypt supported the Palestinians' right to self-determination and to a state of their own in the WEST BANK and the GAZA STRIP.

On 9 November 1977, Sadat made a speech in parliament that contained what has since become known as the Peace Initiative, in which he offered to address the Israelis in their own parliament. When it began to register that Sadat meant what he said, there was widespread surprise on the part of most Egyptian establishment figures, Arab leaders abroad, and the PLO leadership. Sadat's purpose was to move away from the political process that aimed solely at a comprehensive settlement by means of the GENEVA CONFERENCE; instead, he wanted to break down the "psychological barrier" that stood in the way of the political process.

On 19 November 1977, the aircraft of the president of the Arab Republic of Egypt landed at Ben Gurion Airport near Tel Aviv. The following day, Sadat addressed a festive session of Israel's Knesset, presenting his vision for a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, of which the Egyptian-Israeli dispute was only a part. It was a speech filled with hope for a better future between Israelis and Arabs, but it was also a clear statement about the present and the price of peace. Sadat presented for the first time what has become known as the formula of land for peace: complete Israeli withdrawal from the Arab territories occupied since June 1967 in exchange for peace with Egypt, JORDAN, SYRIA, and LEBANON, and the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Peace, he said, guaranteed stability, prosperity, and security. In their speeches, Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN and opposition leader SHIMON PERES emphasized Israel's desire also for peace, security, and normalization with the Arabs, although both refrained from responding directly to Sadat's call for the establishment of a Palestinian state. However, Begin wisely delivered a message that enabled the parties to open political negotiations. "I propose," he declared, "that everything will be negotiable. . . . No side shall present prior conditions."

1978 Camp David Agreements

The negotiations between Israel and Egypt climaxed with the thirteen-day CAMP DAVID SUMMIT (5–17 September 1978), in which the US team, headed by President JIMMY CARTER, was heavily involved. Camp David produced two documents with a weak linkage between them: (1) "A Framework for the Conclusion of a Peace Treaty between Israel and Egypt" and (2) "A Framework for Peace in the Middle East." The latter was deliberately ambiguous on most crucial issues, including a formula for a Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. A formal peace treaty between Egypt and Israel was signed on 26 March 1979. The Palestinian issue had little chance of being resolved, because the PLO rejected the Camp David blueprint, and Israel and the United States would not deal with the organization because it refused to recognize Israel and used terror tactics in the struggle against it.

The 1978 Camp David Accords signed by Sadat, Begin, and Carter were a watershed in the history of the Arab-Israeli conflict. They shattered one of the most deep-set assumptions shared by Arabs and Israelis: that it was impossible to reach a political accommodation based on concessions by the two national communities. Camp David offered both a model for resolving the conflict with Israel and made clear the cost of attaining peace. According to this model, the onus is on the Arabs to follow the Egyptian path and recognize Israel's sovereignty, territorial integrity, and right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries, as well as to terminate the state of war with Israel and to accept security arrangements and normalization of relations that satisfy Israel's demands. Israel, for its part, is responsible for withdrawing from Arab territories occupied since 1967 and for fully implementing its agreements with the Palestinians. This historic compromise required the Arabs to abandon their old concepts of distrust of the Israelis and their struggle against the Jewish state. For Israel the historic compromise with the Arabs and especially the possibility of establishing an independent Palestinian state was, and still is, a heavy blow to the ideology of Eretz Yisrael (The Land of Israel), which claimed the whole land of Palestine for the Jewish people. Above all, the political significance of the Camp David Accords was the ability of the negotiators to translate UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242 of November 1967 into consensual frameworks to facilitate future arrangements between Israel and the Arabs, including the Palestinians. It introduced a model for a transition from a "zero-sum game" or existential confrontation to a dispute over territory and over the terms of settlement.

The peace and the mutual interests between Egypt and Israel have stood the test of sharp challenges. The sides have remained faithful to their obligations in spite of President Sadat's assassination and the outbreak of Israeli-Arab violence, particularly during the LEBANON WAR, the two INTIFADAS, and the acts of terror that targeted mainly innocent Jewish and Arab civilians. Although these challenges placed great stress on the fragile relations between Egypt and Israel, they did not change their fundamental approach and commitment to the mutual agreements.

The effort to achieve further agreements between Israel and its Arab adversaries, first and foremost with the Palestinians, was made the top priority of Egypt's foreign policy. In this context, Egypt perceived the United States as a key player and expected Washington to oblige Israel to moderate its positions on refusing to recognize the PLO or the Palestinian problem as well as to restrain its use of force against the Arabs. Furthermore, Egypt's leadership believes that any serious stalemate in the peace process undermines the foundations of the two pillars of peace: certainty and stability, the lack of which would have negative ramifications not only for Israelis and Palestinians but also for Egypt's relations with the broader Arab world.

During the 1980s, Egypt's diplomacy invested great energies to help PLO leader Arafat consolidate his standing in the international arena and to create the necessary conditions for the participation of the PLO in the peace process, but Egypt's endeavors to convince Arafat to adopt more pragmatic attitudes placed Arafat on the horns of a dilemma. His attempts to tread the thin line between ideological commitments to recover all of Palestine and pragmatism exposed him (and the mainstream of the PLO) to severe criticism and even to a real danger of yet more splits within the organization. Through Arab, US, and international resolutions, Egypt tried to formulate a compromise between the PLO's demand for recognition as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and Washington's terms for recognizing the PLO. The United States was ready to enter a dialogue with the PLO only if the organization acknowledged the right of Israel to exist, accepted UN Resolutions 242 and 338, and renounced TERRORISM.

Cairo's efforts with regard to the PLO, the strengthening of its ties with Jordan, and its support of IRAQ during the war with IRAN all reinforced Egypt's local and global prestige as a constructive actor contributing to the stability of the Middle East. Gradually there emerged a new Arab consensus in favor of renewing relations with Egypt (severed by most Arab states in 1979). However, after the eruption of the 1987 Palestinian uprising and Israel's harsh response, public and official sympathy moved toward the Palestinians. Egyptian policymakers asserted that the INTIFADA had put the Palestinian problem back in the lime-light, placing it at the top of regional and international priorities. In addition, Egypt noted the movement in some sectors of Israeli society toward more openness to dealing with the Palestinians and believed that it had serious implications for the peace process. Behind the scenes, Egypt was involved in most of the developments that led to the announcement of the Palestinian DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE on 15 November 1988. Moreover, when the United States announced that the language of the declaration did not meet its conditions for opening a dialogue with the PLO, Egypt worked hard to convince the Palestinians to commit themselves to Resolution 242 and the rejection of terror. Soon after that, Arafat was invited to address the UN General Assembly, where he spoke of "the right of all parties in the Middle East conflict to exist in peace and security." He went on: "I repeat for the record that we totally and absolutely renounce all forms of terrorism." The United States then entered into a dialogue with the PLO.

Nevertheless, the search for a framework for negotiations ended in a deadlock. Egypt believed that, despite the PLO's flexibility, Israel under the conservative administration of Prime Minister YITZHAK SHAMIR had frustrated all chances for a real peace with the Palestinians. The United States had ended its dialogue with the PLO after eighteen months and was inactive in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as the Intifada began to lose much of its original momentum. Among the Palestinians there was increasing opposition to Arafat's policy of compromise with nothing to show in return. With the outbreak of the GULF WAR, relations between Egypt and the PLO deteriorated sharply as the PLO supported Iraq in the conflict. In February 1990 a Palestinian unit attacked an Israeli tour bus on the Suez-Cairo highway, killing ten Israelis—the first operation of this kind in Egypt. Egypt was much embarrassed and President Hosni Mubarak urged Arafat to condemn the attack. Mubarak himself was under strong pressure from the PLO and eventually issued only a vague condemnation. Antagonism toward PLO solidarity with Iraqi president Saddam Husayn was expressed in Egypt's MEDIA, which in several instances implied that Arafat was no longer seen as a friend to Egypt. However, as a matter of principle, Cairo's officials endeavored to draw a line between mistaken PLO decisions, such as support for Iraq in the war, and Egypt's lasting commitment to the Palestinian cause. In the PLO, many accused Egypt of bringing undue pressure to bear on the PLO.

Diplomacy after the Gulf War

By the end of the Gulf War, the PLO found itself at a low ebb. Its pro-Iraqi policy had severely damaged its relations with the Gulf States, Egypt, and the United States. Against this background, both Mubarak and Arafat, each for his own reason, welcomed the US offer to restructure the peace process. The MADRID CONFERENCE (October 1991) convened with the participation of a Jordanian-Palestinian delegation acting under a mandate from the PLO. After the conference, Egypt played a pivotal role in the bilateral and multilateral working groups, and the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty became a point of reference for all sides. Top Egyptian decisionmakers invested tremendous efforts to maintain the peace process momentum. Egypt's centrality in the Arab world as well as the fact that Cairo was the only Arab capital having diplomatic relations with all the antagonists made Egypt a focal point.

Cairo had the political awareness to quickly understand that the establishment of YITZHAK RABIN's less conservative government (June 1992) offered an opportunity for pragmatic negotiations, while Rabin was ready to see Egypt play an active role in the peace process. Egypt's top leaders were among the few who knew about the secret back-channel Israeli-PLO talks in Oslo that led to the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (September 1993), which set the goal of establishing Palestinian self-government. Following the signing of the declaration in Washington, Egypt's role in the peace process reached its apex. Most of the talks between Israel and the PLO were held in Egypt, and Cairo provided the Palestinians the assurances of the Egyptian support they needed to engage in negotiations that had the potential to catalyze criticism from the Palestinian opposition and other Arab parties. After the assassination of Rabin and mainly during BENJAMIN NETANYAHU'S government, Egypt was vocal in blaming Israel for the deterioration in the peace process with the Palestinians and called upon the two parties to implement their obligations according to the interim agreements they had signed.

When EHUD BARAK became Israeli prime minister, the United States and Israel sought Egyptian involvement in the peace process. Although President Mubarak had serious reservations about Barak's blueprint for achieving a permanent settlement between Israel and the Palestinians, Egypt was not able to dissuade the ambitious prime minister. At the same time, Cairo warned that Barak's guiding principles contradicted central Palestinian positions and would most likely make it more difficult to reach an agreement.

Following the failure of the Camp David Summit (July 2000) and the eruption of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, the Egyptians, along with the Jordanian government, played an important role in checking radical Arab states by steadfastly refusing to annul signed treaties with Israel and by criticizing Arab initiatives that held the potential for spreading the conflict. At the ARAB LEAGUE Summit (21–22 October 2000), Egypt and Jordan opposed calls to assist the Palestinians in armed struggle and to confront Israel. At the domestic level, Islamists and Arab nationalists demanded that Egypt abrogate its agreements with Israel, and in the Arab print and television media there were calls for Egyptian military intervention on behalf of the Palestinians. Mubarak dismissed these demands outright, declaring that he had no desire to satisfy the man on the Egyptian or Arab "street" and called on Arab leaders not to use provocative language. On the other hand, in response to the death of hundreds of Palestinians at the beginning of the al-Aqsa Intifada, Egypt recalled its ambassador from Israel on 21 November 2000 and downgraded the Egyptian representation in Tel Aviv. However, Egypt's policy toward Israel continued to focus on finding a solution to the escalating Israeli-Palestinian confrontation, which threatened its interest in preserving regional stability.

Following the Beirut Summit (28 March 2002), during which the Arab League adopted an Arab peace plan based on a SAUDI initiative, the Egyptians formulated their own plan for a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian and Israeli-Arab conflict. As part of this plan, Egypt focused on two fronts:

the United States and the Palestinians. On the one hand, they urged the administration of GEORGE W. BUSH to recognize Egypt as a credible partner in the struggle against Middle Eastern extremism and attempted to persuade the United States to make a public declaration of its support for a peace settlement between Israel and the Palestinians based on the TWO-STATE SOLUTION. The Egyptian program suggested granting early recognition to a Palestinian state in all the territory that the UN had recognized as Palestinian before settling all the final status complicated issues. This recognition, Mubarak argued, would restore Palestinian hope that a state was on the horizon and would be followed by negotiations and a final status agreement. However, the Egyptian peace initiative, like the resolutions of the Arab summit in Beirut, took a backseat to repeated US demands for regime and security reforms in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY.

On the other hand, the Egyptians also became intensively involved in Palestinian domestic affairs. Believing that he could achieve an overall cease-fire between all the Palestinian factions and Israel, Mubarak charged his minister of intelligence services with the task of mediating and coordinating among the different Palestinian factions.

Israeli Disengagement

Until spring 2004, Egypt's official position had been that the ROAD MAP was the only agreed-upon plan for resuming the political process between Israel and the Palestinians. However, Tel Aviv's decision to implement the ISRAELI UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT Plan reshuffled the cards, and the United States' and the QUARTET'S support for Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON'S decision created a new reality. Because Mubarak did not wish to strain US-Egyptian ties by opposing US support for Sharon's initiative to unilaterally withdraw from Gaza, Cairo became actively involved in the process leading up to the disengagement. After accepting US agreement that the disengagement plan was not a substitute for the Road Map, the Egyptian government publicly expressed its support for Israel's planned withdrawal of settlements and armed forces from the Gaza Strip and a small area of the West Bank. At the same time, however, Egypt gave voice to its reservations about the unilateral nature of the disengagement and the potential for chaos in the Gaza Strip in the aftermath of an uncoordinated Israeli withdrawal.

Egypt's concerns led it to devise a plan under which Cairo would assume responsibility for security on the Egypt-Gaza border. Israel had long wanted Egypt to police the route (known as the PHILADELPHI ROUTE among Israelis and as the Salah al-Din Route among the Arabs) running along the border of the Gaza Strip and Egypt. Over the years this area had become a transit point for the smuggling of weapons and goods from the Sinai into the Gaza Strip. By withdrawing, Israel was poised to give up control of this politically sensitive area and wanted the Egyptians to fill the security vacuum. One factor that had prevented Egypt previously from deploying a robust force in the border area was its peace treaty with Israel, which limited the size and strength of Egyptian forces there. For the Egyptians, there were several disincentives for a larger Egyptian security presence adjacent to the Gaza Strip. First among them was the risk of Egyptian troops getting caught in potential crossfire between the Israelis and the Palestinians.

Nevertheless, Mubarak seized on the Israeli request as a way of bolstering the Egyptian government's image as a valuable moderating and stabilizing factor in the Middle East and in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The Egyptians not only set about coordinating the securing of the Philadelphia Route but also became involved in training Palestinian security forces and in reasserting themselves as mediators among the different Palestinian factions. Egypt, in fact, initiated a dialogue between the Palestinian National Authority and the Palestinian opposition groups to facilitate a cease-fire with Israel, maintained law and order in Palestinian areas, and implemented regime reforms. Egypt's role has become even more crucial following HAMAS'S victory in the elections for the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (in January 2006) and following OPERATION CAST LEAD (January 2009)—a massive attack by Israel aimed at stopping the rocket fire from Gaza into Israeli territory, and dismantling Hamas's ability to govern the Gaza Strip.

See also JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR; PHILADELPHI ROUTE; RAFAH CROSSING

Bibliography

Meital, Yoram. Egypt's Struggle for Peace: Continuity and Change, 1967–1977. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1997.

———. Peace in Tatters: Israel, Palestine and the Middle East. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2006.

Riad, Mahmoud. The Struggle for Peace in the Middle East. New York: Quarter Books, 1981.

Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

—Yoram Meital

Eisenhower, Dwight D. (1890–1969)

Dwight D. Eisenhower was the thirty-fourth president of the UNITED STATES, serving two terms from 1953 to 1961. Like his secretary of state, JOHN FOSTER DULLES, Eisenhower is remembered for his firm policies toward Israel.

During his presidency, Eisenhower ended the Korean War; insisted that Israel, FRANCE, and Britain withdraw immediately after their coordinated invasion of EGYPT; invaded LEBANON to prevent Arab nationalists from taking power; and issued the “Eisenhower Doctrine,” subtly aimed at Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR. The president's overriding concerns were maintaining US access to Arab oil and impeding the spread of communism in the Middle East. Like Dulles, he believed that the best way to guarantee both interests was to solve the Arab states–Israeli conflict. Each time Israel undertook aggression against its neighbors, Eisenhower and Dulles feared that the United States would be seen as backing Israel—further alienating the Arab people and regimes, jeopardizing US access to oil, and affording the Soviet government opportunities to penetrate the region.

In this framework, the Eisenhower administration publicly condemned Israel's massive retaliation raids against neighboring Arab states, demanded its immediate withdrawal from the Suez Canal in 1956, and temporarily withheld aid and loans to bring about Israel's compliance. On the Palestinian question, the administration focused on REFUGEES and on ways to foster the economic development of the region to improve the refugees' lives. Eisenhower thought that some refugees could be repatriated but that most should be settled in the countries to which they had fled. Because he believed that Israel could not afford to pay all the compensation required, in 1955 Eisenhower backed a proposal that Israel be granted an international loan to help cover the costs of compensating the refugees. Dulles stated that the United States was willing to underwrite a loan to a “substantial extent” for this purpose. Neither Eisenhower nor Dulles supported implementation of UN RESOLUTION 181, which partitioned Palestine into a Jewish and a Palestinian state. Indeed, both thought the British-installed monarchy in JORDAN was the appropriate governor of the WEST BANK.

The Suez War typifies the US response to Israeli aggression during the Eisenhower years. On 29 October 1956, Israel attacked Egypt and advanced toward the Suez Canal. On 1 November British and French forces also invaded Egypt and began occupation of the canal zone, but growing opposition from Eisenhower, Dulles, and UN secretary general Dag Hammarskjöld, plus Soviet threats of intervention, put an immediate stop to British and French action. Israel, however, refused to withdraw, maintaining troops in the Gulf of Aqaba and the GAZA STRIP despite a UN resolution. Eisenhower and Dulles were outraged over the whole affair and more so because of Israel's defiant stance after Paris and London withdrew. After three months of continuous US pressure, including the withholding of aid, Israel remained in occupation of Egypt. On 2 February 1957 the UN General Assembly passed a resolution demanding Israel's withdrawal from the Gulf of Aqaba and the Gaza Strip, but Israeli prime minister DAVID BEN-GURION still refused. Disappointed in Israel's intransigence, Eisenhower wrote a strong letter to Ben-Gurion demanding Israel's withdrawal. Once more, Ben-Gurion refused. Eisenhower, however, stood his ground and kept applying pressure on Israel by delaying financial assistance. When Israel began to feel the absence of US dollars, Ben-Gurion finally agreed in March 1957 to withdraw troops from Egypt and the Gaza Strip.

Despite the many efforts of Eisenhower and Dulles, at the end of the president's two terms, the Arab-Israeli conflict continued to grow in hostility, erupting in a series of conflicts, including the 1967 and 1973 Wars; Soviet involvement in the area grew; US domestic support for Israel became more organized and influential; and the Palestinians regrouped after their 1948 disaster and began to make themselves heard on the international scene by a variety of tactics.

See also JOHN FOSTER DULLES; JOHNSTON PLAN; WAR, 1967

Bibliography

Adams, Sherman. First Hand Report: The Story of the Eisenhower Administration. New York: Harper, 1961.

Ambrose, Stephen E. Eisenhower: The President. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984.

Arake, Margaret. The Broken Sword of Justice: America, Israel, and the Palestine Tragedy. London: Quartet Books, 1973.

Eisenhower, Dwight D. The White House Years: Waging Peace, 1956–1961. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965.

Eveland, Wilbur Crane. Ropes of Sand: America's Failure in the Middle East. New York: W. W. Norton, 1980.

Galambos, Louis, and Daun Van Ee, eds. The Papers of Dwight David Eisenhower: The Presidency: Keeping the Peace. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.

Hughes, John Emmet. The Ordeal of Power: A Political Memoir of the Eisenhower Years. New York: Atheneum, 1963.

Khouri, Fred J. The Arab-Israeli Dilemma, 3rd ed. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1985.

Kyle, Keith. Suez: Britain's End of Empire in the Middle East. London: I. B. Tauris, 2002.

Melanson, Richard A. "The Foundation of Eisenhower's Foreign Policy: Continuity, Community, and Consensus." In Reevaluating Eisenhower: American Foreign Policy in the 1950s. Edited by Richard A. Melanson and David Mayers. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Neff, Donald. Warriors at Suez: Eisenhower Takes America into the Middle East. Brattleboro, VT: Amana Books, 1988.

Stivers, William. "Eisenhower and the Middle East." In Reevaluating Eisenhower: American Foreign Policy in the 1950s. Edited by Richard A. Melanson and David Mayers. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Tivnan, Edward. The Lobby: Jewish Political Power and American Foreign Policy. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

ELAD

ELAD (To the City of David) is an organization of right-wing JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISTS who are especially active in the "City of David" within the Palestinian community of SILWAN, a neighborhood of 3,000 Palestinians adjacent to the Old City of Jerusalem. Its fundamental objective is the "Judaization" of East Jerusalem.

ELAD has been operating in East Jerusalem since about 1987. By 1999, it had acquired 42 Palestinian homes in Silwan and had turned most of the homes into heavily defended compounds replete with armed guards. At least 50 Jewish families, comprising 250 people, have moved in. In addition to acquiring property for Jews, ELAD manages the national park in Silwan/City of David on behalf of the state. In recent years, the association has invested many millions to finance controversial archaeological excavations in Silwan.

In 2005 ELAD had revenues totaling NIS 41 million ($10.5 million)—the last year it reported its figures to the registrar of associations. Of this sum, NIS 38 million ($9.8 million) came from donations; however, since 2005 ELAD has refused to disclose who its donors are or how much they have contributed. What is known is that they are mostly wealthy Jewish donors from the DIASPORA.

ELAD's short-term goal is to take over as many Palestinian homes in Silwan as possible and to turn them over to Jews so as to Judaize the area from the Dung Gate to the WESTERN WALL. Its ultimate objective is to reclaim all of East JERUSALEM for the Jews. ELAD's parent organization, the CITY OF DAVID FOUNDATION, is led by the somewhat shadowy Dan Berri.

Berri has said that Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU had openly encouraged ELAD to recruit more Jews to make Silwan their home. At the same time, Jewish settlers in Silwan established a bridgehead in RAS AL-AMUD, another Palestinian neighborhood (population 11,000), just east of Silwan. In addition to financing from Israeli government sources, funding for the settlers has been enhanced by private donations from a variety of sources. One notable and very public contributor is Florida millionaire IRVING MOSKOWITZ, who bought a four-acre plot in Ras al-Amud and undertook construction of 132 homes.

The ELAD settlers are armed and supported by private security forces and the Jerusalem police as protection against neighboring Palestinians. When seizing Palestinian homes, they typically operate in the middle of the night and ignore Palestinian deeds to their homes. After a seizure, ELAD turns the property over to the Israeli DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY, which passes the title on to the CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY, which certifies and returns it to the Development Authority, which then sells it to the original settler group.

The archaeological excavations in Silwan increasingly are becoming a point of contention. The heart of the "City of David" is an archaeological park that is being continuously extended into more corners of Silwan. After they were given the main excavation site in 1998, ELAD built new homes in the park, and they are continuously finding establishing new sites and claiming more land.

New excavations began in 2008 to unearth a drainage channel believed to be from the period of King Herod, damaging the foundations of numerous Palestinian homes. The dig was intended to run 600 meters (980 feet) underground to the walls of Jerusalem's Old City, but was halted by the courts after it emerged that the archaeologists were digging without licenses. Nonetheless, ELAD began work on other tunnels.

ELAD has not only poured money and manpower into the excavations but also subcontracted Israel's main archaeological body, the Antiquities Authority, to oversee the uncovering of what some think is the original location of Jerusalem. Yonathan Mizrachi, a former archaeologist for the Antiquities Authority, says of ELAD, "This is an important site, but ELAD has a very clear agenda, they want to use archaeology, even bogus archaeology, to provide cover for their political agenda of pushing Silwan's Palestinians out. In 2007, said Mizrachi, ELAD brought 350,000 tourists to the site "to convince people that this was once the home of King David, [if they are successful] then it will be easier for them to justify their takeover of Silwan and the removal of the Palestinian population." In any case, most of the ELAD sites supposedly under the control of the Antiquities Authority are in practice only nominally so with ELAD remaining the controlling force.

In the mid-1990s ELAD faced a legal battle over its damaging of ancient relics. In 1997 the Antiquities Authority cautioned against handing the park over to ELAD. And in 1998 archaeologists from Hebrew University in Jerusalem petitioned the Israeli Supreme Court over ELAD's mismanagement of the City of David site. However, as ELAD's control of Silwan has tightened and the City of David's popularity has grown, the voices of dissent have fallen quiet.

When it emerged in June 2008 that dozens of skeletons from the early Islamic period unearthed in Silwan close to the AL-AQSA MOSQUE had been discarded without inspection, no archaeologist would speak on the record, but the Antiquities Authority later admitted that it was "a serious mishap." According to a series of reports in the Israeli MEDIA, the government, state archaeologists, the Jerusalem municipality, and the police have all colluded with ELAD and another settler organization, ATERET COHANIM, in extending the settlers' control of Silwan.

See also ARCHAEOLOGY; JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; SILWAN

Bibliography

- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem. Expanding Jewish Presence on the Old City of Jerusalem. Jerusalem: ARIJ, 1997.
- Associated Press. "Settlements Strangle Hope for Palestinian Capital." Associated Press. 3 January 1999.
- Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Chesnoff, Richard Z. "Love—and Leave—Thy Neighbor." Jewish World Review. 8 July 1998.
- City of David Foundation. www.cityofdavid.org.il/index.html.
- Cook, Jonathan. "Archaeology Becomes a Curse for Jerusalem's Palestinians." Countercurrents.org. 26 September 2008.
- Hider, James. "Settlers Dig Tunnels around Jerusalem." www.timesonline. 1 March 2008.
- LAW. Litigating Silwan: A Case Study of Silwan Village. Jerusalem: The Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment, 1996.
- Meehan, Maureen. "Eviction of Silwan Family Sets Scene for Accelerated Ethnic Cleansing of Jerusalem." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. January–February 1999.
- Potter, Mitch. "Reclaiming David's City . . . a Home at a Time: Israeli Group Defends Abrupt Evictions, Jews Replace Arabs in East Jerusalem." Toronto Star, Middle East Bureau, Jerusalem. 14 February 2004.
- Rapoport, Meron. "Group 'Judaizing' East Jerusalem Accused of Withholding Donation Sources." Ha'aretz. 22 November 2007.
- . "The Republic of Elad." Foundation for Middle East Peace. 16:7 (Summer 2006).
- Schwartz, Michal. "Collusion in Jerusalem: How the Government and the Settlers Conspire to Take Over Houses and Land." Challenge: A Jerusalem Magazine on the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. 50 (1998).
- . "Ras al-Amud: Noha al-Gul Fighting Alone." Challenge: A Jerusalem Magazine on the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. 46 (1997).

Elections, Palestinian

Ottoman-Era Elections

Palestine's experience with formal elections began during the OTTOMAN period. Tanzimat reforms, promulgated through attempts to reassert the authority of the Ottoman central government in rural areas, culminated in legislation of 1864 and 1871 that provided for provincial (vilayet) and local (sanjak and kaza) councils with some elected members—in most cases, an equal number of Muslims and non-Muslims. These bodies essentially acted as consultants for administrative and judicial business. In villages and towns, mukhtars and councils of elders were elected to serve residents; each confessional religious community of more than twenty families was to have two mukhtars. The process of electing council members, however, was more accurately a system of nomination, as senior officials initiated candidates' nomination for posts, despite later legal interventions to change this system.

Post-Enlightenment ideas about the rights of the individual were, however, expressed in non-governmental bodies. A rising effendiya, the Palestinian-Ottoman white-collar middle class, shaped alliances based on common socioeconomic interests despite religious background; these ties were expressed, for example, among Freemason lodges in Palestine, which held elections to determine leadership and policy. Once the national conflict of Turkification became pronounced, these groups later split along confessional lines. Religious-national groups also used the elections process to organize their ranks.

Elections during the Mandate

By 1920, 20,000 Palestinian Jews had immigrated to Palestine and elections were held for a National Assembly, which was cited by British authorities as a reason to grant Jews some autonomy over their affairs in Palestine. These bodies were the nascent institutions of the future Israeli government. The authority granted Britain by the League of Nations to govern Palestine after World War I (BRITISH MANDATE) included the formation of a government to advise the British HIGH COMMISSIONER. The Palestine Order in Council of 1922 stipulated the election of a LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL of twenty-three members—eleven British officials and twelve citizens (eight Muslims, two Christians, two Jews). In the end, however, this scheme was stymied by the Arab leadership, which rejected sharing power with Jews, whose ever-increasing IMMIGRATION and LAND purchases foreshadowed the creation of a Jewish state. The Palestine Order in Council was amended on 4 May 1923 to establish a British-appointed council, but this too was boycotted. As a result, the British Mandate was Britain's only colonial governance that provided no arrangement for the gradual establishment of national self-rule. Municipal elections were first held in 1934 (one British white paper cites twenty-four elected municipal councils, thirty-eight elected local councils, and twenty-four popularly chosen village councils), but by the late 1940s the British sought to stifle nationalist ferment by canceling municipal elections in the GAZA STRIP.

Elections after 1948

In 1948, with the creation of Israel, historic Palestine was divided into three subsystems: Israeli, Jordanian, and Egyptian. The new Jewish state held elections on 25 January 1949 for a parliament based on a proportional party system. All inhabitants of Israel eighteen years of age and older were allowed to vote. Of the elected representatives, 117 were Jews and 3 were Arabs. Some 150,000 Palestinians who remained in Israel after the war took Israeli citizenship. Today their numbers have grown to form nearly 20 percent of the total Israeli population, and their candidates run on several solely Arab slates as well as the lists of leftist Jewish parties. Israel's electoral system has alternated between joint and separate prime ministerial and parliamentary elections, the latter of which strengthens the powers of the prime minister in forming a government. The development of the various parties demonstrates how ethnic/confessional affiliation is tied to political life in Israel. As eastern Jewry on the margins pressured European immigrants at the core of the Zionist movement to share state resources, their cause was championed in the early 1990s by the SEPHARDIC ultra-Orthodox political party SHAS. Similarly, Russian immigrants, ASHKENAZI ultra-Orthodox, secular Ashkenazi Jews, and Arab citizens of Israel developed political platforms around their separate interests.

The WEST BANK and Gaza, controlled by JORDAN and EGYPT, respectively, from 1948 until 1967, were populated by a landed class as well as tens of thousands of new Palestinian REFUGEES. In the Gaza Strip, Egypt banned most political activity and refused to offer residents Egyptian citizenship, arguing that the refugees must be returned to their homes. In 1961 Egypt did allow the first and only elections for the Palestine Labor Union and then, in 1962, took steps to change the makeup of the five-year-old Gaza legislative council. Under the new system, half of the council's representatives were to be elected by members of the Palestine Labor Union and the other half appointed by Egyptian authorities.

Unlike Egypt, Jordan made citizens of some two-thirds of Palestinians in the West Bank and allowed West Bank residents to travel to the Jordanian east side of the Jordan River. But West Bankers' political and economic participation in Jordanian institutions was severely limited. For one, local elections that might have challenged the Jordanian regime were banned. In the elected branch of the bicameral Jordanian parliament, the West and East Banks received thirty seats each. Parliamentary elections were first held on 11 April 1950, and West Bankers were eligible to vote in the elections, even though the West Bank was not yet annexed to Jordan (that move was made later that year). April 1967 was the last general election incorporating the West Bank, and in fact, marked the freezing of parliamentary electoral politics in Jordan for more than two decades.

Gradually, Palestinians sought to reconstitute themselves in their own national institutions. The ARAB LEAGUE'S 1964 establishment of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) laid the ground for a government in exile—its leadership, army, and parliament slowly filled by the unions and political factions forming in universities and refugee camps. Even after YASIR ARAFAT'S faction FATAH began to dominate the PLO, making it somewhat less susceptible to inter-Arab intrigue, the PLO's leadership didn't want to be permanently integrated into Jordan and so was resistant to the electoral processes. The PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL, the PLO parliament self-selected from members of the various Palestinian factions and important independent figures, was ostensibly the highest level of PLO leadership, voting on membership to other PLO bodies. However, PLO committees met more frequently than those of the PNC and were thus able to decide many crucial issues. In practice, the umbrella organizations of the PLO were largely controlled from the top down by Fatah, its dominant faction, and PLO chairman Arafat.

In 1974 an Arab summit in Rabat, Morocco, named the PLO the sole representative of the Palestinian people. However, this was a problem for Jordan, which was not ready to relinquish its claims to the West Bank but was also not interested in confronting the PLO. In November 1974, Jordan's king Husayn dissolved the elected House of Representatives, decreeing that elections for a new house would be held in March 1976. As that date neared, Husayn opted to avoid a risky decision on West Bank and Palestinian participation. In February the old House convened briefly with its West Bank members to approve the indefinite suspension of elections. Although Jordanian elections ceased in 1967, the West Bank's parliamentary representatives continued in office until 1998, when Jordan signed a peace deal with Israel relinquishing all rights to the West Bank.

After Israel captured and occupied the Gaza Strip and West Bank in 1967, its strategic view favored local autonomy for the Palestinians under continuing Israeli control. Coordinating with Israeli authorities, Gaza's elite commercial classes sought in 1971 to establish a municipal council headed and selected by citrus merchant RASHAD AL-SHAWWA. Under criticism for his moderate pro-Jordanian policies, Shawwa resigned one year later, and Israel assumed all civilian control of Gaza. Similarly, Israel's policies in the West Bank initially maintained the region's ties to Jordan, allowing free passage of people and goods across the Jordan River and leaving many Jordanian-appointed bureaucrats in their place. In 1972 and in 1976, Israel authorized municipal elections in the West Bank and liberalized Jordanian election rules in the 1976 election, allowing women and poorer men to vote, in a bid to develop local leaders that would counterbalance the PLO. Palestinians vigorously debated whether the vote should be boycotted. In the end, the elections proceeded normally, and PLO candidates won a landslide on a nationalist mandate, damaging Jordanian political influence in the West Bank and dashing Israeli hopes for an alternative leadership. Afterwards, Israel canceled all future municipal elections.

East JERUSALEM, which is part of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, is claimed by Israel as its eternal capital but designated by the UNITED NATIONS as a permanent international trusteeship under UN authority. In physical control of the city after 1967, Israel asked Palestinian residents to choose Jordanian or Israeli citizenship, at the same time that it automatically designated them as "permanent residents" of Jerusalem. This residency status granted them the right to vote or be elected in the city's new municipal council (Israel disbanded the Arab Jerusalem Municipality Council). But only rarely did residents participate in municipal elections, choosing instead a blanket rejection of Israel's authority in the city.

In lieu of a formal elections process during the years of Israeli OCCUPATION, PALESTINIAN UNIVERSITIES established in the late 1970s became laboratories for the political process. Student unions were modeled after political factions, and student council elections were viewed as a measure of political sentiment in the West Bank and Gaza. For the most part, Israeli officials allowed campaigning and polling to take place on campus grounds, even though all nationalist symbols, colors, and slogans were banned by the Occupation authorities. Much later, during the second Palestinian uprising, Arafat, then president of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (the interim administrative organization), banned student council elections for several years, ostensibly due to public hardship but more plausibly to prevent possible gains in the universities by factions opposed to peace agreements with Israel.

After the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS and return of the Palestinian leadership to the West Bank and Gaza Strip, presidential and Legislative Council elections were held as stipulated by the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES, the Israeli-Palestinian document that set a goal of establishing Palestinian self-government. Jerusalem residents were allowed to vote, but not to run in elections; otherwise the vote was open to all Palestinians over age eighteen. The internationally monitored 20 January 1996 presidential elections featured two candidates: Arafat and women's activist Samiha Khalil. The vote was not close, with Arafat winning 84 percent and Khalil 12 percent. Legislative elections resulted in a PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL dominated by Arafat's faction Fatah, which received forty-nine seats (independents affiliated with Fatah took fifteen seats, Islamists took four seats, other independents took seventeen seats, and another three small parties took one seat each). Six seats were reserved for the CHRISTIAN population, and one seat was kept aside for the Jewish SAMARITANS.

Elections were deemed fair, but critics noted that, one month before the elections, Arafat had delayed the registration of voters in Jerusalem, Khan Yunis, Gaza City, and HEBRON, allowing for the mass registration of Fatah supporters. Further, critics of the peace agreements—the Islamic resistance movement HAMAS and other opposition groups—boycotted the vote, although individual members ran in the elections as independents. Municipal elections were not held until much later. Although not written into the Oslo agreements, local offices were filled by the top levels of the PNA to mediate disputes and leverage power from above.

Over time, however, Fatah's rank and file began to clamor for a share in decisionmaking.

Agreement by Arafat to hold local and municipal elections in stages beginning in 2004 was a nod to these voices. The first round of voting was held in twenty-six local councils on 23 December 2004, with participation of 81 percent of the 144,000 Palestinians eligible to vote. Although the ISLAMIC JIHAD boycotted the elections, Hamas saw local council participation as a way of participating in politics without having to address the issue of recognizing Israel. The Palestinian Higher Commission of Local Elections reported that, in the 306 races, women defeated men in a record twenty-five of them, in addition to the twenty-one quota seats they were allotted to advance female participation. Fatah won a majority in twelve councils, Hamas nine, and independent candidates in another five councils. Pollsters noted the success of candidates from large families in the elections, highlighting the historic importance of extended family loyalties among Palestinians.

Elections were not held again until 2005, well after the Oslo Accords had declined in popularity and five years into the punishing AL-AQSA INTIFADA. A poll was scheduled for 20 January 2003 but then postponed, because Israeli military incursions into Palestinian towns made a vote practically impossible. The international community did little to press for elections, nor did Fatah, which feared losing its electoral majority. Indeed, municipal elections were showing that Hamas, responsible for the most punishing attacks on Israelis, had made great gains in public support. That changed when the UNITED STATES championed general presidential elections as part of its wider policies for democracy in the Middle East. The death of Arafat had further weakened Fatah, and the United States was hoping for a new mandate for his former prime minister, MAHMUD ABBAS. Eight candidates (two Fatah, four independents, one from the PALESTINIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY, and one from the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE) entered the fray. When popular Fatah candidate MARWAN AL-BARGHUTHI withdrew from the race at the last minute after negotiations, Abbas's victory was sealed, winning over 62 percent of votes cast. On 9 January 2005, 70 percent of registered voters cast ballots. In the final hours of election day, unregistered voters were allowed, in a highly contested decision, to cast ballots using only a valid ID. At the behest of Fatah, voting was also extended two hours past the official deadline, a move that caused the head of the elections commission to resign in protest.

That vote was followed by parliamentary elections, made possible by the March 2005 Cairo agreement where Palestinian factions agreed to stop attacks on Israelis for reciprocal Israeli calm, laying the groundwork for national political participation by Hamas. The lead-up to the 25 January 2006 parliamentary elections was marred by violence and disarray within Fatah. Primaries for 300,000 Fatah members to choose 132 candidates were only partially completed because of voting irregularities and internal violence. On the eve of the deadline for candidate registration, it appeared that Fatah might run two lists for each position. An eleventh-hour decision combined the slates, but it was too late to prevent dozens of Fatah candidates from running as independents. Later, Fatah would blame these independents for splitting the Fatah vote and bringing about the faction's stunning loss to Hamas in the 25 January election. Negotiations to draw Hamas into the elections process had produced a compromise electoral formula based on a combined bloc and proportional representation system. This new process, a Fatah vote divided among list candidates and independents, and Hamas's well-organized campaign, particularly among women, brought Hamas seventy-four seats to Fatah's forty-five seats in the PLC. With 75 percent of voters placing ballots on election day, Hamas won 44 percent of the popular vote and 56 percent of the seats, while Fatah won 42 percent of the popular vote and 34 percent of the 132 seats.

These results came as a surprise to most, as exit polling on the eve of the vote showed Fatah winning by a low margin. Pollsters blamed the discrepancy on the confusing balloting system and voters' reluctance to be candid with the pollsters. No significant voting irregularities were noted by election monitors. The POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE won three seats; al-Badeel, a coalition of leftist groups, won three seats; the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL INITIATIVE (MUSTAFA AL-BARGHUTHI) won two seats; the Third Way (Salam Fayyad and HANAN ASHRAWI) won two seats; and independents (some supported by Hamas) won four seats. The election victory meant that Hamas would form the next Palestinian government. It also meant the de facto incorporation of Hamas into the Palestine National Council (council members are automatically included in the PLO parliament) despite Hamas's refusal to recognize the organization. Prior to this election the PNC and virtually all Palestinian politics were dominated by Fatah; the shift was received with defiance by Fatah loyalists. Because most Western states listed Hamas as a TERRORIST entity, Israel refused to transfer PNA tax revenues and the international community stopped the flow of foreign aid bankrolling the official Palestinian budget. After a period of factional tension and violence, in June 2007, Hamas forces took control of Gaza, its authority to govern the PNA challenged by both the international community and Fatah. The physical separation of the West Bank and Gaza was thus rendered political, and two systems began to develop, both only selectively representing the electoral process.

See also individual ISRAELI and PALESTINIAN PARTIES

Bibliography

- Aburish, Said K. Arafat: From Defender to Dictator. London: Bloomsbury, 1998.
- Campos, Michelle. "Freemasonry in Ottoman Palestine." Jerusalem Quarterly. 22 and 23 (2005).
- Erlanger, Steven. "U.S. and Israelis Are Said to Talk of Hamas Ouster." The New York Times. 14 February 2006.
- Findley, Carter. "The Evolution of the System of Provincial Administration as Viewed from the Center." In Palestine in the Late Ottoman Period: Political, Social and Economic Transformation. Edited by David Kushner. Jerusalem: Yad Izhak Ben Zvi Press, 1989.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. Palestinians: The Making of a People. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Makovsky, David. "Are All Politics Local? A Look at Palestinian Municipal Elections Results." Peace-Watch. Washington, DC: Washington Institute for Near East Policy. 28 December 2004.
- Manna, 'Adil. Tarikh Filastin fi Awakhir al-Ahd al-Uthmani, 1700–1918. Beirut, Lebanon: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1999.
- Pappe, Ilan. "Haj Amin and the Buraq Revolt." Jerusalem Quarterly File. 18 (2003).
- Roy, Sara. The Gaza Strip: The Political Economy of De-development. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1995.
- Sachar, Howard. A History of Israel: From the Aftermath of the Yom Kippur War, vol. II. New York: Knopf, 1987.
- . A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, vol. I. New York: Knopf, 1979.
- Seitz, Charmaine. "The Palestinian Elections That Never Were." Middle East Report Online. 24 January 2003.
- Sukhtian, Lara. "Abbas Wins Palestinian Vote in Landslide." Associated Press. 10 January 2005.

—Charmaine Seitz

Elon, Amos (1926–2009)

Amos Elon is one of Israel's preeminent writers and essayists. Born in Vienna to Zionist parents who immigrated to Palestine in 1933, Elon served in the HAGANA, the illegal Jewish military force, during the BRITISH MANDATE. He studied at both Tel Aviv and Hebrew universities and in 1953 won a British Council scholarship to Peterhouse in Cambridge. He began his career as a correspondent for Ha'aretz, the leading Jerusalem newspaper, later becoming a member of its editorial board.

After the 1967 WAR, Elon became a critic of Israel's SETTLEMENT policy in the Occupied Territories, and he has produced a stream of essays in the New York Review of Books about the intractability of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. His analyses and mood have become steadily gloomier, and in 2005 he wrote: "It [the conflict] may yet, I tremble at the thought, lead to results far more terrible than those we are now witnessing. . . . It was almost impossible to move 3,000 settlers out of Sinai under [MENAHEM] BEGIN. Now there are 400,000." Elon further observes that Israeli control over the Palestinian majority in the WEST BANK increasingly relies on brute force, and the morality of the Israeli army is increasingly compromised: "Soldiers loot nowadays," he said, "they looted banks in Ramallah."

Elon is one of the few Israeli writers to live abroad and spends most of his time in a house near Lucca, Italy, returning to Israel only for brief stays. He has written many acclaimed novels as well as works of nonfiction, including Journey through a Haunted Land: The Two Germanies (1967); The Israelis: Founders and Sons (1971); between Enemies: A Compassionate Dialogue Between an Israeli and an Arab (with Sana Hassan, 1974); Herzl: A Biography (1975); Flight into Egypt (1980); Jerusalem: City of Mirrors (1990); Founder: Meyer Amschel Rothschild and His Time (1996); A Blood-dimmed Tide: Dispatches from the Middle East (1997); and The Pity of It All: A Portrait of Jews in Germany 1743–1933 (2003).

See also HEBREW LITERATURE

Bibliography

- Shavit, Ari. "Zionism Has Exhausted Itself: An Interview with Amos Elon." CounterPunch. 27 December 2004.
- Steele, Jonathan. "Amos Elon: A Cold Eye on Zion." The Guardian. 1 February 2003.

Elon, Benjamin (1954–)

Benjamin “Benny” Elon is a rabbi, politician, member of the Knesset, chairman of the MOLEDET PARTY (which advocates “TRANSFER” of all Palestinians from Israel and the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES establishing the “whole” land of Israel for Jews only), and sponsor of extremist settler groups in East Jerusalem and elsewhere in the Occupied Territories. Born in JERUSALEM, he studied at the flagship of religious ZIONISM, Yeshivat Mercaz HaRav; served as a chaplain in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES; and as rabbi of Kibbutz Shluchot from 1978 to 1982. As a JEWISH AGENCY emissary in the UNITED STATES from 1983 to 1985, Elon developed strong relations with the CHRISTIAN fundamentalist community, including politicians and prominent public figures. During his multiple visits to the United States each year, Elon lobbies the Christian groups for support and money for Israel’s right-wing policies. When he returned from his first stint in the United States, Elon taught at the ATERET COHANIM Center in Jerusalem, a radical East Jerusalem settler group, and in 1990 founded Yeshivat BEIT OROT, serving as dean until 1996.

Elon has been a Knesset member since 1996, when he was elected on the Moledet ticket. Recently he has sought to unite Israel’s right-wing parties under one larger faction—the NATIONAL UNION, which in 2006 comprised seven members of the Knesset. In October 2001, following the assassination of Tourism Minister REHAVAM ZE’EVI, Elon was appointed to that post.

Elon is part of the extremist radical right that advocates transfer of the Palestinians from the Occupied Territories and from inside Israel. He is committed to an Israel that stretches from the Mediterranean to the Jordan River—an outcome that he believes is both promised by God and made inevitable by realpolitik. Elon opposes the OSLO ACCORDS and the ROAD MAP: his favorite slogan is “Jordan is Palestine.” He is among the most active forces in the Judaization of East Jerusalem through the acquisition of property, evicting Palestinians from their homes, building new Jewish colonies in Palestinian neighborhoods, and constructing yeshivot (religious schools).

Elon’s party and his opinions are more extreme than the right-wing LIKUD PARTY. He believes that Muslims, including current citizens, should not be able to vote in Israel, and has predicted that Islam will be wiped out in a few years by a Christian crusade. In 2003 Elon developed and vigorously promoted a “peace” plan that includes the following planks:

- Declare the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY an enemy of Israel and dismantle the organization.
- Destroy the “terror infrastructure” by removing every terrorist, weapon, and bomb factory from Judea, Samaria, and GAZA.
- Nullify the Oslo Accords.
- Solve the REFUGEE problem by relocating displaced Arabs to Arab countries and dismantling refugee camps.
- Create two separate states for Jews and Palestinians on two sides of the Jordan River: the Jordanian/Palestinian state with Amman as its capital and the Jewish state with Jerusalem as its capital.
- Designate Arabs remaining in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza as citizens of the Jordanian/Palestinian state. Arab Palestinians holding Israeli citizenship would be offered alternate citizenship in the Jordanian/Palestinian state.

Although Benny Elon and the Moledet Party are not overly powerful in Israel, the presence of his party and others with similar views in a Likud or KADIMA coalition by definition influences those parties’ ability to make concessions to the Palestinians. Elon probably has more influence in the United States than in Israel. The evangelical Christian lobbies that agree with his views, including his claim that all of Palestine belongs to the Jews by biblical right, are some of GEORGE W. BUSH’S most active allies. Sympathy for Israel runs deep enough for Elon to be considered a welcome ally even among US lawmakers who do not support transfer but who believe the Road Map forces Israel to negotiate with TERRORISTS.

See also CHRISTIANITY; JERUSALEM; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM; THIRD TEMPLE MOVEMENT

Bibliography

- Cohen, Roger. “An Israeli’s Easy Smile Masks Unyielding View.” International Herald Tribune. 26 May 2004.
- Don-Yehiye, Eliezer. “Jewish Messianism, Religious Zionism and Israeli Politics.” Middle Eastern Studies. 23 (1987).
- Elon, Benjamin. God’s Covenant with Israel: Establishing Biblical Boundaries in Today’s World. Green Forest, AZ: Balfour Books (imprint of New Leaf Press), 2005.

- . “Jordan Is the Partner.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 8 June 2003. www.therightroadtopeace.com/eng/MoreEng/ArticleHaaretz-com8-6-03.html.
- . “The Right Road to Peace.” Text of the Elon Peace Plan, 2003. www.therightroadtopeace.com/eng/defaulteng.html.
- . “Why the Road Map Won’t Work.” Front-pagemag.com. 9 June 2003. www.frontpagemag.com/Articles/ReadArticle.asp?ID=8286.
- Glick, Caroline B. “Benny Elon Interview.” Jerusalem Post. 15 July 2003. www.gamla.org.il/english/article/2003/july/g1.htm.
- Gorenberg, Gershon. The End of Days: Fundamentalism and the Struggle for the Temple Mount, rev. ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Israelinsider staff. “Elon Promotes ‘Jordan is Palestine’—to Jordanians.” Israelinsider. 17 August 2004.
- Lustick, Ian. For the Land and the Lord: Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1991.
- Ravitzki, Avi. Messianism, Zionism and Jewish Religious Radicalism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Shahak, Israel, and Norton Mezvinsky. Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- Sprinzak, Ehud. The Ascendance of Israel’s Radical Right. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Tristram, Claire. “Benny Elon’s Long, Strange Trip.” Salon.com. 14 May 2003.

Elon Moreh Settlement

Elon Moreh was one of the first permanent SETTLEMENTS established by the GUSH EMUNIM movement, a radical right-wing religious settler movement founded in 1974. It is particularly significant because its founding gave birth to the legal basis for future colonization in the WEST BANK.

Elon Moreh was created by a few hundred FUNDAMENTALIST settlers from KIRYAT ARBA settlement in HEBRON and their supporters, who in December 1975 took over an unused railway station in Sebastia (near Nablus) and refused to leave. Negotiations with the Israeli government, led by Defense Minister SHIMON PERES and Intelligence Advisor ARIEL SHARON, produced a compromise: the settlers could stay temporarily in an Israeli army camp located nearby.

When, in 1979, the government of Israel (under Prime Minister MENAHEM BEGIN) decided to formally expropriate LAND for the new settlement of Elon Moreh (whose settlers still remained at the Israeli army camp), it selected a site near the village of Rujeib. The settlers were given permission to build on privately owned Palestinian lands belonging to families from Rujeib. In keeping with past practice, Israel claimed that the expropriation was for military use. In response, PEACE NOW rallied thousands of Israelis at the site, opposing the seizure of land for what was an unambiguously civilian rather than military purpose, while the Elon Moreh settlers argued for the right of Jews to settle in all parts of the West Bank.

Palestinian owners of the expropriated lands appealed to the ISRAELI SUPREME COURT to stop the seizure of their lands, and the High Court ruled that Elon Moreh had to be dismantled, arguing that privately owned land could not be expropriated to establish civilian settlements. The judges’ decision implied, however, that they would have found otherwise if the land involved had not been privately owned.

The ruling turned out to be a pyrrhic victory for the Palestinians. Subsequent to the court’s decision, the Israeli cabinet created policies to declare the vast majority of the West Bank “STATE LAND,” abandoned property, or unregistered land, which, once classified as such, made the land available for Jewish civilian settlements. Then minister of agriculture Ariel Sharon and Israel Defense Forces chief of staff Rafael Eitan led the effort to implement this new policy, under which Israel could take for civilian settlement use any land in the West Bank that had been designated as state land under Jordanian rule or that Israel asserted was state land or land that was unregistered or uncultivated. Under these terms, most of the West Bank became fair game for settlement, particularly given that the West Bank had not had a complete land registry since OTTOMAN times. (One of the first things Israel did in 1968 was to stop the land registry process, and the burden of proof for landownership was, and remains, extremely difficult for Palestinians to meet.)

In the end, the landowners in Rujeib won their battle in court and got their land back. In January 1980 Elon Moreh moved to a site on Mount Kabir (as of 31 December 2004, there were 1,152 registered residents of Elon Moreh). The army camp where the Elon Moreh settlers had initially been allowed to stay (under the December 1975 compromise) eventually became the settlement of Kedumim (population 3,263, as of 31 December 2004).

Bibliography

- Americans for Peace Now. “Behind the Barrier: A Profile of Elon Moreh.” Settlements in Focus. 1:10 (16 September 2005).

Rubenstein, Danny. "West Bank: New Method of Land Seizure." Journal of Palestine Studies. 10:4 (1981).

The Engineer

See AYYASH, YAHYA

Emergency Articles for the Exploitation of Uncultivated Areas

The Israeli Knesset approved the Emergency Articles for the Exploitation of Uncultivated Areas in 1949 (similar to a law promulgated by the first Jewish settlers in 1947), which allowed the Israeli agriculture minister to take over LAND that had been uncultivated for the previous three years. In many cases, Palestinian farms were declared CLOSED MILITARY ZONES for that time period, which meant Palestinians could not access their land, and then Israel annexed on the basis that the land was not cultivated. Any area could be closed by the authorities for "security" reasons and its Arab owners barred from the land, which would then be declared "abandoned" or "uncultivated." In effect, the articles provided a legal means for Israel to confiscate Palestinian LAND left by the REFUGEES and by the so-called PRESENT ABSENTEES.

This law is part of a series of laws promulgated by Israel soon after becoming an independent state to legally expropriate the lands and property of the approximately 800,000 Palestinians who had become refugees. Other important laws include the DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS, the ABANDONED AREAS ORDINANCE (1948), the ABSENTEE PROPERTY LAW (1950), and the Land Acquisition Law (1955).

Bibliography

Center on Housing Rights and Evictions and Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights. Ruling Palestine: A History of the Legally Sanctioned Jewish-Israeli Seizure of Land and Housing in Palestine. Geneva, Switzerland: COHRE and Badil, 2005.

Kirshbaum, David A. "Israeli Emergency Regulations and the Defense (Emergency) Regulations of 1945." n.d. www.geocities.com/savepalestinenow/emergencyregs/essays/emergencyregsessay.htm.

Emergency Defense Regulations

See DEFENSE EMERGENCY REGULATIONS

Enclaves

See BANTUSTANS

Entebbe, 1976

On 27 June 1976, Air France Flight 139, with 246 passengers traveling from Ben Gurion Airport to Paris via Athens, was hijacked by Arabs who boarded during the Athens stopover. Armed with guns and grenades, the hijackers ordered the plane to divert to Benghazi, Libya, for refueling, then took off again and flew south to Entebbe, Uganda, where the plane landed on the morning of 28 June. The hijacking was a collaborative effort between Dr. WADI' HADDAD'S POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP), a faction within the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION, and the Ugandan dictator Idi Amin.

The hijackers demanded the release of fifty-three Palestinian PRISONERS being held in Israel and elsewhere. Diplomatic efforts involving the FRENCH and the Israelis provided stalling time while the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) planned a rescue operation. The hijackers released some 150 passengers, leaving approximately 100 Israelis and Jews hostage. On 3 July a squadron of Israeli aircraft landed at Entebbe and met little resistance. During the rescue operation, eight hijackers and fifty-six Ugandan military personnel as well as three hostages and one Israeli commando were killed. After a plane loaded with the rescued hostages took off, the IDF destroyed Ugandan MIGs on the ground. The hijacking strengthened Israeli claims that the Palestinians were simply TERRORISTS.

Bibliography

Netanyahu, Iddo. Entebbe: The Jonathan Netanyahu Story: A Defining Moment in the War on Terrorism. Green Forest, AZ: New Leaf Press, 2003.

Environmental Degradation

Palestine is part of the historic Fertile Crescent, which is considered the cradle of human civilization and the origin of agriculture. Its unique location at the crossroads between Asia, Europe, and Africa has made Palestine an environmental melting pot for the flora and fauna of the three continents. Within a very small area, Palestine enjoys tremendous climatic variation. In a matter of thirty minutes' drive it is possible to travel from the relatively humid highlands, receiving twenty-three inches of rain per year, to the JERUSALEM desert, and the Dead Sea nearly 400 meters (1,300 feet) below sea level and receiving less than two inches of rain per year.

Palestine was described by early visitors as a land flowing with milk and honey, but such a description cannot be applied today. Barren lands and deserts have replaced forests and green plains. The Jordan River, which had an annual water flow of 1,300 million cubic meters in 1953, is currently running with contaminated water at a flow of 100 million cubic meters. The Dead Sea, which represents the deepest continental depression on earth, is drying up at an alarming rate and separating into two seas; the water level will decline further if existing practices persist.

Human infringement on Palestine's native vegetative cover has occurred primarily in four ways: gathering of wood for fuel and lumber, overgrazing by domesticated sheep and goats, conversion of woodlands to arable land, and forest fires both planned and accidental. During OTTOMAN rule in Palestine, vast areas of natural forest were lost as large numbers of trees and shrubs were cut to provide fuel for the railways, which led to the loss or marginalization of large numbers of native flora. Gone also from the LAND are animals that were once plentiful—ostrich, cheetah, leopard, lion, Syrian bear, crocodiles, and several kinds of deer—casualties of human encroachment.

Although it is not surprising that world interest has focused far more on the conflicting historical and political claims to the land, what happens to the environment inevitably extends to all components of the natural web, including humanity. Environmental problems cannot be isolated from the surrounding economic, social, political, and military issues. The case of Palestine illustrates the often negative relationship between political conflict and environmental degradation. If one looks at a satellite image, the political boundaries of the Occupied Palestinian Territory (OPT) can be easily traced and two brown desert forms distinguished—in striking contrast to the green, irrigated fields of Israel. While the Israeli desert has bloomed, the once-verdant heights of Palestine have been denuded. Desertification and soil erosion are evident, particularly on the Eastern Slopes to the west of the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY. This dry and barren landscape is the direct result of Israeli control over Palestinian surface and ground WATER resources.

The Palestinian environment has been the victim of Palestinian practices on the one hand and the actions of the Israeli OCCUPATION Authorities on the other. In the past decades, environmental problems such as land degradation, deterioration of biodiversity, depletion of water resources, deterioration of water quality, and air pollution have dramatically accelerated.

Land Degradation

As it stands now, the Occupied Palestinian Territories are significantly degraded, suffering from years of improper land use planning, overgrazing, deforestation, and environmentally unsound management of waste. Human activities, coupled with the impact of natural processes such as erosion and drought, have led to serious environmental problems in the WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP.

Improper land use planning. Lack of sovereignty over land and natural resources has denied the Palestinians their right to regulate land use and manage the utilization of their natural resources. Israeli planning schemes in the OPT have been geared toward political factors aimed at usurping as much land as possible to implement Israeli settlement expansion and toward changing the demographic character of the area. Consequently, there are two contradictory types of built-up areas in the OPT. The first consists of the Palestinian communities that are often constructed on nonfertile soil and comprise traditionally built houses with flat roofs used for harvesting rainwater and typically surrounded by backyard farms to meet household needs for agricultural products. The second type consists of the illegal Israeli SETTLEMENTS that overlie confiscated Palestinian agricultural lands on hilltops, particularly in the Jordan Valley, the western edges of the West Bank, and the Jerusalem area. As of 2008, around 200 Israeli settlements were scattered throughout the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, accommodating more than 500,000 settlers. Other imposed Israeli structures include industrial zones, military bases, and ROADBLOCKS. The most recent Israeli intrusion erected in the West Bank is the Segregation Wall, or BARRIER, which has brought about major challenges to the conservation of ecosystems and landscapes.

In the West Bank, analysis of land use shows that the Israeli settlements, Israeli military bases, and CLOSED MILITARY ZONES occupy approximately 73, 19, and 386 square miles (188, 48, and 999 square kilometers), respectively, while the Palestinian built-up areas occupy only 114 square miles (294 square kilometers), constituting 5 percent of the West Bank's total area (of 2,186 square miles, or 5,661 square kilometers). In the Gaza Strip, prior to ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT of 2005, Israel controlled an area of 53 square miles (138 square kilometers), which is 38 percent of the total area of Gaza (141 square miles, or 365 square kilometers). By the time the Israeli army completed the Gaza redeployment in August 2005, the area of its "security buffer zone" stood at 24 square miles (61 square kilometers); thus 17 percent of the Gaza Strip remained under the control of the Israeli army. On 28 June 2007, in another unilateral step, the Israeli army expanded the security buffer zone along Gaza's northern and eastern border to 1,640 yards (1.5 kilometers) in width. Accordingly, the newly defined security buffer zone occupies an area of 34 square miles (87 square kilometers), constituting 24 percent of the total area of Gaza.

Israeli colonizing activities, the division of the West Bank into Areas A, B, and C (based on the INTERIM AGREEMENT), and the construction of the Barrier wall have created geographical discontinuity especially within the West Bank, limiting the possibility of achieving comprehensive land use planning or implementation of environmentally sound waste management projects, thus leading to further land degradation.

Overgrazing and deforestation. During the prolonged years of Israeli Occupation, large areas in the West Bank have been transformed into deserts. Indicators of desertification appear clearly on the Eastern Slopes, which are characterized by steep slopes that have limited agricultural activity or animal grazing. The closure of 85 percent of the Eastern Slope zone by the Israeli authorities for military purposes has led to severe overgrazing in the remaining area accessible to the Palestinian herders. Overgrazing has resulted in the loss of the vegetation cover, soil erosion, and intensive desertification.

Israel converted large areas of planted and natural forests in the OTP into Israeli settlements and military bases—for example, Abu Ghnaim Mountain in the BETHLEHEM Governorate, where trees were cut down to construct the HAR HOMA settlement. Moreover, in the period from October 2000 until 2008, in the course of confiscating Palestinian land for the implementation of Israeli settlement construction, 432,036 trees including OLIVE TREES were uprooted in the West Bank, which is about 4.4 times greater than the number of trees uprooted in the period from 1993 until 2000. In the Gaza Strip, more than 1 million trees have been uprooted from Palestinian agricultural lands during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA (2000–2009).

Environmentally unsound management of waste. The lack of an efficient waste management system in the Occupied Territories has left huge piles of solid waste accumulating randomly in open areas and sewage streams flowing into wadis without any restriction. These pollution sources undermine the aesthetic value of the natural environment as well as exacerbate the land deterioration problem. During the Israeli Occupation, the waste management system has been neglected and left underdeveloped, with no separate system for the collection, treatment, and disposal of industrial and medical wastes generated from existing industrial facilities and health care centers.

In the West Bank, a high percentage of the collected domestic solid waste is dumped in open and uncontrolled dumping sites where open burning is the common practice, and the remaining uncollected waste is dumped and burned on roadsides and vacant lands. These dumping sites are not designed as sanitary landfills, thus allowing leachate to contaminate the soil, deteriorate the land, infiltrate into soil layers, and endanger the quality of groundwater in the aquifers. Currently, two sanitary landfills are operating in the West Bank, namely Zahret El-Fengan landfill, located in the JENIN Governorate in the northern part of the West Bank, and the JERICHO landfill, located in the Jordan Valley. In the Gaza Strip, the collected waste is disposed of in three sanitary landfills.

Sewage networks serve approximately 32 percent and 61 percent, respectively, of the West Bank and Gaza Strip population. The remaining population uses unlined cesspits and open channels for wastewater disposal. In the West Bank, the domestic wastewater collected by sewage networks is currently discharged raw, along with the collected untreated industrial wastewater, into open areas, mainly wadis. The only centralized wastewater treatment plant that is operating at a high efficiency rate is in Al Bireh in the Ramallah Governorate. The discharged wastewater is highly concentrated, in terms of the biological oxygen demand and the total suspended solids, and it may contain heavy metals due to the release of the untreated industrial wastewater. The wastewater streams threaten the groundwater quality over the highly permeable recharge areas of the West Bank. In the Gaza Strip, part of the domestic wastewater collected by sewage networks is treated in three centralized wastewater treatment plants that are functioning only at moderately efficient rates. The partially treated and untreated wastewater is all discharged into open areas such as Wadi Gaza or into the Mediterranean Sea and sand dunes.

Furthermore, the management of waste has seriously deteriorated since the outbreak of the Second INTIFADA due to the CLOSURE imposed on the Palestinian localities and the concomitant geographical discontinuity. The closure makes it impossible to move waste from origin to waste dumping sites. Also, the construction of the Barrier has exacerbated the solid waste management problem. The existing dumping sites outside the Barrier have become inaccessible to the localities inside the Wall, causing the use of emergency disposal sites inside the localities and increasing the solid waste load to the existing dumping sites.

Another source of the waste is the Israeli settlements. In the West Bank, about 80 percent of the solid waste generated by the settlers is dumped in sites located within the West Bank. These include ABU DIS, Al Birih, and Yatta (HEBRON, Southern Governorate) dumping sites, which are also used by Palestinians, and the Tovlan site, which was established in the Jericho Governorate to serve the settlers only. Most of the wastewater generated in the settlements flows untreated into nearby wadis and Palestinian agricultural lands. For instance, in the Salfit Governorate, the wastewater generated in Ariel Settlement is discharged untreated into Wadi Al Matwi, which overlies the recharge area of the Western Groundwater Basin. Furthermore, Israeli industrial facilities located in the West Bank discharge industrial waste into the environment without prior treatment, because Israeli environmental law is not compulsory and is not followed in the OPT. The most harmful action to Palestinian land is the illegal Israeli transport of hazardous waste generated inside Israel to the Palestinian Territories.

Deterioration of Biodiversity

The location of the Occupied Palestinian Territory at the crossroads of Africa, Asia, and Europe has allowed for a wide range of species to settle and evolve within its BORDERS. The diverse topographical features, climate, and soil distribution within such a small geographical area have provided many ecological niches for a rich biodiversity of flora and fauna. However, the absence of environmental protection has led to the deterioration of the biological resources. Urbanization, deforestation, pollution, overgrazing, land confiscation, and Israeli control over nature reserves during the Occupation have greatly reduced plant biomass and have endangered fauna species. Many of the species that appeared in historical records are now extinct or threatened.

The flora of Palestine includes 149 endemic species, of which 43 percent are found to be common, 27.5 percent rare, and 25.6 percent very rare. About 12 species of the endemic group are extremely rare, such as Polygonum palaestinum, Trichodesma bioessieri, and Verbascum fructiculosum. Various species of mammals have been endangered by human activities, and seven mammalian species are extinct.

Moreover, defined segregation zones and the construction of the Segregation Wall in the West Bank have caused major challenges to the conservation of ecosystems and habitat linkages between protected areas. By fragmenting ecosystems and habitats in both Israel and the West Bank and by disturbing the natural ecological corridors, the Wall and segregation zones impede the movement of terrestrial fauna and cause deterioration of the vegetation cover by isolating over 10,000 acres (about 43 square kilometers) of forests and 130,000 acres (about 534 square kilometers) of nature reserves "protected areas" where Palestinians cannot have access even for management purposes.

Deterioration of Water Quality

Groundwater in most areas of the West Bank is generally considered to be of good quality. There are no serious indications of pollution in the deep aquifer; however, contamination of groundwater has appeared in the shallow aquifer and in some springs in the West Bank. Groundwater contamination is caused by agricultural practices, mainly the use of inorganic fertilizers, pesticides, and herbicides, and by the unsound management of domestic and industrial wastewater and solid waste.

Quality measurements of groundwater in the West Bank have shown that the nitrate level in some wells (particularly in the Governorates of Nablus, Tulkarm, and Jericho) exceeds the World Health Organization's standard guideline value for drinking water. Nitrate contamination of groundwater is caused by fertilizers and raw sewage. Furthermore, microbiological contamination of springs is due to the infiltration of raw sewage from the unlined wastewater cesspits that are used in the rural areas of the West Bank. A microbiological examination conducted in July 2006 of water samples collected by the Palestinian Ministry of Health from Al Balad spring in Nahhalin village, located in the Bethlehem Governorate, showed the presence of coliform bacteria in the sample, indicating wastewater contamination and thus making the spring's waters unsuitable for drinking purposes.

Water quality of the Gaza coastal aquifer is considered poor. The main problem is the gradual increase in salinity and nitrate content, two indicators of organic pollution, as populations increase. Nitrate concentration reaches up to 400 milligrams per liter in the North Gaza Governorate and salinity is more than 1,500 milligrams per liter in the western area of Khan Yunis and southeastern part of Rafah Governorate. This deterioration in water quality is attributed to the overpumping of the aquifer due to increased demand from the growing population, which has lowered the groundwater table below sea level, leading to saltwater intrusion from the sea, as well as to the unregulated disposal of waste. Moreover, Israel's construction of dams on Wadi Gaza, in order to harvest the surface water running in the wadi and divert it into areas inside Israel, has also affected groundwater quality.

Air Pollution

Although air pollution is not recognized as a critical problem in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, it is believed that air quality is continuously deteriorating—hurt mainly by industrial activities, vehicle emissions, energy consumption, open burning of solid waste in the dumping sites, and transboundary air pollutants.

The major source of air pollution in the West Bank is vehicle emissions such as carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide, and nitrogen oxides. These emissions have significantly increased since the segregation of the Palestinian localities, Israel's frequent closures, and destruction of the main Palestinian ROADS between localities and governorates. This has obliged Palestinians to use alternative routes, which are usually long unpaved roads requiring more traveling time and thus increased vehicle emissions.

Existing industrial activities that add to the air pollution problem are quarries and stone-cutting facilities, which emit huge amounts of particulate matter into the air. Charcoal processing releases considerable amounts of carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide, nitrogen oxides, and volatile organic compounds into the atmosphere. Metal factories, bakeries, and pottery industries produce large amounts of toxic gases, because they burn old tires and used motor oil as fuel.

Moreover, transboundary pollutants from Israel have significantly contributed to the deterioration of air quality in the West Bank. Western winds blow air pollution from the Tel Aviv urban area into the West Bank. Studies have shown that nitrogen oxides generated from the traffic in Tel Aviv are produced as ozone in Bethlehem, Jerusalem, and NABLUS.

See also INFRASTRUCTURE IN THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES; LAND; WATER

Bibliography

- Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem (ARIJ). The Geographic Information System (GIS) Unit Database. Bethlehem: ARIJ, 2008.
- . The Har Homa Settlement and Uprooting of Abu Ghnaim Forest. 1997. http://www.arij.org/index.php?option=com\_content&task=view&id=175&Itemid=26&lang=en.
- Isaac, Jad, et al. Analysis of Waste Management Policies in Palestine. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem (ARIJ), 2005.
- . Localizing Agenda 21 in Palestine. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem (ARIJ), 2001.
- . Status of the Environment in the Occupied Palestinian Territory. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem (ARIJ), 2007.
- . The Status of the Environment in the West Bank. Bethlehem: Applied Research Institute—Jerusalem (ARIJ), 1997.
- . Undermining Peace: Israel's Unilateral Segregation Plans in the Palestinian Territories. 2003. http://www.poica.org/editor/case\_studies/view.php?recordID=619.
- Isaac, Jad, and Mohammad Ghanayem. "Environmental Degradation and the Israeli Palestinian Conflict." Rome: Ambiente e Guerra, Odradek Publications, 2003.
- Isaac, Jad, Khaldoun Rishmawi, and Aber Safar. "The Impact of Israel's Unilateral Actions on the Palestinian Environment." In Palestinian and Israeli Environmental Narratives. Toronto: York University, 2004.

Mordechai, Peleg, et al. "Ozone Levels in Central Israel." Israel Journal of Chemistry. 31 (1994).

Palestinian Water Authority. Water Sector Strategic Planning Study (WSSPS). Ramallah: Palestinian Water Authority, 1999.

—Jad Isaac and Abeer Safar

Erekat, Saeb Muhammad Salih (1955–)

Saeb Erekat is a Palestinian academic and politician. He was a member of the first PALESTINE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL (PNC) (representing JERICHO), and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE. Erekat was head of the PLO's Negotiations Affairs Department and the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY'S (PNA) minister of negotiations affairs, as well as minister of local government. He is a former professor of political science at An-Najah National University, NABLUS, and also served as the university's public relations director from 1982 to 1986.

Erekat was born and still lives in Jericho. He has a B.A. and an M.A. from San Francisco State University, both in International Relations, and a Ph.D. from the University of Bradford in Great Britain, where he studied conflict resolution at the Quaker-endowed Department of Peace Studies. In 1987 Erekat was arrested by Israeli authorities and accused of inciting sedition because of an article he wrote in which he argued that "Palestinians must learn to endure and reject and resist." At trial, he argued in his own defense that promoting NONVIOLENT resistance did not qualify as sedition. Nevertheless, an Israeli military court convicted him and he was under intermittent house arrest during the early years of the First INTIFADA.

In May 1988 Erekat was one of three Palestinians (with HAYDAR 'ABD 'AL-SHAFI and HANAN ASHRAWI) to participate in ABC Nightline's town hall meeting from JERUSALEM. At the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE, where Erekat served as deputy advisor to 'Abd al-Shafi, he acquired the reputation of being a born politician and a competent negotiator. He was almost barred from Madrid for his insistence on wearing the hutta (kaffiyah), as a public show of loyalty to PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT. At WYE RIVER and CAMP DAVID, Erekat was the lead negotiator for the Palestinians.

When MAHMUD ABBAS was nominated to serve as prime minister of the Palestine

Legislative Council in early 2003, Erekat was slated to be minister of negotiations in the new cabinet, but he soon resigned after he was excluded from the Palestinian delegation to the first ROAD MAP talks with Israeli prime minister ARIEL SHARON. This was interpreted as part of an internal Palestinian power struggle between Abbas and Arafat. Erekat was later reappointed to his post and participated in the 2007 Annapolis Conference, where he took over from AHMAD QUREI' during an impasse and helped hammer out a joint declaration.

Erekat is one of a very few senior PNA figures to escape charges of corruption. He is also one of the most pro-US members of the Palestinian leadership and remains convinced that there will be no solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict without active and committed US intervention.

Bibliography

PalestineHistory.com. "Palestinian Bibliography: Saeb Erekat." n.d. www.palestinehistory.com/biography/palestine/palbio47.htm.

Eretz Crossing

Eretz was the major crossing point for Palestinians between the GAZA STRIP and Israel and Gazans' only access to the WEST BANK and JERUSALEM before Israel restricted all Palestinian passage starting in 2000. Since the eruption of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000, Israel has almost completely sealed Gaza. Although certain Palestinians could use the crossing, no one could enter or leave without special PERMITS and advanced Israeli approval. Generally, only diplomats and some Israeli-vetted journalists could obtain prior approval. The few Palestinians who in the past were able to obtain the required magnetic cards and permits needed to cross Eretz have been unable to do so since 2000. In May 2003, in the interest of "security," the Israeli authorities denied access through Gaza's crossing to everyone except those with diplomatic passports.

In January 2004, Israel closed the industrial zone near the Eretz crossing established as part of the OSLO ACCORDS in response to Gazans' firing QASSAM ROCKETS into Israel, cutting off hundreds of Palestinian day laborers from their source of employment. In 2005, during ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA, it closed the crossing completely. Several months later, Israel opened it for a short time to Palestinians with special permits, but closed it again in December 2005 and the crossing has remained closed since then.

Bibliography

- Bannoura, Saed. "Palestinian Workers Facing Daily Hardships at Eretz Crossing." International Middle East Media Center. 8 February 2006.
- Hass, Amira. "Primordial Illogic and Primitive Cruelty." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 23 July 2003.
- Levy, Gideon. "All They Want Is Work." Ha'aretz. 14 July 2005.
- . "The Safe Passage: The History of a Farce." Ha'aretz. 11 December 2005.
- . "There Is No Hunger in Gaza!" Ha'aretz. 9 April 2006.
- El-Sarraj, Eyad. "The Crossing." Gaza City: Gaza Community Mental Health Project. 3 May 2004. www.gcmhp.net/File\_files/thecrossingmay32004.html.
- Shaqqura, Hamdi. "If You Were a Gazan: A Personal Account of the Restrictions on the Freedom of Movement." Gaza City: The Palestinian Center for Human Rights, n.d.

Eretz Yisrael l'Hashlema

See GREATER LAND OF ISRAEL MOVEMENT

Eshkol, Levi (1895–1969)

Levi Eshkol (Levi Shkolnik) was a prominent LABOR PARTY leader and prime minister of Israel from 1963 to 1969. Born near Kiev, RUSSIA, he immigrated to Palestine in 1914. His family was wealthy and Hasidic, and Eshkol received a traditional Jewish education in Russia, where he joined a Zionist organization. In Palestine, he quickly became active in military, agricultural, and financial affairs; founded a workers' commune in Petah Tikvah; and became one of the founding members of Kibbutz Deganyah.

A member of the JEWISH LEGION from 1918 to 1920, Eshkol was elected to the defense committee of the HISTADRUT (labor federation) in 1921. In Vienna, he was arrested in 1922 on a mission to buy arms. After HAIM ARLOZOROV concluded the HA'AVARA agreement with the Nazis, Eshkol went to Berlin in 1934 to organize the transfer of German Jewish property. In the 1940s he played a key role in the development of the HAGANA, an illegal Jewish military force. During World War II, Eshkol headed the Hagana's finance department and became treasurer of the JEWISH AGENCY in 1949, heading its Land and Settlement Department. After serving as Israeli deputy minister of defense during the 1948 WAR, he was elected to the Knesset in 1951 and in 1952 became minister of finance. During his ministry, Israel's gross national product increased 10 percent annually and he was largely responsible for the development of the crucial National Water Carrier. In 1963 he succeeded DAVID BEN-GURION as prime minister of Israel.

As prime minister, Eshkol worked to improve Israel's foreign relations. During his term in office, West GERMANY established formal diplomatic relations with Israel in 1965 (although Bonn had been paying Israel reparations since 27 March 1953, constituting a major source of finance for the Jewish state), and relations with the UNITED STATES were greatly improved. His efforts to mend relations with the Soviet Union resulted in permission being granted to some SOVIET JEWS to immigrate to Israel, and cultural ties were established between the two countries.

In the weeks leading up to the 1967 WAR, Eshkol was forced by Israeli generals and senior politicians to form a "Government of National Unity" because they viewed him as "too soft," a government he was able to hold together for some time after the war. He believed that Israel should not return the Palestinian territories that it had conquered and occupied in 1967 until there was a solution to the entire Arab-Israeli conflict. In 1968 Eshkol received a crucial commitment from the United States to supply Israel with sophisticated fighter planes. He died on 26 February 1969 while in office.

See also GERMANY; LYNDON BAINES JOHNSON

Bibliography

- Oren, Michael B. Six Days of War: June 1967 and the Making of the Modern Middle East, reprint ed. Pre-sidio Press, 2003.
- Prittie, Terence. Eshkol of Israel: The Man and the Nation. New York: Pitman Publishing, 1969.
- Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 2nd ed. New York: Knopf, 1996.

Ethnic Cleansing

See TRANSFER AND DISPLACEMENT; WAR, 1948

ETZEL

See IRGUN TZEVA'I LE'UMI

Europe

See policies of individual countries and places: CHINA; EUROPEAN UNION; FRANCE; GERMANY; MOSCOW; SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES; TURKEY

European Union

European colonialism in the Middle East, World Wars I and II and the HOLOCAUST, plus European involvement in the Cold War all affected the Middle East and were central external factors in the evolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. As a consequence, Europe has a historic responsibility for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Today, the resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict is a strategic priority for the European Union (EU), and its political accountability is expressed primarily in the support of diplomatic processes and the defense of and respect for INTERNATIONAL LAW and human rights. As the strongest economic actor in the Mediterranean region, the EU also has an economic responsibility to Israel and the Palestinian territories. The EU has increasingly attempted to respond to these obligations, but its ability to take action is dependent on its internal evolution: the more the process of European integration proceeds, the more the EU, in principle, is capable of acting concretely in the complex and emotionally charged Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

EU's Growing Role in the Middle East

Despite frequent criticism of the EU as an “economic giant but political dwarf,” the EU (and its predecessor, the European Community) has increased its role slowly but constantly as an international actor in the Middle East since the 1958 Treaties of Rome. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has often been the catalyst for the development of the EU's Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP), by forcing the member states to find common policies even though, for historical reasons, the traditional positions of various countries on the conflict diverge quite strongly. GERMANY, for instance, has always defended Israel's interests, while FRANCE, since the 1967 WAR, has tended to support the Palestinians. Nevertheless, since the beginning of European Political Cooperation (EPC) in 1969, the Europeans have tried to harmonize their positions. In 1973 the Europeans' first common official declaration on the Middle East recognized the legitimate rights of the Palestinians to a homeland within historic Palestine.

The 1980 EU Venice Declaration, a major European initiative, called for an end to the OCCUPATION in the Palestinian territories, and recognized the Palestinian right of self-determination and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) as the Palestinians' sole legitimate representative. However, these European initiatives regularly provoked negative reactions from Israel (and the UNITED STATES), which rejected recognition of the PLO, ostensibly because it had not yet recognized Israel's right to exist.

The oil crisis of 1973 led to the creation of the Euro-Arab Dialogue between the EC and the twenty-one member states of the ARAB LEAGUE, an exchange denounced by Israel and the United States. Although the Arab states were mostly interested in a political dialogue and hoped the Europeans would counterbalance US foreign policy in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict; the EC was mainly interested in improving economic cooperation with the Arab states and staying as balanced as possible toward the conflict.

A major milestone in the European integration process, and thus for Europe's Middle Eastern policy, was the creation of the CFSP in 1993, replacing the EPC, and progressively enlarging the capabilities of the EU in matters of foreign policy. At the beginning of the Middle East peace process in MADRID in 1991, the EC/EU's role was little more than participating in the Multilateral Tracks (the central mediating role was played by the United States), while only eleven years later, the EU stood as an equal diplomatic partner with the United States, RUSSIA, and the UNITED NATIONS in the framework of the QUARTET, the four entities that formed an association in Madrid in 2001.

After the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS, European support for the Palestinians increased. The EU was among the first international actors to back the newly created PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) and has been its major financial supporter for nonmilitary purposes since then. With the Berlin Declaration of 1999, the EU underlined the right of self-determination of the Palestinians, including the right to a Palestinian state as the best guarantee of Israel's security, and reaffirmed the readiness of the EU to recognize this future state. Finally, the 2002 Seville Declaration stated that only a negotiated solution of the conflict is acceptable.

After this long process of reaching consensus among different national positions among EU member states, the EU today advocates a TWO-STATE SOLUTION consisting of an Israeli state, and an independent Palestinian state, living side by side within secure and recognized borders. More precisely, the EU recognizes the existence of the state of Israel and its need for security as well as the right of self-determination of the Palestinians. Its objectives are (1) an independent, democratic Palestinian state based on the 1967 BORDERS with minor adjustments agreed to by both parties, with JERUSALEM as the capital of both countries; and (2) an acceptable solution of the REFUGEE problem. These objectives are based on respect for the principles of UN RESOLUTIONS 242, 338, 1397, 1402, and 1515, and of the Madrid Conference of 1991.

Different Frameworks for EU's Policies

The EU's policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is carried out within different frameworks: the CFSP and European Security and Defense Policy (ESDP), the Barcelona Process (since 2008 named the Union for the Mediterranean (UfM), the European Neighborhood Policy (ENP), direct aid to refugees, foreign economic policy, humanitarian aid, and international diplomacy. In the context of the CFSP/ESDP, the EU has issued numerous declarations and defined common positions on the Middle East conflict and has implemented numerous "Joint Actions" and missions, such as sending observers and assistance to the Palestinian ELECTIONS in 1996, 2004, and 2006; training the Palestinian police (by EUPOL COPPS since 2006); providing border assistance at the crossing point between Gaza and Egypt (by EU BAM RAFAH since 2005, but on "standby" since 2007); and appointing a special representative for the Middle East peace process, Miguel Moratinos, in 1996 (succeeded in 2003 by the Belgian diplomat Marc Otte). Since the creation of the position of the high representative of the CFSP in 1999, Javier Solana has been involved diplomatically in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and participated in the first Mitchell Commission. Solana is a Spanish physicist and highly respected international diplomat, former commander of the Balkans NATO mission operation, and from 1995 to 1999 secretary-general of NATO; in 2008 his role is more or less that of a European foreign minister.

The EU was intensively involved in drafting the ROAD MAP of April 2003, which proposed a final and comprehensive settlement of the conflict in three phases by 2005. On the basis of a seven-point plan from the former German foreign minister Joschka Fischer, the Road Map was cooperatively developed by the European Commission, Danish prime minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, and European diplomats before being transmitted to then US secretary of state COLIN POWELL and being endorsed by the QUARTET. The Road Map remains a reference document for the EU, serving as a framework for a comprehensive peace in the Middle East. Beginning in 2007 and continuing thereafter, the EU supported the Annapolis process, in order to encourage Israel and the Palestinians to implement the Road Map obligations and to reach a peace agreement before the end of 2008. Despite some small progress in bilateral negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, SYRIA, and LEBANON, agreements were not achieved and the negotiations were suspended with Israel's 2008 offensive in Gaza. The EU also supports the ARAB PEACE INITIATIVE as a basis for regional peace.

Besides the CFSP/ESDP frame, the EU is indirectly engaged in the settlement of the conflict via the Barcelona Process, or Euro-Mediterranean Partnership (EMP), now UfM, launched in 1995, when the EMP was conceived as a separate but complementary process to the Oslo peace process. Its objective was not to solve the Israel-Palestinian conflict but to improve the political climate in the Mediterranean region in general and, in turn, between the actors involved in the conflict. This was supposed to happen through regional cooperation and confidence-building measures, but the EMP has not been as successful as had been hoped. On the one hand, the EMP/UfM offers the only multilateral forum besides the United Nations where Israel, the Palestinians, and the Arab countries involved in the conflict meet regularly and on an equal basis. When official peace talks were blocked or interrupted, an informal dialogue could be conducted within the Euro-Mediterranean context. Under the new roof of the Union for the Mediterranean, the Arab League will also participate in the planned summits and activities, which implies a "de facto" recognition of Israel by the member states of the Arab League. On the other hand, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict at times paralyzed the development of the EMP/UfM, especially of its first phase, the Political and Security Partnership, which takes place on a multilateral level, making it more vulnerable vis-à-vis the distrust among the actors in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. For example, the planned EU Charter for Peace and Stability was never signed, the regional political dialogue was blocked, and several Euro-Mediterranean foreign minister conferences were boycotted by Syria and Lebanon as a response to Israeli policies in the Palestinian territories. In contrast to the stagnation of the first phase of the EMP, the second phase—the Economic and Financial Partnership—progressed more easily. In the framework of the EMP, the EU signed, among other things, bilateral association agreements with Israel, the Palestinians, and the neighboring countries of JORDAN, EGYPT, and Lebanon. Negotiations with Syria were concluded in 2004.

Bilateral Relations between the EU and Israel

The EU-Israel Association Agreement, signed in November 1995 and in force since June 2000, legally structures the bilateral relations between the EU and Israel and replaces an earlier 1975 Cooperation Agreement. The Association Agreement is primarily concerned with liberalizing commercial relations between the EU and Israel through free trade arrangements for industrial goods and concessionary arrangements for agricultural products, and increasing the prospects for trade liberalization in services and agricultural goods. But it also includes regular political dialogue at the ministerial and senior official levels, and increased contacts between the European Parliament and the Knesset as well as intensified cultural and scientific cooperation. An Action Plan with Israel, concluded in the framework of the European Neighborhood Policy in December 2004, complements the Association Agreement. The objective of the Neighborhood Policy is, on the one hand, to harmonize the bilateral relations between the EU and its neighboring countries after the EU Enlargement round of May 2004 and to intensify political, security, economic, and cultural cooperation. On the other hand, the Action Plans allow involvement with the issues and problems specific to each country. The negotiation process with Israel has been longer and more complicated than with other countries because Israel initially refused to include any reference to the Road Map in the Action Plan, but it finally admitted that the Middle East conflict is a priority for cooperation. Most of all, the Action Plan allows Israel to progressively participate in more EU policies and programs than previously and to access more easily the EU's internal economic market. Israeli politicians and observers from different political camps debated the question of the full membership of Israel into the EU. But the EU is still occupied with managing the last enlargement rounds, and the Arab-Israeli conflict will have to be solved before Israel could ever be considered for full membership.

In 2008, however, the EU agreed on the “Advanced Status” for Israel, which means upgrading the bilateral relations (the only other country in the region with an advanced status is Morocco). Advanced Status was, however, suspended because of Israel's 2008/2009 offensive in Gaza.

The EU is Israel's major trading partner, and Israel is the EU's twenty-first largest export market. About 40 percent of Israeli imports come from the EU, while about 30 percent of Israeli exports are directed to the EU. Besides the economic cooperation, the scientific and technical relationship between the EU and Israel is extensive and has a long history. However, political relations between the EU and Israel have often been strained, especially in the past decade since the collapse of the Middle East peace process beginning in 1996. Israel criticizes the EU for supporting the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) and is concerned about growing ANTI-SEMITISM in Europe, to the extent of urging Jewish residents in France to move to Israel, which ARIEL SHARON initiated in July 2004 and therewith provoked intense diplomatic tensions with the EU. At the same time, the EU and European civil societies criticize Israel for allowing Jewish SETTLEMENTS in the Palestinian territories, the IDF's destruction of EU-funded projects in the Palestinian territories during OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD in 2002, the TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS of Palestinian militants, and the construction of the BARRIER (the wall separating Israel from the Palestinian territories) as violations of international law. The tensions culminated in November 2003 after a survey from the Statistical Office of the European Communities stated that 59 percent of EU citizens consider Israel to be the greatest danger for peace in the world. This provoked Israeli reproaches against the EU for failing to undertake enough efforts to combat anti-Semitism in Europe. Although Europeans recognize the right of Israel to protect its citizens from TERRORIST attacks, there are many and growing critical voices toward Israeli policies and military actions, especially since the beginning of the Second INTIFADA in September 2000, the Second Lebanon War in 2006, and the military offensive in the Gaza Strip in 2008/2009. Fears are growing within European societies that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict could spill onto European territory, especially France. But this does not change the fundamental and strong attachment of the EU and its civil societies to Israel as the only democratic state in the Middle East.

Bilateral Relations between the EU and PNA

The Interim Association Agreement on Trade and Cooperation, signed on 24 February 1997 and entered into force on 1 July 1997, constitutes the main legal document for the bilateral relations between the EU and PNA. The focus of the agreement is the liberalization of trade and a framework for a comprehensive political dialogue. In December 2004, the European Commission also concluded an "Action Plan" with the PNA, in the framework of the European Neighborhood Policy. The implementation of the agreement has been difficult because of the Palestinian territories' strong economic, financial, and geographical dependence on Israel and Israel's restrictions on the Palestinian ECONOMY. This situation has worsened since the beginning of the Second Intifada in September 2000; among other measures, CLOSURES and CURFEWS imposed on the Palestinians have hindered a normalization of trade relations. The EU's objective is to improve the humanitarian and economic situation of the Palestinians, to support political reforms and institution building, and to implement the principles of the Road Map. After the EU decided to assist the PNA with direct financial aid, the suspicion arose in 2002 that Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT and the PNA had misused European funds to finance "military and terrorist activities" and allegedly anti-Semitic Palestinian EDUCATION (e.g., textbooks). This suspicion provoked both a political debate within the EU on the necessary reforms of the PNA and an investigation by the European Anti-Fraud Office (OLAF). In response, the EU reformed and strengthened the conditionality attached to its financial assistance package and contributed to improving the Palestinian public finance management system. Although one of the EU's priorities is the reform of Palestinian institutions, it emphasizes that reforms must come from within. The EU also played a leading role in the International Task Force on Palestinian Reform, created in 2002, which coordinates international donors' aid and monitors civil reforms. The EU is one of the oldest donors (since 1971 in the frame of UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East [UNRWA]) and today the most important donor for the Palestinians. Since the beginning of the Second Intifada, its assistance consists of a mix of emergency support, medium-term institution building measures, and support to the reform process. The EU also cochairs with NORWAY the meetings of the international donor mechanism, the Ad-Hoc Liaison Committee for Assistance to the Palestinians, founded in 1993 after the OSLO ACCORDS.

From 1994 to 2002, the EU provided approximately 1 billion euros in grants and loans for development in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and a further 500 million in contributions to UNRWA. Besides this EU funding, the EU member states provided about 2.5 billion euros during the same time period. For the period 2000–2006, the EU provided approximately 1.8 billion euros for food aid and support to the PNA; refugees; the HEALTH CARE, education, and private sectors; municipalities; preparation for elections; institution building; judicial reform; and programs in support of the Middle East peace process such as the Partnership for Peace Program, focused on local and international CIVIL SOCIETY initiatives. In 2007 about 550 million euros and in 2008 approximately 486 million euros were provided. Large parts of these funds are channeled through the so-called PEGASE mechanism for direct assistance and the Palestinian Reform and Development Plan. In recent years, European support has been instrumental in ensuring fair and free elections in the Palestinian territories. Thanks to European engagement, in cooperation with the international community, the PNA adopted and ratified the constitutional Basic Law in 2002 and passed legislation increasing the independence of its judiciary and the transparency of its public finances. However, European support for the Palestinians has become very controversial since the victory of HAMAS in the January 2006 parliamentary elections. On the one hand, the EU could not recognize a Hamas-led government as long as Hamas does not recognize Israel, renounce violence, and accept the international engagements of the Palestinians in relation to former agreements. On the other hand, the EU continues to financially support the population living in the Gaza Strip, observes the destruction of EU-funded infrastructures by the IDF, and indirectly contributes to the growing fractures between Fatah and Hamas by participating in the policy of isolating Hamas promulgated by the United States and Israel.

Contrasting Approaches of Europe and the United States

The EU and the United States have tried to harmonize their positions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the framework of the Quartet. Even though both actors support peace between Israel and the Palestinians, their approaches often diverge, especially on the question of how to deal with the Palestinian side. One example was the GEORGE W. BUSH administration's isolation of Arafat, while the EU continued its dialogue with him. The international debate on unilateralism and multilateralism provoked by the 2003 War on IRAQ produced a clearer separation of Europe's Middle Eastern policy from the Bush administration's policy. The EU, however, knows that it needs to cooperate with the United States, because it is the only international actor capable of implementing a durable peace agreement. The United States has played a central role in important phases of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict compared to a more modest role by the Europeans. European approaches focus on long-term policies such as "Land for Peace," the support of diplomatic initiatives, and financial support of the peace process.

Since the beginning of a European Middle Eastern policy in the 1970s, the EC and then the EU has sought to promote itself as a neutral actor—to respect the Israeli position as well as the Palestinian. Despite this balanced effort, Israel regularly accuses the EU of favoring the Palestinians, while the Palestinians criticize the EU for being too indulgent of Israel. Nevertheless, Europeans have the political will to increase the EU's role in the Middle East. However, the strength of the EU's Middle Eastern policy will most likely emerge in a postconflict situation.

Bibliography

- Abdul Hadi, Mahdi, ed. Foreign Policies towards the Middle East and Palestine. Ramallah, West Bank: PASSIA Publication, 1999.
- Allen, David, and Alfred Pijpers, eds. European Foreign Policy Making and the Arab-Israeli Conflict. The Hague/Boston/Lancaster: Martinus Nijhof, 1984.
- Aoun, Elena. "European Foreign Policy and the Arab-Israeli Dispute: Much Ado about Nothing?" European Foreign Affairs Review. 8:3 (2003).

- Hollis, Rosemary. "Europe in the Middle East." In International Relations of the Middle East. Edited by Louise Fawcett. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005.
- Le More, Anne. International Assistance to the Palestinians after Oslo: Political Guilt, Wasted Money. London: Routledge, 2008.
- O'Donell, Clara Marina. The EU, Israel and Hamas. Centre for European Reform: Working Paper. London, April 2008.
- Ortega, Martin, ed. The European Union and the Crisis in the Middle East. Chaillot Paper No. 62. Paris: Institute for Security Studies, 2003.
- Roberson, Barbara A., ed. The Middle East and Europe: The Power Deficit. New York: Routledge, 1998.
- Schäfer, Isabel. "The EU as a Transformative Power in the MENA Region: Implications for Israel." In Renewing the Middle East: Climate Changes in Security and Energy and the New Challenges for EU-Israel Relations. Edited by Roby Nathanson and Stephan Stetter. Tel Aviv/Brussels: IEPN, 2008.
- Soetendorp, Ben. "The EU's Involvement in the Israeli-Palestinian Peace Process: The Building of a Visible International Identity." European Foreign Affairs Review. 7:3 (2002).
- Tocci, Nathali. The Widening Gap between Rhetoric and Reality in EU Policy towards the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. Working Document No. 217. Brussels: Centre for European Policy Studies, 2005.
- Von Dosenrode, Soren, and Anders Stubkjaer. The EU and the Middle East. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001.
- Waldegrave, William. "The European Role in the Middle East." Journal of Palestine Studies. 20:1 (1990).

—Isabel Schäfer

Evan Rosh Co.

Evan Rosh Co. is a shadowy company established by right-wing JEWISH FUNDAMENTALIST settlers, which attempts to locate Palestinian homes, especially in East JERUSALEM, whose owners are believed to have fled the country in the 1967 WAR. The Israeli government has allowed representatives of Evan Rosh Co. (and its sister company Mordor Moria Co.) to easily register homes they have identified as absentee with the ISRAELI CUSTODIAN OF ABSENTEE PROPERTY. By law, the custodian is supposed to determine if the owners indeed fled the country and, if so, put the properties up for sale. In practice, the custodian takes the settlers' word and then returns the properties to the settlers.

See also DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY; JEWISH QUARTER DEVELOPMENT COMPANY; KLUGMAN

REPORT; SETTLER GROUPS AND SETTLEMENTS, EAST JERUSALEM;

Bibliography

Cheshin, Amir S., Bill Hutman, and Avi Melamed. Separate and Unequal: The Inside Story of Israeli Rule in East Jerusalem. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

Expropriation of Palestinian Land and Water Resources

See LAND; WATER

Expulsion

See TRANSFER AND DISPLACEMENT; WAR, 1948

Eyal

Eyal was an amorphous but extremist right-wing organization that in the period prior to YITZHAK RABIN'S assassination in 1995 issued daily warnings to the MEDIA that it would kill the prime minister if he proceeded with the OSLO PROCESS. The founder and head of Eyal, Avishai Raviv, worked for Israel's secret service, SHIN BET, and was involved with the establishment of the Zionist Fascist Youth organization. The SHAMGAR COMMISSION, which investigated Rabin's murder, reported that the Eyal organization had been set up by Israeli intelligence. Some in Israel contend that Raviv encouraged YIGAL AMIR, a member of Eyal, to assassinate Rabin.

Bibliography

Bedein, David. "Lessons of the Rabin Assassination." FrontPageMagazine.com. 17 September 2004.

The Cutter. "Psyops and the Israeli Settler Problem." Peacepalestine. 2 June 2005.

Freeman Center. "Summary of a Meeting on the Swearing-In Ceremony of the Eyal Organization Meeting." The Raviv Protocol: An Unofficial Translation of the Document. File 403. 16 June 1996. http://64.233.161.104/search?q=cache:R8aQrhYWy3oJ:www.freeman.org/m\_online/dec99/shapiro5.htm+Eyal+organization+Israel&hl=en.

Gaffney, Frank. "On Crushing the Opposition." Outpost. December 1995.

Israel Hasbara Committee. "Israelis Fear Incitement Plot." True News. 21 October 2004.

Israel's Media Watch. "Secret Service Agent-provocator Avishai Raviv and His Connections with the Media." Special Report 092sr. Israel's Media Watch. 13 November 1997. www.geocities.com/CapitolHill/2527/press6.htm.

Zionist Organization of America's Israel News Connection. "Raviv, Who Murdered Yitzchak Rabin?" Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 30 April 1999.

---

F

---

Fahd Plan, 1981

The Fahd Plan, proposed in 1981 by Saudi crown prince Fahd (who became King Fahd in 1982), was an eight-point initiative to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict that included the establishment of an independent Palestinian state. Although the plan implicitly recognized Israel, Israel rejected it largely because of its call for a Palestinian state, but also because Israel preferred bilateral negotiations over multilateral ones. Arab capitals received it cautiously, but the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) accepted the plan. Among European countries the Fahd Plan was strongly supported, but the UNITED STATES rejected it, believing that its own peace proposal—the REAGAN PLAN, which designated JORDAN as the sovereign in the WEST BANK—would be more acceptable to Israel. (Israel rejected the Reagan Plan too.)

The Fahd peace initiative was largely a consequence of the 1975 rise to power in SAUDI ARABIA of pro-American Crown Prince Fahd, who believed that his initiative would find favor in Washington and lead to an improvement in US-Saudi relations, which became strained after the 1973 oil embargo by the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) and the subsequent rise in petroleum prices. The elements of the plan were familiar and loosely based on UN RESOLUTIONS 242 and 338: Israel was to withdraw from the territories captured in the 1967 WAR, including East JERUSALEM (though not the whole city), dismantle the Jewish SETTLEMENTS, recognize the PLO as the Palestinian representative, and establish an independent Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as its capital. These actions would, in turn, secure guarantees of Arab state recognition of Israel, along with peace and stability for all states in the region, including Israel.

In 1982, at the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference held in Fez, Morocco, the ARAB LEAGUE adopted an initiative similar to the Fahd Plan, which became known as the FEZ PEACE INITIATIVE. It too was rejected by the United States and Israel.

See also ARAB STATE PEACE OVERTURES, 1949–PRESENT; ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC

Bibliography

- Cordesman, Anthony H. Saudi Arabia Enters the Twenty-First Century: The Political, Foreign Policy, Economic, and Energy Dimensions. New York: Praeger, 2003.
- Fahd, Crown Prince. "Statement by Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Fahd on the Latest Political Developments in the Arab Region, August 8, 1981 (excerpt)." Journal of Palestine Studies. 11:1 (1981).
- Long, David E. The United States and Saudi Arabia: Ambivalent Allies. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1985

Family Reunification

International Legal Considerations. Based on the 10 December 1948 proclamation by the UN General Assembly of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (especially Articles 12 and 16), protection of the right to family life from governmental interference was enshrined in international and regional human rights treaties. Such treaties include the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Articles 17 and 23), the International Convention on the Rights of the Child (Article 10), and the European Convention on Human Rights (Article 8). The right to family reunification has been applied to matters of IMMIGRATION by the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. Domestic laws of almost all countries recognize the right of their citizens to be united with members of their immediate families, and most states extend such privileges to the alien resident's family members as well. In situations of armed conflict, the arbitrarily forced displacement of civilians is prohibited under international humanitarian law; the Geneva Conventions (Additional Protocol I, Article 74) require that the parties facilitate the reunion of families dispersed as a result of armed conflict.

Israel's system of family reunification does not meet the standards set by INTERNATIONAL LAW and best practice. First, Israel's system of family reunification treats Palestinians as if they were foreigners requesting immigration. Arab Palestinians constituted the majority of the population of Palestine in 1948, were citizens under the laws of the BRITISH MANDATE in Palestine (1921–1948), and were forcibly displaced and denationalized, mainly during armed conflict, by the successor state, Israel. As such, international legal norms apply to their situation. Second, Israeli laws, policies and practices of family reunification discriminate on grounds of nationality. Jewish immigrants to Israel and after 1967 to the Occupied Territories, as well as their (Jewish or non-Jewish) relatives spanning three generations, have a guaranteed right to nationality as defined under the LAW OF RETURN (1950). No such right exists for Palestinians, and reunification of Palestinian families has been treated mainly as a matter of “national security” and DEMOGRAPHY.

The UN Human Rights Committee (2003); the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR, 1998 and 2003); and the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD, 2003 and 2007) have all importuned Israel to adhere to these norms, to end discrimination against Palestinians, and to facilitate return, family reunification, and naturalization, but Israel has yet to do so. Finally, the separate system of citizenship, residency, and family reunification applicable to Palestinians has been characterized by a lack of transparency and by arbitrariness of procedure and decisions.

Palestinian Citizens in Israel since 1948

Approximately 1.2 million people, or 20 percent of the population, of the state of Israel today are Palestinians. They originate from the 150,000 Palestinians who remained in the territory of Palestine on which Israel established itself in the armed conflict of 1948. During the 1948 WAR, relatives and friends were displaced to the other side of the Israeli-Arab cease-fire lines and became REFUGEES. While Israel's Law of Return (1950) conveyed Israeli citizenship to the new state's Jewish population and to Jews worldwide upon immigration, a separate Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (CEIL) was passed in 1952 to control the official position of the country's Palestinian minority. The large majority of those who had become refugees were effectively denationalized under the terms of this law.

The CEIL (in conjunction with a later amendment) served initially to regulate the legal status of the country's existing Palestinian population—those who remained in Israel after 1948. This Palestinian minority became citizens through naturalization and a mechanism that granted permanent residence and citizenship in Israel to those defined as non-Jewish aliens. The CEIL, however, limited the scope of family reunification to spouses, parents, and minor children. Very few refugees from 1948, mainly some dependent elderly persons and minor children, succeeded in making their way back home under this law.

Israel's 1967 OCCUPATION of the Palestinian WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP resulted in the reunification of historic Palestine and gave rise to a reintegration of previously separated hamula (clans). This resulted in a growing number of marriages between Palestinian citizens of Israel and Palestinian residents of the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT) as well as between citizens and Palestinians living in other Arab states. The non-citizen spouses of Palestinian citizens of Israel were required to apply for family reunification and could become naturalized as citizens under the Naturalization Articles 5–8 of the Citizenship and Entry into Israel Law (1952).

Virtually all articles of the CEIL give power of discretion to the minister of interior. The minister's discretion is limited only by precedent-setting ISRAELI SUPREME COURT rulings based on the non-discrimination clause in Israel's DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, the BASIC LAW on Human Dignity and Liberty (1992), and by the requirement, under the law, that decisions must be reasonable. However, the minister can issue decisions without explanation; the burden of proof that a decision is discriminatory or unreasonable lies with the applicant at the appeal level.

From 1952 until 1992, marriage in itself was not considered a sufficient reason for granting family reunification. Numerous applications by Palestinian noncitizens were rejected; rejections were usually followed by the DEPORTATION from Israel of the noncitizen spouse, including parents of minor children. The discretion and power held by the minister of interior gave rise to arbitrary decisions and corruption, with the result that family reunification was often denied in order to punish citizen spouses alleged to be a “security threat” by Israeli intelligence agencies.

According to Israeli Interior Ministry figures, between 1993 and 2002, some 22,000 family reunification requests were approved inside Israel. The collapse of the political negotiations with the PLO in 2000 and the start of the second Palestinian uprising in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES created the conditions for an unprecedented public campaign against the Palestinian minority within Israel. Israeli officials and MEDIA widely depicted Palestinian citizens as a threat to both state “security” and the Jewish character of Israel, and alleged that Palestinians who had obtained permanent residency via marriage and family reunification were involved in TERRORIST acts.

To counteract the supposed threat, a policy change came first in 2002 with a temporary ministerial decree freezing all applications for residency that involved Palestinian residents of the Occupied Territories, followed by an amendment to the 1952 CEIL. This amendment, temporarily enacted in July 2003 and approved by the Knesset in May 2005, prohibits the granting of family reunification to Palestinians from the Occupied Territories who are married to Israeli citizens or permanent residents with the exception of Palestinian women above the age of twenty-five and Palestinian men above the age of thirty-five, who may apply. It is estimated that the amendment will effectively limit the number of Palestinians from the Occupied Territories who can receive permanent residency or citizenship in Israel to only some 200 to 250 annually.

Palestinians in the Occupied Territory since 1967

Since 1967, Israel has maintained exclusive control over Palestinians in the Occupied Territories, including the granting of status (resident/citizen) through family reunification. Neither the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP) between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) nor ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in 2005 has resulted in the transfer of relevant powers to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA).

Access to family reunification is an important need in the Palestinian WEST BANK and GAZA STRIP, where some 800,000 persons are (descendants of) Palestinian refugees since the 1967 Occupation, and displacement/out-migration continues to be as high as 2 percent yearly. The only means for nonresident spouses and children to obtain legal resident status is under regulations and policies set by Israel's military government in the Occupied Territories. During most of the forty-two years of Occupation, Israel has set these regulations and policies in a unilateral manner.

Between 1967 and 1990, Israel's military regulations considered the indigenous Palestinian inhabitants of the Occupied Territories as “resident aliens” with no option for citizenship. Moreover, only those present and included in Israel's 1967 census in the Occupied Territories were considered residents. Individuals away at university, employed elsewhere, or even just visiting relatives outside the Occupied Territories were denied residency status even if they had lived there all their lives.

Descendants of residents were issued resident status if they were registered within the short time period required under military regulations. Children of a resident father and a nonresident mother could initially receive resident status. However, in 1987, Israel changed the law to require a resident mother. This change dramatically increased the number of unregistered children in the Occupied Territories, because most “mixed marriages” involved male Palestinian residents and female nonresidents. The status of resident alien did not convey a right to live in the Occupied Territories. Although resident aliens were generally permitted to leave—Israel's “open bridge policy” with JORDAN encouraged the departure of large numbers—but return to the Occupied Territories required a valid return visa, which is issued at the discretion of the Israeli authorities. Without such a visa, resident status in the Occupied Territories is revoked. It is estimated that some 100,000 Palestinian students and workers in Arab states without diplomatic relations with Israel failed to retain a valid return visa and were required to follow the family reunification process to return to their families in the Occupied Territories.

Marriage and separation due to armed conflict were not considered sufficient grounds for family reunification, and the military administration did not publish its criteria for establishing entitlement. Waiting periods for decisions could extend over years, and no effective appeal mechanisms were in place. As a result many Palestinians who had obtained temporary visitors' PERMITS to the Occupied Territories avoided applying for family reunification—which could be submitted only after their departure from the country—and stayed on without permission.

As part of its efforts to subdue the first Palestinian INTIFADA in 1989, Israel deported more than 200 nonresident Palestinians from the West Bank for “staying illegally.” Most were nonresident women married to residents and their unregistered children. These deportations triggered concerted legal action by Palestinian and Israeli human rights organizations and lawyers. In response, on 22 August 1993, Israel issued a new policy whereby foreign spouses of residents can apply for family reunification. In addition to humanitarian reasons and public interest, first-degree family relationships would henceforth be regarded as valid grounds for granting permanent residence. With an annual quota of 2,000 permits for permanent residence, spouses would be granted the largest number. Although not expressly stated, it was understood that this policy would also apply to minor children, although Israel fixed the age limit at sixteen years. In addition, applicants for family reunification had to remain abroad until the end of the application process. Special policies designed for spouses and minor children who had entered the Occupied Territories before 31 August 1993, including those who had been deported, were allowed six-month renewable visitors’ permits and entitlements to permanent residency.

The period between 1991 and 2000 marks the only time Israel departed from its unilateralism and engaged in multilateral and bilateral arrangements regarding Palestinian family reunification. At the 1991 MADRID CONFERENCE and in subsequent sessions of the Multilateral Refugee Working Group (RWG), Israel’s family reunification policies came under international scrutiny. At the same time (between 1992 and 1996), local human rights organizations contributed to efforts by the parties in RWG, in particular the French Emissary on Family Reunification and the Jordanian-Palestinian team, to bring Israel’s policy closer to the standards set by international law. However, no tangible results were achieved. Negotiations in the multilateral RWG broke down in 1995 and effectively ceased in 1996 when Arab delegations boycotted the meetings to protest the Israeli government’s opening of the underground HASMONEAN TUNNEL in the area of the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF, the third holiest site in Islam.

By that time the PLO and Israel had signed the 1993 Declaration of Principles (DOP). Interested in the establishment of a PNA with limited autonomy but with a major role in protecting Israel’s security, public administration, and services; Israel agreed to two subsequent interim agreements: GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT I (1994) and the INTERIM AGREEMENT (1995), which had special relevance for Palestinian residency rights and family reunification. Both incorporated Israel’s 1993 policy on family reunification guaranteeing the resident status of Palestinians lawfully present in the Occupied Territories and their children, and providing for the establishment of several special mechanisms to address urgent residency issues and needs. These included a Joint Committee to find redress for Palestinians whose resident status had been revoked by Israel in the past and a special mechanism for the repatriation of Palestinian personnel requested on behalf of the PNA. The Joint Committee, however, never became operational. Issues regarding repatriation of persons displaced in the 1967 WAR were to be resolved in a four-party Continuing Committee (PLO, EGYPT, Jordan, and Israel) established under the DOP and by the peace agreement between Jordan and Israel (1994). The Continuing Committee held several sessions between 1995 and 1997 but failed to achieve tangible results.

The major challenge for family reunification in this period was the complexity of Israeli-Palestinian regulations on civil affairs established under the interim agreements. Israel retained control over the entry of people into the Occupied Territories, family reunification, and the approval of Palestinian IDENTITY CARDS and travel documents, even in the PNA self-rule areas. All previously existing channels for direct legal redress with Israel’s courts were replaced in 1994–1995 by a system of Israeli-Palestinian coordination: on the Palestinian side mainly through coordination offices among the PNA Ministry of Civil Affairs and other PNA ministries, which were mandated to operate as an intermediary between the Palestinian population and the Israeli authorities; on the Israeli side, the Israeli Regional District Coordination Offices (DCOs) took the place of the former regional headquarters of Israel’s military government’s civil affairs branches. Coordinating the Israeli-Palestinian transition took time and was accompanied by frequent disputes over the interpretation and application of the signed agreements.

The delay in implementing family reunification procedures resulted in a huge backlog of applications. By May 1997 the PNA Ministry of Civil Affairs in the West Bank, for example, had compiled some 10,000 requests, of which only 1,700 were considered by Israel. Applicants were forced to deal with Palestinian authorities that lacked power relative to Israel in deciding such matters. The bilateral bargaining over their cases at the regional DCOs violated standards of due process and transparency. Soon the whole mechanism of family reunification became a tool for the stronger party to exert political pressure on the weaker in the context of massive asymmetries of power between Israel and the Palestinians, and to punish both the PNA and its population.

Moreover, by this time the bilateral Israeli-Palestinian family reunification procedure set up under the OSLO PROCESS was already in essence defunct when all official coordination was halted in 2001 in response to the failed peace talks and renewed violence in the Occupied Territories. As of 2009, Israel has approved several thousand applications for family reunification as part of a goodwill gesture that aims to strengthen the FATAH-led PNA in the occupied West Bank. However, all regular procedures regarding family reunification and visitors' permits to the Occupied Territories remain suspended, and Israel follows a more restrictive visa policy also for persons holding a passport from a non-Arab country. Thousands of nonresident spouses and other close relatives of Palestinian residents in the Occupied West Bank are thus staying "illegally." With the movement of persons tightly controlled by Israel's military CHECKPOINTS and permit system, such illegal persons have little chance to find employment and essentially remain confined to their homes.

Since its unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in the summer of 2005, Israel has retained control over the population registry (a huge database of information on persons living in Gaza) and the granting of legal resident status to Palestinians in this area. In line with the policy of boycotting the Hamas-led PNA in the Gaza Strip, no mechanism is in place for family reunification, nor has Israel approved any permits. In 2009, Israel had retained its status as occupying power of the Gaza Strip and continued to block the movement of persons and goods from and to the area in violation of its obligation to ensure access—at least humanitarian access.

Occupied Eastern Jerusalem: A Special Case

During the 1967 War, when Israel seized East JERUSALEM it constituted an area of some 6 square kilometers. Immediately after the war, Israel annexed some 70 square kilometers to the municipal boundaries of what was then West Jerusalem and imposed Israeli law there. These annexed territories included not only the part of Jerusalem that had been under Jordanian rule, but also an additional 64 square kilometers, most of which had belonged to twenty-eight Palestinian villages in the West Bank, and part of which belonged to the municipalities of BETHLEHEM and Beit Jala. Israel made every effort to exclude the residents of the land it confiscated.

In setting the BORDERS, Israel's objective was to strengthen Israeli sovereignty over the city by creating a decisive Jewish majority. Demographic considerations have been behind almost all of Israel's policies toward the Palestinians in the city. After the annexation, Israel conducted a census in these areas and granted permanent residency status to residents in the annexed areas present at the time the census was taken. Persons not present in the city for whatever reason forever lost their right to reside in Jerusalem. Permanent residents were permitted, if they wished and met certain conditions, to receive Israeli citizenship. These conditions included swearing allegiance to the state, proving that they were not citizens of any other country, and showing some knowledge of Hebrew. For political reasons, most of the residents did not request Israeli citizenship.

B'TSELEM comments on the situation of Palestinians in East Jerusalem: "Israel treats Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem as immigrants who live in their homes at the beneficence of the authorities and not by right. The authorities maintain this policy although these Palestinians were born in Jerusalem, lived in the city, and have no other home. Treating these Palestinians as foreigners who entered Israel is astonishing, since it was Israel that entered East Jerusalem in 1967."

Based on a broad political consensus, all Israeli governments have striven for permanent control and sovereignty over eastern Jerusalem. Domestic Israeli law was extended over the expanded eastern Jerusalem, resulting in its legal and administrative separation from the rest of the Occupied Territories, which were under Israeli military rule. The 66,000 Palestinian Jerusalemites recorded by a census in the annexed area were classified as resident aliens—"permanent residents of Israel" under the CEIL. A special Inter-Ministerial Committee on Jerusalem was formed to design policies that would transform the occupied Arab-Palestinian part of the city into an integral part of Israel's capital. This committee determined, among other things, that the Palestinian population in Jerusalem was to remain at a steady ratio of no more than 20 to 28 percent of the total in the city.

The CEIL has been applied to eastern Jerusalem with a twofold aim: to curb the growth of the Palestinian population in the city and to enforce the separation of Jerusalem's Palestinians from those living in the rest of the West Bank. Because family reunification became the only mechanism by which West Bank residents could obtain permission to live in the city, Israel would not permit, from 1967 until 1994, female Palestinian residents to submit family reunification applications for their nonresident husbands. From 1982 until the mid-1990s, Israel's Interior Ministry interpreted Article 12 of the law as precluding registration of children in Jerusalem by their resident Palestinian mothers. Jerusalem-born Palestinian children who were registered according to their father's status in the West Bank lost their natural right to legal status in the city. According to official Israeli sources, Jerusalem resident status was revoked from at least 5,000 Palestinians in the period 1968–1995 because they had failed to retain a valid reentry visa while staying abroad.

The period of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks (1991–2001) was characterized by a deterioration of Palestinian residency rights in Jerusalem. As Israel hoped to assert its claim for sovereignty over the entire city, unilateral Israeli activity intensified and policies were reshaped to strengthen this claim. Masses of Jewish settlers, for example, took over Palestinian homes and created Jewish enclaves in every Palestinian neighborhood.

A new permit system for entry into Israel was installed in 1991–1993 that, for the first time, restricted the physical access of West Bank Palestinians to Jerusalem. Stating that Jerusalem's status was slated for discussion in future FINAL STATUS TALKS, Israel did not apply the 1993 policy on family reunification, including its quota and criteria for eligibility, to Palestinian Jerusalemites. Occupied eastern Jerusalem also remained excluded from the interim agreements reached between Israel and the PLO. Unlike Palestinian residents of the rest of the Occupied Territories, whose right to reside in the territories was protected under the interim agreements, revocation of Palestinian residency rights in Jerusalem increased dramatically based on a 1995 reinterpretation of the 1952 CEIL and the 1974 Entry into Israel Regulations.

To claim Palestinian residency rights, the new policy required proof of a "center of life in Jerusalem" (that is, a person must have lived and worked in Jerusalem for the prior seven years) and papers documenting employment, study, and permanent domicile had to be submitted by Palestinian holders of Jerusalem identity cards in any interaction with the Interior Ministry. For the first time since 1967, failure to prove "center of life" resulted in the revocation of residency rights not only for Palestinians living abroad but also for those who had moved to the West Bank. Between 1995 and 1998, the Jerusalem resident status of some 2,000 Palestinians and their dependents was thus declared "expired," and affected families were left in a legal limbo. Palestinians responded by returning to the city in massive numbers. Israeli authorities decided the policy was counterproductive and subsequently scaled it down but never abolished it.

More recent official and unofficial proposals for dividing sovereignty over the city do not include the basic right to family unity of Palestinians in Jerusalem. Ideas raised at the CAMP DAVID SUMMIT between Israel and the PLO and by US president BILL CLINTON in 2000, as well as the so-called GENEVA ACCORD of 2003 treat Palestinians in Jerusalem as a population that can be separated and diminished by political compromise. In the absence of political compromise, thousands of Palestinians in Jerusalem are separated and displaced by Israel's illegal BARRIER wall, construction of which has largely been completed.

See also DEMOGRAPHY; DEMOGRAPHY AND FOREIGN NATIONALS; JERUSALEM

Bibliography

- Alternative Information Center. The Right to Family Unity. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 1992.
- Amnesty International. Israel and the Occupied Territories: Torn Apart: Families Split by Discriminatory Policies. London: Amnesty International, MDE 15/063/2004.
- B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Family Reunification. 2004. www.btselem.org/English/Family\_Separation/East\_Jerusalem.asp.
- . The Knesset Approves Law to Restrict Family Reunification between Israelis and Palestinians. 2005. www.btselem.org/English/Special/20050728\_Racism\_Law.asp.

- . Legal Status of East Jerusalem and Its Residents. Jerusalem: B'Tselem Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. n.d. http://www.btselem.org/English/Jerusalem/Legal\_Status.asp.
- B'Tselem and HaMoked. Families Torn Apart, Separation of Palestinian Families in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and HaMoked (Center for the Defense of the Individual), July 1999.
- . Forbidden Families: Family Unification and Child Registration in East Jerusalem. 2004. www.btselem.org/download/200401\_Forbidden\_Families\_Eng.rtf.
- . Perpetual Limbo: Israel's Freeze on the Unification of Patrilineal Families in the Occupied Territories. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and HaMoked, 2006.
- . The Quiet Deportation Continues: Revocation of Residency and Denial of Social Rights to East Jerusalem Palestinians. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and HaMoked, September 1998.
- . The Quiet Deportation: Revocation of Residency of Palestinians in East Jerusalem. Jerusalem: B'Tselem and HaMoked, 1997.
- BADIL—Alternative Information Center. Exposed Realities: Palestinian Residency Rights in the "Self Rule Areas" Three Years after Partial Israeli Redeployment. Bethlehem: BADIL, 1997.
- BADIL Resource Center. Eviction from Jerusalem. Bethlehem: BADIL Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights, 1999.
- Human Rights Watch, International Commission of Jurists, and Amnesty International. Letter to Members of the Knesset, 22 May 2005. <http://hrw.org/english/docs/2005/05/23/isrlpa11000.htm>.
- Israeli Interior Ministry. "According to Figures, Some 22,000 Family Reunification Requests Were Approved inside Israel between 1993 and 2002." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 5 January 2002 and 9 January 2002.
- Israeli-Palestinian Coalition of Human Rights Organizations for Family Reunification. "Family Reunification Criteria and Procedures." Unpublished memorandum. Jerusalem, December 1993.
- Kossaifi, George F. The Palestinian Refugees and the Right of Return. Washington, DC: The Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine, 1996.
- Kruger, Martha. "Israel: Balancing Demographics in the Jewish State." Washington, DC: Migration Policy Institute, 2005.
- Krystall, Nathan. Urgent Issues of Palestinian Residency in Jerusalem. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 1994.
- Mac Allister, Karine, and Ingrid Jaradat Gassner, eds. Survey of Palestinian Refugees and Internally Displaced Persons 2006–2007. Bethlehem: BADIL Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights, 2007.
- Palestinian Delegation to the Intercessional Meeting of the Refugee Working Group on Family Reunification. Status of Family Reunification Issues—Achievements and Problems. Unpublished report. Paris, November 1994.
- Pederson, Jon, Sara Randal, and Marwan Khawaja, eds. Growing Fast, the Palestinian Population in the West Bank and Gaza Strip since 1967. Norway: FAFO Institute for Applied Social Science, 2001.
- Peretz, Don. Israel and the Palestine Arabs. Washington, DC: The Middle East Institute, 1959.
- Rempel, Terry. "Housing and Property Restitution: The Palestinian Case." In Returning Home: Housing and Property Restitution Rights of Refugees and Displaced Persons. Edited by Scott Leckie. Ardsley, NY: Transnational Publishers, 2003.
- Tamari, Salim. Palestinian Refugee Negotiations: From Madrid to Oslo II. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1996.
- Tsemel, Lea, and Ingrid Jaradat Gassner. The Trap Is Closing on Palestinian Jerusalemites. Jerusalem: Alternative Information Center, 1996.

—Ingrid Jaradat Gassner

Farsoun, Samih K. (1937–2005)

Samih Farsoun was a Palestinian intellectual, professor, and activist. Born in HAIFA, Palestine, he completed his secondary studies at Beirut's International College. He received a B.S. in Physics and Mathematics from Hamilton College in 1959 and an M.A. and a Ph.D. in sociology in 1971 from the University of Connecticut.

Farsoun spent most of his professional life at the American University in Washington, D.C., where he was a popular teacher, helped to found the Arab Studies Program, and shouldered numerous administrative responsibilities. Outside the university Farsoun made his mark as well. He was president of the Association of Arab-American University Graduates; a founding fellow of the Middle East Studies Association; and a founding member of both The Jerusalem Fund for Education and Community Development and its Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine, as well as the Institute of Arab Studies. He was also a founder of MERIP (Middle East Report and Information Project) and an editor of its journal, Merip Reports, and a founder of the Trans-Arab Research Institute.

Farsoun played a leading role in establishing two universities in the Arab world: American University of Sharjah in the United Arab Emirates, where he was the founding dean of the College of Arts and Sciences from 1997 to 1999, and American University of Kuwait in KUWAIT, where in 2004 he was named founding dean of academic affairs and the College of Arts and Sciences.

Farsoun published six books and over seventy-five papers, book chapters, and articles about the sociology and politics of the Middle East, many of which have been translated into several languages. His Palestine and the Palestinians (1997), the most renowned of all his works, was a sociological history that focused on the political economy of the Palestinian people from the end of the nineteenth century until the present. His most recent book, Culture and Customs of Palestine (2004), was intended to introduce US high school students to the rich culture of the Palestinians.

—Naseer Aruri

Fatah

Fatah, or Fath (conquest or victory, the reverse acronym of Harakat al-Tahir al-Watani al-Filastini, a name used by early Muslim armies), is the largest Palestinian organization and the major political force within the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). Fatah was founded in the late 1950s (probably in 1959, although some accounts put the date as October 1957; in fact, the exact date is not certain). The first issue of its official publication, Filastinuna (Our Palestine), appeared in late 1959 and was widely and well received. Fatah filled a gap in Palestinian political culture at a time when many Palestinians yearned for a purely Palestinian national project and a Palestinian national agenda—as opposed to the pan-Arab nationalist movements of the time. Fatah's assertion of Palestinian nationalism was, at least initially, a polite protest against Egyptian president JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR, who had monopolized the rhetoric about Palestine and any actions taken on behalf of the Palestinian cause in the Arab world.

Fatah was founded by Palestinian professionals who were residing in the Gulf States, many of them in KUWAIT, where YASIR ARAFAT and his comrades were located after their exile from Palestine in 1948. The early founders included SALAH KHALAF (Abu Iyad), KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad), KHALID AL-HASAN (who did not join until 1959), YUSIF AL-MUHAMMAD NAJJAR (Abu Yusif), and KAMAL 'UDWAN. Arafat had been a student leader in Cairo after the Nakba (the 1948 Palestinian exodus) and later obtained a job as an engineer in Kuwait, where he and other colleagues, many of whom had known each other from their student days in EGYPT, organized the group. Some of the founders had modest military experience because of their participation in commando activities in GAZA sponsored by the Egyptian military going back to 1955. From its outset the movement bore the imprint of Arafat, who remained almost synonymous with Fatah even after his death.

The movement quickly founded branches in Egypt, LEBANON, JORDAN, SYRIA, SAUDI ARABIA, Qatar, and the WEST BANK and GAZA. Membership requirements were not especially stringent, which in part explains the movement's inflation in size.

Ideology and Organization

Fatah never produced a clear ideology beyond the vague notion of liberating Palestine or Palestinian nationalism. In part this was due to Arafat's aversion to being pinned down politically, but the result was a hodge-podge of political thought, vague and changing purposes, and empty slogans—for example, "All Rifles against the Zionist Enemy." Fatah also waited until 1968 to formulate the "Principles and Goals of the Fath Movement," a document that is considered its constitution, which was ratified throughout subsequent years into the 1980s.

The political program of Fatah stressed three principles: (1) the liberation of Palestine (which at the time referred to the liberation of all of historic Palestine), (2) the pursuit of ARMED STRUGGLE as the method of liberation (a principle shared by all Palestinian political groups in the early years), and (3) independence from any regime—Arab or other. The last principle was quickly violated, however, as many of the founders of Fatah established close ties to different Arab regimes. But Arafat skillfully positioned the founders and their varying loyalties among different Arab regimes so that no one regime would have sole control.

The highest body of the organization is the FATAH CENTRAL COMMITTEE; two-thirds of its members are elected by the General Congress. The second most powerful body is the FATAH REVOLUTIONARY COUNCIL, which comprises the commanders of forces, regions, and security services. Theoretically, the General Congress is the highest and most authoritative body of the movement and, according to the constitution, should convene once every four years; however, in practice neither has been followed. The organization is also divided into various social sectors, including students, artists, writers, and women.

Fatah was represented in the first PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC) in 1964, although not until 1968 (and officially 1969) did it come to dominate and shape the PLO. In 1969 Fatah officially headed the PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, but other groups had seats on it as well. In that period Fatah, like other groups, opposed what were considered “defeatist solutions”—proposals for settling the Arab-Israeli conflict based on UN SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 242—because the UN resolution does not mention self-determination or a Palestinian state. Indeed, Nasir’s acceptance of the 1969 ROGERS PLAN opened a deep rift between the movement and the Egyptian regime, which led to the closure of the Palestinian radio station in Cairo.

The early period of Fatah (until 1968) was characterized by an extreme emphasis on secrecy; even pictures of the founders were not permitted to be publicized. Arafat was known to distribute leaflets and announcements of Fatah to Lebanese newspapers in Beirut, but the use of code names for members, such as “Abu X,” was standard, although later many of the real names of the leaders were widely known, as were their faces.

Emergence of Armed Struggle

Operating underground, in the early years Fatah focused on organizing cells, military recruitment, and fund-raising, and it was successful in husbanding Palestinian resources scattered throughout the Arab world. Its moment of glory came in January 1965, when, under the name of AL-‘ASIFA (a military offshoot of Fatah), Fatah claimed responsibility for a (foiled) attack on Israel’s National Water Carrier. Arafat’s personality was reflected in his announcement of the raid, which was both bombastic and bragging. This became characteristic of Fatah’s claims of “armed struggle”—wild exaggerations and bold assertions not always based on reality. The date of the attack is celebrated by Fatah as the birth of the movement, and it is marked annually by Fatah supporters around the world.

This first operation began a new phase in the history of the movement, especially because it fulfilled a psychological need among the Palestinians: angry REFUGEES were disgusted with the exploitation of their cause by a variety of Arab regimes and wanted to take action themselves. Arafat quickly emerged as Fatah’s leader and its official spokesperson, although he was not the autocratic leader that he later became, and new recruits flocked to the movement. Although Fatah’s constitution provided for a collective leadership, eventually Arafat was able to outmaneuver and outsmart his rivals through a variety of means, some quite unsavory.

Fatah continued to grow, especially after the March 1968 AL-KARAMA conflict when the Jordanian army and a small band of Fatah guerrillas stood their ground in a battle with Israeli forces in the town in Jordan near the Israeli border. Although they were defeated, Arafat exploited their bravery for propaganda and recruitment purposes, and thousands of new members joined the movement. This came after the humiliating defeat of the Arab states by Israel in the 1967 WAR, when Palestinians and other Arabs were searching for an alternative model of liberation. In hindsight, however, some Fatah leaders, Abu Iyad and HANI AL-HASAN for example, realized that the influx of thousands of new recruits could open a security breach, allowing Israel and Arab regimes to place their operatives in key positions in the movement.

Jordanian Chapter

Karama also initiated the Fatah movement’s Jordanian operation and simultaneously opened relations with several important states, including CHINA, Vietnam, and Algeria. These relations in turn inspired a new Arab version of guerrilla warfare—one that included political recognition and economic and military support to some extent. Later, Arafat expanded the movement’s international ties and restored those with the Egyptian regime, which had been cool during Nasir’s rule due to his monopoly of the rhetoric regarding the Palestinian cause in the Arab world, while he did nothing for the Palestinians, and his acceptance of the 1969 Rogers Plan based on UN Resolution 242, which ignored the Palestinian interests of self-determination and an independent Palestinian state. Later, Egypt had several things to offer the Palestinians, including introduction to the Soviets, and therefore relations warmed for a time. When Arafat was forced to leave Lebanon in 1982 (in the context of Israel’s war in Lebanon), he went first to Egypt, where he was welcomed warmly by HOSNI MUBARAK.

Some members of the Fatah leadership established strong contacts with oil-rich Arab regimes, especially Saudi Arabia, which provided significant financial resources to the movement. This financing (largely garnered through Hani Hasan and Khalid Hasan, who had an influential role within Fatah) led to a reduction in the revolutionary zeal of Fatah (at least among the political elite); served to empower Arafat, who used the money to buy support and punish rivals; and ultimately led to extensive corruption within the top echelons of the movement.

Within Jordan the Fatah movement, adhering to a long-standing policy, was not eager for a confrontation with the regime. Other groups within the PLO (mainly the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE (PFLP) pursued a policy of attempting to overthrow the monarchy, but Fatah counseled caution and accommodation. Nevertheless, the lack of discipline that characterized Fatah led to many excesses by PLO fighters, which together with rash actions by other groups (especially the PFLP) were used by the Jordanian regime to mobilize public opinion and its BEDOUIN army against the Palestinian military presence. The Jordanian regime was not acting independently however; its 1970–1971 suppression of the PLO (BLACK SEPTEMBER) reflected interests that stretched from Amman to Damascus, Cairo, Tel Aviv, and all the way to the UNITED STATES.

The Jordanian war against the PLO left a deep mark on the Palestinian national movement. Palestinian fighters fled Jordan in disbelief, resentment, and anger, although some left with the desire to engage in self-criticism over their behavior in Jordan. Shortly thereafter, ABU IYAD, with Arafat's blessing, founded the ultrasecretive BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION (BSO), which was intended to be a clandestine military arm of Fatah that would take revenge on the enemies of the Palestinians, especially the accomplices of the Jordanian regime in Black September. Although there were operational commanders, Abu Iyad was the ultimate authority; he designed, planned, and recruited the fighters for various missions. The BSO was founded at a time when Palestinians in the refugee camps were demanding action. Not only had Jordan expelled the PLO, but Israeli forces were consolidating their OCCUPATION of the West Bank and Gaza and regularly bombing the refugee camps in Lebanon. But the deadly results (not necessarily intended) of the 1973 attack on the US embassy in Khartoum, Sudan, began to increase the pressures on the movement to cease the activities of the BSO. Officially and publicly Fatah denied any link to BSO.

Lebanese Experience

After the Jordanian debacle, Fatah and the other Palestinian factions relocated to Lebanon. There the movement continued to grow, and Arafat built the infrastructure for statehood, although he did not seek to establish an alternative regime in Lebanon, as claimed by the leaders of the right-wing Lebanese militias. But Fatah was incoherent ideologically and fragmented organizationally into different sections or camps (called dakakin, or shops), and each had its own head and a different patron among the Arab regimes (or even outside the Arab world). FAROUQ AL-QADDUMI's faction of Fatah was close to the Syrian regime; the right-wing faction, led by Khalid Hasan, was close to Saudi Arabia and Kuwait; 'ALI HASAN SALAMAH was close to the United States; and the Islamist faction, led by ABU JIHAD, was close to the Algerian regime, at least in the beginning. ABU NIDAL was linked to the IRAQI regime before he split from the PLO and formed his separate organization, known as FATAH REVOLUTIONARY COUNCIL.

During the time in Lebanon, Arafat began to gradually introduce the idea of accepting a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict—the TWO-STATE SOLUTION, which was a departure from the Palestinian movement's original commitment to liberate Palestine, followed by the idea of a secular democratic state in Palestine. This transformation had its roots in the 1974 PNC meeting when Arafat first put the idea before his colleagues, having already begun raising it in Fatah's fora and councils, although the Fatah movement relied first on the DEMOCRATIC FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE to argue for and publicly theorize the concept of both Israeli and Palestinian states.

The Lebanese Civil War sapped the energy and resources of the PLO, but it also allowed for the creation of a massive infrastructure, both civilian and military. Hospitals, clinics, factories, farms, syndicates, newspapers, publishing houses, and military barracks and bases were all part of the PLO infrastructure in Lebanon. This required the continued influx of massive funding, and the oil-rich Arab Gulf regimes were willing to fund Fatah in return for political support from Arafat, the PLO's acceptance of the two-state solution, and the protection of those regimes from radical Palestinian factions.

Unlike other PLO organizations, Fatah genuinely tried to avoid being embroiled in the Lebanese Civil War, but certain factions within Fatah (NIMR SALIH, or Abu Saleh, and Abu Iyad, in particular) thought otherwise and armed certain groups in Lebanon to help bring about the defeat of the right-wing militias. To protect the right-wing militias from ultimate defeat, the Syrian army intervened in 1976. That chapter in Syrian-PLO relations marked a turning point; relations between Syrian president Hafez Al-Asad and Yasir Arafat soured and never recovered, because Syria, a traditional supporter of the PLO, entered Lebanon and defeated the PLO and its Lebanese allies. Syria felt this was necessary to avoid Israeli participation in the conflict, which it believed was inevitable if the PLO and its allies defeated the Lebanese rightists. The Syrian regime, however, later made an accommodation with others in the PLO.

Fatah's role continued to grow in Lebanon and elsewhere. Thanks to oil money, Arafat and his comrades turned Fatah into the largest and most influential Palestinian organization in the national movement. Despite infighting and factional struggles within Fatah, Arafat was able to rein in his rivals and to maintain full control of the organization.

Fatah after Lebanon

Fatah's role in Lebanon came to an end in 1982 after the Israeli invasion, when PLO fighters were forced to evacuate the country. The PLO and Fatah relocated to Tunisia, but the base was not the same, the money supply dwindled, and a 1983–1984 split within Fatah threatened the unity of the entire movement. In 1983, in protest against the mismanagement of Lebanon's defense during the Israeli invasion, some important political and military leaders within Fatah (primarily Abu Salih, Abu Khalid Al-'Amlah, and SA'ID MUSA MURAGHA, or Abu Musa) split from the movement and established their own organization, FATAH UPRISING. Their movement received direct Syrian support and declared war on Arafat's leadership. Syrian-sponsored Palestinian groups fought Arafat and his supporters in the refugee camps of Nahr al-Bared and Bedawi and in Tripoli. In 1985, Syria also triggered the CAMPS' WAR, which was intended to suppress Arafat's supporters in the Lebanon camps. The campaign ended in a stalemate, and the Syrian regime was never able to establish its own favorite Palestinian organizations as alternatives to Arafat within the PLO.

Fatah was dealt a severe blow in 1988 when Abu Jihad was assassinated by an Israeli team in Tunisia; and in 1991, Abu Iyad and Abu Al-Hawl were assassinated by agents of Abu Nidal, although there were accusations that they were working on behalf of Israeli intelligence. Moreover, the movement lost much of its financial support in 1990 when it sided with Iraqi president Saddam Husayn during the GULF WAR against Kuwait, alienating Gulf governments. For the rest of his life Arafat attempted to make amends with the Saudi government, but it never again trusted him. This was the context in which Arafat signed the OSLO ACCORDS and moved to Palestine, after which the nature of Fatah changed.

The old leaders were either killed, had died naturally, or stayed behind. Farouq al-Qaddumi (one of the few surviving leaders in Fatah and technically the most senior Fatah leader after the death of Arafat) did not support Oslo and remained in Tunisia. Arafat selected the new leaders of Fatah, some of whom had ties to other governments and had developed ambitions of their own. The new leaders of Fatah included MAHMUD ABBAS (Abu Mazen), who was one of the founding members of Fatah; MARWAN AL-BARGHUTHI, a West Bank politician; and MUHAMMAD DAHLAN, a Gazan political activist from the First INTIFADA. The 11 November 2004 death of Arafat put the movement in the hands of this new leadership, and Fatah became a close ally of the United States, which favored the new Fatah leaders in the Palestinian ELECTIONS. However, the corruption, cronyism, and nepotism that had marred the history of Fatah produced stunning election results, bringing the Islamist HAMAS to power.

By 2008, Fatah was a fractured amalgam of coalitions and personal networks without a clear head or a transparent decisionmaking process. The Fatah General Congress—the supreme body within the movement empowered to select the two governing party organs, the Central Committee and the Revolutionary Council—had not met since 1989. As a result, the most powerful elements of the formal party apparatus remained the preserve of those who, prior to the formation of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) in 1994, directed the PLO from exile in Tunis. During the long tenure of Yasir Arafat as head of Fatah, chairman of the PLO, and president of the PNA, the party's various committees and councils, with no real authority, were reduced to instruments of personal gain. Arafat again and again put off convening the Congress in the name of national unity, despite vociferous demands from the Fatah Higher Movement Committee, led by the veterans of the 1987–1991 Intifada, as well as other groups.

Bibliography

- Abu Iyad with Eric Rouleau. My Home My Land. New York: Times Books, 1981.
- AbuKhalil, As'ad. "Biography of Khalil al-Wazir (Abu Jihad)." In Encyclopedia of the Palestinians. Edited by Philip Mattar. New York: Facts on File, 2000.
- . "The Conflict without Arafat." San Francisco Gate. 9 November 2004.
- . "The Demise of the Fatah Movement." Counterpunch. 28–29 January 2006.
- . "Yasir Arafat and the Palestinian National Movement: An Interview with As'ad Abu Khalil." Conducted by Jon Elmer. MIFTA. 26 January 2005.
- Amos, John. Palestinian Resistance: Organization of a Nationalist Movement. New York: Pergamon Press, 1980.
- Blecher, Robert. "Broken Ranks in the Palestinian National Movement." Middle East Report. 1 January 2006.
- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Cobban, Helena. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Gresh, Alan. The PLO: The Struggle Within. London: Zed Press, 1985.
- Hart, Alan. Arafat: A Political Biography. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- . Arafat: Terrorist or Peacemaker? Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984.
- Hirst, David. The Gun and the Olive Branch. London: Faber and Faber, 1977.
- Khalil Husayn, Hasan. Abu Iyad. Amman, Jordan: Matba' al-Dustur, 1991.
- Al-Rayyis, Riyad Najib, and Dunya Habin Nahhas. Al-Massar al-Sa'b: Al-Muqawama al-Filastiniyya. (The Difficult Path: The Palestinian Resistance). Beirut: Dar al-Nahar, 1976.
- Rubinstein, Danny. The Mystery of Arafat. South Royalton, VT: Steerforth Press, 1995.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Shikaki, Khalil. "Palestinians Divided: Old Guard, Young Guard." Foreign Affairs. 81:1 (January–February 2002).
- Ya'ari, Ehud. Strike Terror: The Story of Fatah. New York: Sabra, 1970.
- Yusuf, Samir. Abu Jihad. Cairo, Egypt: al-Markaz al-Misri al-Arabi, 1989.

—As'ad AbuKhalil

Fatah Central Committee

The Fatah Central Committee is the most powerful body within the institutional structure of FATAH. Despite this de facto status, since its founding toward the end of the 1950s, Fatah has stressed the collective nature, or "democratic centralism," of its leadership. Consistent with this principle, Article 63.d of the Organic Law stipulates that "all the members of the Central Committee (CC) are equal in rights, duties and responsibilities." Thus, while the CC has a secretary and two deputy secretaries "chosen from among its members" (Article 64), there is no legal provision for a president, though Article 63.e indicates that "the commander-in-chief presides over the Central Committee meetings and leads its sessions." Additionally, according to its statutes the Fatah Central Committee is no more than the executive instrument of the General Congress, which in principle is the supreme authority of the movement, made up of members of the Fatah Revolutionary Council (RC), regional congresses, military forces, mass organizations, and so on. Between sessions of the Congress, which counted 1,200 members when it was convened in 1998, the "supreme authority" is the 120-member RC.

Over time, however, the Fatah CC succeeded in monopolizing almost all the organization's powers—indeed, the General Congress, which is supposed to meet every four years, has not met since 1989. The CC has three categories of members. According to Article 63 of the statutes, eighteen members are directly elected by secret ballot by the General Congress while three others are named by these eighteen elected members by a two-thirds majority. The RC has the right to nominate an unspecified number of other members to represent the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES. Article 65 requires that candidates for Fatah CC have been members of the movement "for at least fifteen consecutive years and to have served as secretary of a regional committee or an equivalent function in the various departments and forces."

YASIR ARAFAT, often billed as the head of Fatah, legally had exactly the same status as all the other members of Fatah's Central Committee, which according to Article 67 of the Organic Law is "collectively in charge of all the movement's activities." In practice, however, in his capacity as commander of Fatah's armed forces AL-'ASIFA, Arafat could and did claim primacy among his peers. Nonetheless, the title no longer has much meaning since al-'Asifa was dissolved in March 1990 within FORCE 17 (the Presidential Guard) recruited from the PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY. Arafat indeed dominated the CC, but it is unlikely that MAHMUD ABBAS or any other Palestinian official will ever wield as much power.

Bibliography

- Brynen, Rex. Sanctuary and Survival: The PLO in Lebanon. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Cobban, Helena. 1983. The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Gresh, Alain. The PLO: The Struggle Within: Towards an Independent Palestinian State, revised ed. London: Zed Books, 1987.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Schultz, Helen. The Reconstruction of Palestinian Nationalism: Between Revolution and State-hood. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press, 1999.
- Shikaki, Khalil. "Palestinians Divided: Old Guard, Young Guard." Foreign Affairs. 81:1 (January–February 2002).

Fatah Hawks

Fatah Hawks is the name of two Palestinian militant groups, one a popular movement of Palestinian youth in the WEST BANK and GAZA in the 1980s, the other an unofficial group of FATAH fighters, loosely tied to the parent Palestinian organization that has carried out attacks against Israeli military personnel in the Gaza Strip during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA.

During the First INTIFADA that started in 1987, the Hawks were led by young Palestinians in the large cities of NABLUS, Tulkarm, Ramallah, and BETHLEHEM in the West Bank, and Gaza City and Khan Yunis in the Gaza Strip. Most of their attacks were carried out using improvised weapons: stone-throwing, stabbing attacks, and occasionally the use of stolen firearms. The amount of weaponry they received from PLO sources outside of Israel was negligible, and most of their successes, such as they were, were in the use of stabbing attacks or roadside ambushes of Israeli soldiers in the occupied Palestinian territory.

In 1995 YASIR ARAFAT dissolved the Fatah Hawks, but they reemerged with the outbreak of the al-Aqsa Intifada by claiming joint responsibility with HAMAS for an attack on the RAFAH CROSSING, the Israeli military-controlled Egyptian border with Gaza, which resulted in five Israeli soldiers being killed and ten others wounded.

Following the death of Yasir Arafat on 11 November 2004, the Fatah Hawks suffered like many other Fatah-based militant groups from increasing Palestinian apathy as the corrupt and old-style Fatah lost public confidence in favor of Hamas.

The number of attacks has decreased. The Fatah Hawks' last activity was in 2005, when Fatah Hawk gunmen blockaded a Palestinian road and prevented PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) officials from passing in protest of not being included in the PNA security system.

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES

Bibliography

- Aboudi, Sami. "Arafat's Former Fatah Hawks Threaten to Rearm Faction." Chicago Sun Times. 25 November 1994.
- Hedges, Chris. "'Fatah Hawks' Impose Order as Israelis Stand by in Gaza." New York Times. 24 December 1993.
- Milton-Edwards, Beverley. "Palestinian State-Building: Police and Citizens as Test of Democracy." British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies. 25:1 (1998).
- Shikaki, Khalil. "Palestinians Divided: Old Guard, Young Guard." Foreign Affairs. 81:1 (January–February 2002).
- Usher, Graham. "The Politics of Internal Security: The PA's New Intelligence Services." Journal of Palestine Studies. 25:2 (1996).

Fatah Revolutionary Council/Black June

The Fatah Revolutionary Council (Fatah al-Qiyadah al-Thawriyyaho, or Fatah-RC) is a Palestinian organization better known as the Abu Nidal Organization, headed by SABRI AL-BANNA (Abu Nidal) and founded in 1974 as a consequence of Abu Nidal's split from FATAH and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). The organization was originally known as Black June, a reference to its disapproval of the Syrian intervention in Lebanon in 1976 on the side of the rightist Christians. When the organization was at its apogee, it had offices in SYRIA, Yemen, IRAN, Sudan, and LEBANON. It was one of the wealthiest Palestinian groups, with income from patron states, assassinations for hire, extortion, and its own network of businesses and front organizations. In its time

Fatah-RC was considered the most dangerous, active, and murderous Palestinian organization. From the beginning of the 1980s, it attacked Jewish, Israeli, Arab, and Western targets. It carried out terrorist operations all over the world, including throughout the Middle East, Asia, South America, and Europe. Its assassinations of Palestinian leaders whom it considered too moderate were legion.

Abu Nidal's break with Fatah and the PLO was the result of his opposition to their political direction (i.e., the TWO-STATE SOLUTION) and their advocacy of negotiations with Israel, promoted by PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT. IRAQ'S support of and influence on the Fatah-RC led Abu Nidal to carry out terrorist operations that served Iraqi interests. Since its founding the organization has considered itself the real Fatah, accusing the leaders of the mainstream Fatah organization of betrayal. In response Arafat and Fatah tried and convicted Abu Nidal in absentia for treason.

The Fatah-RC has also been known as the Arab Revolutionary Council and has often claimed credit for its actions under the names of the Arab Revolutionary Brigades, the Revolutionary Organization of Socialist Muslims (when taking responsibility for attacks on British targets), and Black September (when claiming credit for attacks on Jordanian targets).

At its peak Fatah-RC had about 400 members, plus a few dozen militiamen in the Palestinian REFUGEE camps in Lebanon. The organization claimed that the ARMED STRUGGLE against Israel was a sacred endeavor and the only way to liberate all of Palestine, and that because Fatah and its leaders had betrayed this struggle and the Palestine Charter, they had to be punished. It argued that both inter-Arab and intra-Palestinian TERRORISM was necessary to precipitate an all-embracing Arab revolution that alone could lead to the liberation of Palestine. Fatah-RC is believed to have carried out attacks in twenty countries, killing or injuring some 900 people.

During 1974–1980 the organization's headquarters were in Baghdad, and its activity was mainly directed by the Iraqis, who gave Abu Nidal substantial logistical assistance. This period was characterized by terrorist attacks mainly against Syrian and Fatah/PLO targets. At the beginning of the 1980s, disagreements between the Iraqis and Abu Nidal over Fatah-RC's independence and Iraq's interest in improving relations with the West during the war with Iran led Baghdad to expel Abu Nidal and his men. After Fatah-RC moved to Syria, the UNITED STATES pressured Syria to constrain the organization, and it moved its training and operational bases to the Sidon area in Lebanon. Still later the headquarters were moved to Libya and remained there.

The year 1987 marked a significant change from Fatah-RC's previously clandestine and secretive nature. The organization opened its ranks to new and young militants, formed a kind of militia, and even initiated social and political activity in the Palestinian refugee camps in South Lebanon. However, the new modus operandi and exposure to the refugees brought a serious split in the organization. By 1987 Abu Nidal had turned his terror tactics inward, against the Fatah-RC itself. After failing in his attempt to co-opt the refugees, he turned on them as well. In November 1989 two of the group's main leaders—Atef Abu Baker, a member of the Central Committee, and Abdel Rahman Issa, a member of the Political Bureau—defected, accusing Abu Nidal of murdering 150 militants because he feared internal subversion. Abu Nidal then made a brief attempt to reconcile with Fatah and Arafat but was rejected. These setbacks, plus the arrest of most of his militants in South America while they were pursuing Jewish targets there and the failure of several operations (e.g., the attack on the ship City of Poros in Greece), left Abu Nidal more isolated than ever. By the mid-1990s the Fatah-RC had ceased almost all terrorist operations and generally ceased to exist.

Bibliography

- Melman, Yossi. The Master Terrorist. New York: Adama Books, 1986.
- Seale, Patrick. Abu Nidal: A Gun for Hire. New York: Random House, 1992.
- Steinberg, Matti. "The Radical Worldview of the Abu Nidal Faction." Jerusalem Quarterly. 48 (Fall 1988).

Fatah Uprising, 1983

The Fatah Uprising, also referred to as the Fatah Dissidents or the Fatah Provisional Command, was a group of rebels who in the aftermath of the Israeli invasion of LEBANON catalyzed a civil war within the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). On 9 May 1983, FATAH colonel SA'ID MUSA MURAGHA (Abu Musa) claimed that YASIR ARAFAT'S corruption and cronyism had prevented an effective Palestinian response during the LEBANON WAR and called upon all Fatah units in Lebanon's Beka'a Valley to disregard future orders from the Fatah leadership. At first the Fatah Central Committee underestimated the disobedience, but when some 2,000 of the 10,000 guerrillas remaining in Lebanon joined the rebellion, it became apparent that the mutiny was gaining strength. The Central Committee attempted to undermine the rebellion by cutting funds and logistical support to the units involved; however, pro-Syrian factions of SA'IQA, the POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE—GENERAL COMMAND, the PALESTINE LIBERATION ARMY, and even Syrian army units backed Abu Musa's forces in what formally became the NATIONAL ALLIANCE. As such it had money, arms, and political support.

On 25 May the rebels seized Fatah supply depots in the Beka'a and on 28 May in Damascus. In late June, fighting erupted in the Beka'a between rebel units and forces loyal to Fatah and Arafat, with the rebels taking control of the town of Majdal Anjar and hence the Beirut-Damascus highway from Shtura to the frontier. Following the failure of Palestinian and Arab states' mediation efforts, loyal Fatah units were gradually forced out of their positions in the Beka'a northward to the Nahr al-Barid and Baddawi refugee camps near Tripoli, Lebanon. In late September Arafat himself returned to Tripoli to face his opponents. In October, fighting erupted around the two northern refugee camps. On 3 November the rebels (backed by Syrian and some Libyan forces) launched a major offensive against Arafat, capturing Nahr al-Barid on 6 November. After a brief lull in the fighting, a second rebel offensive captured Baddawi on 16 November. Loyalist forces retreated to Tripoli (Lebanon), where rebel forces bombarded their positions and threatened to storm the city.

The military pressures on Arafat were combined with Lebanese demands that he leave Tripoli. The only support for the beleaguered PLO leader came from a local Sunni fundamentalist leader, Sa'id Sha'ban, and his Islamic Unification Movement militia. Following a SAUDI ARABIAN-mediated cease-fire agreement on 25 November 1983 (barely a year after the PLO's Israeli-driven exodus from Beirut in 1982), Arafat and some 4,000 loyalists evacuated the city by sea to North Yemen, Algeria, and Tunisia on Greek ships under the UNITED NATIONS flag with a naval escort provided by FRANCE. Because it was a breakaway element of Fatah, neither Abu Musa nor members of his group have attended any PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL (PNC) meetings and thus remain conspicuously outside the PLO umbrella. The group is headquartered in Damascus, SYRIA, with operation sites in the Beka'a Valley. They receded from the forefront after the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS.

See also LEBANON WAR

Bibliography

- Fisk, Robert. Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon, 4th ed. New York: Nation Books, 2002.
- Frangi, Abdallah. The PLO and Palestine. London: Zed Books, 1982.
- Khalidi, Rashid. Under Siege: PLO Decision Making during the 1982 War. New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.
- Mishal, Shaul. The PLO under Arafat: Between Gun and Olive Branch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1986.
- Shikaki, Khalil. "Palestinians Divided: Old Guard, Young Guard." Foreign Affairs. 81:1 (January–February 2002).

Fatherland Front

See HAZIT HAMOLEDETH

Faysal-Weizmann Agreement, 1919

See WEIZMANN-FAYSAL AGREEMENT

Fez Peace Initiative, 1982

The Fez Peace Initiative, which was based on the 1981 FAHD PLAN, was presented and ratified at the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference of the ARAB LEAGUE, held in Fez, Morocco, in September 1982. Meeting shortly after Washington proposed the REAGAN PLAN, Arab leaders and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) debated the US plan, which did not include provisions for an independent Palestinian state but rather a federation with JORDAN, and then endorsed the Fez plan. The Fez Initiative declared that all states in the Middle East, including an independent Palestinian state, had a right to a peaceful existence. In that statement the plan implicitly recognized Israel and left to the UN Security Council the task of guaranteeing the security of states in the region. Based on UN RESOLUTIONS 181 and 242, the Fez plan called for Israeli withdrawal from the LANDS it had occupied in the 1967 WAR and recognized the PLO as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. Pro-Western king Hassan of Morocco, who was host of the summit, predicted the “normalization of relations and diplomatic ties” between Arab states and Israel following implementation of the plan.

Initially, there was some optimism in Washington. Vice-President GEORGE H. W. BUSH said the Fez resolution meant implicit Arab recognition of Israel, and Secretary of State GEORGE SHULTZ thought the Fez summit could be a “genuine breakthrough” and added: “There might be an implied recognition of Israel. I hope that is so.” This optimism lessened, however, after Israel expanded its incursion into LEBANON in mid-September 1982. Moreover, Israeli prime minister YITZHAK SHAMIR rejected the plan, terming it “a renewed declaration of war on Israel . . . another plan for the liquidation of Israel in one stage or two.” The Fez plan “has no weight, no value . . . and contains the same hate, the same war against peace, the same coldness” as all previous Arab plans, he said.

See also ARAB STATE PEACE OVERTURES, 1949–PRESENT; ARAB STATES: INTER-ARAB POLITICS; LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES; PROPAGANDA, ARABIC

Bibliography

Khalidi, Walid. “Toward Peace in the Holy Land.” Foreign Affairs. (Spring 1988).

League of Arab States. Fez Summit Peace Proposal. 1982. www.cmep.org/documents/fezsummit.htm.

FIDA

See PALESTINIAN DEMOCRATIC UNION

Field of Thorns Plan

Field of Thorns was the name given to the overall military strategy that Israel used against the Palestinians during the AL-AQSA INTIFADA, which began on 29 September 2000. By 15 October 2000 the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) had instituted an operations plan to topple YASIR ARAFAT and the interim PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA). Field of Thorns was prepared by the top officials in the Israeli security services during the 1990s, updated in early 2000, and openly discussed by Israeli prime minister EHUD BARAK and senior government officials long before 29 September. Among other things, the Field of Thorns Plan stated: “Arafat, the person, is a severe threat to the security of the State [Israel] and the damage that will result from his disappearance is less than the damage caused by his existence.”

The details of Field of Thorns were published in the framework of a report written by Anthony H. Cordesman, Middle East strategic expert at the influential Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, an institute with strong affiliations with the CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY. The tactics prepared in the Field of Thorns Plan and used by Israel during the Intifada and later included:

- Massive use of IDF troops at points of friction, that is, locations where Palestinians demonstrated or from which militants carried out attacks.
- Use of other units of the IDF to secure Jewish SETTLEMENTS, key ROADS, and terrain points.
- Use of helicopter gunships and snipers to provide mobility and suppressive fire.
- Use of extensive small arms, artillery, and tank fire to suppress sniping, stone-throwing, and demonstrations.
- Bombing, artillery, and helicopter strikes on high-value Palestinian targets, and punishing Palestinian elements for attacks.
- Search-and-seizure interventions and raids into Palestinian areas in GAZA and the WEST BANK to break up organized resistance and capture or kill key leaders.
- Selective destruction of high-value Palestinian facilities and clearing of strong points and fields of fire near Palestinian urban areas.
- Mobilization and deployment of armored and other land forces in the face of a massive Palestinian uprising.
- Use of armor and artillery to isolate major Palestinian population areas and to seal off Palestinian areas, including many parts of AREA A.
- A simultaneous economic blockade of the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES with selective cutoffs of financial transactions, labor movements, and food/fuel shipments.
- Israeli control of WATER, power, communications, and road access to limit the size and length of Palestinian action.
- Regulation and control of MEDIA and a major information campaign to influence local and world opinion.
- Use of military forces trained in urban warfare to penetrate into cities if necessary, especially where there are Jewish enclaves such as HEBRON.

- Temporary withdrawals of Israeli SETTLERS from exposed and low-value isolated settlements such as Hebron.
- Arrest of PNA officials and imposition of a new military administration.
- Forced evacuations of Palestinians from “sensitive areas.”

According to Cordesman, further escalation by Palestinians would be followed by TRANSFER of Palestinians from “sensitive areas,” and the “arrest [of] Palestinian National Authority officials and imposition of a new military administration.” Cordesman foresaw that the ensuing house-to-house battles would kill thousands of Palestinians, both armed and civilian. “The IDF must calculate in the framework of this operation,” he wrote, “the death of hundreds of Israeli soldiers and with thousands more wounded on both sides.” The only chance to avert this danger, his report avers, is if the PNA would suppress any violence ruthlessly and effectively, with no exaggerated amount of respect for human rights.

From the start of the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS, the IDF planned for the possibility that it would reoccupy the territories that were yet to be transferred to PNA authority. In 1996 the IDF developed and tested Field of Thorns tactics through simulations and rehearsals. During the July 2000 negotiations at CAMP DAVID, the IDF changed its training plans from a policing security operation to a full-scale military mission in which all units were to receive special combat and anti-riot training. According to the simulations and rehearsals of the IDF, reoccupying Palestinian areas would take between a few days and twenty-four days, depending on the tactics Israel used. Jane’s Intelligence Review wrote that from the Israeli point of view, “The military cost of reoccupation is directly proportionate to the degree the Israelis restrain their fire: the greater the restraint, the higher the IDF casualty list. Reoccupation could ultimately cost 200–2,000 Israeli military fatalities.” In this scenario there was no estimate of Palestinian casualties.

B’TSELEM (Israeli Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) described Israeli military operations in the first two months of the al-Aqsa Intifada (between 29 September and 2 December 2000) that indicate the IDF implemented the Field of Thorns Plan. “Israeli security forces killed 204 Palestinian civilians and 24 Palestinian security forces, and wounded approximately 10,000 Palestinians. . . . Most of those killed or wounded in recent weeks were unarmed. These casualties were a direct result of Israel’s policy on dispersing demonstrations by unarmed Palestinians. . . . Israel’s policy is directed in large part against the Palestinian civilian population.” Furthermore, B’Tselem stated: “IDF soldiers respond with tear gas, rubber-coated metal bullets, live ammunition, and tank and helicopter gunfire.” Other tactics included “bulldozing homes, neighborhoods, fields of crops, fruit-bearing trees, imposition of a total CLOSURE on the Occupied Territories, closure on certain villages in the Occupied Territories, and in some instances also a CURFEW.”

See also AL-AQSA INTIFADA; INTIFADAS; OPERATION DEFENSIVE SHIELD; OPERATION DETERMINED PATH; OPERATION JOURNEY OF COLORS; OPERATION RAINBOW

Bibliography

- Benvenisti, Meron. “The Depth of Animosity.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 8 August 2001.
- Burston, Bradley. “Background: Sharon Cabinet’s War Lobby Revs into High Gear.” Ha’aretz. 6 March 2002.
- Cordesman, Anthony H. Peace and War: Israel versus the Palestinians: A Second Intifada? Draft. Center for Strategic and International Studies. 9 November 2000. www.csis.org/stratassessment/reorts/Israel/Palestine.pdf.
- Elam, Shraga. “‘Peace’ with Violence or Transfer.” Between the Lines Magazine. Jerusalem, Israel. December 2000.
- Eshel, David. “IDF Prepares for Palestinian Clashes.” Jane’s Intelligence Review. September 2000.
- Halper, Jeff. “Despair: Israel’s Ultimate Weapon.” Middle East Report. Washington, DC: MERIP Middle East Report and Information Project. Information Brief 72. 28 March 2001.
- Hammami, Rema, and Salim Tamari. “The Second Uprising: End or New Beginning?” Journal of Palestine Studies. 30:2 (2001).
- Hanieh, Adam. “Toward Submission or War in Palestine?” Middle East Report. Washington, DC: MERIP Middle East Report and Information Project. Information Brief 82. 26 January 2002.
- Hass, Amira. “All the Way from the Sea to the River.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem, Israel daily, English). 30 May 2001.
- . “A Future Not Worth Living.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem, Israeli daily, English). 20 February 2002.
- . “The Revolt of the Guinea-Pigs.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem, Israeli daily, English). 21 February 2001.
- Hirschberg, Peter. “War Games.” Jerusalem Report. 4 September 1997.
- Kimmerling, Baruch. “The Right to Resist.” Ha’aretz. 27 March 2001.
- . “The Right-Wing without Its Fig Leaf.” Ha’aretz. 3 December 2001.

- Rabbani, Mouin. "Field of Thorns." The Nation. 12 March 2001.
- Reinhart, Tanya. "Evil Unleashed." Tikkun: A Bimonthly Jewish Critique of Politics, Culture & Society. 17:2 (2002).
- Roane, Carey, ed. The New Intifada: Resisting Israel's Apartheid. London: Verso, 2001.
- Rubinstein, Danny. "Why Don't They Stop?" Ha'aretz. 2 July 2001.
- Stein, Yael. Events on the Temple Mount—29 September 2000. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2002.
- . Illusions of Restraint: Human Rights Violations during the Events in the Occupied Territories 29 September—2 December 2000. Jerusalem: B'Tselem, 2000.
- Sternhell, Ze'ev. "Balata Has Fallen." Ha'aretz. 8 March 2002.

The Fifth Mother

The Fifth Mother is an Israeli peace organization that was founded in March 2002 by women from the FOUR MOTHERS MOVEMENT, which was instrumental in ending the Israeli occupation of LEBANON, along with other women who share the view that "War Is Not My Language." The Fifth Mother believes conflicts should be solved with words, not bullets, and uses the voices of women to provide an alternative to the militant language that characterizes the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The movement calls for involving experts such as conflict resolution mediators to help solve impasses in negotiations between the two parties.

The Fifth Mother tries to affect public discourse and public opinion at many levels. They participate in public events to convey their views and create dialogue to counteract the widespread sense of desperation and loss of faith in a solution. Members engage in an ongoing effort to respond to militant and militaristic terminology in the MEDIA, promoting alternatives until they become an integral part of the discourse. They also build relationships with academic institutions that deal with conflict resolution and mediation, applying their expertise to the public debate. (http://coalitionofwomen.org/home/english/organizations/the\_fifth\_mother).

Final Status Talks

The 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES (DOP), the first in a series of agreements between Israel and the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) in the OSLO PROCESS, envisioned that the last stage in the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians would be the final status talks, when all of the most important issues in the conflict would be discussed and resolved. The official concept behind the two-stage peace process was that the experiences of peacemaking would build trust and confidence between Israelis and Palestinians, so the two parties could make the compromises necessary to resolve the weightiest matters by the time of final status talks. The remaining issues, according to the DOP, were "JERUSALEM, REFUGEES, SETTLEMENTS, security arrangements, BORDERS, relations and cooperation with other neighbors, and other issues of common interest."

The DOP outlined a transitional period between the two stages that was not to exceed five years, with final status negotiations starting not later than the beginning of the third year (1996) of the interim period. However, final status talks did not begin until 6 May 1996 and were quickly adjourned, despite the fact that the DOP timetable called for them to be concluded by 4 May 1999. The ostensible reason was the election of BENJAMIN NETANYAHU as Israeli prime minister and the ascension to power of the LIKUD coalition, which opposed the Oslo peace process from the outset.

However, the separation of the peace process into two distinct phases—interim and final status—put the Palestinians at a serious disadvantage, because they had to negotiate without a clear idea concerning the future. In the end the separation permitted Israel to determine unilaterally the nature of the final outcome. In practice, separating the two stages allowed Israel to prolong indefinitely the start of final status talks in what some have termed a policy of "the permanence of temporary arrangements." In the intervening time Israel continued to build settlements, settler bypass ROADS, and military installations, while the DOP gave the Palestinians no means to prevent Israeli expansion throughout the WEST BANK and East JERUSALEM.

Israel's failure to begin final status discussions led YASIR ARAFAT, then president of the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY, to threaten several times to declare unilaterally an independent Palestinian state on 4 May 1999 (the scheduled date for completion of final status negotiations). Israel's position was that a Palestinian state could only come into being as the result of negotiations and threatened to annex all the territories if Arafat acted unilaterally. The UNITED STATES also put enormous pressure on Arafat not to take such a step. According to Israel and the United States, all final status issues could be resolved at a summit convened by President BILL CLINTON at CAMP DAVID in July 2000, even though most interim agreements, especially Israeli redeployments, remained unfulfilled. Negotiations at Camp David were unsuccessful and the peace process fell apart with the onset of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in September 2000 despite another initiative by Clinton in January 2001 known as the CLINTON PARAMETERS.

By 2002, however, Israel was taking major unilateral steps of its own. In addition to the expansion of settlements and road construction, in the summer of 2002, Israel began construction of the BARRIER or separation wall, and in August 2005 it unilaterally withdrew from Gaza. In 2006, Prime Minister EHUD OLMERT declared that Israel would unilaterally determine its final borders in the West Bank within four years and that the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY would be annexed. As of 2008 there have been no final status talks.

Bibliography

- Phillips, James A. Clinton Must Warn Arafat against Declaring Statehood. Washington, DC: The Heritage Foundation. 19 March 1999.
- Pressman, Jeremy. "Israeli Unilateralism and Israeli-Palestinian Relations, 2001–2006." International Studies Perspectives. 7:4 (2006).
- Tolan, Sandy. "No to Israeli Unilateralism." Salon.com. 23 May 2006. www.salon.com/opinion/feature/2006/05/23/olmert.
- US Senate. Senate Opposes Unilateral Declaration of a Palestinian State. 106th Cong., 1st sess. S. Con. Res 5 (11 March 1999).
- Usher, Graham. "Held Back for Now." Al-Ahram (Cairo). 8–14 October 1998.
- Zelnick, Robert. Israel's Unilateralism: Beyond Gaza. Palo Alto, CA: The Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, Stanford University, 2006.

First Arab Congress, 1913

The First Arab Congress, held in Paris in June 1913, was organized by the Committee of Reform (based in Beirut) and al-Fatat, an underground Arab nationalist organization. The congress demanded that the OTTOMAN EMPIRE provide for the autonomy of the Arab provinces ruled by the Turks, Arab participation in the Ottoman central government, and the recognition of Arabic as an official language of the empire along with Turkish. Palestinians supported these demands but criticized the congress for failing to note the threat posed to Palestinian Arabs by ZIONISM. Only a few months earlier, a large land sale to Zionists had prompted the Palestinian newspaper Filastin to write: "If this state of affairs continues . . . then the Zionists will gain mastery over our country, village by village, town by town; tomorrow the whole of JERUSALEM will be sold and then Palestine in its entirety." Although the congress did not deal with specific Palestinian issues, it nevertheless marked a turning point in the Arab nationalist struggle, which in its aftermath refined its goals for the independence of the Arab world in a sovereign, unified state.

See also HUSAYN-McMAHON CORRESPONDENCE

Bibliography

- Lesch, Ann Mosley. Arab Politics in Palestine, 1917–1939. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1979.
- Mandell, Neville J. The Arabs and Zionism before World War I. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.
- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.

First Zionist Congress

See BASEL PROGRAM; WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESSES

Fishing, Gaza Strip

There are approximately 2,500 fishermen in the GAZA STRIP, plus an additional 1,200 Palestinians who have jobs related to fishing, such as the manufacturing and maintenance of boats, the preparation of ice blocks for fish storage, and fish skinning and selling. Thus, approximately 4,000 persons with an average of eight members per family, or 32,000 Palestinians, depend upon the fishing industry for their survival. The majority of these families live in the al-Shati refugee camp, in the Deir al-Balah region, and the al-Mawasi region along the Mediterranean.

Before the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS, Palestinian fishermen were allowed to fish twenty miles from shore. In 1994, Israel reduced the area in which they could fish to twelve miles. Article 11 of the 1994 GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT gave Israel the right to determine which areas off the Gaza coast were open to fishing and how far out Palestinian fishermen could go. Two years later Israel reduced the fishing limit to six miles and since the beginning of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in 2000, fishermen have been arrested and sent to jail after having gone no farther than three miles.

Up to six miles offshore the waters have long been depleted, and sardines, tuna, and Sultan Ibrahim fish are found only much farther out in deeper water. Thus what Palestinians can catch in the restricted zone does not produce enough income for the fishermen to feed themselves or pay for fuel. In effect Israel's policies have caused the demise of the Gazan fishing industry and in the process have contributed to the impoverishment of thousands.

In addition to the foregoing measures, Israeli naval ships and personnel fire at Palestinian boats, chase and arrest fishermen, damage fishing equipment, block and sink Palestinian boats, and impose high fines on the fishermen for the slightest infraction.

Bibliography

- Israel, State of, and Palestine Liberation Organization. Agreement on the Gaza Strip and Jericho Area, May 4, 1994. Annex I, Annex II, Annex III, Annex IV, Gaza-Jericho Agreement—Letters. The Jewish Virtual Library: A Division of the American-Israel Cooperative Enterprise. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourcel/Peace/gjtoc.html.
- Levy, Gideon. "Closing the Sea." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 15 February 2002.
- Palestinian Center for Human Rights. Report on Israeli Attacks on Palestinian Fishermen in the Gaza Strip, 29 September 2000–31 May 2002. Gaza City, Gaza Strip: PCHR, 2002.
- Swisa, Shlomi, and Yael Stein. Al-Mawasi, Gaza Strip: Impossible Life in an Isolated Enclave. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), 2003.
- Urquhart, Conal. "Feeding the Hungry in Gaza." UNRWA Emergency Stories. New York: UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, 2004.
- Wafa Correspondents. "Fishermen Deprived of the Sea." Palestine Report. 10:10 (2003).

Flag, Palestinian

The Palestinian flag is the preeminent symbol of Palestinian nationalism. As such, in 1967 the flag was banned by Israel. A 1980 law forbade artwork of "political significance" and banned art composed of the flag's four colors. Israel went to extraordinary lengths to suppress the illegal flag, and everything that contained the forbidden colors—paintings (even of pastoral scenes), clothing, embroidery, anything—was confiscated and the persons responsible for producing or displaying such items were fined and arrested. Since the signing of the OSLO ACCORDS in 1993, the ban has been relaxed, although it is still occasionally enforced. Israel now is more concerned about the HAMAS Islamic flag, which it has prohibited.

The Palestinian flag is constituted of three equal horizontal stripes (black, white, and green from top to bottom) overlaid by a red isosceles triangle issuing from the hoist and reaching one-third of the way to the fly. Sharif Husayn of Mecca designed the current flag in June 1916 as the flag of the Arab Revolt against the OTTOMAN EMPIRE. In 1917, the Arab people raised it as the flag of the Arab Nationalist Movement. In 1947, the Arab BA'ATH Party interpreted the flag as a symbol of the liberation and unity of the Arab nation. The Palestinians readopted it at the Palestine Conference (ALL PALESTINE GOVERNMENT) in Gaza in 1948. Subsequently, the flag was recognized by the ARAB LEAGUE as the flag of the Palestinian people. In 1964, it was further endorsed by the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION during the first meeting of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL in JERUSALEM.

After 1967 and Israel's OCCUPATION of the Palestinian territories of the WEST BANK, GAZA STRIP, and East JERUSALEM, succeeding military governors undertook systematic policies to eliminate all manifestations of Palestinian nationalism or national identity. This campaign involved every aspect of Palestinians' lives—education, journalism, literature and poetry, painting, folklore, and symbolic representations of Palestinian national identity.

In the whole sphere of cultural life, the Israeli authorities actively pursued a policy of stifling the concept of a Palestinian nation as a part of its general war against Palestinian self-determination. What they objected to was the idea of Palestine, and therefore any form of expression of the concept was forbidden. The campaign against the flag's colors became so extreme that if a man's shirt or the embroidery on a woman's dress contained the four colors, the person was fined and often detained.

After 1993, actions against the flag and against Palestinian nationalism in general significantly diminished because the Oslo Accords in effect denationalized Palestinian autonomy. The flag, its colors, or other previously potent symbols were no longer perceived as a threat. Instead, Israel focused on any symbolic or actual opposition to the Oslo Process.

Bibliography

- Halaby, Samia A. Liberation Art of Palestine: Palestinian Painting and Sculpture in the Second Half of the 20th Century. New York: HTTB, 2001.
- Hallaj, Muhammad. "Palestine—The Suppression of an Idea." The Link. New York: Americans for Middle East Understanding. 15:1 (1982).
- Laidi-Hanieh, Adila. "Arts, Identity, and Survival: Building Cultural Practices in Palestine." Journal of Palestine Studies. 35:4 (Summer 2006).
- Massad, Joseph. "Permission to Paint: Palestinian Art and the Colonial Encounter." Art Journal (Fall 2007).
- Shahak, Israel. 1981. "The Four 'Terrible' Colors." Palestine/Israel Bulletin. March.

Flapan, Simha (1911–1987)

Simha Flapan was the first of the Israeli NEW HISTORIANS, a body of scholars who subject traditional Israeli historiography to revisionist critiques. He is best known for his book The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities, published in the year of his death. The book is considered crucial in demythologizing the story of the founding of the modern state of Israel. Flapan was national secretary of the MAPAM party and the director of its Arab Affairs Department. He was a founder and longtime editor of the leftist New Outlook magazine.

Bibliography

- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon Books, 1987.
- . "The Palestinian Exodus of 1948." Journal of Palestine Studies. 64 (1987).
- . Zionism and the Palestinians. London: Croom Helm, 1979.
- Teveth, Shabtai. "Charging Israel with Original Sin." Commentary. 88:3 (1989).

Force 17

Force 17 was formed in the early 1970s as a personal security guard for YASIR ARAFAT and other leaders of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO). It was initially based in Beirut at 17 Faqahani Street, which may account for its name. Another explanation is that the name refers to the seventeen Palestinians killed in the battle of AL-KARAMA in JORDAN in 1968.

During the early 1980s, Force 17 expanded its mandate to include attacks on Israelis. In 1985 it claimed responsibility for killing three Israelis in Cyprus, but according to the US Department of State, it has since not engaged in any operations outside Israel and the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

When the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY was established in 1994, Force 17 officially ceased to exist and was merged into the Presidential Security Force (al-Amn al-Ri'asah) under the command of Faisal Abu Sharah. During that time it was responsible for protecting Arafat and other prominent Palestinians as well as important installations. Other functions include intelligence and counterterrorism, mainly against opposition activists and suspected COLLABORATORS with Israel.

According to the Israeli army, activists within Force 17 have carried out numerous anti-Israeli attacks since the start of the AL-AQSA INTIFADA in September 2000. Israel alleged that a senior officer in Force 17, Masoud Ayad, was involved in mortar attacks against army positions and Israeli settlements and ASSASSINATED him in 2001 in GAZA. On 4 December 2001, Israel added Force 17, along with the Tanzim, to its list of TERRORIST entities.

Bibliography

- BBC. "What Is Force 17?" BBC News. 5 September 2006.
- The Estimate*. "The Palestinian Authority: The Security Forces and Other Armed Elements." The Estimate: Political and Security Intelligence Analysis of the Islamic World and Its Neighbors. 12:21 (2000).
- Luft, Gal. "The Palestinian Security Services: Between Police and Army." Middle East Review of International Affairs/MERIA. 3:2 (1999).
- Reinhart, Tanya. "Evil Unleashed." Indymedia (Israel). 19 December 2001.
- Sayigh, Yezid. Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Ford, Gerald Rudolph (1913–2007)

Gerald R. Ford was thirty-eighth president of the UNITED STATES. He was appointed the vice president for President RICHARD NIXON after the resignation of Spiro Agnew, and assumed the presidency on 9 August 1974 after Nixon resigned in disgrace. Ford served until 1977, when he lost his bid for a second term. He began his political career when he was elected to Congress in 1948 for the first of thirteen terms in the House of Representatives. From 1965 to 1973 he was House minority leader.

As president, Ford retained Nixon's secretary of state, HENRY KISSINGER, who was at the time engaged in “shuttle diplomacy” between EGYPT and Israel in an attempt to bring about a second disengagement of Israeli forces from the Sinai. This diplomacy took place in the aftermath of the 1973 War, when the United States was suffering the effects of an oil embargo and a subsequent dramatic increase in the price of oil. During the conflict the United States and the SOVIET UNION had come close to nuclear war, and the United States had provided a vast resupply of armaments to Israel. Washington was thus anxious to reduce tensions in the Middle East and was frustrated with Israel’s intransigence in the US-conducted negotiations between the Jewish state and Egypt.

On 10 August, one day after taking office, President Ford publicly assured Israel that the United States would honor all its commitments. Desiring more reassurances, Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN visited Washington in early September 1974 to consult with the new president and senior administration officials. In March 1975, exasperated by Israel’s unwillingness to make any progress in the Sinai negotiations, Ford delivered a speech calling for a “reassessment” of US policy toward Israel. The purpose behind this major presidential address was to spell out US fundamental national interests in the Middle East and to imply that those interests required Israel’s withdrawal from the Sinai. Additionally, on the advice of Kissinger, Ford conspicuously delayed the delivery of weapons to Israel, including promised F-15 fighter planes, and suspended negotiations for pending financial and military aid. On 21 March Ford sent Rabin a tough message, warning that the failure of Kissinger’s mission would have far-reaching consequences for the region and for US-Israel relations.

Within White House circles a consensus for a peace plan was emerging, one similar to UN RESOLUTION 242 and the ROGERS PLAN, which required Israel to return to its pre-1967 borders in return for security guarantees. Nothing, however, came of the president’s efforts, because Israeli leaders and domestic pro-Israel groups launched a campaign to defeat the plan. The American Israel Public Affairs Committee immediately drafted a letter, signed by seventy-six senators, that called for the president to support Israel and be receptive to its needs. Several other pro-Israel organizations, including the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, waged intense campaigns of their own, and within six weeks the president had to reassess his own initiative.

In June 1975 Rabin came to Washington a second time to hold talks with President Ford. Shortly thereafter Ford signed several pieces of legislation desired by Israel, including the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which tied US trade with the Soviet Union to freedom of emigration for SOVIET JEWS. Not only did Kissinger and Ford reinstate the military and economic assistance to Israel that they had placed on hold, but they increased both significantly. On 1 September 1975 President Ford announced that the United States would support Israel’s stand that a comprehensive settlement with SYRIA must ensure Israel’s security from any attack launched from the Golan Heights.

Also in September, several far-reaching political and strategic guarantees were incorporated into a secret American-Israeli Memorandum of Understanding, which was initialed on 1 September 1975 as part of the second Sinai agreement. In accordance with this memorandum, the Ford administration would consult with Israel if Israel received a threat from “a world power” and supply oil to Israel “if the oil Israel needs to meet all of its normal requirements for domestic consumption is not available for purchase.” The United States also agreed “to continue to maintain Israel’s defensive strength through the supply of advanced types of equipment, to continue to adhere to its present policy of nonrecognition of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION as long as it does not recognize Israel’s right to exist and does not accept Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338[,] and to consult fully and seek to concert its position and strategy at the Geneva peace conference on this issue with the government of Israel.” In view of these incentives, Israeli policymakers ultimately decided to set aside their reservations and signed the Sinai II accord, which called for a limited withdrawal from the Sinai.

In January 1976 the UN Security Council opened a debate on Israel’s repressive and expansionist practices in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, but the United States vetoed a draft resolution and the discussion ended. Also in January Rabin made another visit to the United States, addressing a joint session of Congress and holding talks with the president. In March the United States again vetoed a Security Council resolution expressing concern about the Occupied Territories.

See also AMERICAN JEWISH ORGANIZATIONS

Bibliography

- Ben Zvi, Abraham. "Partnership under Stress: The American Jewish Community and Israel." Memorandum No. 52. Jerusalem: Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, 1998.
- Blankfort, Jeffrey. "A War for Israel." Left Curve. n.d. www.leftcurve.org/LC28WebPages/WarForIsrael.html.
- Feuerwerker, Marvin C. Congress and Israel: Foreign Aid Decision-Making in the House of Representatives, 1969–1976. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1979.
- Goldberg, J. J. Jewish Power: Inside the American Jewish Establishment. New York: Addison-Wesley Publishing, 1997.
- Israel, State of, and United States. Israel–United States Memorandum of Understanding. 1 September 1975. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Peace/mou1975.html.
- Mearsheimer, John J., and Stephen M. Walt. The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2008.
- Saunders, Harold H. U.S. Foreign Policy and Peace in the Middle East. Prepared statement of Harold H. Saunders, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, before the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Middle East. 12 November 1975.
- Tivnan, Edward. The Lobby: Jewish Political Power and American Foreign Policy. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Four Mothers Movement

The Four Mothers was a successful grassroots movement that was highly influential in bringing about Israel's 2000 withdrawal from LEBANON. It is considered by many Israelis to be the most significant such movement in Israeli history. The movement was catalyzed in 1997 when two Israeli army helicopters collided on the way to Lebanon, killing 73 soldiers as they crashed in the front yard of the school that Rachel Ben Dor's children attended. At the time, Ms. Ben Dor's oldest son was a soldier in Lebanon, and several of his former classmates had died. Out of the trauma of the helicopter crash, a number of women living on the northern border with sons serving in Lebanon came together and drafted an open letter to Prime Minister BENJAMIN NETANYAHU calling on him to withdraw immediately from Lebanon. Over the coming weeks, the women's letter evolved into the Four Mothers movement.

Rachel Ben Dor of Rosh Pina became the movement's founder and chairperson while two of her friends, Ronit Nahmias and Yaffa Arbel of Kibbutz Gadot, formed the core of the protest movement leadership. The three women had raised their sons together and together watched them go into the army to serve in Lebanon.

The women began with small street protests at traffic intersections; they wrote letters to lawmakers; and they organized debates at northern kibbutzim. After the first story about them appeared on national television, they received calls from all over the country. Working women all, they found themselves at the vanguard of a movement, without any organization, time, or money. They realized that what they were doing would require all of that, plus endurance.

On talk shows, the mothers were placed opposite generals who patted them on the shoulders and rolled their eyes when the women spoke. Eventually, however, the military understood that the women were shaping national opinion and began to attack their movement as bad for the morale of the soldiers and the country.

Over the course of the next two years, the movement grew from its original core group to a national organization with several hundred active members. The Four Mothers held protests, sponsored advertisements in newspapers, and perhaps most effectively, held vigils outside the Defense Ministry in Tel Aviv each day after an IDF soldier was killed in Lebanon.

The persistence of the movement sparked a national reevaluation of the policy guiding Israel's continued presence in the Lebanese security zone. Public opinion polls quickly began to shift. By the time of the 1999 elections, a majority of Israelis supported unilateral withdrawal from the security zone. Understanding the shift in public sentiment, both leading candidates for prime minister in the May 1999 elections, EHUD BARAK (ONE ISRAEL) and Benjamin Netanyahu (LIKUD), made explicit promises to withdraw. Barak, who took office in July 1999, made it a commitment with a date: Israel would be out of Lebanon by 7 July 2000, he declared publicly.

The New York Times wrote on 3 June 2000, shortly after the Israeli army pulled its troops out of Lebanon, ending more than 20 years of war, "Today many Israelis celebrated with the Four Mothers. The women took a classic Israeli stereotype—the silent, suffering soldier's mother—stood it on its head and dared to challenge the military." The Four Mothers had successfully shaped Israeli public opinion into pulling the military out of the so-called security zone that Israel had occupied since 1978.

In the summer of 2006, Israel once again invaded Lebanon, and as earlier, a group of women emerged to protest. The movement was called Waking Up on Time, and while it was far more radical, it was explicitly based on the Four Mothers movement. This time, the 15 active members of the new organization stressed that “this will be a movement of everyone, women and men, young and old.” The members initially hung about a hundred protest signs across the city of Kfar Saba against the fighting in Lebanon. The cities of Herzliya and Raanana were also targeted.

“This time we won’t wait 18 years to demand that Israel leave Lebanon, but now, so as not to be drawn into an operation which will be impossible to escape from,” the activists explained. The group hung signs at central junctions across the country. The signs bore a clear and personal message against Prime Minister EHUD OLMERT and Defense Minister Amir Peretz, in order to clarify that they had learned the lessons of the earlier movement and this time they spoke directly to the country’s leaders. There were no more general and unfocused statements. One of the signs read: “Olmert: Missing Sharon So Entering Lebanon?” Another sign showed a picture of a Hizbullah member guarding caged IDF soldiers above the caption “With Amir Peretz—your children are in good hands.”

Waking Up on Time, like its predecessor movement, had a major impact in mobilizing people to oppose the war.

Bibliography

- Bershtkovsky, Anat. “Four Mothers, 2006 Version.” Israel News. 27 July 2006.
- Horn, Shifra. Four Mothers. London: Piatkus Books, 2000.
- Lieberfeld, Daniel. “It’s Amazing What They Can Do: The Media and Israel’s ‘Four Mothers’ Antiwar Protest.” Annual Review of Sociology. 24:1 (2001).
- Maxwell, Bill. “Four Mothers Made a Difference in Israel.” St. Petersburg Times. 28 May 2000.
- Sontag, Deborah. “Israel Honors Mothers of Lebanon Withdrawal.” New York Times. 3 June 2000.

Fourth Geneva Convention

See INTERNATIONAL LAW AND UN AUTHORITY

France

France has traditionally maintained a strong interest in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict because it has had a unique relationship with both protagonists.

Torn between conflicting interests, French diplomacy has long sought a balanced position, which was at the same time impaired by the country’s specific ties with the Arab world. Two strong factors presently determine France’s diplomatic commitment to finding a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict: its desire to maintain influence in the Middle East and the conflict’s growing domestic impact, which is raising serious concerns among French policymakers.

Attachment to the Holy Land

France’s historical interest in Palestine is intrinsically linked to its Christian culture. As an ancient Catholic monarchy, France has an intense attachment to Christ’s presence in the Holy Land. It was in Clermont-Ferrand, France, that Pope Urbain II called for the First Crusade in 1095, inviting both knights and citizens to travel to Palestine to defend Christian pilgrims’ rights of access to the HOLY SITES. From the sixteenth century onward France continued to affirm its role as protector of the Christian minorities in the Levant. In 1799 a French expedition to EGYPT under Napoleon Bonaparte briefly went to Palestine, where it fought the Ottoman forces. This date marks the starting point of modern French intervention in the Near East.

As in most other nations of Europe, the nineteenth and twentieth centuries witnessed intense episodes of ANTI-SEMITISM in France. While working in Paris as a journalist for a liberal Viennese newspaper, THEODOR HERZL covered the 1894 DREYFUS trial and as a result wrote Der Judenstaat, proposing the creation of a Jewish state as the solution to growing anti-Semitism in Europe. Dreyfus was a Jewish army captain who was falsely convicted of trying to sell military secrets to the Germans.

After World War I the Arab territories of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE were divided between France and Great Britain. The mandate for Palestine was given to the British, to the great displeasure of significant sectors of French Catholic public opinion. SYRIA and LEBANON were entrusted to France.

Between the two world wars France became a land of immigrants, especially for Jewish refugees fleeing the pogroms of Central and Eastern Europe. Yet during GERMANY’S occupation of France (1940–1944), the French collaborationist (Vichy) government enacted its own anti-Jewish laws and cooperated with the Nazis in the extermination of its Jewish population. More than 75,000 Jews were sent from France to the concentration camps and slaughtered.

Immediately after the war, French public opinion became sensitive to the Zionist cause and strongly supported the right of HOLOCAUST survivors to have their own independent state. The traditional rivalry with the British also explains the French government's moral and logistical support for the Jewish IMMIGRANTS and their nascent political organizations in Palestine.

This was the beginning of the golden age of the Franco-Israeli relationship, which lasted for a little less than twenty years. France recognized the state of Israel in May 1949, one year after its proclamation of independence. Military cooperation between France and Israel began in the early 1950s and strengthened during the mid-1950s, mainly as a counterbalance to the emergence of pan-Arab nationalism, at the time jeopardizing France's position with its Arab colonies in the Maghreb. France was responsible for establishing the foundation of Israel's NUCLEAR PROGRAM, directly participating in the construction of the Dimona nuclear plant. This strategic friendship found its most overt expression in the 1956 tripartite Suez expedition, when French, British, and Israeli armies together invaded Egypt to block JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR's nationalist ambitions.

Support for the Palestinian Cause

During the 1950s and 1960s, Arab-Israeli relations were characterized by an enduring state of war. After General Charles de Gaulle's return to power in 1958, France's position toward Israel began to change. France's great and widely respected leader was forced to reexamine all French alliances within the specific context of decolonization in the third world. Morocco and Tunisia obtained their independence from Paris in 1956, but France waged a costly war in Algeria until 1962. After this traumatic episode, de Gaulle reconsidered the significance of the Arab Nationalist Movement. Inspired by a realistic assessment of France's capacities as an intermediate power, he concluded that an entente with former Arab colonies was the best means of preserving French regional influence.

France's attitude toward the Arab-Israeli conflict reached a turning point with the 1967 WAR between Egypt, Syria, and JORDAN and Israel. During the tension preceding the war, President de Gaulle warned that he would not stand with any country that initiated a preemptive strike and announced an embargo on arms sales to all countries involved in the dispute. In a famous declaration, de Gaulle called the Jews "an elite people, sure of itself and dominating," a statement that became embedded in Israel's long historical memory. After Israel bombed the Beirut airport in January 1969 and destroyed thirteen civilian planes on the ground, allegedly in response to a Palestinian guerrilla infiltration, de Gaulle imposed a complete arms embargo on the Jewish state. Thereafter the political breakup was complete, and a quite different era began.

France's so-called Arab policy, a mix of cultural influence, economic aid, military entente, and political leniency for local regimes, began to develop early in the 1970s. France's concern for the fate of the Palestinian REFUGEES had been constant from the outset, yet French sympathy for Palestinian political objectives was not as forthcoming, especially when the Palestinians were engaged in ARMED STRUGGLE that at times degenerated into pure TERRORISM. Nevertheless, from the early 1970s France supported the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), probably based on a tactical evaluation that one strong European political actor was needed to help the Palestinians achieve a national solution and, given its regional interests, better Paris than another power. France therefore consistently championed PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT as someone who could moderate his own movement and move toward a peaceful solution. In 1974, French minister of foreign affairs Jean Sauvagnargues was the first member of a Western European government to meet officially with Arafat, and the PLO opened its first liaison office in Paris in 1975.

Support for the Palestinians' political rights thus progressively became part of the French diplomatic agenda. In 1982 President François Mitterrand was the first French leader to affirm in front of the Israeli Knesset his support for the establishment of a Palestinian state. In the same year, French troops participated in the multinational force that supervised the evacuation of the Palestinian fidaiyyun (guerrilla fighters) from Beirut, then under Israeli siege. One year later they guaranteed the protection of PLO officials fleeing Tripoli under Syrian fire. The French commitment to strengthen the Palestinian position reached its peak with the eruption of the First INTIFADA, in 1987. It was in Paris that Arafat declared in May 1989 that the PLO renounced the Palestinian Covenant and the destruction of Israel. Until his death in 2004, the Palestinian leader maintained strong personal links with successive French presidents, including François Mitterrand and Jacques Chirac. Arafat died in the Val-de-Grâce hospital in Paris, where Chirac had arranged his transfer from Ramallah, WEST BANK.

French diplomacy during the 1980s, considered by some as biased in favor of the Palestinians, reflected more an effort to maintain a position of equilibrium between Israel and the Palestinians. Mitterrand was the main artisan of this subtly balanced position, and his fluid relationship with the PLO did not impede him from trying to overcome France's diplomatic strain with Israel. Yet France's reputation in Israel as pro-Palestinian remained, and was reinforced through the period of the two Intifadas. In the memories of Middle Easterners a few symbolic episodes stand out: President Chirac, in 1996, striving to extricate himself from the vigilance of Israeli security guards during a visit to the Old City of JERUSALEM; and, in contrast, Prime Minister Lionel Jospin being pelted with stones by young Palestinian militants at BIRZEIT UNIVERSITY in early 2000, after he called the Lebanese Islamist group Hizbullah a terrorist organization.

President Nicolas Sarkozy, elected in 2007, initially promoted himself as a greater friend of Israel than his predecessors, but he seems to be aligning himself with France's traditionally balanced approach, notably reviving the Arab track through reengaging Syria.

France's Contribution to a Peace Settlement

France's logistical and political support for the Palestinian cause makes sense when placed in a global context. Because Paris wants to maintain its regional role in the Middle East, it is sensitive to the regional consequences of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The progressive extension of Israeli-Palestinian hostilities to Lebanon and the involvement of Syria, both former mandate colonies of the French, partially explains French insistence on participating as an autonomous player in any peace negotiation.

France's concept of a fair settlement is based on a calculated appraisal of the impact of the conflict on French interests in the region, combined with certain principles that in general guide the nation's foreign policy, in particular a preference for multilateralism and respect for INTERNATIONAL LAW. Thus France has long argued for an international conference involving all parties to the Israeli-Arab dispute under the auspices of the UNITED NATIONS and based on UN RESOLUTIONS 242 and 338. France supports the "land for peace" solution: a final settlement should ensure the viability of two states living side by side in peace and security.

In the Arab-Palestinian-Israeli context, as in many other international situations, France tends to calculate its contribution in proportion to the involvement of the UNITED STATES, which is considered the only influential external player. The latent Franco-US rivalry was explicit after the 1979 CAMP DAVID ACCORDS (between Israel and Egypt), which the French interpreted as a first step toward a separate bilateral peace that would go against the principle of a comprehensive settlement.

Though playing no active role in the negotiations, France supported the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS and the Israeli-Palestinian peace process that followed. However, after Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN's assassination in November 1995, Chirac returned to more traditional and proactive French diplomacy in the region. After the election of BENJAMIN NETANYAHU (which brought the peace process to a halt) and the Israeli-Lebanese crisis of April 1996, France reactivated its privileged links with Syria and Lebanon and managed to assume a central role in securing a truce after Israel's OPERATION GRAPES OF WRATH on Lebanese territory.

France gradually reconciled itself to the primacy of US leadership and the prominence of the US-Israeli relationship in Washington's diplomacy. Successive French governments have gradually come to realize that assuming a complementary role is more realistic. Thus, the continuity of French discourse on the Middle East from one government to another is remarkable both prior to and since the appointment of Foreign Minister Hubert Védrine (1997–2002), who issued regular appeals for the US government to act as a catalyst and a neutral mediator in any peace negotiation.

Unable to exercise significant influence or play a meaningful role as an individual actor, France increasingly resorted to the European track as a possible means to strengthen its diplomatic position. France's activism in the making of a common EUROPEAN UNION (EU) position on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was essential. The European VENICE DECLARATION, which in 1980 proclaimed the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and called for recognition of the PLO as their legitimate representative, largely reflected French initiatives, as did the 1999 Berlin Declaration, which introduced the notion of a “viable Palestinian state.” At the same time, France strongly advocated that the EU provide large amounts of financial assistance to the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY and that it support developmental projects in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

Despite the successes of French diplomacy within the EU, it has significant limitations as a forum for enhancing French national influence. The enlargement of the European Union, the difficulties in developing a common European diplomacy, and the growth of a camp of pro-Israeli supporters among the new members have demonstrated the limits of EU diplomacy on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

French Public Opinion and the Conflict

Public opinion has increasingly become a major factor in French foreign policy on the Israeli-Palestinian issue. Traditionally the majority of the French public expressed solidarity with Israel, thus showing a degree of political independence vis-à-vis the government’s official position. The French public decidedly rallied to the Palestinian cause only after the start of the First Intifada in 1987, largely because of MEDIA coverage of the uprising. Televised images of Israeli violence in the Occupied Territories gave rise to a new and different picture of Israel as an illegitimate occupying force and of the Palestinians as victims fighting for their liberation.

The 2000 AL-AQSA INTIFADA, with its TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS of Palestinians, Israel’s violent military offensives, and the staggering Palestinian civilian death toll, only reinforced the sympathy of the French for the Palestinian people. From the early 1970s the extreme left in France was committed to the Palestinian liberation movement both for ideological and tactical motives, while social democrats and the right were more hesitant in taking sides. Today opinion polls show that the French public favors a balanced solution that ensures peace and security for both sides.

Since 2006, French decisionmakers have regularly expressed concern about the gradual importation of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict into France itself, a development that directly affects the French Muslim and Jewish communities. The growing tension between the two communities illustrates the current difficulty of the French republic in maintaining its historic, egalitarian model of social cohesion. The French Jewish community (third in importance after the US and Israeli populations, with approximately 500,000 members) faces growing social pressure to distance itself from the positions of the Israeli government as well as confronting the growth of a new kind of anti-Semitism. The rise of anti-Semitic acts in France since 2000 is partly due to the indifference of the 5 million Muslim minority, mostly originating from North Africa, some of whom feel economically and politically marginalized and have become more sensitive to extremist pan-Islamic political messages.

In such a strained internal context it is becoming more difficult for French politicians to take open, balanced positions. ISRAEL’S UNILATRAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA in 2005 was perceived as an important opportunity to restore the Franco-Israeli relationship and ease tensions with the French Jewish community; however, French ambiguity regarding its colonial past and its present ambitions in the Arab world lingered and the dynamics of the relationships remained essentially the same. The 2009 Israeli operation in Gaza showed that the potential for social and political mobilization on both sides within France continued intact, suggesting that the government must take a more active part in the search for a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Bibliography

- Barnavi, Elie, and Luc Rosenzweig. La France et Israël: Une affaire passionnelle. Paris: Perrin, 2002.
- Boniface, Pascal. Est-il permis de critiquer Israël? Paris: Robert Laffont, 2003.
- Laurens, Henry. Le Royaume impossible: La France et la genèse du monde arabe. Paris: Armand Colin, 1990.
- Pryce-Jones, David. Betrayal: France, the Arabs and the Jews. New York: Encounter Books, 2006.
- Rondot, Philippe. “France and Palestine: From Charles de Gaulle to François Mitterrand.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 16:3 (1987).
- Sieffert, Denis. Israël-Palestine, une passion française: La France dans le miroir du conflit israélo-palestinien. Paris: La Découverte, 2004.
- Vaïsse, Maurice. “La Diplomatie française, les juifs et les arabes: Réponse à David Pryce-Jones.” Commentaire. 29:115 (2006).
- Wood, Pia Cristina. “France and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict: The Mitterrand Policies, 1981–1992.” Middle East Journal. 47:1 (1993).

Freedom of MovementSee* RESTRICTIONS ON MOVEMENTFreij, Elias (1920–1998)

Elias Freij was the longtime and well-known Greek Orthodox mayor of BETHLEHEM. In the 1976 WEST BANK municipal elections, he was the only pro-Jordanian notable to be elected. All other winning candidates were aligned with the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), although Freij eventually became an articulate spokesman against the OCCUPATION. During the BRITISH MANDATE Freij was employed in the Public Works Department of the Mandatory government and worked briefly in Cyprus. He was from an old and well-respected family, and after 1948 he ran the family's factory in Bethlehem, producing olive-wood handicrafts, mostly for tourists. In 1970 he became head of the Bethlehem Chamber of Commerce and in 1972 mayor of Bethlehem. Freij also headed Bethlehem University's board of trustees from 1973 on.

After the 1976 elections, Freij maintained public support for the PLO, but he also continued his cordial links with Israel and JORDAN, supporting a Palestinian entity in that country. He was the only mayor of a large city whom Israel did not dismiss in 1982 in response to the nationalist movement within the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, which was made up of prominent intellectuals and mayors. He remained mayor of Bethlehem until 1997. Freij was a member of the Palestinian delegation to the MADRID CONFERENCE and served as minister for tourism and antiquities under the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY.

Bibliography

- Freij, Elias, Lynne Barbee, and Margaret Chiari. "Elias Freij." Journal of Palestine Studies. 13:1 (1983).
 Ma'oz, Moshe. Palestinian Leadership on the West Bank: The Changing Role of the Mayors under Jordan and Israel. Totowa, NJ: Frank Cass, 1984.
 Sahliyah, Emile. In Search of Leadership: West Bank Politics since 1967. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 1988.
 Sandler, Shmuel, and Hillel Frisch. Israel, the Palestinians, and the West Bank. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books, 1984.

French Reports, 1931–1932

The French Reports were two evaluations of Palestinian agriculture and landlessness that Louis French, the director of development for the Mandatory Authority, wrote at the request of the British government. French submitted the first report in December 1931 and the second in April 1932. In both he demonstrated that Zionist IMMIGRATION and LAND purchases and settlement were causing Palestinian farmers to lose their land and advocated restrictions on Jewish immigration and land acquisition. At the time, however, most in London believed that increased agricultural productivity was the solution to the Palestinian problem. For different reasons, both Zionists and Palestinians rejected French's recommendations, and the British government never implemented them.

Bibliography

- Adler, Raya. "The Tenants of Wadi Hawarith: Another View of the Land Question in Palestine." International Journal of Middle East Studies. 20:2 (1988).
 French, Lewis. Reports of Agriculture Development and Land Settlement in Palestine, 1931–32. Jerusalem and London: Palestine Government, 1932.
 Schmitt, Bernadotte E. "British Foreign Policy, 1931–1932." The Journal of Modern History. 23:2 (1951).
 Taylor, Alan R. Prelude to Israel: An Analysis of Zionist Diplomacy 1897–1947. New York: Philosophical Library, 1955.

Fundamentalism, Religious

See CHRISTIANITY; GUSH EMUNIM; HAMAS; ISLAMIC JIHAD MOVEMENT; JEWISH FUNDAMENTALISM

Futuwwa

Futuwwa (Youth and Chivalry) was a paramilitary Arab youth movement founded in 1935 by Jamal Tahir al-Husayni of the prominent AL-HUSAYNI FAMILY of Jerusalem. Some Futuwwa members fought as guerrillas in the 1936–1939 ARAB REVOLT, but Futuwwa fell apart when the Arab Revolt was crushed. The group was reorganized in 1946 and was headed by Kamal Urayqat, who was born in ABU DIS, served in the British Police (1926–1941), and participated in the Palestinian resistance movement under the leadership of ABD AL-QADIR AL-HUSAYNI. Not much reliable information is available about the group's activities in the 1948 WAR.

See also NAJJADA

Bibliography

- Matthews, Weldon. Confronting an Empire, Constructing a Nation: Arab Nationalists and Popular Politics in Mandate Palestine. London: I. B. Tauris, 2006.

---

G

---

Gachelet

In 1995, the orthodox garinim Torani'im (religious nuclei), who had moved to towns throughout Israel to establish kollel (institutes for adult study of the Talmud) to counter secularism and spread orthodoxy, set up an umbrella organization called Gachelet (Garinim Chinuchi'im Leumi'im Torani'im B'Eretz Israel, or National Torah Religious Units in Israel).

Gachelet's function is to form a network of the garinim communities, work for the common purpose of all the communities, and unify efforts among the more than 25 outposts. It approaches government offices in search of grants, develops a unified budget, enlists new families, brings renowned rabbis to speak to the groups, and much more.

Today there are more than 500 young families connected to Gachelet, working mostly in development towns. One Orthodox elder explained the significance of Gachelet: "Gachelet is bringing about the most important revolution in Israeli life in our generation." Indeed, the most important characteristic of Gachelet is its reflection of the increasing influence of the Orthodox in Israeli society.

Gahal Party

The Gahal Party (Gush Herut-Liberalism, or Freedom-Liberal Bloc) was a right-wing political party created in 1965 by members of HERUT (founded by MENAHEM BEGIN) and the LIBERAL PARTY. During the 1967 WAR, Gahal joined the National Unity government, formed to bring together all Israeli political parties in support of the war. In 1973 it combined with other right-wing parties to form the LIKUD. In 1977 the Likud Party ascended to power as a rightist coalition dominated by the Herut/Gahal and has been an important force in Israeli politics ever since. Gahal's platform was consistent with VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY's Revisionist ideology, advocating an Israeli state on both sides of the Jordan River. After his retirement from the army EZER WEIZMAN joined the Gahal Party and led it until 1972.

Bibliography

Roberts, Samuel J. Party and Policy in Israel: The Battle between Hawks and Doves. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.

Shapiro, Yonathan. The Road to Power: Herut Party in Israel. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.

Galili, Israel Balashnikov (1911–1986)

Israel Galili was an Israeli political and military leader and the chief weapons designer for Israeli Military Industries. Born in Brailov, Ukraine, he immigrated to Palestine around 1926. Galili was a high commander in the PALMAH, the elite fighting force of the HAGANA, of which he was also head and later a high-ranking officer in the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF). He designed the Galil assault rifle, one of the standard weapons used by the IDF. Galili was also a leader of the KIBBUTZ movement, a LABOR PARTY leader, and a member of Israeli governments during the 1960s and 1970s. The Institute for Settlement, Defense and Foreign Policy Studies—the Galili Institute—was named for Israel Galili.

See also GALILI PROTOCOLS

Galili Protocols

The Galili Protocols of 1973 were tenets for colonizing and settling the Palestinian territories captured in the 1967 WAR. At the end of the war, ISRAEL GALILI declared, "we must take steps leading to a long-range consolidation, lest we be considered a temporary, transient factor in the occupied areas." The protocols called for extensive additional rural and urban Jewish SETTLEMENTS and commercial and industrial development in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES, including the Golan Heights, the WEST BANK, GAZA, and the Sinai. In particular the protocols advocated expulsion of the indigenous BEDOUIN from the Sinai and destruction of their homes, mosques, and graveyards to clear the lands for all-Jewish kibbutzim, villages, and a city. The LABOR PARTY informally incorporated the Galili Protocols with the ALLON PLAN and the DAYAN PLAN, which together crystallized Labor's commitment to retain major portions of the Occupied Territories. Israel began to implement the Galili Protocols shortly after the 1973 War, and in 1975 expelled 10,000 farmers and Bedouin in northeastern Sinai in the process of constructing the Yamit settlement—an area of special focus in the Galili Proposals.

Bibliography

- Aronson, Geoffrey. "Israel's Policy of Military Occupation." Journal of Palestine Studies. 7:4 (1978).
- Avnery, Uri. "How the Hell Did This Happen? Sharon, the Settlers and Greater Israel." Gush Shalom. 9 January 2005.
- Bar-Or, Amir. "The Evolution of the Army's Role in Israeli Strategic Planning: A Documentary Record." Israel Studies. 1:2 (1996).
- Chomsky, Noam. The Fateful Triangle: The United States, Israel and the Palestinians, 2nd ed. Boston, MA: South End Press, 1999.
- Gilbert, Martin. Israel: A History, revised, updated ed. Santa Barbara, CA: McNally and Loftin Publishers, 2008.
- Jacob, Israel Galili, Shalom Rosenfeld, and Shlomo Avineri Talmon. "The Israel-Arab Conflict (An Exchange of Views). Open Letter to the Minister of Information, Mr. Y. Galili; and Answer to Professor Talmon. Palestinian Entity, Cult of Power and a Bit of Zionism: The New Left and Israel." World Labour Zionist Movement. Ca. 1970.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Gamla

An ultra-right-wing Israeli group, Gamla was founded in 2002 by a group of former Israeli generals and settlers. It published a detailed plan, "The Logistics of Transfer," for the expulsion of Palestinians from the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES and for the TRANSFER OF PALESTINIAN CITIZENS OF ISRAEL from Israel proper. (www.gamla.org.il/english).

Gang of Five

The Gang of Five were the leaders of a putsch in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) and held power briefly in 2002, during the siege of YASIR ARAFAT's headquarters in Ramallah. From March to May, five individuals assumed control of and ran the PNA (the interim government): HASAN 'ASFUR, Gaza security chief MUHAMMAD DAHLAN, SAEB EREKAT, MUHAMMAD RASHID, and NABIL SHA'TH. All residents of GAZA, they represented a particular philosophy within the PNA that wanted a return to the OSLO format of direct negotiations with Israel, an end to the INTIFADA (especially armed attacks), and the restructuring of the PNA's security apparatus into a single organization headed by Dahlan and supported by the US CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY and the intelligence agencies of EGYPT, JORDAN, and SAUDI ARABIA. FATAH leaders and cadres in the WEST BANK were extremely displeased with the policies of the Gang of Five and favored continuing the Intifada, believing it was not the time for negotiations. When 'Asfur was severely beaten and seriously wounded on 13 May 2002, it was assumed that the attack was perpetrated by supporters of JIBRIL RAJUB, the PNA security chief for the West Bank, because 'Asfur had aligned himself with Dahlan. In late May 2002, Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat emerged briefly from his house arrest in the Muqata and put an abrupt halt to the putsch.

See also PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY

Bibliography

- Usher, Graham. Dispatches from Palestine: The Rise and Fall of the Oslo Peace Process. London: Pluto Press, 1999.
- . Palestine in Crisis. London: Pluto Press, 1995.

Gaza Coastal Waters

See FISHING, GAZA STRIP

Gaza-Jericho Agreement I (Cairo I)

Two Gaza-Jericho accords were signed during the OSLO PROCESS. The first was the "Gaza-Jericho First Agreement: Cairo I, 9 February 1994," and the second was the "GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT: CAIRO II, 4 May 1994," including as one of its five annexes the economic accord "Economic Protocol to Gaza-Jericho Agreement," Paris, 29 April 1994.

After the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) and Israel agreed in 1993 on the DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES, which set up the framework for future talks on establishing an interim Palestinian self-governing authority for Gaza and Jericho, the first set of negotiations culminated in what became known as the Gaza-Jericho First Agreement: Cairo I, signed on 9 February 1994. In what became a pattern for all future agreements between the parties, this accord was signed later than the period stipulated in the DOP (by five months in this case). The Israeli team that negotiated the agreement was composed of top ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES (IDF) officers, led by Major-General Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, head of military intelligence and the number two man in the IDF. The Palestinian delegation was led by NABIL SHA'TH, a former businessman and one of YASIR ARAFAT's senior political operatives.

Four months of intensive talks resulted in two partial agreements. One, which involved security and military issues, centered on the PLO's responsibilities for maintaining order among the Palestinians under its jurisdiction, protecting Israel's security, and establishing border control, both on the GAZA border with EGYPT and the JERICHO border with JORDAN. At the same time the IDF retained overall responsibility for security in those areas and maintained military encampments for that purpose. The second agreement was another statement of principles concerning the transfer of authority from Israel to the PNA. Together they further refined the limits on PNA governance and delineated the expectations of the PNA regarding Israel's security needs.

Cairo I, as the agreement is sometimes called because it was signed in that city, became a paradigm in terms of both substance and process for future Israeli governmental negotiations with the Palestinians. It was more a unilateral diktat than a negotiation. Moreover, in what became another precedent, Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak intervened in the talks to strongly pressure the Palestinians to accede to Israeli demands.

The most important aspect of the Gaza-Jericho accord concerned the Jewish SETTLEMENTS. The DOP stated that the FINAL STATUS of the settlements would be negotiated later but said nothing about their status during the interim stages. In this agreement Israel imposed a clause that excluded the "zones of the settlements" from the Palestinian self-ruled areas. New settlement continued throughout the entire Oslo Process. The agreement provided for corridors in Gaza linking the Jewish settlements to Israel and for joint two-vehicle patrols along these corridors "led by the Israeli vehicle," while in Jericho (in the WEST BANK) similar patrols were to be led by the Palestinian vehicle. Palestinians gained access to two religious sites on the Jordan River outside Jericho proper and the right of safe passage to an area along the Dead Sea where Palestinian projects were slated. Israel retained control of all the border stations, including the appointment of a director-general with responsibility for the management and security of each border terminal and the right to veto the entry of any person into the Palestinian areas. The exact size of the district to be included in the Jericho region remained open for resolution in further negotiations, as did the scope and power of a new Palestinian police force and its working relationship with Israeli forces.

The DOP had set the terms of reference for future negotiations: The Cairo I agreement transformed ambiguity into fixed constraints on Palestinian self-rule. Israeli historian Avi Shlaim, who wrote that the OSLO ACCORDS were a "historical breakthrough," said of Gaza-Jericho I, "[It] tilted very heavily toward the Israeli position. The IDF had managed to impose its own conception of the interim period. . . . The outstanding feature of the agreement was thus to allow the IDF to maintain a military presence in and around the areas earmarked for Palestinian self-government." Prime Minister YITZHAK RABIN was more explicit in an 11 May address to the Knesset: "The Palestinians will have a policing authority regarding civilian issues, subject to several constraints. . . . [It] allows blanket [IDF] protection of . . . the settlements in the Gaza Strip. . . . [There are] constraints on Palestinian building and other issues. . . . In other areas—such as religion, ARCHAEOLOGY, WATER, electricity, construction and planning, telecommunications, postal services, and population registration affairs—the transfer of power will be subject to certain constraints in order to secure essential Israeli interests. . . . [It] stipulates that a liaison committee . . . will be established to . . . decide on the principles concerning the entry of persons who left Judea and Samaria [the West Bank] in 1967. Take note we are not talking about REFUGEES from 1948 but about people displaced in 1967. . . . This clause stipulates that all decisions on this issue must be made unanimously by all the members of the [joint liaison] committee. In other words, without Israel's agreement, the committee will not be able to determine how many people will be allowed in and in what stages.”

See also GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT II

Bibliography

- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Israel, State of, and Palestine Liberation Organization. “The Cairo Agreement—09-Feb-94” (Gaza-Jericho I Agreement). www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Archive/Peace+Process/1994/The+Cairo+Agreement+-+09-Feb-94.htm.
- . “Israel-PLO Partial Agreements on Implementation of Declaration of Principles, Cairo, 9 February 1994.” Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:3 (1994).
- Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs. “Suicide and Car Bomb Attacks in Israel since the Declaration of Principles (September 1993).” 2002. <http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Terrorism-%20Obstacle%20to%20Peace/Palestinian%20terror%20since%202000/Suicide%20and%20Other%20Bombing%20Attacks%20in%20Israel%20Since>.
- Massad, Joseph. The Persistence of the Palestinian Question: Essays on Zionism and the Palestinians. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Millward, William. Middle East Peace? (II). Commentary No. 49. Ottawa, ON: Canadian Security Intelligence Service, 1994.
- Rabin, Yitzhak. “Yitzhak Rabin, Speech to the Knesset on Gaza-Jericho Agreement, Jerusalem, 11 May 1994 (excerpts).” Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:1 (1994).
- Said, Edward. The Politics of Dispossession: The Struggle for Palestinian Self-Determination, 1969–1994. New York: Pantheon Books, 1994.
- Schiff, Ze’ev. “The Mistakes of Oslo.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 14 September 2001.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Gaza-Jericho Agreement II (Cairo II)

Israel considered the 9 February agreement partial and insufficiently precise in stipulating the autonomy limitations and security responsibilities of the Palestinian authority. Thus negotiations continued for another four months until a second “Gaza-Jericho Agreement (Cairo II)” was signed on 4 May 1994. On 29 April a separate accord, “Economic Protocol,” was signed in Paris and appended to the Gaza-Jericho Agreement II as “Annex IV.”

The second Gaza-Jericho Agreement contains hundreds of pages; dozens of annexes; and thousands of qualifications, reservations, and detailed exceptions to the notion of “limited self-rule.” Taken together, these suggest a determined Israeli effort to impose controls on the Palestinians and obstacles to the possibility of their succeeding at self-rule. For example, the document stated that the Israeli OCCUPATION laws and Military Orders, which had controlled every aspect of the lives of the Palestinians since 1967, were to remain in force unless they were amended by mutual agreement (which meant that Israel held a veto). It was further agreed that Israel had the right to continue arresting, interrogating, and imprisoning any Palestinian, including those who came from the areas under Palestinian jurisdiction.

Gaza-Jericho II, the “Self-Rule (al-Hukm al-Dhati) Accord,” also called for, among other things:

- Immediate accelerated redeployment of Israeli military forces from the Gaza Strip and Jericho area, to be completed within three weeks
- Appointment of a PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA) to consist of twenty-four members to carry out legislative and executive powers, including the exercise of judicial functions
- Establishment by the PNA of a police force of 9,000 men to guarantee public order and internal security in the areas evacuated by the Israelis
- Measures taken by both sides to prevent all acts of TERRORISM, crime, and hostilities directed against each other, including the use of joint mobile patrols consisting of both Israelis and Palestinians, and legal measures that would be taken against offenders
- Promotion of mutual understanding and tolerance between Israel and the PNA (in their respective societies), abstention from incitement and hostile propaganda, and (within the parameters of freedom of expression) legal measures to prevent such incitement
- A temporary international presence in the Gaza Strip and Jericho area (owing to the HEBRON MASSACRE) to consist of 400 qualified personnel including observers, instructors, and other development experts from five or six of the donor countries

On the question of economic relations, Palestinians and Israelis negotiated for eight months in Paris to achieve an agreement. That accord—the Economic Protocol to the Gaza-Jericho Agreement II—was signed on 29 April 1994 and incorporated into the 4 May agreement as Annex IV. The protocol covers all economic sectors and activities, including the PNA's economic relations with Israel and with other countries. In essence the agreement preserved the structure of economic domination that Israel established over the WEST BANK and GAZA beginning in 1967.

Palestinians are prohibited from having their own currency, without which they cannot make monetary policy or determine interest rates or currency value. Both Israel and the PNA have the right to levy personal or individual taxes. The agreement states that “the Palestinian Tax Administration will conduct its own direct tax policies. Israel will transfer to the Palestinian Authority 75 percent of the revenues from income tax collected from Palestinians employed in Israel. A value added tax (VAT) will be operated by the Palestinian Authority with rates around 15–16 percent.” The PNA Tax Department issued a personal income tax regulation that became effective on 1 January 1995 and is applicable to Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza.

Trade relations remain bound by Israeli trade policy, and imports and exports are rigidly controlled. For example, the protocol specifies what goods the PNA may import (from places other than Israel) and in what quantity. The protocol also imposes complex restrictions on exports (both to Israel and other countries) and a de facto customs union with Israel, which would keep the West Bank and Gaza Strip (WBGs) economically integrated with Israel. With regard to labor, the protocol states that “both sides will attempt to maintain the normality of movement of labor between them,” with the proviso that each side has the “right” to “determine from time to time the extent and conditions of the labor movement in its area.” In practice this is solely an Israeli prerogative, because the Palestinian labor force is dependent on employment in Israel. Additionally, Israel retains control over electricity, energy, transport, trade, and WATER. Israel collects VAT and customs duties on all goods destined for the WBGs, as well as continuing to collect taxes on the salaries of Palestinians working in Israel. Israel must remit these taxes to the PNA, although Israel is allowed to withhold from the PNA, at its discretion, moneys due the Palestinians. For example, after the AL-

AQSA INTIFADA erupted in September 2000, Israel seized all taxes that by the agreement would have accrued to the PNA—a sum amounting to NIS (new Israeli shekels) 1.7 billion. The government then began preparing legislation to allow private Israeli citizens to sue the PNA for damages incurred during the course of the uprising, with compensation to be paid from the confiscated Palestinian funds.

The economic protocol gave the PNA control over human resources and investment decisions, but not over LAND and water. Overall the protocol reflects the historical reality of the continuing Occupation and the vast imbalance in power between the two sides.

Of the four documents concluded to this time Israeli analyst Meron Benvenisti wrote: “A perusal of hundreds of the Agreement’s pages can leave no doubt about who is the winner and loser in this deal. By seeing through all the lofty phraseology, all deliberate disinformation, hundreds of pettifogging sections, sub-sections, appendices and protocols, one can clearly recognize that Israeli victory was absolute and Palestinian defeat abject.”

Nevertheless, the majority of Palestinians believed a genuine peace process was under way and that within five years, the time frame stipulated in the DOP, they would have an independent state in the West Bank, Gaza, and East JERUSALEM. Given these high expectations, when the life situations of ordinary Palestinians began to deteriorate seriously and when the five-year deadline for a final settlement passed without any political achievements, Palestinian frustration was overwhelming—ultimately unraveling in the al-Aqsa Intifada.

See also ECONOMY; GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT I

Bibliography

- Alon, Gideon. “State Plans to Allow Private Damages Suits against the PA.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 25 March 2002.
- Benin, Joel, and Rebecca L. Stein, eds. The Struggle for Sovereignty: Palestine and Israel, 1993–2005. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.
- Benvenisti, Meron. “An Agreement of Surrender.” Ha’aretz (Jerusalem). 12 May 1994.
- B’Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories). Impossible Co-existence: Human Rights in Hebron since the Massacre at the Cave of the Patriarchs. Jerusalem: B’Tselem, 1995.

- Drake, Laura. "Between the Lines: A Textual Analysis of the Gaza-Jericho Agreement." Arab Studies Quarterly. 16 (1994).
- Elmusa, Sharif S., and Mahmud El-Ja'afari. "Power and Trade: The Israeli-Palestinian Economic Protocol." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:2 (1995).
- Farsakh, Leila. "Economic Viability of a Palestinian State in the West Bank and Gaza Strip: Is It Possible without Territorial Integrity and Sovereignty?" The MIT Electronic Journal of Middle East Studies. 1:1 (2001).
- Hleilih, Samir. "The Economic Protocols Are the Price We Had to Pay for the Agreement." Middle East Report. 24:1 (1994).
- Israel, State of, and Palestine Liberation Organization. "Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area. 4 May 1994." www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsourcel/Peace/gazajer.html and www.newyork.israel.org/mfa/go.asp.
- . "Israel-PLO Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area, Cairo, 4 May 1994." Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:4 (1994).
- . "Israel-PLO Protocol on Economic Relations, Paris, 29 April 1994." Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:4 (1994).
- . "Special Document: Israel-PLO Protocol on Economic Relations, Paris, 29 April 1994." Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:4 (1994).
- Malanczuk, Peter. "Some Basic Aspects of the Agreements between Israel and the PLO from the Perspective of International Law." European Journal of International Law. 7:4 (1996).
- Murphy, Emma. "Stacking the Deck: The Economics of the Israeli-PLO Accords." Middle East Report. 25:3 and 4 (1995).
- Olmsted, Jennifer. "Thwarting Palestinian Development: The Protocol on Economic Relations." Middle East Report. 26:4 (1996).
- Paine, Robert. "Behind the Hebron Massacre, 1994." Anthropology Today. 11:1 (1995).
- Palestinian Human Rights Information Center. The Massacre in al-Haram al-Ibrahimi al-Sharif: Context and Aftermath. Jerusalem: PHRIC, 1994.
- Rabin, Yitzhak. "Speech to the Knesset on Gaza-Jericho Agreement, Jerusalem, 11 May 1994 (Excerpts)." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:1 (1994).
- Roy, Sara. "De-development Revisited: Palestinian Economy and Society since Oslo." Journal of Palestine Studies. 28:3 (1999).
- . The Gaza Strip Survey. Jerusalem: The West Bank Data Base Project, 1986.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. The Palestinians: In Search of a Just Peace. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- . "Twenty Years of Israeli Economic Policies in the West Bank and Gaza: Prelude to the Intifada." Journal of Arab Affairs. 8:1 (1989).
- Said, Edward. Peace and Its Discontents: Essays on Palestine in the Middle East Peace Process. New York: Vintage, 1996.

Shehadeh, Raja. "Questions of Jurisdiction: A Legal Analysis of the Gaza-Jericho Agreement." Journal of Palestine Studies. 23:4 (1994).

Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.

Weinberger, Naomi. "The Palestinian National Security Debate." Journal of Palestine Studies. 24:3 (1995).

Gaza Strip

The Gaza Strip epitomizes the essence of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the Palestinian struggle for self-determination. The entity with the highest concentration of Palestinian REFUGEES and the birthplace of FATAH military activism, it is also the site of the first Israeli-Palestinian confrontation in 1956, the First INTIFADA in 1987, and the rise of HAMAS—the Islamic Resistance Movement. The Gaza Strip has also figured prominently in all Arab-Israeli peace initiatives and in four of the seven Arab-Israeli wars. It is the first Palestinian territory from which Israel withdrew troops as a result of ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT plan, implemented in August 2005. Yet, like the rest of Palestine, Gaza is still far from being peaceful or viably independent.

The Gaza Strip as a political entity was created in the aftermath of the 1948 WAR and the signing of the Egyptian-Israeli ARMISTICE AGREEMENT on 24 February 1949. It is a narrow area of land, 28 miles long and 7.8 miles wide at its southern end and 3.4 miles at its narrowest point (a total of approximately 140 square miles). Composed mainly of coastal plains and sand dunes with limited annual rainfall (6–10 inches, or 150–250 millimeters), Gaza is bordered by EGYPT in the south, the Mediterranean Sea on the west, and Israel on the north and east. The Gaza Strip constitutes less than 1 percent of the area of Palestine under the BRITISH MANDATE and less than 4 percent of the area designated by the UN Partition Plan in 1947 (UN RESOLUTION 181) for the proposed Arab state. Unlike either Gaza City (believed to have been established in 3200 BCE) or the WEST BANK, the Gaza Strip historically has not been part of any state. Although administered by Egypt from 1948 to 1967, it was not annexed by Egypt or by Israel, which occupied it after 1967. Gaza has been claimed by the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO) as part of a Palestinian state, which has been endorsed by the international community in its ROAD MAP in 2003, but such a state has yet to be established.

The defining element of the Gaza Strip is its refugee population. Within days of Israel's independence in 1948, the war in Palestine created some 750,000 or more refugees, of whom 150,000 to 200,000 were either expelled or fled their homes and found sanctuary in the Gaza Strip, thereby tripling its population almost overnight. These refugees came mainly from central Palestine and from the coastal areas of Ashdod and JAFFA. Although most 1948 Palestinian refugees went to the West Bank and beyond, the Gaza Strip ended up with the highest concentration of refugees among all receiving countries. Refugees and their descendants represent over 60 percent of the total population of the Gaza Strip today. As a result of their high population growth and the limited space of the territory, the Gaza Strip has become one of the mostly densely populated regions in the world, exceeding 9,739 persons per square mile, compared with 80 persons per square mile in Israel. In 2005 a total of 1.4 million Palestinians were living in the Gaza Strip among its 13 cities and towns and its eight refugee camps. In 2000, 45 percent of the refugees lived in the camps, down from 70 percent in 1967, with the rest residing mainly in Gaza City and the towns of Khan Yunis, Rafah, Jabaliya, and Deir el-Balah. The annual growth rate in the Gaza Strip has been approximately 3.9 percent, one of the highest in the world. Compared to the West Bank, the Gaza Strip is poorer, more limited in economic resources, and more militant politically. The historical evolution of the Gaza Strip since 1948 testifies to its resilience and its unresolved status.

Map 14. The Gaza Strip before Israel's Unilateral Withdrawal

© Foundation for Middle East Peace (FMEP), Washington, DC, reprinted with permission.

Zionist Claims over the Gaza Strip

The Zionist claim to the Gaza Strip was part of its claim to historic Palestine. DAVID BEN-GURION, Israel's first prime minister, argued that Gaza was "an integral part not only of the historic Jewish past" but also inferred in the BALFOUR DECLARATION, which promised Jews a homeland in Palestine. Historically, however, the Jewish presence in Gaza City and in the strip has been neither consistent nor dominant.

According to biblical tradition, the original inhabitants of the area around Gaza City were Avvites, but after David's conquest the land was allotted to the tribe of Judah. Archaeological records, however, indicate that the original inhabitants were the Canaanites, who possessed the area until the beginning of the twelfth century BCE, when it was occupied by the Philistines, possibly as an Egyptian garrison. Gaza City was historically an important commercial outpost, providing a link between Egypt and other ancient empires in the Middle East, as well as a way station for caravans traveling between Asia and Africa, starting from the fifteenth century BCE. Although Jews settled in Gaza in the Talmudic period (70–640 CE), the city was regarded as being outside the halakhic (Jewish religious law) boundaries of the holy land. Under Arab rule, Jewish and SAMARITAN communities flourished in Gaza but were eliminated with its destruction by the Crusaders around 1155 CE. Jews reappeared in the city in the fourteenth century and flourished during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but their community declined again during the nineteenth century.

The Zionist movement in Palestine in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries sought to create a Jewish presence in Gaza as much as in the rest of Palestine. However, by 1944 the JEWISH NATIONAL FUND had bought only 4.5 percent of the land in the Gaza subdistrict (which was three times the size of the present Gaza Strip). Jews bought land in rural Gaza in Beit Hanun and Kefar Darom, but Kefar Darom was the only Jewish settlement created within the boundaries of what became the Gaza Strip. During the British Mandate (1922–1948), the Arab and the Jewish communities were segregated economically and politically. After 1929, British policy prohibited the use of STATE LAND in the Gaza District for purposes of Jewish SETTLEMENT. The last Jews in Gaza City left following the WESTERN WALL DISTURBANCES of 1929. The settlement of Kefar Darom was evacuated in the aftermath of the 1948 War when the Gaza Strip came under Egyptian control.

The 1948 War: The Refugee Question

The Gaza Strip was the site of the first Palestinian government established after the 1948 War, when in September 1948 the LEAGUE OF ARAB STATES announced the creation of the ALL PALESTINE GOVERNMENT under the leadership of the grand mufti of JERUSALEM, AL-HAJJ AMIN AL-HUSAYNI. This government was recognized by IRAQ, SYRIA, and LEBANON but collapsed by December 1948 as a result of internal weaknesses and inter-Arab struggles over who represented the Palestinians. King Abdullah of JORDAN, who annexed the West Bank in December 1948, was interested in taking control of the Gaza Strip as well, because it would provide him with access to the Mediterranean Sea. To that end he conducted secret negotiations with GOLDA MEIR and Ben-Gurion in 1949 and 1950. Egypt opposed these plans and took control of the strip after the collapse of the All Palestine Government. Unlike Jordan, though, Egypt did not claim or seek to assert sovereignty over Gaza.

The fate of the Gaza Strip since 1948 has been tied to the refugee question, which has been at the core of the Israeli-Arab conflict following the 1948 War. The Arab countries, as well as the UNITED NATIONS CONCILIATION COMMISSION FOR PALESTINE, maintained that the refugees must be allowed to return to their homes and land before any negotiations over territorial settlement with Israel. On the other hand, Israel sought a territorial settlement first and planned to bar the refugees' return. Israel believed that achieving peace agreements with the Arab countries would resolve the refugee problem by absorbing them into the Arab states. In May 1949, after months of unsuccessful negotiations in Lausanne, Israel proposed the "Gaza Plan." It was Israel's first and only official plan to tackle the refugee problem up until the CAMP DAVID II negotiation in 2000. Under the Gaza Plan, Israel proposed to annex the Gaza Strip together with all of its refugees in exchange for a peace treaty with Egypt, thereby freeing Egypt of the refugee problem. Israel, however, retreated from the plan almost as soon as it proposed it, in part because the LABOR government feared strong adverse reaction, particularly from its right wing, but more so because it had seriously underestimated the number of Arabs in Gaza at 100,000 to 150,000 when the number was nearer 280,000. While Israel retreated, Egypt also repudiated the proposal. Cairo could not afford the political cost of conceding yet more Arab territory to the new Jewish state. Thus, on both the Israeli and Egyptian sides the plan died. The UNITED STATES supported the Gaza Plan and the proposal that Egypt receive part of the Negev in exchange for giving up Gaza. But Egypt considered this unacceptable because it was based on a refugee-for-land formula and because it rejected Israel's hope that achieving peace agreements with the Arab countries would resolve the refugee problem by absorbing them into the Arab states.

Egyptian Legacy: 1948–1967

The Gaza Strip came under Egyptian military administration in February 1949, on the date of the signing of the armistice agreement between Israel and Egypt. Instead of annexing Gaza or giving its residents Egyptian citizenship, Egypt provided them with travel documents and governed them according to a fusion of Egyptian laws and pre-1948 laws put in place by British and OTTOMAN rulers. Egypt also did not attempt to resolve the refugee problem, which it left to the UN RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY (UNRWA), the organization created in the aftermath of the 1948 War to carry out relief and humanitarian operations for the refugees. UNRWA began its work in Gaza on 1 May 1950 and by 1952 established eight refugee camps for which it assumed total responsibility, while Egypt remained responsible for order and security.

Until 1956, Egypt's main concern was preventing any military confrontation with Israel. During this time Palestinian refugees from all the countries bordering Israel often attempted to return to their villages inside Israel, and throughout the early 1950s nearly 500 Palestinians were killed during such INFILTRATIONS. Most of these incursions were carried out by unarmed individuals seeking to reunite with relatives, harvest their crops, or retrieve property from their homes. The Palestinian resistance, or the fida'iyyun (Palestinian guerrilla fighters) based in Gaza, also occasionally launched strikes on Israeli military posts beyond the border and caused friction along the 1948 armistice line. But JAMAL 'ABD AL-NASIR kept a very tight rein on the Palestinians, and as Israeli historian Benny Morris notes in his Israel's Border Wars, there were remarkably few Israeli casualties during these years: on all Israel's borders, 66 individuals died in 1953 and 55 in 1954. All that changed, however, with Israel's Operation Black Arrow (commonly known as the Gaza Raid), initiated on 27 February and lasting through 1 March 1955, in which Israel launched a massive military raid on Egyptian military headquarters in Gaza, its bloodiest attack against Egypt since the 1948 War. The Gaza Raid resulted in the death of 38 Egyptian soldiers and precipitated a Middle East arms race in which Nasir, in response to Israel's aggression, signed an arms deal with Czechoslovakia. This escalation of tension eventually led to the 1956 Sinai/Suez War. It also provoked Nasir to organize the Palestinian fida'iyyun and encourage them to engage in cross-border armed infiltrations against Israel.

In 1956, Israel invaded Egypt, pushing all the way to Sharm al-Shaykh, and in a previously coordinated arrangement Britain and France attacked Egypt in an effort to reclaim control of the Suez Canal, recently nationalized by Nasir. Israel occupied the Gaza Strip, plus the entire Sinai, which it retained from November 1956 until March 1957, despite UN resolutions and intense US pressure. This short occupation was the only direct political-military confrontation between Israelis and Palestinians outside of Israel from 1949 until 1965, and as such it afforded important insight into Israel's strategy for institutionalizing its control over unannexed Palestinian territories. This five-month occupation was also key in developing Palestinian nationalism and shaping the ideas of major leaders in Fatah (the major Palestinian political party), many of whom had lived and studied in Gaza and Egypt, such as YASIR ARAFAT, SALAH KHALAF (Abu Iyad), and KHALIL AL-WAZIR (Abu Jihad), among others. Most important, it made Palestinians aware of the limits of pan-Arab nationalism and of the need for an independent Palestinian national movement of liberation.

After the Suez War in 1956, Egyptian policy shifted toward supporting Palestinian nationalism and building Palestinian institutions. Nasir declared in 1962 that the Gaza Strip would be the "vanguard for the liberation of Palestine . . . [and] the nucleus of the awaited Arab Palestinian state." However, between 1957 and May 1967 the UN Emergency Force was stationed along the Egyptian side of the armistice line to patrol Gaza's borders with Israel, and during that time no Palestinian guerrilla attacks were carried out across the border. Egypt resumed its civil administration of the Strip after the war and permitted the formation of the Palestine National Union (PNU, al-Ittihad al-Qawmi al-Falastini) in Gaza. Egypt dissolved the PNU in 1965 and created the Gaza Legislative Council, which acted as a ruling council until 1967. Cairo also facilitated the creation of the PLO in 1964 through the League of Arab States, but more as a means of controlling Palestinian nationalist groups and preventing them from taking actions that could drag Egypt into another, unwanted, war with Israel than as supporting the goal of the groups to liberate Palestine. At the first meeting of the PALESTINE NATIONAL COUNCIL in Jerusalem that year, numerous delegates came from Gaza, and three of the fifteen-member PLO EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE were Gazans.

Struggle for Self-Determination: 1967–1993

During the 1967 WAR, Israel occupied the Gaza Strip as well as the entire Sinai Peninsula. UN RESOLUTION 242 (22 November 1967) considered this seizure illegal and the UN called on Israel to return the land in exchange for peace with its neighbors. Israel, however, installed a military administration in the Gaza Strip (and in the West Bank) that controlled the Palestinian population, and created a civilian Jewish presence in the area as a means to foster a Jewish claim over the land and to prevent the establishment of an independent Palestinian entity in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES.

Although resistance to Israeli OCCUPATION was strong in the Gaza Strip, Israeli military repression was fierce. By 1972 ARIEL SHARON, commander of the ISRAEL DEFENSE FORCES' (IDF) Southern Command, broke the resistance in a violent campaign that destroyed thousands of Palestinian homes and killed hundreds of people, and then attempted to remove the refugees from the camps and resettle them in newly constructed Gazan neighborhoods—in exchange for their relinquishing their refugee status. The program was only minimally successful, because few Palestinians were willing to abandon their status as refugees (thereby giving up all claims to their property in Israel) in exchange for better housing, even though most were living in makeshift shelters without electricity or running water. After the resettlement scheme foundered, Sharon enacted brutal measures to put the camps under full military control. He also completely sealed the Gaza Strip from the rest of the world by constructing a security barrier—a ten-foot-high barbed wire and chain-link fence surrounding most of the Gaza Strip that was regularly patrolled by Israeli soldiers. It had three points of entry: ERETZ, RAFAH, and Nahal Oz (expanded in 1995 to include KARNI CROSSING), which remain the only points of exit from or entry to Gaza today. With the 2005 unilateral Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, Eretz and Karni remain under Israel's control, while the Rafah/PHILADELPHI ROUTE is under Egyptian rule.

Until 1995, Israel maintained direct military administration over the Gaza Strip. Between 1967 and 1995, Israel constructed seventeen settlements in the Strip, housing between 7,000 and 8,000 Jewish settlers, and it also controlled approximately 20 percent of the Gaza Strip's land for the colonies, together with its WATER and other resources, bypass ROADS, and military installations. Although Jewish settlers represented less than 0.5 percent of the total population living in Gaza, they were allotted 16 times more water per capita and 84 times more land per capita than the Palestinians.

Israel regulated the economic, political, and legal life of the 1.4 million Gazans through military orders and the control of other legal institutions. Although Israel severed Gaza's economic relations with Egypt, it kept the Egyptian legal system and administration with regard to civilian affairs (EDUCATION, HEALTH CARE, etc.). Gazans continued to need travel documents issued by Egypt as well as exit PERMITS from the Israeli military governor. Economically, the Gaza ECONOMY was integrated into that of Israel through a policy that allowed Palestinian workers to be employed in Israel, restricted Palestinian exports, and flooded Palestinian markets with Israeli goods, setting in motion a process of economic decline in Gaza.

Politically, Israel's position shifted from wanting to annex the Gaza Strip to using it as a bargaining chip in peace negotiations with the Arab countries and eventually with the Palestinians, and finally to disengaging from it unilaterally. According to the ALLON PLAN, discussed in the Israeli cabinet within weeks of the 1967 War, Israel would annex the Gaza Strip after resettling 350,000 of its refugees into northern Sinai and the West Bank. However, after failing to impose a refugee resettlement program on the Gaza Strip or to contain the area's DEMOGRAPHIC growth, and in the context of strong Palestinian political opposition to the Occupation, the Israeli government gave up on the idea of annexation by the early 1970s and proposed returning Gaza to Arab control. Between 1970 and 1993, Israel's official position supported what came to be known as the "JORDANIAN OPTION," namely the return of some West Bank Palestinian areas plus the Gaza Strip to Jordan. In 1971 the Israeli military commander in the strip appointed RASHAD AL-SHAWWA, who supported a united Arab kingdom with Jordan and the West Bank, as mayor of Gaza City. The Jordanian Option, however, was opposed by Gazans and the PLO, and by 1988 was abandoned by Jordan.

The Gaza Strip figured prominently in the peace negotiations that began between Egypt and Israel in 1977–1978. The Framework for Peace in the Middle East, signed by Israel and Egypt at Camp David in 1978, proposed a limited form of autonomy for the Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, although Israel would retain control of land, water, settlements, and BORDERS. It also promised a local Palestinian governing council similar to the one that existed in Gaza before 1967. President Anwar Sadat of Egypt suggested implementing the autonomy plan first in the Gaza Strip, because it was smaller and its borders, unlike those of the West Bank, were not in dispute. The Israeli government supported in principle this "Gaza First" approach, but failed to implement any of the related tenets of the Framework for Peace. Not until the 1993 DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES did Tel Aviv actually commit to a "Gaza First" plan and then largely as a means of extricating itself from the demographic and other problems Gaza posed as well as an "exchange" for a strengthened and solidified Israeli hold over the West Bank. The 1978 autonomy plan, however, was rejected by the Gazans, including Mayor Shawwa, as well as by the PLO, which was popular in Gaza by that time. In 1982, Israel removed Shawwa from his post, and the Israeli CIVIL ADMINISTRATION, which remained under military command, reassumed control of the Gaza municipal council. In 1991, Israel allowed the establishment of a new Palestinian municipal council, headed by Fayez Abu Rahmeh, an attorney and Fatah activist.

The Gaza Strip's rejection of Israeli Occupation was clearly expressed with the eruption of the first Palestinian uprising on 9 December 1987, which was triggered when an Israeli vehicle hit and killed four Palestinians, including two children, and injured seven in the Jabaliya refugee camp in Gaza. The First Intifada, as it is called, soon spread to the rest of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. Although its beginning was spontaneous, it quickly transformed into an organized rebellion that relied on a campaign of civil and economic disobedience. Israel met this resistance with a violent response that led, between 9 December 1987 and 30 December 1990, to the deaths of 782 Palestinians (mainly civilians) killed by Israeli forces and settlers, the deaths of 65 Israelis (civilians and military) killed by Palestinians, and 130,787 Palestinians injured. Despite its heavy human toll, the First Intifada was important in changing the political landscape of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Locally the Intifada gave rise to the Islamic resistance movement Hamas (Harakat al-Muqawama al-Islamia), which emerged out of the MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD in Gaza. Hamas, which Israel initially supported in an attempt to undermine the PLO, was soon to compete with the PLO for dominance of the Palestinian political agenda. Regionally the Intifada brought an end to the Jordanian Option, as Jordan declared its disengagement from the West Bank on 31 July 1988, stating that it did not represent or speak for the Palestinian people.

The Intifada also enabled the PLO, under the leadership of Yasir Arafat, to announce its historic compromise with Israel. On 15 November 1988 the PLO declared that it supported the creation of a Palestinian state on any part of liberated Palestine—meaning it accepted a state on the 22 percent of Palestine (the West Bank, East Jerusalem, and Gaza) that was not Israel. In December 1988 the PLO announced its recognition of Israel, along with its acceptance of UN Resolution 242 and the two-state solution. The PLO's historic compromise opened the way for the UNITED STATES–PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION DIALOGUE and for Palestinian (though not PLO) participation at the MADRID CONFERENCE, which opened on 21 October 1991. The Palestinian delegation, which was part of the joint Palestinian-Jordanian delegation, was led by HAYDAR 'ABD AL-SHAFI, a prominent doctor who was the chairman of the first Gaza Legislative Council and a longtime political activist from Gaza.

Oslo Years: 1993–2000

The secret Oslo negotiations between Israel and the PLO in 1992–1993, which sidetracked the Madrid multilateral peace talks, initially revolved around the Gaza Strip. Israeli officials, including LABOR PARTY leaders YITZHAK RABIN and SHIMON PERES, were interested in resurrecting the “Gaza First” option, first proposed at the Camp David negotiations in 1978. They proposed Palestinian autonomy in Gaza under PLO rule as a first step toward a peaceful settlement between Israel and the Palestinians. The PLO accepted the idea of phased Palestinian self-rule, so long as it was not confined exclusively to Gaza, and proposed initial self-rule in the West Bank town of JERICHO as well. The OSLO ACCORDS, signed in September 1993 (Declaration of Principles), and GAZA-JERICHO AGREEMENT I in May 1994 provided for mutual recognition between Israel and the PLO and the establishment of an interim government, the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), in Gaza and Jericho. On 25 May 1994, IDF forces redeployed from Gaza City and Jericho. On 1 July 1994 Arafat returned to Gaza from his exile in TUNIS, his first entry into the Palestinian territories.

Yitzhak Rabin, however, decided that it was necessary to physically tighten the existing fence around Gaza to give Israel more control. He ordered the construction of a GAZA STRIP BARRIER, a continuous obstacle, 37.5 miles (60 kilometers) long with four crossing points—Eretz, Karni, Kisufim, and Sufa. Kisufim was used exclusively by Israeli civilians and army forces. Most of the fence was equipped with sensors, and bordering it on either side was an area of 300 meters that the IDF leveled and cleared of all foliage. The fence was continuously manned with troops sitting in watchtowers and utilizing other means of scouting and patrolling the terrain.

The Gaza Strip proved to be the test for Palestinian state building. The Oslo II, or INTERIM AGREEMENT, in September 1995 set out the terms for staged Israeli redeployment from the Palestinian territories and the scope of Palestinian jurisdiction. In January 1996, ELECTIONS were held for the PALESTINIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL, the legislative branch of the PNA, and for the presidency of the PNA. These were boycotted by Hamas, which had already condemned the Madrid and Oslo negotiations. Hamas, however, accepted the return of the PLO from exile in Tunis and strove to avoid a civil war among the Palestinians, despite its disagreement with the Oslo framework. Under Arafat's leadership the PNA established a large state bureaucracy and security force filled with members of the PLO OLD GUARD, who returned from Tunis after being driven from Lebanon in 1982, as well as loyal Fatah members from the Occupied Territories. The PNA government and legislature, whose offices oscillated between Gaza and Ramallah (in the West Bank), sought to lay the foundation for an independent Palestinian state but without much success.

The terms of the Oslo Accords seriously constrained the scope of Palestinian jurisdiction and basically redefined rather than ended Israeli Occupation. While the Oslo Accords transferred to the PNA functional jurisdiction over civilian affairs, they strictly limited territorial jurisdiction. By the time FINAL STATUS TALKS took place at Camp David in July 2000, the PNA had functional jurisdiction over 93 percent of the Palestinian population, but territorial control over only 80 percent of the Gaza Strip and less than 22 percent of the land in the West Bank (Area A). Palestinian authority in Gaza was further constrained by Israel's continuous control of borders, land, and water resources, along with the expansion of its settlements. The entry and exit of Palestinian citizens, workers, goods, and government officials out of and into Gaza remained under the control of the Israeli permit and CLOSURE policy. Between 1994 and 2000, Israel imposed over 493 days of closure on Gaza.

By 1997, one of the major challenges facing the PNA was the need to maintain its legitimacy in view of the growing opposition to the Oslo peace process, mainly led by Hamas, which had its most violent expression in SUICIDE BOMBINGS on civilians inside Israel. This strategy, initiated in April 1994 after Israeli settler BARUCH GOLDSTEIN massacred twenty-nine Palestinians at prayer in the AL-IBRAHIMI MOSQUE in the West Bank city of HEBRON in February 1994, intensified after the 1996 assassination of Hamas militant YAHYA AYYASH in Gaza. The PNA's response to Hamas's suicide attacks was to attack Hamas, imprisoning many of its members, closing down its offices and associations, and clamping down on its social activities and press. Opposition to the PNA also grew from within its own ranks, among the young cadres of Fatah, as well as from secular forces and the rest of the population who were opposed to Arafat's antidemocratic style of government, patronage, corruption, attempts to control the NGO community, and failure to hold elections scheduled for 1999. The AL-AQSA INTIFADA of 2000 was nearly as much a rebellion against the PNA's style of government as against Israel's policies during the Oslo years, which had deepened rather than ended Israeli Occupation.

2000–2005: The Road Map to Disengagement

The al-Aqsa Intifada, which erupted on 29 September 2000, ended the Oslo peace process. The second uprising proved to be far more militarized, violent, and devastating for the Palestinians than had the First Intifada. Both Hamas and Fatah's AL-AQSA MARTYRS' BRIGADES, the military wing of Fatah in the West Bank, led the resistance against Israel's Occupation through a series of armed strikes and suicide attacks inside Israel. This strategy led to a harsh Israeli military response that brought a heavy toll on Palestinian lives and INFRASTRUCTURE, particularly in the Gaza Strip. Between 28 September 2000 and 26 December 2008, a total of 4,837 Palestinians and 1,062 Israelis were killed. During heavy Israeli military escalations in 2001, 2003, 2004, and 2006 the Gaza Strip suffered severe human and material losses. According to World Bank data, between 2000 and 2008 and on the eve of another major Israeli operation in Gaza, 75 percent of the population lived below the poverty level, the PNA's infrastructure and Hamas's institutions were destroyed, and per capita annual income had fallen from $1,231 to $942.

At the start of the Intifada, Israel cut the Gaza Strip into three parts, with the only road that connected the south to the north frequently shut by the Israeli military. In the spring of 2004, Israel's policy of TARGETED ASSASSINATIONS led to the liquidation of most Hamas leaders, including SHEIKH AHMAD YASIN, the spiritual founder of the movement, and his successor, ABD AL-AZIZ RANTISI.

Israel's political response to the al-Aqsa Intifada was its plan for unilateral disengagement from Gaza, which was officially announced in April 2004 and revised and approved by the Israeli cabinet in June 2004. This plan formalized the objective of successive Israeli governments, which was to disengage from the Gaza Strip while maintaining control over the major part of the West Bank. The plan called for the evacuation of all Israeli settlements in the Gaza Strip and the redeployment of the Israeli army outside the territory. It also promised Israeli withdrawal from four small settlements in the northern West Bank, but specified that "in Judea and Samaria [the West Bank] some areas will remain part of the State of Israel." When US president GEORGE W. BUSH endorsed the disengagement plan, it gained some international acceptance, despite its violation of UN resolutions that called for a negotiated settlement and affirmed the illegality of acquiring land by force. The plan effectively sidetracked the April 2003 internationally backed Road Map to peace in the Middle East, which provided the clearest US-led international call for the idea of a viable Palestinian state as a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Israel completed its disengagement from Gaza in August 2005, successfully evacuating all the Jewish settlers and destroying their seventeen settlements without major incident. Although Israel considers that its responsibility toward the Gaza Strip has ended as a result of the disengagement, virtually no other international organization agrees, and based on major tenets of INTERNATIONAL LAW an international consensus exists that given the degree of "effective control" Israel maintains over Gaza, the Occupation remains and Israel is responsible for the welfare of the population. Israel continues to control exit and entry points to the strip and to "maintain exclusive authority for Gaza's air space, and . . . exercise security activity in the sea off the coast of the Gaza Strip" (Disengagement Plan, Article III.1). The plan also stipulates that the Strip be demilitarized and that the water, electrical, and other infrastructure that links Gaza to Israel be kept in place (Article VIII). It further stipulates that the Rafah border be monitored by a joint Israeli-Egyptian-Palestinian police force while all other borders and exit points remain under exclusive Israeli control. Israel's hegemony over the borders and Gaza's links to the West Bank and East Jerusalem effectively eliminates Palestinian jurisdiction as well as any Palestinian movement among these areas.

During the six weeks while Israel evacuated its settler population from the Gaza Strip, the Israeli military conducted 1,041 security raids in Palestinian areas, half of which were in Gaza, killing a total of 22 Palestinians.

Gaza in the Aftermath of the Unilateral Disengagement

Rather than leading to Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank as the PNA hoped, Israeli disengagement from the Gaza Strip and its continued domination of Palestinian resources (land, water, etc.) brought about deeper economic and political destruction. It continued Israel's brutal Occupation of the Palestinians and institutionalized the fragmentation of the Palestinian polity.

Israel's unilateral disengagement from the Gaza Strip on 15 August 2005 reinforced the power of Hamas in the Strip and contributed to its success in the Palestinian Legislative Council elections in January 2006. However, Hamas's electoral win led to international sanctions (because Hamas refused to officially recognize Israel's right to exist), which in turn deprived the PNA of the annual average of $55 million in customs and revenues clearance that Israel was required by the Interim Agreement to remit to the PNA and that constituted 70 percent of the PNA's budget. The PNA was also deprived of international aid, and Gaza was sealed from any trade with the outside world and with the West Bank (the Karni border crossing was closed 47 percent of its scheduled operating time in 2006, and completely closed after 2007). In June 2006, following a Hamas raid near the Kerem Shalom border crossing that resulted in the death of two Israeli soldiers and the capture of IDF corporal Gilad Shalit, Israel launched OPERATION SUMMER RAINS. This operation, which lasted until 26 November 2006, resulted in the death of 402 Palestinians and 6 Israelis. Palestinians in Gaza responded by continuing to launch QASSAM ROCKETS that reached as far as Ashkelon and Sderot. Between 2001 and 2008, some 15,000 Qassam rockets were fired from Gaza, killing some 18 Israeli civilians.

Together with the military Operation Summer Rains, Israel imposed a total blockade on the Gaza Strip that lasted beyond January 2009. This contributed to an implosion of Palestinian society and polity, as interclan fighting and clashes between Fatah and Hamas militias took to the street. In February 2007, Hamas and Fatah signed the MECCA AGREEMENT, which led to the establishment of a Palestinian National Unity government as a means to resolve their conflict and entice the international community to lift the sanctions it had imposed on the Palestinians following the Hamas 2006 victory. The National Unity government failed, and in mid-June 2007, Hamas took control of Gaza, ousting Fatah militants from the Strip. Thereafter the Gaza Strip was split politically, economically, and territorially from the West Bank.

Israel tightened its siege of the strip after the Hamas takeover. In September 2007 it declared Gaza an "enemy entity" and intensified its air and ground raids. With all access to and from the outside world severed, in January 2008, Hamas militants blew holes in the border wall with Egypt, allowing hundreds of thousands of Palestinians to go into Egypt to stock up on food, medicine, and other essential goods for a total of ten days, after which Egypt closed its borders. Israeli air strikes and Palestinian rocket attacks on Israeli towns escalated in 2008 until a six-month truce agreement, brokered by Egypt, was accepted by Israel and Hamas on 19 June 2008. Meanwhile, the humanitarian situation reached disastrous proportions. In 2006, Israel had destroyed Gaza's main electricity station and most of its major roads, and ruined hundreds of acres of agricultural land. By 2008, 56 percent of the population was food insecure and the poverty level had reached 79.4 percent. People in Gaza continued to suffer from a lack of electricity, fuel, and spare parts, as well as food, medicine, and cash.

Hamas leaders signaled readiness to accept Israel's de facto existence, even if they did not explicitly recognize Israel's right to exist. In a series of interviews in April 2008, they called for a peace process with Israel based on Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 borders, and an end of the blockade. Israel, however, declared its intention to “topple the Hamas regime in Gaza,” as expressed by Foreign Minister TZIPI LIVNI in December 2008. On 4 November 2008, Israel violated the June 2008 truce and entered Gaza, killing six people and capturing six others. On 19 December 2008, subsequent to further clashes, Hamas called off the six-month truce. On 27 December 2008, Israel launched OPERATION CAST LEAD, which lasted until 18 January 2009. The stated purpose of the offensive was to end the firing of Qassam rockets from the Gaza Strip into Israel. In the twenty-two days of Operation Cast Lead, the IDF reported 10 fatalities, all combatants, of whom 4 were killed by friendly fire, 1 inside Israel by a Qassam rocket, and 5 in combat with Palestinian forces. The Palestinian death toll reached a total of 1,417, of which 926 were civilians, including 313 children and 116 women. Noncombatant police officers constituted 255, and 236 combatants were killed, representing 16.7 percent of the total deaths. The number of civilian fatalities included 16 medics and 4 journalists. The number of wounded was approximately 5,500, of which two-thirds were civilians. Operation Cast Lead caused the destruction of 15–20 percent of the Gaza Strip’s total infrastructure at an estimated cost of US$1.4 billion.

Hamas has not been defeated, but Gaza remains under siege and its population destitute. Talks among Hamas, Fatah, and other Palestinian factions resumed in Cairo in February 2009 in an attempt to achieve national Palestinian reconciliation.

The Gaza Strip’s Economic Predicament

The economy of the Gaza Strip has been characterized by its internal weakness, its small size relative to that of the West Bank, its dependence on external sources of income, and its unsustainability. During the late nineteenth century and the British Mandate period, the economy, though largely based on subsistence agriculture, was already developing an export trade and market production, particularly of wheat and barley. During the period of Egyptian administration, services became the main source of economic activity, accounting for 55 percent of gross domestic product (GDP), followed by agriculture, which accounted for 34 percent of GDP. In 1966, gross national product (GNP) per capita in the Gaza Strip was half that of the West Bank and less than 1.6 percent that of Israel. Most of the labor force was employed in services (45 percent), followed by agriculture (35 percent), which was almost exclusively citrus production. UNRWA remains the main employer and provider for the refugees, who comprise 78 percent of Gaza’s population.

The Occupation of the Gaza Strip in 1967 integrated this refugee-dominated and mainly agricultural economy into Israel’s industrial and more developed economy, expropriating its resources and preventing it from competing with Israeli industries by means of trade and resource restrictions and barriers. According to Sara Roy, a leading expert on Gaza, from 1967 the Strip underwent a process of “de-development.” The Israeli Occupation led to major structural changes in the Gaza economy, the central one being Palestinian dependence on the Israeli labor market. Between 1975 and 1993, 30 to 45 percent of the Gaza Strip’s total labor force worked in Israel, thereby financing the Strip’s trade deficit with Israel, which represented over 42 percent of Gaza’s GNP. While employment in Israel was key to improving Palestinian standards of living and increasing demand in the domestic economy, Israeli restrictions on domestic investment and on Gazan access to land, water, and outside markets prevented the development of a vibrant, internally articulated Palestinian economy. Israel became the market for 70 percent of Gaza’s (and the West Bank’s) exports and the source of 90 percent of its imports. Although Gazan agriculture became more productive, it was skewed toward Israeli demand rather than toward domestic or international markets, and its share of the GDP dropped to less than 20 percent after 1990. The industrial sector was organized in small cottage industries such as sewing, increasingly geared toward subcontracting for large Israeli companies. Like those in the West Bank, Gazan industries were not allowed to compete with Israeli goods and represented less than 11 percent of GDP by 1991. Most Palestinian investment went into housing and construction (80 percent of total investment in the 1980s), which absorbed over 10 percent of the labor force and generated 18 percent of Gaza’s GDP.

The OSLO PROCESS of 1994–2000 brought promises to “lay the groundwork for strengthening the economic base of the Palestinian [economy] and for exercising its right of economic decision making in accordance with its own development plans and priorities” (preamble to the Economic Protocol, Interim or Oslo II Agreement). However, the Gazan economy further deteriorated, largely as a result of the failure of the Oslo Process to end Israeli Occupation and because of the myriad security and economic provisions in the Interim Agreement, Oslo II, that worked to Palestinian disadvantage. Israel remained in control of borders and security—and thereby of the movement of goods into and out of the Gaza Strip. It also restricted Palestinian workers' access to Israel, as it consolidated the permit and closure policies. The number of Gazans working in Israel fell from 43,000 in 1992 to fewer than 10,000 in 1996, or 8 percent of the labor force. Unemployment, meanwhile, soared from 15 to 32 percent between 1994 and 2000, decreasing whenever labor and goods access to Israel was restored. After 2000, unemployment rose to 38 percent. In 1998, those living in poverty, defined as those earning less than US$2.10 per day, constituted 46 percent of the population, compared with less than 16 percent in the West Bank.

The Oslo years led to the separation of the Gaza economy from Israel and its de facto separation from the economy of the West Bank. Structurally the Gaza economy became dependent on foreign aid, customs revenues from Israel, and public employment, in contrast to the pre-1993 era when it was dependent on labor export to Israel. The establishment of the PNA expanded the public sector and absorbed 26 to 32 percent of the labor force in the Gaza Strip, but it also created a system of patronage that proved detrimental to the efficient management of resources. At the same time, the sustainability of the public sector and the economy at large remained dependent on the generosity and vision of the donor community and custom revenues collected by Israel. These revenues represented 70 percent of the PNA's revenues and 20 percent of Palestinian GDP. Meanwhile, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and the EUROPEAN UNION disbursed $3.5 billion to the Palestinian economy between 1995 and 2000. They have also become the main advisors, and supporters, of Palestinian finances and the economy at large. Nevertheless, they failed to make the Palestinian economy self-sufficient. Meanwhile, trade between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank dropped by 30 percent between 1994 and 1997, and trade with Israel dropped by 40 percent. By 2007 the Gaza economy was half the size of the West Bank's, and its GDP per capita was two-thirds that of the West Bank.

The al-Aqsa Intifada and disengagement plan confirmed the separation of the Gaza Strip from Israel and the West Bank and destroyed whatever remained of the Gaza economy. While formally committed to previously signed economic agreements, the disengagement plan suggests a severance of economic relations between Israel and the Gaza Strip. At the time of disengagement Israeli officials made it clear that they intended to terminate permits for Palestinians workers and their access to Israel by 2008, and to end customs arrangements with the Strip. While the disengagement plan promises the construction of an international SEAPORT and AIRPORT in Gaza, the movements of persons and freight will continue to be supervised by Israel. The international community promised to disburse $1.1 billion a year between 2004 and 2008 to help the Palestinian economy recover after the disengagement. However, by 2008 the Gaza economy had completely collapsed as a result of the sanctions and siege imposed on it since 2006.

According to the 2008 World Bank report, the manufacturing sector was 98 percent inactive, the banking sector had shut down, and the private sector had been destroyed. Bare economic survival became a function of "tunnel economics" (consisting of over 500 tunnels through which goods were smuggled from Egypt to the Strip), the economics of informal sector, and monopoly thugs unaccountable to law.

See also ECONOMY; INFILTRATION AND RETALIATION; ISRAELI MILITARY COURT SYSTEM; ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA; KARNI CROSSING; OPERATION CAST LEAD; RAFAH CROSSING; WEST BANK

Bibliography

- Allon, Yigal. "Israel: The Case for Defensible Borders." Foreign Affairs. 55:1 (1976).
- Farsoun, Samih, and Christina Zacharia. Palestine and the Palestinians. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1997.
- "Gaza Strip." Encyclopedia Judaica, vol. 7: 339–342. Jerusalem: Iketer Publishing House, 1972.
- Gresh, Alain, and Dominique Vidal. Les 100 clés du Proche-Orient. Paris: Pluriel, 2002.
- Israel, State of. The Cabinet Resolution Regarding the Disengagement Plan. 6 June 2004. www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Peace+Process/Reference/Documents/Revised+Disengagement+Plan+6-June-2004.htm.
- Israel, State of, and Palestine Liberation Organization. Israeli-Palestinian Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Authority. 13 September 1993. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Peace/dop.html.

- . Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. 28 September 1995. www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Peace/interim.html.
- Lein, Yehezkel. One Big Prison: Freedom of Movement to and from the Gaza Strip on the Eve of the Disengagement Plan. Jerusalem: B'Tselem (Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories) and HaMoked (Center for the Defence of the Individual), 2005.
- McDowall, David. Palestine and Israel: The Uprising and Beyond. London: I. B. Tauris, 1990.
- Morris, Benny. Israel's Border Wars, 1949–1956: Arab Infiltration, Israeli Retaliation, and the Countdown to the Suez War, 2nd revised ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Program on Humanitarian Policy and Conflict Research, Harvard University. Gaza 2010: Human Security Needs in the Gaza Strip: Population Projections for Socioeconomic Development in the Gaza Strip. Working Paper No. 1, May 2006. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University.
- Roy, Sara. "The Gaza Economy." Palestine Center Information Brief No. 143, October 2006. Washington, DC: Palestine Center.
- . The Gaza Strip: The Political Economy of Development, 2nd ed. Washington, DC: Institute of Palestine Studies, 2002.
- . "Praying with Eyes Closed: Reflections on the Disengagement." Journal of Palestine Studies. 34:4 (2005).
- United Nations. The Humanitarian Monitor—Occupied Palestinian Territory. No. 4. August 2006.
- World Bank. Four Years: Intifada, Closures and Palestinian Economic Crisis: An Assessment. Washington DC: World Bank, 1 October 2004.
- . Stagnation or Revival? Israeli Disengagement and Palestinian Economic Prospects: Aid, Access and Reform. Economic Monitoring Report to the Ad Hoc Liaison Committee. Washington, DC: World Bank, 1 December 2004.

—Leila Farsakh

Gaza Strip Barrier

Begun in 1994 and completed in 1996 in the context of the OSLO ACCORDS, a separation barrier around the Gaza Strip, home to 1.4 million Palestinians, was constructed at the order of Israeli prime minister YITZHAK RABIN. Completely encircling Gaza, the barrier is made up of an electric fence with observation towers, sensors, and buffer zones on lands bordering Israel, and concrete and steel walls on lands bordering EGYPT. It is 37 miles (60 kilometers) long with three crossing points: the northern ERETZ into Israel, the southern RAFAH into Egypt, and the eastern KARNI used only for cargo.

Between December 2000 and June 2001 the part of the barrier separating the Gaza Strip from Israel was reconstructed, and a 1-kilometer buffer zone was added, as well as high-technology observation posts. Soldiers were also given new rules of engagement, which allow them to fire at anyone seen there at night. Along the Egyptian border with Rafah, Israel established a buffer zone 200 to 300 yards wide known as the PHILADELPHI ROUTE, or Philadelphi corridor. In order to construct this buffer zone, entire blocks of houses were demolished at the main entrance to Rafah's central throughway as well as in other neighborhoods. In 2005, Israel constructed a concrete wall over 26 feet (8 meters) high that was equipped with electronic sensors and underground concrete barriers to prevent tunneling, adding to the already existing steel wall running the length of the border with Egypt.

The three crossing points in the barrier are crucial to the population, who live in an area too small to be self-sufficient, at barely 3.4–7.8 miles (6–12 kilometers) wide and 25 miles (41 kilometers) long, with a total area of 140 square miles (360 square kilometers). In 2007 approximately 1.4 million Palestinians lived in the Strip, of whom almost 1 million were UN-registered REFUGEES. The Eretz crossing is the only pedestrian exit point from the Gaza Strip into Israel. Palestinians who have a PERMIT (some 5,000) to work in Israel or those with permits allowing them to receive medical treatment or to visit immediate family in prisons in Israel use this crossing, provided that it is open and that soldiers honor the permits. As a crossing for the transportation of cargo and goods between Israel and the Gaza Strip, Karni is vitally important to the Palestinian economy. Nevertheless, the Karni crossing is often closed by Israel.

On 17 June 2005, Israel announced plans to build a barrier that will extend out to the sea from its border with Gaza in order to deter Palestinian infiltrators from entering Gaza and then Israel. The Jerusalem Post reported that the first 150 meters of the sea barrier would consist of concrete pilings set into the seabed, while the remaining 800 meters would be a submerged, 1.8-meter-deep "floating fence." The Post further revealed that the barrier would stretch 950 meters into the Mediterranean from Israel's boundary with the northern Gaza Strip. The aim, according to Israel, is to stop Gaza militants from launching attacks into Israel by sea, but it will be the death knell for the Gazan fishing industry.

Bibliography

- Akkaya, Sebnem, Norbert Fiess, Bartłomiej Kaminski, and Gael Raballand. Economics of "Policy-Induced" Fragmentation: The Costs of Closures Regime to West Bank and Gaza. World Bank. Middle East and North Africa Working Paper Series, No. 50. January 2008.
- Makovsky, David. "How to Build a Fence." Foreign Affairs. March–April 2004.
- O'Sullivan, Arieh. "Israel to Build Terror Barrier off Gaza Coast." The Jerusalem Post. 17 June 2005.
- Pedersen, Jon, Mona Christophersen, and Pål Sletten. Paying a Price: Coping with Closure in Gaza and the Reinforcement of the Fence 2001. Fafo-report 371. Oslo: Fafo Institute for Applied Social Science, 2001.
- Rabin, Yitzhak. Policy Statement Presented by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to the Knesset on the Gaza-Jericho Agreement. Jerusalem: Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 11 May 1994. <http://www.mfa.gov.il/MFA/Archive/Speeches/POLICY%20STATEMENT%20BY%20PM%20RABIN%20TO%20THE%20KNESSET%20ON%20GAZ>.
- Spetalnick, Matt. "Israel to Build Sea Barrier Near Gaza Coast." ReliefWeb. 17 June 2005. <http://www.reliefweb.int>.

Gaza, Unilateral Withdrawal from

See ISRAEL'S UNILATERAL DISENGAGEMENT FROM GAZA

General Strike

See ARAB REVOLT

Geneva Accord, 2003

The eruption of the second Palestinian INTIFADA and the January 2001 election of ARIEL SHARON as Israel's prime minister ended any serious official negotiations for a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Unwilling to allow the escalating violence to destroy the chances for peace, Israeli and Palestinian delegations met in Geneva in October 2003. The Israeli delegation, which included Amram Mitzna, mayor of HAIFA and leader of the LABOR PARTY, and Labor Party leader Avraham Burg, was headed by YOSSI BEILIN, who is widely acknowledged as the most important political leader within the Israeli peace camp. The Palestinian delegation, which included prominent Palestinian academics and politicians, was headed by YASIR 'ABD RABBU, a former minister in the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY known to have been close to Palestinian leader YASIR ARAFAT.

The result of the talks was the Geneva Accord: Draft Permanent Status Agreement (GA), a highly detailed unofficial agreement that covers most aspects of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and represents the almost universally acknowledged basis for a peace settlement in a two-state formula. Although the GA is unofficial, it was negotiated by high-level Israeli and Palestinian teams and is based upon and extends the 1993 OSLO ACCORDS, the 1995 BEILIN-ABU MAZEN ACCORD, the unsuccessful but important 2000 CAMP DAVID negotiations that were followed by the December 2000 CLINTON PARAMETERS, and the 2001 Israeli-Palestinian TABA TALKS.

In embodying a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the Geneva Accord recognized and acknowledged "the right of both the Jewish and Palestinian peoples to statehood . . . within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force." Within this framework the main issues were resolved by mutual compromises, including territorial and security issues, the division of JERUSALEM, and the status of Palestinian REFUGEES. Other important issues, especially the disposition of WATER resources, were to be resolved later in special annexes to the accord.

At Geneva the Israeli delegation agreed to a more generous territorial compromise than Israel had previously. The accord required Israel to end its OCCUPATION and withdraw from almost all of the territories conquered in the 1967 WAR, including all of Gaza and some 98 percent of the West Bank. Even with these concessions, however, Israel would still comprise about 77 percent of the land of Palestine as it existed under the BRITISH MANDATE, leaving the Palestinians with only the remaining 23 percent. Approximately 2 percent of the WEST BANK, containing about 110,000 Jewish settlers within three of the largest Israeli SETTLEMENTS, would be transferred to Israeli sovereignty, while the remaining settlers scattered throughout the West Bank heartland (approximately 100,000) would be evacuated and settled in Israel. According to the accord, Palestinians would be compensated for this Israeli annexation through a land swap near the GAZA STRIP in which they would receive some 2 percent of Israeli territory. Because this land is agricultural, it could help the Gazan economy and widen the Palestinian corridor between Gaza and the West Bank.

To accommodate Israel's security concerns the Palestinian state would be demilitarized; no army or heavy weapons would be allowed, but only a police force sufficient to maintain internal law and order. All existing Palestinian militias would be disarmed, and Israeli border forces would be supplemented by an international peacekeeping force, composed mainly of US troops, which would control the BORDERS between Israel and the Palestinian state. The Palestinians agreed to allow Israel to continue high-altitude military flights over the West Bank and to maintain two early-warning radar stations in the JORDAN RIFT VALLEY.

Jerusalem would be divided into East JERUSALEM and West Jerusalem, and each would become the internationally recognized capital of each state. The line of division would be based on the general principle of the Clinton Parameters: "What is Jewish is Israeli, what is Arab is Palestinian." Israel would be allowed to keep the Jewish neighborhoods it has established since 1967 within what was formerly Arab East Jerusalem and would hold sovereignty over the Jewish Quarter of the OLD CITY and the WESTERN WALL. Other sites regarded as holy by Jews, Muslims, and Christians would be under international supervision. The Palestinians would gain sovereignty over the remaining Arab areas of East Jerusalem as well as most of the Old City—in particular, over the Muslim holy places on what Israel calls the TEMPLE MOUNT and the Arabs the AL-HARAM ASH-SHARIF.

Aside from Jerusalem, the most contentious issue in all Israeli-Palestinian negotiations has been over the right of return for the Palestinian REFUGEES from the 1948 and 1967 WARS. The Geneva Accord also embodied the Clinton Parameters on this issue: at the discretion of the Israeli government, a few Palestinians might be able to return to what is now Israel, but there would be no overall right of return. Instead, the refugees would be offered generous economic compensation provided by the international community and given the choice between an unlimited right to return to the new Palestinian state and resettlement in another country that would accept them.

Several important issues were not resolved at Geneva, principally those concerning legal and economic relations between the two states and the disposition of the WATER resources near the 1967 borders. Some settlements slated for annexation by Israel were built over aquifers, making it imperative for the Palestinian state to be compensated for the loss of these crucial water sources. The Geneva agreement posits the building of internationally financed desalination plants, although this as well as other technical, security, and legal issues was left for resolution in separate negotiations that would later be incorporated into the accord in special annexes.

In sum, the Jerusalem and refugee issues that prevented a comprehensive settlement at the 2000 Camp David negotiations were potentially resolved in the Geneva Accord on the basis of a compromise: the Palestinians essentially accepted the Clinton proposals on the refugees, thus giving Israel a de facto veto over any return. In return, the Israelis conceded the division of Jerusalem and Palestinian sovereignty over the al-Haram ash-Sharif.

As the al-Aqsa Intifada escalated throughout 2003–2004, leaders on both sides backed away from the Geneva Accord. The Israeli government of ARIEL SHARON dismissed it out of hand, and even EHUD BARAK, who had appointed Yossi Beilin as the head of the Israeli delegation at Taba, denounced the agreement. As was typical, Arafat's response was noncommittal, even though some of his closest associates were members of the Palestinian team and he had encouraged the negotiations. However, the two most important Palestinian successors to Arafat, MAHMUD ABBAS and AHMAD QUREI', have long been strong supporters of a compromise two-state settlement. It is widely understood and accepted by most Israelis and Palestinians—political leaders, the general public, and specialists alike—that the Geneva Accord will be the framework for any political settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Bibliography

- Abunimah, Ali. "The False Hope of the Geneva Accord." The Chicago Tribune. 3 December 2003.
- Abu Nimah, Hasan. "Geneva Accord: Why Can't the PA Learn from Its Mistakes?" The Electronic Intifada. 30 October 2003.
- Behar, Shiko, and Michael Warschawski. "The Israeli Text and Context of the Geneva Accord." Middle East Report Online. 24 November 2003.
- Beilin, Yossi. The Path to Geneva: The Quest for a Permanent Agreement, 1996–2004. New York: RDV Books/Akashic Books, 2004.

- Bishara, Azmi. "A Glimmer of Nothing." Al-Ahram (Cairo weekly). 23–29 October 2003.
- Burrows, Paul. "Geneva Accord: Analysis of Bankruptcy." Electronic Intifada. 3 January 2004. www.electronicintifada.net.
- European Union. EU Heads of Mission Report on East Jerusalem. EUOBSERVER Document. 9 March 2009. <http://www.euobserver.com>.
- al-Haq (West Bank Affiliate of the International Commission of Jurists). A Legal Commentary on the Geneva Accord. Ramallah, West Bank: al-Haq, May 2004.
- Israel, State of, and Palestine Liberation Organization. "The Geneva Accord: A Model Israeli-Palestinian Peace Agreement." 2003. www.geneva-accord.org/Accord.aspx?FolderID=33&lang=en.
- Klein, Menachem. "The Logic behind the Geneva Accord." Logos. 3:1 (2004).
- Pundak, Ron. "Read It before You Criticize It." Ha'aretz (Jerusalem). 17 December 2003.
- Slater, Jerome. "The Missing Pieces in The Missing Peace." Tikkun. 20:3 (2005).
- Special Document. "The Geneva Accord." Journal of Palestine Studies. 33:2 (2004).
- El-Zabri, Haithem. "Geneva Accord—PA Selling Out Palestinian Rights?" The Electronic Intifada. 22 October 2003. <http://www.electronicintifada.net>.

—Jerome Slater

Geneva Conference, 1973

The Geneva Conference was part of US secretary of state HENRY KISSINGER's diplomacy after the 1973 WAR. It was to be convened on 18 December 1973 with EGYPT, SYRIA, JORDAN, and Israel as participants; with the UNITED STATES and the SOVIET UNION as cosponsors; and with the UNITED NATIONS as the official host. It seems certain that Kissinger knew the conference could not resolve the basic issues in dispute; moreover, he personally opposed both a comprehensive peace settlement and Soviet participation. But he believed that convening such a conference would give him time for behind-the-scenes personal diplomacy and that the psychological factor of bringing Arabs and Israelis together for diplomatic intercourse could set an important precedent. Egypt, however, was the only willing participant among the Middle East actors. Kissinger declined to meet Syria's prerequisites, and Jordan's initial enthusiasm for a Geneva Conference was significantly dampened as a result of the ALGIERS SUMMIT (which transferred responsibility for the Palestinians to the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION [PLO]), although Jordan's wavering was overcome with relative ease.

Israel was strongly opposed to the Geneva Conference, and its disinclination to attend was far less easily resolved than Jordan's. It put forward a number of demands as prerequisites for its attendance at Geneva. One was for an explicit provision in the conference invitations stating that the original composition of the conference could be expanded only unanimously. This demand, to which Kissinger agreed, was intended to ensure that the PLO would be formally barred from Geneva and that its later participation at any reconvened conference would be subject to an Israeli veto. Israel was also given a private, written assurance that the United States would oppose, to the point of veto, any invitation to the PLO without Israel's consent. Kissinger's commitment prevented the United States from negotiating with the PLO until it met Israel's conditions. It was a substantial concession on the part of the United States considering that PLO leader YASIR ARAFAT had written to Kissinger on 10 October expressing the PLO's willingness to participate in postwar negotiations, given the intense feelings throughout the Arab world on this issue and the centrality of the Palestinian question to any final resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Israel also demanded that the United Nations have no more than a ceremonial role, arguing that granting the auspices for a peace conference between Israel and the Arab states to an organization in which the Arabs had an automatic majority was unacceptable.

In response Kissinger manipulated the program to ensure that the United Nations would only convene the conference and not supervise it, and also arranged the conference so that the participants would form subgroups as rapidly as possible, ensuring that diplomacy would proceed in a bilateral fashion. Israel refused to sit in the same room with the Syrians unless they first met Israel's demand for a list of prisoners from the 1973 War being held in Syria and allowed the Red Cross to visit them, but Syria refused to come to Geneva, so Kissinger did not have to negotiate with Damascus regarding Israel's demands.

When Syria's president Hafez Assad declined the invitation to Geneva, he stated that he would not attend a formal peace conference without an initial disengagement agreement with Israel. He was extremely disturbed that there was to be an agreement concerning the Egyptian front before there was one on the Syrian front. He saw this as a serious threat to the Egyptian-Syrian alliance and suspected, rightly, that Egyptian president Anwar Sadat had not informed him of all the arrangements he had concluded with Kissinger. Indeed, the secretary of state had played his role craftily in provoking ill-feeling between Syria and Egypt in the postwar period and by engaging in double-dealing and innuendoes.

The Geneva Conference convened on 21 December 1973 but was then recessed indefinitely. Nothing was accomplished at Geneva and subsequent attempts to reconvene the conference—for example, President JIMMY CARTER's 1977 effort—were unsuccessful, primarily because Israel objected to dealing with all the Arab states in a single forum, preferring instead bilateral negotiations.

See also GERALD FORD; RICHARD NIXON; UNITED STATES

Bibliography

- Chomsky, Noam. "US-Israel-Palestine." Znet. 11 April 2002.
- Neff, Donald. "It Happened in January." Washington Report on Middle East Affairs. January–February 1997.
- Rabinovich, Itamar. Waging Peace: Israel and the Arabs, 1948–2003, revised updated ed. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A. Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Shlaim, Avi. The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W. W. Norton, 2001.

Germany

Federal Republic of Germany and the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict

Within the first four days after YASIR ARAFAT, chairman of the PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION (PLO), began in August 1994 to organize the PALESTINIAN NATIONAL AUTHORITY (PNA), two foreign states established diplomatic representations with the PNA—SWEDEN and Germany (the Federal Republic of Germany or West Germany). Germany's swift action came because the OSLO PROCESS represented the first real opportunity for the German government to become involved in the Palestinian issue, not just verbally, as previously with political statements, but in a highly visible form—and at the same time in full agreement with Israel. Until then, "official Germany"—the government and the major political parties in the Bundestag (the federal parliament)—had treated the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as merely one dimension of the larger Arab-Israeli conflict, with the Palestinian issue consisting of little more than the REFUGEE problem rather than a matter of Palestinian political rights. If there was a political dimension to the problem for Germany, it was the TERRORISM of some of the Palestinian political groups—such as the BLACK SEPTEMBER ORGANIZATION's attack on Israeli athletes during the 1972 MUNICH OLYMPICS.

The prolonged exclusion of the Palestinian issue from official German policy was only one of the consequences of its policy options in the aftermath of the Nazi crimes. During the first decades after World War II, the Arab-Israeli conflict, with its attendant Palestinian dimension, was primarily an irritant in German endeavors to establish a working relationship with Jews—which at the time could only mean with Israel. On the German side, positive developments in these relations, accompanied by tensions and crises, were often expressed as a sense of guilt and obligation over the Nazi genocide of European Jews. This does not mean that the Arab-Israeli conflict went unrecognized in West Germany, but it was not perceived in German foreign policy or within German-Israeli relations as a factor in its own right. The conflict was viewed more as an obstacle to Germany's responsibilities toward Israel and an almost insurmountable dilemma for German foreign policy that sought to balance its relationship with Israel with German (commercial) interests in the Arab world. Only after—long after—the 1967 WAR did the conflict between Israel and its Arab neighbors and Israeli policy in the OCCUPIED TERRITORIES become a factor in German-Israeli relations too.

Several factors account for Germany's limited involvement. Consecutive West German governments from the 1950s onward failed to develop a coherent and consistent Middle East policy, in spite of good and in some cases quite close bilateral relations with most states in the Middle East. In the early years Germany simply operated without a formal Middle East policy, but a policy of "even-handedness" was more clearly articulated by the social-liberal government of German chancellor Willy Brandt after 1969, and the government could expect that its policy would be accepted by all the factions in the administration's coalition without major contradictions and conflicts. The situation improved somewhat when Germany initiated a two-pronged policy by adding to its bilateral relations with Israel an active involvement on the multilateral level. This came about through German participation in the European Community's European Political Cooperation (EPC), which placed a special emphasis on the Middle East. The EUROPEAN UNION's Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP) let the German government hide behind its partners when taking positions on the conflict; this was more acceptable to the Arab side but strained Germany's relations with Israel. Additionally, a more consistent policy vis-à-vis the Arab-Israeli conflict emerged due to Germany's own forays into multilateralism and efforts to improve relations with Arab and other European countries after 1989.

German Reparations to Israel. After World War II, Germany faced many difficulties in creating a foreign policy. To be accepted again by the international community, the first postwar West German government of Chancellor Konrad Adenauer had to demonstrate that it represented a very different Germany. That meant, among other things, that Germany would have to make amends (at least on the material level) for the Nazi crimes against the Jews. This led to the 1952 Agreements on Restitution and Indemnification (the Luxembourg Treaty), which for Germans became the Reparations Agreement, or the Agreement of Making Good Again. Under its terms West Germany committed itself to pay Israel 3 billion German marks (DM) ($820 million in 1952 US dollars) over a period of twelve to fourteen years as "global recompense for the costs of the integration" of Jewish refugees from Europe. The agreement stipulated that two-thirds of the amount would be spent on German-made goods and services, and one-third would be paid in currency to British companies for oil shipments to Israel.

Today the overall sum of DM 3.45 billion seems somewhat small, but for postwar Germany it amounted to 15 percent of the total annual budget of the federal government, which was DM 23 billion (over $5 billion) in the year when the agreements were signed. The cost to Germany is one reason why the agreements were strongly opposed by some, including Adenauer's own cabinet minister of finance. For Israel, on the other hand, the financial aspects of the agreement were of huge significance in its early years, helping it to

